"Since the opening of the Orphanage in 1910 all the children have been sent to schools suitable for their development so far as has been possible, both to Mission and Government Schools. Four are studying in the Church of England St. Mark's College, three are in the Methodist Fuchow Academy, three are attending the American Board Fuchow College, one is in a branch of the College at Dionghoh, and six in a branch at Inghok. Of the thirteen girls, ten are in boarding schools and the in industrial schools. Eight boys are in the Government Arsenal, two are in the Commercial School, seven are in the Commercial School, Shanghai; seven are learning embroidery with a Christian embroiderer, two are learning tailoring, two shoemaking, while sixteen are learning cabinetmaking at the Homes and twenty-eight are at Beacon Hill Farm, Sharp Peak Island, for their health, while working half a day to learn masonry, carpentry or care of goats and chickens. During the past year four have gone out from trades as self-supporting two employed by the Provincial General in his working school for the poor.

"The government officials and the leading patriots have been led to help, and during last year thirty-seven new children were admitted through funds furnished by Chinese donations. This shows that our Board are doing the best to enlist the help of Chinese patriots before the seven years of your generosity shall have come to the end, five years of which have already passed.

"We are sorry to say that China has not yet passed from the thralldom of superstition that keeps the people in great poverty on account of idolatry. Fukien is two-thirds mountain, and its mines are not yet developed. The one-third arable land is not sufficient to keep her dense population from lack of food, hence the people of Fukien are exceedingly poor.

"It is our united wish to make the Christian Herald Fukien Industrial Homes a permanent orphanage. It is impossible to do so without help from outside, so, having received the generous bounty of the Christian Herald these five years and more since opening the Homes, we, and of Chinese and foreign workers, placing the hands of the two hundred boys and girls whom your generosity has helped us save, come to beseech you to continue your generous help after the seven years shall have finished.

"With most grateful acknowledgment of your help,

"Most respectfully yours,
"(Rev.) W. S. PAKENHAM-WALKER, Chairman.

(Also signed by all the members of the Board of Managers.)

PLEASE address your gifts to the China Orphan Fund, Christian Herald, Bible House, New York. We suggest that you ask us to send you copies of the leaflet, "Little Hai-ieh-tsi," which you may hand to your friends.

This little booklet, by the way, is packed with human interest. It tells the true stories of some almost unbelievable cases of child life in China. It is valuable for the information it gives, and will be found very useful indeed to leaders in missionary meetings in Young People's Societies and other organizations. It is a nicely printed and well illustrated booklet, and if your heart is tender for the orphans under our care and you would interest your friends in forwarding this excellent work, you will find that you could not do better than ask for a number.

Another Training Camp

TRAINING CAMPS are popular these days. It may be thought that another one was not necessary; but this one was different. The men in training were Methodist missionaries, some on furlough and others brought from the foreign field to participate in the National Missionary Campaign. Between forty and fifty of these men received as thorough training at Ocean Grove as the business men received in the military training camp at Plattsburg. They gathered September 22 and drilled and practiced for six days successively. Now they are ready to go to the cities where conventions will be held this fall and winter, and have received everything that is possible in the way of training and equipment to enable them to round up thousands of registrations for the campaign. They will reach the Methodist constituency in the neighborhood of each convention city by means of extensive deputation work. The work will also be made intensive by the appointment of a Promotion and Conservation Committee in every local church to carry forward the new impulse.

These missionaries will assist in the conservation work as well as in the promotion work. The messages of the convention and the methods it presents will be taken by deputation methods to the last local church. The men will not only speak concerning the mission fields in which they labor, but will tell the local church the best modern methods for it to adopt in its own program of missionary work. The most effective plans for evangelism, community service, publicity, and finance will also be offered in the district meetings and local churches where these men speak. An effort will be made to have every local church committee adopt the most progressive and efficient methods.

The campaign includes conventions in about eighty leading cities throughout the country. Preparations have been in progress for a year. Everything else has given way to make these meetings a supreme success.

These Men (Four Bishops in the Seated Row) Attended the Gospel Training Camp at Ocean Grove

Our Mail-Bag

NOTICE

The editors of the Christian Herald will be glad to answer any question addressed to the Bag provided it be of general interest and not merely personal. Correspondents may use a nom de plume to identify the question, but all letters must contain name and address of the sender, in addition to nom de plume. No attention will be paid to anonymous letters.

Questions and Answers

MRS. M. B. W., Lancaster, Ky. Please explain Rom. 7:11—"For sin, taking occasion by the commandment, deceived me, and by it slew me." Also the 13th verse: "Was then that which is good made death unto me?" etc. Also verse 19: "For the good that I would I do not; but the evil which I would not, that I do." I believe that if we delight in the law of God and try in all things to do his will, in word, thought and deed, we are cleansed from all sin through the blood of Christ. John 3:9 declares: "Whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin; for his seed remaineth in him, and he cannot sin, because he is born of God."

Actually all commentators agree that the verses 7-23 in the seventh chapter of Romans are at all a description of Paul's state at the time he wrote the letter, but form a parenthesis, describing in a graphic way his experiences before he found deliverance through the power of Jesus. So changes of tense are common in literature, the narrator passing from the past tense to the present for the sake of vividness. It is clear from the phraseology of the seventh verse and a few verses following that he is describing a past experience. Paul's whole message and testimony is of victory, not of defeat. Verses 11 and 13 mean, then, that the commandment revealed the sinfulness of his nature, so that while he yielded to temptation his conscience troubled him. The law revealed sin and showed sin's power. Those who have no law commit sin and feel no condemnation. They do not realize that the things they do are sinful. The law shows us that they are sinful, but has no power to make us stop the sinful acts. Verse 19 shows the inner conflict of the awakened soul because he has received Christ's deliverance; he is attracted to the good, but finds no power within him to perform it. You are right in saying that the New Testament teaches that we may be cleansed from sin and kept by the power of God. I John 3:9 means that so long as a person is consciously loving God, so long as the power of God is in his soul, making him love God and love his brother, he will not wilfully sin. We must let go our hold on God and lose the daily implanted love from our souls before we can do a conscious and wilful wrong.

Disheartened, Abilene, Kan. Some time ago I gave my heart and my all to Jesus. At times I was greatly blessed, but there seemed always a little doubt or fear within that nerved my peace. I prayed much, but try as I would, I failed to get rid of it. Of late I seem to be losing ground. I can no longer feel the Lord so near, and fear he is forsaking me. Everything seems to be against me. Even some of those from whom I would expect help and encouragement seem concerned only about what I can do for them, and sometimes hard thoughts arise in my heart toward them. I know this is wrong and fight against such thoughts and pray for help to overcome them. But there are more defeats than victories. I am just discouraged. What can I do?

In saying: "I can no longer feel the Lord so near, and fear he is forsaking me." Now in such cases as this you must make your thoughts control your feelings rather than allow your feelings to control your thoughts. You know perfectly well that Jesus is just as near you as ever. He is not going to forsake you, because he loves you and wants to make you happy and useful. Since you know this for a fact, why is the use of letting your foolish feelings mislead you doubt? You must determine to trust God. Faith is an act of the will. Compel your will to follow your mind rather than your feelings, and you will find your feelings behaving themselves. You say you made a complete surrender of yourself to Christ. Now trust him to cleanse you fully and to keep you, moment by moment. You ought to be glad that other people expect you to help them rather than be mournful because they do not help you. One of the finest prophecies in the Bible is: "Behold, thou shalt call a nation that thou knowest not, and nations that knew not thee shall run unto thee because of the Lord thy God, and for the Holy One of Israel: for he hath glorified thee." (Is. 55:5.) God will bless us so richly that others will "run" to us to find out how we get so great a blessing. He can put upon us no greater honor than to let us help other people. Ask him to fill you with more love; to give you all the fruits of the Spirit, "love, joy, peace," and all the rest, then share these blessings generously with those near you.

J. F. R., Blue Rapids, Kan. With deep interest and sympathy but also pain in my heart, I have noted anxious letters about forgiveness and peace which those readers fail to possess, many claiming the lack of assurance that they are saved. To such I wish to say from deep personal experience that the simple reason in such cases is, that we allow our mind to dwell on ourselves and our imperfections instead of looking only to Christ and his supreme perfection. Only try that, other party intended taking to lead to reconciliation. The friendly advances of the other side having been rejected, thus causing new complications, it would seem to us to be the best thing—no matter how the dispute originated or who was the most at fault—for you to take the initiative, letting them know of your desire to forgive and come together as friends and fellow Christians again. If our Master forgave those who crucified him, we can surely forgive those who may have slighted us, and who may be only waiting for a signal on our part to come forward and make such amends as will bring gladness and peace to all hearts.

P. E. B., Sterling, Ohio. 1. We know of no absolute defense of war. In the ideal state of society, with Christian principles prevailing universally, war would be impossible. But we are still very far from that condition. As the world is now constituted, war is one of those unfortunate results of man's wickedness that are, humanly speaking, inevitable. All wars are bad, yet some are less so than others. A war to repel an invader who would involve a peaceful country in ruin and destroy or enslave its people, is to be regarded in a wholly different light from a war which is undertaken for the sake of conquest, or the thirst for military glory, regardless of the awful consequences. 2. You ask how a man calling himself done in the past. By good works they seek to affect this chain of causation so as to reach Nirvana, if not at the end of this life, at least in some subsequent existence. 2. The Grand Lama is the head of the Buddhist Church in Tibet, and the secular ruler, church and state being so closely united as to be practically one. He is believed by the Tibetans to be an incarnation of Buddha, and when the Grand Lama dies the body of incarnations which corresponds to the College of Cardinals at Rome selects as his successor a new-born child in whom they assert the soul of Buddha is reincarnated.

Mrs. L. L., Mound City, Kan. The ultimate aim of the Zionists, as it is represented by their leaders, is the organization of a Jewish commonwealth in Palestine, and the restoration of the ancient worship, but precisely in what form or to what extent is not stated. There are many Jews who regard the project as visionary and impractical. Yet it is admitted that the larger number believe in a glorious future for their race, according to prophecy. It is not claimed that they will have been converted to Christianity before their return. God may open their hearts and minds to the recognition of Jesus as Messiah afterward. On this subject read Rom. 11:26; Isa. 2:24; Jer. 3:18 and 16:14, 15; Ezek. 36:24; 37:21-25 and 39:28.

J. E. S., Dubuque, Iowa. The influence of the Church of Rome has always been adverse to popular education and enlightenment. This is shown in the condition of the lower classes not only in Spain, Italy, Austria and Portugal, but in practically all of the South American republics as well. Slavish obedience to Rome cannot exist where education is accessible to the masses.

Miscellaneous

Mrs. M. E. B., Nogal, New Mex. Different preachers have different methods, according to temperament. God can use men like Billy Sunday and also men whose pulpit manner is quietness itself. We know there are many people who dislike vociferation and gestulation, but there are others to whom it conveys the impression of intense earnestness and strong conviction. The preacher who delivers a quiet discourse to a cultured and refined audience would probably produce little effect upon such audiences as those that are reached by evangelists or the Salvation Army speakers. Remember Paul's statement that he was willing to be "all things to all men, if by any means he might save some."

J. A. A., Seattle, Wash. Never heard of it. There are many sensational rumors in connection with the war, and this is doubtless one of that class.

P. R. T., Columbus, Miss. The verses in Luke 11:45-51 were a sweeping reproach of the Pharisees, not only for the heartlessness of their religious observances but for their shameless inconsistency. The reference to Zacharias in v. 51 is explained by II Chronicles 24:20-22, which was the last recorded case of the kind and therefore suitable as an illustration of the Saviour's meaning. Zacharias' last words were: "The Lord require it," and Jesus warned them that it would be required "of this generation." John 7:38 does not refer to any particular passage but to the expression of the same idea in several passages, such as Isa. 58:11; Joel 3:18; Zach. 14:8; Ezek. 37:1-2. The Saviour's references in James 4:5, 6, are evidently to passages in Proverbs 21:10 and 3:34.

Reader, Pa. 1. The Scriptural passages regarding divorce will be found in Gen. 3:24, Matt. 19:5, 6; Mark 10:7, 8; Eph. 5:31; I Cor. 7:11, 39; Luke 16:18; Matt. 5:32; Rom. 7:3 and elsewhere. 2. We cannot pass judgment in the case you mention. The Divine mercy is boundless. Whosoever cometh He will in no wise cast out, if they come in the right spirit of contrition and repentance. 3. There are many amusements that are wholesome and proper, and there is no reason why professing Christians should not enjoy them. There is a time for mirth and a time for sadness. It is a mistake to imagine that God's people are doomed to gloomy lives, and that religion is a melancholy affair. Discriminate in your choice of amusements, avoiding those that are doubtful and also any by participating in which you may exert a bad influence on others.

A MESSAGE by Margaret Sangster Jr.

THIS birdie's a carrier pidgeon,
Who darts 'mong th' clouds in th' sky;
I wonder if he'll take a message
Way up, until goin' so high,
He reaches the gate of God's Heaven,
The home o' th' good folks that die.

You see, they say mother has gone there,
An' how in the world could she know
That I'm thinking o' her every minute,
Jes' lovin' and missin' her so!
That's why I am givin' th' birdie
A message an' bidding him go.

Perhaps in God's Heaven it's lonely,
For people who loves you, you see—
An' so I am tellin' th' birdie
To fly jes' as fast as can be—
I know he'll remember th' message:
A kiss for my mother from me!

dear tried and worrying soul. Stop thinking about self and think about the blessed Christ as he heals the demoniac, makes a noble woman of Magdalene, speaks a kind word to Judas, has forgiveness for Peter, Paradise for the penitent robber and offers of rest and peace for the heavy laden. If you do this you will enjoy the peace that passeth all understanding.

C. B., Talmage, Pa. The name "Dead Sea" nowhere occurs in the Bible, and was not used by writers before the time of Christ. The name was evidently given to the lake on account of the belief that no life existed in it. But some low forms of life are found in the water, and many small animals and birds live near the shores. The great tragedy of Sodom and Gomorrah may also have led to the bestowal of the name.

Mrs. M. J. W., Bardolph, Ill. Almost all languages are related, some more closely than others. In dealing with the most ancient languages, the ablest scholars throughout the world have worked together until they found the key, and then having mastered the alphabet they have learned the structure and form. All such processes are slow and many difficulties present themselves; but they yield to persevering scholarship in the end. As to the correctness of translations, where two or more Orientalists, living far apart from each other, having no communication on the subject, make translations of the same ancient writing in almost precise agreement with each other, its accuracy is accepted as conclusive.

Shut-In, Brooklyn, N. Y. We cannot advise in a matter concerning which we have not sufficient information to form an opinion. The quarrel is evidently one which could readily be settled amicably if all parties were so disposed, and as all are professing Christians, we think it ought to be so arranged without further delay. It was an unfortunate mistake to interrupt a prayer, as that was probably the first step the a Christian can justify himself in going to war. Scripture is very plain in its condemnation of war. If any community or nation had such a firm faith in God as their shield and defender that they would trust him absolutely, they need never fear war, for he would protect them; but is there such a nation or such faith? To suppose this possible, would be to suppose that nation had reached the ideal Christian state. Unfortunately, none has reached it. Jesus spoke against war, but the nations today do not echo or follow his teachings. When they do, then the time prophesied will have come when swords and spears shall be transformed into implements of peaceful industry. Jesus also taught that wars would continue to the end of the age. 3. We are not to judge the attitude of individuals, whether their motives and actions be wicked or otherwise; such judgment is for God alone. It remains for us, in our own humble spheres, to live at peace with all men, to hate none, but to love all, and to recognize all as "of one blood"—members of the great human brotherhood. And thus, by our own lives and examples, we shall be making war upon war in the way he desired his followers to do.

E. F. B., Sacramento, Calif. 1. Can you tell me something about the history and doctrines of the Buddhist religion? 2. What is the Grand Lama?

1. Buddhism is the religious or philosophic system founded by Gotama Buddha, who lived in the fifth or sixth century B.C. Buddha is not a proper name, but a title, and means "the enlightened one." The Buddhists believe in the transmigration of souls, and the aim of the Buddhist devotee is to attain enlightenment or perfect knowledge of the truth, in order to achieve Nirvana, or extinction, and the end of transmigration. Thus the Buddhists do not believe in immortality. But they teach the existence of what they call the Karma, or principle of ethical causation, and that our happiness or misery is the result of deeds

Amarilly of Clothes-Line Alley

By BELLE K. MANIATES

Copyright, 1915, by Little, Brown & Co. All rights reserved

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

AMARILLY made her bow to Christian Herald readers from the threshold of the Barlow "Theater," where she mopped floors and dreamed dreams. They followed her home to a dark little court and became acquainted with her mother, her sister Cory, her brother Flamingus and the twins. They saw her handle the domestic difficulty entailed by the addition of a boarder in the family, and applauded the resourcefulness with which she overcame the obstacle of numbers by the expedient of "double-decking" the crowd. They saw her under the tutelage of this boarder begin a struggle for the education necessary to the career of her dreams, and finally they went with her to the Saturday afternoon school at St. Mark's, to the class whose teacher wore real hair and wasn't made up. There she won the heart and whole-souled interest of this teacher, and came home in triumph in the teacher's electric brougham.

Through the interest of this teacher, Colette King, Amarilly's mother became the laundress of St. Mark's and Amarilly met the rector, Rev. (St.) John Meredith, who invited her to attend morning service and who showed something more than a pastor's interest in Colette. Amarilly's soul responded to the church service and her heart beat in unison with the music. She thought it must be what Heaven was.

CHAPTER VI

MONDAY'S mops and pails broke in upon the spell of Amarilly's spiritual enchantment to some extent, but remembrance of the scenic effects lingered and was refreshed by the clothes-line of vestal garb which manifested the family prosperity, and heralded to the neighborhood that the Jenkinses' star was in the ascendant.

"Them Jenkinses," said Mrs. Hudgers, who lived next door, "is orful stuck up sence they got the sudsins' of them surpluses."

This animadversion was soon conveyed to Amarilly, who instantly and freely forgave the critic.

"She's old and rheumatic," argued the little girl. "She can't git to go no-whars, and folks that is shut in too long spiles, jest like canned goods. Besides, her clock has stopped. Nobody can't go on without no clock."

Out of pity for the old woman's sequestered life, Amarilly was wont to relate to her all the current events, and it was through the child's keen young optics that Mrs. Hudgers saw life. An eloquent and vivid description of St. Mark's service was eagerly related.

"I allers thought I'd like to see them Episcopal's," she remarked regretfully. "Ef church air wa'n't so bad fer my rheumatiz, I'd pay car-fare jest to see it onet. I was brung up Methodist though."

This desire suggested to Amarilly's fertile little brain a way to make a contribution to John Meredith's pet missionary scheme, whose merits he had so ardently expounded from the pulpit.

"I'll hev a sacred concert like the one he said they was goin' to hev to the church," she decided.

She was fully aware of the sensation created by the Thursday clothes-line of surpluses, and she resolved to profit thereby while the garments were still a novelty. Consequently the neighborhood was notified that a sacred concert by a "surplused choir" composed of members of the Jenkins household, assisted by a few of their schoolmates, would be given a week from Wednesday night. This particular night was chosen for the reason that the church washing was put to soak late on a Wednesday.

There was a short, sharp conflict in Amarilly's conscience before she convinced herself it would not be wrong to allow the impromptu choir to don the surpluses of St. Mark's.

"They wouldn't spile 'em jest a-wear-in' 'em onet," she argued sharply, for Amarilly always "sassed back" with spirit to her moral accuser. "Tain't as if they wa'n't a-goin' into the wash as soon as they take 'em off. Besides," as a triumphant clincher, "think of the cause!"

Amarilly had heard the Boarder and a young Socialist exchanging views, and she had caught this slogan, which was a tempting phrase and adequate to white-wash many a doubtful act. It proved effectual in silencing the conscience which Amarilly slipped back into its case and fastened securely.

She held nightly rehearsals for the proposed entertainment. After the first the novelty was exhausted, and on the next night there was a falling off in attendance, so the young director diplomatically resorted to the use of decoy ducks in the shape of a pan of popcorn, a candy pull, and an apple roast. By "This ain't no show, and it ain't no time to clap," she explained to the Boarder, who cautioned the congregation against further demonstration.

Flamingus read a psalm in a sing-song, resonant voice, and then Amarilly announced a hymn, cordially inviting the neighbors to "jine in." The response was lusty-lunged, and there was a unanimous request for another tune. After Amarilly had explained the use to which the collection was to be put, Gus passed a pie tin, while an offertory solo was rendered by Bud in sweet, treble tones.

THE sacred concert was pronounced a great success by the audience, who promptly dispersed at its close.

"I came to call upon you," said the young rector such inducements she whipped her chorus into line, ably assisted by Bud, who had profited by his attendance at St. Mark's.

The Jenkins dwelling was singularly well adapted for a public performance, as, to use Mrs. Wint's phraseology, "it had no insides." The rooms were partitioned off by means of curtains on strings. These were taken down on the night of the concert. So the "settin'-room," the "bedroom off," and the kitchen became one. Seats were improvised by means of boards stretched across inverted washtubs.

At seven o'clock on the night set for the concert the audience was solemnly ushered in by the Boarder. No signs of the performers were visible, but sounds of suppressed excitement issued from the woodshed, which had been converted into a vestry.

Presently the choir, chanting a hymn, made an impressive and effective entrance. To Amarilly's consternation this evoked an applause, which jarred on her sense of propriety.

While the Boarder was shifting the curtains to their former positions, and Mrs. Jenkins and Amarilly were busily engaged in divesting the choir of their costumes, the front door opened and disclosed a vision of loveliness in the form of Colette.

"I knocked," she explained apologetically to the Boarder, "but no one heard me. Are the family all away?"

"They are in the woodshed. Walk right out," he urged hospitably.

Colette stepped to the door and, on opening it, gazed in bewilderment at the disrobing choir.

"These are not St. Mark's choir-boys, are they?" she asked wonderingly.

Mrs. Jenkins felt herself growing weak-kneed. She looked apprehensively at Amarilly, who stepped bravely to the front with the air of one who feels that the end justifies the means.

"It was fer him—fer Mr. St. John I done it," she began in explanation, and then she proceeded to relate the particulars of her scheme and its accomplishment.

She had but just finished this narrative when suddenly in the line of vision came the form of the young rector himself. He had been ushered to the Boarder, who was still active engaged in "redding up."

"I came to call upon you, for consider you one of my parishioners," he said to Amarilly, his face flushed at the unexpected encounter with Colette.

Amarilly breathed a devout prayer of thankfulness that the last surplice had been removed and was now being soaked by her mother.

Colette's eyes were dancing with the delight of mischief-making as she directed, in soft but mirthful tones:

"Tell Mr. St. John about your choir and concert."

Amarilly's eyes lowered in consternation. She was in great awe of this young man whose square chin was in such extreme contradiction to his softly luminous eyes, and she began to feel less fortified by the reminder of the "caution."

"I'd ruther not," she faltered.

"Then don't, Amarilly," he said gently.

"Mebby that's why I'd orter," she acknowledged, lifting serious eyes to his.

"You said that Sunday that we ought to turn out of the way fer hard times. I don't want it to be hard for you to tell me anything, Amarilly," he said reassuringly. "Suppose you show me that you trust me by telling me about your concert."

So once more Amarilly gave a detail of her plan for raising money for the mission, and of its successful fulfillment. John listened with varying emotions, struggling heroically to maintain his gravity as he heard of the realization of the long-cherished, long-deferred dream of Mrs. Hudgers.

"And we took in thirty-seven cents," she said in breathless excitement, and she handed him the contents of the pail.

"Amarilly," he replied fervently with the look that Colette was learning to love, "you did just right to use the surpluses, and this contribution means more to me than any I have received. It was a sweet and generous thought that prompted your concert."

Amarilly's little heart glowed with pride at this acknowledgment.

At that moment came Bud, singing a snatch of his solo.

"Is this the little brother that sang the offertory?"

"Yes; that's him—Bud."

"Bud, will you sing it again for me, now?"

"Sure thing!" said the atom of boy, promptly mounting a soap box.

He threw back a mop of thick black hair, rolled his eyes ceilingward, and let his sweet, clear voice have full swing.

"Oh, Bud, you darling! Why don't you tell me he could sing like that, Amarilly?" cried Colette at the close of the song.

"We must have him in St. Mark's choir," declared Mr. Meredith. "You may bring him to the rectory to-morrow, Amarilly, and I will have the choir master try his voice. Besides receiving instruction and practice every week he will be paid for his singing."

Money for Bud's voice! So much prosperity was scarcely believable.

"Fust the Guild school, Miss King's washing, the surpluses, and now Bud! thought Amarilly exuberantly. "Next thing I know, I'll be on the stage."

"I must go," said Colette presently. "My car is just around the corner of the next street. John, will you ride up with me?"

HE accepted the invitation with alacrity. Colette's sidelong glance noted a certain masterful look about his chin, and there was a warning, melting ring in his voice that denoted a determination to overcome all obstacles and triumph by sheer force of will. She was not ready to listen to him yet, and evader of issues, chatted incessantly on the way to the car. He waited in patience, biding his time. As he neared the turn in the alley, she placed her reserve card.

Henry didn't think it prudent to bring the big car into the Jenkinses' garage, so he waited in the next street. I expect father will be there by the time. We dropped him at a factory near by, where he was to speak to the United Workmen.

Colette smiled at the drooping of John's features as he beheld her father announced in the tonneau.

"Oh, John! I am glad you were here to protect my little girl through these by-ways. I was just on the point of looking after myself."

When the car stopped at the rectory and Colette bade John good night, the resolute, forward thrust was still prominent in his chin.

Henry went straight to his study and wrote an ardent avowal of his love. Then he sealed the letter and despatched it by special messenger. There would be no more suspense, he thought, for she would have to respond by a direct affirmation or negation.

CHAPTER VII

The tide of the Jenkinses' prosperity here came the inevitable ebb. On the fateful Friday morning succeeding the concert, Mrs. Hudgers, looking from her window, saw a little group of children with books under their arms retreating from school. Having no timepiece, she was accustomed to depend on the passing to and fro of the children for guidance as to the performance of her household affairs.

"My sakes, but twelve o'clock come quick to-day," she thought, as she kindled the fire and set the kettle over it in preparation of her midday meal.

Neighbor dropping in viewed these proceedings with surprise.

"Why, Mrs. Hudgers, ain't you et yer breakfast yet?"

"I course I hev. I'm puttin' the kettle over fer my dinner."

"Inner! why, it's only a half arter nin."

Mrs. Hudgers looked incredulous.

"Seen the chillern a-goin' hum from school," she maintained.

"Them was the Jenkinses. Iry hez come down with the scarlet fever, and there all in quarrytine."

"Now you talk! Wait till I put the kettle off the bile."

Two neighbors sat down to discuss this affliction with the ready sympathy of the poor for the poor. Their passing envy of the Jenkinses' good fortune was instantly skimmed from the surface of the friendliness, which had only lain dormant and wanted but the touch of trouble to make them once more akin.

Even the city physician had pronounced Iry's "spell" to be scarlet fever; the other members of the household were immediately summoned by emergency calls. The children came from school, Amarilly from the theater, and the Boarder from his switch to hold an excited family conference.

"It's a good thing we got the washin' all hum afore Iry was took," declared the optimistic Amarilly.

"Har's two things here yet," reported Mrs. Jenkins. "Gus come hum to the last night to take the preacher's surp and Miss King's lace waist. You was so tired I didn't tell you, 'cause I kin'd you'd be sot on goin' with them you-elf. They're all did up."

"Well, they'll hev to stay right here with us and the fever," said Amarilly philosophically.

A heart she secretly rejoiced in the retaking of these two garments, for they seemed to keep her in touch with the owners, whom she would be unable to see until Iry had recovered.

"Don't see what we are goin' to do, Amarilly," said her mother despairingly. "Thar'll be nuthin' comin' in and many extryes."

"Extryes," cheerfully assured the little comforter. "The city doctor'll take care of Iry and bring the medicines. We've laid by some sence we got the chum wash. It'll tide us over till Iry gets well. We all need a vacation from wor anyhow."

At the beginning of the next week a familiar bill came from Colette, to buy jellies and things for Iry," she wrote. A similar contribution came from John Meredith.

"We air on Easy Street onct more!" cried Amarilly joyfully.

"I hate to take the money from them," sighed Mrs. Jenkins.

"We'll make it up to them when we kin work again," consoled Amarilly. "Better to take from friends than from the city. It won't be fer long. Iry seems to hev took it light, the doctor said."

This diagnosis proved correct, but it had not occurred to Amarilly in her prognostications that the question of the duration of the quarantine was not entirely dependent upon Iry's convalescence. Like a row of blocks the children, with the exception of Flamingus and Amarilly, in rapid succession came down with a mild form of the fever. Mrs. Jenkins and Amarilly divided the labors of cook and nurse, but the mainstay of the family was the Boarder. He aided in the housework, and as an entertainer of the sick he proved invaluable. He told stories, drew pictures, propounded riddles, whittled boats and animals, played "Beggar my Neighbor," and sang songs for the convalescent ward.

When the last cent of the Jenkinses' reserve fund and the contributions from the rector and Colette had been exhausted, the Boarder put a willing hand in his pocket and drew forth his all to share with the afflicted family. There was one appalling night when the treasury was entirely depleted, and the larder was a veritable Mother Hubbard's cupboard.

"Something will come," prophesied Amarilly trustfully.

SOMETHING did come the next day in the shape of a donation of five dollars from Mr. Vedder, who had heard of the prolonged quarantine. Amarilly wept from gratitude and gladness.

"The perlessun allers stand by each other," she murmured proudly.

This last act of charity kept the Jenkinses' pot boiling until the premises were officially and thoroughly fumigated. Again famine threatened. The switch remained open to the Boarder, and he was once more on duty, but he had as yet drawn no wages. One morning there was nothing for breakfast.

"I'll pawn my tucker at noon," promised the Boarder, "and bring home something for dinner."

"There is lots of folks as goes without breakfast allers, from choice," informed Amarilly. "Miss Vail, the teacher at the Guild, says it's hygienic."

"It won't hurt us and the boys," said Mrs. Jenkins, "but Iry and Co is too young to go hungry even if it be hygienic."

"They ain't a-goin' hungry," declared Amarilly. "I'll pervide fer them."

With a small pitcher under her cape she started bravely forth on a foraging expedition. After walking a few blocks she came to a white house whose wood-house joined the alley. Hiding behind a barrel she watched and waited until a woman opened the back door and set a soup plate of milk on the lowest step.

"Come a kits! Come a kits!" she called shrilly, and then went back into the house.

The "kits" came on the run; so did Amarilly. She arrived first, and hastily emptied the contents of the soup plate into her pitcher. Then she fled.

"Here's milk for Iry," she announced, handing the pitcher to her mother.

"Now I'll go and get some breakfast for Co."

She returned presently with a sugared doughnut.

"Where did you borry the milk and nuteake?" asked her mother wonderingly.

"I didn't borry them," replied Amarilly stoically. "I stole them."

"Stole them! Am-a-ril-ly Jenk-ins!"

"Twan't exactly stealin'," argued Amarilly cheerfully. "I took the milk from two little cats what git stuffed with milk every morning and night. The doughnut had jest been stuck in a parrot's cage. He hedn't tetcht it."

"What would the preacher say!" demanded her mother solemnly. "He would say it was wrong."

Continued on page 1065

Beech-Nut

Tomato Catsup

Did you ever taste a natural tomato catsup? One that you find worth eating for its own flavor?

There is just one way to produce it—the Beech-Nut way.

Tomatoes grown near Rochester—the finest country for catsup tomatoes in the world. Ripened on the vines—carried in right from the farms. No shipping long distances—no re-cooking—no loss of flavor. Two hours to make, bottle and sterilize—and Beech-Nut Tomato Catsup is ready for you.

Exceptional in delicacy of flavor—yet costs no more than the ordinary catsups.

Of your grocer—two sizes, 25 cents and 15 cents (in the extreme West, a little more).

Makers of America's Most Famous Bacon—Beech-Nut Bacon

BEECH-NUT PACKING COMPANY
Canajoharie, N. Y.
Catsup Plant at Rochester, N. Y.

Avoid those colds this winter—wear

VELLASTIC

Elastic Ribbed, Fleece-Lined

UNDERWEAR

NO weather too cold, no place too draughty for VELLASTIC wearers. Doctors will tell you that the soft, luxurious, downy VELLASTIC fleece holds a cushion of warm, dry air next to the skin that keeps out chill and cold. The porosity of the patented ribbed VELLASTIC fabric ventilates the fleece lining, keeping it clean and hygienic—its elasticity gives perfect freedom of movement and insures smooth easy fit. Ask your dealer for VELLASTIC—it's cheaper than doctor's bills.

UNION SUITS $1.00 For MEN, WOMEN and CHILDREN SEPARATE GARMENTS 50c

UTICA KNITTING CO., Makers Dept. 10, Utica, N. Y.

How to be Well and Strong without Diet, Drugs or Appliances

We have known for years what it is that has control of every function of the body, but undue consideration of individual weaknesses and diseases has so blinded us that we have totally neglected that which is greater than all else—that upon which the health of every organ and consequently our health depends.

By HOMER DAVIES

HAVE you ever stopped to consider just what it is that keeps that most wonderfully delicate and intricate piece of mechanism—your body—working in harmony? If you have not you should become acquainted without delay with the fact that it is your nerves.

Your nerves regulate and govern absolutely every process that goes on within you. Sever the nerves leading to the eye and not only would you be unable to move the eye but your sight would be gone forever. Your nerves regulate the beating of your heart, one set making it beat and another keeping it from racing too fast. You breathe unconsciously, your digestion proceeds without your having to think of it at all. The glands create and distribute their secretions, all at the bidding of your nerves.

It has been definitely established that more than 99 per cent. of all humanity, past their majority, are deficient from a standpoint of nerve strength and, therefore, are deficient in nervous energy.

Nearly all functional weaknesses and disorders can be directly traced to weak nerves and depleted vitality.

You have never seen a man of achievements in athletics, in business or any profession who did not have a highly developed and powerful nervous system. Did he not possess this he could not be healthy, nor would he have the vitality to push his work through to success.

Macfadden, who is probably the foremost general physical culture authority in the world, says of Energy: "The longer and more thoroughly we study the structure and functions of the human body, the more clear and absolute becomes the conviction that the secret of human strength and energy lies in the nervous system."

Napoleon said: "No man can win in the battle of life who has not Courage and Persistency. These are impossible where Energy is lacking, hence Energy is the indispensable quality of great Success."

No greater truth than this was ever uttered. Were it possible to chronicle all the failures, not due to lack of brains, but to a lack of physical vitality, which is now recognized as an illness in itself, there would be a list so long as to appal the world.

Every great man of history—every highly successful man of the day—is possessed of more than an average amount of energy. Some have been gifted with this wonderful quality as were Lincoln, Napoleon, Rockefeller, Morgan and others; and some developed it as did Gladstone and Roosevelt.

Not one of these men, as they admit themselves, could ever have attained the position they occupy were it not for this factor.

Big muscles unless accompanied by powerful nerves are as useless as a trolley car without electricity. If your nerves are weak your every organ will be weak in exact proportion. If you are troubled with indigestion, constipation, a weak heart, weak kidneys, a torpid liver, or any of the functional ills that flesh is heir to you should look immediately to your nerves. For unless your vital organs are receiving their due share of nervous energy they cannot possibly do their work. Advanced thinkers in the medical world as well as those who do not use drugs have sought in vain for some direct method for the strengthening of the nerves.

Exercise, Osteopathy, Deep Breathing, Chiropractic, Hydrotherapy, Electricity and other methods without end have been advanced at one time or another, as offering an ideal means for the building of vitality, or rather nervous energy, which is what vitality really means.

Many of these have much to commend them, but not one can benefit the nerves except in a most roundabout and uncertain way.

It has remained for one Robert Duncan to discover a method for direct nerve stimulation. By his methods he can build and create a degree of energy that you can actually feel course through your body within a few minutes unless you are horribly run down, and even then, it can be developed within a very short time.

By this method he is enabling people to absolutely overcome functional weaknesses and disorders without resorting to tortuous exercise, drugs, repulsive diets, and in addition build for themselves a degree of energy that will be the determining factor in their success in life.

He tells all about this discovery in his book "Building Energy." He has agreed to send a copy to any reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who will write Robert Duncan, Room 619, U. S. Express Building, New York City, enclosing 25 cents for the book in stamps or coin.

Every man and woman in America should read this work and every man, woman and child should follow its precepts.

This country is coming to be known as a country of neurasthenics. You should not be one of those who is a slave to his nerves. Develop them so that you may enjoy the health and the worldly success that is your birthright. Advertisment.

The Boy Joash Crowned King

International Sunday School Lesson for October 31.

II Kings 11:1-20

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By Rev. F. B. Meyer, B. A.

"The house of the wicked shall be overthrown, but the tent of the upright shall flourish." Prov. 14:11.

The contrast here is between house of the wicked and the tent of the upright. The wicked man, —the word would include the irreligious—is driven to build something permanent and enduring, because he has no assurance for the present world or the future, save his own efforts and forecast. But the upright those who can look into the face of God with conscious acceptance—can afford to dwell in tents, because they know that if the earthly house of this tabernacle were dissolved, they have a building of God, a house not made with hands eternal in the heavens. But however deep the foundations or solid the walls of the house of the wicked, it will not be able to stand in the day of hurricane and flood. "Thou shalt diligently consider its place, but it shall not be." Whilst, however slight the hold of the tent on mother earth may be, if God be the ropes, it will persist, though a cyclone use its entire force on its frail structure. Under these circumstances, who would not rather live in the tent than the house? Besides the soul's slight tent lets in more of heaven's light and air than the thick walls of a palace, so much healthier to live under canvas!

Come, Inherit the Kingdom

By Arthur H. Howland

THE names of Joash and Jehu are linked together as great royal reformers. Jehu overthrew the dynasty of Ahab and almost extirpated the worship of Baal from the northern kingdom of Israel, while Joash wrought in the southern kingdom of Judah the same sort of a revival. We shall study next week this reforming work of Joash; today we have the narrative of his coronation.

But there was a vast difference between the work of Jehu and that of Joash. The reforms of Joash were almost bloodless, while the history of Jehu reeks with blood. His record is not only horribly stained with murder, but with infamous treachery. He slew ten kings, seventy princes and a whole multitude of Baal-worshippers whom he had lured to their temple by lies. We are not surprised that the historian records: "But Jehu took no heed to walk in the law of the Lord with all his heart."

Yet while one part of the story is so dreadful, both must be considered together because they were part of the one general movement to rid the land of Baal worship. The two stories are connected further by the fact of the intermarriage of the two reigning families. At Samaria, Ahab and Jezebel reigned over the northern kingdom; at Jerusalem Jehoshaphat reigned over the southern kingdom. Jehoshaphat was a good man, but made the mistake of allying himself too closely with his wicked neighbor on the north. Besides helping Ahab in his wars, Jehoshaphat allowed his son Joram to marry Athaliah, the daughter of the wretched pair who reigned at Samaria. Jezebel introduced and promoted Baal worship throughout Israel, having a Baal temple at the royal city; Athaliah prompted Baal worship in Judea, and a Baal temple was built at Jerusalem near the temple of Jehovah.

ELIJAH and Elisha warned the king and queen and the people of Israel; fierce and bloody Jehu came upon the scene and drowned idolatry in a sea of blood. At about the time that Jehu was killing Joram, king of Israel, fatally wounding Ahaziah, king of Judah, who happened to be visiting Joram, and making way with Ahab's seventy sons, Athaliah, the mother of Ahaziah, devised the pleasant plan of killing all her grandchildren and all others who might lay claim to the throne so that she might be the reigning queen. She did a fairly thorough piece of work, but one little baby was saved. He was two years old on that dreadful day when the priest's wife, Jehosheba, caught him up, ran away and hid him in the temple.

Six years the little boy was hid in the house of the Lord, while his wicked grandmother reigned. Here is a good place to stop and think of some other things besides idolatry and bloodshed. A little boy—a very little boy, only a baby—hid in the house of the true God. There was a power in that hidden life that was to accomplish God's work, and accomplish it in God's way. Let's try to think of some of the "hiding" verses in the Bible. Ask your pupils to try to locate those you will mention and suggest some others for themselves. "He that dwelleth in the secret place, the Most High shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty." "In the time of trouble he shall hide me in his pavilion: in the secret of his tabernacle shall he hide me." "Thou shalt hide them in the secret of thy presence." "Seest thou affection on things above, not on things on the earth, for ye are dead, and your life is hid with Christ in God." "Abide hidden with God, is mightier than all the nations. Moses hid in the swamps of Egypt; Samuel, a boy in the priest's tabernacle; Joash in the temple; monarchy in a good home with his mother and grandmother—these boys, like the baby Jesus in the Bethlehem stable, were watched over and kept and prepared for great deeds that would shake world and build the right.

BUT not only babies and boys can hide without sacrificing dignity and courage. It is not cowardly to be at times. This new and bitter war is reading about every day is largely fought by men in hiding. So the place of a brave Christian is in that secret hiding-place—in God's presence. When troubles come, when perplexities baffle, when the clouds grow darker, hide a little deeper, get closer, get farther in toward the kind, strong heart of God.

After six years the good priest Jehoiada thought the time had come to bring out the royal boy and make him king. He organized a revolution against the murderous queen. The other might turn aside to speak of some righteous rebellions and revolutions and start a discussion as to when it might be right to revolt against law and government.

The description of the military arrangement of the camp is a little hard to follow. Evidently it took place on a Sabbath and the palace guard who were on duty on Sabbath days were let into the plan. This Sabbath guard at all times probably amounted to 500 men—was to be divided in five parts, three companies guarding the gates to the palace and two companies placed on guard within the temple. To make their interest as well as their efficiency greater certain ancient armor and weapons that had been treasured from David's time were put into their hands. The two companies inside the temple stood in ranks facing a space near the altar within which the young king was to appear. Crowds of expectant people waited in the outer court. When the priest "brought out the king son, and put the crown upon him and gave him the testimony; and they made him king, and anointed him; and they clapped their hands and said, Live the king."

Athaliah, the wicked queen, heard and approached, and cried: "Treason and he was slain. That was practically the killing the revolutionists had done, except that they slew the chief priest of Baal.

NOTICE the various covenants. Jehoiada made first a covenant with the people who were to help the revolt (verse 4). When you have an important enterprise on hand, make sure that your co-workers are united in purpose. Then, after the coronation, the

ENGINE POWER

Costs Less Now

Besides our lower prices, WITTE engines use less fuel and cost less for up-keep—enough saving, in a year, to pay entire engine price.

WITTE Engines

Gasoline, Kerosene, Distillate, Gas.
H-P $34.95; 4 H-P $69.75; 6 H-P $97.75
H-P $139.65; 12 H-P $197.00; 16 H-P $279.70
2 H-P $359.80. Portable Engines. Proportionately low.
C. O. B. Factory. Cash or Easy Terms.

Sent Direct From Factory Under 5-Year Guarantee

Before you buy any engine, for any kind of use, let us tell you where, and how, to look for engineering quality—the things that make lower cost power with easy starting, no fussing, steady running and utmost durability.

New Book Free

Tells plainly how to judge engines easily. Write us for it today.

ED. H. WITTE, WITTE ENGINE WORKS,
2005 Oakland Avenue,
Kansas City, Mo.
2095 Empire Building,
Pittsburgh, Pa.

JUST OUT!
FALL STYLE BOOK
40 CLOTH SAMPLES

$10 to $22

by a Glen Rock Suit or Overcoat and Save $8 or More.

Look for our Men's Fall style Book and 40 samples of cloth, pattern, and color. You select the material, and we make the suit to your measurements in order to have which is the best. You can't go wrong. You can't lose on the Glen Rock plan. Your garment is guaranteed not only to fit perfectly, but to keep its perfect shape permanently. Glen Rock is famous for the excellence of both, tailoring, cutting and fitting. Signed guarantee attached to every made-to-order suit. The best step to save $8 to $15 to send for your Fall style Book and 40 cloth samples. IT'S FREE!

GLEN ROCK WOOLEN CO.
J. H. Orange, President
21 Main Street, Somerville, N. J.

The Doctor Uses CARBOLIC ACID

Carbolic acid is one of the three or four most efficient antiseptics known to medicine.

Vaseline CARBOLATED

Petroleum Jelly

A safe, convenient form of this powerful antiseptic, for home use in dressing cuts, bruises and sores. It contains 1% of carbolic acid, blended with a pure "Vaseline" base. Sold at drug and general stores.

Send postal for free "Vaseline" booklet.

CHESEBROUGH MFG. CO.
3 State Street (Consolidated) New York City

TYPEWRITERS ALL MAKES

Prices $15.00 up. SOLD or RENTED anywhere at 1/4 to 1/2 MANUFACTURER'S PRICES, allowing RENTAL TO APPLY ON PRICE. Free Trial. Installment payments. Illustrated. Write for catalog at TYPEWRITER EMPORIUM, 24-26 W. Lake St., Chicago priest made a comprehensive covenant — "a covenant between the Lord and the king and the people" (verse 7.) This was a special covenant "that they should be the Lord's people." That is beautiful, is it not? Then a covenant "between the king and the people." With such bonds as this we are not surprised to learn that the next step was a zealous attack against idolatry, followed by a great revival of church-repairing and church-going. The record of their thoroughness is stimulating: "And all the people of the land" (that of course is a bit of hyperbole, for they could not all have gotten in) "went into the house of Baal and broke it down; his altars and his images brake they in pieces utterly." That's the only way to attack an evil; that is the only place to stop: when it is broken in pieces utterly.

But after all, the real lesson for today is not Joash's coronation but yours. Are you yet king or queen of that realm that is yours—your life, your heart, your soul, your body? Enter into a covenant with your closest, most trusted friends, mother, father, pastor, teacher, that you will be a true king, a true queen. Then make that covenant with Jehovah—that you will be his. Break down in his strength the evil things that hinder. Let the power of his Holy Spirit destroy what is evil within you. Set the forces of that kingdom of yours against all that is wrong and for the help of everything that will lead the world to God.

"I Have a Good Protector"

By Amos R. Wells

IT is deeply interesting to see, far back in the time of Joash, how profound was the influence of women on affairs of state. Jezebel had really ruled, and not Ahab. Her daughter Athaliah slew all her grandchildren but one, and became queen. Athaliah's daughter, Jehoshabea, saved the one grandchild of Athaliah, her infant nephew Joash, and in time made him sovereign in the place of Athaliah. There is a "feminist movement" for you! Where in modern days can you find its equal?

Is there not in this tragic-joyous story a plain indication of what we may expect from the feminist movement of today? Women are rapidly securing the right of suffrage in the United States. The great war is forcing women to the front all over Europe, to take the place of the farmers, storekeepers, men of all occupations, who are fighting at the front. The Orient is freeing its women from their age-long bondage, so that in Japan the new government school system makes almost as full provision for females as males, while in China the "new woman" is almost as aggressive as in England. In view of all this, let us remember that women and men have the same mothers and fathers, and are not very different in their characters. Some women are good and some are bad, Athaliahs and Jehoshabes. Women must be freed, as a matter of justice, but the Christianization of the world must go on just the same.

The safety of the boy Joash, brought up in the very midst of his deadly foes, was no greater than all of God's children may enjoy. Once in the last century an old lady in England had occasion to go ten miles on horseback, in a dark night and alone, to take a sum of money to a friend who needed it. Her friends urged her not to go, warning her that she would lose her way, or be robbed. "I have said my bit prayer," said the old lady; "I am on the Lord's errand and trust him." She was indeed attacked by a highwayman as she passed a dark wood, but she was so cool that the robber wondered. "Aren't you afraid?" he asked. "No," she answered, "I have a good protector." The robber looked around and could see no one in the darkness; but the old lady was so confident that he supposed that a well-armed man was near, and ran away. Every child of God has that same Good Protector always at hand.

YOUNG Joash, brought up in the temple, got a far better education than he would have received in the court of Athaliah near by, though the gay courtiers would have thought it no education at all. Once an agricultural expert, addressing a state grange, was worsted in discussion by a certain plain farmer. "Sir," he roared at last, "do you realize that I have been at two universities, one in this country and one in Germany?" "What of that?" asked the farmer quietly. "I had a calf that nursed two cows, and the more he nursed the greater calf he grew." We need to remember this homely illustration in educating our children.

The care with which Jehoiada surrounded the young prince when it came time for him to step out into his royal rights was no more than every parent should exercise as he sends out his boy or girl into the world. It is only recently that our government has established a Children's Bureau. With more than 30,000,000 children in the United States under 15 years of age, with 300,000 babies dying every year before they are one year old, and half of them needlessly, our government has until a few years ago spent money unstintedly in the protection of cows and pigs, but not a cent for the protection of children. Surely Jehoiada could teach us a lesson.

The most significant incident in the stirring scene of the crowning of King Joash is the placing in his hands of the Bible at the same time that the crown was placed on his head. President Wilson once said, "There are great problems before the American people. There are problems which will need purity of spirit and an integrity of purpose such as have never been called for before in the history of this country. I should be afraid to go forward if I did not believe that there lay at the foundation of all our schooling and of all our thought this incomparable and unimpeachable Word of God. If we cannot derive our strength thence, there is no source from which we can derive it." This, which is true of our country and its ruler, is true of each child as he enters upon the ruling of his life.

Echoes from the Holy Land

THE change of dynasties in all lands seems inseparably connected with military force or display. Jehu, anointed by Elijah, had destroyed the whole house of Ahab and Jezebel, driving the reforms, as he drove his chariot, at a maddening pace.

Athaliah, the queen mother, was of more importance than the wife of the king. The same custom lives in Turkey till the present hour. The Valide Sultan, the mother of the ruling Sultan, is "the first lady of the land." One woman's ruthless slaying of the royal seed has often been circumvented by the cunning of another woman, and Jehoshabea has had more than one imitator.

The law of succession in Oriental countries differs from European usage. In Turkey the oldest male of the ruling family, not necessarily the oldest son of the ruling sovereign, is the heir apparent. Recent efforts to change the law have not succeeded.

"Gate of Sur." In most Oriental cities the main gates are named from the main roads leading out of them to the larger neighboring cities. This gate was evidently that controlling the road to Tyre, which is called Sur till the present hour. At Jerusalem the west gate is still called the Jaffa Gate, because it marks the beginning of the main road leading westward to the seacoast at Jaffa.

"David's Spears and Shields," more than one hundred years old and probably carefully preserved up to that time. Collections of antique weapons are more often forgotten and lost sight of. A few years ago an extensive collection was discovered at Jerusalem in what is still known as "David's Tower." They consisted of spears and javelins and had been plainly lost sight of after the introduction of gunpowder.

"Crown." Most crowns are today carefully guarded in museums and brought forth and worn only on coronation days or other great occasions. This crown was most probably one from Solomon's time.

"The testimony." Modern kings and rulers take a solemn oath to obey the laws of the realm and uphold the constitution.

"Clapped their hands." A common Arabic proverb finely illustrating the need of cooperation runs: "One hand can't clap."

"God save the king." Our cheering is as yet only senseless noise like all the college cheers. History will no doubt develop the "hip, hip, hurrah" into something that has real meaning in it. Republics in Europe have changed the ancient "God save the king" to "Vive la république." We have yet to create the form and perhaps the idea.

The man who is on speaking terms with all of his neighbors is within speaking distance of heaven.

The man who grows tired of life is very likely the sort of man who has never really lived.

G. M. WHEELER
$25 to $50

6000 miles without a minute lost

"IN the early spring of 1868 I purchased a G. M. Wheeler movement, number 6882, and can testify to the admirable qualities of this watch. Two years ago (watch was 46 years old when this was written) I carried it to the Pacific Coast and on my return, after an absence of about two months, it had not varied one minute, as I did not change the time to correspond with the longitude affecting the change of time."

(ORIGINAL LETTER ON FILE AT ELGIN HEADQUARTERS)

Elgin performance is the result of painstaking care that is without parallel in the art of watchmaking. Human ingenuity has been sounded to its greatest depths to produce the machines that in turn produce Elgin parts of microscopic accuracy. Men have been carefully trained to an astounding degree of skill and delicacy to accomplish the last careful adjustments that make Elgin Watches run true with the stars and the rotation of the earth.

Ask Your Elgineer

He will show you a variety of Elgin Watches priced according to fineness and the richness of the case. Each measures up to the one famous Elgin standard of timekeeping.

Write for booklet—Elgin Wonder Tales. Send stamped and addressed envelope for set of Elgin Poster Stamps.

LORD ELGIN (Extra thin model) $700 to $115
B. W. RAYMOND (R. R. Watch) $35 to $75

LADY ELGIN
A wide range of prices

ELGIN Watches KEEP TIME

ELGIN NATIONAL WATCH COMPANY
Elgin, Illinois

40 Million Miles a Day

This Is What Wins Men to Fortified Tires

Perhaps every day about two million Goodyear tires are run. And their daily mileage totals, probably, some forty million miles.

Thus to hundreds of thousands these tires reveal their super-quality. They show their strength and endurance, their saving of trouble. They meet with mishap and misuse like other tires, sometimes. But they combat tire troubles in efficient ways, and their users know it.

What They Have Done

Goodyears have won more users than any other tire ever had. They have won more new users this year than ever before in our history. They have forced us to build plant after plant until our new capacity—ready soon—will be close to 20,000 tires per day.

For Winter

Get the Double-Thickness All-Weather Tread

This tread is best for all seasons, but essential on winter tires. It is not a regular tread made rough, but an extra tread made of very tough rubber. So it gives you a double-thick tread.

The grips are deep and enduring. They are sharp and efficient.

Double thickness means more wear. It means a deep-cut lasting anti-skid. It means great resistance to puncture. This matchless tread is winning more users than any other Goodyear feature.

Any Goodyear dealer will supply you. Every neighborhood has a Goodyear Service Station with your size in stock and it will render full Goodyear service.

GOOD YEAR
AKRON, OHIO

Fortified Tires

No-Rim-Cut Tires — "On-Air" Cured With All-Weather Treads or Smooth

The Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co.
Akron, Ohio

A Veteran Baptist Retires

AFTER a continuous pastorate of fifty-seven years, and a preaching career comprising no fewer than sixty-four years, Dr. John Clifford, well-known to many in this country, has retired from the ministry of Westbourne Park Baptist Chapel, London.

Doctor Clifford's name has been called

"a synonym for British nonconformity"; though perhaps an even better description of him is "a Cromwell of the pulpit." There are many points of comparison between him and the man who sent Charles I to the block. Not in appearance though, for there is not much resemblance between Cromwell's sturdy figure and dour face, and the slim, eager-visaged minister, but in other respects John Clifford is in the direct spiritual line of descent from Oliver Cromwell. In love of freedom, fearlessness of the powers that be, and hatred of entrenched evils, he is decidedly of the Cromwellian order.

The doctor comes of the working-class, the class that embodies the most typical British qualities. He was born eighty years ago in the Midland village of Sawley, and it was by sheer force of intellect and character that he rose to be the greatest Baptist preacher since Spurgeon, and in the front rank of all contemporary ministers. He filled a place in the public life of Great Britain such as no other minister has occupied during the last half-century.

In the course of his long career Dr. Clifford had of course seen many changes and he mentioned some in a quite recent interview.

"There have been changes in theology since my young days," he said. "In 1858, or about that time, theological theories were dominant everywhere, and were regarded by many unthinking persons as though they had the stamp of finality upon them; but in the sixties there was a revolt against them, which was not confined to any one section of the Church, but was particularly widespread among the students of the colleges, sometimes exposing them to difficulties in obtaining churches on their leaving college. That revolt went on for twenty-five or thirty years, and of course it produced a considerable number of changes, a loosening of faith in all creeds as creeds, and a recognition of the necessity of adapting expressions of the Christian faith to the facts disclosed in Biblical study on the one hand, and brought out from the study of Nature by scientific men on the other.

"Biblical criticism," he said, "was at first received with doubt and hesitation, and for years it was treated with contempt and indignation, but with the last fifteen years the results of biblical criticism have been so manifestly to the enriching of our comprehension of the meaning of the Scriptures and of the place of the Scriptures in the life of the world, that they are now accepted, in the main, thankfully.

"Another change due to the influence of physical science is, insistence upon facts and upon absolute intellectual accuracy. It is one of the benefits springing out of the work of Huxley, Tyndal and others. The surety was brought to face with the necessity of verifying its statements. That has led to the closer study of the facts of the life of Christ, so that it is safe to say that the story of the life of Christ is infinite better understood than it was fifty years ago. Interest in his life has been wonderfully quickened in consequence of the necessity of fitting at the foundation of his life. The application of scientific methods to the investigation of the data in the New Testament has been to make us indubitably sure of the historic ground of Christianity, and given us a conception of Jesus Christ that has brought him much more fully within the range of human sympathy and adoration than was possible before."

Dr. John Clifford

ASKED as to who, in his opinion, is the greatest living preacher, Dr. Clifford named one well known to readers of the Christian Herald, Dr. Jowett.

"Dr. Jowett takes precedence, all I think," said he. "He is beautifully imaginative, and exceedingly suggestive in the side-lights he throws upon passages of Scripture."

As for the preaching of to-day Dr. Clifford remarked that it was much more experiential than formerly.

"I sometimes think," said he, "that the emphasis is so exclusively on the practical and the experiential as to fail to give that satisfaction to the intellect which Christianity is calculated to give, and which it is intended to give, or it is meant for the whole of man."

"I feel I can say," he declared, "eager aged face alight with the hope of a man just starting life, instead of in the evening of his days, 'that I think the world is immensely better than it was. I am not a bit doubtful about the outcome of this war. For that will mean the advancement of the kingdom of God by the introduction of Christianity into the control of the international life of the nations.'"

HARRY ELMORE.

DON'T PAY TWO PRICES HOOSIER Stoves Ranges Heaters FREE

To try in your own home for 30 days. Show your friends. Freight paid by us. Send it back at our expense if you do not want to keep it. You can buy the best at Actual Factory Prices. Are heavily made, of the highest grade selected material, beautifully finished, with improvements that equal anything ever produced. The Best in the World. Guaranteed for years by a Two Million Dollar Bond. No matter where you live, you can try a HOOSIER in your own home thirty days, without a penny's expense or obligation to you. You can save enough on a single HOOSIER STOVE to buy your winter's fuel. Write or send postal today for Large Free Catalog "and prices" showing large assortment to select from. No Obligations.

HOOSIER STOVE COMPANY
164 State Street, - MARION, IND.

Hoosier Range

Base Burner

INTERNATIONAL PRECIOUS PROMISE BIBLE JUST ISSUED

All the precious promises stand out like the milky way in the heavens. Helpful and inspiring. Handsomely illustrated. Complete study helps, family record, maps, etc. Low price. Send for special offer.

High-grade representatives wanted.

INTERNATIONAL BIBLES are noted for their accuracy, completeness and mechanical perfection. Good styles provide for every taste in type, binding, study helps, etc. Liberal discount. Catalog FREE.

THE JOHN C. WINSTON COMPANY
402 Winston Building - Philadelphia

The Key To Success

Stop Forgetting

Increase Your Efficiency

The secret of business and social success is the ability to remember. I can make your mind an infallible, fastened index from which you can instantly select thoughts, facts, figures, names, faces. Enables you to concentrate, develop self-control, overcome bashfulness, think on your feet, address an audience. Easy, Simple. The result of 20 years' experience in developing memories of thousands of students. Write today for copy of my book "How to Remember" and Copyrighted Intensely Interesting Memory Test Free, also how to obtain FREE copy of my book "How to Speak in Public."

Prof. Henry Dickson, Principal

Dickson School of Memory, 701 Hearst Bldg., Chicago, Ill.

Young People's Meetings for October 31

Increase and Efficiency

Christian Endeavor Topic. Eph. 4: 1-16

WHEN you see that this Scripture reference includes that familiar passage about "the whole body fitly joined together," etc., you may find yourself thinking: "Oh dear! must we study these same verses again?"

But try a new plan. I can guarantee that it will flood these familiar verses with new and startling light.

We are hearing much about vers libre and have long been acquainted with William J. Lampton's delightful poems in which one line may consist of one word and the next of seventeen. Now take two sheets of foolscap or legal cap paper (better paste them together end to end, so that when you are done you will have the whole thing on one connected sheet), and write down thought by thought, the wonderful phrases of this great section of our soul and church philosophy. You will have what looks like a bit over libre, but when you have finished you will feel that you could talk for an hour about the words you have put down.

Begin like this:

Walk worthy;
Worthy of the calling;
In all lowliness, meekness, long suffering, forbearance, love.
Endeavoring
To keep the unity
Of the Spirit
In the bond of peace.

Then when you get to that most familiar part you will be delighted to see afresh how packed full it is of

"Safety First" For Your Children Means

LUDEX'S MENTHOL CANDY COUGH DROPS

at first sign of cough or cold. LUDEX'S save doctor's bills. LUDEX'S contain no narcotics or coloring. LUDEX'S have many uses.

Wm. H. Luden, Manufacturing Confectioner Reading, Pa.

In the yellow box 5c

practical suggestions for "increase and efficiency."
Professor Riddle, writing for the Philo-Schaff Commentary, sums up the fifth verse as follows: "All that the body possesses, by means of the adaptation, compacting, supply, and energy of each part, contributes to this organic, symmetrical growth."
Like each member of your society ask himself: "Am I filling my place and doing my part, connected with the great Source of divine life, living and working harmoniously with my Christian fellows, helping our growth and enlarging our achievements?"

How Christ Organized for Personal Work

*Fourth League Topic. Mark 6: 3-13.
Luke 10: 1, 2.*

THE disciples said: "Send them away." Jesus said: "Give ye them to eat."

What was the difference? Why did Jesus say one thing and the disciples another? Because Jesus was moved with compassion, while the disciples did not care.

Jesus had big plans for his disciples. He had already sent them out to preach and heal (Mark 6: 7-13). He was to send them out many times ago, both before and after his death and resurrection; the severity referred to in our second reference (Luke 10: 1) probably included some of the disciples and surely included many whom the disciples had influenced and helped. Christ was creating an organization that should last through the centuries, and whose spirit should be that of radiant and persistent and efficient helpfulness. So he gave this inner circle an object lesson. "Don't send these folks away. Feed them. Give them what you have. I am sorry for them. They are hungry."

This is the secret of successful "personal work." If the motive is to do a duty to rid ourselves of an obligation, the work is almost sure to fail. But if we can realize that others are longing hungrily for what we possess, if we can get our souls something of that compassion of Jesus, then we shall win not only our "chums" but many more.

Responsibility of Christians for American Cities

EY. P. U. Topic. Zech. 8: 1-8.

A CITY of truth, and a city of youth. That is an unintentional rhyme, but that is the sort of city described in this beautiful prophecy of Zechariah. "Jerusalem shall be called a city of truth." "And the streets of the city shall be full of boys and girls playing in the streets thereof." But while the spirit of the city is the spirit of the exuberant joys of youth, age is not forgotten—the old men and old women are protected and happy. Best of all, God is going to dwell in the city as the Friend and helper of all.

How far American cities come from this dream! There is some frolic for the children and some comfort for the aged but how much of woe! Little children forced to work, babies dying for lack of food and care, old people in misery—and all this trouble and distress.

Your society should write to the Federal Commission on Industrial Relations at Washington asking for a copy of the recently published report and arrange to study it carefully. It describes conditions and suggests remedies.

Nice Miss Sangster's article in this issue telling about the exhibition at New York of the work of industrial schools and classes. This is a bright and happy side of the picture of life in American cities.

Find out also about some Gospel mission or church extension work and remember that Christ himself is the only hope for the American city.

Ancient Jerusalem is still far from the fulfillment of this glad prophecy of Zechariah. But much has been done for the comfort of the people of that ancient city, though the welfare work is for the present largely interrupted by the war.

Should There Be A New Marriage Ceremony For Ministers' Wives?

An astonishing question, astonishingly answered with eight new marriage-ceremony promises for ministers' wives. A woman who knows has daringly written an article on what a church has the right to ask of its minister's wife that promises to be the most-talked-of article in church circles this winter.

It is in the November

LADIES' HOME JOURNAL

15 Cents—Now On Sale—Everywhere

ALSO IN NOVEMBER

"THE THREE THINGS"

BY MARY RAYMOND SHIPMAN ANDREWS

A GREAT SONGBOOK

Hundreds have already written us that "Songs for Service" is the superior of any gospel songbook they have ever met up with. Its 288 pages sparkle with bright, new, snappy songs—songs that have been tested—that are unusually effective—songs such as have made previous Rodeheaver songbooks so wonderfully popular.

Songs for Service

is the best songbook that has yet been issued by The Rodeheaver Co. no higher praise can be given. It is the book used exclusively in the "Billy" Sunday campaigns.

EXAMINE A COPY FREE—Simply state that you will either return it in good condition within 15 days or will remit the retail price. State binding desired.

PRICES
Cloth 35c, limp 25c, manila 20c per copy, postpaid
Cloth $25, limp $18, manila $15 per 100, not prepaid

Orchestrated for 15 instruments.
Printed in both round and shaped notes.

RODEHEAVE CO.
GOSPEL MUSIC
1083 MONON BUILDING, CHICAGO
633 LIPPINCOTT BLDG., PHILADELPHIA

DR. JAMES M. GRAY
now writes the expositions of the Sunday School Lessons exclusively for

THE CHRISTIAN WORKERS MAGAZINE

Dr. Robert M. Russell gives the Devotional Lessons, and Mr. E. O. Sellers, Teachers' Problems. This is the best all-round magazine for Christian workers.
10c a copy, 25c for three months, $1 per year.

THE CHRISTIAN WORKERS MAGAZINE, 152 INSTITUTE PLACE, CHICAGO

Curtains

Direct from the Manufacturer
Our 1915-16 Line of "Qualibest" Novelty Curtains contains hundreds of beautiful designs at one-half retail prices.
No. 104. Made of good quality scrim, hem, set-in-lapel. Pocket edge, 2 1/2 yards long. White or Arabe; state color desired. 75c pair sizes—except as noted, postpaid.

Satisfaction guaranteed or money refunded.
Send for Free Illustrated Catalog of Curtains, Materials, Curtains, Portieres, etc.
French Curtain Mfg. Co., Dept. E, 31 E. 27th St., N.Y.

From Spinning Wheels to Motor Cars

Side by side with the first advertisement of the Hartford Fire Insurance Company, printed in the Hartford Courant in 1810, Donald McAulay, Turner, announced that he "made and repaired all kinds of spinning wheels."

Old Donald would look in vain through the pages of this magazine for advertisements of spinning wheels, and we can imagine his amazement at phonograph, telephone or motor car. But one familiar friend he would find—the announcement of the "Old Hartford," as ready today to give protection from all the risks of a motor car as it was to insure a spinning wheel in 1810. Such is the complete

INSURANCE SERVICE OF THE TWO HARTFORDS

For the Hartford Fire Insurance Company has granted protection against loss by fire for 105 years. It has grown with the country's growth, and the development of its insurance service has always kept pace with the country's insurance needs.

The Hartford Accident & Indemnity Company was organized by the Hartford Fire Insurance Company to conduct a general casualty and bonding business, and inherits the parent company's reputation for the fair settlement of every honest obligation.

Check on the coupon below the kind of insurance that interests you most. Mail it to us and we will send you full information.

Hartford Fire Insurance Co.
Hartford Accident & Indemnity Co.
Hartford, Conn.

COUPON—CHECK—TEAR OFF—MAIL

Hartford Fire Insurance Company, (Service Department C 10) 125 Trumbull Street, Hartford, Conn.

Gentlemen:

Please send information on the kind of insurance checked to the name and address written on margin of coupon.

☐ Fire	☐ Motor Cycle	☐ Tornado	☐ Sprinkler Leakage
☐ Accident	☐ Burglary	☐ Mail	☐ Marine
☐ Health	☐ Employer's Liability	☐ Golfer's Policy	☐ Earthquake
☐ Auto Liability	☐ Workmen's Compensation	☐ Parcel Post	☐ Breeders and Exhibitors
☐ Auto Collision	☐ Bonding	☐ Rent	☐ Teaming
☐ Auto Theft	☐ Elevator	☐ Merchandise in Transit	☐ Salesmen's Samples
☐ Auto Fire	☐ Plate Glass	☐ Live Stock Transit	☐ Registered Mail
☐ Baggage (Insurance)	☐ Race Horse	☐ Live Stock	☐ Use and Occupancy

The Christian Herald Prayer League

MRS. M. A. M. writes from Wise, Va.: "I want you to know that prayers for state-wide prohibition were answered. God be praised forever!" Another Virginia lady writes: "Some months ago I requested prayers that a nephew might be healed of mind trouble brought on by drink, and that he might obtain employment. Both prayers have been answered." Mrs. W. W. C. writes: "Some time ago I asked prayer for a revival of religion at Eliasville, Texas. The prayers have been answered, and I thank God." Mrs. D. D. writes from Pocahontas, Tenn.: "Several of us have received spiritual uplift through the Prayer League. There have been three revivals in this neighborhood, and the young people, as was specially asked in the request for prayer, were those most moved by the Spirit's power."

A Reader of Camden, Ohio, writes: "Some time ago I requested prayer for the restoration of my own health. I want to thank God that he has improved my health, and since then has also restored my baby's health and my husband's." Mrs. L. C. G. writes from Dallas, Texas: "In answer to prayer, God raised me up from a very serious sickness when the doctors said there was no chance to get well." "I wrote you several months ago," writes a Kentucky Subscriber, "asking prayer for financial aid. We are so thankful to God for prayers answered and for brightening the way that was once so dark." Mrs. A. E. P. writes from Florida: "I know your precious prayers have been ascending for me and mine, and I must report that I have had a blessing from our Father. Never before, perhaps, in all my experience have I had such sweet communion with him." M. H., Pittsboro, N. C., writes: "Some time ago I wrote to ask the prayers of the League in behalf of a dear relative. My prayers have been answered, and he has been restored to health."

Acknowledgments of answered prayer have also been received from: M. E. A., Lewisville, Pa.; Miss A. B. G., Covington, Ky. (for bodily healing); L. W. Wooster, Ohio; C. E. M., Rutland, B. C.; Mrs. A. C. M., New Haven, W. Va.; M. E. D., Greensboro, N. C.; S. J., Quebec; C. E. S., Wilkes-Barre, Pa.; Miss H. B., Commerce, Ga. (for restoration to health); Miss C. A. C., West Hartford, Conn.; A Friend, Macon, Miss.; Mrs. A. F. G., Ramsey, Ill.; A Friend, Kalamazoo, Mich.; Mrs. A. B., California (for relief from financial embarrassment).

PRAYERS are asked for revivals of religion at Haverhill, Mass.; Wise, Va. (that church may be cleared of debt); Mocksville, N. C.; Dayton, Ohio; Sea Cliff, N. Y.; Wauseon, Ohio; Pocahontas, Tenn.; Mason City, Neb.; Dallas, Texas; Woodburn, Ky.; Eliasville, Texas; Delevan, N. Y.; Lyndeboro, N. H.; Detroit, Mich.; Milo, Me.; Coleville, Calif. (that a man and his wife may be successful in starting a Sunday school here); Bogard, Mo.; Los Angeles, Calif. (that many may be saved through the work of a metropolitan mission at Ocean Park); Vinita, Okla.; Lebanon, Ill. Prayer is requested for a world-wide revival. Mrs. E. T. S., Cincinnati, Ohio, asks prayer that a minister of the Gospel may have a pastorate. A Reader asks prayer that he may make a good Sunday school superintendent, and that many may be brought into the fold. Mrs. S. M. W. asks prayer that a pastor may be filled with the Spirit; Mrs. C. A. S., that a young man twenty-three years of age who has just entered the ministry and taken his first charge may be truly consecrated to his work and be successful in building up the church and leading souls to salvation.

Two mothers ask prayer that their daughters' minds may be restored; Mrs. A. R. T., Miss A. A., Miss H. B., their mothers'. Five others ask prayer for mental restoration or strengthening for friends or for themselves.

L. J. L. and Mrs. M. C. L. ask prayer that sight may be restored; Mrs. A. P. C., that her husband's sight may be restored; Mrs. Z. E. R., her son's; Mrs. G. S. H., her daughter's; A Reader, a mother's; Mrs. M. W., a niece's; Miss C. A. C., a nephew's; four others ask prayer for the strengthening of sight.

A sad letter brings the request for prayer that brothers and mothers be saved from the liquor habit; that another family, a nephew and friend be delivered from this bitter curse.

L. M. K., J. E. H., Mrs. T. V. and "A Mother" ask prayer that their sons may be saved from the liquor habit; Mrs. E. J. C., her sons; C. B. P., daughter; Mrs. A. R. T. and V., their fathers; Mrs. A. C. V. and M. E. A., their nephews; A Mother, Mrs. M. G., their sons-in-law; Mrs. J. M., a young man; E. S. O. and Mrs. R. H. P., other friends.

J. E. H. asks prayer that a son may be cured of the drug habit; Mrs. E. B. C., that her brother may be cured of the morphine habit; Mrs. M. M., that a friend may be cured of the morphine habit.

AN earnest mother asks prayer that her son may be converted very soon. Another mother asks prayer that her son may be converted; Mrs. D. M., Mrs. S. E. B., Mrs. A. C. M. and G. E. C. each ask prayer that their sons may be saved; A Reader asks prayer that her son may be saved and returned to his wife and children. Seventeen other parents ask prayer for the conversion of their sons.

Eleven wives ask for the conversion of husbands. Forty-three friends ask prayer for the conversion of other relatives or friends.

M. E. D. asks prayer that parents and relatives may be reconciled; the death of a child, and that they may look to God for strength in their sorrow. E. B. asks prayer that two young men may have a deeper work of grace in their heart and remain true to the principles of Christ. Twelve other friends ask prayer for special spiritual blessing for relatives or friends.

Thirty-four friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual lessing.

Fifty friends ask prayer for the healing of others, including one who asks that her mother be restored to health; and another that a young mother may be restored to health.

Mrs. M. G. asks prayer that she may be cured of cancer; I. M., to regain the use of hands and arms and to be able to speak more plainly; S. B., to regain the use of limbs; A. S. S. that natural sleep be restored. Forty other friends ask prayer for healing from various afflictions.

Eleven ask prayer for the healing of hearing.

Thirty ask prayer for guidance and help in financial matters.

Mrs. B. S. B. asks prayer that her husband may return, and that they may have a happy home together; A Reader, that her husband's love may be renewed and all misunderstandings be removed; X. Y. Z., that she may hear from her daughter; Mrs. M. W., that her sister and brother may become reconciled. Two other friends ask prayer for happier homes; a friend, that a man and wife may become reconciled. A faithful Reader asks prayer "that a great sorrow may be lifted from our hearts"; S. A. H. asks prayer to be delivered from an overwhelming trouble.

A number of parents have written asking prayer that their boys dwell at school. It has seemed that this sort of trouble was hardly serious enough to be given the space required for special mention in the Prayer League columns. But this is, after all, a very real sort of sorrow and very deep. A boy that disappoints is a deep grief indeed. And if boys disappoint at school they are apt to disappoint elsewhere. So the members of the League will be glad to remember these careless boys who are saddening their parents' hearts, and perhaps some of the parents themselves, seeing this, will see that these prayers are answered.

Forty-eight other friends ask prayer for the granting of varied desires and needs.

The War in Europe

Continued from page 1047

the Austro-Italian front, attacks have been made on both sides, but no important change has been made in the positions held last week.

King Emmanuel of Italy recently had a narrow escape from death, by shell while close to the firing line at the front. He left his automobile because of lack of a road, and went on horseback among his troops, disregarding a warning that they were under fire. A shell exploded near him and splinters wounded his horse, but the king was unhurt.

British expedition was reported to have defeated the Turks in the Euphrates Valley about ninety miles from Baghdad. Later reports from Turkish sources claimed that the expedition had been checked. This expedition is apparently planned to advance through Armenia and to connect with the Russian forces advancing southward through the Caucasus. If the two expeditions meet, the Turks will face a serious situation in eastern Asia Minor.

A note delivered at the American State Department on Tuesday, October 5, Ambassador von Bernstorff for his government disavowed the attack upon the steamer Arabic and agreed to make full preparation for the loss of American lives. The ambassador admitted that the United States had gained a diplomatic victory. The tension between the two governments is now removed. It is expected that an equally satisfactory settlement of the Lusitania matter will follow. The New York Times sums up the results that American diplomacy has gained as follows:

Germany's acknowledgment of the right of American ships to sail through the war zone unmolested, with the accompanying acknowledgment of full German liability for any damage inflicted by German naval vessels to these American craft.

German acknowledgment of liability for American ships sunk anywhere by German war vessels, even if the American bottoms are taking contraband to Germany's enemies, as was alleged in the case of the William P. Frye.

Germany's promise not to sink American ships carrying conditional contraband to Germany's enemies, even when it is impossible to take such ships into German port.

Germany's offer to arbitrate the German claim of right to sink American ships carrying absolute contraband to Germany's enemies.

Germany's acknowledgment of liability for damages to American citizens injured by German attacks on merchant ships even of Germany's enemies, when the attacks are delivered without warning and without the assailed ships attempting resistance or escape.

Germany's promise not to attack unarming liners, even of her enemies, without warning and without providing for the safety of the passengers and crew.

Germany's disavowal of the sinking of the Arabic and an expression of regret at the incident, with notice to the offending submarine commander of this act.

Germany's statement that hereafter the mistaken impression of a German submarine commander that his boat was about to be rammed by an enemy merchantman would not be regarded as diminishing German liability for damages inflicted upon American citizens.

This is a complete acknowledgment of the validity of the provisions of international law upon which the United States' stand was made, and is as great a gain for every nation as for the United States. President Wilson still has the major of the interference of England with our commerce to arrange. But there is every reason to believe that in this also America, standing upon her recognized rights under established law, will succeed in forcing the recognition of the rights. The protest of the American carriers against the recent confiscation of their cargoes, the restriction of American exports of certain goods in neutral countries while English exports of similar goods are not impeded, the release of American-owned German goods now held up in neutral ports and the taking of American vessels bound to neutral ports into English ports for examination, frequently too greatly prolonged, are the principal elements of the controversy.

THE Russian campaign during the winter of 1914-15 was seriously handicapped by the freezing of the port of Archangel, which was closed for three months. With another winter campaign facing her, Russia has begun strenuous measures to avoid another interruption in the forwarding of supplies. The railway from Vladivostok across Siberia is inadequate to carry the immense traffic created by the needs of the Russian armies, and the arrival of supplies at Vladivostok is made more or less uncertain by the earth-slides in the Panama Canal. To again meet this difficulty, Russia has throughout the summer been constructing a double-track railway from the junction of Petrozavodsk to the port of Ekaterina on the Arctic Ocean, which, by virtue of a backwash of the Gulf Stream, is said to be ice-free throughout the winter.

THE German and Austrian forces under Field Marshal von Mackensen began their attack upon Serbia almost simultaneously with the breaking of diplomatic relations between Bulgaria and the Entente powers. Crossings were made at many points along the Drina, Save, and Danube rivers, and Berlin reported that the Teuton armies were firmly established on Serbian soil and that some prisoners and guns had been taken. Serbian official reports claimed that the invaders had been checked and driven back to the rivers with great loss.

The change of cabinet in Greece did not halt the landing of Allied troops at Salonica which was pushed with vigor, the troops being promptly carried by express trains to Serbian Macedonia where they were reported to have taken up positions between the Nish-Salonica railway and the Bulgarian frontier. The Bulgarians were expected to make their first attack in this region in order to cut the railway by which only Serbia's allies can come to her assistance.

The new Premier of Greece is Alexander Zaimis, a former premier and a supporter of the policy of neutrality favored by the king. M. Zaimis is premier and foreign minister, and his cabinet represents a coalition of all parties and is expected to receive the support of the Greek Chamber of Deputies. The policy of the new cabinet is expected to be armed neutrality, benevolent toward the Entente Allies. Greek troops will probably not become actively engaged unless Greece is attacked. Rumania shows evidence of an intention to continue neutral. Rumanian forces are however being maintained at full strength.

Latest reports show further progress by the French east of the hill at Tahure, and the loss by them of some trenches between Tahure and the Navarin farm. Reports from Petrograd admit that the fighting between Dvinsk and Smorgon has resulted in some gain for the German forces enabling them to improve their position slightly.

General F. V. Greene, U. S. A., retired, has compiled from the best available data, what he calls an "intelligent guess" as to the casualties in the war thus far. His figures were given in an address at West Point reported by the New York Times and are tabulated as follows:

	Killed	Wounded	Missing	Total
U. Britain	85,000	251,000	55,000	391,000
France	100,000	700,000	300,000	1,400,000
Russia	500,000	800,000	900,000	2,200,000
Italy	5,000	15,000	5,000	25,000
Belgium	25,000	40,000	15,000	80,000
Serbia	20,000	10,000	10,000	40,000
Total	1,035,000	1,846,000	1,285,000	4,166,000
Germany	600,000	1,000,000	300,000	1,900,000
Austria	100,000	700,000	200,000	1,000,000
Turkey	30,000	80,000	70,000	180,000
Total	1,030,000	1,780,000	1,020,000	3,830,000

By this showing the war has claimed nearly 8,000,000 men who have been put out of action by all causes.

Hamilton Watch

"The Watch of Railroad Accuracy"

Used for Navigation—"Far more accurate than the average chronometer," says Captain in U. S. N.

The following letter, recently received from an officer of the Navy, speaks for itself. The signer's name is omitted for reasons of Naval etiquette.

HAMILTON WATCH COMPANY, Lancaster, Pa.
Gentlemen:—The watch purchased from you in December, 1913, is a marvel of accuracy. On January 1, 1914, it was set 22 seconds fast, on standard mean time, and throughout the year frequent comparisons were made which showed a steady and regular gain. On January 1, 1915, it was again compared and was found to be 1 minute 35 seconds fast, or a gain of 1 minute 13 seconds in 365 days, which is equivalent to a gaining rate of 0.2 seconds a day, or 6 seconds a month.

Had the rate of gain been variable, it would have been very different, but running as steadily and uniformly as it did, I would have no hesitancy whatever in using it for navigational purposes, as it is far more accurate than the average chronometer used for this purpose, and much more convenient.

(Signed)

IMAGINE yourself carrying this very watch—it was not an expensive watch. Wouldn't you derive an immense satisfaction from the comfort, convenience and companionship of so accurate a watch? Every Hamilton Watch sold has Hamilton Accuracy and Hamilton Durability.

Prices of Hamiltons: The lowest-priced Hamilton is a movement alone for $12.25 ($13.00 in Canada). The highest-priced Hamilton is our Masterpiece at $150.00 in 18k heavy gold case. Other Hamiltons at $15.00, $25.00, $28.00, $40.00, $55.00, $80.00, $110.00, etc. Hamiltons are made in many models—in cased watches; also in movements alone which your jeweler can fit to your present watch-case.

Write for Hamilton Watch Book, "The Timekeeper" describing all models and containing much interesting watch information.

HAMILTON WATCH COMPANY
Dept. T-4 Lancaster, Pa.

Eat Your Way to Health

Use Teller's Macerated Wheat and other raw foods like I did and get well. A wonderful corrective food. Removes cause of constipation. Users praise it. Doctors recommend it.

For further information, send for the Free Book, "The Food Book," containing recipe for the Food which you eat. It is yours for the asking.

DR. J. TELLER, 36 Syndicate Bldg., Kansas City, Mo., U. S. A.

WANTED AN IDEA!

THINK OF SOME SIMPLE THING TO PATENT. Protect your ideas, they may bring you wealth. Write for "Needed Inventions," and "How to Get Your Patent."

RANDOLPH & CO., Dept. 96, Washington, D. C.

PATENTS That Protect and Pay
Advice and Books FREE.
Rates Reasonable. Highest References. Best Services.
WATSON E. COLEMAN, Patent Lawyer, Washington, D. C.

Save Stove Money

Get your stove at first hand—direct from the factory—and save middlemen's profits. Satisfaction guaranteed—backed by 59 years' reputation.

Factory Prices—$5 to $23 Saved
ONE YEAR'S TRIAL

Select from a big line of up-to-date models with all the latest work-saving and fuel-saving improvements. Then try your stove a whole year. Money refunded if unsatisfactory.

GOLD COIN Stoves and Ranges

Thousands of these stoves are in use—some 40 years old. Shipments prompt and freight paid. Stoves shipped all polished and ready to set up. Safe delivery guaranteed. No risk whatever to you.

Write for our FREE Catalog Today

Get our Catalog—see the handsome models and their low prices. Figure your saving! Write now.

The Gold Coin Stove Co.
11 Oakwood Av.
Troy, N. Y.

Ridpath's History OF THE World At a Bargain

We will name our special low price and easy terms of payment only in direct letters to those mailing the Coupon below. Tear off Coupon, write name and address plainly, and mail now before you forget it. The 46 free sample pages will give you some idea of the splendid illustrations and wonderfully beautiful style in which the work is written. Thousands have already availed themselves of our offer and every purchaser is more than satisfied. Mail Coupon Now.

FREE COUPON

WESTERN NEWSPAPER ASSOCIATION 10 20
140 So. Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill. 15

Please mail your 46-page free sample booklet of Ridpath's History of the World, containing photographs of Napoleon, Socrates, Caesar, and other great characters in history, and write me full particulars of your special offer to Christian Herald readers.

NAME _____
ADDRESS _____

Fine Quality in Full Measure is assured you when you buy

BAKER'S
BREAKFAST
COCOA

To make our Breakfast Cocoa we select only choice cocoa beans and use a strictly mechanical—not a chemical—process.

The result is cocoa of delicious natural flavor and absolute purity, put up in full weight as stated on the label, and sold for the lowest price for which pure, high-grade cocoa is marketed.

Get the genuine made only by

Walter Baker & Co. Ltd.
Established 1780
Dorchester, Massachusetts

Boston Garter

Velvet Grip

Three Popular Styles:

NEVERBIND
CORD and PAD

Silk 50¢
Lisle 25¢

George Frost Co.
Makers
BOSTON

Huge Bargains

In Books—New Plan

Special sale by Library Press of good books—fiction, juvenile, history, science—at rock-bottom prices direct. Price we quote to biggest libraries now to you while this offer lasts. 1/2 to 3/4 publisher's prices. $1.50 books only 43 cents; similar savings on large sets. Write for bargains.

Library Prices to You

Write for our library catalog with net prices to libraries plainly quoted.

The Library Press, 2497 Tower Bldg., Chicago, Ill.

Why Are Protestant Missions in Latin America?

Continued from page 1044

immense immigration can be expected from Europe. Lord Bryce estimates a population of 200,000,000 in South America in the near future.

This points to South America as a field for Protestant missionary work of great opportunity and great promise, if we view it from the standpoint of new immigration or unreached Indian populations.

BUT there is a large need for Protestant effort if we consider the unevangelized native population. A comparison of two great cities will demonstrate this. The city of Philadelphia has 690 Protestant churches and 90 Catholic churches. The city of Buenos Aires, with 1,700,000 population, has only forty Catholic churches and ten Protestant churches. The unchurched native population is therefore large, and Protestant effort is needed to save such great centers.

The extent of atheism among them, too, indicates that the Catholic Church has lost its grip upon the men of Latin America, and a vital Christianity is needed to arrest this condition.

The university students at Buenos Aires are almost entirely agnostic. The Catholic Church is unable to reach them. In the city of Cordoba, Argentina, called the Rome of South America and a great university center, sixty per cent. of the men put themselves down as atheists, according to the government census. Mr. Sherrill, who was the American Minister to Argentina, was twitted by the Argentine leaders for his faithful attendance upon the American church at Buenos Aires. They asked him if his government required him to go to church. They could not understand how a man could of his own volition attend church. The loss of the spiritual note from the life of the people is significant. One of Argentina's educational leaders told me that the men were absolutely indifferent to the church, and they were waiting for some leader who should unite the people for a native church free from foreign control.

The opposition, too, of the governments to the union of church and state creates an opportunity for Protestantism. There is now practical freedom of worship in South America. To be sure, some countries, such as Chile and Argentina, still subsidize the church in a limited way. In Peru Protestant churches cannot advertise their services, but there is practically no hindrance to preaching the gospel by word and through literature.

THE need and opportunity for Protestant Christian education is impressive. From fifty to eighty per cent. of the population are illiterate. In Argentina and Uruguay there is a rule in the public schools prohibiting the use of the name of God in the exercises of the schools. There are many fine Christian schools in South America—several of these, such as Mackenzie College of Sao Paulo, are of commanding influence—but the governments have not yet recognized, as they doubtless will later, the excellencies of Protestant schools in their wholesome educational and moral results. There is a large call now for a Protestant university at Buenos Aires as a center of influence.

There is need, too, of a public conscience, or a conscience as to public office, which can only come when the individual is impelled and steadied by a spiritual life. The condition as to graft in Latin America, of public office for private gain, is almost universal. North America has its own blemishes in this respect, but it can fairly be said that the condition is exceptional here, and when discovered is eradicated. Not so in Latin America. Stories are many of wholesale stealings in office and of the fattening of politicians from public contracts. Surely there is need of a pulpit that shall speak out fearlessly against these wrongs. The system is evil in its influence upon the young, who are naturally taking example from those apparently successful, but who have achieved success by the submerging of conscience.

BUT the urgent need is for morality in private as well as public life. The immorality of Latin America is testified to from many angles. The young men have practically no ideals as to purity. They cannot understand our Christian standard of purity. The record of over fifty per cent. of illegitimacy in Latin America tells its own story of low moral standards, as well as of the difficulties in the way of a marriage because of high church fees. Bishop Every, the Protestant Episcopal Bishop of Argentina, says: "Integrity and clean living are not expected. Honor and truth are exceptional. There is a general lax attitude of tolerance toward everything, including vice. What it means for a young man to come into contact with this temper of mind may easily be imagined. And with morals goes faith."

Sunday is the day for sports, horse racing, fairs and secular affairs. When I was at Buenos Aires in March last the whole population seemed to converge upon the race track on the Sunday of our stay. It was the gala day, and the betting is publicly conducted.

IT HAS been said that the national vice of Argentina is gambling, but this is also largely true of other Latin American countries. In a recreation center near Buenos Aires a group of young men were found by our party under training to run the gambling devices of the establishment.

In nearly every city of South America we were approached on the street, in restaurants, in the cars, by numbers of young children, girls, old men and women, selling tickets on the public lotteries conducted by the Societies of Public Beneficence. There is a weekly drawing. Part of the proceeds goes to the public institutions, part to the Catholic Church for its use, possibly in institutional work. But the object of such profits cannot atone for the degradation of the public and private conscience concerning the evil, the substitution of chance for honest labor, and the wholesale poverty caused by the continuous temptations to risk with hope of gain.

THESE conditions are not hard to understand when we know that the people have been deprived of the light of conscience and of life through the Scriptures. Until the Bible Societies pushed their work with such remarkable courage and success the church took no heed to the need of the people for the Word. In fact, Bible burnings and persecution of Bible agents were the rule. Penzotti, the heroic colporteur and preacher, was imprisoned in Peru for selling the Word. He was offered liberty if he would refrain from preaching and selling the Bible. He said that his bones would rot first in prison. He was liberated, and so was the Word, to do its own work. To meet the phenomenal success of the Bible Societies the Catholic Church has given its nominal approval to the sale of its own editions of the Book, but the people as a whole have not the Word through the effort of the Catholic Church. And without the Word superstition naturally flourishes.

Protestantism, therefore, is sadly needed in Latin America to provide for native and foreign religious needs, purify the Catholic Church, promote private and public morality, develop Christian education and put against the atheism of these countries a vital triumphant Christian life and experience. Such a life and experience is suited perfectly to the needs of an emotional people, who are idealists and natively religious, but who have not known their birthright. Rightly founded in the Word, these peoples are bound to develop with great rapidity, and should join hands with America as the world's evangelists. It is through Protestant missions that they shall rightly understand North America's spiritual life and their own great spiritual destiny.

HARD ON CHILDREN When Teacher Has Coffee Habit.

"Best is best, and best will ever ve." When a person feels this way out Postum they are glad to give test any for the benefit of others.

A school teacher down in Miss. says: "I had been a coffee drinker sin childhood, and the last few years had injured me seriously."

"One cup of coffee taken at bre fast would cause me to become so n ous that I could scarcely go through wi the day's duties, and this nervousne was often accompanied by deep depre sion of spirits and heart palpitation."

"I am a teacher by profession and when under the influence of coffe had to struggle against crossness wh in the school room."

"When talking this over with my ysi cian, he suggested that I try Postu so I purchased a package and made it are fully according to directions; foud it excellent of flavour, and nourishin."

"In a short time I noticed very ati fying effects. My nervousness sap peared, I was not irritated by my lips, life seemed full of sunshine, and my ear troubled me no longer."

"I attribute my change in healt and spirits to Postum alone."

Name given by Postum Co., little Creek, Mich.

Postum comes in two forms: Postum Cereal—the original f— must be well boiled. 15c and 25c ack ages.

Instant Postum—a soluble pow er— dissolves quickly in a cup of hot ter, and, with cream and sugar, makes de licious beverage instantly. 30c ar 50c tins.

Both kinds are equally deliciou and cost about the same per cup.

"There's a Reason" for Postum. —sold by Grocs.

Cornish Profts Help You

For any beautiful Cornish Piano or Organ. Send for the New Cornish Profit Sharing Plan, which enables Cornish users actually pay for the instrument of their choice, in whole or in part, out of the profits of the Cornish Company.

A Year's Free Trial. All Credit You Need. Life Time Guarantee. Buy from Factory.

All these features of the world famous Cornish Plan, and now in addition we let our Profits help you pay. Send today for the beautiful Cornish Book, which explains how over 250,000 purchasers have saved one-third to one-half, tells how we do without dealers, and why only Cornish instruments are good enough for you. Dept. C.H. Cornish Company, WASHINGTON, NEW SEY for our independent holl win lighting systems for mea, stores, public building etc. Use common gasoline. I, and cheapest illumination own.

AGENTS WANTED

AKRON LIGHTING SYS MS are most improved, simp and safest of all. Shed a cl, bright light of high candl, Also complete line of port and street lamps, and lanterns, guaranteed. Our Agency P cannot be beat. Exclusive ter. Send quick for catalog an

Agents' Outfit Akron Gas Lamp Co., 627 So. Main St., Akron, Ohio

Save Half ON PLAYER PIANO ROLLS

Enjoy the best, full-score music yet save 45c to 50c on the dollar—get quicker delivery, and choice of over 2000 selections (classic, popular, etc.). Arrangement of our rolls celebrated. Materials of highest quality.

90-Page Catalog FREE

Shows convincingly how to get truly desirable (88-note) player-music at genuine half prices. B. C. Consumers Music Co., Sta. H, Buffalo, N.Y.

The "BEST" LIGHT

Positively the cheapest and strongest light on rth. Used in every country on the globe. Me and burns its own gas. Casts no shadow. C and odorless. Absolutely safe. Over 200 styles. 0 to 2000 Candle Power. Fully Guaranteed. W for catalog. AGENTS WANTED EVERYWE.

THE BEST LIGHT CO 470 E. 5th St., Canto O.

LADIES! Ease your feet. S for free catalog tell about our Neat, Noiseless, Flexible, Color able, unlined Vici Kid O'Sullivanized P SHOE. New shoes easy as old on breaking in required. Fit and feel a kid glove. O'Sullivan's Rubber H on all styles.

PILLOW SHOE CO., De 3 184 Summer Street, Boston, ASS.

Continued from page 1057

"I don't know nothin' about bein' hurry!" replied Amarilly defiantly. "He was ever as hungry as Iry, I bet he'd steal from a cat."

The season was now summer. Some time ago John Meredith had gone to the sea shore and the King family to their summer home in the mountains, unaware that the fever had spread over so wide an area in the Jenkins domain. The heater and St. Mark's were closed for the rest of the summer. The little boy found that their positions had been filled during the period of quarantine. None of these catastrophes, however, could be compared to the calamity of the revelation that Bud alone of all the patients had not convalesced completely. He was a delicate little fellow, and grew paler and thinner each day. In desperation Amarilly went to the doctor.

"I can get a week for him through the Red Air Fund," suggested the doctor. "I returned a study in reds and broods."

The family fund once more had a most start. Mrs. Jenkins obtained a few of her old customers, Bobby got a paper route, Flamingus and Milton were again at work, but Amarilly, Gus, and Cor were without vocations.

Soon after the quarantine was lifted Amarilly went forth to deliver the surplus and the waist which had hung fanarily side by side during the weeks of trouble. The housekeeper made Amarilly a present of the surplus.

"Mr. Meredith said you were to keep it," he thought your mother might find it useful. It is good linen, you know."

"I'll never cut it up!" thought Amarilly as she reverently received the robe. "I'll keep it in 'membrane of him."

"It's awful good in him to give it to us," she said gratefully.

At the King residence Amarilly saw the caretaker, who gave her a similar message regarding the lace waist.

"I'll keep it," thought Amarilly with a little blush, "until I'm married. I'll part my trousseau."

She took the garments home, not mentioning to anyone the gift of the waist, however, for that was to be her secret heart secret. She hid this nest-egg of her trousseau in an old trunk which she fastened securely.

The next day she was summoned to help clean the theater, which had been rented for one night by the St. Andrew's vocal choir, whose members were to give a sacred concert. A rehearsal for the entertainment was being held when Amarilly arrived.

"These surpluses are all too long or too short for me," complained the young ten, who had recently been engaged for a solo part.

Amarilly surveyed him critically.

"He's jest about Mr. St. John's size," she thought, "only he ain't so fine a shape."

With the thought came an inspiration that brought a quickly waged battle.

She made answer to her stabs of conscience by action instead of words, and went straight to her friend, the ticket-seller.

"That feller," she said, indicating the ten, "ain't satisfied with the fit of his surpluses. I've got one jest his size. It's done up spick and span clean, and I'll rent it to him for the show. He kin hev it for the ev'nin' for a dollar. Would you ask him for me?"

"Certainly, Amarilly," he agreed.

"I came back to her, smiling. 'I'll take it, but he seems to think you charge rather high.'"

"This ain't no common surplus," defended Amarilly loftily. "It was wore by the rector of St. Mark's, and he give it to me. It's of finer stuff than the other surpluses, and it hez got a cross word onto it, and a pocket in it, too."

"If course such inducements should increase the value," confirmed Mr. Vedder gravely, and he proceeded to hold another colloquy with the twinkling-eyed tenor. Amarilly went home for the surplice and received therefor the sum of one dollar, which swelled the Jenkins' purse perceptibly.

And here began the mundane career of a minister's surplice.

To be continued

TIMKEN

ROLLER BEARINGS

Know Motor Car Values

To know motor-car values you need to know the values of the parts.

Because the motor-car is a machine. And its use-service-value depends upon the rightness of its component parts.

No parts are more important to know than the bearings—because they safeguard the other vital moving parts that give "life" to the car.

Where the Bearings Are: On the axle spindles in the hubs of all four wheels, in the steering knuckle heads, in the transmission, on the pinion shaft, each side of the differential—these are the hard service places where only the best bearings will stand up to year-after-year use.

Bearings must reduce friction to almost nothing. They must sustain the weight of car and passengers, and the sudden increases in pressure that come with rapid travel on rough roads. They must also meet severe "end-thrust"—the mass momentum of car and contents which press side-wise against the wheels as you round a corner. Keep both vertical load and "end thrust" in mind as you read further.

Types of Bearings in Use: Anti-friction bearings may be divided into two general groups—Ball Bearings and Roller Bearings. These groups may be sub-divided thus:

- | Ball Bearings | | Roller Bearings | |
|---------------|------------------|-----------------|-------------|
| 1. Annular. | 2. Cup-and-Cone. | 3. Straight. | 4. Tapered. |

The illustrations show an example of each. From the text with the pictures you will note these interesting facts:

(a) A roller carries more direct load in proportion to its diameter than a ball because it carries the load along a line instead of on one or two mere points.

(b) Annular ball bearings have very little capacity for end-thrust, and straight roller bearings none, and they cannot be adjusted to take up wear. Hence they are often used with additional thrust bearings, and when sufficiently worn, they must be replaced.

(c) Cup-and-cone ball bearings meet end-thrust to some extent, but only at great sacrifice of capacity for vertical load.

(d) Cup-and-cone ball bearings can be adjusted—but this does not restore full efficiency because the slightest wear destroys the proper curvature of the ball race.

(e) Timken Roller Bearings have greater capacity for both vertical load and end-thrust. Pressure is distributed over wide surfaces, hence wear is minimized. The slight wear inevitable in any bearing cannot affect the taper of cone, rollers or cup. Therefore, simply moving these parts into slightly closer contact with each other brings cup, rollers and cone into the same relations that existed before the minute wear occurred. This "adjustment" restores the Timken Roller Bearing to full efficiency.

The Conclusion is Irresistible: What's more, it is backed by the experience of several hundred thousand motorists with Timken Roller Bearings at the points of severest service in the great majority of motor cars.

Send for Free Book Giving Full Details

Just ask for our book D-7 "On Bearings." We'll also send interesting pamphlet "The Companies Timken Keeps," which gives names of all motor cars having Timken Bearings and tells where they are located in the car.

The Timken Roller Bearing Company
Canton, Ohio Detroit, Mich.

New Contributions to the Fund for Widows and Orphans of the War

Miscellaneous Amounts

Ella Scott, $6; Friends, Ft. Wayne, Ind., $12; Tommie Stevens, $1.05; Point Chautauque Summer Sunday School, N. Y., $18.22; "Hamilton Range Sunday School and Social, Millfield, Quebec, Canada," $16.50; "Friends," Moorhead, Miss., $3.30; Mrs. F. F. Chamberlain and Daughters, $1.25; Jass E. Chadwick, $3.25; Cortland, N. Y., $2.25; Young Peoples' Christian Union, Sharon Reformed Presby. Church, Medford, Iowa, $38.25; "Friends," Springfield, Mich., $5.10; Friends, Frankfort, N. Y., $8; Nella B. Carley, $1.25; Annie Hillis and Katherine Hughes, $6.50; A Reader, Great Barrington, Mass., $2.30; W. C. Kirkland, 70 cents; Bergen Class, M. E. S. S., Clarks Summit, Pa., 20 cents; G. W. Reynolds, 20 cents; S. Hanson, $1.00; Exie Estes, 70 cents; Mrs. Mary Van Antwerp, 15 cents; "Winnie," S. S. Class, Charlestown, Miss., $2.25; B. M. Furman, $4.

Gift of $200

Anna A. Bradford.

Gifts of $25 Each

Council of Presby. and Reformed Missionaries, Karuiyawa, Japan, The Misses Camp, Ida M. Lovett, Miss Marie Stecker.

Gifts of $20 Each

I. H. N. Harper, III; G. H. Gosselink; James Boon; Mrs. L. S. Kuhn.

Gift of $15

Geo. Rayn.

Gifts of $10 Each

"Ebenezer Y. M. C. A., Flaxton, N. D.," Joseph Withington, Mrs. H. Stephen Bridge; Mrs. Kate Stewart; B. Bradford; Miss Anna K. Hoersch; Geo. E. Hays.

Gifts of $5 Each

Lydia and Richard Quirk, Andrew Turkington, Arthur Jensen, Mrs. M. M. Summers, Mr. and Mrs. Daniel Heimlich, Utica, N. Y.; C. J. Quesenberry, Mr. and Mrs. Simon de Haan, H. S. Kenyon, E. B. Leek, Ruth A. Kittredge; Miss Sara E. Bennett; Topeka, Kansas; Mrs. Manse; Miss Edna A. Ringstrand; Della Bowman; Mrs. F. M. Santa Ana, Cal.; Mrs. Mary Mayer; C. M. D. Browne; Benjamin Tanner; Gabriel Fedde; A Reader, Burlington, Wis.; Mrs. F. E. B.; J. W. Blackwell; Irene E. Montgomery; Mrs. A. L. F. Deye; Presby. Church S. S., Itasca, Ill.; "In His Name," Boonville, N. Y.; "In His Name," Haverhill, N. H.; John M. Bender.

Gifts of $3 Each

Miss Elizabeth Hosley; Mrs. Geo. Harvey; The Junior Missionary Society, Fifth Street Meth. Church, Meridian, Miss.; Miss Lucia S. Ladd.

Gifts of $2.50 Each

S. W. Hoffman; H. Gulson.

Gifts of $2 Each

Hickory, Va.; Mrs. Mary Suett; A Friend, East Hampton, N. Y.; Mrs. J. V. Roberts; Nelson Peterson; Susan Garrett Nelson; Helen T. Burdick; Maria M. Vallatte; Mrs. Elizabeth Shaffer; Mrs. Alice M. Burroughs; A. H. N.; Waterville, N. Y.; "A Friend, Eaton, N. Y.," Samuel S. Tear; J. C. Davis; L. H. N.; Winsted, Conn.; Adeline Cromwell; Mrs. Robert McKee; Mrs. James Cairns; Mr. William Hartje; Julia H. O'Neal; J. C. Wilmington, Del.; Mrs. H. Mitrav; A. L. Hollowell; Mrs. E. Davis; John Keiter; Mrs. Hardill.

Additional amounts to be acknowledged later.

G & J "Indianapolis Brand" "Chain Tread" Bicycle Tires

A Real Safety Tread on a Phenomenally Long Wearing Tire

Automobile experts and motorcycle experts agree that the "Chain Tread" is a really marvelous anti-skid device.

Today thousands upon thousands of bicycle riders are enjoying the freedom from slipping that comes to all those who ride upon the renowned "Chain Tread."

The "Chain Tread" is placed on the long famous G & J "Indianapolis Brand" Bicycle Tire.

From the date of the invention of the pneumatic tires for bicycles the G & J Tire has given exceptional mileage and remarkable freedom from punctures. Be sure any Bicycle Tire you buy has the G & J Trade Mark and the famous "Chain Tread."

UNITED STATES TIRES

Made by the Largest Rubber Company in the World.

Harris Home No. 556

$673 buys the Material to build this Home

BUILD TO STAY
Cut-To-Fit The Harris Way.

Easily built under our guaranteed no shortage, no extras system, with positive accurate plans, 6 rooms, bath, large closets, modern stairway, inside finish, doors and windows. Excellent layout. Sound construction. Architecturally correct in every detail.

No Money Down—Save Half

The Material: The above price includes all first-class lumber cut to fit the Harris Way, Clear Interior Trim, Clear Floorings, Clear Outside Finish and Shingles. No 1 Dimension Lumber. All glass in and back putted. Up-to-date hardware, everything guaranteed.

The Offer: We don't want a cent until you checked and inspected. Pay us after you get it. $2.00 brings blue print plans, specifications, material list, and delivered price to your station. If the plans do not suit, return them, and 50c will be refunded.

$10,000 Plan Book Free It is not necessary that you decide on your home with only the design above before you. There are 100 Harris homes in our free plan book. Write today.

Ask for Free Book of Plans CFY 202

HARRIS BROTHERS COMPANY
35th and Iron Sts. CHICAGO

DON'T Pay Two PRICES HOOSIER Stoves Ranges FREE

Thirty in your own home for 30 days. Show your friends. If right, pay for us. Send it back and our expense if you do not want to keep it. You can buy the best at Actual Factory Prices. Our new improvements equal anything ever produced. Save enough on a single stove to buy your winter's fuel. ALL HOOSIER STOVES Guaranteed for Years. Send postal today for large FREE Catalogue, showing large assortment of models. No Obligations.

HOOSIER STOVE CO.
164 State St., MARION, IND.

TYPEWRITERS ALL MAKES ALL PRICES

Look at these bargains! Typewriters Rebuilt in our own Factories. Every machine is guaranteed for one year.

Remingtons $20 to $55 Smiths $18 to $40
Underwoods $35 to $60 Royals $25 to $45
L. C. Smiths $30 to $50 Oliverts $20 to $35

We have others. Send for catalog describing them, and address of nearest branch office.

AMERICAN WRITING MACHINE CO., Inc., 345 Broadway, N. Y.

Write to Cincinnati Bell Foundry Co., Cincinnati, O.

UNLIKE OTHER BELLS SWEETER, MORE DURABLE, LOWER PRICE. OUR FREE CATALOGUE TELLS WHY.

$3.25 Special Offer $3.25

Christian Herald	- ($1.50 a year)	} $3.25
Youth's Companion	- ($2.00 a year)
(Remaining issues of 1915 FREE)
McCall's Magazine	- ($.50 a year)	} Save 90c
(including choice of a 15c pattern FREE)	- ($.15 retail)

Address

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York

The Klondike Goldfield

IN a recent publication of the Smithsonian Institution Mr. H. M. Cadell reports his studies of the Klondike and Yukon goldfield, including an interesting review of the early history of this district. Although the great ice fields of the early ages swept the greater portion of North America they missed the region of the Klondike, and consequently the gold producing deposits remained intact until the early prospectors discovered them. The Yukon goldfield is confined mainly to the vicinity of Dawson City. Dawson City is situated on the alluvial flat where the Yukon is joined by the Klondike River. Although traces of gold were discovered in the Yukon Valley in about 1869, it was twelve years later, in 1881, before it was found in the Big Salmon, and in the Lewes, Pelly, and Stewart Rivers. Five years afterward coarse gold was found on the Fortymile, a tributary of the Yukon below Dawson, and in 1894-1896 the discoveries of Bob Henderson and George Cormack in Hunker and Bonanza Creeks drew miners into Klondike Valley from all quarters. Prodigious quantities of gold were soon found in Bonanza Creek and many miners made fortunes in a short time, but unfortunately most of the gold was spent foolishly or in debauchery. One man is said to have taken $600,000 out of a claim eighty-six by three hundred feet, but, so the story goes, he spent it in a few years and died in poverty. The quickest fortune on record was secured by two men who cleaned up gold to the value of $65,000 in twenty-seven hours. Stories of the "golden days" are not edifying, but point to the moral that wealth too easily and quickly won is apt to work ill. The total output in 1898 was $10,000,000, from which figure it jumped six million annually until 1900, when the production reached $22,275,000, the highest point. From this point a steady decline began until in 1908, when it was $2,820,131, at which time hydraulic mining and dredging began and the total output rose slowly until it was $5,018,411, in 1913. It has been estimated that only about $20,000,000 worth of gold remains to be produced, out of the original available amount of nearly $180,000,000. At the height of the boom in the winter of 1899 the population of Dawson is said to have reached 25,000; recently, however, it has dwindled down to less than two thousand people.

A Soldier's Long-Lost Hymnal

AN interesting recovery from a battle field after the lapse of fifty-one years was that of a hymnal which on a flyleaf bore the name of "Frederick Will, Ixonia, Wis., First Sergeant Co. B, Twenty-sixth Wisconsin Volunteers." Will's regiment was surprised at the battle of Peachtree Creek, Georgia, July 20, 1864, and some of the troops were called into action before they could gather up their belongings. One of the articles left in the camp by Sergeant Will was a hymnal, one of a number that had been distributed to the troops at the outbreak of the war by the Y. M. C. A. of Boston. After the war, Sergeant Will moved from his old home town, and the hymnal incident was all but forgotten, when one day he happened to meet an old comrade who had been attending a soldiers' reunion. This comrade had there become acquainted with Charles Stacey, of Norwalk, Ohio, a former member of Company D of the Sixty-fifth Ohio regiment, which had participated in the fight of Peachtree Creek. Stacey mentioned that he had found a hymnbook on the battle-ground bearing Sergeant Will's name. When the sergeant heard this, he immediately wrote to Stacey, and the latter mailed the book to its former owner, accompanying it with a letter in which he told the sergeant that he had been "trying to find him for over a half century." The book had been well preserved, and today is highly treasured by the whole Will family.

J. L. GRAFF.

Is Bran Unpopular

In your home?

If so, change the bran food. Make bran inviting. You can afford to omit it.

Pettijohn's is a breakfast dain made of soft wheat flaked. In luscious food it hides 25% of bran.

The bran is in flake form which makes it efficient. It is so and tender. Bran in this form a welcome dish. It becomes constant food, as it should be. Try it.

Pettijohn's

Rolled Wheat with Bran Flake

Most grocers have it. Any grocer will get it. Per package, 15c.

THE QUAKER OATS COMPANY
Chicago

Women Will Say

I don't know that stitch and I don't know this stitch. Our new book ART NEEDLEWORK with over 100 illustrations teaches you to master every known Embroidery and Crochet stitch. A child can learn them herself. Instruction as we picture in nine parts include all kinds of Embroidery, Stamping, Lacing, Crocheting, Handpainting, Crazy work, Punch work, Cross stitch, Felt work, etc. Complete book by mail, 10 cents.

ART PUB. CO., Desk 56 South Norwalk, Conn.

Health Culture Magazine

Edited by Dr. Elmer Lee, best writer, attainment of Health, Efficiency, and Power by Rational Methods, teaching how to Eat, to Breathe, to Exercise, to Sleep, to Health and Bodily Development, and to regain health without drugs. $1 a year, 6 numbers. "On Trial" 6 months for $1. Money back if desired. Send for it.

Health Culture, 512 St. James Bldg., New York.

BIG MONEY FOR YOU

growing mushrooms spare time. Sell them, sheds, boxes, etc. Put in a mushroom bed simply amazing. Tell you where to sell at highest prices. Free Illustrated Instruction Book.

HIRSH BARTON, 336 West 48th St., New York.

INDIVIDUAL COMMUNION SERVICE

Does YOUR Church use it? Is it clean and sanitary method? Send for catalog and special offer. Outfits on trial.

Thomas Communion Service Co. Box 150 Lima, Io.

MAGAZINES 1/3 PRICE

All leading 15c magazines, post paid: 7c. All 25c, 35c magazines: last month, 10c; previous months, 15c; yearly at cheaper rates. Big bargain list sent free. Economy Magazine Exchange, R319 Monon Bldg., Chicago, Ill.

YOU CAN AFFORD

Familiar Songs on Cospel (No. 1). Round or shape notes. 5c per hundred; samples, 5c each. 83 songs, words and music.

E. A. K. HACKETT, FORT WAYNE, IND.

KIDDER'S PASTILLES

For 50 yrs Standard Relief for Asthma (Inhalation). All Druggists; or by mail, 15c.

STOWELL & CO., Manufacturers, Charlestown, Mass.

POMPEIAN OLIVE OIL

ALWAYS FRESH
PURE-SWEET-WHOLESOME

1916 Maxwell $655

Including Electric Starter and Electric Lights

The "Wonder Car"

The Acknowledged Automobile Sensation of 1916

The Lowest Cost Real Automobile

From the Atlantic to the Pacific, from the Gulf to the Great Lakes, in every City, Town and Hamlet, automobilists are lauding the 1916 Maxwell's power,—the 1916 Maxwell's beauty,—the 1916 Maxwell's luxury,—the 1916 Maxwell's complete and detailed equipment.

Everywhere, men who know motor cars, are marveling that $655 now buys a beautiful, powerful, stream-line, real, complete, full five-passenger car, with electric starter,—electric lights,—high-tension magneto,—demountable rims,—"one-man" mohair top, and every other feature and modern refinement known to the automobile industry.

The Car of Lowest "After-Cost"

Owners of the new Maxwell know that the first inspection, and the first ride, do not disclose the real worth of the "1916 Wonder Car." That only becomes apparent after week-in, and week-out, year-round use. Then it is found that the Maxwell gives matchless automobile service and lowers all economy records for:

- 1st—Miles per set of tires.
- 2nd—Miles per gallon of gasoline.
- 3rd—Miles per quart of lubricating oil.
- 4th—Lowest year-in-and-year-out repair bills.

1916 Maxwell High-Priced Car Features, all included for $655

Electric Starter and Electric Lights	Electric Horn	Handsome Rounded Radiator and Hood	Easy Riding and Marvelous Flexibility
Demountable Rims	Double Ventilating Windshield (clear vision and rain-proof)	Linoleum covered running-boards and floor-boards	Unusual power on hills and in sand
High-tension Magneto	Aluminum Transmission Housing	Automatic Tell-tale Oil Gauge	Ability to hold the road at high speed
"One-Man" Mohair Top	Robe Rail with back of front seat leather covered	Heat-treated, Tested Steel throughout	Improved Instrument Board with all instruments set flush
New Stream-line Design
Wider Front and Rear Seats

Every feature and every refinement of cars that sell at twice its price

PRICE F. O. B. DETROIT

Write for the 1916 Maxwell Catalogue and name of the Maxwell Dealer nearest you. Address Dept. A.

MAXWELL MOTOR COMPANY, Inc., Detroit, Michigan

Cylinder Unit Power Plant with closed fly-wheel and clutch.

Demountable Rims are regular equipment of the 1916 Maxwell.

Front view showing the handsome design of the new radiator and hood.

Speedometer, fuse box, ignition, lights, battery regulator, all mounted flush on instrument board.

Note the compact arrangement of spare tire carrier, tail light and license bracket.

Perfect-fitting, "one-man" mohair top; quick adjustable storm curtains, rolled up inside of top.

Built complete by the three gigantic Maxwell factories at Detroit, Dayton and Newcastle.

16 Great Maxwell Service Stations—54 District Offices—Over 2,500 Dealers—all giving Maxwell service.

Victor Record of "Silent Night, Holy Night" sung by Schumann-Heink

Schumann-Heink

Photo Hall

Both are Schumann-Heink

The Victor Record of Schumann-Heink's voice is just as truly Schumann-Heink as Schumann-Heink herself.

To hear her on the Victrola is the same as hearing her in person.

It is Schumann-Heink to the life—the most glorious and sympathetic of true contralto voices, with all the genial personality that has endeared her to music-lovers everywhere.

The proof is in the hearing. Any Victor dealer in any city in the world will gladly play for you any of the thirty-nine Schumann-Heink records, or Victor records by any other of the world's greatest artists.

There are Victors and Victrolas in great variety of styles from $10 to $300.

Victor Talking Machine Co., Camden, N. J., U. S. A.

Berliner Gramophone Co., Montréal, Canadian Distributors

Always use Victor Machines with Victor Records and Victor Needles—
the combination. There is no other way to get the unequalled Victor tone.

Victrola

New Victor Records demonstrated at all dealers on the 28th of each month.

Christian Herald

SUBSCRIPTION, $1.50 PER YEAR
PUBLISHED 52 TIMES A YEAR

COPYRIGHT, 1915, BY THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

NEW YORK, OCTOBER 27, 1915

VOL. 38—NO. 43. PRICE 5 CENTS
OFFICES: BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK

"SEAWARD."

*The world's reflected in the sky,
A land-locked sea in clouds aglow;
Thither our agonies would fly.*

Our Mail-Bag

NOTICE

THE editors of the Christian Herald will be glad to answer any question addressed to the Mail-Bag provided it be of general interest and not merely personal. Correspondents may use a nom de plume to identify the question, but all letters must contain name and address of the sender, in addition to the nom de plume. No attention will be paid to anonymous letters.

Questions and Answers

J. A. G., Ohio. A number of times since I have been in this country (now twenty years) I have been told that knowing three languages (German, French and English) I could get a good position in a store or courtroom as an interpreter. Could you give me an idea how I could find out if I have really underrated my capacities?

Many persons who speak two or more languages fluently fail to profit by their accomplishment because they have not systematized their knowledge by study. You should get a book for the study of each of these languages and practice translating from one language to the other; then get an educated person of each nation to correct your translations, especially in regard to spelling and punctuation. In the meantime you could get a position as interpreter in a store or courtroom, where the practice would be all in the direction you are seeking. A knowledge of shorthand in these languages would be a great help, not only in fixing their knowledge in your mind and making it more accurate, but in enabling you to earn a better income. Then when you are better equipped you might try to secure a position in some large commercial city where there are more opportunities, though it must be remembered that the competition is also keener.

E. G., Brooklyn, N. Y. Of what religion was Cyrus, King of Persia? Was he not an idolater?

The Persians of the time of Cyrus were Zoroastrians. According to McClintock and Strong, their religion was primitively monotheistic, and they allowed no idols or other material symbols of deity in their temples. There was less enmity on the part of the Jews against the Persians than against the other great nations with whom they came in contact, due probably to the monotheism which characterized the Persian religion. So Cyrus, whatever else may be said of him, was certainly not an idolater.

G. W. S., Reinbeck, Ia. In the paragraph you quote from the Christian Herald, "head" religion as distinguished from "heart" religion is intended to mark the wide difference between mere intellectual assent and the conviction that carries with it the heart and the whole life. Spiritual enlightenment, conviction, conversion, regeneration, are not intellectual processes in the usual sense, nor are they to be attained by what might be termed "head" religion, but by putting all other means aside and reaching out in faith, laying hold of Christ as Saviour and yielding our whole heart and life and being to his rule.

T. B. L., Cane Valley, Ky., sends this timely letter, which expresses the views of so many of our readers besides echoing our own, that we gladly give it space in the Mail Bag:

"It seems to be generally conceded that war is hell, and that Satan is its author. If this be true, is it not inconsistent for us to send our young men to military schools to learn the art of war, the art of destroying their enemies? Isn't this opposing ourselves, and, as Paul says, building again that which we destroy?"

"We teach the young in our Sunday schools to love their enemies, do good to those who despitefully use them, and overcome evil with good. Now in their military training are they not taught exactly the opposite to this?"

"Another thing that to some of us seems strange is, how can a minister of the gospel of Christ go into the army as a chaplain, and preach as Christ and his apostles did, and as they would today if they were here, without stirring up the war devil and creating a greater commotion than Paul did when he preached against the great goddess of the Ephesians? What use would an army have for a preacher that would tell them to put up their swords, and that Christ's kingdom was not of this world and therefore his servants did not fight with carnal weapons; that they must love their enemies and overcome them with good; that instead of blockading their ports and starving them, they must feed them when they hungered?"

"Many such questions as these are running through our minds these days. When fire and powder come in contact without an explosion we conclude there is something wrong with the fire or powder, one or the other; but as the devil always keeps his ammunition dry and in good shape, when we see fire come in contact with it, and observe no explosion, we naturally conclude the fire is some kind of "strange fire," and not the fire of God that is coming down out of heaven to destroy the devil and his works (Heb. 2:14; 1 John 3:8)."

S. G., Casey, Ill. It is an old saying that "the blood of the martyrs is the seed of the church." You ask why God permits all great spiritual reformers to be persecuted. The answer is that the world is wedded to its wickedness. It is at constant enmity with God. "The prince of the world hath nothing in me," said Jesus. And it has been so almost ever since the beginning. Jerusalem killed the prophets and the enmity of the world has been directed against every man who bore a divine message, warning against sin and calling to repentance. Many times even the church itself the Canaanites as the latter are described in the Old Testament. They practised human sacrifices and other enormities in their worship of Baal, whose name forms part of the name of the celebrated Carthaginian general Hannibal, which means "the favor of Baal." (In Num. 34:23 and 1 Chron. 7:39 we have an exact parallel to this name Hamul-el, "the favor of God.") The Carthaginians had established a kind of republic, presided over by two officers called by the Roman historians suffetes. Carthage was only one, though the greatest, of many similar Phœnician colonies on the coast of the Mediterranean.

Mrs. H. C. M., White House, N. Y., responding to a request by D. M. W., Springfield, Mass., for a poem called "A Little Parable," sends the verses, which are so beautiful that we give them for the benefit of all. The poem is by Anne Reeve Aldrich.

I made the cross myself, whose weight
Was later laid on me.

This thought adds anguish as I toil
Up life's steep Calvary.

"To think mine own hands drove the nails!
I sang a merry song.

And chose the heaviest wood I had
To build it firm and strong.

"If I had guessed—if I had dreamed
Its weight was meant for me,
I should have built a lighter cross
To bear up Calvary!"

A. H. P., Seattle, Wash. Can you tell me something of the history of Cadmus, who invented the alphabet?

Cadmus is a purely legendary character. The foundation of the city of Thebes is attributed to

NOTICE OF EXPIRATION

ONCE each month we attach, just under notice, a subscription blank and notice of expiration for our subscribers whose Christian Herald subscriptions expired at any time during the past month. If your copy has this subscription blank attached, please use it to renew at once. IF YOU SENT YOUR RENEWAL WITHIN THE LAST TWO OR THREE WEEKS, PLEASE PAY NO ATTENTION TO THIS BLANK.

When renewing, indicate on the blank your remittance whether you are subscribing for any of our premium books, In Christ's Country, $2; The Fundamentals of the Faith, $2.20; Wonder Stories, $2; 555 Difficult Bible Questions Answered, $1.85; India Paper Letter Bible, $3, with your subscription, or a straight year's subscription at $1.50.

Do not forget you can have YOUR OWN RENEWAL AND ONE NEW SUBSCRIPTION FOR $2.25, or, YOUR OWN RENEWAL AND TWO NEW SUBSCRIPTIONS FOR $3.50. It is understood that the old subscriber must pay the full subscription price of $1.50 from a new subscriber and must not in any way share the special price with the new subscriber.

Send money by postal or express money orders. Address, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Box 100, New York.

as by lightning, etc. There are various stories of travelers who found tribes ignorant of fire. The historian of Magellan's voyage round the world relates that the inhabitants of a Pacific island knew nothing of fire until Magellan burned one of their villages, but this story is not credited to other travelers who have visited those islands, with ruins of great antiquity found indicating some advance in civilization. The savage tribes, as far as known, have produced fire by striking flints or other hard substances together, or by the friction of pieces of wood so contrived as to secure very rapid motion combined with great pressure.

HELP WANTED—MALE

BACK to college this year may mean something far different from any other year's return. What else may it mean? Who would like to meet us at the threshold of the new college year and talk things over with us?

Particularly the seniors. Has that decision been made yet about the life work? Many voices are calling; many fingers beckoning. Have we talked it all over with this Friend and asked him to tell us plainly what he would like to have us do? He will if we ask. He is waiting for us to listen.

For many years the appeals of missionary work have been presented to the student. The sorrows and woes and needs of the Christless nations have been described, and their cries for deliverance have sounded above the clamors of college life and have lured many to become Light-bearers in those lands of darkness. The moans of the sick have drawn many noble girls to lives of healing comfort and many young men to the tasks of medicine and surgery in neglected fields. The needs of the poor have led many to give their lives to the work of cheering the needy and to labor for the bettering of their condition. Always there is the call of sin-burdened souls to hear the message of salvation, and always the call of Jesus, singling out certain favored ones to be the heralds of his evangel.

"Ye have not chosen me," he will say, "but I have chosen you, and ordained you, that ye should go and bring forth fruit, and that your fruit should remain."

But whether or not he calls us to give up other forms of activity for these special tasks, he calls us, every one, to do all our work for his glory—that is, because we love him and want others to understand and love him too. He asks us, every one, to give our lives to the service of others in his name, and will assure us some day that inasmuch as we have done some service unto one of the least of his brethren we have done it for him.

him. He was said to be the son of a Phœnician king. But it is believed that the name is a Hellenized form of a Phœnician word, Kedem, meaning "the East," and that it indicates that the Greeks derived their knowledge of letters from the East, i. e., from Phœnicia. Strictly speaking, no one man invented the alphabet, but it was gradually developed from hieroglyphic writing.

B. G. B., San Diego, Calif. Is it true that there are or have been races of men ignorant of the use of fire?

Theoretically, there must have been a time when men had not yet learned to make fire or to preserve it when produced by natural means,

Miscellaneous

Mattie Meadow, Germantown, N. J. In "yellow streak" is a phrase which means that there is a low-bred strain in a person; that he is shifty, unreliable, untrustworthy—the sort of a man to avoid. P. P. Bliss died in 1866 in a railroad wreck at Tabula, Ohio.

P. K. C., Fort Davis, Texas. Thanks for your friendly criticism. The North Atlantic Eddy, mentioned in Tarr and Murray's World Geography, is the "complete circle" formed by the ocean current which branches off from the Gulf Stream and flows southward to Spain and Northern Africa and then turns westward and returns to near its place of origin.

L. W. G., Lawrenceburg, Tenn. The Baptist Missionary Society was founded October 2, 1792, as a result of the efforts of William Carey, the "Ninthhamptonshire Cobbler" who was its first missionary.

J. S. A., Toledo, O. Not in our collection. Write to Anti-Slavery League, New York, for the information.

A. C. W., Antwerp, N. B. Both of your questions have been answered repeatedly in the Mail Bag and they are dealt with at length in the book "555 Difficult Bible Questions Answered," issued by the Christian Herald.

Westerner, Norwalk, Colo. There is no passage in the Bible which can bear the interpretation mentioned. It is possible that the preacher's statement may have been misunderstood. If you have his own version of it, we may be able to help.

John A. Gerber, Axtell Avenue, Painesville, Ohio, wishes a copy of the poem "A Little Behind Hand."

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

An Illustrated News Weekly for the Home

Not Your Money, But Your Life

By LOUIS E. ORCUTT

IN the chapel of the old Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church of New York a group of men knelt in prayer. It was the anniversary in 1906 of that Haystack Prayer Meeting which the genesis of all our American missionary endeavor. And these men prayed. From three to six o'clock they prayed; prayed that the men of America might see the vision of a world in need, and that they might hear, as they had never yet heard it, the Great Commission of the risen Lord, "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature."

Earlier in the year one of the men had seen five thousand students at Nashville quietly, bravely, prayerfully facing the question of their personal duty to the Lord and King. He had seen hundreds of these students joyfully dedicate and consecrate their lives and all their purposes to the service of their Christ and Saviour; and he had become impressed with the results that must come for the Kingdom when all the men of the church should lay their lives upon the altar of the Lord. And so this meeting in New York was called; and nearly seventy-five men laid aside their work and spent the afternoon and evening in prayer and discussion. Out of the earnest waiting before God was born the Laymen's Missionary Movement; and out of the movement has come a great awakening in the church and a great strengthening of every department of Christian work at home and in every mission field.

THE first years of the life of the movement were spent in building up the framework upon which its activities were to rest. At the prayer-meeting on November 15, 1906, a committee of fifty-five representative laymen was called into existence and was commissioned "to consult with the secretaries of the various foreign missionary boards, with reference, first, to the conduct of a campaign of education among laymen, to interest them more largely in missions; second, to the devising of a comprehensive plan for the evangelization of the world in this generation; third, to endeavor to send a commission of fifty or more laymen to visit mission fields and report their findings to the church at home." This was the initial program of the movement. In 1907 the movement, which originally included only the men of the United States and Canada, was extended to England and Scotland. In 1908 a commission of sixty-six laymen visited various mission fields at their own expense. During the winter of 1908-09 a national missionary campaign was conducted in Canada, the campaign culminating in a great convention in Toronto in April, 1909. The next winter a similar campaign was conducted in the United States, conventions held in seventy-five cities being attended by about 75,000 registered delegates. As in Canada, so in the United States, the series of conventions ended in a great convention in Chicago in May, 1910. Since 1910 the churches and the Laymen's Missionary Movement have been working together to preserve and to build upon the results of the conventions.

The years since 1910 have been marked by great increase in missionary giving. In 1906 the total receipts of the Foreign Missionary Boards of North America was $830,448; in 1914 the total was $1,168,611, an increase almost as great as that of the preceding ninety years. Nor has this large increase in gifts to missions been at the expense of other causes; instead it has stimulated them also. In the Goshen District of the North Indiana Conference of the Methodist Church the benevolence collections in 1909 were $9,012; in 1915, $21,119;

the contributions to ministerial support increased in the same time from $31,014 to $41,000. Similar increase has been noted wherever the conventions have been followed up and in all denominations. The movement does not claim all the credit, but officers of denominational agencies

Officers of the Laymen's Missionary Movement

W. E. Doughty
Educational Secretary

W. B. Millar
General Secretary

J. Campbell White
Organizer and First Gen'l Secretary

frankly admit that a considerable part of the credit is due to the movement and to the working out locally of plans the movement has suggested.

Dr. Stanley White of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions summed up the work of the movement by saying that it had called the attention of the church to its spiritual opportunity and privilege,

IT was early recognized that the meagerness of the contributions to missionary endeavor was due in a large degree to ignorance of the need and to failure to make giving a matter of system. The movement therefore put stress on the advisability of the every-member canvass and upon systematic giving. It has encouraged the appointment of missionary committees in every church, and this has brought to the men of the churches a new and broader understanding of the Great Commission. It has urged prayer as the first measure to be employed in every effort for missionary support, and it has promoted the organization of men's discussion classes, finding that discussion attracted men while they would not consider study. The men who served on these missionary committees got a broader vision of Christian service through the very effort of urging the claims of the Kingdom upon others; and many of them found it possible to render effective service in the pulpit and in public addresses. Expression deepened the impression that their work had made upon their own lives, and many of these men have gained and have helped others to gain an entirely new idea of Christian stewardship.

In all the work of the movement the stress has been laid on the necessity of a deepened spiritual life. Bible study and prayer have been placed on a par with activity and service. The conference and convention method has been adhered to as a means of developing the field. Since 1910, six hundred and ninety-five conferences have been held in the smaller cities of the Union. Now another series of great conventions is planned for the winter of 1915-16. The first of these convened at Chicago on October 14. There will be seventy-five conventions throughout the country, and then there will be a great national convention at Washington April 26-30, 1916. The churches are mobilizing their best men for these conventions; the Missionary Societies have put every missionary at home on furlough into the work of preparing for the conventions and of following them up afterward, and have called home many of the strongest men from the foreign field to help make the conventions centers of spiritual life and consecration.

THE purpose of the movement and of these conventions is to intensify Christ's kingship in the lives of his followers, to increase the efficiency and spiritual power of the local church, to inaugurate in each church a program of community service that will express the adequacy of the Gospel to meet modern social conditions, to consider new world conditions and America's enlarged responsibility, to study recent missionary progress, to secure general use of the best methods of missionary education and finance, to inspire the church to undertake the accomplishment of America's full missionary duty, and to enlist laymen for world conquest for the Prince of Peace. The campaign is undertaken in the spirit of prayer and with reliance upon God; and God's people everywhere are asked to pray that America and the Church of Christ may fulfill their mission to mankind.

A careful computation shows that in 1914 less than 50 per cent of the members enrolled in Protestant churches contributed to the local expense or benevolent funds of the churches, or participated in any definite form of service. A conservative estimate places the wealth of Protestant churches in the United States at $23,000,000,000, with an average annual increase of $700,000,000; yet in 1914 they gave but $28,875,000 to home and foreign missions—about $1.25 per capita. The Laymen's Missionary Movement would correct this by seeking not your money first but your life.

MEN WANTED
NATIONAL MISSIONARY CAMPAIGN
1915 - 1916

ENLIST FOR WORLD SERVICE CONVENTIONS IN SEVENTY-FIVE CITIES
LAYMEN'S MISSIONARY MOVEMENT

National Missionary Campaign Poster

had deepened the individual consecration of church members, and had resulted in additional financial support, especially in buildings and colleges. He attributed the splendid condition of missionary treasuries at the present time in large part to the Laymen's Missionary Movement.

Reformation Day

A COMMEMORATIVE SERMON BY PASTOR D. H. STEFFENS*

TEXT, I Cor. 3:21: "All things are yours"

IN THE mind of the average liberty-loving American, Boston, with its Common, its monuments, its old South Church and its Faneuil Hall, above all other things, stands for liberty. The great historic event which we commemorate, the Lutheran Reformation, stands for just that most precious thing. Guizot, in his famous book "The History of Civilization in Modern Europe," cannot sufficiently emphasize this truth. He calls the Reformation "the immortal portion of history which all generations must study, in order to understand the past as well as the present time." He defines it as being "a vast effort made by the human mind to achieve its freedom; it was a newborn desire which it felt to think and judge, freely and independently, of facts and opinions which, till then, Europe received, or was considered bound to receive, from the hands of authority. It was a great endeavor to emancipate human reason and to call things by their right names; it was an insurrection of the human mind against the absolute power of spiritual order." "Wherever the Reformation penetrated, wherever it acted an important part, whether conqueror or conquered, its general, leading and constant result was an immense progress in mental activity and freedom; an immense step toward the emancipation of the human mind." "European civilization has, if I may be allowed the expression, at last penetrated into the ways of eternal truth—into the scheme of Providence; it moves in the ways which God has prescribed."

NOW what is this scheme of Providence? It is this: "Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free." It moves in the direction of the glorious liberty of the sons of God. When it fully penetrates into the ways of eternal truth, its highest fruition, its most glorious consummation will be the complete deliverance of the people of God from all thralldom and their removal into the full and free enjoyment of the bounties of God's love in Jesus Christ. That will be liberty—full, sweet, perfect liberty! Let us therefore look at this stupendous event which we call the Reformation from this viewpoint: It was "a movement in the ways which God has prescribed." A gigantic and successful struggle for liberty.

I am not thinking merely of the liberation of the human mind from the blighting thralldom of the ecclesiastical authority which to this day keeps a great majority of the people of Roman Catholic countries like Spain or Portugal in densest ignorance of all letters. Nor am I thinking of civil or political liberty, the lack of which is keeping poor Mexico in its present state of revolution and bloodshed. I am thinking of that liberty described by our Lord Jesus Christ when he said: "If the Son therefore shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed"—the liberty Paul had in mind when he said: "Stand fast therefore in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free." "Ye are bought with a price; be not ye the servants of men"—the liberty Martin Luther restored unto an enslaved Church when he wrote his book on "The Freedom of a Christian Man," and told us that a Christian is a free lord over all things but in love every man's servant. Even as Paul says: "All things are yours . . . but ye are Christ's." It is the deliverance of men from the bondage of the law, the freeing of their consciences from slavish obedience to the commandments of men, and the giving to them of the blessed privilege of free access to the father-heart of God. In a word, it is the glorious liberty won by Christ for a sin-enthralled world and proclaimed to men by his great emancipation act—the Gospel of the full and free forgiveness of sins.

ACCORDING to Paul, there are but two religious systems in the world: the religion of law and the religion of the Gospel; the religion of works and the religion of grace; the religion of bondage and the religion of freedom. As a type of the one, he puts Sinai, with its thundering curses. As a type of the other, he puts Jerusalem, the city of peace. The adherents of the one he calls the sons of the bondwoman. The adherents of the other he calls the sons of the free. Then, speaking of himself and his fellow Christians, he drives home the argument: "So then, brethren, we are not children of the bondwoman but of the free." Do you ask why? Let me give the answer in the words of Martin Luther: "I believe that Jesus Christ, true God begotten of the Father from eternity, and also true man born of the Virgin Mary, is my Lord, who has redeemed me, a lost and condemned creature, purchased and won me from all sins, from death and the power of the devil, not with gold or silver, but with his holy precious blood and with his innocent suffering and death, that I may be his own and live under him in his kingdom, and serve him in everlasting righteousness, innocence and blessedness, even as he is risen from the dead, lives and reigns to all eternity. This is most certainly true."

Through the redemption of Jesus Christ, a Christian is a free lord of all things. All the boundless treasures of God's free grace: forgiveness of sin, life and salvation, everlasting righteousness, holiness of living, the priceless privilege of sonship, the imperishable hope of heaven, the possession of the means of grace, the keys of heaven and hell, are directly and immediately in his hand, won for him and given to him by Christ. He knows but one Lord. He owes fealty to him alone. He accepts commands in things spiritual from no other master. He bows down to no power and authority save to the word of him who said: "One is your Master, even Christ, and all ye are brethren."

THAT any creature should ever have attempted to deprive Christ's Christians of this their liberty is almost inconceivable. Yet that is exactly what was done by him "who opposeth and exalteth himself above all that is called God, or that is worshiped; so that he, as God, sitteth in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God," the self-styled vicar of Christ and the vicegerent of God, in the Church of Rome. Time fails me for a proper presentation of the historical development of that dreadful power secured unto themselves by the bishops of a Church founded by Paul in the imperial city of the ancient world—a power expressed in the proud words addressed to all Christendom in the opening sentence of every papal decree: "It is our will and command." Permit me to waive that argument. It has been so often presented that I may assume your entire familiarity with its salient features.

I therefore desire merely to show you the results of this usurpation of spiritual power upon the hearts and minds of God's free Christian men. Papal usurpation attempted utterly to destroy for man the blessed fruit of God's redeeming love in Jesus Christ. It did this by converting Christ's covenant of grace into a covenant of works, by substituting law for gospel, by transforming Christ's family, the Church, into a kingdom of this world, by degrading the children of the free bride of Christ into children of the bondwoman—in a word, by robbing Christian men of their Christian liberty. It did this by binding their consciences, under pain of excommunication and the stake, to the word of a man who exalted himself above all that is called God, arrogating to himself and his creatures all the blessings, powers and privileges which Christ had given to his Church, and making salvation, which is a free gift of God, a reward to be won by faithful service to his commands. "Sitting in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God," he virtually applied the words of our blessed Lord and Master, "All power is given unto me in heaven and on earth," to his own sinful person.

Christian men believed him. With what result? Peter said to all believers: "Ye are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood." Peter's so-called successor said: "Believe it not. Ye are humble laymen; the priesthood is mine." And they believed him. Paul said to his fellow-believers: "Ye which are spiritual." Paul's successor in the Church of Rome said: "Believe it not. Ye are secular, worldly, unclean. I with my priests and spiritual orders am spiritual, holy, clean." And they believed him. Paul invited all Christians: "Judge ye what I say." This man says: "Accept my judgment or die. Ye have neither right nor power of judgment." And they believed him. Christ commands his Christians: "Search the Scriptures." The vicegerent of Christ says: "It is a dark book. Put it away. Read it not." And they obeyed him. Paul said: "Let every man be subject unto the higher powers." This man said: "I will be subject to no power. Let all men be subject to me." And again they obeyed him. Christ said of his holy Supper: "Drink ye all of it." This man said: "Do not dare. That word 'all' means my priests." And again they obeyed him, receiving a mutilated sacrament from his hands instead of the sacrament which Christ had instituted for all his people. Christ said: "There is one God and one Mediator between God and man, the Man Christ Jesus." This man said: "If you would be saved, trust to the mediation of my sacrificing priesthood." And they believed him. The great author of the Epistle to the Hebrews, speaking of the one sacrifice of Christ, our great High Priest, says: "There is no more offering for sin." This man says: "My priests daily make offering for sin. Away from mass at your peril." And they obeyed him. Christ says: "When ye pray, ye shall say, Our Father." This man said: "When ye pray, ye shall say: Hail Mary!" And they believed him. Christ says: "One is your Master, one is your Father." This man said: "I am your master. I am your Father. Refuse to call me father at your peril." And they again believed him, obeyed him and bowed down themselves before him.

There is no doctrine, no precious promise, no blessed privilege given by Christ to his Church which this "man of sin," this "child of perdition," has not taken and wrested and interpreted for the establishment of his own selfish power over the hearts and minds of men, until it seemed that all Christendom walked in chains behind the triumphal chariot of a triple-crowned monarch, who, to gratify his lust of conquest, was leading the world to certain ruin, and the plaudits of his creatures, who goaded on the unfortunate victims, crying: "We are the Church. All things are ours. Hear us or die. Obey or perish."

THERE never was a time when Christian men did not struggle against the fatal spiritual power which, with invisible chains, thus bound them to the chariot wheels of papal Rome. Emperors, kings and princes, faithful prophets of God, a very clot of witnesses, great general councils of the Church, made effort after effort to break the ever-increasing power of the supreme pontiff and the Roman hierarchy. The names of some of them have come down to us: Boniface VIII, John Wycliffe, Huss, the Albigenses, the Lollards, the Hussites, and the Brethren of the Common Life. But all their efforts came to naught. Despite these attacks, the Papacy stood in the unshaken strength of a thousand years' growth, like the fabled upas tree, to diffuse its poisonous corruption into every relationship of life, in every nook and corner of the known world.

Then, on October 31, 1517, came Martin Luther, an unknown Saxon monk. In the mysterious way of God's providence, he had found for himself in the word of truth that most precious of all precious things, the liberty wherewith the Eternal Son of God hath made us free. His soul, once sick unto death from fruitless efforts to fulfil the demands of the law as taught by an apostate church, had tasted the delight of that spiritual freedom won for us by Christ in his great work of deliverance and redemption. He had passed from bondage to freedom, from Sinai to Jerusalem, from despair unto peace, from death to life. The thirty-seventh of the ninety-five sentences nailed up by him on the university bulletin board, the door of the old Wittenberg Castle church, says this: "Every true Christian, whether he be living or dead, is partaker of all the blessings of Christ and the Church by free gift of God, without letters or indulgence."

Do you grasp the full import of those words? He is saying: "All things are yours. . . . Whether Judah, or Apollos, or Cephas, or the world, or life, or death, or things present, or things to come, all are yours; and ye are Christ's; and Christ is God's." He is calling the world to liberty, the glorious liberty of the sons of God!

IT HAS been said that the sound of the blows struck by the hammer in the hand of that humble monk reverberated around the world. It struck off the shackles which held millions enthralled, freeing them from spiritual bondage and calling them into the possession and exercise of their God-given rights and privileges; into possession and use of their Christian liberty—of that glorious freedom which is ours by the knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus Christ of the glorious gospel of free salvation through the merits of our Lord and Saviour—God's own emancipation proclamation to a sin-enslaved world.

I have stood beside the glass case of the bell which once rang out political liberty to this our beloved country. Preserved with jealous care in Independence Hall, Philadelphia, it is an object of veneration to thousands—a symbol of our civic privileges. I have stood at the mausoleum where now rest the mortal remains of him whose hand signed the proclamation which freed the thousands once held in bondage by their fellow men of this country. It symbolized the liberation of the freedman. These things meant much to me, as they mean much to you. But as a Christian I do not hesitate to say that the doors of that church, upon which Luther's sentences are cast

(Continued on page 1073)

Pastor Martini Evangelical Lutheran Church, Baltimore.

Daily Meditation

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR, LED BY

J. H. JOWETT, D.D., F. B. MEYER, D.D., REV. E. WHITTIER CASWELL AND CLAYTON SEDGWICK COOPER

The Inner Door

SUNDAY, October 31. John 12: 21. "Sir, we would see Jesus." In his book entitled "Fragments of Prose and Poetry," Mr. F. W. H. Myers has the following vital passage: "I have never as yet realized faith in its emotional fulness; I have been converted by the Phædo, and not by the Goel. Christian conversion now came to me in a poet form, through the agency of Josephine Butler, whose name will not be forgotten in the annals of English philanthropy. She introduced me to Christianity, so to say, by an inner door."

There were more urgent need of ministers of the inner door, men and women of spiritual directness who lead the soul immediately to Christ. Henry Drummond was a great apostle of the inner door. The Edinburgh students were not conducted to some outer vestibule and made to believe they were now in the palace of the king. They were taken straight to the inner door by an intimate friend of the King, and we brought into the immediate presence of the Lord. They were not left in the anteroom of any other; they were introduced to a Friend, the great Saviour and Companion of the soul. Drummond knew the way home!

There was not an official minister who found the inner door for Myers. It was a saintly woman who knew the way of the Lord, and who especially knew the way of his salvation. And this is the sacred priesthood to which every believer is called, and which every believer exercises. That man is a priest unto the Lord who finds the inner door for other men. All who know the Lord may be priests of this order. The only ordination needed is to have found him ourselves. We need no experts in the theological map to be apostles of the inner door. "Sir, we would see Jesus!" To be able to introduce them is to be a minister of the life-deed.

J. H. J.

God's Peace in Our Lives

MONDAY, November 1. Isa. 48: 12-22. "Peace as a river and righteousness as the waves of the sea." Not as a brook, as it rushes forth from the mountainside; not as a streamlet, hardly filling its bed; but like a river, deep and placid, able to bear navies and to carry seaward the refuse of the towns upon its banks. Such was the ideal that God gave his people of the peace that flowed from the eternal sources of his nature, that they might have enjoyed. But notice the other symbol. The divine life of the inner life is mid-ocean, where there is no ebbs muddy ooze, no black unsightly rocks; but the majestic roll of the breakers. What a contrast to the troubled sea, chafing along the shore, and casting up mire and dirt!

These ideals are within the reach of us all, if we will harken to God's commandments. There is a short and easy method by which that peace may begin to flow through our lives and waves of righteousness sweep in their mighty joy over our unsightliness and sinfulness. Hearken and do. Hear his commandments and do them. Level your life to your light. Whosoever he saith unto you, do it. "Behold, I send an angel before thee," said the Most High, "to keep thee in the way and to bring thee into the place where I have prepared. Take ye heed of him, and hearken to his voice; provoke him not, but if thou shalt indeed hearken unto his voice, and do all that I speak, then . . ."

F. B. M.

The Courage of Faith

TUESDAY, November 2. Eccles. 11: 6. "In the morning sow thy seed, and in the evening withhold not thy hand." The figure is that of the farmer, who sows his grain regardless of weather conditions, trusting the results to nature. In a verse shortly before this one we read, "He that observeth the wind shall not sow; and he that regardeth the clouds shall not reap." It is the lesson of sowing beside all waters with a courageous hand, trusting God to do his part.

This is a text for timid, hesitating souls. The man who is always seeing lions in the path, and can find a hundred reasons for not going ahead in a worth-while task, should repeat this word each day as he rises to go to his work. It is for the soul who always is seeing clouds in the sky and difficulties in his way, who is long on objections and short on deeds. It is for the person who is ruled by his feelings and by the criticisms of others, and who is always going to do something and never daring to start.

Some of us are like certain farmers who are eternally grumbling about imperfect skies and the wind being in the wrong quarter for seed-sowing. We do not succeed because of failure to attempt. I remember years ago a writer of books told me that the secret of writing was sitting down and beginning to write. The key to success in almost any kind of activity, being a good farmer or being a good Christian, is courage of action and courage of faith. The Christian likewise does not stop working because some one criticizes him or circumstances may not seem altogether propitious; it is his business to sow, to act in line with a steady, good conviction, and sail out of the rain.

C. S. C.

The Last Fruits of Life

WEDNESDAY, November 3. John 14: 25-31. "My peace I give unto you." A believer, whose feet were dipping in the chill waters of the river, said to me, when speaking of her enjoyment of some of the deeper aspects of Christian experience, "I am afraid I have been building from the top. I see now, as I come near eternity, that one's foundations must be strong and sure before one can build on them. I need now more than ever the blood of Christ." This perhaps is one of the special perils of the present day. Treatises and tractlets endeavor to show the short cuts into the blessed life, and there is a danger of young converts and others occupying themselves with such themes and neglecting the divine order. We must be justified before we can be sanctified; we must have peace with God through the blood of Christ, before knowing the peace that "passeth understanding."

But there is a deeper experience of peace, when the Holy Spirit—the Heavenly Dove—comes in fulness to the obedient and receptive soul. Men are disposed to think that peace is one of the last fruits of life to drop into the hand of the aged. A snug home, the culture of flowers, tender home-love—these are the conditions of peace! "Not so," says Christ. "Arise, let us go hence." We must leave this quiet harbor and launch out into the stormy deep. We must leave this still chamber, around the windows of which the vines cling, for the garden where the cedars fight the storm. "In the world ye shall have tribulation, but in me, peace."

F. B. M.

The Brave Heart Goes Forward

THURSDAY, November 4. Ex. 13: 21. "A pillar of cloud by day and by night a pillar of fire." The people of Israel went forward. At almost the first step in obedience to the command of Jehovah, the way began to be cleared for their feet; the sea swept back for them; the heaven was opened and manna fell for them; the water burst out of the rock in the wilderness. The Lord went before them by day and by night.

At a quiet lake where I spend my summers, a soft mist rises at times over the waters and almost obscures the farther shore. I sometimes go out in my canoe, and as I approach, the fog seems to recede. When I reach the place where it looked thickest, lo, the air is clear and the bank of mist hangs far ahead on the distant hills.

So with the fears and ills which seem to be waiting to envelop us; advance and they scatter and often disappear entirely. Go forward! That is the great and saving summons. We get self-conscious and think the world is waiting to criticize us and find us in mistake. But the world is there to help us on as long as we go forward. It is the man who halts who gets into trouble. "Man was made to grow, not stop," says Browning.

In "Sartor Resartus," that wonderful book of Carlyle, we find this expression: "The everlasting Yea," the sign of the gospel of never-ceasing productive and constructive action. In a letter to his friend Henry Inglis, Carlyle summarizes this gospel of the forward man: "Diligence, unwearied, steadfast Endeavor: like the stars unshining, unceasing! This is the scepter with which man rules his destiny; and though fragile as a reed removes mountains, spiritual as well as physical."

C. S. C.

Christ, a Message to Men and Angels

FRIDAY, November 5. I Tim. 3: 1-16. "Great is the mystery of godliness." Paul had been giving directions to Timothy as to his service in the Church of God, and now he proceeds to unfold some of those sacred mysteries or secrets which are summed up in the Christian revelation. But those secrets are only unveiled to godliness. The six particulars mentioned here were probably embodied in one of the ancient hymns of the Church. Pliny wrote of the Christians of Asia Minor, "They are wont, on a fixed day, before dawn, to meet and sing a hymn in alternate verses to Christ as God." Perhaps these six sentences may be the very hymn to which he refers. The clauses are parallel, each two form a pair. Flesh and spirit; angels and Gentiles; world and glory.

Our Lord was the manifestation of God in the terms of human life. Angels came to know the Son of God as even they could never have known him in the dazzling splendor of heavenly glory, and the Gentile nations have come to know him also. He is a new message to both orders of beings, to the one by seeing, to the other by preaching. The success of our Saviour's mission had a double attestation. On the one hand he was believed on in the world, and on the other was received up into glory. His reception in heaven answered to his reception on earth. Here are secrets into which those who love God may find unending themes for contemplation and ministry.

F. B. M.

Reproof in a Look

SATURDAY, November 6. Luke 22: 61. "And the Lord turned, and looked upon Peter." The most noted artists have failed to reproduce that wonderful facial expression of Christ upon canvas, and the writers of the Gospel did not attempt a pen portrait, but divine light etched the Saviour's look upon the walls of Peter's memory, never to be effaced. Our Lord could not make a gesture, for his hands were tied; he could not speak his reproof, for he was being hurried by soldiers. It was just a look. It was oceans of love, pity and compassion, looking out through eyes of God-like longing for Peter's soul. It was a gaze so full of forgiveness, loving-kindness and gentleness, that the truant apostle, who was only a few hours from the communion table, was overwhelmed with the magnitude of his betrayal.

In the agony of his pain, he hid himself away, where he could weep and pray. He saw that he had pierced the side of Jesus deeper than the spear could go; he had driven the nails of denial into the very heart of his Lord and put him to an open shame, at a time when Jesus was on trial for his life! Peter knew that Christ had been praying for him on Calvary, when he heard the precious message of love on the morning of the resurrection, "Go tell the disciples and Peter that I have risen from the dead."

E. W. C.

Reformation Day

(Continued from page 1072)

imperishable bronze, mean more. It is not merely that our declaration of independence and abolition of slavery are a direct result of the work of Martin Luther. It is because the liberty to which Luther called us and which God through him restored to his Church infinitely transcends in the priceless fulness of its privileges and blessings all earthly things. They shall pass away. This endures forever. They may be lost to us through no fault of our own. This no man can take from us, save by our own act and deed. They are, and ever will be, partial and imperfect. This is as full and perfect as the everlasting love of God. Even as it is written: All things are yours . . . and ye are Christ's.

O children of the Reformation Church, "stand fast therefore in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made you free." And since "with might of ours can naught be done," let us ever pray: "O Lord, save thy people and bless thine heritage. Govern them and lift them up forever. . . . O Lord, let thy mercy be upon us, as our trust is in thee. O Lord, in thee have I trusted; let me never be confounded. Amen."

A Week in the World's News

READY TO FEED THE WORLD. The government October crop report, issued October 7, gave the condition of the crops as follows: The corn crop will probably be in excess of 3,000,000,000 bushels, which at prices now prevailing will make it worth more than $2,000,000,000. Wheat exceeds 1,000,000,000 bushels, worth over $900,000,000, considerably more than was ever paid for a wheat crop before. Potatoes will exceed 350,000,000 bushels; oats will exceed the record crop of 1912 by nearly 100,000,000 bushels, making a total of a billion and a half bushels. Barley has made a new record by 13,000,000 bushels and sweet potatoes by 5,000,000. The rice production exceeds any previous record by 500,000 bushels and hay by 8,000,000 tons. The apple forecast is 71,600,000 barrels of three bushels each, slightly less than last year's production.

PROHIBITION MOVES ONWARD. In a recent address at Seattle, Anna A. Gordon, President of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union, addressed the first session of the 1915 convention and cited the victories of the last twenty months. In that time Russia has become prohibition territory, Germany, France and England have greatly restricted the use of liquors, the United States navy has banished alcohol, and it has been outlawed in the Panama Canal Zone and in the states of Virginia, Colorado, Oregon, Washington, Arizona, Arkansas, Idaho, Iowa, Alabama and South Carolina. The national internal revenue collections on distilled spirits have decreased at the rate of $1,250,000 a month in spite of new high taxes on wines and the emergency war tax.

THE DOLLAR THE WORLD'S STANDARD. Despite the great loan which was recently placed in the United States by France and Great Britain, sterling exchange is still weak in the New York market and exporters put their drafts into sterling exchange with a risk of serious loss before the drafts are handled. The balance of trade is now running heavily against Europe and in favor of the United States. American bankers are seriously considering the substituting of dollar exchange for sterling exchange in the export business of the country. On October 11, a number of influential American bankers and Sir Edward Hopkinson Holden, chairman of the London City and Midland Bank and senior member of the Joint Financial Mission from London and Paris, met at the National City Bank, New York. The exchange situation was gone into thoroughly. It was shown that the recent $480,000,000 credit created here by the sale of the half billion dollars' worth of bonds will take care of about one quarter of the trade balance. It was suggested that another $150,000,000 might be shipped in gold and that American securities might provide another $300,000,000, which would leave about $300,000,000 more to be arranged through additional credits. To supply these it was suggested to Sir Edward that New York banks cooperate with the London banks for the substitution of dollar exchange for sterling exchange, dollar exchange being the only exchange that is not now fluctuating in value. For many years the "demand sterling" has been the foundation of business throughout the world. It may not be entirely impossible that the world's business may yet be based upon the American dollar, provided American banks establish branches throughout the world; they have already begun with South America.

FOR EFFICIENCY IN CHURCH WORK. What is described as the first Church Efficiency Convention of the New York Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church—and we know of no other having been held for other denominations—was held in the Grace Methodist Church, New York City, on October 12, the program beginning with an automobile tour of institutional churches and playgrounds at 9 A. M., and closing in the evening with a moving picture show, "The Birth of a Nation." Practically the entire field of church life was covered by a large number of speakers, including John Mitchell, who spoke on the Church and the Laboring Man, Prof. William Wirt, who discussed religious education as something the church should provide for all school children during school days instead of for a limited number of children on Sundays, and Rev. C. C. Marshall of the Metropolitan Temple, who advocated the use of moving pictures as a feature of church work. The approval of the assembly of ministers was given to the idea of holding moving picture performances in church buildings; to utilizing brass aeroplanes for the multitudes. After that all that will be necessary will be to know how to fly them.

REFRESHING THIRSTY ACRES. The United States Reclamation Service has completed another of the large irrigation projects which it has been prosecuting for the last ten or twelve years. On October 4, the Arrow-rock dam, the highest in the world, was dedicated at Boise, Idaho. The dam crosses the Boise River near Idaho's capital and will provide irrigation for 243,000 acres. The dam is 1100 feet long, 240 feet thick at the hands to attract the public; and to conducting gymnasiums in connection with churches. The pastor of Grace Church, Rev. Dr. Christian F. Reinsner, is already recognized as a leader in departmental work in churches.

The President Cements the North and South in Memory of Our Dead

FLYING AGE NOW IN SIGHT. A syndicate of New York capitalists have bought the aeroplane rights of the Wright Company of Dayton, Ohio, manufacturers of the airships designed after the model by the Wright brothers, and by this transfer the aeroplane business for the first time will be brought into the field of ordinary industries. Orville Wright, who is said to have received a million and a half as president of the company, will continue to be consulting engineer to the new concern. It is now predicted that the new company with large capitalization will soon be turning out bottom and 16 feet wide at the top. The top of the dam is 351 feet above the base and the dam is set in a gorge between mountains a mile high. The dam was completed after four years of work and was finished two years ahead of time at the cost of that of a modern battleship.

NEW CIVIL WAR MEMORIAL BEGUN. The cornerstone of the great and beautiful amphitheater which is to be erected in the Arlington National Cemetery in honor of the nation's soldier and sailor dead was laid on October 13 with simple ceremonies. President Wilson, who spread the mortar which is to cement the stone in place, made no address. Secretary of the Navy Daniels, who presided, declared the memorial to be "a substantial symbol, expressive of the national appreciation of valor," and he called it "a recognition of the grand democracy of the dead," he said, "an eternal cementing of the republic, with the home of Lee as the place of the glorious company of Grants, the invincible army, and the equally brave officers who fought with Lee." Two trees, in honor of General George H. Thomas and General William T. Sherman, were planted in front of the memorial. Congress appropriated three quarters of a million dollars for this structure which is expected to be dedicated on Memorial Day, 1917. It will be a classical colonnade, and will include a chapel and catacomb.

AMERICAN LOAN SANCTIONED BY PARLIAMENT. At 4:40 P. M. on October 13 the American Loan Bill passed the British House of Lords and received the royal assent, this being the last move in the negotiations for a half billion dollar credit just concluded in New York. In addition to the half billion loan, British bankers are cooperating to establish a supplemental credit in America of 250,000,000 more to be obtained privately from American financial houses.

WE BEGIN TO PREPARE. On October 14 the keel of our forthcoming greatest battleship, the superdreadnought California, was laid in the Brooklyn Navy Yard in the presence of the Secretary of the Navy and a large company of naval officers and others. The California, which will be of great size and power, will be the first battleship to be propelled by electricity. Secretary Daniels stated that even mightier battleships will follow. He made himself the spokesman of the nation and declared that the whole people realize that preparedness is essential and that the government is moving toward big developments in obedience to the will of the people. We must, at the moment, recall just when this demand by the people was made in an unmistakable manner, but so inconsequential a thing as transforming the United States into a militarist nation can easily be overlooked in the general news. It is probably true that the great majority believe in adequate preparedness against war; we believe it also true that an equilibrium is opposed to the extremist policy which, until Congress assembles, seems to have the right of way. A picture has recently appeared showing an Italian priest blessing a huge cannon; this scene was matched at the Brooklyn Navy Yard when Admiral Fisher called upon Chaplain Isaacs to invoke the blessing of God on the national enterprise just then being inaugurated.

"STEEL" AND "OIL" TO COME WITH "MUNITIONS"? The munition concerns of the country and the builders of submarines and battleships will find themselves in bitter competition with the steel and oil industries if the project for harbor defense recently made known by an inventor named James H. Reinhardt is taken up by the government. By this plan great pipes will be laid on the bottom of the sea extending twenty-five to thirty miles in front of all vulnerable harbors, through which enormous quantities of oil will be set free in case of the approach of a hostile fleet, the oil gushing to the surface and there ignited by a chemical process which will be set off by an electric button on shore. Great walls of fire leaping high in the air to stop the escape of the battleships in any direction save to shore which, of course, would be out of the fire into the frying pan. We hotly hope that this plan will be adopted, because warfare needs some new spectacle to give interest in it.

TWO MARTYRS. The insistence of Mr. Henry Ford, automobile manufacturer, to devote all his energies and wealth to advancing world peace and destroying militarism, lost him the vice-president and general manager of his company, Mr. James Couzens, who has resigned his interests in the Ford concern because he takes a directly opposite view on this general subject.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is published weekly by The Christian Herald, at the Bible House, Fourth Avenue, 8th and 9th Sts., New York City. The Officers are: Otto Koenig, President and Treasurer, Bible House, N. Y. City; Geo. H. Sandison, Vice President, Bible House, N. Y. City; Theodore Waters, Secretary, Bible House, N. Y. City.

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE $1.50 a year in advance. Remittances should be made in the safest manner available. Make checks and money orders payable to the Christian Herald.

FOREIGN POSTAGE.—For copies mailed outside

Entered at Post Office, New York, as Second-class Matter

Entered as Second-class Matter at the Post Office Department, Ottawa

the United States, Canada and Mexico, add one dollar a year to subscription price.

CHANGE OF DATE.—It takes at least two weeks to change the date, after your subscription is renewed.

EXPIRATION OF SUBSCRIPTION.—The date on the wrapper indicates when your subscription ends.

CHANGE OF ADDRESS.—It requires three weeks' time to make the change. Give both old and new address.

LETTERS should be addressed, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

The Reclamation Service Has Harnessed the Boise River to be a Servant to 243,000 Acres

Your True Moor

Christian "Trenches" in Morocco

By GEORGE E. HOLT

Former United States Consul at Tangier, Author of "Morocco, the Bizarre"

TRENCH fighting—the foot-by-foot gain, or loss, has even characterized the battles of Christianity. Nowhere, perhaps, has this form of warfare been so necessary as in Morocco, where the trenches of Islam have been strongly built, cleverly protected, and defended with all the terrific fanaticism of the most orthodox survivors of Moorish Mohammedanism.

Five centuries ago the Most Catholic sovereigns, Ferdinand and Isabella, drove the Moor from Spain. In Morocco he sought new empire. The gradual conquest of North Africa by European powers has driven the true Mohammedan—the religious fanatic—southward or westward to the practically unknown interior, or to Morocco. Egypt, Tripoli, Tunisia and Algeria have all contributed from their populations to the peopling of Morocco. English, French or Italian conquest has driven neither the Moors who would rather work for the Christian nor obey his laws nor accept his faith. And the Atlas Mountains have become the strongest fortress held by Islam, sheltering a most purely Mohammedan and the most fanatical. Christians have been in sacred Mekka, have even seen the Kaabah, and have returned to their own countries; but no foreigner, Christian or otherwise, has yet been within rifle shot of the sacred city of Zarahon, near Fez, the Moorish capital.

Throughout North Africa the army of Islam is organized. It is, in fact, an allied army, for it is made up of many Mohammedan orders. There is the Qadiriyya, founded in the year 1165, of which the noted es-Sanussi was a member; there is the Shadhiliyya, begun in 1258, which has three great branches: the Bakariyya, the Shaikhiiyya and the Hansariyya; there is the Tijaniyya; and the Idrisiyya, with nearly a hundred monasteries in Algeria alone; and the Darkaniyya and the Madaniyyah.

Most of these orders make themselves felt in Morocco as well as throughout North Africa. The Sanussiyyah (followers of the Sheikh es-Sanussi) is a most powerful order, with two millions of names on its official rolls, and military headquarters in the oasis of Kufra, while the Aisawa and Hamadsha orders are particularly strong in Morocco. Each year the two orders make pilgrimage to the graves of their patron saints, near Fez, and on their way through the many Moroccan towns and villages they awaken great fanaticism and religious fervor. Even in "infidel" Tangier, when their pilgrimage turns into an endurance dance, the foreigner must watch from afar off, as his life would not be safe for a moment among the dancers. It is in these dances that the fanatics eat living creatures of all sorts, poisonous reptiles, filth from the streets, or cut their heads with small axes until covered with blood. Practically every man, woman and child in Morocco belongs to one or the other of these two sects, and in the brutal dances women dance and whirl to exhaustion, while boys of a tender age cut themselves until they faint beneath the shock.

These orders are defending the trenches of Islam against the Christian forces; holding them tenaciously, yet little by little being forced backward, foot by foot, toward a bigger conception of life, a more enlightened attitude toward civilization.

IN thinking of the Moors one should remember that they are not a black race: that mistake is often made. In cases there is an admixture of negro blood from the Sudan—what else could be expected where slavery still exists, and always has existed? But the true Moor has none of the black in him; he is the white Arab or the brown Berber, or a union of these two races. And the true Moor's pride of race and history and religion has never been surpassed; what he has, and that alone, is right.

Therefore it is "trench warfare" of the hardest sort which has pushed, and will continue to push, the banners of Christendom a little farther on the Moroccan battleground. Much noble work is being done among the hills of Al Moghreb, among the foothills of the Mountains of the Moon, not only by our own American missionaries, but by English and Spanish and other Europeans as well. Certain of the English medical missionaries have gained that rarest of all things, the affection of Mohammedans; not alone because they preached, but because they brought with their Bible a real friendship, a real sympathy and understanding, expressed in an effort to relieve from pain, to cure illness and disease, and to improve living conditions and morality. This is the one thing that wins the Moor. "He who loves my child places for me a crown upon his head." That is a Moorish proverb, and he who is kind to a child, or who cures a child's illness, will find that it is no empty saying.

Upon an occasion my little horse-boy, Mohammed, age 12, failed to appear for duty, and upon investigation I found him lying upon the earthen floor of his father's straw-roofed cottage, delirious from fever. On my way back to town for a doctor I encountered one of the English medical missionaries, and told him about Mohammed. Promptly he turned his horse and rode back with me, although he had an appointment with the British consul general. In half an hour Mohammed was in bed in the missionary's house and his delirium had been quieted.

"Double pneumonia," said the missionary.

But under his care Mohammed, in a fortnight—such is the ability of these native children to recover from illness which would kill an Occidental—was back at my horse's bridle.

"Do you still hate the Christian missionary?" I asked him.

He shook his head slowly.

"Him good man," he answered. "Him my father now."

Thus kindness had won a convert—not to a cause, but to one of its representatives.

In Tangier is a Protestant church, standing guard over the great market place, and a Spanish cathedral where the Bishop of Fes presides. Spanish priests have pushed their way to all parts of the country. But the mosque-towers of Islam, watch-towers they are in reality, still stand sentinel-like, overlooking every village and town. Many a path ends at a little dazzlingly white shrine of some saint where the passer-by pauses a moment to do reverence; and every town of any size holds scores of these shrines.

All Morocco still repeats its salat five times a day, facing the east and the sacred city. Most of its people still pause now and then in the day's work to say du'a or voluntary prayer. Mosques are still being reared, and saints' shrines multiply—but the trenches of Christianity are there, valiantly held by a handful of volunteers.

Trench warfare is slow, but the Cross is moving forward.

A Dazzling Shrine

The Fanatical Dance of the Aisawa

The Knock-Box

Be polite. Perhaps your family won't mind if you practice it on them

WHERE was more than average contentment and general "get-along-ness" in a Connecticut family when I visited one summer. Back of the politeness and pleasant attitude of each to the other lay a secret of some sort which was joked about and laughed over but never divulged to the general public. The mystery hovered about a small box which stood on the parlor mantel. It resembled a mail box, and when it was emptied each evening, notes were handed around to mother, father, brothers and sisters. Sometimes they were read with quiet gravity, sometimes with a smile. One morning a missive fell on my plate. Here is the message it held:

If our company would be good enough to phone when she decides not to return for luncheon, the cook would be exceedingly grateful."

I re-read it, mystified a trifle, also a bit ruffled, I confess, and a laugh went round the table.

"Mother," cried one of the girls, "plain to the company about our knock-box. It was not exactly fair to discipline her without a warning."

That forenoon while I helped to empty a darning basket I suggested, "Now tell me about the knock-box."

"The knock-box," explained my hostess, "is an ancient and honorable institution of this family, but it was not fair to initiate you as we did."

"It was perfectly fair. I felt guilty enough yesterday when I found you had waited luncheon for me. Now for the story."

"When we were married," she began, "I was a fault-finder, a petty, fussy housewife, picking on somebody about something all the time. One evening my husband took me to task and I suddenly realized that if I did not take heed I might develop into a genuine nagger like a woman next door, who is the terror of our neighborhood. He suggested as a cure that instead of blurting out every little fault I found in him I should write it down each day and drop my criticism in a box. He said he would do the same thing with me. We christened it the knock-box. Two rules were made: that complaints should be politely worded and read over several times before being mailed. If they seemed too trivial for utterance they were to be destroyed. I remember the first time we emptied the knock-box. I found a suggestion that coffee ought to be served steaming hot and that when a man loaned his knife to a lady he expected it to be returned.

"My husband had one solitary knock to read. I had destroyed ten or twelve during the day; on a second reading they had sounded petty. This one was about a man who left his belongings scattered all over a house when he dashed out to catch a car. It was seed sown in good ground. The work grew lighter each day after that, because my husband became tidier. It is years since he found a complaint in the knock-box about careless habits. When the children were old enough to read and write they found little reminders in the box. They were also allowed to send knocks to us, and some of them were very funny. I remember one from Bob about hanging the key of the preserve closet where he could not reach it. At the age of eight Margaret objected strenuously to wearing pinafores. Each one agreed that eight o'clock was much too early to go to bed. You have not an idea of how the knock-box saves a family from snarls. One little bit of fault-finding is capable of stirring up a storm of reprimand. Besides, a written hint sinks in as no amount of nagging can."

Can you imagine what my first task was on reaching home? I instituted a family knock-box. It works; oh, it has worked like a charm.

ISABEL GORDON CURTIS.

A Cry from China

LITTLE HAI IER TSI (the "Abused Leaf"): a Story of Childhood and its Perils in Heathen China. All who are interested in sweet and innocent childhood will find this a fascinating story. A postal card addressed to "China Orphans, Christian Herald, Bible House, New York," will bring you free copies of this illustrated booklet.

Our Editorial Forum

PRESIDENT
OTTO KOENIG

MANAGING EDITOR
GEO. H. SANDISON

SECRETARY
THEODORE WATERS

A Disgraceful Traffic

IN his admirable address before the Daughters of the American Revolution in Washington, on the recent occasion of their silver jubilee celebration, President Wilson gave an eloquent description of the "American spirit." He pictured this nation as a model for the whole world in its love of peace, its recognition of the rights of humanity, and the high ideals which it sought to attain in its relations with other nations.

There are many things in which we, as a nation, may take a good deal of satisfaction. We have kept out of the war, but we have not escaped the ineradicable stain of the munitions traffic, which is adding daily to the slaughter. We have maintained our reputation for international friendship and good-will with all the great powers, but we have not been quite as scrupulous in our dealings with the smaller and unprotected peoples.

In the Missionary Herald of Boston, for September, the following appears:

In the hold of the four-masted schooner Estelle Krieger, of Boston, are 210,000 gallons of New England rum, bound for the West Coast of Africa. Boston's contribution toward the redemption of the Dark Continent . . . It will work incalculable harm, as it is sure to be "doctored" and made yet more deadly in its effects. At every port where it is distributed, it will be like the letting loose of hell upon the susceptible and unprotected natives.

In Collier's of June 26 it is announced that the Orleans had sailed from Boston for the West Coast of Africa with 200,000 gallons of rum. Two well-known missionaries write to us: "We are told that the entire West Coast of Africa has been turned into one long barroom, from which no less than two million natives go forth to die every year as a result of a traffic forced on these people by Christian nations. Do not national sins bring national judgments? 'Is not that idea proclaimed in the Bible?'"

This sin lies at our door. We are in the midst of a great national temperance movement; yet we cannot be oblivious of the fact that we are guilty of degrading these unprotected peoples by permitting a traffic among them which we would stamp as intolerable if it were attempted here.

That great and good missionary, Hudson Taylor, in 1897 warned British Christians that God would surely punish their land for forcing the opium traffic upon helpless China. Russia cannot escape atonement for its age-long persecution of the Jews, nor Turkey for its repeated attempts to exterminate the helpless Armenians. These are all in line for retributive justice. If we not only permit the degradation of the uncivilized millions of West Africa, but profit by it, and are directly responsible before God for it, how can we hope to escape similar consequences?

How are we to purge ourselves? Let the churches of all denominations, their young people's societies, and good people of every class, use their influence in spreading the great truth that if we ever mean to become a sober nation, and to deserve divine favor and blessing, we must stop degrading the defenseless peoples with that which is wrecking them, body and soul. It can be stopped and will be, if the nation's forces of truth and righteousness unite to do it.

Is It a New World?

SCIENCE does not stop for wars. Europe had been in convulsion for nearly a year while Stefansson, oblivious of disturbance, was searching the icy seas for a new Arctic continent. While the turmoil went on increasingly, Professor Sola of the Barcelona Observatory, with gaze directed skyward, was focusing the lenses upon the new planet in the Pisces group, which the astronomers are now hailing as a new-found world. Interest centers on the suggestion based on Sola's theory that the new-found planet is composed of the same material as our own earth, and that while its chemical elements may be in a different condition, science assumes that the basic fabrics, being kindred to those with which we are familiar, may be capable of producing and sustaining certain forms of animal and even of human life. Although in astronomy science and imagination may hardly be said to go hand in hand, it is alluring to think of another world inhabited possibly by sentient beings. But we are warned by the astronomers not to indulge such fancies, as the probabilities are that the new discovery is merely one of a vast number of asteroids such as are known to exist by the hundred in the immense spaces of the sky, and so immeasurably remote that the distance from us would probably be computed in nine figures. An American scientist, Professor Jacobs of Columbia, estimates that the new planetoid is probably three times farther removed from the sun than our own globe, that the wanderer would require from two to five years for its journey around that luminary, and that it is concealed part of the time by the great planet Neptune.

We shall probably hear further of this wanderer. Meanwhile, the discovery will furnish a theme for imaginative writers, who love to speculate on the possibilities of the astronomical revelations that may yet await the industrious searchers of the heavens.

The Burden-Bearers

ROBERT HICHENS, the famous author, in a recent article tells how half the civilized world is today helping uncounted multitudes of sufferers to bear the heavy burdens which the great war has laid upon them. They are sharing with the afflicted ones their bread and meat; they are clothing the naked, ministering to the sick, sheltering the homeless, feeding the famished. They are literally fulfilling the divine injunction: "Bear ye one another's burdens."

It is a trying time for the burden-bearers. Yet they are not weary of their long task; for the love and sympathy in their hearts urges them to go on. It is all dark ahead. They have carried their burdens vicariously these many months, and may have to carry them much longer. But they know that it is a duty they owe to humanity, and so they bravely go on, believing that sometime the light will shine through the darkness, and the burden will lighten.

It is a fine thing to put love into your work and to know that you have brightened and revived those who were sick unto death—not of wounds received in battle, but the sorer thrusts of sorrow and bereavement. The spirit of Christ is in the hearts of the burden-bearers. Patiently, unweariedly, they plod on, meeting every fresh need with a new effort.

Jesus bore the burdens of the sins and sorrows of a world. His whole earthly life was one of ministry to the suffering. He "fed the multitudes," just as his people are now feeding Europe's afflicted millions. There is a share for each of us in this great work of humanity. Let us gird ourselves to do our duty loyally, gladly, unflinchingly, as he would have us do it, and not diminish our labors until the end is reached.

Dr. Nearing and Freedom of Speech

THE case of Dr. Scott Nearing and the University of Pennsylvania has raised an uproar in educational and sociological circles. Dr. Nearing was not reappointed to the university faculty this year and the accusation was freely made that he had been dropped because of radical utterances on economic questions. Students, alumni, fellow instructors, economists, protested violently against what they felt to be tampering with the rights of free speech. Dr. Nearing stated that he was told that his utterances might alienate those whose support the university needed, and instanced a direct warning he received from the university provost "not to talk against child labor or poverty, as such agitation hurts the university."

A touch of comedy was added to the whole situation when a boy, characterized later by his instructor as a "nineteen-year-old child," withdrew from a class taught by Dr. Nearing's successor because the instructor had said stern things about the corporation of which the boy's father was an official. The teacher had declared: "The Philadelphia Rapid Transit Company has Philadelphia by the throat and is strangling it." The young man explained his withdrawal from the class by saying: "When a fellow's father is chairman of the Board of Managers of that company it is mighty unpleasant to listen to such statements. Professor B— said he was going to follow in Nearing's footsteps and was prepared for whatever might happen. I wanted economics, but I don't think young men should listen to such stuff as he delivered in the quiz."

The Christian Herald is not posted upon traction conditions in Philadelphia, but the Christian Herald must take its place with those contenders for the truth who insist that education and educational institutions be kept free from the contaminating and oppressive touch of Mammon. The trustees of the university have at length issued a statement asserting that it was the manner more than the matter of Dr. Nearing's utterances that made his retention and advancement impracticable, and adopted a resolution declaring the university's fidelity to the principle of freedom of thought and speech. It is to be earnestly hoped that this great university will make good the promise to toil unshackled in its efforts to find and to propagate the Truth.

Temples

THE other day an altogether new sort of sign appeared on the streets of New York. It was a sort of roofed shed on wheels and upon each side were peep-holes, marked with signs in English and Yiddish, detailing the fascinating objects that were to be seen within. One penny and for one look, long or short as the visitor might desire, into one window. The cart was marked "The Temple of Solomon," and each peep-hole promised a view of some feature of that ancient edifice. A thoughtful, bearded, kindly man, evidently a Jewish rabbi, was in charge; a crowd surrounded the odd contrivance, and as one after another designated the view he wished, the rabbi took his penny and switched on a tiny electric light which illuminated the desired scene. Little toy reproductions of these ancient sacred glories, with photographic backgrounds of the Temple City, were thus brought to view.

Bible students are interested in the Jewish temple; Christians regret that its ancient site is now occupied by an edifice that is neither Jewish nor Christian; it was a pleasing thing to notice that even in the busy streets of busy New York groups of people could be found who still felt the power of the ancient faith and were interested in this crude and childish representation of glories long since perished.

But the real glory of Judaism, the real splendor of the Jewish temple, has not perished. It still lives—in lives where the Jews themselves, scholar and peasant alike, do not expect to find it—in the souls of Christians. The writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews points out to the Jewish Christians that the glory and splendors of the salvation they have found in Christ far outshine the temple grandeur. The belief in Jesus enters into the Most Holy Place, where only the high priest, and he only once a year, could go. All the power and richness and beauty of God are revealed in Jesus—in whom "dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily." The believer, knowing him, enjoying the wonders of his friendship, delighting in his perfections, sharing the riches of his strength and grace, has within his own soul a far more glorious temple than ever stood on Mount Zion, finer than any gorgeous Christian cathedral that was ever reared.

There was something undeniably pathetic in the spectacle of the humble rabbi rolling his little temple toys through the streets of New York. There is something pathetic about the wistful faith and awe of every worshiper who lets his mind and heart rest on any material sanctuary, however grand, and fails to comprehend the real presence of him who dwells that we might have life and might have it abundantly.

Tinkering with the Marriage Ceremony

THERE are some people who have a facility for reversing the old maxim of "doing the right thing in the right place." It occasionally happens that some pastor, ambitious to create a sensation, defies the conventionalities, and tinkers with venerable customs which have long been held sacred by the great majority, irrespective of denomination. This was what happened at a wedding in Jersey City a few days ago, when a preacher, who is widely known for his socialistic tendencies, in performing the marriage ceremony, substituted for the familiar passage "Until death do us part," the words "while love lasts." The new marriage "ceremony," he contended, altered the marriage relation to the extent that love and not financial support is to be henceforth the only basis of union between man and woman.

This unique ceremony has been called socialistic or progressive, but it is progress backward. It is aside the old, reverent form in which two hearts and lives are united for better or worse, through life until death. It ignores the Scriptural injunction that a man should cleave unto his wife, and that "what God hath joined, let no man put asunder." It opens the way to disunion on the first provocation. It imposes no binding obligation, for the reason that each of the parties united by so loose a tie may fling it off at will, even on a whim. It leaves either party at liberty to transfer the affections at will.

Of course, such a ceremony is simply a freak and will have little or no influence on the general question of marriage. In all true marriages the ties are one which grows stronger and truer through the years; the two natures blend together, each making allowances for the other, and both bearing each other's burdens. True, all marriages are not successful; but to put a premium on separation, and to afford every facility for breaking the tie, would be to undermine the home and multiply ultimate unhappiness.

The Bible and Newspaper

CONDUCTED BY
FERDINAND C. IGLEHART, D.D.

An Incurable Boy's Vision

LITTLE Freddie Smith dreamed of the sea, and said he was going to be the captain of a big ship, and walk the deck. An incurable disease fastened itself on him, and he is now in a Brooklyn hospital, but a little longer time to live. The boy is attracting attention on account of his personal qualities, as we learn from the interview of a reporter. The boy's mother is a poor woman who has no clean clothes to support four other children. What a blessed civilization is that of ours which provides a hospital as a home for such unfortunates! "Oh, the doctors all say I am going to get well," said Freddie the other day. "But I know I'm not. Fact is, I think I'm going to die pretty soon; don't you think so?" The visitor felt a sudden tightening of the throat, and did not answer. Miss Lee hurried over and showered pats on his pillow, and then gave the little patient a real hug and kiss. The boy asked the nurse if she would not take him to the top of the roof and leave him in a wheel chair to see the ships in the harbor. A benevolent woman visiting the hospital asked him what he wanted. He said three things: a set of toys "to build things with," a picture book of "ships and things," and a spyglass. The woman sent him the spyglasses, one a real soldier's glass which he wanted sadly, and a five-pound box of candy. They took him on the roof and let him see the ships in the harbor, and he was in paradise. It was noon, the usual hour for the sailing of the trans-Atlantic liners, and across the sunny bay Freddie saw two immense ships slowly making their way past the skyscrapers of Manhattan and out to sea. "O-o-oh!" breathed the boy. "I see the captain, and the little boats pulling the big ones. I wanted to be a captain and sail the big ship out to sea, but I can't, can I, Ms Lee? for I'm going to die." Little Freddie is only marooned on an island. God will send a ship for him to take him out into the open sea. What rapture will fill his heart at the glorious visions of the harbor and city on the other side! Of this and other things, both young and old, and the sorely afflicted of earth will be glad to hear. "These are they which came out of great tribulation, and have washed their robes, and made them white in the blood of the Lamb." (Rev. 7:14.)

Millions in Street-Car Fares

THE Public Service Commission of New York City in its report just published reveals the fact that during the past year 1,807,632,726 persons had rides on the various street-car lines of the city. The amount paid in fares was $1,644,428.41. Figures for the different lines are then given in the report: Interborough, Subway division, $17,879,432.79; Interborough, Elevated, $15,515,947; Hudson and Manhattan Company, $3,679,082; Brooklyn Rapid Transit, $27,043,190; Manhattan surface roads, $21,581,414; Bronx surface roads, $4,307,569; Queens surface roads, $43,959; other companies, including the Borough of Richmond and the Manhattan Bridge three-cent line, $5,469. What a significance there is in the millions of people that daily come into the city and go out of it and cross it to and fro in every direction! What plans, what employments, what hopes and fears, what joys and tears, what destinies, what tragedies this myriad motion involves! The prophet thus sees the spectacle of the traveling of the multitude: "Many shall run to and fro, and knowledge shall be increased." (Dan. 12:4.)

Turns Money into Knowledge

MR. JACOB SCHIFF, a wealthy banker and prominent Hebrew, gave Barnard College $500,000 the other day for a Students' Hall, which is to be a social and religious center for all the women students of the University of Columbia, besides furnishing the Barnard undergraduates with a much needed gymnasium, to be used for social festivities, exercise rooms, a lunch room, a library, offices for students' societies, laboratories and lecture rooms. Mr. Schiff was celebrating a jubilee, the fiftieth anniversary of his landing in this country from Germany, and the years of prosperity with which his life had been blessed, and this was his memorial gift. Those who are sullen and growl at the foreigners are blind to the fact that we are the best nation on the earth, because the best blood of all the nations has come to our shores to take advantage of our liberty and opportunity and to merit our appreciation and gratitude. What a wise investment for the education and happiness of young women! By what a divine alchemy is the material transmuted into the spiritual when money becomes knowledge and love! The thought is suggested by these words: "For wisdom is a defense, and money is a defense; but the excellency of knowledge is, that wisdom giveth life to them that have it." (Eccles. 7:12.)

Gave Life for Ship

GEORGE TRUJILLO, first-class fireman from James, New Mexico, aboard the torpedo-boat destroyer

Cummings, on which a fire and explosion occurred the other morning, died at the naval hospital at Newport, R. I., as a result of his injuries and burns. He could have saved himself, but he stayed at his post and saved the ship and the rest on board. He shut off the burners, groped to the escape hatch, burned and exhausted, and was rescued by members of his crew and rushed by Lieutenant J. C. Fremant, in command of the destroyer, as soon as possible, back to Newport, whence the vessel had gone a little time before to engage in the war game; but it was of no avail, for the man had been fatally burned. Thomas Shea, a water-tender from Paterson, N. J., who was badly burned but is expected to recover, manifested the ence to beware of bad companions. I blame no one but myself for my present condition. I hold no grudge against any one. I ask forgiveness from any I have wronged." On his arrival at the gallows he began to address a little group of persons below him in the courtyard with "Well, gentlemen," when the sheriff caught hold of his arm to direct him to the trapdoor. "Let me speak," he urged. "Sheriff, you promised me," and Sheriff Armstrong motioned for him to proceed. He then solemnly warned them to shun drinking places and resorts of vice, and said: "Jesus has come to me now and I can see him with these eyes of mine in my imagination. I call on Almighty God and Jesus Christ to forgive everybody who was in this affair, and I forgive them."

Those who might be inclined to doubt the genuineness of the penitence and conversion of the executed prisoner could with profit study Christ's standard, which counts grudges and hates so sweetly cherished by some professed Christians as murder, and be thankful that the atonement of Christ is broad enough to cover the hates out of which murder comes and which are so hateful to God. It is not the time but the state of the soul that determines Christ's willingness to save. "And Jesus said unto him, Today shalt thou be with me in paradise." (Luke 23:43.)

Kinds of Lying

DIFFERENT kinds of liars was the theme of the matriculation sermon which President Hadley delivered in Woolsey Hall, Yale University, Sunday, October 3. Among other things President Hadley said: "In a democracy like ours we must work with others. To be able to do so we must tell the truth. The whole fabric of American society rests on the assumption that we are going to be honest in our dealings. Truthfulness in word and in act, strict fulfillment of every obligation, straightforwardness in meeting all promises expressed or implied, independent of all temporary gain or loss to ourselves, are the things that give us the right and power to be members of a free commonwealth. It is a part of our religious creed as well as political duty. When David described a citizen of Zion he said: 'He that sweareth to his own hurt, and changeth not.' There are three kinds of untruthfulness, due to quite distinct causes. One man lies and cheats because he is frightened. Another lies and cheats because he expects to gain advantage for himself or his fellows; a third lies and cheats because he sees others do it and is content to follow the fashion. Unlike the lie of the coward, the premeditated lie of the deceiver often appears to accomplish its purpose. A man may win a game by a trick that deceives the umpire, or a prize by a falsehood that deceives the examiner. He may gain a fortune by an advertisement that deceives the consumer, or an election by a speech that misleads the voter. But in the end, a course of deceit is a foolish way of trying to reach an aim." What a splendid theme and treatment for the young men of Yale, and young and old everywhere in these times when deceit in so many departments of life tries to supplant the truth. President Hadley took as his text: "Wherefore, putting away lying, speak every man truth." (Eph. 4:25.)

Veterans Releasing Peace Doves from Dome of Capitol in Washington

ON the last day of the forty-ninth reunion of the Grand Army of the Republic in Washington, D. C., four doves were released with messages addressed to the rulers of the earth expressing the hope that peace would come soon and reign forever. The doves, which were released by four young girls, represented the Northern, Southern, Eastern and Western sections, and figuratively speaking were to bear the message of the G. A. R. to the monarchs of the world. Captain James Whittlessey, a member of the Signal Corps with the Union fleet operating on the Mississippi River during the war, signaled this message to the Arlington wireless towers with a large red Signal Corps flag: "Greetings from the G. A. R., Washington, D. C., 1915, to the rulers of the nations of the earth, with the hope that peace will come soon and reign forever." From the wireless towers the message was flashed to the four points of the compass. It would be difficult to conceive of a more beautiful picture than this. These scarred veterans, with silver on their heads, and the gates of gold that open in the western sky when the sun goes down just opening to receive them, sent out their doves, symbolic, like the one that bore the olive branch, to echo this song, sung by the heavenly choir at the advent of the Prince of Peace: "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace, good will toward men." (Luke 2:14.)

same kind of heroism by remaining also at his post. The mastery of the sea requires men of strong fiber of body and mind, and great courage of soul. The heroism and even martyrdom of seafaring men is a common story. Giving one's life for others is the climax of all heroism; it is the highest limit of service for Christ, which involves all obligation. The principle is here announced: "For whosoever will save his life shall lose it; and whosoever will lose his life for my sake shall find it." (Matt. 16:25.)

Sermon from the Scaffold

T. C. M'KILLARNEY, alias Mickey the Dago, who killed Detective Richard Levis of the Vancouver police force, recently paid the penalty for his crime on the scaffold in the courtyard of the provincial jail at New Westminster, British Columbia. Adjutant Hector C. Habbkirk of the Salvation Army, who was his spiritual adviser during his imprisonment and execution, told the story of the penitence and conversion of the condemned man, and gave to the public a letter of warning against bad company he had written just before his execution. Among other things the letter says: "Especially would I like to warn young men through my experi-

Amarilly of Clothes-Line Alley

By BELLE K. MANIATES

Copyright, 1917, by Little, Brown & Co. All rights reserved

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

AMARILLY made her bow to Christian Herald readers from the threshold of the Barlow "Theater," where she mopped floors and dreamed dreams. They followed her home to a dark little court and became acquainted with her mother, her sister Cory, her brother Flamingus and the twins. They saw her handle the domestic difficulty entailed by the addition of a boarder in the family, and applauded the resourcefulness with which she overcame the obstacle of numbers by the expedient of "double-decking" the crowd. They saw her under the tutelage of this boarder begin a struggle for the education necessary to the career of her dreams, and finally they went with her to the Saturday afternoon school at St. Mark's, to the class whose teacher wore real hair and wasn't made up. There she won the heart and whole-souled interest of this teacher, and came home in triumph in the teacher's electric brougham.

Through the interest of this teacher, Colette King, Amarilly's mother became the laundress of St. Mark's and Amarilly met the rector, Rev. (St.) John Meredith, who invited her to attend morning service and who showed something more than a pastor's interest in Colette. Amarilly's soul responded to the church service and her heart beat in unison with the music. She thought it must be what Heaven was. Amarilly organized a choir and gave a Wednesday evening sacred concert for the neighbors. Bud's offertory solo was repeated for Mr. Meredith, who promptly introduced Bud into the choir of St. Mark's, where he would be paid for singing. The Jenkinses' income began to show a surplus. Then scarlet fever quarantined them; and in spite of generous friends there came a morning when although the quarantine had been lifted Amarilly had to forage for breakfast. The family fund once more got a modest start, which was accelerated by the mundane career of the minister's surplice.

CHAPTER VIII

EVER apt in following a lead, Amarilly at once resolved to establish a regular costuming business. It even occurred to her to hire out the lace waist, but thoughts of wedding bells prevailed against her impulse to open this branch of the business.

When the young tenor returned the surplice he informed Amarilly that two young ladies of his acquaintance were going to give a home entertainment for charity. Among the impromptu acts would be some tableaux, and the surplice was needed for a church scene. So the new venture brought in another dollar that week.

One day Bud came home capless, having crossed a bridge in a high wind.

"I seen an ad," said the thrifty Flamingus, "that the Beehive would give away baseball caps to-day."

Amarilly immediately set out for the Beehive, an emporium of fashion in the vicinity of the theater. It was the noon hour, and there were no other customers in evidence. The proprietor and a clerk were engaged in discussing the design for a window display, and were loath to notice their would-be beneficiary. Finally the clerk drawled out:

"Did you want anything, little girl?"

"I called," explained Amarilly with grandiose manner, "to git one of them caps you advertised to give away."

"Oh, those were all given out long ago. You should have come earlier," he replied with an air of relief, as he turned to resume the all-absorbing topic with the proprietor.

Amarilly's interest in the window display dispelled any disappointment she might have had in regard to Bud's head covering.

"Now," said the clerk didactically, "my idea is this. Have a wedding—a church wedding. I can rig up an altar, and we'll have the bride in a white, trailing gown; the groom, best man, and ushers in dress suits to advertise our gents' department; the bridesmaids and relatives in different colored evening dresses, and in this way we can announce our big clearing sale of summer goods in the ready-to-wear department. It'll make a swell window and draw crowds. Women can never get by a wedding."

"That's a dandy idea, Ben," approved the proprietor.

"Oh, I am a winner on ideas," vaunted the clerk chestily.

So was Amarilly. She stepped eagerly up to the window designer.

"Do you keep surpluses?"

"No; don't know what they are," replied the clerk shortly, turning from her.

"We'll get a wreath of orange flowers for the bride, and then we can have a child carrying the ring, so as to call attention to our children's department."

"A surplus," explained Amarilly, scornful of such avowed ignorance, "is the white gown that Episcopal ministers wear."

"No; we don't keep them," was the impatient rejoinder.

"Well, I hev one," she said, addressing the proprietor this time; "a real minister's, and I'll rent it to you to put on your figger of the minister in your wedding window. He'll hev to wear one."

"I am not an Episcopalian," said the proprietor hesitatingly. "What do you think, Ben?"

"Well, it hadn't occurred to me to have an Episcopal wedding, but I don't know but what it would work out well, after all. It would make it attract notice more, and women are always daffy over Episcopal weddings. They like classy things. We could put a card in the window, saying all the clergy bought the linen for their surpluses here. How," turning to Amarilly, "did you happen to have such an article?"

"We do the washin' fer St. Mark's church, and the minister give us one of his surpluses."

"The display will be in for six days. What will you rent it for that long?"

"I allers git a dollar a night fer it," replied Amarilly.

"Too much!" declared the clerk. "I'll give you fifty cents a day."

"I'll let it go six days fer four dollars," bargained Amarilly.

"Well, seeing you have come down on your offer, I'll come up a little on mine. I'll take it for three-fifty."

Amarilly considered.

"I will, if you'll throw in one of them caps fer my brother."

"All right," laughed the proprietor.

"I think we'll call it a bargain. See if you can't dig up one of those caps for her, Ben."

Without much difficulty Ben produced a cap, and Amarilly hurried home for the surplice. She went down to the Beehive every day during the wedding-window week and feasted her eyes on the beloved gown. She took all the glory of the success of the display to her own credit, and her feelings were very much like those of the writer of a play on a first night.

FROM a wedding to a funeral was the natural evolution of a surplice, but this time it did not appear in its customary rôle. Instead of adorning a minister, it clad the corpse. Mrs. Hudgers's only son, a scallawag, who had been a constant drain on his mother's small stipend, was taken ill and died, to the discreetly disguised relief of the neighborhood.

"I'm a-goin' to give Hallie a good funeral," Mrs. Hudgers confided to Amarilly. "I'm a-goin' to hev hacks and flowers and singin'. If yer St. Mark's man was to hum now, I should like to have him fishyate."

"Who will you git?" asked Amarilly interestedly.

"I'll hev the preacher from the meetin'-house on the hill, Brother Longgrass."

"I wonder," speculated Amarilly, "if he'd like to wear the surplus?"

Foremost as the plumes of Henry of Navarre in battle were the surplice and the renting thereof in Amarilly's vision.

"I don't expect he could do that," replied Mrs. Hudgers doubtfully. "His church most likely wouldn't stand fer it. Brother Longgrass is real kind if he ain't my sort. He's a-goin' to let the boys run the maylodeun down here the night afore the funyral."

"Who's a-goin' to sing?"

"I dunno yit. I left it to the preacher. He said he'd git me a picked choir, whatever that may be."

"My! But you'll hev a fine funeral!" exclaimed Amarilly admiringly.

"I allers did say that when Hallie got merried, or died, things should be done right. That's jest one thing I can't hev."

"What's that, Mrs. Hudgers?"

"Why, you see, Amarilly, Hallie's clo'es air sort of shabby-like, and when we git him in that shiny new caskit, they air a-goin' to show up orful seedy. But I can't afford ter buy him a new suit jest for this onct."

"Couldn't you rent a suit?" asked Amarilly, her ruling passion for business still dominating.

"No; I jest can't, Amarilly. It's costin' me too much now."

"I know it is," sympathized Amarilly, concentrating her mind on the puzzling solution of Hallie's habiliment.

"Mrs. Hudgers," she exclaimed suddenly, "why can't you put the surplus on Hallie? You kin slip it on over his suit, and when the funeral's over, and they hev all looked at the corpse, you kin take it offen him."

"Oh, that would be sweet!" cried Mrs. Hudgers, brightening perceptibly. Hallie would look beautiful in it and 'twould be diffrent from any one else's funeral. How you allers think of things, Amarilly! But I ain't got no do'r to pay you fer it."

"If you did hev one," replied Amarilly indignantly, "I shouldn't let you pay fer it. We're neighbors, and I kin do fer Hallie I want ter do."

"Well, Amarilly, it's certainly fer you to feel that way. You don't take," she added with sudden apprehension, "that they'd think the surplus was Hallie's nightshirt, do you?"

"Oh, no!" protested Amarilly, shocked at such a supposition. Besides, you kin tell them all that Hallie's laid out in a surplus. They all seen them to the concert."

The funeral passed off with real éclat. The picked choir had real voices, and Brother Longgrass preached one of his longest sermons, cordially omitting reference to any of the characteristics of the deceased. Mrs. Hudgers was suitably attired in dotted and dusty black. The extremely conventional garb of Hallie caused some little comment, but it was commonly supposed to be a part of the Episcopalian spirit which the Jenkinses seemed to be inculcating in the neighborhood. Brother Longgrass was a little startled upon beholding the white-robed corpse, but perceiving what comfort it brought to the afflicted mother, he magnanimously forbore to allude to the matter.

After the remains had been viewed for the last time, the surplice was removed. In the evening Amarilly called for it.

"He did look handsome in it," commented Mrs. Hudgers with a satisfied, reminiscent smile. "I wish I might hed his likeness took. I'm a-goin' to make you take hum this pan of iced cakes Mrs. Holdcock fetched in. T'y'll help fill up the chillern."

"I don't want to rob you, Mrs. Hudgers," said Amarilly, gazing longingly at the doughnuts, which were classed as luxuries in the Jenkinses' menu.

"I dassent eat 'em, Amarilly. I jest jest one, I'd hev dyspepsy orful and folks hez brung in enough stuff to kill me now. It does beat all the way hey bring vittles to a house of mournin'! I only wish Hallie could hev some of 'n."

CHAPTER IX

THE surplice, carefully laundered after the funeral, was ready to swell fields of labor. The tenor, first patron of Amarilly's costuming establishment, was wont to loiter in the studio of an artist he knew and relate his about-town adventures. This artist was interested in the annals of the little scrub-girl and her means of livelihood.

"I have in mind he said musingly, "a picture of a musician he light to be streaming through a stained window on his uplifted lad as he sits at an organ." "The Lost Chord?" inquired the tenor.

"Nothing quite so bromidic as that," laughed the artist. "I have my model engaged, and I had intended to give you borrow a surplice for me, but you may ask our little customer to reimburse her gown for a couple of days."

On receipt of this request delivered through the medium of the ketch-seller, Amarilly promptly appeared at the studio. She was gravely and courteously received by the artist.

Continued on page 15

WHEN MOTHER READS A STORY

By Margaret E. Sangster, Jr.

WHEN mother reads a story jes' before we go to bed, There's not a one of all of us that is a sleepy-head; We gather round and crowd up close about her rockin' chair, An' as she reads I watch the light a-glowin' on her hair. Oh! Jimmy's eyes get big as plates, an' Mary sometimes squeals, An' Betty sits with tear-stained face because she sorter feels Real sorry for the dragon when the hero kills him dead; When mother reads a story jes' before we go to bed.

When mother reads a story jes' before we go to bed, I lean up close an' hold the book so she can pat my head; For when the giant's yellin' fierce, it's awful nice to know That mother's arm is holding you an' will not let you go! Oh! Buddy's mouth falls open most, he gets so filled with fear, An' Helen's eyes glow bright like stars; an' when the end is near, We hear the words, "They happy lived fer ever—it was said," When mother reads a story jes' before we go to bed.

Women Point the Way to Peace

THE net result of the International Congress of Women which met at The Hague last April is a manifesto printed below in its entirety. It was just recently issued by the envoys to the Congress who were appointed to interview the governments of Europe and of the United States. This report has high importance from the fact that it reflects special interviews granted to these women envoys by the following, among others:

Prime Minister Asquith and Foreign Minister Sir Edward Grey, in London; Reichskanzler von Bethmann-Hollweg and Foreign Minister von Jagow, in Berlin; Prime Minister Stuerghk, Foreign Minister Burian, in Vienna; Prime Minister Tisza, in Budapest; Prime Minister Salandra and Foreign Minister Sonino, in Rome; Prime Minister Viviani and Foreign Minister Deleassé, in Paris; Foreign Minister d'Avignon, in Havre; Foreign Minister Sasonoff, in Petrograd. and by the following representatives of neutral governments:

Prime Minister Cort van der Linden and Foreign Minister Loudon, in The Hague; Prime Minister Zahle and Foreign Minister Scavenius, in Copenhagen; King Haakon, Prime Minister Knudsen and Foreign Minister Ihlen, and by Mrs. Loveland, Aarstad, Castberg and Jahren, the four presidents of the thing in Christiania; Foreign Minister Wallenberg, in Stockholm.

President Motta and Foreign Minister Hoffman, in Berne; President Wilson and Secretary of State Lansing in Washington.

The signers of this announcement to the public were leading members of the Congress, and rank among the foremost women of their respective countries. With a proposal of this character, made by such responsible women and ended in such responsible quarters, to stimulate action, it would seem to be a case when every thoughtful man and woman should bring his and her influence to bear upon the Administration at Washington in behalf of a definite step toward the one thing most to be desired in this world at the present moment.

The Women's Manifesto

HERE in America, on neutral soil, far removed from the stress of the conflict, we, the envoys to the governments from the International Congress of Women at The Hague, have come together to canvass the results of our missions. We put forth this statement as our united and deliberate conclusions.

Our mission was to place before belligerent and neutral alike the resolutions of the International Congress of Women held at The Hague in April; especially to place before them the definite method of a conference of neutral nations as an agency of continuous mediation for the settlement of the war.

To carry out this mission two delegations were appointed, which included women of Great Britain, Hungary, Italy, the Netherlands, Sweden, and the United States. One or other of these delegations was received by the governments in fourteen capitals: Berlin, Berne, Budapest, Christiania, Copenhagen, The Hague, Havre (Belgian Government), London, Paris, Petrograd, Rome, Stockholm, Vienna, and Washington. We were received by the Prime Ministers and Foreign Ministers of the Powers, by the King of Norway, by the Presidents of Switzerland and of the United States, by the Pope and the Cardinal Secretary of State. In many capitals more than one audience was given, not merely to present our resolutions, but for a thorough discussion. In addition to the thirty-five governmental visits we met everywhere members of parliaments and other leaders of public opinion.

This Russian Hospital Is but One Argument for Peace

ments in fourteen capitals: Berlin, Berne, Budapest, Christiania, Copenhagen, The Hague, Havre (Belgian Government), London, Paris, Petrograd, Rome, Stockholm, Vienna, and Washington. We were received by the Prime Ministers and Foreign Ministers of the Powers, by the King of Norway, by the Presidents of Switzerland and of the United States, by the Pope and the Cardinal Secretary of State. In many capitals more than one audience was given, not merely to present our resolutions, but for a thorough discussion. In addition to the thirty-five governmental visits we met everywhere members of parliaments and other leaders of public opinion.

Our visits to the war capitals convinced us that the belligerent governments would not be opposed to a conference of neutral nations; that while the belligerents have rejected offers of mediation by single neutral nations, and while no belligerent could ask for mediation, the creation of a continuous conference of neutral nations might provide the machinery which would lead to peace. We found that the neutrals on the other hand were concerned lest calling such a conference might be considered inopportune by one or other of the belligerents. Here our information from the belligerents themselves gave assurance that such initiative would not be resented. "My country would not find anything unfriendly in such action by the neutrals," was the assurance given us by the Foreign Minister of one of the great belligerents. "My government would place no obstacle in the way of its institution," said the minister of an opposing nation. "What are the neutrals waiting for?" said a third, whose name ranks high not only in his own country, but all over the world.

It remained to put this clarifying intelligence before the neutral countries. As a result the plan of starting mediation through the agency of a continuous conference of the neutral nations is today being seriously discussed alike in the cabinets of the belligerent and neutral countries of Europe and in the press of both.

WE are in a position to quote some of the expressions of men high in the councils of the great nations as to the feasibility of the plan. "You are right," said one minister, "that it would be of the greatest importance to finish the fight by early negotiation rather than by further military efforts, which would result in more and more destruction and irreparable loss." "Yours is the sanest proposal that has been brought to this office in the last six months," said the Prime Minister of one of the larger countries.

We were also in position to canvass the objections that have been made to the proposal, testing it out severely in the judgment of those in the midst of the European conflict. It has been argued that it is not the time at present to start such a process of negotiation, and that no step should be taken until one or other party has a victory, or at least until some new military balance is struck. The answer we bring is that every delay makes more difficult the beginning of negotiations, more nations become involved, and the situation becomes more complicated; that when at times in the course of the war such a balance was struck, the neutrals were unprepared to act. The opportunity passed. For the forces of peace to be unprepared when the hour comes, is as irretrievable as for a military leader to be unready.

It has been argued that for such a conference to be called at any time when one side has met with some military advantage, would be to favor that side. The answer we bring is that the proposed conference would start mediation at a higher level than that of military advantage. As to the actual military situation, however, we quote a remark made to us by a Foreign Minister of one of the belligerent Powers. "Neither side is to-day strong enough to dictate terms, and neither side is so weakened that it has to accept humiliating terms."

We have been convinced that the governments of the belligerent nations would not be hostile to the institution of such a common channel for good offices; and that the governments of the European neutrals we visited stand ready to cooperate with others in mediation. Reviewing the situation, we believe that of the five European neutral nations visited, three are ready to join in such a conference, and that two are deliberating the calling of such a conference. Of the intention of the United States we have as yet no evidence.

The excruciating burden of responsibility for the hopeless continuance of this war no longer rests on the will of the belligerent nations alone. It rests also on the will of those neutral governments and people who have been spared its shock but cannot, if they would, absolve themselves from their full share of responsibility for the continuance of war.

Signed by

Aletta Jacobs [Holland].
Chrystal Macmillan [Great Britain].
Rosika Schwimmer [Austro-Hungary].
Emily G. Balch [United States].
Jane Addams [United States].

The War in Europe

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

European journalist of many years' standing, author of "The Peace of Paris," "The Peace of Versailles," and "The Peace of Tientsin," and a contributor to "The Christian Herald."

THE Balkan situation continues to occupy the attention of the world. Bulgaria and Serbia have mutually declared war on each other, and Bulgarian troops have advanced into Serbian territory. Great Britain, on the 5th, also declared war on Bulgaria, which example will probably very shortly be followed by Russia and France.

Rumania has given no certain sign of whether her future military action will be, if any, up to the present writing. Her geographical situation makes her doubly well-timed, touching as she does, not only on Bulgaria but also on Austria and on Russia. The result being that if she should declare for the Central Empires, she would be able to attack by Russia from the east and on her Black Sea coast; while on the other hand, should she declare for the Entente Powers, Austria from the north and Bulgaria from the south could launch a joint simultaneous assault upon her. Her geographical difficulties are supplemented by the fact that she is the ultimately winning power no matter which that might be, she could gratify her desires for territorial expansion. Should she join the Teutons and should they be victorious, she would regain undoubtedly her lost province of Bessarabia, which Russia took from her in 1878, and perhaps other Russian territory in addition, though she would have to restore to Bulgaria, Celestria, which she took from Bulgaria as a result of the second Balkan war two years ago.

Should Rumania, however, join the Entente powers, in the event of their victory she would retain Celestria and have other territory given to her from the Austrian Transylvania territory, to a considerable degree inhabited by a people of the same stock as her own population, which territory once formed part of the Roman province of Dacia, whereof modern Rumania also was a part.

For all these reasons her very national existence is involved, and it does not seem that she can possibly remain permanently neutral.

Greece also is in a peculiar position. At the conclusion of the second Balkan war she made a treaty with Serbia which, according to the common understanding, provided for united action against Bulgaria in case that nation sought to recover by force of arms the territory taken from her and divided between Greece and Serbia. Bulgaria has now attacked Serbia, after sending her an ultimatum demanding the return of the territory which fell to the share of Serbia. Serbia consequently called on Greece to fulfill her obligation, to which Greece replied by stating that certain prior acts of Serbia had abrogated the treaty and that it was no longer binding. Serbia answered this contention by a traverse and announced that she would publish the full text of the treaty which was a secret one. This, however, has not been as yet done, and until it is it is difficult to see which of the two is in the right.

The situation is otherwise complicated. The Allies, against the formal protest of Greece, have landed and are landing troops on Greek territory. Prior to such landing, the King had dismissed Venizelos from the office of prime minister and had called to that position Alexander Zaimis. This minister has announced formally that Greece would maintain a neutral attitude. With Greece's long coast line and her ports exposed to naval attack, it would have been madness on her part to have attempted to sustain her formal protest, yet in strict neutrality she was bound to do her best to stop such use of her territory. The Central Empires have addressed her a protest against her inactivity under the circumstances. How Greece can long escape taking an active part in the war is extremely difficult to see.

One possible result of the Balkan situation may be the abandonment by the Allies of the campaign against Constantinople, judging from the debate in the British House of Lords last Thursday evening, in which this course was openly advocated by Viscount Milner of South African fame, who suggested that in view of the need of all available troops on the western front there was but one course for the Allies to pursue, withdraw all the French and British troops from Gallipoli Peninsula and transfer the men with all speed to the aid of Serbia before that country was completely crushed by the Teutons and Bulgaria. The government speakers were wholly non-committal and evasive upon this question.

Continued on page 1086

Do You Ever Go Visiting On Washday Afternoon?

with Fels-Naptha Soap.

After clearing away the breakfast dishes she washes the clothes. Fels-Naptha has loosened the dirt and dissolved the grease, so that a few light rubs get them sweet, clean and white, ready for the line before noon.

Right after lunch she sprinkles down the dry clothes, ready for the next day's ironing. Then she has a couple of hours with nothing to do, except just what she pleases.

She sometimes goes to the store and does a little shopping or stops in to see a friend.

After a nice, tasty supper, it is only a matter of a few minutes for the children to do the dishes. The children love to help, and Fels-Naptha makes all kinds of work child's play.

Mrs. Wisely often does. She gets her wash done early. Right after breakfast on washday morning, she puts the clothes to soak for about 30 minutes

After clearing away the breakfast dishes she washes the clothes. Fels-Naptha has loosened the dirt and dissolved the grease, so that a few light rubs get them

Right after lunch she sprinkles down the dry clothes, ready for the next day's ironing. Then she has a couple of hours with nothing to do, except just what she pleases.

After a nice, tasty supper, it is only a matter of a few minutes for the children to do the dishes. The children love to help, and Fels-Naptha makes all kinds of

By 7.30 the family is ready to start off to the "movies." How many other women, after doing the washing for four people, feel able or have the time to spend washday like Mrs. Wisely?

Every woman could have just as much time for pleasure, if she would let Fels-Naptha Soap do the hard part of her work for her. Not only for washing clothes—it's just as wonderful for all household cleaning.

Fels & Co., Philadelphia

Young People's Topics for November 7

Tasks That Are Waiting For the Church of Christ

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topic: Luke 4:14-21 (Consecration Meeting)

THE Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the Gospel to the poor; he hath sent me to heal the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised, to preach the acceptable year of the Lord.

To give sight to the blind—that means, in addition to actual restoration of eyesight, by miracle or skill, to show people the truth. Often the church has been opposed to truth. It persecuted Galileo for saying that the earth was round; it frowned upon Garrison and other abolitionists for saying that slavery was wicked; it is tempted today to stifle the voices of those who are declaring advanced economic truths. Jesus said: "Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free." That is almost the first business of the church—to aid in the search for truth in every field, to flash the light of God upon every human problem.

Healing the broken-hearted. That means showing them what to do about the distresses of conscience, how to find forgiveness for past sins, how to find hope of spiritual triumph, how to find immortality, how to find comfort in the midst of trial, how to find, from some trials, relief.

To deliver the captives. Christianity has done a lot of that—setting free slaves, delivering oppressed. But there is a lot of it left yet to do.

To set at liberty the bruised. The "bruised." What a multitude they make! All the little children in homes of poverty, in the factories and mills, all the weary women and discouraged men crushed by the rigors of the civilization we have developed. These to be set at liberty.

And so to preach the Gospel to the poor must mean not a Gospel that makes people content with poverty, but a Gospel that will free society from the curse of poverty.

All by the power of the Spirit of the Lord God. The Spirit of Jehovah was in Jesus to help him do these things. That Spirit will come to our souls, our society, our church, to give us power for these great and happy tasks.

This is a consecration meeting. Shall we give ourselves jubilantly to share with Christ the glories of this indwelling Spirit and the splendors, as well as the crosses, of this work divine?

A Prophet's Great Promise To Youth
Epworth League Topic: Joel 2:21, 27-29

THE passage from Joel's prophecy which we study today is one of the greatest in the whole Bible. When the day of Pentecost came, with its marvelous gift, Peter quoted this prophecy and said that the blessing just given was its fulfillment.

It is particularly beautiful and gratifying that young people are specifically mentioned in this promise. The sons and daughters shall prophesy—that is, shall get messages direct from God, which they will deliver to others in the form of testimony, exhortation, prayer and counsel—and not only the old men but the young men shall see visions—visions of truth, of God.

Look up the Sunday school lesson for October 24 in the Christian Herald for October 13, especially the article on "Seers and Blind Men." Then see the notes on this page on the Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. topic. Combine the two ideas and make that the body of this Epworth League lesson—the vision of the present tasks, then the assurance that the gifts of heavenly sight and heavenly power shall be given.

Both the young people's lessons lead us back to the Holy Spirit. It was the Holy Spirit that anointed Jesus for his transcendent work; it is the Holy Spirit that will fire and strengthen us for carrying on the work he began. It is the Holy Spirit that will come to every one of our hearts as we welcome him, bringing the fulfilment of this prophecy of long ago.

Have we received personally this gift of the Holy Spirit? Robert E. Speer delivers a wonderful address on the "Fire-Casting Christ," showing how the Messiah will fill souls today as in other days with the fires of God. But it means to forsake sin. It means a willingness to have the inward sins burned up. Are we willing, then, to be baptized with that baptism?

Light and joy and glory and triumph are for us if we say yes.

One word more: the blessing comes by simple faith. Believe that he means you, and the blessing is yours. You are one of the young men, one of the sons or daughters or handmaids who were to receive this glorious gift.

Jews Hear Gospel in Masses

ONE of the remarkable effects of the present great war is that it has turned the mind of the Jewish nation to a profound introspection. The entire nation realizes that these are solemn times for Israel. Fully 80 per cent. of all the Jews in the world are living in the war area, the total being ten million Jews; practically the only Jews that are immune from the effects of the terrible war are the Jews living in America, about two million in number. About 500,000 Jews are fighting in the various armies, so that we have the amazing spectacle of Jew fighting brother Jew, and being compelled to do so by the respective governments under which they live.

New conditions have made it easier to reach the Jews with the Gospel than for many years past. The Williamsburg Hebrew Christian Mission and others have been quick to take advantage of this changed attitude, and have accomplished remarkable results during the past year. A great mass meeting for Jews was held in the city of New York this spring in the Second Avenue Baptist Church by the Williamsburg Mission, at which thirty cultured Jews, men of ability and education, all of them believers in Christ, testified to their belief in the vital truth of the Gospel message.

The Williamsburg Mission, which is at 27 Throop Avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y., is planning similar activities on a large scale this winter. Rev. Leopold Cohn is the founder and superintendent.

Among the Workers

THE editor recently received a letter from one of our friends who has passed the fiftieth milestone not alone in life but in married life. Mrs. Charles A. Post of Riverside, Calif., whose home was recently filled with friends in honor of the golden wedding anniversary of Mr. and Mrs. Post. Mrs. Post writes as follows:

"I want to tell you I do enjoy your paper, cannot remember the number of years I have taken it. The sermons and daily readings are an inspiration in themselves and Margaret Sangster's page and the Prayer League are comforting messages."

REV. HOWARD J. KINGDON, Pastor of the First Baptist Church of Beacon, N. Y., asks that we mention the union evangelistic campaign soon to open in that city under the management of Rev. J. B. McMinn and his company. He says, "Our needs here are very great and unless we can have the prayers of the children of God for the outpouring of his blessed Spirit we shall fail; but with this we shall succeed and sinners will be saved. Pray most earnestly that the party coming to us may be given wisdom and that the Spirit may attend these meetings in a very marked way."

WHEN the Mongolia sailed from San Francisco late this summer, she had on board 134 missionaries. On the voyage they held meetings for spiritual help and for the interchange of missionary knowledge and experience. It was said to be the largest number of missionaries ever crossing the sea in one vessel. There were eleven Protestant denominations represented, not including Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A. representatives, Yale Mission teachers, two independent missions and three Roman Catholics. The destinations were China, Japan, India, Korea, Siam and Honolulu.

Let Us Tell You The 1916 Price on this beautiful Mission Base-Burner and 500 other styles and sizes of best quality ranges, cook stoves and heaters that you can choose from our

New 1916 Catalog Mailed With "Recipes in Rhyme" FREE

Write for these two books today—see new styles—1916 wholesale prices—read latest helpful recipes in catchy sparkling jingle. Choose your Kalamazoo at once for 30 day trial, 360 days' approval test—on cash or easy payment plan—we pay freight and ship within 24 hours. $100,000 bank guaranty. Write today! Ask for Catalog No. 103

Kalamazoo Stove Co., Manufacturers
Kalamazoo, Mich.

We make ranges, stoves, gas stoves, furnaces and white enameled metal kitchen cabinets. We have four catalogs—please mention which you want.

"A Kalamazoo Direct to You"
Trade Mark Registered

A Perfect Ford Tire Holder with Lock $100

The "BEST" Tire Holder for Ford Cars is the only combination Tire Holder and Brace for the running board. It fits to the body at the top and running board at the bottom, making a rigid running board and holds the tire without vibration.

It saves the tires, and lock prevents theft. Can be attached to any Ford or similar car in ten minutes and will carry a Ford tire. For a two tire holder, 25c extra. Sheet iron tube or Tool Box, with lock as shown in illustration, $2.00 each. Send order today. If not found as represented, money promptly refunded. Attractive discounts to agents, etc. for FREE FOLDER.

Oltmanns-Kunkle Co., 609 Franklin St., Peoria, Ill.

POMPEIAN
OLIVE OIL

ALWAYS FRESH
PURE-SWEET-WHOLESOME

Hallowe'en

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

ON Hallowe'en—or All Saints' Day—the spirits walk (so people say), and ghosts in flowing robes of white make horrible the autumn night. At twelve o'clock the graveyards drear are spectacles or so we hear, for every grave gives up its dead, and little lights of green and red fly through the frosty evening air, and noises sound most everywhere. Such awful noises! I've heard tell that witches sob and goblins yell! The woods are filled with titens black, with yellow eyes and cehing back; and all the world is grim and gray—if you believe what people say.

ONG, long ago across the sea, folk were as scared as they could be, or fear the deeds that they had done could turn to spirits every one. (Of course, I mean the wicked things, for evil deeds grow silver wings, and away to do their part in some one's lonely, aching heart!) As I was saying, they were scared, and so because they never dared to venture out on All Saints' Night, they built a huge and bright before the doorway of each home, so that the evil ones might roam away into the dark and go—for evil loves the dark, you know.

ON Hallowe'en—so people said—when you were safely tucked in bed, if you had been unkind or bad, your thoughts would come to make you sad; and while you sobbed in hopeless pain, you'd hear a sound like weeping rain against your window, and you would think of nothing to do, before a shape all grim and black stepped toward your bed, like thunder's crack a voice would sound, a voice of doom that echoed through the lonely room; and you could have to swear an oath (and you would swear it, nothing loath!) to do good deeds or kind. And when the figure's teeth would grind, and it would say: "I warn you fair, you betray the words you swear, I'll come back and I shall stay, to haunt you every night and day!" and you would faint away in bed from awful fear—so people said.

OH, superstitions queer were rife about one's past or future life; and folk believed them, thought them true—which you or I would never do! Young girls who wished to know their fate would take a candle and a plate of silver to reflect their face, and they would seek some lonely place, and holding plate and light on high, would look the far-off misty sky to send a vision of the man whom they would marry. (If you can relate a queerer thing to do, please tell it—but they thought it true!)

AT children's parties here today, we play such games a different way; we laugh and joke and try our fate in fun, and sometimes we relate ghost stories, and we bob in pails for apples, and the one who fails to get a large and juicy bite is not consumed with needless fright. We stand three candles in a row and try to blow them out; we know, though each is christened for some friend, the one that glimmers to the end is not a sign to any one of anything but youth and fun. We walk down darksome cellar stairs, and yet we know that, unawares, no goblin form will seek to slay; we know no witch is hid away. We feel remorse if we have been unkind, and yet we know no sin in ghostly form will seek our bed; we know no cat with ugly head is in the wood to bring our doom; we have no haunted, scary room within our home where goblins dwell; we listen to the folk who tell us stories, and we always laugh—we don't believe their tales by half. We know that gray-clad women tall don't ride on ghostly brooms at all; we know the moon of Hallowe'en, that glimmers softly down between the leafless boughs, is just as kind as any moon that you can find.

AND yet the folk of long ago believed these things—and do you know, some people, of this very day, are scared on Hallowe'en and stay at home and do not dare to walk out in the dark—they fear to talk about the goblins and the sprites, that do not live on other nights. And when I hear such silly things, I laugh, and oh, my laughter brings a vision up of other days when folk had useless, silly ways.

ON Hallowe'en or All Saints' Day the spirits walked—so people say. And so, to guard themselves, folk made a fire (they were so afraid, before the doorway of each home, to keep away the Things that roam.

SUCH thoughts are obsolete and dead; but if each one would build instead a blazing light with logs of love, and bits of faith from God above; if each would keep his fire bright on Hallowe'en—and every night—before the doorway of his heart, why, needless wrong would never start! And each would be as pure and good as God the Father meant he should.

IF you will guard your fire well no evil deeds will come to dwell, and wanderers who travel far will see your light like some great star; and some of them will cease to roam, and with a prayer will hurry home.

SAXON "SIX"

A big touring car for five people

$785

Power of a Locomotive

Mighty, resistless power that seems capable of sweeping you on and on forever—that's the first thing you feel when you sit behind the wheel of a New Series Saxon "Six." You sense it in the motor's low, healthy purr. You feel it in the steady, even pull as the car gets under way.

And then—when you step on the accelerator, what a revelation of power you get. The car leaps forward—eagerly, like a hound unleashed.

Speed is yours—as much as you want—with only a touch of the throttle. Hills are like level places. You romp up steep grades without the slightest feeling of effort.

Saxon high speed motor plus Saxon light weight is the combination that gives such wonderful power. Yacht line body gives the New Series "Six" its striking beauty and style. Ample room in both driver's seat and tonneau gives complete comfort for all passengers.

See this splendid car: let it prove to you its power and quality. In choosing your touring car don't be content with anything less than a "Six." Write for "Saxon Days." Address Dept. K.

"Four" Roadster With detachable Coupe top Delivery Car	$395 455 395	"Six" Touring Car With detachable Limousine top "Six" Roadster	$785 935 785
---	---------------------	---	---------------------

Saxon Motor Company, Detroit

(196)

FEED CHILDREN

On Properly Selected Food. It Pays Big Dividends.

If parents will give just a little intelligent thought to the feeding of their children the difference in the health of the little folks will pay, many times over, for the small trouble.

A mother writes: "Our children are all so much better and stronger than they ever were before we made a change in the character of the food. We have quit using potatoes three times a day with coffee and so much meat.

"Now we give the little folks some fruit, either fresh, stewed, or canned, some Grape-Nuts with cream, occasionally some soft boiled eggs, and some Postum for breakfast and supper. Then for dinner they have some meat and vegetables.

"It would be hard to fully describe the change in the children, they have grown so sturdy and strong, and we attribute this change to the food elements that, I understand, exist in Grape-Nuts and Postum.

"A short time ago my baby was teething and had a great deal of stomach and bowel trouble. Nothing seemed to agree with him until I tried Grape-Nuts softened and mixed with rich milk and he improved rapidly and got sturdy and well."

"There's a Reason."
Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

PIANO TUNING AT HOME

A LUCRATIVE PROFESSION easily acquired. Anyone can learn. Our PATENTED TUNE-A-PHONE METHOD makes success more certain than best oral instruction. Guaranteed. Write for FREE BOOKLET, telling how our STUDENTS MAKE BIG MONEY.
Niles Bryant School of Tuning, 22 Inst. Bldg., Battle Creek, Mich.

Car Owners—Here's a Device That Ends Carbon Troubles

THE HART-BELL CARBON REMOVER is a device for intruding live steam into the cylinders of the motor. Carbon cannot be dissolved—only loosened—and live steam is the best agency for loosening carbon. The carbon is then blown out through the exhaust while the motor is running.

THE HART-BELL CARBON REMOVER

IS PERMANENTLY ATTACHED (as an attach it yourself) and can be used as often as desired. There is no complicated mechanism and nothing to get out of order. Positively cannot harm the motor. Thousands in use and giving entire satisfaction. Price $5.00—the cost of one cleaning in the garage—and money refunded if not satisfied.

GOOD SELLING TERRITORY OPEN

Car owners, garage men, any one looking for a good selling proposition, should write at once to territory and terms.

Utility Products Co., Inc.
1402 Times Building, N.Y. City

The "Home Builders"

NO. 2 THE HALL AND STAIRWAY

The gratifying success of John's suggestion for a white dining room led to its adoption for other rooms. It was found to be true that produced a rich permanent snow white finish with no tendency to turn yellow, crack or chip. It was also seen that the immaculate white finish could be preserved indefinitely by a gentle washing. So it was decided to use Luxeberry White Enamel on the reception hall and stairway, and to give some of the bedrooms the same treatment as well.

LUXEBERRY WHITE ENAMEL

Whitest White Stays White

LIQUID GRANITE for FLOORS

Lasting Waterproof Varnish

The Homebuilders too, decided that no matter what style of finish was adopted for the interior trim, Liquid Granite was the ideal floor finish. It is transparent, develops and preserves the grain and color of all woods and makes a lustrous finish that is mar proof, waterproof, wear resisting, and is kept in perfect condition by the occasional use of a floor mop. Homebuilders everywhere can secure finishing information from the nearest Berry Bros. dealer or from our factory.

BERRY BROTHERS

World's Largest Varnish Makers

ESTABLISHED 1858
Factories: Detroit, Mich., Walkerville, Ont.,
San Francisco, Cal.
Branches in principal cities of the world.

For nearly 60 years the above trade mark has been recognized as a guarantee of quality to the varnish buyer.

(156)

MAKE BIG MONEY

New gas-generating Coal-oil lamp. Absolutely safe. Big money saver.

300 Candle Power

Light it and make a sale. Thousands can be sold. Enormous profits on every sale. Big money easy. Low retail price. Attractive terms to agents. Write quick for territory and free trial offer.

THE L. THOMAS MFG. CO.
4124 Rome St. Dayton, Ohio

Giant Heater

Will make a stove of your round-neck lamp, gas jet or mantle burner. Requires no more gas or oil than for light; does not lessen volume of light; simply utilizes waste heat. Heat and light at one cost. Will heat ordinary room comfortably in zero weather. No ashes, no trouble, clean and odorless; mixes the air. Just the thing for sick-room, bath, bedroom; heating water, making tea or coffee, etc.

On Lamp

On Gas Flame

Send for booklet and testimonials.
Price, Carriage (Black Iron) - $1.00 postpaid (Polished Brass, $1.50
Nickel Plated, $2.00

Satisfaction guaranteed or money refunded if returned in 10 days.
THE GIANT HEATER CO., 63 Temple St., Springfield, Mass.

PATENT IDEAS WANTED. Manufacturers want Owen patents. Send for 3 free books; inventions wanted, etc. I get patent or no fee. Manufacturing facilities.
RICHARD B. OWEN, 53 Owen Bldg., Washington, D. C.

WANTED in every town in the United States, an intelligent man or woman, boy or girl to represent The Christian Herald. This is an opportunity to build up a business of your own, which should grow more and more profitable year after year. Address: Agency Dept., THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Bible House, New York City

Hoosier Range

DON'T PAY TWO PRICES

HOOSIER Stoves Ranges Heaters FREE

To try in your own home for 30 days. Show your friends. Freight paid by us. Send it back at our expense if you do not want to keep it. You can buy the best at Actual Factory Prices. Are heavily made, of the highest grade selected material, beautifully finished, with improvements that equal anything ever produced. The Best in the World. Guaranteed for years by a Two Million Dollar Bond. No matter where you live, you can try a HOOSIER in your own home thirty days, without a penny's expense or obligation to you. You can save enough on a single HOOSIER STOVE to buy your winter's fuel. Write or send postal today for Large Free Catalog "and prices" showing large assortment to select from. No Obligations.

HOOSIER STOVE COMPANY
164 State Street, MARION, IND.

Baseburner

Joash Repairs the Temple

International Sunday School Lesson for November 7

II Kings 11:21-12:16

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By REV. F. B. MEYER, D.D.

"God loveth a cheerful giver." II Cor. 9:7

We give cheerfully when we give systematically, i. e., when we regularly set apart a proportion of our income for God's service. No one can lay down a law for another as to what that proportion should be. The patriarchs gave a tenth. Indeed, it has been calculated that the Jews gave in all at least a fifth. But each must decide how much is fit and right. One may give a shilling in £1, another sixpence, another threepence; but there ought to be a definite arrangement with our Lord, to whom belongs all we are and have. When this is fixed, we should procure a bag, or box, or open a separate account at the bank, so that directly we receive any part of our income we shall note it down, or put aside God's portion. Thus we all obey the spirit at least of the apostle's exhortation: "Upon the first day of the week let every one of you lay by him store as God hath prospered him." (I Cor. 16:2.) When, thereafter, we are called upon to give, it will be a happy to administer wisely the Lord's money, and all the remainder will seem sanctified through the dedication of the first fruits. There are no gifts so precious in the eyes of love as those that involve some planning and self-sacrifice; and our Saviour must be glad when we bring him love-tokens, alms in boxes, or the two farthings, which are all our living.

Temple-Building

By Arthur H. Howland

THERE are pleasant and unpleasant facts in the narrative we study this week. The lesson should really include the whole of the twelfth chapter of II Kings and the corresponding chapter in II Chronicles, the twenty-fourth. It is a terrible thing to observe the zealous king Joash turning against Jehovah, against his temple and his prophets, even consenting to the murder of Zechariah, the faithful messenger of God and son of Joash's old friend, protector and savior, the high priest Jehoiada. History presents few records of such complete and ugly perfidy. He was sheltered by the temple, but turns against the temple; he was saved and crowned by Jehoiada, yet kills his son; he was protected and blessed by Jehovah, but repudiates him.

How can this amazing apostasy be accounted for? Of course, no one knows; but some commentators have suggested that Joash went so far away and antagonized so furiously what he had formerly supported because of the unfaithfulness of the priests of God whose aid he once asked in repairing the temple. There is doubtless a great deal that does not appear in the record which would throw light on the question why the priests did not help more vigorously and more efficiently the plans of the young king for repairing the temple, which Athaliah and her wicked companions had "broken up" (II Chron. 24:7). Whatever the trouble was, it had its root in selfishness. Either the priests were merely lazy and did not push the project, or they were downright dishonest and kept for their own use what was meant for the temple repairs.

It is a little difficult to figure out just what money should have gone rightfully to the priests according to the king's proclamation and the ancient law of Moses. Furthermore, the accounts in Kings and Chronicles differ somewhat. The writer of the book of Kings says that the money for the temple repairs was to come from three sources: (a) that from the dedicated things; (b) that paid by "every one that passeth the account," and (c) the free-will offerings for the purpose. Money from the dedicated things means the money brought instead of persons or property vowed to Jehovah. There was an elaborate schedule for the redemption of these dedicated things. If a worshiper vowed a servant, a captive, an animal, or a piece of property to Jehovah, he could arrange to pay a money equivalent to the priest, and this squared the account. This money was paid to the priests directly, and a large portion, if not all of it, went to their personal maintenance. The second class of funds were those paid as a sort of religious poll tax, as described in Ex. 30:13-16. The third class of money was that offered voluntarily for this specific purpose. The various worshipers had their particular priests with whom they dealt in religious matters and to whom they paid the temple moneys.

For one reason or another the scheme failed. Either the people did not pay or the priests did not deliver the funds. Very likely the people realized that most or all of what they gave would find its way to the purses rather than into temple building, so the giving lagged. Just now there is a stir in New York over the reported discovery that at least two of the greatest charity organizations are almost criminally large percentages of "administration expenses." This is one of the most serious problems and handicaps of church and altar work. Outsiders almost always focus the leaders and helpers in such work as taking an unreasonable amount for their own use, and far too often the charge is true.

The sins of greed and grasping, soiled and maimed and defeated the cause of religion from time immemorial. The power of priest and medicine over the simple folk has been enormous. Strange fears are created, dangers described, and from the priest will deliver—for a consideration. So even among the poor the priest and the religious cult grows rich.

Ignatius Loyola realized this dark fact when, in founding the Jesuit order, he prescribed that no moneys should be received by any member of the order for any religious service, although no member of the order, nor those themselves, nor any section of it, should own property. But the Jesuits broke away from this wise provision of their founder and became the richest and most corrupt of the orders of the church.

Just in passing, these facts ought to make those very happy who are doing the work of God without any pay or compensation whatever. Sunday school teachers and officers, church evangelists, women workers, busy laymen who give time and strength to outdoor preaching or other evangelistic or welfare work—these people have a leverage in their influence upon outsiders that they can scarcely estimate. So long as we can possibly say, "He is getting paid for saying or doing that," so long will our words have a peculiar power. We can understand Paul's eagerness to support himself making tents, Tersteeg's to weave, Carey's to make shoes. The church needs to free itself again from the reproach of doing the work for the sake of the gold of men.

But to go back to Joash and Jehoiada. The king finally realized that the work was not being done, and summoned the priests to tell him why. The answer is not recorded. New plans were made. A chest was to be set beside the altar and money asked of the people for the specific purpose of repairing the temple. They gave it swiftly, generously, and the work was undertaken.

The priests consented to the arrangement, and they still kept to their own use their legal allowance of the moneys brought for temple repairs and offerings. The accounts in Kings Chronicles appear to differ on the matter of resupplying the temple with furniture and utensils. Kings says it was not done, Chronicles that it was. I may, however, be thought possible to construe the statement in Kings to mean that since these things were lacking the workmen labored to produce them.

Here there is the bright picture—king, high priest, priests, Levites, people all working together to rebuild the house of God. Are there any happier times than when a group of people who let God get together to do some hard work for his cause? Digging for the foundation of a new church, helping to build the church, helping to paint it, helping to clean it, helping to carpet it, helping to trim it for Christmas or Children's Day—these are bright hours to make pleasant memories for life.

Does your church, your Sunday school, your young people's organization, need rebuilding—rebuilding in doctrine, rebuilding in faith, rebuilding in holiness, rebuilding in zeal? There is something you can do to help.

Then, too, remember the New Testament idea about the temple. "Ye are the temples of the Holy Ghost." The individual soul, the group of souls, this is where God wants to dwell. The Christian view of religion calls for a great temple, no ornate and costly equipment, no large stipends to the workers. To rebuild the people—that is Christianity. To build up souls in holiness and in neighborliness that is the work of Christ. Are we laboring at it?

Our own bodies and minds must be kept in good trim for this work. Here will be a good opportunity to say something interesting about athletics, gymnastics, physical culture. Anything that tends to make the body strong and efficient, the mind clear and vigorous, is a temple-building. We must keep ourselves at our best for God and for the work he has for us to do.

Helpfulness—that is the new great word for society and for the church. A back of the helpfulness, and underneath it, is love—love for the Christ, love for those for whom he died and whom he asks us to help him save and a and cheer.

We are unfaithful, some one whom we might help will go unhelped, and see one who is looking on—king, or stonemason, or newsboy, or boot-black, or train-man, may be switched off the right track and wind up in trouble and sin and doom.

Echoes from the Holy Land

CENTURIES of human effort to defy the destructive hand of time led to the transformation of Oriental cities into almost solid masses of stonework. Foundations were set to bed rock, walls were thickened and braced, ceilings were arched and vaulted and roofs were paved with plates of stone laid in cement. Fifty years ago the city of Jerusalem did not contain a single roof of anything but stone except those of churches roofed with sheets of lead by foreigners. These vaulted roofs gave coolness and permanence, and preserved every drop of rainwater by conduits leading into enormous cisterns, which still stir the wonder of the investigating traveler.

Some of these Oriental dwellings and temples are as near to defying the ravages of time as any human structure can. In every part of the Bible lands—Egypt, Palestine, Syria and the desert, at Karnak, Jerusalem, Baalbec and Palmyra—are ancient structures that will still be standing when cities like New York and Chicago may be heaps of rusty dust. To return to iron and cement as building materials may delay the process of decay, but the climate will always be against us.

When Solomon built the temple about 970 B.C., less than one hundred years Joash found it difficult in arousing the people to add to the repairs of the cracking and crumbling walls and the decaying timbers.

The causes of decay were earthquakes or floods, shocks, which occur every year, the action of frost in districts and elevations where that occurs, the dry rot in the beams which followed the action of the rain or dampness; but, greater than all, the action of roots. I like these lines within sight of the massive foundations of the Crusaders on the island of Rhodes, and can see several fig trees growing from crevices in the ancient walls, the roots of which must in the course of years still other cracks to the decaying ramparts. One of the striking sights of Jerusalem to be seen from any high building, is the piles of debris and accumulated soil on the tops of ancient buildings in which grow grapes-vines and even trees, not to mention flowers and shrubbery and little vegetable gardens.

The traveler who passes through Cairo or Damascus will be struck with the excessive dilapidation of the mosques, synagogues and churches, showing plainly the same germ of neglect still working in the veins of the dwellers in the land.

To keep the roof of St. Peter's at Rome in proper repair is a task that employs a permanent force of workmen, who actually live upon the roofs, and whose families have been there for generations.

Priests in Joash's day needed sharp reminders (as no doubt are needed in our times) to distinguish carefully between their private property and the money of the temple.

All European museums contain specimens of money chests whose size, strength, locks and hinges, like the vaults and safe deposits, speak eloquently in all ages of the difficulties in handling money in connection with fallen human nature.

Do You Know Your Bible?

OUR readers were given a few weeks' grace in getting out the answers to the questions on Romans. They made a very good record, thirty-eight answering all the questions correctly. Correct answers and Honor Roll appear below. The new list of questions, together with correct answers and Honor Roll for the questions on Colossians, will be published next week.

Correct Answers

Half-Year Contest, List 1; Year's Contest, List 6

Epistle to the Romans

(These questions appeared August 18.)

1. (a) Phoebe, Rom. 16:1. (b) Cenchreae, 16:11. (c) Gaius, 16:23.
2. (a) Erastus, 16:23. (b) Tertius, 16:22. (c) Jerusalem, 15:25, 26. (d) To take the contributions raised by the churches of Macedonia and Achaia, 15:25, 26.
3. (a) Their faith, 1:8. (b) obedience, 16:19. (c) It is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth, 1:16.
4. (a) His deeds, 2:6. (b) Their conscience, 2:14, 15. (c) Under sin, 3:9.
5. (a) 3:23, also 3:10 and 5:12. (b) Grace, through the redemption of Jesus, 3:24; (c) By faith, 3:27, 30, 31; (d) It is established, 3:31.
6. (a) Gen. 15:6. (b) He was justified before he was circumcised, 4:11.
7. (a) Peace with God, 5:1. (b) Patience, experience, hope, confidence, love of God shed abroad by the Holy Ghost, Rom. 5:3, 4, 5.
8. (a) Dead to it, 6:2. (b) Crucified with Christ, 6:6; (c) 6:4, 5, 8; 8:10, 11; (d) Gal. 2:20; (e) Holiness and eternal life, Rom. 6:22.
9. (a) Sin, 7:17. (b) Christ, 8:2, 3; (c) The love of God, 8:39.
10. (a) Chapters 9, 10, 11. (b) Chapters 10, 12, 13. (c) By preachers, 10:14, 15; (d) Twelfth chapter; (e) Chapter 14:15.

Honor Roll for List No. 1

H. P. Axtell, Hattie Baldwin, Lidie Baxter, Mrs. John Bissett, Mrs. C. C. Brown, Mrs. Lettie Cobb, Lillian Cox, Dr. H. F. Datesman, Celia H. Deeley, Mrs. Arthur DuBois, Elizabeth Esmond, Mrs. J. A. Ferguson, John A. Freeman, Mary French, Richard Galley, Mrs. A. S. Graham, Mae Granger, Mrs. Emily H. Harrington, Lois L. Hoyt, Mrs. Esther D. Jones, Miss Susan Kilpatrick, Nettie E. Leach, W. E. Light, Miss S. E. Lyle, M. L. MacKenzie, Ethel Maple, Belle Padgham, Sister Lena Rasch, Julia A. Robinson, Mrs. F. H. E. Ross, Ellen Simkin, Mrs. G. L. Snyder, J. E. Taylor, Mrs. F. M. Thompson, Mrs. Edwin D. Ward, Elizabeth Wilson, Maude L. Wood, Mrs. W. H. Woemuth.

A New Mastodon

THE United States National Museum is putting together the bones of a huge skeleton of a mastodon recently secured by the Assistant Curator of fossil mammals, Mr. James W. Gidley. Nearly a year ago a mastodon skull and several other bones were dug up by a steam shovel in the course of constructing a drainage ditch on the farm of H. H. and W. D. Pattison, several miles northwest of Winamac, Ind. These bones were donated to the National Museum. The specimen is believed to be that of a full grown male, although not an old individual, who lived in the Pleistocene age, probably 150,000 years ago. This animal, while it is related to the elephant family, differs in general proportions of the skeleton and through the character of its teeth, which were used in crushing as well as grinding the coarse vegetable food on which it lived. The largest of the teeth measures nearly seven inches in length and is about four inches across, weighing several pounds. Southwestern Institution Bulletin.

The Jeffery Four

STANDARD
SEVEN-PASSENGER
$1035

F.O.B. Kenosha, Wis.

WITHOUT AUXILIARY SEATS
$1000

F.O.B. Kenosha, Wis.

The first automobile of its quality, size and efficiency to sell at a thousand-dollar price.

Body, standard seven-passenger Chesterfield type • Front seats, divided lounge type • Driver's seat, adjustable • Upholstery, deep, real leather • Springs, extra length • Shipping weight, 1750 pounds • Tires, 34x4 Goodyear, all weather tread rear • Motor, Jeffery high-speed high-efficiency • Ignition, Bosch magneto • Starting and lighting system, Bijur electric • Color, light brown with fine gold stripe • Equipment complete • Entire car by Jeffery-built

The Jeffery Sales Co.
F.O.B. Kenosha, Wis.

The Thomas B. Jeffery Company
Main Office and Works • Kenosha, Wisconsin

Illustrated Booklet on request

Does Your Figure Please You?

Your dressmaker can never make a gown look well on you unless you have a good figure and unless you carry it well

I want to make you realize that your figure and health are almost entirely in your own hands, and that by following my simple, hygienic directions in the privacy of your own room that your whole being vibrates health. I have helped 75,000 of the most refined, intellectual women of America to regain health and good figures; and have taught them how to keep well. Why not you? You are busy, but you can devote a few minutes a day, in the privacy of your own room, to following scientific, hygienic principles of health prescribed to your particular needs.

You Can Be So Well

I have reduced the weight of over 32,000 women and increased the weight of as many more. In my work for reduction or building flesh, I strengthen every vital function so that you are full of life and energy.

My work has grown in favor because results are quick, natural and permanent, and because they are scientific and appeal to common sense. Fully one-third of my pupils are sent to me by those who have worked with me.

I wish you could stand with me at my window for a few minutes and, as the women pass, realize with me how many need better figures, better health. They could have them, too, with just a little daily effort which is easy—not as hard as what they are enduring.

The best physicians are my friends—their wives and daughters are my pupils—the medical magazines advertise my work. Someone in your town knows me. Ask your friends about my work. I am at my desk daily from 8 to 5.

No Drugs—No Medicines

I study each woman's case just as a physician studies it, the only difference being that instead of medicine I strengthen and put in place weakened organs by exercises for nerves and muscles controlling them, bringing a good circulation of warm blood to them, which I purify by teaching correct breathing. I relieve such ailments as

Indigestion	Sleeplessness	Catarrh	Suffering in
Constipation	Nervousness	Headaches	Pregnancy
Anaemia	Torpid Liver	Weakness	Rheumatism

I have published an interesting booklet showing how to stand and walk correctly and giving other information of vital interest to women. You are welcome to it. Write for it. It is FREE and I will also tell you about my work. If you are perfectly well and your figure is just what you wish, you may be able to help a dear friend—at least you will help me by your interest in this great movement for greater culture, refinement and beauty in woman. Sit down and write me NOW. Don't wait—you may forget it. I have had a wonderful experience and I should like to tell you about it.

SUSANNA COCROFT, Dept. 18, 624 South Michigan Ave., CHICAGO

Rand, McNally & Co. have just published Miss Cocroft's new book, "Beauty, a Duty." For sale at all booksellers. Beautifully bound. Price 25c.

First Lien Farm Mortgages

5% 6%

A well-known American business man recently left an estate of fifteen million dollars, approximately invested as follows:

- One-third in Municipal Bonds
- One-third in First Lien City Mortgages
- One-third in First Lien Farm Mortgages

His will specifically provides that all Trust Funds are to be invested in similar securities.

The war has not affected securities of this character. His estate shows no losses. His policy is worthy of imitation by conservative investors.

To those who cannot afford to lose principal or interest we offer our First Lien Farm Mortgages in denominations of $200 up to any desired amount and netting from 5% to 6%. Each Mortgage is secured by its individual productive farm, worth at least twice the amount of the Mortgage. Reference: First National Bank of Chicago. Write for list C-2.

George M. Forman & Company
(Established 1885) 11 South La Salle St., CHICAGO

Stocks and Bonds ODD LOTS

Thrifty men and women in all parts of the country are profitably investing their funds by purchasing standard securities listed on the New York Stock Exchange in "odd lots," that is, small amounts under 100 shares.

We will execute your order for any number of shares or bonds from one up, either outright for cash or on partial payment.

Practically 30% of the transactions on the Stock Exchange nowadays are in these small amounts—10—20—35—60 shares, etc.

Free Booklet T-1, "The Odd Lot," gives full particulars. You can diversify your investments by buying a few shares in several companies.

Sheldon, Morgan & Co.
42 Broadway, New York City
Members New York Stock Exchange

SCIENTIFIC SAVING

The direct and the indirect methods of accumulating money are compared in an interesting booklet entitled "What To Do With $20."

Ask for Booklet "A 20"

P. W. Brooks & Co
(Incorporated)

115 BROADWAY, NEW YORK
Albany Philadelphia

THE BEST SECURITY IS EARTH ITSELF

First mortgages on rich Agricultural Lands are safe, and returns are certain. "We're Right On The Ground," and have been since 1883. We personally know the security and the borrower under all of our loans.

6% Farm Mortgages have never caused an investor the loss of a dollar. Don't take chances with your investments. Write now for Booklet "O," and list of offerings.

E. J. LANDER & CO.
Grand Forks, N. D.
Est. 1883
Capital and Surplus, $400,000

New Paper For Investors

"Investment Factors" for every investor or saver, has just made its appearance. To any reader of Christian Herald owning securities or having funds on hand for profitable investment, it will be sent gratis—without obligation of ANY sort. Ask us to put your name on mailing list TODAY.

BOWMAN, COST & COMPANY
Investment Bankers

615 Third National Bank Bldg. ST. LOUIS, MO.

Investment and Insurance Counsel

This department is maintained for the benefit of our regular readers; the service is offered entirely free of cost to them, and all correspondence is strictly personal and confidential, in so far as the identity of the inquirer is concerned. Always enclose letter postage and write name and address plainly, addressing your inquiry to Financial Editor, Christian Herald, Bible House, New York City.

Neither the Christian Herald nor any other publication can guarantee the value of investment securities. We do all we can, however, to make sure of the integrity of our advertisers before admitting them to our columns. Any advice given is an expression of our conclusions, based upon information we believe to be reliable, but we must not be held responsible, should any loss arise from its acceptance.

Answers to Financial Queries

REV. C. P. D. WISCONSIN. You will gain nothing by waiting for lower bond prices. United Light and Railways Company 1st, and Refunding 5 per cent. bonds are regarded as a sound investment. There is little likelihood of a lower price.

MRS. S. C. D., VERMONT. The farm mortgage firm you refer to is regarded as one of the oldest and soundest in the business. There is no better form of conservative investment for a woman than a well-selected Western loan.

MISS M. H., CANADA. Twin City Rapid Transit stock is listed on the New York Stock Exchange, is quoted around 95, but is inactive. Last February the company put the common stock on a 6 per cent. basis. Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe common is a better purchase for you.

L. M. G., NEW JERSEY. You did a wise thing in selling your Standard Motors stock at $16. This was almost the top of the rise. The stock was never in the investment class and it is likely it still would be quoted around $1, where it was a year ago, if the war hadn't given the shares a temporary boost. It is now selling for about $9.

MISS M. A. F., MAINE. La Rose Consolidated stock is quoted on the New York Curb at 50 cents. The par value is $5. Four years ago the stock was selling at $8 a share. Whether the stock will ever partially recover depends on whether the management will find new ore bodies to make up for the present reported exhausted condition of the mine.

REV. G. L. H., WISCONSIN. (1) North and East River Terminal Railway Company of New York ceased business in 1890. (2) Swastika Mountain-Top Mining Company is not known in New York. (3) Telepost stock is far removed from the investment class. The quoted value of Series "A," "B," and "C" is around $1.50 per share.

H. D. A., CONNECTICUT. To have advised a man 77 years of age to invest his modest competency in Cities Service common, Public Light and Power common, Pacific Gas and Electric common, International Silver common and Trap Rock common, all at almost top prices, is, in our opinion, incompetent counsel, and we advise you to change your banker.

MRS. O. J. W., NEW YORK. Argentine government bonds may be considered reasonably sound. The 6s due May, 1920, are quoted at 98 3/4, and yield 6.30 per cent. The Christian Herald has never especially favored foreign government bonds and is disinclined to recommend many such issues for conservative investment. But of all the South American republics Argentina's credit is highest.

C. E. D., TENNESSEE. (1) American Hide and Leather common is far removed from investment rating. The company will have to pay 106 1/4 per cent. back dividends to the preferred shareholders before the common stock shares in profits. (2) Central Leather common received a 3 per cent. dividend in February. An increase is talked of. The stock is not an investment issue, however.

G. M. M., ILLINOIS. (1) Stewart-Warner Speedometer Corporation has two classes of stock: $10,000,000 of common and $1,000,000 of 7 per cent. cumulative preferred, both quoted in the unlisted department of the Chicago Stock Exchange. (2) In January the common stock sold at 48 1/2. (3) The firm you ask about is well regarded in financial circles. (4) Hold your Chesapeake & Ohio.

G. N. D., OHIO. Seattle Electric Company 1st 5s, at 98 1/2, yielding 5.10 per cent., and Cumberland County Power and Light Company 1st 5s, at 95 1/2, yielding 5.30 per cent., are regarded as sound investments. The remainder of your $3,000 might well be invested in five shares of Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railway common, and six shares of Baltimore & Ohio Railroad common. This arrangement will give you an average return on investment of about 5 1/2 per cent.

M. L., NEW JERSEY. (1) Victoria Chief Mining and Smelting Company is "dead," and stock is worthless. The Copper

Handbook refers to the Victoria Chief as one of the meanest swindles ever perpetrated. The shares were sold to innocent investors at prices ranging from seventy-five cents to $.50. It is believed the public contributed nearly a million dollars to this fake. (2) The Alaska Gold Mines Company controls valuable properties, and the company is in experienced hands; but the stock is not recommended for the investment of an "aged man."

H. I. S., ILLINOIS. International Text Book, International Educational Publishing Company, and Coal Land Securities stock issues are today quoted at prices which mean pathetic losses for thousands of investors who were induced to entrust their money to the tender mercies of the Scranton promoters. This department has consistently advised Christian Herald readers against all of T. J. Foster's stock-selling schemes, and you are but one of the many who have been saved from loss. Nevertheless we appreciate your letter. Your decision was most fortunate.

E. P. D., IOWA. While the stability of the public utility industry cannot be denied, there is no doubt that the attention of investors generally has been largely diverted by the craze for "war orders" speculation from the steady improvement in earnings which these companies have shown during the first year of the European war. Many sound mortgage bonds of great public service corporations which are now earning in some cases in excess of four or five times the interest requirements are now selling much below their real value. The firm is probably right. Accept their offer.

E. M. M., RHODE ISLAND. (1) Probably nine out of ten large investors include a certain number of real estate mortgages. This is done with two ends in view: first, the income yield is always liberal—usually 6 per cent. and—second, the mortgage is always of a fixed value, which stabilizes the total investment and reduces the degree of hazard. (2) Southern California Edison Company General Mortgage 5s may be considered an attractive purchase. The bonds are legal investment for the savings banks in your state. The latest quoted price is 97.60, not 96.60 as you state.

MISS M. D. T., WASHINGTON, D. C. (1) Your first $300 might be invested in one each of the following $100 bonds: Denver Gas and Electric Co. 6s at 99. City Light and Traction Co. 5s at 80. Denver Gas and Electric Co. 5s at 92 3/4. (2) The second $300 might be invested in one each of the following $100 issues: Missouri and Southeast Utilities Co. 1st Mortgage 6s at 100. Ohio and West Utilities Co. 1st Lien 6s at 100. Minnesota Gas and Electric Co. 1st 6s at 100.

R. D. L., NEW HAMPSHIRE. (1) We cannot aid our readers in purely speculative matters. No one knows what future prices of stocks will be. (2) Buying stocks on margin is dangerous. Partial payment plan is altogether different, inasmuch as a person buying investment securities through the method of partial payment goes into the transaction wholly as a means of acquiring ownership to good stocks or bonds for permanent investment and income, with no thought of speculative gain, whereas the margin speculator buys stocks with no thought of ever paying outright for his purchases, and is intent wholly upon the profit he may make by a subsequent sale for more than he paid.

M. C. D., NORTH CAROLINA. New York, Westchester and Boston Railway first mortgage 4 1/2s are not what may be considered a conservative investment. But the bonds are guaranteed unconditionally by the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad, and the farther away from foolish receiver-ship talk the latter gets through its rapidly increasing earnings just so much increases the security back of the Westchester bonds. For a business man's investment the Westchester 4 1/2s look attractive. The company is now said to be earning its interest charges and as time goes on will do still better, for more and more of the New Haven's passenger traffic will be diverted to the Westchester, which shortly will have terminal entrance to the Pennsylvania station in Manhattan. A year ago the bonds sold as low as 56. They are now quoted around 75.

Selected Farm Mortgages

Netting 6%

in amounts from $500 to $12,500 ranging between 25 and 40% of the present value of the land alone. The mortgages are secured by operating farms located in thriving and highly productive sections where values are moderate and are steadily advancing.

Ask for Circular No. 892C

Peabody, Houghteling & Co
(Established 1865)

10 So. La Salle Street, - Chicago

DO YOU KNOW that in the course of twenty years a selection of Farm Mortgages will net you larger returns in actual cash than a selection of stocks of equal amount? The few exceptions only prove this rule.

You can't afford to be unlucky with funds on which you are dependent. Certainly not with all of them.

Make Fundamental Investments such as

6% North Dakota Farm Mortgages

Write for descriptive booklet 810

Walter L. Williams
Lisbon North Dakota

Public Utilities Show Gains in Earnings

Bonds at Bargain Prices

Conservative investors, seeking stability and opportunity for future profit, should send for our List H2 in denominations of $100, $500, $1000.

A. H. Bickmore & Co
111 BROADWAY, N.Y.

Chas. S. KIDDER & Co.
INVESTMENT BANKERS Est. 1838

TEST OUR RELIABILITY

by advising with us regarding your investments. We will be glad to render service to Christian Herald readers. We deal in Municipal Bonds, one of the safe forms of investment known, because the principal and interest is secured by a tax on property. Your Savings Bank buys these Bonds.

Write for offerings yielding 5 to 6%

W.C.T.U. Bldg. Chicago

(This page went to press October 13)

Amarilly of Clothes-Line Alley

Continued from page 1078

Phillips, an easy-mannered youth, and supple, with dark, laughing eyes. When they had transacted the business pertaining to the rental of the place, Amarilly arose from her chair with apparent reluctance. This was a pleasant atmosphere, and she was fascinated by the pictures and the general air of the disarrangement which she felt could not account for.

"Tain't exactly the kind of place to live," she reflected, "but it needs cleaning turrible."

"Do you like pictures?" asked the artist, following her gaze. "Stay a while and look at them, if you wish." Amarilly readily availed herself of the permission, and rummaged about the rooms while Derry pursued his work. Upon the completion of her tour of inspection, he noticed a decided look of approval upon her face.

"What is the matter, Miss Jenkins? Ain't the pictures true to life?" he inquired with feigned anxiety.

"The pictures is all right," replied Amarilly, "but—"

"But what?" he urged expectantly. "Your rooms need reddin' up. Thar's a awful lot of dust. Yer things will sp—"

"Oh, dust, you know, to the artistic temperament, is merely a little misplaced matter."

"Tain't only misplaced. It's stuck to the wall," contended Amarilly.

"Dear me! And to think that I was contemplating a studio tea to some people after tomorrow. I suppose it really should be 'red up' again. Honesty, though, I engage a woman to come every week and clean the rooms."

"She's imposed on you," said Amarilly indignantly. "She's swept the dirt out of the mopboards and left it thar, in she hez only jest skimmed over 'em with a dust-cloth. It ain't done thorough."

"And are you quite proficient as a housewife?"

Amarilly looked at him unperturbed. "Kin scrub," she remarked calmly. "stand rebuked. Scrubbing is what I need. If you will come tomorrow morning and put these rooms in order, I'll give you a dollar and your midday meal."

Amarilly, well satisfied with her new offering, closed the bargain instantly.

The next morning at seven o'clock she rang the studio bell. The artist, attired in his bathrobe and rubbing his eyes sleepily, opened the door.

"This was the day I was to clean," retorted Amarilly reprovingly.

"To be sure. But why so early? I thought you were a telegram."

"Early! It's seven o'clock."

"I still claim it's early. I have only been in bed four hours."

"Well, you kin go back to bed. I'll be awfully quiet."

"And I can trust you not to touch any of the pictures or move anything?"

"I'll be keeful," Amarilly assured him. "Jest show me whar to het up the war. I brung the soap and a brush."

The artist lighted a gas stove, and, after carefully donning a long-sleeved apron, Amarilly put the water on and began operations. Her eyes shone with anticipation as she looked at her.

"I'm glad it's so dirty," she remarked. "It's more interestin' to clean a dirty place. Then what you do shows up and you feel you earned your money."

With a laugh the artist returned to his room, whence he emerged three hours later.

"This room is all cleaned," announced Amarilly. "It took me so long 'cause it's so full big and then 'twas so turrible dirty."

"You must have worked like a little train. Now stop a bit while I prepare my breakfast."

"Kin you cook?" asked Amarilly in amazement.

"I can make coffee and poach eggs. Come into my butler's pantry and watch me."

Amarilly followed him into a small apartment and was initiated into the mysteries of electric toasters and percolators.

He tried in vain to induce her to share his meal with him, but she protested.

"I hed my breakfast at five-thirty. I don't eat agin till noon."

"Oh, Miss Jenkins! You have no artistic temperament or you would not cling to ironclad rules."

"My name's Amarilly," she answered shortly. "I ain't old enough to be 'missed' yet."

"I beg your pardon, Amarilly. You seem any age," he replied, sitting down to his breakfast. "You are not too old, then, for me to ask what your age is—in years?"

"I jest got into my teens."

"Thirteen. And I am ten years older. When is your birthday?"

"It's ben. It was the fust of June."

"Why, Amarilly," jumping up and holding out his hand, "we are twins! That is my birthday."

"And you are twenty-three."

"Right you are. That is my age at the present moment. Last night I was far older, and tomorrow, mayhap, I'll be years younger."

"Be you a Christian Science?" she asked doubtfully.

"Lord, no, child! I am an artist. What made you ask that?"

"Cause they don't believe in age. Miss Jupperskin told me about 'em. She's workin' up to it. But I must go back to my work."

"So must I, Amarilly. My model will be here in a few moments to don your surplice. If you want to clean up my breakfast dishes you may do so, and then tackle the bedroom and the rest of the apartment."

To be continued

Christian Herald Prayer League

MRS. T. S. G., Mount Mitchell, N. C., writes: "About six months ago I asked the prayers of the League. It seemed then that my prayer could be answered only in a miraculous way, but it has since been answered." Mrs. H. E. writes from Riviera, Texas: "I asked you several weeks ago to help me pray that a young man in Texas might be saved. I have got the glad news that God has saved him." E. J. N. B.: "My letter of some time ago requesting prayer for the lifting of a heavy burden had scarcely reached you when the burden was lifted. The other trouble has since been removed, and I praise his holy name." Another friend writes: "My heart was burdened with doubts and fears. I asked God for help and strength, yet in my heart was a bitterness. My prayer was not answered until I came to God and asked him to remove the bitterness from my heart and make it right with him. Then he answered my prayer." "Some time ago," writes An Old Subscriber of Cortland, N. Y.: "I asked the League to pray that I might hear from a dear friend from whom I had not heard in a long time. I wish to thank the Lord for answering this prayer and many others." Miss E. M. L., Mansfield, La., writes: "The lost notes and other valuable papers for the recovery of which prayer was requested have been found." M. T. writes from Illinois: "Some time ago I asked prayers for employment and was graciously helped, for which I am more than 'thankful.'" Mrs. C. W. H. writes to acknowledge answer to prayer in a business matter of great importance.

Prayers are asked for revivals of religion at Arcade, N. Y. (that all saloons may be kept out of town); Syracuse, N. Y.; Ipswich, Mass.; Roanoke, Va.; Pell City, Ala.; Middleville, Mich.; Biltmore, N. C.; Sterling, N. D.; Laurel, Md.; Gonzales, Texas; Coeymans, N. Y. (that this town may be voted dry this fall); Kalamazoo, Mich.; Nevada, Mo.; North Long Branch, N. J. E. J. R., Sunnyside, Wash., requests prayer that an evangelist may be sent to preach at the Euclid School House, ten miles from there.

Mrs. A. S. C. asks prayer that son's hearing may be restored; Mrs. W. C., a daughter's; Mrs. M. C. H., a niece's; seven other friends ask prayer for the healing of hearing for themselves or other friends.

A New Way to Learn Music

Easy for Any One. Learn at Home. Special Offer 12½¢ Weekly.

No longer need the ability to play a musical instrument be shut out of your life because of the expense or the inconvenience of going to a teacher—you can learn at home to play the Piano, Organ, Violin, Banjo, Mandolin, Cornet, Cello or Sight Singing. All by note.

Our method has revolutionized old teaching standards. It enables any one to learn to play, and the only cost is the sheet music, averaging about 12½¢ weekly. For a limited time the instruction will be free.

Not an Experiment

Although new, compared with the old-fashioned way, our marvelous method of teaching music is in no sense an experiment.

Over 200,000 students, ranging in age from seven to seventy, have become capable players through its easily understood teachings, which anyone who can read the English language can follow.

How We Can Do It

Teaching music successfully by mail is a positive proved fact.

Thousands who never knew one note from another before taking the lessons have developed into expert musicians—many have themselves become teachers and are earning their living instructing others. The average yearly enrollment for the past few years has been over 25,000 pupils, yet we rarely ever hear of a failure.

Teaching music successfully by mail is just as much an established fact as teaching it in person, and has many great advantages over the old-fashioned way.

As Much Fun as a Game

Learning music our way is a fascinating pleasure instead of a tax. As one pupil writes "It's more like a wonderful game than anything else, and it becomes more interesting every day."

This is because each step is so clearly explained that you experience absolutely no difficulty even at the start.

What Pupils Say:

"Since I've been taking your lessons, I've made over $60.00 with my violin. Your lessons surely are fine."—Melvin Vreeland, Macopin, N. J.

"I finished your course of forty-eight lessons on Cornet. Some time ago I intended writing to let you know how I got along. When I started then I knew nothing about the Cornet or Music, but now I can play almost any piece of music."

—Kasson Swan, Denmark, Col. Co., Nova Scotia.
"I want to extend the heartiest approval of your Piano Course. It has done more for me than years of other lessons. So complete in every way. I certainly can recommend it to others, and will do so." — Mozie N. Lewis, 319 Jefferson, Neosha, Mo.

Address U. S. SCHOOL OF MUSIC, Box 7, 225 Fifth Ave.

Beginners or Advanced Pupils

No matter whether you have never learned to distinguish one note from another or whether you have already studied music, the U. S. Course is meant for you.

We grade you before you start and fit the instruction to your special needs, instead of fitting you to the course. A beginner gets entirely different lessons than one who has formerly studied music.

Don't Judge by the Cost

Don't judge this modern method of teaching music in your own home by its low cost.

If it cost you ten times as much we couldn't give you instruction better suited to your individual needs or more positive of getting results.

Publishing the music used ourselves, we are able to supply it to you at the same price or less than you would pay in your local store. And we are giving the instruction absolutely free for a limited time for advertising purposes as explained in our booklet.

Free Book

"Music Lessons by Mail" is a 24-page book which describes the secret principles of this wonderful system from beginning to end, and contains scores of letters from pupils who have become expert players as a result of the course. We cannot explain this great plan here—you must see the book. It's free. Clip the coupon and mail it to-day before you turn this page and forget. Do it right now—the gift of music is within your grasp.

MAIL THIS COUPON TO-DAY

Name _____
Address _____
City _____ State _____

Mail to U. S. School of Music, Dept. 7, 225 Fifth Ave., New York.

FREE 3-in-1 Oils

Cleans out dirt and grease and lubricates every delicate part so your Sewing Machine works more easily, more smoothly and lasts longer. You do more work, better work, with half the labor. Prevents rust on all metal parts; saves cost of expensive repairs. Generous trial bottle and new booklet free.

3 IN 1 OIL CO.
42CM. B'way.
New York

"DON'T SHOUT"

"I hear you. I can hear now as well as anybody. 'How?' With the MORLEY PHONE. I've a pair in my ears now, but they are invisible. I would not know I had them in, myself, only that I hear all right."

DEAF

is to the ears what glasses are to the eyes. Invisible, comfortable, weightless and harmless. Anyone can adjust it. Over one hundred thousand sold. Write for booklet and testimonials.

THE MORLEY CO., Dept. 754, Perry Bldg., Phila.

MEDETS

Don't throw it away

Mend leaks instantly in all utensils, crockery, a minimum tin, brass, hot water bags, etc. No solder, cement or rivet. Any one can use them. Send for sample box, 10c; large box, all sizes, 25c, postpaid. Agents Wanted. Collette Mfg. Co., Box 302, Amsterdam, N. Y.

$3.25 Special Offer $3.25

Christian Herald	— ($1.50 a year)	} $3.25
Youth's Companion	— ($2.00 a year)
(Remaining issues of 1915 FREE)		} Save 90c
McCall's Magazine	— ($.50 a year)
(including choice of a 15c pattern FREE)		— ($.15 retail)

Address

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York

10 Days Free Trial

Charges Prepaid Send No Money

NEW KEROSENE LIGHT

Beats Electric or Gasoline

TWICE THE LIGHT HALF THE OIL

We don't ask you to pay us a cent until you have used this wonderful modern light in your own home ten days—we even prepay transportation charges. You may return it at our expense if not perfectly satisfied after putting it to every possible test for 10 nights. You can't possibly lose a cent. We want to prove to you that it makes an ordinary oil lamp look like a candle; beats electric, gasoline or acetylene. Lights and is put out like old oil lamp. Tests at 33 leading Universities and Government Bureau of Standards show it common coal oil, and gives more than twice as much light as the best round wick open flame lamps. No odor, smoke or noise, simple, clean, no pressure, won't explode. Several million people already enjoying this powerful, white, steady light, nearest to sunlight. Guaranteed.

Burns 50 Hours on One Gallon

Awarded GOLD MEDAL at World's Exposition San Francisco

$1000 Will Be Given to the person who shows us an oil lamp equal to the new Aladdin (details of offer given in our circular.) Would we dare make such a challenge if there were the slightest doubts as to merits of the Aladdin? We want one user in each locality to whom we can refer customers. Be the first and get our special introductory offer under which you get your own lamp free for showing it to a few neighbors and sending in their orders. Write quick for 10-Day Absolutely Free Trial. Send coupon to nearest office.

MANTLE LAMP COMPANY, 117 Aladdin Bldg.
Largest Kerosene (Coal Oil) Mantle Lamp House in the World
Chicago, New York City, Portland, Ore., Montreal or Winnipeg, Can.

Men Make $50 to $300.00 Per Month With Rigs or Autos
delivering the ALADDIN on our easy trial plan. No previous experience necessary. Practically every farm home and small town home will buy after trying. One farmer who had never sold anything in his life before writes: "I sold 51 lamps the first seven days." Another says: "I disposed of 37 lamps out of 31 calls." Thousands who are earning money endorse the Aladdin just as strongly.

NO MONEY Required
We furnish capital to reliable men to get started. Ask for our distributor's plan, and learn how to make big money in unoccupied territory. Sample sent for 10 days FREE TRIAL.

10-Day FREE TRIAL Coupon
I would like to know more about the Aladdin and your Easy Delivery Plan, under which inexperienced men with rigs make big money without capital. This in no way obligates me.

Name _____
P.O. _____
Address _____

The War in Europe

Continued from page 1079

For the ten days prior to October 16 the autumnal rains have been in full swing in Russia, and as a consequence the campaign has languished to a considerable degree. In the best weather Russian roads are not particularly remarkable for their goodness, and become impassable in bad, while the abutting flat and oftentimes boggy country becomes a vast morass. During the past week all military operations have been halted from this cause along all the northern and central portions of the firing line, from near Riga in the north to near the fortress of Rovno in the south, and the only activity has been in the immediate vicinity of Dunaberg, where there have been attack and counter attack on the northwestern front, with no results of importance. In the center there has been absolutely no activity, and in the south towards Rovno, none either. In Galicia, the Russians in the early part of the week defeated the Austrians to the west and southwest of Tarnopol, and gained considerable ground, but later in the week an Austrian counter attack recovered most of the lost ground.

On the western front the Allies have continued their recently adopted policy of hammering the German lines at the critical fronts, the Artois and the Champagne, and on both these fronts have achieved a reasonable amount of progress, which progress has been particularly important on the Champagne front.

On the Artois front, from Ypres to a little south of Loos, the point recently captured by the British, the British have delivered one after another two sustained attacks. The first earlier in the week gained some ground, but still better fortune attended their efforts in the middle of the week, when several thousand yards of German trenches, north and south of Loos, were captured, as well as a portion of the formidable German field fortification known as the Hohenzollern redoubt. At the end of the week a German counter attack recovered a portion of the captured trenches, but the week ended with the balance decidedly in favor of the British. In this fighting the Canadians particularly distinguished themselves.

The most important advance strategically, however, was made by the French in Champagne, north of Tahure, where their lines were pushed forward over a mile and to within four miles of the German east and west line of communication, the loss of which would force the German retirement not only in Champagne but in the Argonne forest and around Verdun. This fighting was particularly desperate, and the losses on both sides very severe, which is reflected in the fact that few prisoners were taken.

A new campaign has begun, the joint Austro-German and Bulgarian campaign against Serbia, which has as its primary object the forcing of a way through Serbia to the Bulgarian frontier to connect the Central Empires with their new ally, and with the Turks.

On the north, this campaign opened with an Austro-German advance across the Danube and the seizure of Belgrade, the usual capital of Serbia, and of Samandria, the fortress of Serbia's northern border to the east of Belgrade which commands the Mowara valley leading south to Nish, with the railroad. The Serbians are opposing a desperate resistance, but their army is greatly reduced in strength by the three campaigns which it has gone through the past four years and by the epidemic of typhus which raged in Serbia last winter, and it can hardly be expected that it will be able to keep up this resistance for any very long time, particularly as it is also about to be attacked on the east by the Bulgarians and on Serbia's western frontier by another Austro-German invasion, which is being launched across the Dvina river.

The Allies are rushing troops forward from all quarters to Salonica, the Grecian port, connecting with Monastir, in South Serbia, by rail, in the hope of being able to render efficient aid to Serbia in repelling these attacks,

My Husband's Necktie

My husband used to complain continually his neckties. He said they were "no good," were "short"; "pulled out of shape"; and "looked string"; they would not "slide around under the collar"; the "narrow part" was "too long enough"; and "the whole tie" was "too short and never would even" at the ends. I've never broken in half with tried to pull it through collar.

For months I have been investigating, experimenting and working out ways to come every one of these conditions. I have been successful that he says that my ties now far better than he ever had. I know they are much better and that they last four times as long.

You can make ties for your husband, brother, sweetheart that he will brag about. They will be the best Christmas presents you can give.

I will send you complete instructions for making ties. Complete instructions and pattern for Complete instructions, pattern and a commencement (brown, blue, red, grey, green or black) for $1.00. Preference of color. Equivalent to regular $2.00 and $2.50 ties.

BLANCHE ELTON, 21 Columbia Street, Hempstead, Long Island, N.Y.

Thorburn's Bulb Catalogue

Send for your copy. Our bulbs are full size, to name and very beautiful.

We have a really wonderful assortment of 60 of our choice bulbs for $1.00. You may send a dollar bill pinned to our order at our risk.

To those who love flowers and "things," our Bulb Catalogue will be a revelation. Send for it today.

J. M. Thorburn & Co.
555 Broadway, New York, through to L. R. Place, New York.

DON'T Pay Two PRICES HOOSIER Stoves & Ranges FREE

Try in your own home for 30 days. Show your friends. Freight by us. Send it back at our expense if you do not want to keep it. You buy the best at Actual Factory Price. Our new improvements are equal to any ever produced. Save enough on a single stove to buy your wife's fuel. ALL HOOSIER STOVES Guaranteed for Years. Send for our free Catalogue, showing our assortment to select from. No Obligation.

HOOSIER STOVE CO.
164 State St., MARION, IND.

MAGAZINES

J. M. Hanson-Bennett Magazine Agency is the agent in the world. You can save money on the magazine you want by writing for

This Catalog FREE

Our new Catalog lists more than 3000 Periodicals and 1000 Magazines. It's a BIG MONEY SAVER. Write your name and address on post card today and get this big free catalog. Agents Wanted. Write full particulars.

J. M. HANSON-BENNETT Magazine Agency
222 Brooks Building Chicago, Ill.

WOULD YOU

show this standard high speed fully visible typewriter to your friends and let them see wherein it excels all other $100 typewriters. If by doing this you are increasing other small advances, you could easily make a good thing of it. Then you would keep as your own. Then you would say "Mail Particulars."

or letter to us simply say "Mail Particulars."

WOODSTOCK TYPEWRITER CO., Box 1176, Woodstock, Ill.

"How Money Grows"

An invaluable reference booklet of 48 pages for the pocket or office. Tables showing how long it takes a sum of money to DOUBLE at various rates of interest. How money grows when deposited regularly each month with interest compounded semi-annually. Stock yield tables. Three sets of interest tables. Price, 25c.

THE COMPUTING PRESS, SOUTHINGTON, CO.

For 36 years we have been paying our customers the highest returns consistent with conservative methods. First mortgage loans of $200 and up which we can recommend after the most thorough personal investigation. Please ask for Loan List No. 252 Certificates of Deposit also for saving in

PERKINS & CO. Lawrence, Mo.

FACTORY TRAVELING SALESMEN WANTED to sell our Enamel and other Household Ware direct to the factory to retail merchants. Liberal Commissions. Arrangements can be made for weekly drawing accounts. Some territory open. Give references.

United States Steel Ware Co., Pittsburgh, Pa.

TABLE GRACES For DAILY SPECIAL DISCOUNTS and OCCASIONAL SPECIALS. All Will Welcome This New Book of Graces. Postpaid. Paper, Cloth, 50c. M. E. MUNSON, 77 Bible House, New York.

Only Book that Explains Mr. Sunday
279,000 COPIES SOLD

"Billy" Sunday

THE MAN AND HIS MESSAGE
By William T. Ellis, LL.D.
AUTHORIZED BY MR. SUNDAY

Tells the story of Mr. Sunday's eventful life, gives a keen analysis of his manner and methods, and contains the heart of his message, arranged by subjects, including his vivid utterances, his startling epigrams and his homely, Lincoln-like illustrations that add to his tremendously earnest appeals.

Extra Cloth, 496 pp. Illustrated, $1.50
Cheaper Cloth, printed on thinner paper, $1.00

THE JOHN C. WINSTON CO., PHILADELPHIA
PUBLISHERS OF "INTERNATIONAL" SERIES OF BIBLES

BECOME A NURSE

WE have trained thousands of women in their own homes to earn $10 to $25 a week as nurses. Send for "How I Became a Nurse"—248 pages with actual experiences. 48 illustrated lesson pages free. Fourteenth Year.

The Chautauqua School of Nursing
341 Main St., Jamestown, N.Y.

The fact that a painter knows

Zinc

is strong evidence that he is able and willing to give you the best and longest lasting job of painting that can be done.

"Your Move" is ours for the asking

The New Jersey Zinc Company
Room 404, 55 Wall Street, New York

For big contract jobs consult our Research Bureau

IF we have a dissatisfied customer, it's not our fault—it's because he has kept it to himself.

FREE—A Duplex Envelope Opener, for the name and address of your Treasurer and S. S. Superintendent. Saves time, energy and trouble.

ADDRESS DESK—1
DUPLUX
ARCHER G. JONES
RICHMOND, VA.

UNLESS YOU TRY IT, IT'S AN IMITATION

WANTED

In every town in the United States, an intelligent man or woman, boy or girl, to represent The Christian Herald. This is

AN OPPORTUNITY

To build up a business of your own, which should grow more and more profitable year after year. Address

AGENCY DEPARTMENT
The Christian Herald BIBLE HOUSE New York

ACORN UNI-LITE FREE

Turns night into day. 300 candle power. Carry as a lantern; use anywhere as a lamp. Weather proof. For house, barn, garage, camp and around the farm. Write for free offer. Special opportunity to farmers, stockmen and motorists. Agents make big money. Write tonight.

Acorn Brass Mfg. Co., 766 Acorn Bldg., Chicago

Why Hens Stop Laying

E. J. REEFER, the poultry expert, is giving away, FREE, a valuable book explaining how every farm and backyard hen can be made to produce 200 eggs per year. The book contains scientific facts of vital interest to every poultry raiser. Write today for one of the valuable books—FREE.

E. J. Reefer Dept. 2497 Nelson Bldg. Kansas City, Mo.

POULTRY PAPER

44-124 PAGE periodical, up-to-date; tells all you want to know about care and management of poultry for pleasure or profit. Four months for 10 cents.

POULTRY ADVOCATE, Dept. 29, Syracuse, N. Y.

GOOD SALARY earned by any woman, while establishing a Hosiery trade all your own. Work all or part time. No experience. The work is gentle and profitable. Representative needed in your territory. Be first. Write quick. C. C. HOSIERY CO., Norristown, Pa.

WANTED AN IDEA!

THINK OF SOME SIMPLE THING TO PATENT. Protect your idea, they may bring you wealth. Write for "Needed Inventions," and "How to Get Your Patent."

RANDOLPH & CO., Dept. 96, Washington, D. C.

WITH LENS AND SHUTTER IN THE FIELD OF WAR

At the left, British sailors off duty try to forget what lies ahead.

Below, an Austrian shell has imbedded itself in a harmless tree on Galician soil.

Copyright, International Press Exchange
Above, an Arabian patrol swelters through the sunshine of the Sinai Peninsula.

While below, Italian horses plunge gladly into a running stream regardless of the wetting the all-important gun receives.

Copyright, International News Service

At the left hand, is seen a light field railway over which German troops transport supplies by horse power to the front.

Below, English recruits are learning the art of the bayonet, with protections that do not accompany their field equipment. A vast amount of training has been necessary in order to fit new recruits for the field. But instruction in trench digging, and practice in enduring hardship, have been more to the point in preparatory work for the present war than bayonet drills and tactical evolutions.

Copyright, International News Service
An unexploded 42-cm. shell on exhibition.

These English convalescents think there is no use in crying over spilled blood.

To the dispatch bearer obstructions are merely a challenge.

Copyright, International Press Exchange
This is an unexpected use to which a large French laundry is put; but these men have more use for the tubs at present than do their shirts and collars.

Hygienic and Thorough

Quickly
Cleans and Polishes

Cooking Utensils

It's Free
From Caustics
and Acids
Which are Dangerous
In the Kitchen

Christian Herald

SUBSCRIPTION, $1.50 PER ANNUM
PUBLISHED 52 TIMES A YEAR

NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 3, 1915

VOL. 38 NO. 44. PRICE 5 CENTS
OFFICES: BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK

You may have a copy free of charge by sending your name and address with a request for "The Bride's Book" to The Procter & Gamble Co., Dept. 13-K, Cincinnati, Ohio

ELIZABETH HARDING, BRIDE

IF THE girl who catches the bride's bouquet believes in signs she should begin at once to put the finishing touches to her knowledge of housekeeping.

Not the least important thing to know is the possibilities in Ivory Soap. Let her be familiar with the many and varied purposes for which good housekeepers use Ivory and she will have no cleaning problem to puzzle her later.

This information is condensed into a little booklet entitled "Elizabeth Harding, Bride". Whether you expect to be married or already are responsible for the care of a home and family, you will find this booklet interesting and helpful.

IVORY SOAP  99 ⁴⁴/₁₀₀ % PURE

IT FLOATS

Factories at Ivorydale, Ohio; Port Ivory, New York; Kansas City, Kansas; Hamilton, Canada.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

An Illustrated News Weekly for the Home

Forward, for Christ

Rev. Asher Anderson
Secretary National Council

THE Biennial Convention at New Haven, Conn., October 20 to 27, of the National Congregational Council called attention anew to the very evident undercurrent of renewed spiritual life in the churches of America. As each denominational report of the year's work has been given, each body reporting has given testimony to the same thing. There is a deep, sustained and growing spirit of evangelism in the churches this country and in those abroad. Four years ago churches were not gaining as fast as the population. Now they are gaining more than twice as fast, and an awakening life seems even yet to be only the stirring of consciousness. What shall it be when the church has reached the strength of noonday!

The Congregational church has passed through this year of unusual strain without taking a backward step in any line of organized endeavor. Not a missionary has been recalled, though some have been able to return from furlough to their fields; an appropriation has been cut, except such as could have been cut in ease; and new plans have been made and put into execution. It took the courage and more to refuse to trim the sails under the financial stress of a year ago; but the courage and faith have been rewarded, as similar courage and faith on other boards have been, by increased sacrifices on the part of the people of the church. In spite of this sacrifice, however, the increase in receipts was made possible through legacies, the actual total gifts to both Home and Foreign Missions being slightly under that of a year ago.

The receipts of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions for the year were $1,102,330.2, an increase of $20,024.81 over the preceding year; the actual falling off in donations was $31,637.2. The other boards of this body were able to report similar victories over the financial problems of their work. Congregationalism is standing firmly on the ground gained and is pressing forward to later things in the year to come. In foreign fields the church directs the work of 658 missionaries, and contributes to the support of more than 2,000 institutions; in the United States and in Alaska there are 174 missionaries and 2,345 churches under the supervision of the home board.

At the Biennial Convention at Kansas City in 1913 a new statement of faith was approved. This new confession has been adopted during the two years by great many of the churches. It is reproduced on this page. The long-cherished and jealously guarded democracy and independence of the Congregational churches has been a source of strength and also a source of weakness. For a number of years a means has been sought to overcome the weaknesses without sacrificing any of the strength. The search was for some sort of centralization of effort that would not centralize authority. A satisfactory form of organization is being found in local associations, gathered together into state conferences which participate in the National Council. All decisions are taken as the expression of the best thought of the church, but are not mandatory nor of any binding effect upon any individual congregation or association. During the year just past there has been a considerable increase in the number and influence of these associations and conferences, and the church has worked as a unit to a greater degree than it has ever been possible for it to work hitherto. This united effort has had an unmistakable influence upon the increase in the vital spirit of the church and in the definite results of its endeavors.

THROUGHOUT the year the church in the United States has been emphasizing evangelism, pushing the every-member canvass and attempting to standardize the teaching efforts of the churches. Committees from the conferences have gone from association to association urging on churches and boards of deacons and trustees the vital need of efficiency in every channel of church work. The emphasis on evangelism has not been narrowed to special meetings, but has covered the broader field of lay activity and of service to humanity. The every-member canvass has been relied upon to secure the “missionalism” to a degree that would once have been thought impossible. All the churches have not yet come heartily into the full sense of congregational cooperation, as is shown by the fact that of the total accessions for the year of more than 15,500, eighty per cent. of them came through less than twelve per cent. of the churches, and this twelve per cent. is composed of churches under the supervision of the Home Mission Board; a concrete evidence of the value of centralized authority which even Congregationalists are willing to recognize.

Another activity of the church of much promise to the universal kingdom is its action in the problem of the over-churching town. The Methodist, Baptist, Presbyterian and Congregationalist bodies in the West, where this situation is most acute, agreed some time ago upon a program of exchange of fields. The Methodist and Congregationalist churches have made considerable progress, since this agreement, in removing duplication to their mutual advantage. The program is this: Two towns are taken, in both of which both denominations have small churches. In one town the Congregationalists turn over to the Methodists all their property and all their members and all their good will; and in the other town the Methodists make a similar conversion of property and parish. The net result is just as many communicants for both denominations as they had before; but each denomination has one less weak church and one more strong church, while in the two towns there are two efficient churches where there were four struggling ones.

THE Congregational Church is entering with all its energy into the work of the Laymen's Missionary Movement conventions that are to be held this winter. At the recent Chicago convention one delegate in six was a Congregationalist, a representation out of all proportion to the relative size of the denomination, but fairly representative of the new spirit of the church, the undercurrent of spiritual power of greater intensity than has been manifest in years.

On the foreign field the church has faced all the serious problems that are always present in missionary endeavor; and because of its preponderance in the work in Turkey, the Balkans and in Mexico, problems have doubled and been multiplied again. In Mexico the missionaries have largely stuck to their posts, and have been able to render service that can not fail to be repaid manifold when peace once more reigns south of the Rio Grande. In Turkey the missionaries have been able to continue their work only partially and with difficulty. The missionaries have been protected by the influence of Mr. Morgenthau, the American ambassador to Turkey. In Armenia they have had to witness sufferings more intense than any that have ever before fallen to the unhappy lot of that persecuted people; but this very sorrow has given unmeasured opportunity for service and for help. In a time when all exchange has been nearly valueless in Asia, the drafts

Rev. James L. Barton
Foreign Sec. American Board

Anatolia College at Marsovan, Western Turkey. A Christian Lighthouse Upon a Hill in Islam Where Were Enrolled Last Year 205 Greeks, 160 Armenians, 35 Russians and 25 Turks funds in a year when funds could not be expected to come easily; and the means has been adequate to the need. The educational efforts of the church have been standardized by the institution of teachers' training classes, the opening of pastors' eyes to their opportunities as teachers and as teachers of teachers, and the setting of standards with rewards for attainment. Congregationalism has come to mean “con-

Statement of Faith Approved by the National Council in 1913

WE BELIEVE in God the Father, infinite in wisdom, goodness, and love; and in Jesus Christ, his Son, our Lord and Saviour, who for us and our salvation lived and died and rose again and liveth evermore; and in the Holy Spirit, who taketh of the things of Christ and revealeth them to us, renewing, comforting, and inspiring the souls of men. We are united in striving to know the will of God as taught in the Holy Scriptures, and in our purpose to walk in the ways of the Lord, made known or to be made known to us. We hold it to be the mission of the Church of Christ to proclaim the gospel to all mankind, exalting the worship of the one true God, and laboring for the progress of knowledge, the promotion of justice, the reign of peace, and the realization of human brotherhood. Depending, as did our fathers, upon the continued guidance of the Holy Spirit to lead us into all truth, we work and pray for the transformation of the world into the kingdom of God; and we look with faith for the triumph of righteousness and the life everlasting.

Henry Atkinson
Congregational Brotherhood

Rev. Henry A. Stimson
Recording Sec. American Board of the American Board have been made a recognized standard, and the board has handled $240,000 in relief funds for stricken relatives and friends of the Armenians in this country. An Armenian bishop once remarked to Cornelius H. Patton, Corresponding Secretary of the American Board, as he looked out upon the ruins of Adana and recounted the awful events of 1909 in the Cilician Plain: "We are a martyr nation. It may be that the world needs the testimony of our sufferings and faith." The mobilization of the Turkish army took many of the students from the schools and some of the teachers; it took all the crops of the country, and the financial requirements of the government took almost all the money of the people in increased taxes; yet the schools outside actual war areas have succeeded in reaching an enrolment of nearly three-fourths their usual number of students, and there is a very noticeable turning of the people away from Islam.

As an illustration of the strength of some of the Turkish churches—and this is not by any means the largest church in the Central Turkey field—the report of the board refers to the church in Adana, which has a membership of 240, with an average Sabbath attendance throughout the year of 650. In Tarsus, with 154 members, the average attendance upon the Sabbath has been a little over 500. In one of the outstations, with a reported church membership of only 59, the average attendance for the year has been 225.

In India caste is breaking down and the influence of Christian teaching has been made manifest in a very earnest attempt to grade Hinduism up to the Christian level. India is beginning to have a new national consciousness, and she seeks a truly Indian religion. The reincarnation of the soul of Hinduism can only prove the emptiness of the shell; and there is growing evidence that India will soon be ready to welcome a Christianity that is produced in India through Indian lives and by Indian methods.

In China the people are turning to the church of Christ as never before. In Shansi the work of the Congregational mission was cut short by the Boxer rebellion. All the missionaries on the ground were massacred, half the native Christians were put to death and the mission buildings were burned. That was in 1900. Today the restored mission has twice as many native adherents as there were fifteen years ago; and the Chinese authorities are entreating the missionaries to teach the Bible in the government schools, and in some cases to take entire charge of the schools. In other parts of China missionary boards have been asked to take over and run the new schools through which the new régime in China planned to recreate the nation. They have found their Chinese teachers incompetent to meet the task laid out for the government schools. In this request to direct the education of the nation there is both a challenge and an opportunity.

Great and world-wide as is the work of the Foreign Board it is an interesting fact that the Board of Home Missions, in their 415 churches among peoples of alien origin in this country, are today conducting services on Sundays in three more languages than total of those spoken by all the peoples reached by other board. The German language leads all the

AS IN the conventions of the Laymen's Mission Movement, the program of the Biennial Conference at New Haven was founded on prayer. The emphasis of the week's deliberations was put upon the continuation of the efforts which have proven so effective during the past year. The work of the church is to be further systematized in the interests of greater efficiency. The visiting committees will seek to cover all the territory not covered this year, stirring up churches and official bodies to a fuller evangelism and a more complete and intensive canvass of every member, stressing the needs and opportunities of the various boards and the comparative insignificance of the average annual contribution of the individual member. Sunday schools will be urged to give greater attention to teacher training, missionary teaching, graded lessons, and real instruction; and pastors will be shown their great opportunities as teachers, leaders and ministers to the young. The membership of 763,182 will be kept informed this year as never before and a constantly increasing number of laymen will be led into definite service for Christ.

Congregationalism is very much alive—with the spirit of God which has quickened this year every communion; and Congregationalism is going to turn this expanding life into channels of practical service for the Lord and King.

St. Paul's Church, Where the Largest of the Community Meetings Are Held

AMITY Township, Pennsylvania, is historic. It was first settled by the Swedes in 1701. Near by are the homes of some of the ancestors of Lincoln and Daniel Boone. From the beginning of its history the township has been a leader in educational and religious work. The first church in the county was established in this township and the first schools. Today all residents, parents as well as children, are interested in the township's school system and all of them belong to the social center.

The earliest advocate of social center work in Berks County was Prof. E. M.

Rapp, superintendent of schools, who thus defines his views:

"The very center and essence of the rural problem is the necessity of securing the establishment of a new point of view and a wider outlook on the part of the inhabitants. Life to the average farmer is a round of eating, working, sleeping, saving, economizing, skimping along with inconveniences, especially in the home. Drudgery has driven many boys away from the farm. Farmers must think about something besides 'buying land to grow more corn to feed hogs to buy more land and raise more corn to feed more hogs.' Instead, they should plan to train their children to be better farmers, to conduct better farms and to produce on those same farms better farmers."

"The social and industrial revitalization of country life is one of the most hopeful signs of the times, and may check the movement of population from the country to the city, and thus remove one cause of the high cost of living."

THE Amity Social Center is an organized body of boys, girls, men and women of the township. Everybody is eligible. The members have signed the following pledge:

"I hereby promise to support the Amity Social Center; to pay five cents a month toward expenses; and to try to interest friends and neighbors in the different meetings and in the social center as a whole."

The slogans are:
"Getting together is a big thing: community betterment just naturally follows."
"The peculiarity about swapping ideas is that both parties come out ahead."

All meetings are announced by postal card to the members. There are three meeting places: Weavertown, Douglassville and Monocacy. On each card is printed the pledge. From one hundred to three hundred persons have attended every meeting.

A program at one of these meetings consumes several hours. It consists of outdoor folk-dancing; playing of games; a business session; general discussion of educational and other topics by leaders. On one such occasion the following topics were discussed: The New Neighborliness, The Effect of Conservation on the Rural School; School Consolidation and Centralization and the Farm Home. Discussion is followed by a debate on a vital question of the day and by recitations, dialogues, or a playlet.

Since the social center has been organized one school purchased a victrola, a volley-ball outfit and general playground apparatus, valued at $300. Other schools have done almost as well. One school purchased a fifty-dollar lantern and almost weekly shows educational pictures to large audiences.

During the last school vacation, the members of the social center got together and decided to celebrate Old Home Week, and the great feature was a historical pageant in which every school boy and girl in the township took part, and most of the teachers and parent-members of the organization. They twice repeated the pageant which depicted the township's history and progress during two centuries, and realized a profit of more than $600. This is to be used, either for the purchase of an athletic field and playgrounds, or for a social center building.

Amity township is a pioneer in this line of work in Berks county, and the third township in rural Pennsylvania to test out the new principles of community betterment. A great deal of the credit for what is being accomplished is due to the school teachers, who have a keen, personal interest in developing the possibilities of the schools outside of school hours. They take a professional pride in making the school the center of community interests.

Folk-Dances Being Taught in Front of the School

WHEN the county superintendent attended the last social center meeting of the first season, he said:

"I have been a student of social center work for several years and I am convinced that social and industrial revitalization of rural life is necessary. The city problem is congestion, but the rural problem is isolation. Economic betterment must precede better living. The public school is the best rural agency working toward the goal of community betterment. It does not represent any political party nor any church; it stands for the boys and girls. The day is not far distant when the boys will send their boys and girls into the open country to complete their education." H. WINSLOW FEUER

This Teacher Took His Poultry Exhibit into the Classroom

The Whole Countryside, by Taking Part or Looking On, Enters into the Fun and Benefit of the Pageants

Libraries of Early Bible Times

MUCH light has been thrown on the literature of ancient times by the discoveries made by archeologists during the last two decades, especially in Assyria and Babylonia. While these have been largely fragmentary and disconnected, it was inevitable that a scholarly mind, in love with the subject, would some day assemble all the available data in a coherent and logical, if not chronological form, thus placing them at the service of all who are interested in the beginnings of literature. This has been very agreeably and skillfully done in a volume entitled "Biblical Libraries," by Professor Ernest Richardson, published by the Princeton University Press, which gives the history of libraries from 3400 B. C. to the middle of the second century A. D.

That there were libraries nearly 6,000 years ago is not only shown to be a historical fact, but all the indications point to the existence of similar collections at a much earlier period. It could be understood at the outset that the very ancient libraries discussed in Professor Richardson's volume were not collections of books that differed in many respects from the modern conception of a library. Some of those ancient collections were literary only in a comparatively small degree, being merely public documents, official writings or temple records and accounts, and here and there a tablet of real historical value, or containing biographical references, and occasionally dealing with the achievements of some monarch, or disclosing the laws and customs or the religious beliefs of an early age. Thus, Lugash had its tablet collection of 30,000 or more public documents, Sippara 50,000, and Nippur probably about the same number; yet they could in no sense be regarded as libraries, since they had little or no literary character. But the Ashurbanipal (Babylonian) collection, though it does not exceed 20,000, is sufficiently literary to be regarded as a real library.

It is interesting also to know that many of these very ancient libraries were imposingly housed in specially constructed buildings. There were "houses of books," so-called, in the temples and in the schools, and there were crude receptacles, the equivalent of modern shelves or book-cases. There were regularly appointed librarians, too.

Many of the cities mentioned in the early books of the Bible are now known to have had libraries. The vast numbers of tablets unearthed in various parts of Mesopotamia let in a flood of knowledge on life and conditions in Babylonia and in the land of Sumer. Ur and Haran, in Abram's day and even earlier, were religious and literary centers. It is not improbable that future research in these regions may disclose the remains of libraries or tablet collections of even greater antiquity than those already discovered.

There are many points on which the early libraries have yielded information that would have been wholly lost to the world, if recorded in any other less permanent form than that of the clay tablet. They tell us much concerning the earliest educational methods, the systems of banking and accounting and the forms of business correspondence. They had their multiplication tables, too, their genealogies of notable families, their hymns of worship, prayers and incantations, and, as in the case of the Babylonian libraries, accounts of the Creation and the Deluge, which had doubtless been transmitted through successive generations orally or in some other form, before they were ineffaceably fixed on tablets that have defied the "tooth of time."

LIBRARIES which had been flourishing in Egypt long before Abraham's visit (in 1950-1900 B. C.) are now known to have contained religious and medical texts, as well as annals and public records, covering a period, as Mr. Richardson estimates, of possibly 1,000 years. The "Pyramid texts," engraved about 2700 B. C. during the early dynasties, bore witness to the primitive custom of writing on papyrus, and to the existence of collections of religious literature of a period much earlier. The "Palermo Stone" (of about the same date as the "Pyramid texts") is a book of annals and indicates the existence of book collections dating back possibly to 3400 B. C. So far had the dignity and importance of the library, as an authentic record of a nation's history and intellectual progress, come to be recognized, that we find in some of the inscriptions mention made of Seshait "the Goddess (or Lady) of Libraries" (3400 B. C.). The library was called "the hospital of the soul," and the scribes of the hieroglyphics were the "masters of all secrets." Of the records written on leather and papyrus little has been preserved.

Another suggestion worth noting is that Moses, who was "learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians," doubtless had access to the libraries of his day, and that the "book-chests" which the Egyptians made the repositories of their most precious writings may have been the prototype of the "ark" which was to contain the sacred writings of the Jewish nation after the Exodus. That the Israelites themselves had at least one sacred library from the beginning of their existence as an independent nation is evident from several Bible passages referring to documents of great importance, which were "laid up before the Lord," doubtless in the ark. In later years, as the nation grew in power and influence, the "house of books" or "house of rolls" became a prominent feature.

IN the first century A. D., there were in Palestine several different kinds of libraries, viz., the temple libraries, a public central collection of archives in Jerusalem; local libraries of public archives in many cities; synagogue, school and private libraries. These were all in scroll and, in the case of the synagogues at least, were multiplied amazingly. Synagogue rolls were loaned out for purposes of religious and general instruction, and there were many schools at the houses of the scribes. Respect for books was taught, and every child had his own book. The synagogue itself was a sort of higher school, at which law and Jewish history were taught. On the whole, the author concludes, popular education in Palestine in New Testament times might be compared to conditions in New England, "when every family had its Bible and hymn-book and every child its primer and not much else."

The one outstanding revelation in Professor Richardson's instructive volume is that throughout the ancient world, not only in the countries we have mentioned but in many others which he names, libraries were common to an extent which was quite unknown, until recent research established the fact beyond question. What revelations are in store as the result of continuous investigation must be left to conjecture. As he remarks, a high state of organization implies an evolutionary background, and from the character of the earliest libraries thus far discovered the existence of still earlier collections must be inferred. Whether they will be discovered or not is a problem for the archeologists. G. H. S.

Checking Serbia's Plague

By ELON JESSUP,
Member of the Columbia Committee

IN Serbia, in the winter and spring of 1914-15, was written one of the darkest pages in the history of disease. A Serbian official recently told me in Nish that although the government was reticent about the quotation of any figures upon the subject, an estimate of 500,000 deaths from various epidemics was not an exaggeration.

Death was on a rampage. Victims died in the streets; died in doorways. Three hundred deaths a day was the total in one city. In Nish, the numerous hospitals could not begin to accommodate the sufferers, and a large public square, nearly knee-deep in mud, was used as a hospital camp. Physicians were so over-worked that it was impossible to give patients the proper amount of attention; a not unusual assignment was 1,500 patients to one doctor.

Such were the conditions which Dr. Richard P. Strong, director of the American Sanitary Commission, encountered when he and his party arrived in Serbia in the latter part of April.

Dr. Strong's first official act was to bring about the formation of an international health board, composed of the members of the various foreign missions in Sofia, and Serbian officials, this board assuming control of sanitary affairs throughout the country.

In the early stages of the sanitary work special attention was given to bathing and sterilization. Among the various methods employed was that of using a train of four cars which traveled from station to station. One car contained a number of shower baths; another a steam room for the sterilization of clothes. Large bodies of troops were bathed with remarkable facility; often more than 2,000 a day.

The actual working methods of an American sanitary delegation of ten men (five physicians and five sanitary engineers) was about as follows: Upon entering a town the physicians proceeded to fumigate private houses as well as all hospitals, barracks, prisons and hotels. If an Austrian prison camp was located in the town, all prisoners were turned out and the quarters thoroughly fumigated, the prisoners at the same time being bathed and vaccinated. A temporary clinic was early established in some central location, where the civil population could come for advice and medicine, and where also much vaccinating was done.

The prefect of the town was talked to on sanitation and the value of preventive measures, and he was urged to continue the work of instruction, emphasis being laid upon the necessity of a show of authority at times. That such methods have proved of ultimate value is evidenced by the fact that the voluntary purchase of fumigating sulphur in towns visited by the sanitary commission is now not unusual.

While the doctors were busy at their tasks, the sanitary engineers investigated all wells, and usually discovered a great number polluted, sewerage conditions being frightful. They immediately began driving new wells, a pipe four inches in diameter being used, pure water being located at a depth of thirty-five feet. Emphatic instructions were given the community on the necessity of using the water drawn from the new wells and no other, and as a precautionary measure the engineers sealed up the old wells with cement.

Strangers in a Strange Land

The scope of the work done and the real results attained are alike remarkable. Today typhus and cholera have been almost exterminated, and the cases of typhoid are few. Dr. Strong, shortly before he left Serbia, declared that conditions were as good as could be wished for. He did not believe that typhus would return. At any rate, no big epidemic was feared.

A City of Beggars

ANOTHER form of misery was met with by our Columbia University party as we made our way to Serbia.

Shortly after Turkey's entrance into the war, Greece was confronted with an unforeseen problem, one which she has made creditable attempts to solve but with rather indifferent success. Large numbers of Greeks, Smyrnians, Armenians, Christian Turks—in fact members of nearly all races not actively engaged in the war but living in Turkey and Asia Minor—found continued existence under the new conditions intolerable. With only the clothes upon their backs, they fled from their homes and flocked into Greek Macedonia. They traveled on mule-back, on foot and in small boats. Of the fate of their properties and personal belongings they knew nothing and still know nothing. Their lives had been spared—that is all. They wandered on, living upon the hospitality of the people of Greece, many finding means of obtaining a living in the isolated country districts. As it turned out, these were the more fortunate. A great number estimates run between 15,000 and 20,000—could not resist the call of the city, and kept on with Salonica as the goal. Once within its portals all would be well, they felt.

Salonica is a city of extremes—the rich are very comfortable; the poor are very miserable. That the refugees should not have appreciated this fact is unfortunate. They arrived in all their poverty and they experienced all that the indifference of a city implies. Salonica became a city of beggars. But people could not be allowed to starve—at least not upon so large a scale—and fortunately the Greek government arose to its responsibilities. Five miles from the city were about fifty small brick buildings which had just been finished and were about to be used as barracks. Although crude in construction, they were clean and provided shelter. With the addition of tents, housing facilities for about 10,000 refugees were thus procured, the distribution being twelve families to a building, the amount of space allowed each individual family being about ten square feet.

In such manner are 10,000 refugees of various races living upon the hospitality of the Greek government. Our escort pointed with pride—and with reason—at the evidences of the care that had been taken for the physical welfare of these people. But we saw something which he could not seem to thoroughly appreciate: the deadly effect of enforced idleness; the tragic hopelessness of a people that had lost their all and now had little or nothing to occupy their hands or minds.

A Week in the World's News

WAR MADNESS. Miss Edith Cavell, an English nurse who had been active in hospital work in Brussels, and through over-zeal for her country was also active in an organized plot to aid English, French and Belgian soldiers to escape from Belgium, was court-martialed by the German military authorities, found guilty upon her own frank confession, sentenced to death in accordance with military law, and in the night of October 10-11 was executed. History will pronounce the German military governor of Belgium, General von Bissing, a madman for permitting this deed. The American minister at Brussels, Brand Whitlock, and also the Spanish minister, used their utmost powers of persuasion to prevent the execution, but were kept in the dark as to the true situation until too late for human help. The course of the authorities in Brussels has aroused intense indignation and, in England, fury. The American minister reported the affair in full to Ambassador Page at London, so there can be no doubt as to the facts. It is asserted that Bissing acted with haste, lest the Kaiser interfere and pardon the Englishwoman, a fear which seems well founded, inasmuch as William did promptly pardon two other women and seven men who were sentenced to death when Miss Cavell was, the announcement being made the day after the execution. Press reports indicate that no opportunity was given the German Emperor to extend clemency in her case. Technically, the acts of Miss Cavell were punishable by death under military rules, but being a woman, exile or imprisonment would surely have sufficed, and the German government will undoubtedly feel the wave of horror that swept through the capitals of the world and will, it is to be hoped, visit a just and sufficient rebuke upon the inglorious military court of Brussels.

SPACE ANNIHILATED AT LAST. On October 21 the American Telephone and Telegraph Company announced that during the preceding ten days experiments in wireless telephony had resulted in the human voice being heard from Arlington, Va., in Paris and Honolulu at the same time. This was more than was intended, as the message was spoken toward Paris only, 3,800 miles distant. Engineers of the company had taken up positions at the Eiffel Tower to observe the results of the efforts. French government officers were also present. Assurances that the several different messages were distinctly heard were cabled to the company; and from the company's temporary station at Pearl Harbor, Honolulu, came word by cable that the entire conversations had been heard there simultaneously. Chief Engineer John J. Carty conducted the epochal experiments, and H. E. Shreeve and A. M. Curtis of his staff recorded the results in Paris.

PLACES BLAME ON ARMENIANS. At the same time that news despatches declare that of 1,200,000 Armenian inhabitants of Turkey only 200,000 remain, the Turkish Government, through its Embassy at Washington, prefers a countercharge against the Armenians, alleging that the latter brought their fate upon themselves by joining with Russian troops in attacking Moslems, committing outrages of the same nature as those charged against the Turks. Turkey is entitled to be heard in her own defense, but whether she is entitled to be believed is another matter. Possibly the truth may be that the Armenians gave the Turks a much-desired opportunity to let loose their ancient hatred and pent-up ferocity, and the Turks made the most of it. Whatever the facts, the extermination of a whole people, among whom were thousands upon thousands of helpless women and children, aged men, invalids, and unoffending men and boys, cannot be excused on the ground of self-defense.

The Biggest United States Submarine, the M-1

USING OUR NATIONAL PLAY-GROUNDS. Official reports to the Department of the Interior show that the year 1915 has been marked by an unusual increase in the number of visitors to the national parks. In the case of the Yellowstone, Yosemite, and

Mount Rainier, the increase exceeded one hundred per cent. The total number of visitors to all the parks in 1914 was 80,601, and in 1915 189,734, which includes 30,000 people who visited the new Rocky Mountain National Park in Colorado, not open in 1914. Beginning in August, automobiles, which had until then been excluded from the parks, were admitted and were operated under a very carefully worked-out schedule. During the remainder of the season 958 cars, carrying 3,513 people, entered the Yellowstone.

BIG SUBMARINE FLEET BEGUN. Contracts for sixteen submarines and six destroyers, authorized by the 1915 naval appropriation, have been awarded. Three private concerns will build fourteen of the submersibles, the Portsmouth and the Puget Sound navy yards the other two; and three other private concerns will build four of the destroyers, Mare Island and Norfolk navy

Copyright, International Film Service, Inc.

A Great Recruiting Rally in London yards, two. The contracts total $13,500,000, of which sum $11,095,000, goes to the private builders. Delivery is to be made within eighteen or twenty months. This is the largest number of such craft ordered at one time by the government.

PRAYER FOR YOUNG MEN. The call to prayer has been sounded by the Young Men's Christian Associations of the United States and Canada. During the week beginning Sunday, November 14, all Christian and especially men, are asked to become co-workers in prayer for the Associations in their world-wide work. Prayer is asked for the evangelistic mission of the Association, for the Association in its relation to the Christian Church, for Divine help to meet the pressing problems of the day, for the raising of leaders and workers, for the work among young men in non-Christian lands, for the Association men at work among the millions of men under arms, and for the preservation of the international bonds among the Associations of the world in the midst of the present strife.

YANKEEFYING THE CHINESE. In response to a petition from the business interests of China, President Yuan Shi Kai has created a commercial and industrial commission, and has appointed as one of the commissioners an American, Mr. Roy S. Anderson, formerly of the Standard Oil Company. The commission will educate Chinese merchants in modern business methods, will foster commerce, and will develop native industries.

SPREADING THE WORD. The annual report of the New York Bible Society, made public on October 19, shows that this local society has distributed during the year 31,332 volumes of the Scriptures. The books distributed represented forty-seven languages and some were printed in raised type for the blind; 31,181 volumes were given to immigrants at Ellis Island, and 15,702 volumes were given to seamen on vessels in the harbor; the society supplied Bibles to one hundred and forty institutions, including homes, hospitals and prisons.

BUSINESS SLOWLY GAINING. The report of the New York State Industrial Commission for the month of September, just available, shows a steady improvement over the record of 1914 in nearly all industries. The greatest improvement is in the metal trades and in the fur and leather-working industries. In woodworking, in pottery, glassware, optical trades, textiles, printing and paper-working, slight gains are recorded. Food and beverages showed no change, while tobacco lost a little.

A DAY FOR TEMPERANCE. Sunday, November 14, has been set apart by all organizations interested, as World's Temperance Sunday. Pastors are asked to preach a temperance sermon on this day. The Sunday school lesson for the day is a temperance lesson, and all people interested in practical righteousness are asked to add what they can to the successful observance of the day.

The War in Europe

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

European journalist of many years' standing; military critic; staff writer of the Paris Daily Mail and Le Temps; contributor to l'Indépendance Belge

EVENTS in the Balkans have for the last week (October 15-22) continued to be the center of attention. Greece has not changed her attitude of neutrality up to the present time, though the diplomats of both sets of combatants are bending their efforts to induce her to declare for one side or the other. Great Britain has offered Greece the island of Cyprus, one of the largest and most important islands of the Mediterranean, with a considerable Greek population and of some commercial and economic importance; but this offer, it is said, has been refused by the Greek government.

In the meantime the Allies continue to land troops at Salonica, but the reports that these troops have advanced any great distance from that point inland must be received with some caution, as it hardly seems probable that these troops would so advance on Greek soil until the attitude of Greece is finally determined, because to do so would expose them to attack from the rear by superior forces in the event that any combination of circumstances turned Greece's present attitude toward the Allies into one of hostility.

Rumania, the other Balkan factor of undecided position, remained completely quiet, as far as we know, during the week, and there is nothing indicative of which side she will finally be found on. It is very hard to see how both these countries, Greece and Rumania, can ultimately avoid entering the war.

Italy declared war on Bulgaria during the week, but otherwise appears as yet to have reached no decision as to how far, if at all, her direct intervention in the Balkan situation will go, either with troops or with ships. It is a very curious fact that though Italy declared war on Austria months ago, and in the past week on Bulgaria, she still is not at war with Germany. If, therefore, Italy sends troops to Serbia, these troops will come necessarily into collision with troops of a power with whom Italy is not at war, unless she declares war in the meantime. The relations of Italy and Germany are one of the standing mysteries of this war.

The Serbian campaign is not going very well for the Serbians. The Austro-German forces in the north have crossed the Danube not only on the Belgrade front but at two other points, near the northeastern end of the frontier and the celebrated iron gates of the Danube, and at the head of the Morava valley. West of Belgrade, the Save, a tributary of the Danube, which forms the northwestern boundary between Serbia and Austria from the point where the Danube turns and begins to run north, has been crossed at Sabatz. The invasion through Orsova is moving southward on Brsa Palanka, where it will probably form a junction with a Bulgarian army now at Negotin.

The invasion from Semendria has captured the town of Posaravetz to the east, is moving southward on a front extending from side to side of the Morava valley, and has reached approximately Parodin, some twenty-five miles from the Danube.

The forces which captured Belgrade have spread to the south and southeast of that city, but are principally moving along the railroad running southward from Belgrade, Alaska thereon having been reached by the advance guards.

After crossing the Save, the Austrians took the town of Sabatz and appear to be advancing on Verna to the southeast. There is also considerable skirmishing going on on the Drina river, which forms the boundary between Serbia and Bosnia.

In the fighting on all these fronts the Serbians have been defending themselves desperately, but necessarily have not been able to stay the Austro-German advance, the latter complaining at women and children are taking an active part in the defense.

While Serbia is thus in hard case in the north, the Bulgarians have inflicted severe blows on them in the east. The Bulgarian force has already been referred to as operating in the vicinity of Negotin, in the northeast corner of Serbia. Another has seized and controls the Timok river, which forms the main artery of communication between Serbia and Rumania, and along which supplies have been shipped in.

Continued on page 1111

NEW JERSEY FAILS SUFFRAGISTS. Victory almost confidently expected at the special election held in New Jersey October 19 on the proposed constitutional amendment giving the suffrage to women was lost by the discouragingly heavy margin of 55,000 votes. The campaign had been conducted with determination, and practically every city and town for weeks had been haled on street corners and in every available place. One of the biggest pieces of encouragement came in the form of the President's announcement that he would vote for the amendment which he did, and a stinging encouragement was met in the statement by the President's fiancée, Mrs. Norman Thayer, that she was opposed to giving women the vote. The Women's Political Union and the Woman Suffrage Association directed the fight, and fired it in a whirlwind of appeal and enthusiasm. The women encountered the hostility of party machines as well as the opposition of a strong anti-suffrage organization, but nevertheless entertained real hope of success. Pulpits were opened to oratory in their behalf, and the men of the state appeared to be discussing the question with, on the whole, a favorable bias. The returns, however, checked but one friendly county, Ocean, which on 2,052 votes gave the women a majority of 0. The total vote of the state for the amendment was reported on October 20 as 13,34, and against it 190,885, with 169 districts missing. Although this rejection of the cause and of another proposed amendment makes it impossible for equal suffrage to come an issue again in New Jersey within five years, the leaders have already announced the decision to keep up the fight. They expressed the opinion that New Jersey's lack of manly will incite New York, Massachusetts and Pennsylvania to an exactly opposite course on November 2. By the time this issue of the Christian Herald reaches our readers, these states will have recorded their mind on the subject.

ELA NOW A REBEL. On October 19 the governments of the United States, Brazil, Chile, Argentina, Bolivia, Uruguay, Guatemala, Colombia and Nicaragua formally recognized General Venustiano Carranza as the executive of Mexico, and in the case of the United States announcement was made of intention to appoint an ambassador, which he, it is said, Henry Prather Fletcher, present American ambassador to Chile. This governmental function of recognition is so far necessary that the exact manner of performing it will be of interest, and the following letter tells the tale:

Washington, D. C., October 19, 1915.
 Mr. Arredondo, Esq.
 DEAR MR. ARREDONDO: It is my pleasure to inform you that the President of the United States takes this opportunity of extending recognition to the de facto government of Mexico, of which General Venustiano Carranza is the Chief Executive.
 The Government of the United States will be pleased to receive formally in Washington a diplomatic representative of the de facto government as soon as it shall please General Carranza to designate and appoint such representative, and, reciprocally, the Government of the United States will accredit to the de facto government a diplomatic representative as soon as the President has had opportunity to designate such representative. I should appreciate it if you could find it possible to communicate this information to General Carranza at your earliest convenience. Very sincerely yours,
 ROBERT LANSING, Secretary of State.

Implicitly following the recognition of the de facto government in Mexico, President Wilson placed an embargo on the shipment of arms and ammunition into Mexico to opponents of the Carranza government, thereby establishing the status of Villa, the former ally of Carranza, and of all other revolutionary forces, as rebels. With an early appointment of Carranza of a cabinet the new government of Mexico will be in operation.

THE DISPERSED AMONG ALL NATIONS. A representative of the Hebrew Shering and Immigrant Aid Society of America, Isidore Hershfield, has been sent abroad to search Europe for members of Jewish families who have relatives in this country and who have been scattered by the war with no chance to communicate with friends. The society states that thousands of Jewish homes have been broken up in Russia and Galicia, and that fully 1,500,000 Jews have been driven from their homes to find new homes where they may. The undertaking to locate Jews who have American relatives is enormous, and the State Department at Washington is said to be lending aid it can through consular agents. Mr. Hershfield expects also to study the conditions of Jews in European countries and to discourage the emigration to America of those who are manifestly ineligible.

SENCE AIDS INDUSTRY. In the past week two announcements of great interest to the industry were made. From Detroit came the statement that after a long series of experiments one of the great automobile companies had effected a practicable process of producing any iron and malleable castings direct from the ores in one heating. This process will greatly reduce the cost of iron castings and it is claimed that it produces more uniform results than could be obtained by first making pig iron and then remelting it. The other announcement came from the U. S. Department of the Interior and was of great interest both to agriculture and to advocates of national defense. Chemists of the Department have been experimenting with a mineral known as alunite, found in a large vein in central Utah. Alunite is a sulphate of aluminum and potassium and when subjected to a simple process of heating, solution, filtering and evaporation, potassium sulphate, the potash of commerce, is obtained. Potash is indispensable in the manufacture of war munitions and it is an essential soil food. Growing crops exhaust the potash in the soil and it must be replaced. The discovery of alunite and the perfection of a process that will produce potash in commercial quantities are therefore items of first importance, inasmuch as Germany, who has formerly supplied the world, is cut off from commercial inter-

Venustiano Carranza
 Now Mexico's Chief

Sir Edward Carson
 Who Leaves British Cabinet

operative institution which shall be more directly under the management of the planters, with full liberty of action, free from political interference and with a minimum of governmental supervision, although the state government will continue to assist with advice and in more material ways in order to attain the objects of the institution, these being mainly the elimination of Mexican speculators, who have heretofore brought about unreasonable fluctuations in the price of sisal fiber with tremendous profit to themselves and to the great detriment of the planters. The conditions under which sisal is produced in Yucatan—sisal is an essential in most of the binder twine used in the United States—are said to be of the worst class of human slavery. The course Alunite is also found in Colorado, Nevada, California and Arizona, and the agents of the department are searching for new deposits.

Although the Leaders of the Movement Used Every Up-to-Date Method They Failed to Get the New Jersey Voters

MORE BANANA ATROCITIES. Because the New York City health department condemned them as spoiled, 20,000,000 bananas were taken out to sea and given away to all the boy fishes in the vicinity, on October 18. Just a few more such items in the press, and there won't be a banana left at a respectable price.

YOKING UP THE FORCE OF GRAVITY. A power permit has been recently granted by the Federal Government for a hydro-electric plant on Big Creek in the Kalispell land district of Montana. The plant will use the water power to generate electricity for municipal and private use in the town of Polson, and will furnish power for the Polson water works.

A COINCIDENCE OF MEXICAN PACIFICATION. Scarcely had the recognition of the Carranza government in Mexico been announced than it was made known "by a Mexican committee identified with the new powers in control in Mexico from 64 Wall supreme powers given to the planters in the above arrangement would hardly tend to the mitigation of such conditions.

"METHODISM'S RIGHT ARM OF POWER." This is what the Northwestern Christian Advocate calls the Sunday school, and justifies the title by showing that since 1908 the membership in the Sunday schools of that body has increased by more than 1,200,000, a gain four times as great as that of the eight years preceding, and more than one-third as great as the entire growth in the century and a quarter preceding. During this last eight years 1,400,000 scholars have been converted to Christ, and more than five million dollars have been contributed by the Sunday schools to the missionary and benevolent work of the church, says the Northwestern, and goes on to predict a Methodist Sunday school enrollment at the close of 1915 of four and one-half millions.

A MODEST WAR BORROWER. The piffling sum of $25,000,000 has been loaned to Italy by American bankers on one-year notes of $100, $500, and $1,000 denominations at six per cent, to cover purchases of war munitions and other commodities. This is Italy's first war loan here, and the transaction is regarded as a part of the wider credit arrangements which the Allied nations have established in the United States.

MISS ADDAMS WAS WRONG: SOLDIERS ARE NOT MADE DRUNK. Mrs. Harriet Stanton Blatch, noted suffrage leader, just returned from England, is authority for the statement that Miss Jane Addams was mistaken about soldiers being made drunk before battle. "Whisky and other stimulants are given to the soldiers to prepare them for the fight in the same way that stimulants are given to horses before a race," said Mrs. Blatch. "The reason for this is that no sane man wants to be killed, or really wants to fight, so he must be spurred on." It is a pretty picture. Will rum-drinking be taught to American schoolboy reserves along with the bayonet thrusts, et cetera? There is undoubtedly a solid basis of fact for what both these ladies have told us, but fortunately for the credit of the race it may be doubted if it is universally true of the men in the ranks in Europe today.

ROOSEVELT'S ANTITHESES SUGGESTS A WORN-OUT CUSTOM. The old and once popular idea of letting the whole people have a voice in matters that affect every one was revived by William Jennings Bryan in an address in New York recently, to the amusement of our preparedness leaders. He proposed as an amendment to his own peace treaties with foreign countries—which stipulate that a year of inquiry must elapse before either party to the treaty takes warlike steps upon a disputed question—that if at the end of the year the only seeming solution is the test of arms the question of war or peace shall be voted on by the whole people, women included. Obsolete as is the notion it does still smack of true democracy and sane government of the people, by the people, for the people.

APPRECIATE OUR APPLES. October 17 a South American steamer sailed from New York carrying 60,000 boxes of American fruit, including 45,000 boxes of American apples and 15,000 boxes of pears; 2,000 tons in all. The apples are said to sell for ten cents each in South American cities.

WITH OUR COMPLIMENTS TO THE CANADIAN NORTHERN. A passenger train just eight feet short of a quarter of a mile in length and weighing 1,200 tons exclusive of the 200 persons aboard, made the first trip over the new link in the Canadian Northern Railroad system October 18, crossing the Rocky mountains through the Yellowstone Pass on the way to the coast, the longest and heaviest train that ever passed through the Rockies, it is declared. The passengers included eighty members of the Canadian Parliament. The train was drawn by a single ordinary passenger engine at an average speed of forty miles an hour.

PLANET RETURNS AFTER THIRTY-SIX YEARS. The planet recently "discovered" by Professor Sola of Spain is, in fact, scientists now assert, a missing member of the family named "93 Ambrosii," of whose whereabouts astronomers have been ignorant for nearly forty years. It is good to feel that the wanderer has come back within eyeshot, though too bad to spoil the glory of a new celestial discovery.

THE SULTAN BELIEVES IN ABSENT TREATMENT. The Turkish Government has refused to permit the American Red Cross or doctors and nurses of other countries to enter Turkey to go to the relief of the Armenian people who are under persecution, and has so informed our State Department.

THE PRESIDENT'S OFFICE. Ex-President Taft, in a series of lectures on the Presidency, at Columbia University, has suggested several changes in the powers of the President and of his cabinet. Mr. Taft would restrict the appointing power of the President to the members of the cabinet and a single political assistant secretary in each department. He believes that this would mean more efficient service at a lower cost, especially in the post office; and that continuity in service under a system of civil service would greatly strengthen our foreign service. Mr. Taft would also make our cabinet officers a more integral part of the government and would give them the right to go upon the floor of either house of Congress to introduce measures, advocate their passage, answer questions and enter into debate, without the right to vote. This would give the President direct initiative in Congress. In making this suggestion Mr. Taft is no doubt considering his own experience rather than that of his successor.

Your Christian Herald Late?

WE believe that all cause for delay in mailing the Christian Herald—due to an important change in our printing arrangements—has been removed. We regret more than we can possibly say that there has been any interruption in the regular receipt of the Christian Herald, and we shall be grateful if every reader who receives this number or any future number late, will promptly notify us, giving exact date of issue and of receipt.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is published weekly by The Christian Herald at the Bible House, Fourth Avenue, 40, 42 and 44 Sts., New York City. The Herald is owned by the Christian Herald Association, Bible House, N. Y. City, 42 St., H. Schramm, Vice-President, Bible House, N. Y. City, Executive Editors, Secretary, Bible House, N. Y. City.

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE $10.00 a year in advance. Remittance should be made in full to the publishers. Make checks and money orders payable to the Christian Herald.

FOREIGN POSTAGE—For copies sent to the United States, Canada and Mexico, add one dollar a year to subscription price.

CHANGE OF DATE—It takes at least two weeks to change the date, after your subscription is renewed.

TERMINATION OF SUBSCRIPTION—The date on the wrapper indicates when your subscription ends.

CHANGE OF ADDRESS—It requires three weeks time to make the change. Give both old and new address.

LETTERS should be addressed, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

Entered as Second-Class Matter, October 1, 1902, Post Office at New York, N. Y., under No. 100,000. Accepted for mailing at special rate of postage provided for in Act of October 3, 1917, authorized on July 1, 1918.

"Imitators of God"

A SERMON BY THE REV. J. H. JOWETT, M. A.*

TEXT: Eph. 5:1, R. V., "Be ye therefore imitators of God, as beloved children."

WHERE shall we begin our exposition of these words? Where shall we place the emphasis? Everything depends upon our point of view. We may look at it in one way, and the injunction will become to us a counsel of despair. We may look at it in another way, and it will appear as an evangel of radiant and alluring hope. Let us read the passage again, and I will turn out two of the lamps, and let us mark our dark impoverishment. "Be ye imitators of God as devoted servants." The light and music have disappeared from the counsel!

The word "servant" is suggestive of circumference and externality. The word "child" is laden with the significance of home. Servant implies obedience; it moves in the region of commandment; child implies kinship, fellowship, ample privilege and joyful freedom. Servant suggests life which is restrained and confined, dwelling only in a section of the house. Child is of the widest significance, and denotes "the run of the house." Surely we must place the emphasis here. We must not begin with the word "imitators," or the ideal may paralyze us. We must begin with the word "children," and imitation will appear as the natural and inevitable fruit. "Be ye imitators . . . as children." That is the status of the Christian. We are the Father's very own; his house is our home.

BUT the apostle now adds a richer glory. We are not only children, we are children "beloved." Even children might be orphaned or ignored, but a Christian is a child with the Father's love forever resting upon the life. Now let us see the meaning of that. Love is no idle sentiment, a transient emotion of a summer's night, a fleeting sensation that comes and goes with a breath. It is the debasement of the great word that these smaller and impoverished meanings are so frequently attached to it. The restoration of the sovereign word love to its rightful ascendancy would do much to illumine many passages in the Sacred Word which are now dim and obscure. If we regard love as a merely luxurious feeling, a kind of passive delight, we can never enter into the secrets of Christian redemption. Love is an energy, a force, a gracious power. The essential characteristic of true love is that it is ever imparting. Love is always giving its best. "Bring forth the best robe." That is ever the speech of the lover concerning the loved.

How true is it of the love of a mother for her child! The mother is continually giving; her life consists in self-impartation. She lives in the giving of thought, feeling, prayer, service. Well, now, with this large and rich significance, let us turn to the counsel of the text. We are not only the children of God, we are beloved by God. From the Eternal Heart there are ever flowing out toward us rivers of affectional thought, tender yearnings, beneficent service. Our spirits are enswathed in the love of God, as our bodies are enveloped by the atmosphere. This energy is mighty and redemptive, ever seeking our salvation. It is a dynamic, the most powerful dynamic in heaven or on earth. It quickens, uplifts, and sanctifies. "Thou hast loved my soul out of the pit."

Pastor of the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, New York.

NOW we can get our atmosphere. We are the "children" of the Father, with the large privileges and enjoyments of "at-homeness" with God. We are "beloved" children, the life of the eternal God flowing out toward us in affectionate goodwill and ministry. "Be ye therefore imitators of God." Why, if we realized and utilized the privileges enfolded in the two words "children" and "beloved," we should not need to be counseled to imitate the Father. Imitation would become inevitable; we could not help it!

Take a little child; let her be set in a home of perfect freedom; enswathe her with a conscious possession of parental love, and what will happen? The ministry of imitation inevitably begins. We speak of our little ones as "perfect little mimics." They mimic our ways, our words, our tones, our accents. In them we find ourselves repeated. One little trait appears, and the father says to the mother, "That's you," or another little feature is produced, and the mother discovers the father repeated. Well, now, this word "mimic" is the literal word that lies behind our English word imitator. In the profoundest and most deeply spiritual sense we are to be mimics of God; we are to catch his ways, his tones, his accents. We are to repeat and reproduce him.

WHAT, then, are the essential factors if beloved children are to be imitators of God? Can we fruitfully analyze the mimicry of a little child? I think we can mention two or three elements which enter into a little child's imitativeness. Before a child can imitate a parent it must observe him. Vigilance is essential. We say of little children that they are "all eyes and ears." They are alert, observant, receptive, ever watching for unveilings. But they are more than observant. They are aspiring. They want to become like that which they see. The child notices its mother's attire, and wishes to wear it. She delights in putting on her mother's gloves, or hat, or ribbon. Ah, but the aspiration proceeds to deeper and more vital ends. They not only wish to imitate in external attire; little eyes can see through the vesture of the body and can perceive the habits and garments of the mind and the soul. What they discover they desire to reproduce. They want to wear our clothes!

But they do not rest contented with the mood of aspiration. They make ceaseless endeavors to repeat us. They are forever trying to be like us! Almost unconsciously they seek to obtain our likeness. Now, can we carry over these suggestions into the realm of the spirit, and find in them any help to express our relationship with God? If we are to be imitators of God we must certainly watch him. We must see with our eyes and ears! James Smeathem said of Turner: "The leaves from his sketch-books revealed how he lived, pencil in hand." Turner was always on the look-out and forever jotting down what he saw.

We are to have a similar vigilance in the presence of Christ, and mark every line and feature and color in the glorious unveiling. But we must not only look at him, we must set our eyes upon the revelation of God in Christ, and mark every line and feature and color in the glorious unveiling. But we must not only look at him, we must set our eyes upon the revelation of God in Christ, and mark every line and feature and color in the glorious unveiling. But we must not only look at him, we must set our eyes upon the revelation of God in Christ, and mark every line and feature and color in the glorious unveiling.

AND let us not forget that all this time the Father is loving us; the affectionate energy is flowing from his heart, and is working upon us for our redemption. While we are looking, love is strengthening our eyes. While we are aspiring, love is strengthening our desires! And while we are endeavoring, love is strengthening our wills! "Be ye therefore imitators of God, as beloved children."

Paul now proceeds to say that there is nothing we must imitate above all things—the Saviour's walk. "Walk in love." We are to walk about the home, in the street, in the market-place, with the very walk of Christ. We are to go a-pilgrimage with the Master, and watch how he walks in the many ways of men. We are to walk with him from Bethlehem to Calvary, and Paul tells us that this is what we shall see. As the Master walked he was forever "long" and "giving himself" away. He was always presenting himself as an offering; submitting his powers of body and mind and soul to the will of the Father; and everything was consummated in a "sacrifice" which necessitated the shedding of his own blood.

I am to move like a child among all this, and am to imitate the walk of the Master. I, too, am to go down the ways of life, distributing myself to the right and to the left in ministries of love. I, too, am to use my gifts and powers in generous offering. If I, too, am to shed my blood. Let us watch and then confidently imitate. Let us live with him as children, and we shall begin to imitate his life. We shall not rise into his likeness in a day. The glory will come line by line, color by color, until the fashion is perfected.

It is a welcome suggestion that the literal rendering of the counsel might be given as follows: "Be ye therefore imitators of God." It is a process of gathering powers. The imitator of today will be a sturdy imitator of tomorrow. Every line faithfully picked makes the copying of the next an easier task.

WOMAN'S elevation in character, her emancipation from brutal sentiments, her increased realization of the value of individual life, are shown most vividly in her softened war spirit. While she glories in the bravery and achievements of those who accomplished the independence of her country, her heart's desire today is that never again, even in the name of freedom, shall blood be shed on freedom's soil.

There had been advancing strides in womanhood when, in colonial and pioneer days, women defended their homes from Indian warfare, loading their husbands' guns, or even firing from the stockades, when their help was needed. Cooperation shoulder to shoulder, now, not the inactive adoration of the days of chivalry, marked their spirit. Yet at times, even in comparatively modern struggles, the old glory in bloodshed defaced woman's purity, as in the French Revolution, when there existed many women of the Thérèse Dufarge type.

It is to women like Dorothea Dix and Clara Barton that womanhood turns in pride today—those pioneers in truly womanly war spirit, who sought to alleviate pain, not to further the cause which led to war. And their work goes on today through thousands of nurses who serve in hospitals and on battlefields. It lives, too, in the women who knit and stitch, and deprive themselves, that they may send freely of their substance to victims of the horrors of war. But how changed is the heart of woman toward the carnage!

Women and the War Spirit

HOSTS of women all over the country are rallying to join the Women's Movement for Constructive Peace, first suggested in America by an English woman. It is to the glory of womanhood that she conceived of concerted action toward the establishment of enduring peace. All men and women may not feel able to accede to all the propositions of this platform, and so may prefer to work along similar though somewhat divergent lines. Many believe that no political platform is needed, and are seeking to awaken sentiment more purely religious, showing the incompatibility of war and Christianity. If all endeavors might be merged into one mighty effort it would promise greater efficiency. Peace is what the world cries out for; and surely the world's noble sisters will not impede the cause by any personal ambition that does not savor of, or militate toward, peace.

It is not because she lacks courage that the woman of today lends her strength toward establishing peace. It is because her vision has widened. She sees in works of construction, not destruction, the glory she longs to have her husband and her sons win. The anger, jealousy, cruelty, engendered by war, the ruthless sacrifice of noble life, the suffering of little children and the grief and anxiety of her sisters, fill with regret and horror the heart of every woman who has caught of the spirit of Christ, the Prince of Peace.

To her, manly combat consists in overcoming evils that beset humanity and the human heart. She would have the knights of her home battle to the finish against the spirit of greed, the love of lucre, the lust for power to accomplish ignoble ends. To her, struggle for self-advancement, or even for national power, cannot compare with the noble fight men are making for the uplift of souls. Looking at her boys who see in him elements that will help to make or mar his country. To a patriot in the best sense, his heart must be right before God.

Living up to this vision the women of today will teach the coming man to be pure in heart, high in motive, free above race prejudices, positive in beliefs, and courageous enough to stand by them without wincing at a worldly attack. With such characteristics the men of tomorrow will not lack courage to defend their country against any enemy, moral or physical; but they will be a new race of men, men glorying in peace rather than war. Their arm will be righteousness.

"Lord, give the mothers of the world
More love to do their part;
That love which reaches not alone
The children made by birth their own.
But every childish heart.
Wake in their souls true motherhood,
Which aims at universal good."

JENNIE CAMPBELL DOUGLASS

Daily Meditation

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR, LED BY

J. H. JOWETT, D.D., F. B. MEYER, D.D., REV. E. WHITTIER CASWELL AND CLAYTON SEDGWICK COOPER

Flowering Piety

SUNDAY, November 7. Ps. 96:9. "The beauty of holiness." Here is a very significant passage from one of Robert Louis Stevenson's letters: "John, do you see that bed of Renovation?" "It's doing bravely, sir." "John, I will not leave it in my garden; it flatters not the eye, and courts not the stomach; root it out." "Sir, I have seen o' them that raise as high as nettles!" "What then? Were they as tall as Alps, if still ungrassy and bleak, what matters? Out with it, then, and in its place put a bush of Flowering Piety—but see, be the flowering sort!"

It is the flowers that offer the best witness to our religion. Flowerless virtue is never winsome, and yet how much of our piety never comes to the floor! It may be dutiful, but it stops short of being beautiful. The strength does not culminate in graces, but remains rough and unrefined.

Righteousness must be of the flowering sort, it must express itself in goodness. Righteousness which does not effloresce in goodness is a very bleak and dingy thing. "Scarcely for a righteous man will he lie!" Mr. Casaubon, in "Middlemarch," was a scrupulously righteous man, but no fragrant and exquisite goodness were to be found upon his tree. He had all the gloominess of the dark and sullen yew. His children would shrink from such a shade. There were no flowers to gather. Strength but not beauty was in his sanctuary.

Truth must be of the flowering sort, and it must bloom in the ministries of love. "Speaking truth in love." Truth can be exhibited in such a way as to do the work of untruth. That is to say, truth can be nullified by an untrue manner. Even the truth of the Gospel can be made unattractive by the spirit in which it is proclaimed. Said a friend to me after a certain service, "Did you ever hear the love of Christ preached so bitterly?" Truth was maimed by its witness.

Patience must be of the flowering sort, and must bloom in cheerfulness. Even patience can be grim and unlovely. But when it flowers there is no more beautiful plant in God's garden. It wins the wondering admiration of everybody, and is a powerful witness of the grace and love of God. J. H. J.

Gathering Strength in the Shadows

SUNDAY, November 8. Isa. 49:1-12. "In the shadow of his hand hath he hid me, and made me a overshadowed shaft." We all need the shadow. The glare of a day is too brilliant. Our eyes become dazzled and unable to discern the delicate shades of color or appreciate the neutral tints. We require the shadowed chamber of sickness, the shadowed house of burning, the shadowed religious experience from which the ecstasy and song seem to have withdrawn. Beware not!—it is the shadow of God's hand. He is leading thee through these dark valleys of shadow. These are experiences of the utmost value to be gathered there. Do not fear! He has not flung thee away as a useless thing. Thou art not cast into the dust of neglect. He has thee in his quiver awaiting the moment when he can send thee forth moving swiftly and surely on some errand in which he can be glorified.

Christ needs "polished" shafts. In archery, a red arrow-point will not penetrate; and in war if sword or spear be corroded by rust, it will not clear its way through helmet or shield. Rust is removed by sandpaper or the file. To keep us from deterioration God uses the fret of daily life, the chaf of small annoyances, the wear and tear of irritating tempers and vexing circumstances. Nothing great or crushing, but little things that gall and vex—these are God's sandpaper and file, employed against whomever would blunt the edge or impair the temper of our souls. F. B. M.

When the Heart Cries Out to God

TUESDAY, November 9. Ps. 59:16. "For thou hast been my defense and refuge in the day of my trouble." David's songs come near to the hearts of men. His career was kaleidoscopic and shows almost every changing human side and divine longing of the heart.

Why is this man, who went down to the depths of sin, and also rose to the heights of devout worship, so immortally helpful to men? It was not because of his perfection; he was far from perfect. The storm of anger, of envy and impurity, of deceit, and even the blighting breath of murder, swept over his life. Yet, through it all, David somehow makes an appeal to the heart that perhaps no other Old Testament writer or character quite approaches in the same way.

The reason is to be found in the fact that David's weakness was the signal always of his need of God. He was driven to the Almighty by the very insistency of his necessity for him. His fiercely tempted nature cultivated within him the thirst for the living God, without whom he felt he was undone. His weakness was too great to allow him to depend upon his own strength, as Saul was inclined to do. Like those of Joshua, all of David's victories were "in the name of the Lord."

The psalms of David are the great songs of meditation, for they tell us of the cleansing of the heart, something that God alone can do. We may change our environment; we may exchange our poverty for wealth; we may surround ourselves with friends and delightful associations; but there is an inner region that must be made right if we are to have peace. It is not our mistakes that determine destiny; it is the way in which our hearts cry out for the forgiveness and help of God. C. S. C.

Christ the Ark of Safety

WEDNESDAY, November 10. John 15:1-8. "Abide in me." "Abide" is just "remain." "Mary abode (or remained) with Elizabeth for three months;" and "there abide" (or remain), said our Lord, when giving his disciples directions about their preaching tour, and referring to some hospitable house which was opened to receive them. We are to remain in Christ, as a man stays in his house; and we remain in, not by worrying whether we are in or not, but by taking it for granted that we are in, unless consciously and voluntarily we go out.

Once we were outside—"separate from Christ, alienated from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenants of promise, having no hope and without God in the world." We were shoots in the wild vine, partaking of its nature, involved in its curse, threatened by the ax that lay at its root. But all this is altered now. The Father, who is the husbandman, of his abundant grace and mercy took us out of the wild vine, and grafted us into the true. "Of God are ye in Christ Jesus." What confidence this gives us! We are in Christ by the act of God's grace and power; and surely he who put us in can keep us there. Did he not shut Noah in the ark, and keep him there amid the crash of the pitiless storm? We have only to consent to remain and allow God to perfect that which concerneth us. Be confident of this very thing, that he who began a good work in you will perform it until the day of Jesus Christ.

There are three things only which can break the blessed consciousness of union with the true Vine, and stop the inflow of the sap of his life. First, unconfessed sin; second, permitted worry; and third, interrupted fellowship through Scripture and prayer. F. B. M.

Begin the Heavenly Life Here and Now

THURSDAY, November 11. Heb. 11:5. "By faith Enoch was translated that he should not see death; and he was not found, because God translated him." The writer to the Hebrews has caught the secret of the life of Enoch in his phrase that "before his translation he had been well-pleasing unto God." The whole length and breadth of his three hundred and sixty-five years on earth were so full of God that death was obliterated for him. He "walked with God," the narrative tells us, and this fact made the change from earth to heaven a continuance and not a contrast from the life he was already living among his fellows in the light of day.

Heaven is going to depend for each of us upon the power of our appreciation of what heaven brings, and appreciation depends upon our remembrance, as well as upon the new glory to be revealed. As a traveler in the East gets from his visions there what he brings with him as well as what he sees of larger life, so heaven must consist in a large part of the memory of the walks with God on this earth. The only thing we can carry with us into that other world beyond the sunset is God in the soul. Immortality must mean then the pleasing walk with God here and now. Eternity is not simply something that follows death; it is something that precedes death as well, and this life today is a vital part of it.

I would remember that my translation, like that of Enoch, hangs upon my "pleasing" the heavenly Father here, in my earthly walk in the mist and the rain, in the struggle and the sorrow of this stage of eternity. Today is my heaven at hand, today to be well pleasing to God is to begin my immortality with him. My real life is not beyond the "low green tent whose curtain never outward swings"; it is here this hour in my walk with God. C. S. C.

Testing Every-day Things

FRIDAY, November 12. I Tim. 4:1-16. "Every creature of God is good, and nothing is to be refused, if it be received with thanksgiving, for it is sanctified through the Word of God and prayer." This is a most helpful principle, which will prove a solvent to many of life's problems. We all have to deal with three classes of things. Some are clearly and obviously good, such as love, home, health, innocent and happy laughter. Others are as distinctly bad, such as evil talk, unclean and frivolous allusions, the allurements of the devil through appetite. But there are many doubtful things which are allowed to lie on life's table. Concerning these we stand in doubt. May we partake of them, or must they be resolutely and constantly refused?

The apostle gives us golden advice for dealing with these questions. (1) He says, speaking generally, that all God's creations and donations are in themselves good and wholesome, but man may pervert them; as when he converts good grain into intoxicants, and extracts poison from flowers. (2) He gives three tests: Can you give thanks for this new thing which has come into your life? Do you find it possible to turn from it with an eager and unclayed appetite for the Word of God? Are you able to pray about it with perfect confidence, without any sense of effort, as though to bring about God's acquiescence and sanction? If any new friendship or acquisition can pass those three tests, there is no necessity to refuse it. The one matter with us all is to walk in unclouded and unbroken fellowship with God. There must be an open heaven between us. When the least shadow comes on that fellowship—beware! In the old story the stirrup-cup which held the poisoned drink shivered when the knights made over it the sign of the Cross. F. B. M.

The Glorious Companionship

SATURDAY, November 13. John 21:7. "It is the Lord." O morning of mornings, when the voyage of life is over and the golden shores appear at last! Did not Doubt often say, "There is no eternal morning; no landing-place, no haven of rest, nothing but the depths of the sea of oblivion. You have loved and lost." But look! there is a dim Figure standing on the shore, as if waiting for you; with a cry of joy you exclaim, "It is the Lord!" You remember that he said, "I will come for you, that where I am, there ye may be also." Now you know that "he is faithful that promised." All that he said about the mansions is true, for there they are in the bright celestial city before your gaze; there Jesus stands, waiting to welcome you, as he did the martyr Stephen. Around him are angels chanting your home-coming. The hills of glory are thronged with happy spirits, waiting to receive you.

As your bark grazes the golden sands, Christ takes your hand, saying, "Wherefore didst thou doubt?" "If it were not so, I would have told you." This is heaven, the home of the soul, and you are here. Once you saw through a glass darkly, looking through the Bible, nature, providences and experiences; but now, face to face, heart to heart, soul to soul. In that supreme moment, it seems almost too good to believe that eternity is yours, that it is Christ himself by your side, and a wave of glorious satisfaction sweeps over your spirit when you realize that you are in his likeness, in his love, in the Father's house and home, seated at his table, under the shadow of the eternal throne. E. W. C.

OVER FIFTY

By SUSAN HEARLE THOMAS

THE change from the old accustomed order of things had been so sudden that it had completely unnerved Benjamin Tuttle.

For years he and his wife had led a comfortable, uneventful life, taking their small joys and sorrows as they came, and making the best of the little they possessed—it had always been enough.

But now it was different! She was in the hospital, and he . . .

The changes and chances of this existence confronted him not as a question of death, but of life. At the place where he had worked for so many years a new Pharaoh had arisen, one who belonged to another generation. Many of those who had been there under his father's régime were discharged.

Benjamin had heard them spoken of disrespectfully as old fogies, and down in his heart he knew they were not much good, that they were a clog on the wheels of the machinery! Nevertheless, he had learned to dread the sight of that folded slip that told one or the other that his services would no longer be needed.

It would be his turn next! He told himself that he had worked faithfully, in season and out of season; that he had always done his best! But it was no use. This, and his wife's sickness, had had its effect upon him.

"I ought to be thankful she's living, but somehow I don't feel that way," he thought miserably as he turned the water on and filled the kettle to make a cup of coffee this morning.

He was a clumsy cook; his wife had always done these things, and he was a man who depended on a woman's services. He struck a match and lit the gas, then waited for the water to boil.

"It's early, but I might as well be going down to the office," he said.

He pushed the bread that he had put on the table away from him. His throat was too parched to eat.

"If the old man had lived we'd have gone on in the same way, but his son is all for up-to-date methods and men. He hasn't any use for any one over fifty."

The hand that held the cup shook. His face showed gray and drawn; his eyes were bloodshot, telling of sleepless nights. Had his wife been here she would have told him not to worry! Most likely she would have said something about his want of faith. She was a good woman.

It was this thought of her that made the man suddenly drop on his knees.

"God!" he cried, "Don't—don't! What'd become of her? I couldn't pick up another job easy—not at my age!" His age had become a torment to him.

HIS wife did not know what he knew. It had been a month now since she had gone to the hospital, and all their extra money had been used. Yesterday the doctor had told him there must be an operation.

"Where am I going to get the money?" he thought savagely.

He could sell the house? Yes. But what then? The question had made its inroads on his soul. With a face of worried abstraction he made ready to leave for his day's work. He looked like one upon whom age had fixed its fatal clutch.

As he entered the office the haunting fear of the past weeks rose yet stronger. No one was here. Slowly he removed hat and overcoat, hanging them on the accustomed peg.

His furtive eye went toward the desk where he worked, shying from it again as it caught sight of something resembling an envelope. There was a sudden stiffening of muscle that often comes after a period of suspense. His eye went back to the desk with a desperate courage.

He knew now for a certainty that that which he had dreaded had happened.

That instant of returning strength brought with it a sense of relief. Reality, as it often does, had dealt fear a blow—there was nothing more to dread!

He stood stupefied, not thinking—he was beyond that. Things seemed to go from him, as if his brain was standing still. His face showed compressed and gray, but the curved fingers had straightened. Hanging up against the wall just above him a clock ticked out the passing minutes. But for that, and the slight sound in his throat, there was a death-like stillness all about him.

Then from out that chaotic holding of sense came the grim irony of the fact that this day marked the twenty-fifth anniversary of the date of his coming to this place to work. Held in the sudden thought he hardly noticed the boy who came gaily into the office, whistling a joyous air that was full of lilting life.

"Hello!" called the boy in youthful familiarity.

The man was standing with his back to him. At the sound of his voice a strange cunning took hold of Benjamin Tuttle. He reached out stealthily toward the fatal missive, drawing it toward him with sly slowness, then holding it in his hand as if it had been a mere scrap of paper which he had casually picked

THE CHIEF CAUSE OF —HUMAN TROUBLE—

By W. J. Lampton

THINGS wuzn't goin' right a-tall.

An' I wuz feelin' blue.

Although I didn't owe a cent.

An' there wuz work to do:

The home wuz jest the same old home,

The wife an' kids wuz well,

The stock wuz lookin' fat and slick

And there wuz crops to sell.

But yit I wuzn't satisfied,

Ner nothin' I could see,

Er feel, er hear, er talk about

Seemed like it used to be.

I didn't like the things I et,

My liver felt like clay,

An' apple-pie might jest as well

Have been filled in with hay,

Ef there wuz sunshine on the flowers,

An' bees wuz on the buzz,

An' birds wuz singin' in the trees,

I didn't know they wuz.

Ef I had friends, they didn't seem

To be like friends no more.

An' I quit goin' down to loaf

At Grimes's grocery store.

Doc Simpson said he couldn't tell

What ailed me, an' I tried

So many things, the wonder is

I hadn't up an' died;

Till Susan, she's my wife, one day,

She said she couldn't see

What ailed me everywhere like that,

Unless it must be me.

That set me thinkin', an', by heck,

I say it now with shame,

'Twuz jest myself, my durned old self,

An' nothin' else to blame.

up—nothing of interest. He did not want the boy to know.

There was that sensitiveness of age to the curiosity of youth.

"What you doing? Busy, eh? Say, you and I always seem to be the first on our jobs mornings. These high-cock-a-lorums sleep late," said the boy.

The man crumpled the note in his hand, crushed it as he would like to have crushed the forces that had proved too strong for him. He was full of a burning rage, mingled with that overpowering sense of his own impotence.

"What's up?" The boy's eyes held the unconscious keenness of the twentieth-century youth.

"Nothing. It's early. I'm going out for a bit."

The man smiled in a strangely calm manner. He was experiencing swift transitions of emotion. He went toward the place where he had hung his coat and hat. He took his hat down.

"Best be putting on your coat," advised the boy; "it's cold."

"I'm not cold. I don't mind the weather—guess I'm not worrying over things like that!"

And the man laughed, putting a hand into his trousers pocket and jingling the few coins that were there—all he had until next pay-day. The crushed note was there also.

Another moment and he had staggered. The boy rushed toward him.

"Look here, this won't do! I knew you were worrying over something. Is it about your wife? You told me she was in the hospital. My mother was there once. She got all right. Guess your wife soon be well. Say, you'd best not go out."

The boy was good-hearted; he meant well, but he man felt his curiosity.

"Oh, it's nothing! I was a bit dizzy, that's all. No, I'm not sick—and I'm not worrying over anything. My wife's getting all right," he added.

"I'm not sick," he repeated, as the boy still looked at him.

HE sat up very straight in the chair that had been brought to him. The boy went after a glass of water, which he made him drink. Benjamin Tuttle appreciated his kindness, but he wished he would leave him alone. Instead of that he hung around him, proffering unnecessary services.

"Say," he burst forth at last, "did you get anything this morning?"

The man became rigid in an instant.

"I don't know what you mean." He spoke in a tone that was meant to check any undue familiarity. He belonged to a generation which did not appreciate the sympathy of youth—and he had never known what it was to have a son or a daughter.

"I thought," began the boy, then stopped. The man was not encouraging, but he did not see to notice this.

"I thought I saw you pick something up off your desk," he said more boldly.

At this the face of the man tightened. "Less you young fellows see a great deal," he said.

"Yes, sir, I see and hear a good deal—you're right. I'm in and out of the office more'n anybody else around here, and I catch things. I heard 'em talking in here yesterday. That's the reason I asked you did you get anything this morning. I wasn't running any harm," he apologized.

"It don't matter." Benjamin Tuttle felt as if he no longer wanted to keep the thing a secret. Why shouldn't the boy know? Why shouldn't the whole world know? He almost hoped that Mary would not recover. They were too old, both of them! The dizziness, the result of spare living and strong notion, returned; thought whirled in terrible confusion.

He felt as if he might be dying—he hoped that he was.

His hand went toward his pocket in mechanical obedience to the imperious will of youth.

"You did get it?" said the boy. "And you haven't even opened it," he added as he caught sight of the crumpled envelope.

THE dizziness passed. "No." The man laughed aloud. "There's no hurry," he said, as if making fate. He felt like one who could dance with death. Holding the sealed note aloft in the air he waved it as if suddenly crazed.

"I've been working steadily here for five and twenty years—five and twenty years," he repeated. "And this is what I'm getting," he derided. "Make me feel as if they didn't have to wait for their reward till they get to the next world—they get 'em here—"

"Open it," commanded the boy, who seemed to have taken charge of the situation.

The trembling fingers obeyed, tearing at the sealed note, making a jagged rent across the top.

"There," cried the boy, who was watching with intense interest. "Now see what's inside! Anything written?"

Benjamin Tuttle jerked out a sheet of paper and an inclosure dropped to the floor.

"Read," said the boy, stooping to pick it up.

And the dazed man read:

"In acknowledgment of your faithful service for the last twenty-five years, we wish to show you the hearty appreciation of our firm, and on this the first of your quarter of a century of service, tender to you a small gift. Please accept the inclosed—"

"I heard 'em talking about it, that's the reason I wanted to know," he heard the boy say, "and saying you were sort of down—well, I just wanted to see what you would say!"

But the man did not say a word. He was gazing in stupefied silence at the check which the boy was holding up in front of his eyes. It was for a thousand dollars.

Among the Workers

EVANGELISTS Geisenheimer and Imrie have just closed two weeks of revival services at Spring Grove, Mo. Much good was accomplished although the field was a difficult one. The church at Spring Grove is without a pastor.

REV. JOHN FLETCHER has completed a pastorate of fifty years with the Plainwell, Mich., Baptist church. His church is one of the very few which has attained the ideal of raising as much for outside benevolences as for home work. He has been missionary pastor for the entire community, preaching in school-houses and organizing schoolhouses into active Bible schools. The wagon which he used in this work was donated by him to the American Baptist Publication Society. Mr. Fletcher says: "We have avoided church troubles and debts. Any measures we could not see alike upon we dropped for the time. Riding hobbies and going into ruts must be avoided. The aim of the pulpit has been to feed the flock of God."

EVANGELIST HENRY W. STOUGH is reported to be stirring Lebanon, Pa.

Prayers are being answered and meetings are crowding down the sawdust trail. One of the business men of the town says "Lebanon will never be the same." A correspondent writes that the trolley car conductor asked "Are you a Christian?" as he took his fare, and that the mail men sing hymns on their route and that prayer meetings crop up in the strictest of places. The town is awakened.

Dog Train on the Way to Edmonton with a Season's Catch

Scows Loading Provisions at a Northern Trading Post

Fur Trappers Have a Vacation

WHEN news that the Great White Father and his men were at war reached the Indian in the far wilds of Northern Canada some three months at the outbreak of hostilities, he merely shrugged his shoulders indifferently. It meant little to him. The land where he fought the Great White Father and his men was incomprehensibly distant; across Keechegame (the sea) in ages beyond his ken.

It was when, on going to the nearest post that same week for his annual outfit of supplies for the winter trapping—it began then October—he was informed that no more "debt" could be given, the war came suddenly very close to home. No longer was the red man indifferent, for "debt" was to him his mainstay, his staff of life, without which nothing could be undertaken.

Every Indian in the Northland is a trader. The territory from which he gets ninety per cent. of the fur Canada prices extends from the shores of the Arctic Sea to the fifty-fourth parallel of north latitude, and over that territory lie between the seventieth and the one hundred and thirty-sixth parallel of longitude west of Greenwich. How vast this is can be gained by the most cursory glance at the map of North America; and because of the European demand the cutting off of the "debt," for twenty-five thousand Indians, at the end of October, 1914, here faced the possibility of starvation during the coming winter.

The "debt" is an advance of food stuffs and trapping supplies, given by the factors of the fur posts to the Indians, to be later taken out of their fur catch when they return to the posts in the spring.

Each tribe or band naturally trades with the nearest post, and on the books of it each man is entered and his debt recorded. Sometimes the catch brought in will leave the trapper a balance of many dollars, or rather "beavers." Dollars are practically unknown in the far north; the "beaver," a trade term representing a value of from fifty cents to a dollar, varying according to posts, is the recognized medium of exchange. But the Indian, ever extravagant, improvident, thinking not of the morrow, does not leave this balance to his credit against a time of need. Instead he feasts on good things, and buys gew-gaws for his women. In the long run the Indian owes the company more often than not.

Directly following the outbreak of hostilities the principal fur marts of Europe—London, Leipzig, Paris and Petrograd—stopped buying fur. The world's annual output, based on the figures of the years 1911 to 1913 inclusive, is about $95,000,000 in value. Of this, Asia produces about thirty per cent., North America and Europe about twenty-five per cent. each, and the other continents, the balance. The greater part of this is handled through the four above named cities; so, by closing their doors to fur shipments, this immense trade was brought to a standstill. And this was why the fur traders, at the end of October, 1914, received word to cease the giving of debt to the red hunters.

But the Indian did not understand. To him the mighty machinations of the world's money marts had no meaning. He only knew that hunger lurked close, and that these men, the fur traders, whom he and his people had long served, would no longer supply the wherewithal to live.

In the meantime the greater fur companies, after patriotically devoting to the war fund sums running into the hundreds of thousands of dollars, notified the Dominion Government through its department of Indian affairs, that they would be unable to make the customary advance of supplies to the Indians.

The Dominion Government, harassed and overworked as it was and needing every dollar to arm and equip an army of one hundred and ten thousand men, still found the time and means to look after its subjects in the Far North. Large supplies of food were rushed into the northland on scows before the freeze-up, and in some places by dog trains, to be taken in charge by the various mounted policemen for the relief of the Indians.

During the months from October, 1914, to January, 1915, furs of all kinds throughout the vast land described above sold for hitherto unheard-of prices. Muskrats brought three cents, where before the war they had brought from ten to fifty according to the distance from civilization; red fox skins brought seventy-five cents where formerly they brought two and a half and three dollars. The silver fox, the most valuable fur in the world, slumped seventy-five per cent. All this vitally affected the Indian. However, after January the fur market began to take a new lease on life, and now all furs are bringing within about thirty-five per cent. of normal prices.

But your Indian is a stoic. The refusal of "debt," the slumping of the fur market, and his desertion by the old companies to whom he had been faithful so long, were accepted without undue perturbation. If anything, he has hunted and fished more this last year than before. In a way, he has come nearer to living the life of his forefathers than at any time since the fur traders invaded the wilderness. But with the rising price of fur and a good season's hunting, the Indian will see a better winter in 1915-16.

FRANCIS J. DICKIE.

Fur Men Shooting the Cascade Rapids on the Athabasca River

Indian Fur Traders of Northern Canada Always Happy and in Debt

The Circuit Walker

THE road was lonely and rough and the rocks were plentiful. On every hand hills loomed in the gloom of the fast descending night. No house or a soul was in sight, save the lone traveler who trudged onward over the rocks and up the steep inclines. All day long he had been walking, through the hot sun and the dust, with only a pause at mid-day to eat a simple luncheon and quench his thirst at a nearby spring. Under his arm he carried a Bible and in his hand was a stout stick to aid him in climbing steep places.

The place was the Ozarks of Missouri, and the man, Rev. J. L. Finley, a member of the St. Louis Methodist Conference and a real "shepherd of the lost." He is technically a "circuit rider," but in reality he is a circuit walker, because he is too poor to buy a horse, and his salary is too small to allow him to hire a conveyance. On $400 per year he supports a wife and four children. He preaches to eight small churches scattered over a territory of two counties, some of it in the wildest part of the Ozarks.

At this particular time the shepherd was on his way to one of his little chapels, and on the way he prayed that the message might be of benefit to the people there. It had taken him all day to make the trip, and he reached the place just before the service was to begin. The children came out to meet him, followed by their elders, and gathered around him to give him their greeting and a word of welcome, just as they did everywhere on his circuit.

THE shepherd looked into the faces of his people, and saw there a need of sympathy and encouragement and love, and he began to talk to them as one would talk to children, of the simple gospel of Christ's love to men. When he was through he gave an invitation for those who were tired of the bondage and slavery of sin, to come forward. Eight came and five of them were converted to the ways of his Master.

For years Finley was a saw-mill proprietor, making more money than he possibly could at preaching. Then he entered the ministry. "The Master called me," he said simply. "No credit is due me for the work I am doing. I am simply an humble worker in his vineyard."

For the past seven years he has been shepherd to the mountaineers, sometimes walking more than one hundred miles a week to make his round, preaching every night and three times on Sunday.

"I do not mind the walks," he said. "They give me good exercise and keep me healthy and strong. Then I make friends for the Master along the way-side." Finley knows that he has a greater field than many a large city parish could afford. They are as poor as the poorest, and he is glad to be poor among them.

SAMUEL TILDEN LARKIN.

Our Editorial Forum

PRESIDENT
OTTO KOENIG

MANAGING EDITOR
GEO. H. SANDISON

SECRETARY
THEODORE WATERS

The Testing Time

THE children of God are in the midst of a testing time. No thoughtful person can well doubt that. Most of us have long felt that some great stirring up of the church was imminent. The almost universal decline in spiritual thinking and living, the very general letting down of individual Christian standards, have brought into startling contrast the ideal of a Christian people, such as is presented in the New Testament, and the church as it actually is. We have fallen far behind our Divine Leader as a people on a pilgrimage from earth to heaven. We are, indeed, as individuals, living epistles read and known by all men—unfortunately too well read and known. We have not fallen from grace, but have fallen in grace. Into the company of the saints have been admitted, welcomed and held in spite of everything, too many who have no real part with them. We have forgotten that as Christians we are a chosen generation, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a peculiar people; solely and before all else to show forth in the midst of a crooked and perverse generation the praises of Him who hath called us out of darkness into his marvelous light.

And now the testing time of the ages for the Christian Church appears to be at hand. It behooves us to consider the great issues of the day in the light of the Beatitudes. Shall we, as individuals, be guided in thought, in conduct, in speech by those eternal principles of the kingdom of heaven? Will the church stand firmly on this rock-hewn platform, a steady, saving beacon to war-driven states, a bulwark to all men against the storm of hate and destruction that is raging through the world?

Let us consider what these rock-bottom principles of Christian citizenship are, remembering that the Beatitudes describe the ascent from citizenship in the world to citizenship in the kingdom of heaven.

The first blessed step consists in becoming poor in spirit; losing our self-assertiveness. Then, becoming conscious of our great lack of spiritual things, we mourn thereat and are comforted with instruction. Becoming meek—that is, no longer self-seeking—we begin to inherit the earth as our field of righteous activity. We now realize the excelling worth of righteousness, for which we hunger and thirst. So, with clearer vision, we begin to see the great needs of our fellow men and are merciful. Thus we have become pure in heart, and see God in all about us. Dominated by this new vision of God's immanence, our whole attitude of mind becomes peaceable toward all men, and thereupon we are called the children of God. But immediately we find ourselves opposed by the world, and are persecuted for righteousness' sake: "Blessed are they which are persecuted for righteousness' sake: for theirs is the kingdom of heaven."

We cannot get away from this official declaration by the only begotten Son of God. No man has yet been authorized to modify these opening sentences of the Sermon on the Mount. These are fundamentals in Christian living. Without these it is impossible to please God.

These teachings of Jesus Christ are opposed by the forces let loose in the world today as never before. Is God testing his people? Is he testing you?

From Farm to Consumer

AN important experiment is now under way in New York, with a view to bringing the agriculturist and consumer into closer and more satisfactory relations. Under the direction of the State Department of Food and Markets, the fruit and truck growers are to be assisted in disposing of their products by public auction. Buyers are invited to visit the orchards on a stated day when the fruit, having been inspected, is offered in large quantities to the highest bidder. At some of these sales, the products of a number of orchards have been offered together as a single lot. The result has been the accomplishment of two desirable things: the growers have been brought into personal touch with the wholesale buyers, without the intervention of middlemen, and a market price for fruit at wholesale has been established which assures a satisfactory profit to the growers. Although the plan is still in the experimental stage, it promises well. With a view to its extension, the Food and Market Bureau is planning the establishment of a union freight terminal in New York, at which a general line of agricultural food products can be handled in the same direct fashion, the building to contain ample auction rooms and all the necessary equipment for doing a general wholesale business.

The New York plan has features that might be adapted to the needs of many other cities, where the high cost of living has become a difficult problem, and where the interests of both farmer and consumer would be materially helped by a method of marketing that eliminates the broker, who is the principal beneficiary at present. The Christian Herald has received letters from farmers and fruit and truck growers this year, complaining of existing conditions which make it well-nigh impossible for them to get an adequate return for their labor. In such localities the new plan, with necessary modifications, might be tried with advantage.

The Jersey Election

IT was almost a foregone conclusion that the suffrage campaign in New Jersey would turn out as it did. Bravely as the women fought, they were not only overmatched by the experienced political forces arrayed against them, but they suffered from the struggle between the two rival factions of the dominant party in the state. But the outcome of their experience has proved to the women the wisdom of a well-planned and carefully managed educational campaign, if the Eastern states are to be persuaded to move into the suffrage line. Overconfidence is a shoal which old campaigners carefully avoid, and it was upon this that the suffrage cause struck in the special election of October 19, with the result that—in sharp contrast with their claims of assured victory before the battle—only one county in the whole state was carried for the cause. All the advantages of a fine enthusiasm, and even of the President's presence and example, did not avail. But the women are not discouraged; they made a good fight, and now they accept the situation with admirable spirit, believing that the setback is only temporary. Quite a different view is that taken by the Women's Anti-Suffrage organization in the state, which is elated over the defeat of the suffrage amendment and has expressed the hope that "it will settle the issue, as far as New Jersey is concerned, for all time." This adventure in the realm of political prophecy shows that a little more experience is needed on that side also. In the real work of a political campaign there are few things more illusive or misleading than dreams and forecasts.

Shall We Train Our Boys to Kill?

WHEN a brave man takes a gun and points it in the direction of an enemy, the attention of the man's friends and fellow countrymen is focused on his own courage and skill. What they forget is that if the man they are thinking of is efficient enough, that gun he is firing will turn a fellow being into a corpse. All the paraphernalia and splendor and skill of warfare mean just that—slaughter.

How, then, should religious, peace-loving people feel about the announcement that the schoolboys of America are to be given military training—are to have guns put into their hands and to be trained in handling and firing them? Fine, manly training for the boys, many will say; they will learn precision, submission, agility; they will grow strong and efficient and courageous. But what will be happening to the souls and hearts of these boys while their muscles and nerves are learning to be accurate and their minds being trained to the machinery of murder?

These are serious days for America. We have succeeded in keeping out of the war. We have not succeeded in keeping our factories and towns and offices from the taint of blood-stained gold. Are we to succeed in stemming the militaristic fever that is sweeping the world and to keep ourselves a nation that thinks in terms of peace, that believes in peace, that trusts to the power of peaceful means in its dealings with other nations? Never have our armies and navies been found insufficient when the stress of war has actually overtaken us. Is it necessary now to instill thoughts of war into our schoolboys, to organize them into military camps, to train them in our state armories, to drill them in our fortifications? Is it wise to familiarize them with the trade of bloodshed? Will it make us a better, cleaner, happier, more useful nation a hundred years from now? We believe not.

One of the most sinister elements in the plan of this new movement, called, by the way, the National School Camp Association, is the proposed enrolment of business men and manufacturers, who will agree to give the preference in their establishments to boys who have graduated from this four-year course of military training. That suggests again the ugly alliance of war and business.

The civilization of the future will have most in store for the nation that has trained its young men not to fight, but to help; not to kill, but to be cured. Some months ago the school authorities of New York City quashed the suggestion to give the pupils military training. It is to be hoped that this new organization, planned on a wider scale and backed by men some of whose names have stood prominent for sanity and kindness in public affairs, will meet with protests so loud and emphatic that it will have to be abandoned.

Does anybody suppose that if, in the acute crisis through which we have just passed, our American homes had been filled with young men who remembered with fresh enthusiasm and delight recent days of military training and military maneuvers, in whose rooms could have been found cartridge belts, pushed rifle, sword and bayonet, men who had experienced the strange and deadly zest for war that still possesses mankind, we could have been held back from the verge of war that nearly engulfed us? Was it not (Cethu) who said: "When a nation's children begin to play soldier, look out for war"? How much more, then, that when a nation's youth is trained to fight, they will, when occasion arises, insist upon going forth to battle?

A War Poet Wanted

THERE have been many men of artistic temperament in the great war—poets, painters, musicians—men with high artistic genius that could command the richest rewards from the world—and yet the leaden hail of death has not discriminated between them and their heroic comrades. Strangely enough, those who have returned seem to have missed the inspiration they sought. So tremendous, so overpowering, indescribable, has been their experience that they are incapable, for the time at least, of giving it words. One of the latest to seek to pass through the "baleful of madness" is the English poet, John Masefield, author of the "Everlasting Mercy," who is now on the way to the Dardanelles. The realism of Masefield's genius will now find a different theme from that afforded by the docks of English seaports, at the domestic scenes to which he has heretofore confined himself. It will be interesting to read what he writes. We need a latter-day Homer to undertake the epic of this greatest of all wars, with its elemental forces, its mighty aerial and undersea fleets, its death-dealing clouds of chlorine gas, and all the other appalling paraphernalia that dwarf even the titanic colossi in which the imagination of the ancient poets reeled. Verily, here is the opportunity for a great war poet. Where shall one be found equal to the task?

Comment by the Way

"DID BOOZE EVER DO YOU ANY GOOD?" A large red electric sign in South Chicago flashes out this question. The bill for this sign is not paid by the Anti-Liquor League, but by the Illinois Steel Corporation for the sell of its 20,000 workmen. The American Steel and Wire company has given notice to its employees that they must draw from all clubs and organizations where liquor is sold, because such sales impair the efficiency of the workers.

IT is a hopeful sign that the hate stirred up by the war is dying out. There is unquestionably a great modification in the intensity of international feeling in the last half-century. Germany has almost universally repudiated the bitter "Jann" by Lissauer, so frequently quoted and parodied last year. England has met the modified German sentiment a half-way in recent press utterances and in public expressions of bitter feeling. "The wall of a church," declared the chancellor of the Chester Diocese (when permission was asked to erect a mural tablet to a Lusitania victim), "is an appropriate place to perpetuate hatred"—and the offending inscription was accordingly modified. Commenting on the changed attitude, Professor Deissman of Berlin writes: "As soon as the good will on one side finds its echo in the same disposition on the other, a ray of light falls into the darkness of these tragic days."

WHILE many are flinging caps in the air over the proposed militarization of the public schools at the training of an army of American boys "a million strong," it is well to note what thoughtful and experienced educators have to say on the subject. The National Education Association, at its recent meeting in Oakland, Calif., adopted this resolution:

"The association deplors any attempt to militarize this country. It again declares against the establishment of compulsory military training in the schools on the ground that this is reactionary and inconsistent with American ideas and standards. The association expresses its approval of the policy of the Boy Scouts of America in keeping the useful work free from connection with military affairs."

This expression of the views of a representative body of national educators has not received the attention it deserves. Gymnastics is a proper part of education, but if we introduce general military training in the schools it can only have one certain result: the militarizing of the rising generation.

The Bible and Newspaper

CONDUCTED BY
FERDINAND C. IGLEHART, D.D.

Fraudulent Transactions by Mail

INVESTIGATIONS conducted by government officials show that fraudulent schemes using the United States mail have taken from the public over $239,000,000 in the last four years. The Post Office, to len this robbery, issued during the fifty-six fraud orders, which deny persons named in them the use of the mails. One concern alone last year took from the people's pockets $350,000. A promoter of an anti-fat preparation kept $50,000 in a single month in advertising. Invalids promised health are the worst victims. One man made over $1000 a year by the sale of a magical pill with promised chemical power to draw acid from the system and cure almost every ill. Offering fake riches to widows as wives to lovesick bachelors was a gold mine. Fortunately the government is going the better of these malefactors who defy the law of God and man. It is well for them to remember the truth of these words: "Better is a little with righteousness than great revenue without right." (Psalm 16:8.)

A Novel Vacation

DR. ROSALIE S. MORTON, assistant on the surgical staff of the Polyclinic Hospital in New York, who spent her vacation doing hospital work at the Grenfell Mission at various stations along the Labrador coast, gives quite an account of the country and people she saw. She said: "Next to nothing grows on that coast. The vegetation is very slight as compared with southern Alaska, which is in the same latitude. Only a few flowers grow close to the ground in the rock crevices, and there are no vegetables at all everything they eat is imported." Dr. Morton describes some of the diseases of the people at her surgical work among them. The most interesting point of her story was that the country she visited was one spot where the British empire practically infected by the war. She saw German Moravians and English Christians so busy in civilizing and Christianizing Labrador that they had no time to quarrel about a conflict that seemed to them to be in another world. They were bound together in love and peace by the One who said: "My peace I give unto you." (John 14:27.)

Boys with the Right Idea

REV. CLAUD OLANDT, pastor of the Reformed Church at Montrose, N.Y., which is 198 years old, thanked his Junior Epworth Leaguers who had cut down a tree, sawed off a high trunk, and placed on it a road lamp in front of the church. The secretary of the Y. M. C. a few nights before had missed the road in the darkness just there, and fallen down an embankment had broken his arm badly. The church is itself a light in darkness and danger. Christ said it is a lamp set on a standard. "Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven." (Matt. 5:13.)

Decrease in Drinking

FOR several years the Internal Revenue Department of the government has reported an increased manufacture and consumption of intoxicating liquors in the year preceding. These figures related the liquor dealers and puzzled the friends of temperance, and discouraged some of them, who could not understand the explanation given. The reports of the Internal Revenue Department for the year ending June 30, 1915, indicate that the consumption of fermented liquors decreased 200,300,436 gallons, and distilled liquors decreased 14,983,333 gallons. One billion six hundred thousand less glasses have been passed over the counter, and about a half billion of drinks of distilled liquors. This is a per capita reduction of 2.15 gallons, bringing the per capita consumption of liquors in the nation to 20.15 gallons, the lowest in ten years. There was a decrease in government receipts for tax of over $50,000 a day. Sixteen thousand two hundred and sevhis health. It is said that the grandfather of Mayor Mitchel aided him in getting to America. He first became drawing teacher, then he got to be a teacher of the lowest class at $550 a year, then assistant principal, and then principal. He founded the Evening High School, and taught during a long term of years. He then founded the Normal School for Girls, and remained as its head for nearly forty years. The city made him President Emeritus, and voted him a pension of $5,000 a year. Twelve thousand female teachers passed under his instruction. He was one of those splendid Irishmen that have had so large a part in molding the mental and moral life of the city and nation, and verifying this prophecy of those getting wisdom: "She shall give to thine heart."

went." The dying man did not wince or cry; he paid no attention to death. He knew he was to live forever, and only awaited death to take him to that better life. As he lingered he said: "I have not made my home run yet." The veterinary department at Washington, noticing in the papers the heroic fight Judge Stackpole was making at the hospital, at the request of the authorities of Bellevue, rushed to the hospital some serum which Dr. Eichhorn of the Bureau of Animal Industry had found efficacious in 482 out of 500 animal cases treated. The first injection of the serum seemed to check the disease, but the hero's heart let down and he hurried to his coronation. Anthrax is caught by contact with infected animals, or oftener by handling their hides. The anthrax bacillus is the largest disease germ, and was the first found. In 1850 it was discovered in sheep. In 1876 Koch with the microscope found the anthrax in the blood of a sheep, grew the germ outside the body, injected it into a rabbit, produced the disease in the rabbit, and then recovered it from the blood of the rabbit. Two years later, Pasteur, working independently, took the germ from the blood of a sheep and produced a protective serum, which he injected into another sheep, protecting it for the remainder of its life. By the use of anthrax serum the death rate of the cattle of the civilized world has been reduced from ten to one-third of one per cent. It is believed that the serum if applied early enough will save most of the human patients. Judge Stackpole's friends mourned at first at his fate, but his heroism, shamed their tears, and they congratulated him on his defiance of the last enemy, and upon the fact that his Saviour had taken him up into a high mountain to die where all the world could see him, and had given him a message of faith and immortality that all the world could hear. In his Christian bravery Judge Stackpole copied the apostle who said: "I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith; henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness, which the Lord, the righteous judge, shall give me at that day." (1 Tim. 6:7, 8.)

Slide Chokes Panama Canal

THE slide into the Panama Canal is so disastrous that General George Goethals, governor of the Panama Canal Zone, will have to remain on the Isthmus for six months or more to open the canal to navigation properly. In his dispatch to the War Department, October 13, Governor Goethals said: "Length of channel involved, 1,300 feet of which 200 feet has present width of twenty-five feet and depth of three to fifteen feet. During the week 209,000 cubic yards of material were dredged, but as the movement continued the result has been to maintain only what slides left in the first instance. Material in settling and moving creates earth waves with deep depressions behind those being some 500 to 600 feet from the canal prism, with elevations of sixty to eighty feet above water surface. These waves undoubtedly counterbalance the weight of the broken mass on either side, and when removed may cause another similar movement. Hence the impossibility as to making any prediction as to the date of opening, until after the waves which now block the channel have been removed, and the action of the remaining material determined." Meanwhile ships that were to have gone through the canal have had to make the long voyage around Cape Horn or transfer their cargoes to the railroad on the Isthmus. There was a ship laden with merchandise halted in a voyage at a place where two seas mingled. The trouble was not with the channel, but with the boat: "Falling into a place where two seas met, they ran the ship aground." (Acts 27:41.)

ornament of grace; a crown of glory shall she deliver to thee." (Prov. 4:9.)

Bravery of Anthrax Victim

JUDGE GEORGE F. STACKPOLE of Riverhead, Long Island, aged seventy-one, was bitten by an insect, and was hurried to the Bellevue Hospital in New York City, where his malady was pronounced to be anthrax, for which the authorities had no remedy. He was told that certain death awaited him in twenty-four hours. He made his will, and sent for his wife, daughter and son. Fearing his family might not reach his side in time he called for a pencil and wrote them a dying message in which he exhibited rare physical, moral and spiritual bravery. He said he had lived a consistent Christian life for over fifty years, and that he was ready to go. He said this was no time to act the craven, but to meet death like a man. In his message to his son he said: "Live a clean, upright, Christian life and you need have no fear, and can meet death calmly as I do now." A few hours before his death he said to his boy: "Sonnie, go out and get a paper and see how the ball game in Boston

Specimen of Extinct Dodo

A SPECIMEN of the dodo, a bird long since extinct, was installed recently in the Museum of Natural History in New York. It is the first ever sent to this country. The only others like it are in the British Museum, Oxford and Cambridge Universities, and Utrecht. As the dodo became extinct more than 230 years ago, the specimens here and in Europe are restorations from casts and feathers resembling the original bird. The Island of Mauritius, off the African coast, was the bird's only known home. A skeleton of actual dodo bones has been in the possession of the Museum and was exhibited with the specimen received from Mr. Walter Winaus of England. The dodo looked like a mammoth pigeon, and was twice the size of a turkey gobbler. The Portuguese who discovered Mauritius in 1507 found these birds so tame and sociable that they named them "dodos," meaning "simpletons." The apostle thus refers to tame birds to enforce a moral lesson: "For every kind of beasts, and of birds, and of serpents, and of things in the sea, is tamed." (James 3:7.)

Eminent School Teacher Gone

ON October 14 Professor Thomas Hunter, who retired in June, 1906, after being president of the Normal College of New York City from the date of its opening, a period of thirty-seven years, and in whose honor the name of the college was changed to Hunter College by the Board of Education in 1914, passed to his reward just five days before his eighty-fifth birthday. A North of Ireland lad of only eighteen, he wrote a severe criticism of British rule in Ireland and had to take a hurried trip for

Our Mail-Bag

NOTICE

THE editors of the Christian Herald will be glad to answer any question addressed to the Mail-Bag provided it be of general interest and not merely personal. Correspondents may use a nom de plume to identify the question, but all letters must contain name and address of the sender, in addition to the nom de plume. No attention will be paid to anonymous letters.

Questions and Answers

V. H., Iowa. There is out here in a farming community a so-called union church edifice, in which two orthodox denominations have for years conducted the services. 1. According to the federated church idea and spirit would it be the natural and Christian thing for each of the ministers of these two denominations to announce his brother pastor's services as well as his own? 2. Would it be in harmony with the mind and teaching of Christ for the members of these two denominations and for the other church members in the community to sink their denominational preferences in the interests of general community uplift and religious unity and to organize a real community church, the representatives of the various denominations contributing, if they wish, to their own denominational benevolences?

1. You are certainly right in saying that both these ministers ought to help one another in their work by announcing their respective services, or in any other way possible. 2. So long as the union church idea prevails, it should be carried out in precisely the way you describe. It sometimes happens, however, that, where certain members of a denomination feel conscientiously a special zeal for their own doctrines and a special freedom in working along the lines of their own denomination, it is better for them to form an organization of their own. Denominational differences sometimes run very deep. They are largely matters of taste and preference, but where they amount to intense conviction it is perhaps as well to encourage those who hold them to form their own local organization. As a matter of fact, it often happens that the denominational churches, if they work side by side in a truly neighborly spirit, accomplish more than a single union church.

A. M. H., Walum, N. D. In the first person, "shall" expresses simple futurity; that is, it predicts or announces that the speaker or speakers will do certain things, while "will" in the first person signifies determination. Thus "I shall" means merely "I am going to do so and so." "I will" means "I am determined to do so and so." In the second and third persons this is reversed, "will" being used to denote simple futurity, "shall" to express an order, command, obligation or promise. There are exceptions, however, to this general usage.

J. N. M., Wichita, Kan. What is the derivation and meaning of the word Jehovah?

Jehovah means "He who is" or the "Existing One." It is "regarded as designating God as eternal, immutable, who will never be other than the same." There seems little doubt that this is the real meaning of the word, but about its pronunciation there have been endless difficulties. The Jews came to regard this particular name of the deity as too sacred to pronounce; so, whenever it occurred in their Scriptures, they read another word, "Adonai," meaning "Lord." The Hebrew text was written, originally, without vowels, the vowels being added later in the forms of dots and other marks made beneath or above or at the side of the consonants. When these vowels were written into the original text, the vowels of "Adonai" were substituted for the vowels of the name that was never uttered, and the readers always substituted this word "Adonai" for the other. The English word Jehovah, then, is a strange combination of errors. If the vowels of Adonai were really added to the consonants J H V H the word should have been Jahovah. But since the Hebrews never in actual speech used such a combination of consonants and vowels, modern scholars, in writing Scripture passages and discussing them, use the term Jahveh or Jahweh, which is as near as we can come in English speech to that ancient ineffable Name.

W. B., Mooresville, N. C. 1. A humane nation performs its duty to Christianity and civilization in feeding a nation stricken by famine. 2. World peace is not promised in Scripture until the Prince of Peace establishes his kingdom on earth and all the nations are converted. 3. The original causes of the present war have long since been lost sight of. The first provocation was the assassination of the Crown Prince and Princess of Austro-Hungary. 4. Write to Biglow & Main, publishers, 156 Fifth Avenue, New York, for the information desired.

W. D., Huntington, Ind. Is it morally right to promise to keep inviolate in our own breast any or all of the secrets of a brother in an order or brotherhood?

We can conceive of circumstances under which a great wrong might be inflicted by the withholding of knowledge that had been committed to us under the pledge of secrecy. One who has given such a pledge, however, and who feels bound in honor to observe it, would in such a case find himself between two fires, his pledge holding him silent on the one hand, and perhaps his duty to his country, his fellow citizens or his friends calling loudly upon him to divulge what he knows on the other. The whole question must hinge on the nature of the pledge itself. It should bind him to secrecy, if at all, only in relation to matters of a class which could not affect the welfare of others, nor reflect upon his own honor. In other words, he should take no pledge which would make him the custodian of secrets that might be harmful to others, morally or materially, because such a pledge would in itself be immoral if not illegal. The logical deduction is that oath-bound secret pledges should be avoided altogether, and also the orders which impose them.

F. A. S., Chillwack, B. C. The "sin unto death" mentioned in I John 5:16, has been variously discussed. Alford holds that it is denying Jesus to be the Christ, the Son of pray for the impenitent, "it must be with humble submission to God's will, as knowing all, and not with the intercession request which we would offer for a brother who was engaged in a way that we clearly understood."

H. W., Artesian, S. D. There are many passages in Job that are very obscure. The passage in 21:29 is a request of Job's answer to the arguments of his friends, who have been questioning him for proof of the pleasure a man can have from the children of his house after he is dead. The passages in the progress of the argument that make him pessimistic; but if we turn to Job's magnificent declaration of his faith in God, in chapter 19:26, 27, the strength of his trust is seen to be unshakable.

Reader, Fairfield, Vt. We are distinctly told in the latter days false prophets and misleaders would arise to deceive, if possible, the very elect. Why not ask to your own denomination and induce your husband to do the same? Take advice of your own pastor in what you have confidence. We cannot judge, from what you write of the itinerant preacher in question, what his doctrine is; but if they are as you state them, you should be careful not to give them serious consideration.

C. F., Escondido, Calif. The verses are not in the collections.

Saddened, Lakeport, N. H. 1. The passage in Luke 21:32 has been more clearly rendered (Mark 13:35) by modern translators in these words: "This generation shall not pass until it sees all these things coming to pass that is, the beginning of the manifestation predicted, a sign not its complete development." 2. In Mark 4:12 the meaning is held to be that the Scribes and Pharisees, under the difficulty of having their ears and undersouls judicially sealed so that they could not apprehend the soul-penetrating, life-giving words addressed to them. Men who thus deliberately preferred darkness to light became morally incapable of spiritual apprehension.

Mrs. A. H. M., Rolfe, Iowa. While all charity, in the broad sense, may be regarded as a part of the Lord's work, which we do in our relationship with the church or outside of it, the claims of needy relatives are hardly to be classed in the same category. Within certain limitations such claims are a legal obligation on us—a bounden duty. We do not quite see how it can legitimately be charged upon a part of our religious offering.

Constant Reader, Amelia, Va. Judging from your description of religious conditions in your community you have an excellent field and a fine opportunity for a union church. We should advise you to write to the General Council of Churches, 105 East Twenty-second Street New York, which will assist you with practical advice, as also as to a form of constitution, etc. You should endeavor to stimulate every resident in the district to do his/her part in making the enterprise a success.

J. G. B., Indianapolis, writes: "I noticed on the side front cover of the Christian Herald issue, September 29, a poem entitled 'The Good Old Hymns.' I have often one recently that is so nearly like the one just mentioned that I am taking the liberty to send it to you." This is the poem enclosed, which we take pleasure in printing since, as the author suggests, it may be the means of helping some one:

You may talk of processions, anthems and such,
And their splendor I cannot deny;
But for soul-stirring music my heart-strings to touch,
Let me sing "In the Sweet Bye and Bye."

I care not for honor or fame here below,
Nor would I of wealth have a share;
But my heart becomes lighter and brighter, I know,
When I sing "Is My Name Written There?"

I scorn many pleasures that money can bring
Such as leisure or earthly renown;
But my soul thrills with rapture whenever I sing,
"Will There Be Any Stars in My Crown?"

I'm in league with my Saviour; he loves me, I know,
And will help me his praises to sing;
And then, when at last to bright glory I go,
I'll shout, "I'm a Child of a King!"

D. E. B., Alta., Can. We can find no record of a demand of the kind having been made.

W. J. W. C., Santa Maria, Calif. Doubtless the R. J. Campbell Morgan, when he made the statement that out for the fall, death need not have entered the world in mind the language of Milton in "Paradise Lost"—

"Of man's first disobedience, and the fruit
Of that forbidden tree, whose mortal taste
Brought sin into the world, and all our woe."

No human being is wise enough to say what the condition or progress of the race might have been, had it remained unfallen and sinless.

Please define the following words, which I have met across in my reading: Aryan (or Arian), Turanian.

Aryan is a name given to the family of languages spoken in the greater part of Europe, in Persia, in India, and in countries peopled by European colonists, such as America, Australasia, South Africa, etc. The word "Arian," which you seem to confound it, is the name of a religious sect taught by Arius, who lived in the fourth century. "Turanian" is a term applied to a family of languages spoken in central Asia and some parts of Europe, to which Finnish, Hungarian and Turkish belong. The word is not much used by writers, who prefer the term Ural-Altaic.

The MOOSE CALL

By Margaret E. Sangster, Jr.

"Far through the wood comes the sound of her calling,
Calling me down to the deep flowing stream;
Sweet is her voice as the swift water falling,
Soft is her tone as the breath of a dream.

"Faintly I hear her. I push through the briars, Twigs snap before me and branches are torn;
Swift do I run as the forest of fires,
Light is my heart as the breeze of the morn.

"Little white rabbit, leap out of my highway,
Fly, little bird, with your whispering hum;
Down to the water through woodtrail and byway,
My love is calling and bidding me come.

"Louder her voice grows—she hears my tread beating,
Even the flowers and grasses make way;
Even the trees shall bow down to our meeting;
I am the king of the forests today!

"Out in the water I creep—has she waited?
God of the woodland! 'Tis man come to kill.
Bright is the flash of the gun that I hated—"

All of the forest is stricken—and still.

God, and that those making such wilful denials are not to be regarded as brothers, or received into one's house (See II John, verses 10, 11). It is believed by others to be the sin of wilful and persistent apostasy, "a state of soul in which faith, love and hope—the new light—are extinguished. It is a palpable rejection of grace, and when a man puts life from him by such an act, others cannot procure life for him." We should not attempt to judge finally even in such cases. If we

A Boy Who Dared

By Arthur H. Howland

WE have been getting pictures through the year of the lives of two great nations. We saw a nation develop from a tribe of nomads and wanderers; we saw divided into two kingdoms; we saw the torment of its people as they lived face to face with the seductions of heathenism and were being constantly drawn away from the true faith; we have heard the words and seen the deeds of the two great prophets of the Northern Kingdom as they sought to warn the people back to God; we saw a great revival in the Southern Kingdom and watched the people rebuilding their desolated temple. But we knew all the time that the day was to turn out badly, and that the kingdoms were to be punished and overthrown. The destruction of the Northern Kingdom is related in the nineteenth chapter of II Kings, commencing soon after the events of our lessons about Joash. Today we look ahead, at a number of events which will be related in later lessons, and witness some of the scenes accompanying the overthrow of the Southern Kingdom of Judah.

There was a boy looking on when the armies of Babylon were besieging Jerusalem. He saw the city fall and the king bound with fetters to be taken away to the heathen capital. Priceless vessels from the temple were also carried along. Then came the startling revelation that he himself, and a few other young men, were to go back to Babylon as special favorites of the conquering king, to be inmates of his palace and to be trained in the affairs of that great kingdom. Daniel must have been a very strange sort of a boy if his grief at the defeat of his own city and people was not pretty much overshadowed by his wonderment at the events of his journey, his anticipation of the greater joys to come, and his bewilderment at the scenes of the palace and the city. Try putting yourself in his place. A whole city and people believing that they were mistaken in your ideas of God and morality. Is your hold on God strong enough and your determination to go right deep enough to meet such a test? A nation, a palace, a king who was his friend, bent on doing things that he considered wrong. But he did not forget his home, his faith, his people. Then came an order from the king himself. This boy and his friends must drink the wine and eat the meat of the king's table.

"A nation, a city, a palace, a king—away. 'Eat and drink.' And this is what Daniel dares to stand up and say."

That is almost the loudest "No" that has ever been uttered, for people, particularly young people, are hearing the sound of it and feeling the thrill of it even today, after near three thousand years.

Daniel was doubtless very lonely when he made his decision first. He seems to have made it before knowing what his three comrades would do. "In his heart," he purposed. First he stood alone, then with three friends—none with millions. He is a friend and ally and champion and leader for all the minds of the people that have made up the minds to do right.

Choices from the Holy Land

THE four Jewish names of Daniel and his companions all contained the name of Israel's God and were all changed to names which contained the names of heathen gods. Converts from Judaism almost invariably desire a change of name at baptism and are not discouraged in this wish. When certificates of baptism are given, it is customary to mention the old name as well as the new one given. Muhammad is often changed to Abd-el-Masih, "the servant of Christ."

"Fulse" means specifically peas and beans, but no doubt included in Daniel's casual vegetable food, very probably also what strict Catholics make use of during Lent. Unless animals are killed by Jewish butchers, using certain special formulas, their flesh is reckoned

Daniel in the King's Court

International Sunday School Lesson for November 14. Daniel 1:1-24
World's Temperance Sunday

unclean. In our mission schools and hospitals great care is taken of the food in order not to hurt the conscience of either Moslem or Jew. We make no use of lard in any form of food. At Tiberias on the Sea of Galilee the Scotch Hospital keeps two kitchens and two sets of waiters, food and dishes in order to avoid ceremonial defilement of the patients.

For thirty-three years I have watched American and other sailors in foreign ports and have had occasion to mourn over the painful spectacle of drunken Christians reeling through Moslem streets. It is a pleasant task to mark the change for the better during recent years among sailors of all nationalities. It is with great pride that we can now point to our American navy as having the cleanest, manliest, best-behaved sailors that enter our port. I have had the privilege of traveling as a guest on several of our American men-of-war since the new orders forbidding the use of intoxicating liquors among men and officers. The change for the better permeates every department of conduct and service. Both officers and men are younger by many years and no one can question their ability to handle these valuable aggregations of delicate machinery. Steady hands, clear brains, clean bodies are the rule and not the exception in all departments. Neither the officers nor the men would go back to the old conditions when rations of grog and ward-room drinking were the rule. Captain Blakely of the U. S. S. Des Moines, on whose ship I was a guest only ten days ago, told me that out of 957 liberties granted in Beirut during the stay there, not one sailor was punished for overstaying his leave. This could never have been possible even five years ago. He gave all praise to those who have been instrumental in formulating and sustaining a temperance policy for our United States navy.

Alcohol the Enemy

By Amos R. Wells

THE Jewish children that Nebuchadnezzar required were to have no physical blemish, were to be beautiful, skilful, and able to serve the king. What would be the result if some modern Nebuchadnezzar should make such a demand of American parents? Professor

Wood of the Teachers' College of Columbia University once classified our twenty million school children as follows: about five per cent. (one million) have defective hearing; about one-fourth (five million) have defective vision; about one-fourth (five million) are poorly nourished; more than thirty per cent. (six million) have enlarged tonsils, adenoids, or cervical glands needing attention; more than half (ten million)—and in some schools as high as ninety-eight per cent.—have defective teeth which interfere with health.

Such children cannot study well, they suffer much, and they are a constant nursing-ground of contagious diseases.

What an indictment of our civilization would Nebuchadnezzar draw from these facts!

After Nebuchadnezzar found his model Jewish children he had them nourished and trained for three years in preparation for his service. For that same purpose we today have three agencies: the home, the church (in the Sunday schools and young people's societies) and the public schools. What is the education given by the three? Test it by Professor Huxley's noble definition: "That man has a liberal education who has been so trained in youth that his body is the ready servant of his will, and does with ease and pleasure the work that it is capable of; whose intellect is a clear logic engine, ready to spin the gossamers as well as forge the anchors of the mind—one full of life and fire but whose passions are trained to come to heel by a rigorous will; the servant of a tender conscience, who has learned to love beauty, to hate vileness, and to respect others as himself; such a one is in harmony with nature; they will get on together." For "nature" the Christian will read "God," and with this change how fine is the definition, and how seldom does a so-called "educated" person come up to it!

That Daniel was educated according to this definition is indicated by the strong sentence, "Daniel purposed in his heart that he would not defile himself." A holy determination is the grandest product of education. Fixity of aim, a mighty purpose, is the secret of success. William Herschel, the great astronomer, would work for sixteen hours polishing a telescopic mirror and not once take his hand from it; his sister, equally interested, put food in his mouth from time to time. The two made observations outdoors on nights so cold that their recording ink froze in the bottle, but they hardly noticed it. Such zeal opened the starry universe to Herschel. Such zeal opened to Daniel the heavens of God's thought and his plans for the world.

Daniel's temperance purpose was the strongest factor in his rapid advance. This was for many reasons: it left his brain clear, his body strong, and his conscience active. Alcohol, also, has been truly called "a narcotic to ambition." Even in small quantities, it makes one satisfied with one's self, and sluggishly acquiescent in one's achievements. "By thus deadening the feelings," says Professor G. Sims Woodhead, M.D., "alcohol is doing more to interfere with the advancement of the race than any other factor with which we have to deal." It is holding our possible Daniels down in the ditch.

The How Column

ANSWERS right from the workshop. Being the personal statements of successful Sunday school teachers, selected for the Christian Herald by Mr. Frank L. Brown, Joint General Secretary of the World's Sunday School Association, from letters sent him in answer to the questions recently published.

This week the question answered is "How I prepare the lesson." Each of the following paragraphs is an individual answer:

I first get my own thought from the Bible-reading, then, taking my helps, check each thought that impresses me. Then on a slip I place enough to recall the thought when I go before the class.

I make a practice of writing out my lessons and then studying them. I generally do this as near the first part of the week as possible, so that I may gather illustrations here and there during the week to fit in. I make a brief outline to take to class instead of the whole written lesson.

I spend about five hours a week in the preparation of the lesson, making a list of questions and reading as much as I can from books which will give light upon the subject.

I study lesson text, connecting Scripture and lesson helps, select teaching material, systematize the points selected, and ask God's help on the preparation.

I commence on Monday and each day study some, and give a longer time to it on Saturday night.

I set aside certain hours each week for this purpose.

Study of Bible text and supplementary text-books, search for a story or incident for point of contact, then vivifying of lesson story and application.

I think of my girls, their needs and temptations, then read the lesson with the thought, What is God's message to inspire them for service? Then read and reread to find the heart of the lesson—that is, where is Jesus in the lesson?—and pray that I may be able to get the truth.

I use Peloubet's notes, Josephus and every other reference that's good. I give five or six hours' study for a twenty-minute lesson.

I always know my lesson by heart. I spend a few minutes each day and go over all the material at the end of the week.

I begin preparation Sabbath afternoon for the following Sabbath.

I begin by reading the Scripture passage from the close of the last lesson and any connecting passages. Then use any other helps I have.

I read Scriptures which form lesson basis, read Quarterly Notes, read library references, and go over the proposed questions.

I use all helps obtainable, but leave all helps and Quarterly at home and teach from the Bible only.

I get a complete knowledge of the Bible story and use simple language in telling it.

TO all this wealth of suggestion growing out of the practical experience of these teachers, we shall next week add some plans which have been tested out that should make the teacher's personal preparation of the lesson a delight. Other teachers are invited to send in statements of their methods. Address all communications to Frank L. Brown, 247 New York Avenue, Brooklyn, N. Y.

"He Purposed in His Heart. . ."

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By REV. F. B. MEYER, B.A., D.D.

"Watch ye; stand fast in the faith; quit you like men; be strong."—I Cor. 16:13.

Here are the watch-words of Christian chivalry. We must watch against insidious temptations, which approach us stealthily and under disguise. The enemy may approach us in the uniform of a friend and comrade; or, as in Indian warfare in the skin of a harmless animal. Often our truest maneuver is to stand fast, neither yielding an inch, nor charging the foe. But the main element for us all, women as well as men is courage. "Be strong!" On one occasion Charles Kingsley was asked for his favorite motto, and he at once wrote the words, "Be strong!" When preaching his funeral sermon in Westminster Abbey, Dean Stanley said that the main lessons of his noble career might be summed up in these words. Diogenes the cynic was once found in the streets of Athens with a lighted candle in broad daylight, and seemed to be searching for something lost. On being challenged as to his meaning, he replied, "I am trying to find a man." But where Jesus lives in the heart he brings thither all the attributes of high and glorious character. Quit you like Christ! But notice the next verse! All must be done in love. It is a spurious strength which is boisterous and self-assertive. Be strong, fearless, tenacious of the truth, but be conciliatory, unselfish and forbearing.

A Religious Exhibit at Last

Dr. Geo. W. Hinman
Amer'n Missionary Asso.

Mrs. A. W. Reinhart
American Tract Society

Geo. W. Hunter
Bible Institute of L. A.

Mrs. Botsford
World's S. S. Association

TODAY every effort of humanity, whether commercial or social, advertises to the public through exhibits of photographs, or models, or motion pictures. Yet until 1915, no such exhibit had been made of the work of religion. Religion is intangible, a matter of the mind and of the heart that can not be photographed or sculptured or molded into visual shape; but the products of religion in its outpouring upon human life and human need and human relationships are capable of graphic representation and display.

Such a representation was skilfully worked out at the Panama-Pacific Exposition in San Francisco, under the direction of G. B. St. John, of New York City, who took charge of the "religious exhibits" just when the project to install them seemed doomed to failure, and brought them to such a degree of perfection that the whole exhibit was awarded the Grand Prize, while many medals and honorable mentions fell to individual exhibits.

The display occupies about 10,000 square feet of space in the Palace of Education and Social Economy, and is so arranged that the exhibits of each denomination and board, while grouped together, are still so related to all the others that it is possible to get a unified idea of the exact status of each line of endeavor throughout the world.

More than forty great church boards and organizations contributed to the success of this project—unique in religious enterprise—to show the country at large what the churches are doing in evangelism, in social service, in religious education, and in work among foreign-speaking people—in the open country, in the crowded city, in industrial communities, on frontier fields and beyond the seas.

During the exposition many thousands of visitors have passed through the exhibit; many stopped to see the motion pictures and to hear the lectures; and to all of them the material evidence must have been a revelation of what the religion of Jesus Christ has really meant to mankind as a social and material force.

The exhibit was one great advertisement for the Church of Christ. No one seeing it could again charge the church at large with failure to apprehend the needs of the world or with indifference in its endeavor to meet those needs. No one could look through the files and cases and say that the world had outgrown religion, or that faith was now impractical.

G. B. St. John
Director of Exhibits

A member of any of the great evangelical bodies could learn first from the exhibit of his own church what his denomination was doing, in a practical, results-getting way, to solve the social problems and the religious problems that are so intimately and inseparably united in the complex life of today. Then he could also compare the activities of his own communion with those of the others represented; and if the comparison was unfavorable to his own connection, the exhibits made it possible for him to see wherein his church had failed and wherein and by what methods success could be attained.

This display in its entirety and in its separate parts was and is so valuable that, as the exposition approached its date of closing, many of those most interested came to feel that the exhibit should be kept together and re-exhibited in the larger cities throughout the country. Thus its great educational and inspirational appeal will be carried on to those who were unable to go to San Francisco, and in each center where it is exhibited it will become a focal point for an educational campaign that should result in greater social effectiveness on the part of the churches in that field.

Plans for this chain of local exhibitions are not yet permanently closed. The first exhibition will be in Seattle for one week in January, 1916, and thirty-seven other cities are tentatively on the list, which will without doubt be extended sufficiently to keep the exhibits together for at least two years.

Each organization represented will pay a proportionate share of the expense of handling and caring for the exhibit, and will have a separate space where it may exhibit as a distinct unit. Trained leaders will accompany the exhibits from city to city, insuring competent oversight and arrangement and the greatest possible usefulness to each community. The exhibition will be held in the largest building available in each city under the auspices of the local Church Federation or Ministers' Association; and each denomination will make an exhibit of its own local work.

Thus the thousands of church members, both those who are earnest and those who are careless, will see the things that the church is doing. Duty will be removed from the region of abstract and half-understood statement to a graphic presentation of concrete evidence that can not be misunderstood.

The Religious Exhibit at the Panama Pacific Exposition

Mrs. Adj. Simps
Salvation Arm

Charles H. Coulter
Moody Bible Inst

Dr. Robert Irwin
American Bible Socy

Anabel Reed Scofield
Superintendent of Lanes

Amarilly of Clothes-Line Alley

By BELLE K. MANIATES

Copyright, 1915, by Little, Brown & Co. All rights reserved

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

AMARILLY made her bow to Christian Herald readers from the threshold of the Barlow "Theater," where she mopped floors and dreamed dreams. They saw her begin a struggle for the education necessary to the career of her dreams, and they went with her to St. Mark's, to the class whose teacher wore real hair and wasn't made up. Through this teacher, Colette King, Amarilly's mother became the laundress of St. Mark's and Amarilly met the rector, Rev. (St.) John Meredith, who invited her to attend morning service and who showed something more than a pastor's interest in Colette. Amarilly's soul responded to the church service and she thought it must be what Heaven was. Then scarlet fever quarantined them; and there came a morning when Amarilly had to forage for breakfast. The family fund once more got a modest start, which was accelerated by the mundane career of the minister's surplice, through which Amarilly and her thoroughness entered the world of art and the studio of Derry Phillips.

CHAPTER IX—Continued

THREE hours later, Amarilly went into the studio. The model had gone, and the artist stood before his easel surveying his sketch with approval.

"This is going to be a good picture, Amarilly. The model caught my idea. There is some fore—"

"Mr. Phillips!"

"My name is Derry. I am too young to be 'mistered.'"

There was no response, and with a smile he turned inquiringly toward her. There was a wan little droop about the corners of her eyes and lips that brought contrition to his boyish heart.

"Amarilly, you are tired! You have worked too steadily. Sit down and rest awhile."

"Tain't that! I'm hungry. Kin I het up the coffee and—"

"Good gracious, Amarilly! I forgot you ate at regular, stated intervals. We will go right out now to a nice little restaurant near by and eat our luncheon together."

Amarilly flushed.

"Thank you, Mr. Derry. That's awful nice in you, but I'd rather eat here. That's the toast and coffee to het, and an aig—"

"No! You are going to have a good square meal and eat it with me. You see I had to eat my birthday dinner all alone, so we'll celebrate the first of June now, together. Slip off your apron. By the way, some day I shall paint a picture of you in that apron scrubbing my 'mopboard.'"

Amarilly shook her head.

"I don't look fit to go nowhars with you, Mr. Derry."

"Vanitas, and the rest of it! Oh, Amarilly, only thirteen, and the ruling passion of your sex already in full sway!"

"It's on your account that I'm ashamed," she said in defense of his accusation. "I'd want ter look nice fer you."

"That's sweet of you, Amarilly; but if you really want to look nice, don't think of your clothes. It's other things. Think of your hair, for instance. It's your best point, and yet you hide it under a bushel and, worse than that, you braid it so tight I verily believe it's wired."

"I'm used to bein' teased about my red head," she replied. "I don't keer."

"It's a glorious red, Amarilly. The color the vulgar jeer at, and artists like your friend and twin, Derry, rave over. You're what is called 'Titian-haired.'"

"Are you makin' fun, Mr. Derry?" she asked suspiciously.

"No, Amarilly; seriously, I think it the loveliest shade of hair there is, and now I am going to show you how you should wear it. Unbind it, all for of those skin-tight braids."

She obeyed him, and a loosened, thick mass of hair fell below her waist.

"Glorious!" he cried fervidly. "Take that comb from the top of your head and comb it out. There! Now pat it, and catch up these strands loosely so. I must find a ribbon for a bow. What color would you suggest, Amarilly?"

"Brown."

"Bravo, Amarilly. If you had had blue, I should have lost all faith in your future upcoming. Here are two beautiful brown bows on this th—amajig some one gave me last Christmas, and whose claim on creation I never discovered. Let me braid your hair loosely for two and one-quarter inches. One bow here—another there. Look in the glass, Amarilly. If I give you these bows will you promise me never to wear your hair in any other fashion until you are sixteen at least? Off with your apron! It's picturesque, but sooty and exceedingly wet. You won't need a hat. It's only around the corner, and I want your hair to be observed and admired."

Amarilly gained assurance from the lection of her hair in the mirror, and they started gayly forth like two school children out for a lark. He shored her into a quiet little café that had an air of pronounced elegance about it. From a secluded corner behind some palms came the subdued notes of ringed instruments. Derry seemed to be well known here, and his waiter lewed his approach with an air of proprietorship.

"It's dead quiet here," thought Amarilly, wondering. "Like a church."

It was beginning to dawn upon her little brain that real things were all quiet, not noisy like the theater.

"What shall we have first, Amarilly?" quired her new friend with mock deference. "Bouillon?"

Amarilly, recalling the one time in her life when she had had "luncheon," plied casually that she preferred fruit, and suggested a melon.

"Good, Amarilly! You are a natural gourmand. Fruit, certainly, on a warm day like this. I shall let you select all the courses. What next?"

"Lobster," she replied nonchalantly. "Fine! And then?"

"Grapefruit salad." He looked at her in amazement, and detected that she had doubtless been employed in some capacity that had made her acquainted with luncheon menus.

"And," concluded Amarilly, without waiting for prompting, "I think an ice could be about right. And coffee in a little cup and some cheese."

"By all means, Amarilly," he responded humbly. "And what kind of cheese, please?"

"Now I'm stumped," thought Amarilly ruefully, "for I can't remember how to speak the kind she had."

"Most any kind," she said loftily, except that kind you put in mouselines."

"Oh, Amarilly, you are a true stoic! How comes it that you don't shiver? Is it on a bet?"

The waiter came up and said something to the artist in a low tone, and Derry replied hastily:

"Nothing today." Then, turning to Amarilly, he asked her if she would like a glass of milk. Upon her assent, he placed two glasses of milk, to the veiled surprise of the waiter.

WHEN the luncheon was served, Amarilly, by reason of her good memory, was still at ease. The children of the Guild school had been given a few general rules in table deportment, but Amarilly had followed every movement of Colette's so faithfully at the eventful luncheon that she ate very slowly, used proper forks and spoons, and won Derry's undisguised admiration.

"Mr. Vedder's good," she thought. "Mr. St. John's grand, but this 'ere Derry's folksy. I'd be skeert settin' 'em eatin' with Mr. St. John, but this 'ere's only a kid, and I feel quite to be with him."

Amarilly," he said confidentially, as they were sipping their coffee from the cups. "You are truthful, I know. And you are perfectly frank with me and never a question."

"Mebby," she replied warily. "Did you ever eat a luncheon like this before?"

"I never seen the inside of a resturant before," she replied.

"Now you are fenceing. I mean, did you ever have the same things to eat?"

Amarilly hesitated, longing to mystify him further, but it came over her in a flash how very kind he had been to her.

"Yes, I hev. I'll tell you all about it." Good! An after-dinner story! Beat it up, Amarilly!"

So she told him of her patroness and the luncheon she had eaten at her house.

And I watched how she et and done, and she tole me the names of the things wined. I writ them out, and that was my lesson that night with the Boarder."

Then, of course, Derry must know all about the Boarder and the brothers. And she had finished her faithful descriptions, it was time to return to the studio. Her quick, keen eyes had noted the size of the bill Derry had put on the counter, and the small amount of change he had received. She walked home beside him in troubled silence.

"What's the matter, Amarilly?" he asked as she was buttoning on her apron preparatory to resuming work. "Didn't the luncheon agree with you, or are you mad at me? And for why, pray?"

Amarilly's thin little face flushed and a tear came into each thoughtful eye.

"I hedn't orter to hev tole you ter git all them things. I was a-tryin' ter be smart and show off, but, honest, I didn't know they was a-goin' ter cost so much. I ain't a-goin' ter take no money fer the cleanin', and that'll help some."

Derry laughed rapturously.

"My dear child!" he exclaimed, when he could speak. "You are a veritable little field daisy. You really saved me money by going with me. If I had gone alone, I should have spent twice as much."

"How could that be?" she asked unbelievably. "You would only hev give one order, so 'twould hev ben jest half as much."

"But if you had not been with me, I should have had a cocktail and a bottle of wine, which would have cost more than our meal. Out of deference to your youth and other things, I forbore to indulge. So you see I saved money by having you along. And then it was much better for me not to have had those libations."

"Honest true?"

"Honest true, hope to die! Cross my heart and all the rest of it! I'd lie cheerfully to some people, but never to you, Amarilly."

"Mr. Reeves-Eggleston—he's on the stage—said artists was allers poor."

"That's one reason why I am not an artist—a great artist. I am hampered by an inheritance that allows me to live without working, so I don't do anything worth while. I only dabble at this and that. Some day, maybe, I'll have an inspiration."

"Go to work now," she admonished.

"I must perforce. My model's foot is on the stair."

AMARILLY left the studio to resume her cleaning. At five o'clock she came back. Derry stood at the window, working furiously at some fleecy clouds sailing over a cerulean sky. She was about to speak, but discerning that he must work speedily and uninterruptedly to keep pace with the shifting clouds, she refrained.

"There!" he said. "I got it. You were a good little girl not to interrupt me, Amarilly."

"It's beautiful!" gasped Amarilly. "I was afeard you'd git the sky blue instead of purplish and that you'd make the clouds too white."

"Amarilly, you've the soul of an artist! In you I have found a true critic."

"Come and see if the rooms is all right. I got 'em real clean. Every nook and corner. And —"

"I know you did, Amarilly, without looking. I can smell the clean from here."

"If that's nothin' more you want did, I'll go hum."

"Here's a dollar for the rooms and two dollars for the surplice. Amarilly, you were glad to learn table manners from Miss King, weren't you?"

"Yes; I like to larn all I kin."

"Then, will you let me teach you something?"

"Sure!" she acquiesced quickly.

"There are two things you must do for me. Never say 'et'; say 'ate' instead. Then you must say 'can'; not 'kin.' It will be hard to remember at first, but every time you forget and make a mistake, remember today and our jolly little luncheon, will you?"

"I will, and I can, Mr. Derry."

"You're an apt little pupil, Amarilly, and I am going to teach you two words every time you come."

"Oh!" exclaimed Amarilly, brightening. "Will you want me ter come agin?"

"Indeed I shall. I am going away next week to the mountains for a couple of months. When I come back, I am going to have you come every morning at nine o'clock. You can prepare and serve my simple breakfast and clean my rooms every day. Then they won't get so disreputable. I will pay you what they do at the theater, and it will not be such hard work. Will you enjoy it as well?"

"Oh, better!" exclaimed Amarilly. And with this naive admission died the last spark of Amarilly's stage-lust.

"Then consider yourself engaged. You can call for the surplice tomorrow afternoon at this hour."

"Thank you, Mr. Derry."

She hesitated, and then awkwardly extended her hand, which he shook most cordially.

"Thank you for a day's entertainment, Amarilly. I haven't been bored once. You have very nice hands," looking down at the one he still held.

She reddened and jerked her hand quickly away.

"Now you are kiddin'! They're redder than my hair, and rough and big."

"I repeat, Amarilly, you have nice hands. It isn't size and color that counts; it's shape, and from an artist's standpoint you have shapely hands. Now will you be good, and shake hands with me in a perfectly ladylike way? Thank you, Amarilly."

"Thank you, Mr. Derry. It's the beautifullest day I ever hed. Better'n the matinee or the Guild or —" she drew a quick breath and said in a scared whisper "the church!"

"I am flattered, Amarilly. We shall have many ruby-lettered days like it."

CHAPTER X

THE next afternoon Amarilly called at the studio for the surplice.

"I am glad to see you have your hair fixed as I told you, Amarilly," was Derry's greeting. "And have you remembered the other things I told you?"

"I hev writ out 'can' and 'ate' in big letters and pinned 'em up on the wall. I can say 'em right every time now."

"Of course you can! And for a reward, here's a dollar with which to buy some black velvet hair-ribbons. Never put any color but black or brown near your hair, Amarilly."

"No, Mr. Derry; but I don't want to take the dollar."

"See here, Amarilly! You're to be my little housemaid, and the uniform is always provided. Instead of buying you a cap and apron, I prefer to furnish velvet hair-ribbons. Take it, and get a good quality silk velvet. And now, good-by for two months. I will let you know when I am home so that you may begin on your duties."

"Good-by, Mr. Derry," said the little girl artlessly. "And that's something I'd like to say to you, if you don't mind."

"You may say anything—everything to me, Amarilly."

"When you go to eat, won't you order just as ef I was with you nothin' more?"

His fair boyish face reddened slightly, and then a serious look came into his dancing eyes.

"Oh, my, Amarilly! I've been wishing some girl who really meant it, who really cared, would say that to me. You put it very delicately and sweetly. I'll — yes, I'll do it all the time I'm gone. There's my hand on it. Good-by, Amarilly."

"Good-by, Mr. Derry."

Amarilly walked home very slowly, trying to think of a way to realize again from the surplice.

"I'm afeard I won't find a place to rent it right away," she sighed.

Looking up, she saw the Boarder. A slender, shy slip of a girl had his arm, and he was gazing into her intent eyes with a look of adoration.

"Oh, the Boarder is in love!" gasped Amarilly, her responsive little heart leaping in sympathetic interest.

"That's why he's wore a blue necktie the last few days. Lord Algernon said that was allers a sure sign."

She tactfully slipped around a corner, unseen by the entranced couple.

That night, as he was lighting his after-supper pipe, the Boarder remarked casually:

"I'd like to rent the surplus fer an hour to-morrow, Amarilly."

"Why, what on airth can you do with it?" was the astonished query.

The Boarder looked sheepish.

"You see, Amarilly, I'm akeepin' stiddy company with a little gal."

"I seen you and her this artemnoon."

For the Children

"Sugar in some form is necessary for children, as their universal craving for it shows. Sugar is best taken when combined with food, so candy should be restricted."

Elizabeth Robinson Scoville.

To every mother the candy question is perplexing. Its proper answer—indicated in the quotation given above—is wholesome cakes and cookies.

The objection that such foods may tax the digestion of the child can be overcome by making them with

CRISCO

For Frying—For Shortening
For Cake Making

Crisco contains no animal fats. It is entirely vegetable—and melts at less than body temperature, leaving no solids to delay digestion.

Crisco is packed in a great sun-lit, spotless building, finished throughout in glass and tile. No hand touches the product, all machinery is nicked or enameled and the very air is washed before it enters.

Crisco Brownies

- 1 cupful sugar
- 1/2 cupful Crisco
- 1 cupful molasses
- 2 eggs
- 1 cupful flour
- 1 cupful chopped nut meats
- 1/2 teaspoonful salt
- 1/2 teaspoonful vanilla extract

(Use level measurements)

Cream Crisco and sugar together, add eggs well beaten, molasses, extract, flour, salt and nuts. Divide into small fancy Criscoed tins, or bake in Criscoed sheet tin and cut in squares. Bake in moderate oven half hour. Crisco Brownies are a cross between cake and candy. Sufficient for twelve squares.

If you want to know more about Crisco and the conditions under which it is prepared, send for the "Calendar of Dinners". This cloth bound, gold-stamped book contains, besides the story of Crisco, a different dinner menu for every day of the year and 615 recipes gathered and carefully tested by the well-known cooking authority, Marion Harris Neil. Address Department S-11, The Procter & Gamble Company, Cincinnati, O., enclosing five 2-cent stamps. A paper-bound edition, without the "Calendar of Dinners" and with 250 recipes is free.

Resinol Soap

gives natural beauty to skin and hair

Resinol Soap is not only unusually cleansing and softening, but its regular use gives to the skin and hair that natural beauty of perfect health which even the best of cosmetics can only imitate. Pimples, redness and roughness disappear, and in a very short time the complexion becomes clear, fresh and velvety.

The soothing, restoring influence that makes this possible is the Resinol which this soap contains and which physicians have prescribed for years in Resinol Ointment, in the care of skin and scalp troubles.

If the skin is in bad condition through neglect or an unwise use of cosmetics, apply a little Resinol Ointment and let it remain on ten minutes before washing with Resinol Soap.

Resinol Soap is sold by all druggists and dealers in toilet goods. For a trial size cake and miniature box of Resinol Ointment, write to Dept. 42-A, Resinol, Baltimore, Md.

Doctors Recommend

VELLASTIC

Elastic Ribbed, Fleece-Lined UNDERWEAR

VELLASTIC is made the "health" way. Scientists agree that air is a great non-conductor of heat and cold. VELLASTIC with its thick, fleece lining keeps a cushion of warm air next to the skin. The porosity of the ribbed fabric keeps this aerated fleece dry and hygienic.

The fleece, besides protecting the body from draughts and colds, is gratefully pleasant to the skin, while the elasticity of the ribbed fabric permits perfect freedom of movement, and give smooth, snug fit. VELLASTIC is so well made, so strong in fabric and stitching that it is good for two seasons' wear and will more than save its costs in doctor's bills. Write for booklet No. 10

UNION SUITS $1.00 For MEN, WOMEN and CHILDREN SEPARATE GARMENTS 50c. UTICA KNITTING CO., Makers Utica, N. Y.

She's orful pretty," said Amarilly reflectively. "She looked kinder delikit, though. What's her name?"

"Lily—Lily Rose. Ain't that a purty name?"

"Beautiful. The lily part jest suits her. She's like a flower—a white flower. But what do you want the surplus fer?"

"You see," began the Boarder, coming by circuitous route to his subject, "gals git notions in their heads sometimes when they air in—"

"Love," promptly supplied the comprehending little girl.

"Yes," he assented with a fiery blush. "And she wants fer me to hev my likeness took so I kin give it to her."

"Thar ain't nothin' foolish about that!" declared Amarilly.

"No; but I never sot fer one yet. I wouldn't mind, but you see she's got it in her head that I am good-looking—"

"Well, you be," corroborated Amarilly decisively.

"And she wants me fer to dress up like a preacher. I told her about Hallie Hudgers lookin' so swell in the surplus, and she wants as I should dress up in it and set fer my likeness in it."

"I think it would be fine!" approved Amarilly. "You sure would look nicer nor Hallie did."

"Well, I wouldn't look like a dead one," admitted the Boarder. "But I was orful afraid you'd laugh. Then I kin rent it fer an hour to-morrer ef it ain't got no other dates."

"You can't rent it. You can take it fer an hour, or so long as you like," she assured him.

"You'll hev to take a quarter an way, fer luck. Mebbly 'twill bring a luck awinnin' her."

The photograph of the Boarder saintly attire was pronounced a great success. Before the presentation he had it set in a frame made of gilt network studded with shells.

Lily Rose spent her leisure moment gazing upon it with the dream-centred eyes of a young devotee before a shrine.

The next wearing of the surplice was more in accord with its original design. In the precinct adjoining the one which lived and let live the Jenkins family, a colored Episcopal church had recently been established. The rector had but one surplice, and that had been stolen from the clothes-line, mayhap one of his dusky flock; thus it was that Amarilly received a call from the Reverend Virgil Washington, who had heard of the errant surplice, which offered to purchase.

Naturally his proposition was met by a firm and unalterable refusal. It would have been like selling a golden goose to dispose of such a profitable commodity. He then asked to rent it for a Sunday while he was having one made. The application, being quite in Amarilly's line of business, met with a ready assent.

"You can hev it fer a dollar," she offered.

The bargain was finally closed, though it gave Amarilly more than a passing pang to think of the snowy folds of Mr. St. John's garment adorning an Ethiopian form.

(To be continued)

Christian Herald Prayer League

A BELIEVER in Prayer, Doster, Mich., writes: "I wish you to know that the mother with five children who had tuberculosis and was beyond all medical help is well on the way to recovery—able to do more than for a year. The physician for whose health prayer was requested is improving." Mrs. C. R. Y., Essex, Mo., writes: "Some time ago a mother asked for prayers to regain the use of limbs. The prayer has been graciously answered." A mother from Iowa writes: "I asked you some time ago to help me pray for my son. He is better both mentally and physically." Mrs. J. N. writes from Tennessee: "The woman who had pellagra and felt that she was spiritually lost now says she is saved, since I asked the Prayer League to pray for her." An Illinois Subscriber writes: "Some time ago I asked prayers for our family doctor that he might be given strength to give up the liquor habit, and I want to tell you our prayers have been answered. I think he has not indulged in the habit since I wrote." M. E. G. writes from Pennsylvania: "I asked for prayers when I was in financial distress, of which I have now been relieved." M. A. G. writes from Michigan: "I wish to acknowledge what I believe was an answer to prayer concerning financial circumstances." A. M. A. writes from Keesville, N. Y.: "God has given me wonderful answers to prayer, and I know he does hear." Mrs. R. M. writes from Iowa: "I wish to acknowledge answer to a special prayer and the granting of almost everything I desire." M. F. S. writes: "I want to tell you that God answered my prayer. He is showering blessings upon me. I ask the prayers of the League that I may be able to fill the excellent position God sent me in answer to your prayers."

Acknowledgments of answered prayer have also been received from: E. L. M., J. A. H., Texas; Miss E. H. B., Washington, D. C.; A. Reader, Fort Scott, Kan.; A. B. C., Philadelphia, Pa.; A. Friend, Lock Haven, Pa.; Mrs. L. B., Rushford, Minn.; Mrs. Y. C. O., West Alexander, Pa.; E. J. R., Sunnyside, Wash.; Mrs. D. J. R., Nevada, Mo.; A. Reader, Pittsburg, Pa.; A. M. S. (for improvement of granddaughter's health and that grandson might become more interested in his studies).

A lady, after stating that a certain document is believed to have been confiscated by a man now dead, asks prayer that his child, who is abundantly able to do so, may make full restitution for the property alienated by his act. A writer who signs herself Earnest asks prayer that her failing eyesight may be strengthened and that mental and bodily health may soon be restored.

Prayers are asked for revivals of religion at Laurel, Md.; Oneida, N. Y. (that the evangelist now conducting a campaign there may be blessed); that all the saloons may be closed; Middle Haddam, Conn.; Toledo, O.; Bowling Green, Va.; La Pryor, Tex.; Goldendale, Wash.; Cortland, N. Y.; Perry, Ill.; St. Louis, Mo.; Edson, Pa. (that Sunday school may be blessed); Keesville, N. Y. A Subscriber, Pittsfield, N. H., asks prayer for a man who is seeking salvation; also twenty-five men in a country neighborhood at need conversion and two men to be reclaimed. Mrs. M. H. asks prayer for the abolishing of idolatry and ruin in this country. Mrs. W. L., Perry, asks prayer that a church may vote to keep the same preacher another year.

Mrs. A. T. B. asks prayer that her mother's mind may be restored; E. S. K., her sister; A. Mother and Mrs. W. M. J., their daughter; S. W., E. H. W., and L. C., their sister; Mrs. A. E., a brother's; Mrs. W. P., her son's; R. A. and Mrs. J. Y., their friends. Ten other friends ask prayer for the restoration of themselves or other friends.

L. H. asks prayer that mother's sight may be strengthened; C. R. J. asks prayers at his wife's sight may be restored; L. I. a daughter's; Mrs. J. N. M., a nephew's; A. H., a little girl's; A. Subscriber, an old lady; M. E. M. asks that threatened blindness may be averted; J. D., a friend's and his; eighteen other friends ask prayer for restoration or strengthening of sight for themselves or friends.

J. A. H. asks prayer that God will revivify him his entire Christian work and give him power and grace to do it. Fifty-six other friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing.

S. W. and S. G. both ask prayers that their sons may be delivered from the liquor habit. Mrs. M. R., Mrs. R. S., H. H. T., Mr. C. R., Mrs. E. M. W., Mrs. C. A. F., M. J. H. S., F. C., and Mrs. S. H. W., their sons; S. A. C., Mrs. W. L. P., and Mrs. K. A., their grandsons; J. E. Y., Mrs. V. A., Mrs. A. I. B., Mrs. E. C. V. K., A. B., Mrs. L. A., and F. O., their brothers. Four other friends ask prayer that their husbands may be delivered from this habit. Eleven other friends ask prayer that relatives or friends be saved from the liquor habit. H. L. K. asks prayer that son may be cured of the drug habit; P. A. J., that a woman may be cured of the drug habit, and Mrs. E. G., that a neighbor may be cured of the morphine habit.

Mrs. L. N. asks prayer that four sons may be saved; thirty-three other parents ask prayer for the conversion of sons. Twenty-two prayer for the conversion of their husbands. Twenty-eight other readers ask prayer for the conversion of relatives or friends. Twenty-eight friends ask prayer for special eternal blessing for relatives or friends. One hundred and thirty-eight friends ask prayer for the healing of relatives or friends. Mrs. M. A. A. requests prayer for the regaining of the power of speech; S. W. that she regain the use of limbs. Eighty-six other friends ask prayer for the healing of various diseases for themselves. Eight friends ask prayer that hearing may be restored to themselves or other friends.

Thirty-two friends ask prayer for help or guidance in financial affairs. Forty-nine friends ask prayer for the granting of varied needs and desires.

If a Young Mother, who is afflicted with dropsy and who asked special prayers for her recovery, particularly for the sake of her infant child, will write giving her name and address, we shall be glad to forward a letter which has been sent to us by a reader interested in her case.

Do You Know Your Bible?

New Questions

1st Year Contest, List No. 3; Year's Contest, List No. 8

Philemon and Ephesians

Philemon

(a) What friend to whom Paul sends a message in the letter to the Colossians is also mentioned in the salutations to Philemon? (b) What four friends who joined in the salutations to the Colossians join also in the greeting to Philemon?

(a) For whom does Paul ask favor from Philemon? (b) What verse indicates that this man had been Philemon's servant? (c) How is he looked now to receive him?

(a) What two expressions indicate that the servant and his master were not on good terms? (b) What expression suggests that the servant was a prisoner with Paul? (c) What guarantee does Paul make as to any loss the master might have suffered from the ways of the servant? (d) What expression shows that Paul wrote this letter late in life?

Ephesians

(a) Who is mentioned as the messenger of all to the Ephesians as he was also to the Colossians? (b) Is any other friend mentioned by name in the epistle to the Ephesians else as sending greetings or as designated to receive special greetings from Paul?

(a) Were the members of the Ephesian church Jews or Gentiles? (b) Give at least two references. (c) By what means did Christ bring the aliens into the family of God? (d) What constituted between the two groups the dividing line which Christ destroyed?

(a) What attitude had these Ephesians taken toward the message of Christ's gospel? (b) What blessing had they received afterward? (c) What passage in the Acts tells of this experience?

(a) What passages contain the two wonderful prayers of Paul for the Ephesian Christians? (b) To whom, according to an expression the first of these prayers, does God's great power come? (c) How also (according to an expression in the second prayer) is the experience of Christ's indwelling obtained and kept?

(a) With how much of God does Paul pray that the Ephesians might be filled? (b) Note the wonderful verse which shows them praying for spiritual blessings no request is too extravagant. (c) What verse far along in the epistle states the purpose for which Christ gave his life for the church?

(a) In the great chapter on Christian unity what church offices are specially mentioned?

tioned? (b) What two expressions, occurring also in the epistle to the Colossians, does Paul use to designate the sinful self and the new nature? (c) Quote the two verses in which the apostle makes a beautiful appeal for love and forbearance among fellow Christians. (d) What passage in Ephesians corresponds strikingly with the passage in Colossians in which Paul gives special counsel about the duties of family and social relationships?

(a) State the various graces and gifts and help Paul mentions in describing the Christian's armor, stating what place each fills in that equipment.

Honor Roll for List No. 7

Hattie P. Axtell; Hattie Baldwin; Ethel Barber; Mrs. John Bissett; Mrs. C. C. Brown; Mrs. Lettie Cobb; Lillian Cox; Dr. H. F. Datesman; Charles W. Dickinson; Mrs. Wallace Eaton; Miss Anna Evenson; Mrs. Carl Foreman; John A. Freeman; Mrs. Eliza J. Fuller; Mrs. Susan A. Glover; Mae Granger; Miss I. Volucia Guppy; Mrs. E. A. Hall; Torrence J. Harer; Delia M. D. Harris; Mrs. J. R. Hissem; Miss Flora A. Johnson; Clara J. Kelly; Ethel Maple; Mrs. Lizzie Morse; Miss W. Nicholson; Miss Carolyn Noyes; J. N. Ogle; Mrs. Wm. Pitt; D. B. Raulins; Mrs. L. B. Riddell; Mrs. J. W. Smith; Miss E. L. Standiford; Anna G. Stine; Annie Tipton; Miss Mary E. Wagner; Miss Mary Willet.

Correct Answers to List No. 7

1. "For which I am in bonds," Col. 4:3. Aristarchus, my fellow prisoner," 1:10. Remember my bonds," 4:18.

2. (a) "And for as many as have not seen my face in the flesh," Col. 2:1; (b) Laodicea, 4:16. (c) Hierapolis, 4:13.

3. (a) Epaphras, 4:12; (b) Col. 1:7.

4. (a) Tychicus and Onesimus, 4:7-9. (b) Aristarchus, Mark, Justus, Epaphras, Luke, and Demas, 4:10, 11, 12, 14.

5. (a) Col. 2:4, also 2:8; (b) worship of angels, 2:18; will worship, 2:23.

6. Col. 1:15-19, 2:9.

7. (a) "To present you holy and without blemish and unreprouvable before him," 1:22; (b) Col. 1:22; 2:10, 12, 13, 20; 3:1, 3, 4.

8. (a) In Christ, 2:10. (b) to continue in the faith, 1:23.

9. "Old man" and "new man," 4:9, 10.

10. (a) Love, 3:14. (b) that they might stand perfect and complete, assured in all the will of God," 4:12.

What Our Big Wheat Crop Means

It is estimated by competent authorities that the wheat crop of the present year will be between 950,000,000 and 1,000,000,000 bushels. The New York Journal of Commerce recently placed it at 966,000,000. But we shall be fully within the limit if we call the minimum 950,000,000 bushels. The total acreage to wheat this year is 60,000 acres. This is equivalent to the total acreage of the following states: Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York and Pennsylvania.

This great wheat farm it is estimated that 150,000 men have been employed this season, who have received at the last calculation $1,800,000 for each week's service in the fields. At this wage wheat is quoted in the Chicago market at $1.05 per bushel, but to call it I will make it easier figuring. This would give us for the 1915 crop a value of $950,000,000. Let us see if we can make this statement a little more comprehensible!

This vast sum were made available in 1 bank notes and these were placed end to end on the proposed Lincoln Highway between New York and San Francisco, a distance of 3,500 miles they would extend across the continent 30 times, or they would make a carpet for the highway eight feet wide the entire length of the road.

To transport the crop to market would require 950,000 freight cars carrying the minimum of 1,000 bushels each. These would make up two continuous trains of 475,000 cars each stretching across the continent, or if divided into the ordinary train lengths of 40 cars they would make 23,750 trains, which, if moving side by side, allowing each train a trackage width of 10 feet, would cover a space 45 miles wide.

Again, the wheat crop of this season if used entirely for bread would make 190,000,000 barrels of flour, estimating at the usual rate of five bushels to the barrel. A barrel of flour ordinarily makes 200 loaves of bread. This would give a grand total of 38,000,000,000 loaves. Assuming that there are 20,000,000 men under arms in the Great War, which may be a rather liberal estimate, and that each were to be given the minimum allowance of one loaf of bread a day, our wheat crop would afford "the staff of life" to 20,000,000 men for a period of about five years.

J. WALLACE DARROW.
Editor of The Grange Review.

The Book of Knowledge

THE CHILDREN'S ENCYCLOPÆDIA

Has been awarded

The First Medal of Honor and Gold Medal

FOR EDUCATIONAL VALUE by the INTERNATIONAL SUPREME JURY of the Panama-Pacific Exposition

375,000 Copies Sold
In Four Languages
On Five Continents

350 Color Plates
10,000 Educational Pictures
Complete Index

Answers Every Question a Child Can Ask

Why is the sea never still?
Why are the rain drops round?
What is the use of our hair?
Do we think in words?
How far off is the sky?
What makes the heart beat?
What is the milky way?
Why do we go to sleep?
What makes a cat purr?
Why does the kettle sing?
Is a stone alive?
Does a plant eat?
What keeps the stars in place?

And Thousands of Others

WINIFRED SACKVILLE STONER, Jr., says:
OF THE BOOK OF KNOWLEDGE

"When people wonder how I have been able to gain a knowledge of the many subjects taught in college without going to school, I tell inquirers that I did not get my information from teachers, but from my good companions—the pages of THE BOOK OF KNOWLEDGE."

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD says of this wonderful girl: "Many scientists and educators now declare her to be the most wonderfully developed little girl in America."

The World's Great Gift to the Child

In 375,000 families THE BOOK OF KNOWLEDGE has become the center of usefulness and delight. It is an absolute necessity in the practical education of the child of today. It is the only work of a serious educational character which children do not have to be urged to read. It draws like a magnet. 10,000 fascinating pictures and brief and simply written story-articles form the Simplest Scheme of Universal Knowledge ever devised. It is a wholesome fountain bubbling up for every thirsty child. Every teacher knows that children who possess this first work of reference for the young lead their classes. YOUR CHILD CANNOT AFFORD TO DO WITHOUT IT ANOTHER DAY.

Mail This Coupon for Free Book

Mail this coupon for 65-page free illustrated book describing the 16 Great Departments which form THE SIMPLEST SCHEME OF UNIVERSAL KNOWLEDGE, with fascinating educational pictures and colored plates. And containing 250 interesting questions answered in THE BOOK OF KNOWLEDGE.

THE GROlier SOCIETY
2 West 45th St., New York

Please mail me descriptive sample book, "The Child and THE BOOK OF KNOWLEDGE," explaining the psychology of the work.

NAME _____

ADDRESS _____

Not necessary to cut coupon if you C.H. 11-3 mention Christian Herald

Beautiful Hands

will retain their delicate softness and smoothness in any climate if you will use a little

Hinds Cream

every day. Gently applied before and after exposure to sun and wind, or after household tasks are done it keeps the skin fresh and clear—prevents chapping, roughness and windburn.

Selling everywhere, or postpaid by us on receipt of price. Hinds Cream in bottles, 50c. Hinds Cold Cream in tubes, 25c. Samples sent for 2c stamp to pay postage. Do not take a substitute—Hinds Cream will improve the skin. A. S. HINDS, 291 West St., Portland, Maine. Try HINDS Honey and Almond Cream SOAP, 25c. No Soap Samples.

Use O-Cedar anywhere. Many people do not know that O-Cedar Polish is a perfect cleanser and renovator for lacquered brass and the like. Try it on your chandelier.

Your piano is undoubtedly the most expensive piece of furniture in your home. It should have the best of care. O-Cedar Polish will restore it to its original lustre and beauty. The better your furniture, the more you should use O-Cedar Polish.

O-Cedar Polish will make your dull floors sparkling bright, clean and attractive. Use O-Cedar on a cloth dampened with water, or renew your polish mop with O-Cedar Polish.

25c to $3 Sizes O-Cedar Polish At All Dealers

Channell Chemical Company, Chicago Toronto London Berlin

Four Weeks' Trial

Choice of 38 styles. Yes, we will ship you four weeks' absolutely free trial, all freight prepaid, direct from our own factory your choice of 38 new styles of the highest-grade Wing Piano or Player Piano.

No Money Down No C. O. D. no freight either way, no security, use it and enjoy it four full weeks; then if you wish, ship it back at our expense. You alone are the judge. You will be amazed at our rock-bottom direct price on the superior. We guarantee 10 years. Easy monthly payment—cash. Write today for Valuable Book—FREE "The Book of Complete Information About Pianos" sent free and postpaid. Valuable 100-page book. Tells how to judge pianos. Beautiful art catalog also sent and particulars of our great Free Shipments Office. Write to-day—now. Wing & Son (Est. 1868), 9th Ave. & 13th St., Dept. 2498, New York.

AGENTS—Steady Income Large manufacturer of Handkerchiefs and Dress Goods, Etc., wishes representative in each locality. Factory to consumer. Big profits, honest goods. Credit given. Send for particulars. FREEPORT MFG. CO., 32 Main St., Brooklyn, N. Y.

Stockholders in a Great Corporation

WHEN two or three or four men become a firm for the transaction of any business, the important decisions are made by the agreement of all. But when many men become interested in a business they incorporate it, and in the selection of directors to manage the business each man votes as his stockholding entitles him to vote. In a large corporation the stockholders can not all be on hand to participate in decisions of moment to the business, neither can all of them be sufficiently conversant with the details of the business to be able to make an intelligent decision. That is the reason for the choice of directors. The directors are charged with the management of the business in the interest of the stockholders, and their annual or quarterly reports show the measure of their success. As long as they make a proper showing they usually remain directors, for in business it is generally recognized as good policy to maintain a successful organization.

The government of the United States is a great corporation, and you and I and every man—also some of the women—are stockholders in the corporation. We have no beautifully lithographed parchments showing the number of our shares, but we are stockholders nevertheless. In the government of the United States the Senators and Representatives, more especially the Representatives, are the directors elected by us, the stockholders, to manage the corporation in our interest. We do not always agree as to what constitutes our interest; and we do not always determine the value of the service rendered at Washington by our Representatives in the light of its value in making the whole business of Government run profitably.

During most of the time we are as unconscious of the existence of the Congress as if it were a part of the government of Dahomey; but once in two years, about primary time, when the early frosts have taken the latent indolence of summer out of the atmosphere, we gird ourselves for battle and proceed to save the country by picking out from among a number of gentlemen the one who we think can best serve our district and our own interests. It is a very serious matter, and we give it all the thought and time we can apart from business. We think, talk and act politics. We enthusiastically endorse the candidacy of John Someone because he is a real American, and are genuinely delighted when he wins the primary election and becomes the congressional candidate of our party. We are assured that in the hands of such a man, backed by the principles of such a party, the future of the country is safe. We even contribute to the campaign fund so liberally that we find it necessary to cut down our church subscription and the allowance to our boy at college. We boost Someone at every opportunity, and we are constantly getting into arguments that wax warm and that tend to open hostilities. Then comes election day. We spend the day getting out the vote. Someone is elected, and we return once more to our business and put politics out of our mind for another two years.

SOMEONE goes to Congress and enters upon that most trying of all times, the first session of a new member. He is earnest and anxious to serve his constituency. He works hard and he studies diligently all the ramifications of the Federal Government, in order that he may vote intelligently on bills that are on their passage. He becomes known on his committees and is rewarded with the beginnings of social recognition. He feels that he is making good until, one day, he opens a marked copy of a paper in our county that did not support him, and reads a column editorial attacking him for not making himself heard, for being a nonentity, and closing with the suggestion that the district would be about as well off without a congressman.

He is not much comforted by the answer to this attack that follows in our favorite organ. He asks an old member what to do, and the old member gives him some good advice. A week or two later Someone gives notice that he wishes to address the House. He is given ten minutes and he makes a little speech and files a large document with the clerk, requesting leave to print, which is granted. Our paper prints the speech in full and we read it and are proud of Someone—but we don't write to him and tell him of our pleasure. We are too busy. A little later we receive a circular from the National One-Cent Postage Association, or some other propaganda in a good cause. The circular urges upon us all the arguments in favor of the thing desired, and for lack of time—we are so busy—we do not permit ourself to really consider the matter. We just sign the circular letter enclosed and feel that we have once more done our duty. We do not know that our congressman has already studied the question and decided against the propaganda as not a feasible thing at this time, and we do not and cannot know his feelings as he receives several hundred identical letters all urging him to vote contrary to his own convictions.

There is good reason to believe that in the course of a session of Congress our name will go to Someone in several petitions which we have signed without reading them, because Bill or Sam or Joe said it was all right. There is also a fair chance that we shall have requested Someone to vote "yes" or "no" on many questions on which we were informed only of the facts on one side. There is also good reason to believe that the whole two years will not show that we have sent a single letter to Someone commending his work. If we did begin a letter with commendation, we ended it with a request that he either could not or ought not to grant.

A couple of years ago, when the tariff was under consideration, certain people who were interested in getting raw sugar into the country free of duty had large posters printed in big red letters which they pasted on every barrel of refined sugar that went to the trade. The poster said, "This sugar would cost you two cents less if admitted free of duty." It was intended to stir the retailers, and the wholesalers, and every other user of sugar, to action in the interest of free sugar. It put the question on the basis of self-interest, not on the basis of the relation of free sugar to necessary revenue or to the sugar-cane industry of the South. It was a purely selfish propaganda, and every citizen who urged free sugar upon his congressman acted without proper thought. On its face it looked like a boon to the poor, but the price of sugar goes up in the canning season now as formerly. This is only an illustration.

OUR congressman is entitled to our loyal support, whether he belongs to our party or not. Once elected, he represents every sovereign citizen of his district. He must be a true representative and he wants to be. That is his job. Our job is the upholding of his hands.

Every man and every woman worthy of the vote should be willing to take a national view of questions at Washington. It is the duty of every citizen to keep himself informed on national questions; yes, in this day and age of the world he must be conversant with international questions. It is his duty also to throw aside partisanship and every sort of bias and to know all the facts on both sides or on all sides, and to judge only when his judgment can be based on full information. He should feel that the congressman is his delegate, not his servant; and, instead of demanding that the congressman do or get certain things, he should expect the congressman to do what seems right regardless of local advantage.

If he has a well thought-out opinion on any subject that is before the congress, his congressman is entitled to receive a letter to that effect. Do not expect Someone to guess your mind on important measures. You have a duty to perform as well as he: do you perform it?

Let us not forget that we are a

Let This Woman Cut Your Cost of Living

MRS. ALICE GITCHELL KIRK is a national authority on household economics—a leader to whom hundreds of thousands of housewives look for inspiration. Out of her ripe experience she devised the original of which nearly 50,000 sets have been sold. Accuracy in measuring, the use of ingredients that have highest food value, correct cooking, mean delicious appetizing dishes without waste and with real economy.

Mrs. Kirk's Card Indexed Recipes

Don't put away with the old fashioned, wasteful, cookbook. Send $2.00 for a handsome quartered oak cabinet, containing 128 tested, favorite recipes. Money back if you want it.

The Alice Gitchell Kirk Co. 1902 Euclid Avenue Cleveland, O.

DON'T Pay Two PRICES HOOSIER Stoves & Ranges FREE

Try in your own home for 30 days. Show your friends. Freight paid us. Send it back at our expense if you do not want to keep it. You can't get the best at Actual Factory Prices and new improvements equal any ever produced. Save enough a single stove to buy your winter fuel. ALL HOOSIER STOVES Guaranteed for Years. Send today for large FREE Catalogue, showing assortment to select from. No Obligations.

HOOSIER STOVE CO. 164 State St., MARION, O.

The "BEST" LIGHT

Positively the cheapest and strongest light on the globe. Used in every country on the globe. Makes its own gas. Casts no shadow. Clean and odorless. Absolutely safe. Over 200 styles. 2000 Candle Power. Fully Guaranteed. Write for catalog. AGENTS WANTED EVERYWHERE.

THE BEST LIGHT CO. 470 E. 5th St., Canton, O.

POMPEIAN OLIVE OIL

ALWAYS FRESH PURE—SWEET—WHOLE SOME

Eat Your Way to Health

Use Tyler's Macerated Wheat and other raw foods like I did and get well. A wonderful corrective. Removes cause of constipation. Users praise. Doctors recommend it. Send 2c stamp for Raw Food Book and Health Guide or send 10c for copy of the food and book, including recipe for the finest salad you ever tasted, postpaid to any address. BYRON TYLER, 36 Syndicate Bldg. Kansas City, Mo., U. S. A.

TYPEWRITERS

Prices $15.00 up. SOLD or RENTED anywhere at 1/2 MANUFACTURER'S PRICE, allowing RENTAL TO A YEAR ON PRICE. Free Trial. Installment payments if desired. Write for catalog. TYPEWRITER EMPORIUM, 34-36 W. Lake St., C. O.

YOU CAN AFFORD

Familiar Songs on Cospel (No. 10). Round or shape notes 25¢ per hundred; samples, 5¢ each. 33 songs, words and music. E. A. K. HACKETT, FORT WAYNE, INDIA.

KIDDER'S PASTILLES

For 50 yrs. Standard Relief for Asthma (Inhalation). All Druggists; or by mail. STOWELL & CO., Manufacturers, Charleston, S. C.

BEADS MAKE MONEY FREE

Unusual varieties make CHAINS, FOBS, NECKLACES, etc. Write for FREE designs table mats, crocheted beads. Imperial Bead Co., 500 B-West 171 St., N. Y. C.

ation; that while we are a federation of states divided into districts and counties, we are nevertheless a nation. Let us get a national consciousness and national point of view and let us cease to strive for selfish local advantage and begin to demand a full measure of national loyalty from every man who presents us in the Congress or any legislature. The peace and prosperity of all mankind for generations to come may a large degree depend upon issues which will be decided by the Congress of the United States this winter. Upon these grave questions your congressman is entitled to know—and you are entitled to have him know—how you stand. Who of us is willing to forego his right to vote for congressmen? Let none of us forego our right and duty to have a part in the government of these United States beyond that of helping to elect our national legislature. To keep informed upon the questions which will come before Congress, and to keep your congressman informed upon your views as a voter, are kin duties of the highest importance at this real crisis in national and international affairs.

Man and Woman Suffrage

By JOSIAH ALLEN'S WIFE

OUR civilization has been in the past like the religion of Confucius, that I've heard Thomas read about: cold, glittering, intellectual, not so bad mebbly in times of prosperity and happiness.

But we poor dependent mortals need art in it, sunthin' to help and sustain in trouble. We need the woman's empathy and helpfulness in times of adversity. The drawin' and upholdin' d healin' spirit that makes the little y with the black eye run and tell Ma out it and dry his tears and his nose Ma's checkered gingham lap, and reve the help and comfort and counsel at enables him to lift up his head d face life and Billy Jones as good as er again.

Old boys need the same sympathy d inspiration and spiritual help and aling. The country needs it; needs bad. Many of its black eyes and ody noses the mother spirit will tp to heal and make well agin, and de the trouble peacefully without shin' into warfare.

Oh, in public life how wimmen are eded as contogglers. Why, I've seen mmen that wuz worth almost their ight in gold as contogglers; hefty mmen too. Contogglin' things up en they git to goin' wrong, smoothin' e kinks out of the skein of life d makin' it run smooth agin. It es a woman's intuition and patience d peace-lovin' spirit to do this, for ough men have many noble and hefty alities—yes, indeed they have! e never seen one yet worth his salt a contogglers. Why, my Josiah is a ad failure at that bizness.

SPOZE it is woman's nateral nater, and then wimmen as a class have l so much to do, and so little to do with, that it has made 'em excel in s department.

Oh, how that trait of theirs would ne in legislative halls! The nation ds a contogglers and needs one bad. d how the Powers needed a female otogglers a year or so ago! Them wers might have richly afforded to ke hired a good smart female ontogglers and paid her well, before they eided to make Europe a bloody ighter house. And if she wuz good al conscientious she wouldn't have ed a cent, only jest the right to help e country and save her loved ones; t it is all a worthy female contogglers ould want.

Men and wimmen are made different; e on 'em jest as good as the other, e they have different qualities; and e m different qualities are both needed take proper care of the smaller home y live in and bring up their famblys

If course there are execeptions, but a rule both sets are needed to con- et a successful home. The roof and lerpinnin' must be made solid and are, which work mebbly a man could better, because they're more used to sochin' and climbin' round, and e have long petticoats to hamper a and ketch onto door scrapers and e-sports, and tumble agin chimbllys d gabriel winders, etc.

But every house, big and little, must a have its interior tended to, made em and hullsome, a comfortable and active refuge for its boys and girls, l and little. And who is so fitted to and to this work and do it properly as t wives, mothers, and sisters of the household, whose labor has always lain in this direction?

WHAT reasonable house-mother ex- pects the man of the house, when he comes in weary with the labor of providin' food and raiment, to go to work and make riz biscuit and pun- kin pie, or to take into his tired hand mops and scrubbin' cloths, and rack his weary brain on the relative worths of Old Dutch Cleanser and Sapolio and attact the woodwork and ceilin' with cleansin' brushes, clean out the bread jar and butter bowl, and toil to make the home hygienic and comfortable? No; he naterally and justly leaves that part of the work to the female wimmen of the household.

And how reasonable it duz look to me to see both sets a-workin' together to make the big home of the nation they both have to live in and be pun- ished alike in if they don't keep its laws, and bring up their children in, clean and comfortable and safe for themselves and famblys! Both on 'em usin' the ballot as a weapon for safety and de- fense, and to brush off the cobwebs and clean out moldy corners! And every- body knows there are moldy and cob- webby legislative corners that both sets have to come up aginst, that nothing but the strong long brush of the ballot will reach.

It would look dretful good to me to see both sets, contented and happy, workin' on in his way and hern, not lookin' up or down to find her or his companion, but walkin' right along side by side, a follerin' their two male and female noses right forward in the path of legal liberty and household cleanliness and happiness. Both on 'em doin' their best to stiddy this blunderin', staggerin' old planet, both puttin' their shoulder blades to the wheel to roll it on towards the millennium.

ALWAYS in the past there have been some prophetic souls who have seen this truth and follered it in spirit. But like the wayfarers of old through the wilderness, the march of the wim- men of the world towards the Canaan of their desires has been hard and toilsome.

The shadows of prejudice and old custom lay heavy on 'em. The stuns of ridicule and misconception and selfish- ness have pelted 'em and hurt their feet. The jungle has been dark and wild through which they have had to cut their way with blunt hatchets. And the cries of the surroundin' animals has been awesome and hard on their ear pans.

But them roars have now ceased to be so blood-curdlin', they are beginnin' to be even conciliatory and amiable. The path is growin' softer and easier, the dark shadders are fallin' backward in- stead of before the wayfarers. And fur ahead we ketch glimpses of "Sweet fields beyond the swellin' flood," the brighter light of the future. The wilder- ness is nearly passed, the Promised Land lies jest before. And now may we not any of us (like our late friend Moses) fail through faint-heartedness and un- belief to enter in and possess the land.

Your paper is so good, it is such a comfort and help to me. It has been a welcome weekly visitor in our home for more than eighteen years. May God abundantly bless you in your work for the uplift of humanity.

Mrs. Rev. P. L. Miller.

The Will of the Majority

Will you be governed in tire-buying as you are in the affairs of the nation—by the will of the majority?

Goodyear sales are greater by a mighty majority than those of any other tire.

As far as Goodyear tires are concerned, America is a nation with its mind made up.

And the individual American mind—in business or in government—is more independent in its action than any other intelligence on earth.

When the people act en masse, as they have in awarding first place to Goodyear, it is not because they have been herded together and forced to a conclusion.

It is because tens and hundreds of thousands of minds, acting separately, have all reached the same tire conclusion.

The farmer, stopping to rest in his fields at mid-day, looks back over his tire experience and says, "Goodyear."

The business man in his office, checking up his tire mileage, says, "Goodyear."

The same mental process is multiplied by hundreds of thousands of minds, in tens of thousands of places—with the same clear-cut Goodyear conclusion in every case.

Think of the power of these pleasant thoughts about Goodyear—rolling like a mighty wave from one end of the nation to the other!

Is it not something greater than salesmanship, and greater than advertising?

This is the force which has created that precious, intangible, invaluable thing called Goodyear reputation.

This is the impulse which renders lower prices on other tires powerless in the face of Goodyear goodness.

Good-will toward Goodyear—that is the open secret of Goodyear sales success.

The Goodyear Tire & Rubber Company
Akron, Ohio

Good year

AKRON

TIRES

"We can have it done this winter, without upsetting the house, and perhaps in the Spring we can reshingle the roof with Cypress, 'the Wood Eternal.'" (You know it was only last year that historic Mount Vernon, Washington's old home, was reshingled with Cypress for the second time since its erection in 1743.) But to get back to the matter of New and Artistic Interiors, why not LET US HELP by sending you, with no charge or obligation at all, our booklet on

"New Insides for Old Homes?"

This is the title of VOL. 39 (VOLUME THIRTY-NINE) of the internationally famous Cypress Pocket Library, a series of authoritative text books on the Intelligent Use of Lumber, in which our particular product, Cypress, "the Wood Eternal," is recommended ONLY where it is the very best wood for the given use.

Vol. 39 contains 40 pages, with 10 pictures, an art supplement in tint (showing the beauty of Cypress grain). Detailed Working Drawings on a sheet 24 x 36 inches, with Full Specifications for rebuilding the Hall, Library, Dining Room and Living Room with architectural correctness and artistic finish without resort to expensive hardwoods. (Cypress works easily and is wonderful under stains.) Each design by an authority—on our special order. No "stock patterns." Write for Vol. 39. Study it. Use it.

When planning a Porch, Mansion, Bungalow, pasture-fence or sleeping porch, remember "WOOD CYPRESS can Build But ONCE"

Let our "ALL ROUND HELPS DEPARTMENT" help YOU. Our entire resources are at your service with reliable personal Counsel.

SOUTHERN CYPRESS MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION

125 HIBBERTIA BANK BLDG., NEW ORLEANS, LA. or 125 HEARD BLDG., JACKSONVILLE, FLA.

INSIST ON CYPRESS AT YOUR LOCAL LUMBER DEALER'S. IF YOU DON'T, TELL US NOW IMMEDIATELY

MOTHER'S "NOTIONS"

Good for Young People to Follow.

"My little grandson often comes up to show me how large the muscles of his arms are.

"He was a delicate child, but has developed into a strong, healthy boy and Postum has been the principal factor.

"I was induced to give him the Postum because of my own experience with it.

"I am sixty years old, and have been a victim of nervous dyspepsia for many years. Have tried all sorts of medicines and had treatment from many physicians, but no permanent relief came.

"I used to read the Postum advertisements in our paper. At first I gave but little attention to them, but finally something in one of the advertisements made me conclude to try Postum.

"I was very particular to have it prepared strictly according to directions, and used good, rich cream. It was very nice indeed, and about bedtime I said to the members of the family that I believed I felt better. One of them laughed and said, 'That's another of mother's notions,' but the notion has not left me yet.

"I continued to improve right along after leaving off coffee and taking Postum, and now after three years' use I feel so well that I am almost young again. I know Postum was the cause of the change in my health and I cannot say too much in its favor. I wish I could persuade all nervous people to use it."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Postum comes in two forms:

Postum Cereal—the original form—must be well boiled. 15c and 25c packages.

Instant Postum—a soluble powder—dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water, and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. 30c and 50c tins.

Both kinds are equally delicious and cost about the same per cup.

"There's a Reason" for Postum.
—sold by Grocers.

After Vacation

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

SOME time ago, when all the world seemed putting on holiday dress and taking suit case in one hand and camera and tennis racket in the other and starting off for vacation land, I wrote an article which I called, incongruously, "After Vacation." In it I told of some plans that my girls had for the fall season, after they had finished with the summer holiday. I told of girls who wanted to be nurses and school teachers and social workers. I told of girls who had large, ambitious plans, and girls who had tiny plans. And then, at the end of my two columns, I tucked in a little note that asked other girls to send in their plans.

For a week or so I didn't get many letters from my girls, and I began to be worried. I thought, "Perhaps I have not been cordial enough." I thought, "Perhaps some, most of my girls didn't see it; perhaps they didn't read so far!" And then, as if in rebuke to my doubts, the letters began to flock in from my pen-and-ink friends who were planning futures that should begin "after vacation."

A great many of the futures were alike; you'd be surprised to know how much alike they were. A number of my girls were going to be teachers—the kind of teachers that study a pupil's character and try to know him and help him individually. Some of the girls, quite a few of them, were going to write; others were embarking on school and college careers. And as I read the letters it seemed as though I were sitting in front of a great screen watching different scenes coming to me from the written pages. I am going to tell you about some of them.

THE first letter, or one of the first, came from Michigan. I have never been in Michigan, but the name always brings a mental picture to me: the picture of a vast country with rolling hills and clear air and sparkling sunshine. Friends of mine who live in Michigan, am I right? The letter said:

"I have just finished high school, so after vacation I hope to go to school and take up primary work. That means that I must leave this small town to go to a larger one. I must leave my folks—which will, of course, be hard. I know that I shall love the work, I do love children so. I am very much interested in singing. Although I live in this small town, I have had the advantage of taking vocal lessons from a teacher who comes here from the city. I hope that, in the future, I may be able to go on with my vocal work. When I read your article I felt that I could not resist the temptation to tell you of my after-vacation plans."

THE next letter in my pile comes from Minnesota. I have often wondered about that state, but somehow my mind never formed a clear picture of it. Perhaps some of my girls who live there will some time tell me about it. This Minnesota letter was a very sweet one: "Since reading the call for 'after-vacation' ideas," ran the letter, "my mind seems so full of one idea that I really must drop a suggestion, and it is that we begin every day with a little talk with God. Also that we try to add at least a little of the love that is needed in this world—needed and longed for by many tired hearts. I see by your article that some of the girls are already planning to do good to others, and I am sure that most of your girls are loving and helpful."

ONE girl from up in New York State (and I have spent so many beautiful vacations up in New York State that the mental picture of it is very clear—a picture of lovely tree-covered hills and deep skies, and dancing rivers) writes me a sparkling, full-of-joy letter. Her plans are very lovely:

"I am going to be married this winter," she writes, "and oh, Miss Sangster, though my plans may seem simple, they are beautiful to me. For I am going to make a home! That seems one of the biggest things in the world."

FROM California comes a letter full of inspiration and hopefulness—and I hardly think that my pen-and-ink friends from California need tell me of their beautiful State. I have always pictured it as a land of many flowers, and balmy breezes, and wide roads, and snow-capped mountains in the distance. This is the picture that flashed on my screen when I opened this letter. Am I right?

"Since my first glimpse of the Exposition," the letter told me, "I have felt that perhaps I had some heretofore unguessed talents. You see, the Exposition was so full of really large things that it made me feel as if I were doing nothing. My life up to this time has always been more or less aimless. You see, I haven't had to work, and so I have only tried to enjoy myself. My 'after-vacation' plans—if they work out—are going to change everything. I think that God put each of us on the earth for some reason. This winter I am going to try and discover what the reason is in my case."

THE last letter that I am going to quote comes from Mexico. The picture that came to my mind as I opened the letter was of sandy openspaces dotted with clumps of mesquite, and dark-growing, dangerous-looking mountains in the distance. I could see low adobe houses, and folk dressed in clothes with high lights of red and yellow.

"My country," said the letter, "is a very unhappy country just now. There are babies starving, and mothers starving, and even strong men starving. I haven't had any vacation, but I have plans—many of them. And all my plans tend to the same point—to relieve the sufferings of my people. Are my plans worthy?"

FRIENDS of mine, if you have any plans or ambitions or little hopes that you hold deep in your hearts, I should like awfully well to have you write me about them some day. For they make wonderfully good reading, and sometimes just a stray word that you may speak or write will give some soul in doubt just the needed bit of inspiration to do the really big thing that is waiting.

The High Cost of Publishing

AS everybody knows, the "high cost of living," which has affected every home in America, is also universally felt in the world of productive industry. It has greatly added to the cost of producing all classes of publications, the Christian Herald among the rest. But while many other publications, both religious and secular, have been driven by necessity to increase their subscription price, the Christian Herald has made no change and will make none. It has been enabled to do this by means of its advertising, which has made it possible for us to give a much larger paper, with a greater variety of reading matter than ever before, without raising the subscription rate. The increased revenue from the advertisements is thus turned into a direct source of benefit to our Subscribers, who are getting a bigger, better and more attractive paper than ever.

I am very fond of the Christian Herald for several reasons, and one of these is that whenever I have a little money to spare you use it to the best advantage for one of your numerous charities.

Your sample copy of the Christian Herald to hand and looked over and am very much pleased with it. Wm. S. ROBERTS. This man sent his subscription for the Christian Herald.

The Herald's Sermons and Daily Meditations are grand. J. R. FRAME.

For Swollen Veins

Absorbine Jr.
THE ANTISEPTIC LINIMENT

That Absorbine, Jr., would relieve Varicose Veins was discovered by an old gentleman who had suffered with swollen veins for nearly fifty years. He had made many unsuccessful efforts to get relief and finally tried Absorbine, Jr., knowing its value in reducing swellings, aches, pains and soreness.

Absorbine, Jr., relieved him, and after he had applied it regularly for a few weeks he told us that his legs were as smooth as when he was a boy and all the pain and soreness had ceased.

Thousands have since used this antiseptic liniment for this purpose with remarkable good results.

Absorbine, Jr., is made of oils and extracts from pure herbs and when rubbed upon the skin is quickly taken up by the pores; the blood circulation in surrounding parts is thereby stimulated and healing helped.

$1.00 a Bottle at Druggists or Postpaid

A LIBERAL TRIAL BOTTLE will be mailed to your address for 10c in stamp Booklet free.

W. F. YOUNG, P. D. F.
5 Temple St., Springfield, Ma.

BUNIONS Grow Worse

Bunions can't get better unless you remove the pressure that makes them worse. Get immediate relief from bunions and enlarged joints by wearing a

FISCHER Bunion Protector
FOR MEN AND WOMEN

No Medicine—just a Protector that relieves and hides the deformity and keeps the shoe in shape. No larger size shoe required. Ask your Druggist or Shoe Dealer. Write today for 10 Days' Free Trial. State size of shoe and for which foot.

THE FISCHER MFG. CO.
Milwaukee, Wis.
Dept. M

Try My Rapid Fireless Cooker 30 Days—FREE

Cook every meal on it. If you are not satisfied, I will refund every cent. Get my Special Low Factory Price direct from me. Cookers of all sizes, from 1 to 10, set of famous "Wear-Ever" aluminum cookware comes with it. Ask for a book of valuable recipes. William Campbell, Dept. 2, Detroit, Mich.

WANTED in every town in the United States, an intelligent man, woman, boy or girl to represent The Christian Herald. This is an opportunity to build a business of your own, which should grow and more profitable year after year. Address Agency Dept., THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York City.

500 TYPEWRITERS Typewriter prices smashed! Your choice of any factory rebuilt machine at a bargain. Every one perfect—guaranteed for 3 yrs.—including repairs. My free circular tells how to save 40 percent—60 percent on each machine. Write for it. C. E. GABTE, Pres. DEARBORN TYPEWRITER EXCHANGE, DEPT. J-8, CHICAGO, ILL.

PULLEASY CLOTHES LINE PULLEYS Make hanging up clothes a pleasure. Brand new! No hard pulling. Heaviest filled lines slide and with perfect ease. Pulleys 5 ins. in diameter. Light, durable and rust-proof. Sample pair 75c, postpaid. Agents wanted. Write today. COLLETTE MFG. CO. Box 302C, Amsterdam, N.Y.

MEN WANTED

To sell "Wear-Ever" Aluminum Ware. Experience unnecessary. References required, and postal for free booklet, "The Man Who Does It." The Aluminum Cooking Utensil Co., Dept. E, New Kensington, Pa.

POULTRY PAPER 44-124 1-E all you want to know about care and management of poultry for pleasure or profit. Four months for 10 cents. POULTRY ADVOCATE, Dept. 29, Syracuse, N.Y.

PATENTABLE IDEAS WANTED. Manufacturers want Owen patents. Send 3 free books; inventions wanted. I get patent or no fee. Manufacturing facilities. RICHARD B. OWEN, 53 Owen Bldg., Washington, D.C.

For Women!

The NATURAL BODY BRACE!
A delightful, certain and quick remedy for the peculiar ailments of women and girls.

TRIAL FREE
for 30 Days under my Personal Directions
Develops Erect, Graceful Figure
It brings restful relief, comfort and wonderful benefits—overcomes weakness—strengthens and invigorates the entire body.

Banishes All These Troubles
Does away with the strain and pain of standing and walking, replaces and supports misplaced internal organs, reduces enlarged abdomen, straightens and strengthens the back, corrects stooping shoulders, develops lungs & bust, relieves backache & nervousness.

Write today for illustrated booklet and full information mailed FREE.

HOWARD C. RASH, Pres. Natural Body Brace Co.
171 Rash Building SALINA, KANSAS

New Way to Learn Music

Costs But 2 Cents a Day

We teach you in your own home to play by note, Piano, Organ, Violin, Guitar, Banjo, Cornet, Sight Singing, Mandolin or Cello. Special Limited Free Tuition Offer made for advertising purposes entitles you to lessons and lecture free. We only ask you to pay for sheet music used, which averages about 12 1/2 cents a week. No extras. 200,000 successful students ranging from age of 7 to 70. Special lessons for beginners and advanced pupils.

Free Book "Music Lessons by Mail" explains the plan. Contains page after page of letters from students who have become expert players. Send postal today. U. S. School of Music, Dept. 7A, 225 Fifth Avenue, New York City.

INDIVIDUAL COMMUNION SERVICE

Does YOUR Church use this cleanly and sanitary method? Send for catalog and special offer. Outfits on trial. Thomas Communion Service Co. Box 150 Lima, Ohio

The President's Thanksgiving Proclamation

It has long been the honored custom of our people to turn in the fruitful autumn of the year in praise and thanksgiving to Almighty God for His many blessings and favors to us as a nation. The year that is now drawing to close since we last observed our day of national thanksgiving has been, while a year of discipline because of the many forces of war, and of changes which have disturbed the world, also a year of special blessing for us.

Another year of peace has been vouchsafed us; another year in which not only to take thought of our duties to ourselves and to mankind, but also to adjust ourselves to the many responsibilities thrust upon us by a war which has involved almost the whole of Europe. We have been able to assert our rights and the rights of mankind without breach of friendship with the great nations with whom we have had to deal, and while we have asserted rights, we have been able also to perform duties and exercise privileges of suzerainty and helpfulness which should serve to demonstrate our desire to make the offices of friendship the means of truly disinterested and unselfish service.

Our ability to serve all who could avail themselves of our services in the midst of crisis has been increased, by gracious providence, by more and more abundant crops; our ample financial resources have enabled us to steady the markets of the world and facilitate necessary movement of commerce which the war might otherwise have rendered impossible; and our people have come more and more to a realization of the part they have been called upon to play in a time when all the world is shaken by unparalleled distresses and disasters.

THE extraordinary circumstances of such a time have done much to quicken our national consciousness and deepen and confirm our confidence in the principles of peace and freedom by which we have always sought to be guided. Out of darkness and perplexities have come firmer counsels of policy and clearer perceptions of the essential welfare of the nation. We have prospered while other peoples were at war, but our prosperity has been vouchsafed us, we believe, only that we might the better perform the functions which war rendered it impossible for them to perform.

NOW, therefore, I, Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States of America, do hereby designate Thursday, the 25th of November next, as a day of Thanksgiving and prayer, and invite the people throughout the land to cease from their wonted occupations and in their several homes and places of worship render thanks to Almighty God.

IN witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington, this 20th day of October, in the year of our Lord, one thousand, nine hundred and fifteen, and of the independence of the United States of America one hundred and fortieth.

WOODROW WILSON.

By the President: Robert Lansing, Secretary of State.

The War in Europe

Continued from page 1094
The result of this approach was to make preparations for the removal of the temporary capital of Serbia from Nis to Prisrend, a town located just north of the Shar mountains in southwestern Serbia not far from the Albanian border.

Further south still, the Bulgarians struck their most effective blow by capturing the town of Vranja, which capture has cut off all the Serbian army north of that point from any communication with the forces of the Allies at Salica, or elsewhere in the south. The capture was followed by that of the town of Kumanova, also on this road to the south of Vranja, thus strengthening the Bulgarian hold on the line of communication.

Kib lies only a few miles to the south of this latter place, at which city the Nish-Salonica railroad connects with another line running northwest to Mivitsa, and the Bulgarians, with the object of getting possession of this line, are making a drive at Uskib both from Kumanova and from the southeast, in which direction they have possessed themselves of the towns of Istib and Komania.

The Allies have sent a small force northward from Salonica, which has defeated the Bulgarians near Strumitza, an event which may prove of considerable importance in case any advance by the Austro-Germans and Bulgarians is attempted towards Salonica, though at the present writing there is a rumor that the Bulgarians have succeeded in recapturing the town.

Austria opened an offensive on the northern borders of Montenegro during the week, the obvious reason for which was to prevent any aid from that country being sent to her ally, Serbia.

For many days of late British submarines have been very active in the Baltic, and are reported to have sunk a very large number of German merchant ships. In fact, fairly reliable reports state that German ships no longer attempt to cross over to Sweden and Norway, and that all commerce between those countries and Germany is suspended, which, of course, means that a certain amount of supplies of various kinds no longer reach the latter country.

Usually the Austro-Italian campaign is a most devoid of incident. The snow and cold weather in the mountain region has practically prevented all activity there, and on the Isonzo river front while there have been continual artillery duels, there have been no infantry attacks rising above the level of skirmishes, and consequently the end of the week finds the combatants in much the same positions as they were at the end of last.

Premier Asquith is quite ill. Among the political incidents of the week in Great Britain were Sir Edward Carson's resignation from the cabinet and his subsequent explanation that his reasons for so resigning were disagreements with his colleagues as to the methods of conducting the war.

The Dardanelles campaign was without military incident during nearly all the week. The last two days, however, some rather hard fighting took place. The Turks attacked the Allies' positions along the front at Suvla and Krithia, but were repulsed and this repulse was followed by an assumption of the offensive by the Allies, and hard fighting is going on as this record closes.

General Hamilton, who commanded the Allies in this campaign, has been relieved and ordered home, General Monro succeeding him. No decision has yet been reached (or if reached has not been communicated to the world), as to whether or not the Allies intend to continue their attempt to reach Constantinople by this route.

In Mesopotamia the British forces are making steady progress and have now reached a point within a hundred miles of Bagdad. This campaign deserves more attention than it is receiving, as the capture of Bagdad would be an event of considerable importance, both politically and in a military sense, as in the event of the success of the German drive through Serbia and subsequent advance to Constantinople, which seems quite possible, if they then attempt, or send the Turks to attempt, to attack Egypt and the Suez Canal, the possession of Bagdad by the British would be a thorn in their side.

Little can be said of the fighting on the western line during the past week, which has again reverted to monotonous trench fighting, and artillery duels. Such infantry fighting as there was, was mostly in the vicinity of Souchez on the Arras front, and north of Talune on the Champagne front, on both of which the lines have swayed a short distance to and fro, according to the momentary tide, but which have practically resulted in no gain for either side. In the Vosges, there was just a little activity centering around Hartmannswiller Kopf, where a few feet of trenches changed hands once or twice, but here again the final result was nil.

In Russia, the campaign also languished during the early part of the week, but later considerable activity was again manifested in the north on the line from Riga to Dunaberg. East of Mitau, late in the week, the Germans by successive advances for a couple of days carried their line forward to the bank of the Duna river, which, however, they were unable to cross, but were able to plant artillery in positions which enabled it to command the railroad running from Dunaberg to Riga. This latter city is now almost completely surrounded and cut off from all communication from the rest of Russia, except by water through the Gulf of Riga.

On the Dunaberg front, signs of an approaching revival of activity are to be noticed, and the prospect is that the Germans will open another attack on that city in the very near future.

Farther south, near Baranovitch, there was also some rather hard fighting lasting nearly all the week, between the army of Prince Leopold of Bavaria and the Russians, with the result that the Russians were finally repulsed.

Still farther south, near Tschartiwsk, the Russians attempted to break through General von Linsingen's lines, but were not successful, losing several thousand prisoners besides some artillery.

In Galicia, there was some desultory skirmishing, but no general engagement.

A NEWS despatch late on October 22 states that King George has issued the following appeal:

"To My People: At this grave moment in the struggle between my people and a highly organized enemy, who has transgressed the laws of nations and changed the ordinance that binds civilized Europe together, I appeal to you.

"I rejoice in my empire's effort. I feel pride in the voluntary response from my subjects all over the world who have sacrificed home, fortune, life itself, in order that another may not inherit the free empire which their and mine ancestors have built.

"I ask you to make good these sacrifices.

"The end is not in sight. More men, and yet more, are wanted to keep my armies in the field, and through them secure victory and enduring peace. In ancient days the darkest moment ever produced in the men of our race the sternest resolve. I ask you men of all classes to come forward voluntarily and take your share in the fight.

"In freely responding to my appeal you will be giving your support to our brothers who for long months have nobly upheld Great Britain's past traditions and the glory of her arms."

(Signed) "GEORGE R. I."

THE United States government has published this year a really good map of the several scenes of war in Europe, and any one can procure this by sending to the Superintendent of Public Documents in Washington, enclosing the nominal price charged of 30 cents. This is by far the best map available for the general public, and its possession will enable readers to follow Mr. Arnoux's story more intelligently.—[EDITOR.]

"I simply press the button and fill myself in two seconds"

I am the Gift of Gifts

Wherever you send me as a holiday remembrance I'll surely be appreciated. My double usefulness will make me doubly welcome. I am both, a self-filler and a safety pen. In two seconds I fill myself for writing ten thousand words.

PARKER SAFETY SELF-FILLING FOUNTAIN PEN

You can carry me any side up without danger of spilling ink for my safety cap keeps it safely locked in.

My smooth barrel, without openings or projections, fits the hand and is another safeguard against accidents. Ask any Parker dealer.

PARKER PEN COMPANY
152 Mill St., Janesville, Wis.

New York Retail Store in the big Woolworth Bldg.

Parker Fountain Pen Ink 25c, in patented bottles, is my favorite beverage.

Factory Prices Save $5 to $23

Freight Paid - A Year's Trial

Save from $5 to $23 by buying direct from factory. 55 years' reputation back of every stove. Our long experience and big output gives you a better stove or range at less cost.

Gold Coin Stoves and Ranges

Use one for a year—money refunded if it doesn't prove absolutely satisfactory. We pay freight, guarantee safe delivery and send every stove ready to set up. BIG FREE CATALOG—Send for it now. See why improved features of Gold Coin Stoves help you save fuel and bake better. Write today GOLD COIN STOVE CO., 11 Oak St., Troy, N. Y.

LADIES! Ease your feet. Send for free catalog telling all about our Neat, Noiseless, Flexible, Comfortable, unlined Vic Kid O'Sullivanized PILLOW SHOE. New shoes easy as old ones. No breaking in required. Fit and feel like a kid glove. O'Sullivan's Rubber Heels on all styles.

PILLOW SHOE CO., Dept. 3
184 Summer Street, Boston, Mass.

The HOLMES CO.

sells direct to you by mail. Diamonds, Watches, Rings, Gold and Silver Jewelry, Silver and Plated Tableware, Toilet and Leather Goods, and Novelties.

A. W. HOLMES, President.

FREE The Big Holmes Catalog pictures thousands of splendid articles suitable for Christmas, Wedding and Birthday presents or home-uses. It solves the gift problem for everybody—for you. It tells you how to save time and money. Cut out this ad and send it to us with your name and address. You'll get the Big Catalog FREE. Send NOW. It isn't a day too soon.

The Holmes Co.

344 Elmwood, Providence, R. I.

Name.....
Street.....
Town.....
State.....

$1 Every Woman's Sewing Set
Sewing Set, $1.00
Just to get better acquainted we offer this set of SIX USEFUL PIECES IN HEART SHAPED CASE, SIX INCHES WIDE, that every woman needs, for only $1.00, a splendid Birthday or Holiday gift. Big $2.00 value for $1.00. It's a dollar bill to the coupon and send to The Holmes Co., when you write for the FREE Catalog. Your money back if you're not pleased.

Wouldn't You Like to Own a Store

Like This?

Wouldn't you like to be proprietor of a money making business? Once I was just a struggling candy maker. The profits from Crispettes, the new, delicious popcorn confection, built this big business for me. The very same proposition that made me, should do the same for you. Start in the Crispette Business for yourself. Build a business of your own as I did. Get a window—a small store—a cozy nook where the rent is low. Keep all the profits. I'll teach you the Crispette business—tell you how to succeed—how you can make Crispettes by my special secret formula. I'll do it right here in Springfield—personally or by mail. But the thing for you to do is to Take advantage of my offer to come and see me

Don't say you're coming. Just drop in quietly. Call on any banker or merchant. Ask them about Long—about my store—my Crispette business. Ask them if what I say isn't the truth—right from the shoulder. Look into my reputation. See if folks think I'll give you a square deal. Then come and see my store—see that it is just like the picture. See the machine. See Crispettes made—make a batch yourself. Learn the business. Get my pointers on how to succeed. Up to a distance of 300 miles I'll pay all your traveling expenses, if you buy a machine. You'll see—know—learn everything. It's simple—easy. Won't take you a day. I'll be glad to see you—glad to show you the store and have a good talk with you. You'll go home ready to make more money than you ever made in your life.

Every Nickel You Take in Nets You Almost Four Cents Profit

Think of it! Think of the fortunes made in 5-cent pieces. It's one business in a hundred. Everybody likes Crispettes—children—parents—old folks. One sale always means two—two means four. So it goes. It's a great business. I found it so—so should you. Send for my big free book, "How to make money in the Crispette Business"—48 pages, illustrated—complete information and story of how I built my business. Read it and then come to Springfield.

W. Z. LONG, 1099 High St., Springfield, Ohio

This is a recent picture of the man who made a big success with a Long Crispette machine, in a store with low

Young People's Topics for November 14

How the Denominations May Be United in Service

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topic. Isa. 52: 7, 8

THE committees which made this passage of Scripture the reference for the subject "How the Denominations May Be United in Service" seem to have missed the real emphasis of the verses themselves. The union described in these verses is, as a matter of fact, not union in working and giving, but a union in praising and receiving. It is not the messengers who are united in the picture—there is supposed to be only one messenger in this particular description; but the waiting watchmen are united in their joy at the good tidings.

The lesson our committees wished to bring out is true enough, and there are many passages in the Bible and in church history and in present-day facts to prove it. Christians will come close together when they forget themselves and their differences in hard work for others.

But this special picture from Old Testament prophecy is of a people united in joy and praise at the good tidings brought. And is not this a deep and true hint of the deepest and truest unity? Read the second and fourth chapters of Ephesians. The love and joy of Christ's presence and blessing bring people together. And back here in Isaiah we have a beautiful hint of this. It is singing that the people do together, and it is when the Lord comes with his gracious blessing that they see "eye to eye."

We must work together. We must announce together the grace of Christ to those who know it not. Particularly on the mission field should denominational differences be forgotten in intense effort to teach and help and save the peoples. And we should and must learn that in the home field the same sort of unity of effort is possible. In every community the church of Jesus must work together for the good of all.

But remember that the truest unity will come from great outpourings of the divine blessing. We shall then be united in our praise. And we shall find at last that praising God may be after all the best kind of work we can do for him. It was when the mouths of the emancipated Israelites were filled with laughter and their tongues with singing that the wondering heathen said: "The Lord hath done great things for them." (Ps. 126: 2-3.) So when Christians praise the Saviour, unbelievers are led to seek and trust him.

The Promise of Spiritual Certainty

Epworth League Topic. John 7: 17; 11 Tim. 1: 12; 1 John 4: 13; 3: 14; 2: 3

DID you ever stop to think how a book of history is written? The writer of history digs into what he calls his "sources," sifting the true from the false, the probable from the doubtful, trying to make a faithful narrative of the days long past. Imagine a historian looking over, a hundred years from now, the files of this year's daily papers. How much of what he reads would he "know" to be true? How much would he dare put into his history? That gives you some idea of the difficulty of getting at accurate truth. And juries have the same difficulty in the science of "evidences" is most intricate. How do we arrive at knowledge we attain? That is the problem. How, especially, do we get to a place of real certainty about spiritual things?

The five verses we study present a pretty strong chain of evidences.

First, the testimony of others. You believe credible witnesses about other matters, why not about salvation? If you get a sufficient number of witnesses of the right kind you are sure of your facts. If one who died a hundred years ago were to come to life now he could at first think that all the world had gone mad and that he only was sane—or all the rest would be believing in wireless telegraphy and in aeroplanes and in a hundred other things which he could believe impossible. But finally the weight of testimony would be overwhelming. Everybody he asked could say these things were true, so he would yield to this mass of evidence before he actually saw the things described. So myriads of people testify to the reality and power of salvation. Their testimony makes good evidence.

But Paul adds a note of personal conviction. He himself "knows." He has himself had experiences so vital, that he cannot doubt. That is the real safeguard against doubt. The apostles declared, "We cannot but speak the things that we have seen and heard." Seek a vision of Christ and word from him so clear that you can never doubt again.

Then (1 John 4: 13) we may have the evidence within, not only by remembering past blessings but by the presence of the Holy Spirit.

Then we have a new gift, new experience of love—particularly a feeling of delightful fellowship with those who share with us the joy and power of salvation. But we must love everybody else, too—even the people who wrong us. If we do not, John says we are still spiritually dead. This feeling of love is added proof that we have found the new life.

The last test is obedience. If we are doing the things Christ asked us to do, we may know that we are his.

Make this a meeting in which we are urged to stop being doubters and to become jubilant believers. Urge every soul to believe not only that the essential facts of our religion are true, but that they are true for him.

Cave-Ins on Broadway

A STATEMENT just issued by E. Graham Wilson calls attention to a number of "cave-ins" on Broadway prior to the crash near Thirty-eighth Street and the one on Seventh Avenue. No lives were lost in these earlier cases. This is the way Mr. Wilson describes it in a report made to the committee on religious work of the West Side Young Men's Christian Association.

"We went by automobile to the busiest corner we could find, elevated our huge framed standard, announcing that we came from the churches of the district and from the Y. M. C. A., and we turned loose a gospel cornetist, who soon collected a crowd. The object of the work was then explained and the speaker introduced, and before long the traffic cop was watching the growing crowd with some concern, fearful of another 'cave-in' of another sort, caused by the bulwarks of sin built around the heart of the passer-by yielding before the manly, melting message."

The keynote of the campaign was "We Help Men," and 143 meetings were held with a counted attendance of more than 45,000, or 315 at each. As a result of cards distributed inquiring inquiries on almost everything in a job to religion, 314 interviews were given men and that many individuals were helped to a better condition. The total cost of the meetings was $3, the Y. M. C. A. furnishing the aut and the Evangelistic Committee the cornetist.

In the net results the report of a bartender turned to other employment, a young man under malign influence, his work, given a moral impulse and help in bettering his employment, a former theological student lost to the White Way, turned from evil ways and now leader of a boys' club; a doctor, about to end his life because of troubles, induced to join a church and Bible class and start a new life.

Any man who can win a friend for himself can win a soul for Christ.—William J. Bucher

A GREAT SONGBOOK

Hundreds have already written us that "Songs for Service" is the superior of any gospel songbook they have ever met with. Its 288 pages sparkle with bright, new, snappy songs—songs that have been tested—that are unusually effective—songs such as have made previous Rodeheaver songbooks so wonderfully popular.

Songs for Service

is the best songbook that has yet been issued by The Rodeheaver Co.—no higher praise can be given. It is the book used exclusively in the "Billy" Sunday campaigns.

EXAMINE A COPY FREE—Simply state that you will either return it in good condition within 15 days or will remit the retail price. State binding desired.

PRICES

Cloth 35c, limp 25c, manila 20c per copy, postpaid
Cloth $25, limp $18, manila $15 per 100, not prepaid

Orchestrated for 15 instruments.

Printed in both round and shaped notes.

THE RODEHEAVER CO.
GOSPEL MUSIC
1083 MONON BUILDING, CHICAGO
633 LIPPINCOTT BLDG., PHILADELPHIA

Let the Cornish Profit-Sharing Plan Pay For Your Choice of Any

Cornish Piano or Organ In Whole or in Part

You buy this beautiful, sweet-toned Cornish Piano or any Cornish Instrument you select and pay for it either wholly or in part out of our bonus profits.

That's the new feature of the world-famous Cornish Plan, which has set music lovers wild all over this world. Now there can be no excuse for your failing to have a beautiful, high grade, Cornish Instrument in your home at once.

No Money in Advance

The new Cornish Plan provides, as always, for 30 Days' Free Use in your home. It provides that you shall buy at lowest Factory Price direct from the factory, saving you one-third to one-half. It gives you All the Credit Needed—terms of your own choice, the privilege of returning the instrument any time within one year if unsatisfactory; and a guarantee for life. We pay the freight if desired. And now in addition comes this great Profit-Sharing Bonus Plan—you now share too in our profits. Let our money help you pay. Send today for this new Cornish Book telling how we do without dealers. Our reference of 5,000 Recent Purchasers and full particulars of the greatest Piano and Organ Plan ever offered—our new Profit-Sharing Plan. Send for these today.

Cornish Company, Dept. C.H., WASHINGTON, N. J. ESTABLISHED OVER FIFTY YEARS.

"Sure, the Whiting-Adams Floor Brushes do beat them all for cleaning house"

WHITING-ADAMS BRUSHES

Methods of Manufacture produce perfect which are guaranteed to live long and please all users Over 10,000 Kinds and Sizes made

FOR SALE BY DEALERS EVERYWHERE

Send for illustrated literature JOHN L. WHITING-J. J. ADAMS CO. BOSTON, U. S. A.

Brush Manufacturers for Over One Hundred Years

Whiting-Adams Brushes Awarded Gold Medal, the highest award at Panama-Pacific Exposition, 1915

PATENTS That Protect and Pay Rates Reasonable. Advice and Books FREE. Highest References. Best Services. WATSON E. COLEMAN, Patent Lawyer, Washington, D. C.

HAVE You a Camera? Write for samples of my magazines, American Photography and Popular Photography, which will tell you how to make better pictures and earn money. F. R. FRAPRIE, 802 Pope Building, Boston

ENGINE POWER

COSTS LESS NOW

My Book TELLS WHY

Lower Engine Prices:
 2 H.P. $34.95; 3 H.P. $52.50; 4 H.P. $69.75
 6 H.P. $97.75; 8 H.P. $139.65; 12 H.P. $197.00
 15 H.P. $279.70; 22 H.P. $359.80.
Portable Engines Proportionally Low Prices F. O. B. Factory.

WITTE Engines

Gasoline, Kerosene, Gas.

Besides lower price, WITTE engines use less fuel per horsepower hour—four-fifths as much less—enough saving in a year to pay entire cost of engine. Easy starting; no cranking. Investigate these points before buying any engine.

Buy Direct; Cash or Easy Terms.

New Book Free Write me, so I can send you by return mail, full information on my latest and best offer.

D. H. WITTE ENGINE WORKS,
 691 Oakland Avenue,
 Kansas City, Missouri.
 2091 Empire Building,
 Pittsburgh, Pa.

1-Year Warranty

Delicate Girls and Women

are too often dosed with drugs when their blood is really starved. They need that blood-strength which comes from medicinal nourishment. No drugs can make blood.

SCOTT'S EMULSION is a highly concentrated blood-food and every drop yields returns in strengthening both body and brain.

If you are frail, languid, delicate or nervous, take Scott's Emulsion after meals for one month. No Alcohol.

SCOTT & BOWNE, BLOOMFIELD, N. J. 14-62

Keeps Skin Smooth, Firm, Fresh — Youthful Looking

To dispel the tell-tale lines of age, illness or worry — to overcome blemishes and improve facial contour — there is nothing quite so good as plain

Powdered SAXOLITE

Effective for wrinkles, crowsfeet, enlarged pores, etc., because it "tightens" and tones the skin and underlying tissue. No harm to tenderest skin. Get an ounce package. For the simple directions — see what just one application will do. Sold at all drug stores.

Curtains

Direct from the Manufacturer

Our 1915-16 Line of "Quilbest" Sewels Curtains contains hundreds of beautiful designs at one-half Retail Prices.

No. 104—Master of good quality seaming, hemming, and finishing. Best edge, 2 1/2 yards long. White or color, extra choice, comes in 12 per cent, extra special value, 75c per yard.

Satisfaction guaranteed or money refunded.

Send for Free Illustrated Catalogue of Curtains, Materials, Curtain Rods, Portieres, etc.

French Curtain Mfg. Co., Dept. E, 31 E. 27th St., N.Y.

TYPEWRITERS BARGAIN PRICES

Look these bargains! Typewriters from our own Factories. Every machine is guaranteed for one year.

Remington $20 to $55	Smiths $18 to $40
Underwoods $35 to $60	Royals $25 to $45
Corbitts $30 to $50	Olivers $20 to $35

We others Send for catalog describing the address of nearest branch office.

AM CAN WRITING MACHINE CO., Inc., 345 Broadway, N. Y.

ABRIDAL "GIFT"

With Every IMPERIAL RANGE

Send name and address. This receipt of Imperial Range. Learn the secrets of the Stone Oven Bottom, Odor Hood, and all exclusive features. Save $25. Direct from factory. 30 days trial. Cash or Credit. Write now for card facts about YOUR premium IMPERIAL STEEL RANGE COMPLY.

Imperial Steel Range Co., Cleveland, Ohio

CHANCE TO EARN MONEY. Man or Woman Wanted to sell HIGH-CLASS line of Silk Petticoats. Sent to best trade. $10.10 and full instructions on request. Leland P. Hamilton, Orange, N. J.

Righting a National Wrong

WOMEN, under the Labor Law of New York State, may not be employed in mercantile establishments more than fifty-four hours in any week (nine hours a day)—excepting . . .

This humane law with an exception has as its object the protection of woman, young and old. Before its advent, girls and women could be kept at work at all hours practically at the will of their employers. But now, during fifty-one of the fifty-two weeks in each year, girls and women are legally protected from the evils of unrestricted labor. For fifty-one weeks, women and girls need not jeopardize their honor, their health and their very lives in order to have employment.

We need not delve far into the history of a salesgirl to know wherein her honor was jeopardized by the old system—now in force for one week only. Nor does it require deep thinking to determine the effect of overwork on health. Overwork leads to nervousness, and that to physical and mental impairment. The duties of some employees take them out into inclement weather at night, candidates for disease that frequently leads far, far away from the hurry and worry of the daily grind.

Unrestricted hours, unrestricted toil for girls and women had become a national shame. Then various laws were enacted in their behalf. The beneficent law of New York State operates for fifty-one weeks—and then stops. The whole flood of evils, barely mentioned here, is let loose for one long week—the week (of all weeks!) before Christmas. The Labor Law of New York State says: "Women may not be employed in mercantile establishments more than fifty-four hours in a week, except from December 18 to 25, both inclusive." Why the exception?

It is made at the demand of employers in the interests of the public. The "public" is not a mere distant term involving all the people we do not know; it means us, Christian men and women who forget our "Golden Rule" because we wanted the precious privilege of crowding into the stores the week before Christmas; of waiting until then to buy our lists of "loving remembrances." So our legislators framed a law with a modification enabling employers to keep their employees at work day and night the hardest week in the year for us. But they unconsciously doomed thousands to the darkest Christmas and saddest New Year imaginable.

But the question may be asked, in order that this law may be altered and these wrongs abolished, must we now do away with Christmas giving entirely? Decidedly not; there is a far happier alternative. Gifts designed for affording pleasure, and to reflect loving thoughts on December 25, could just as well be in the stores in November, and purchased in the first part of December. But they will not be in the stores in November unless customers demand such things long before Christmas week.

It may open our eyes to the meaning of all this, if we get a vision of the army of workers, not women only by any means, who are suddenly put on forced time to produce and handle, economically at the latest possible moment, the nation's Christmas gifts.

There are some 90,000 wage-earners making paper and wood pulp in the United States, with a half hundred factories converting it into fancy paper boxes. Hundreds of these earners, we know, are little children who start working early in the morning, and even when the sandman comes around their heads may nod, but tiny hands must fashion boxes; and Mother Nature, who wills that all living things shall have a certain amount of sleep, shakes her head in dismay. There are more than 13,000 pairs of hands engaged in the manufacture of sugar, partly that 44,638 workers may use it in the making of confectionery, that commodity which we must have dainty and fresh no matter who wilts and suffers to turn enough out in time. In the toy-making industry thousands of workers, very many of them girls and women, are driven to their tasks not by loving eagerness to bring shouts of glee to little lips on Christmas morning, but by the remorseless need of haste to turn out the goods within the briefest period of time. How many hot tears have fallen upon these childhood treasures we can never know. But we can make sure that none fall because of us. We, not the manufacturers, dictate the conditions under which Christmas goods are turned out.

Games, fancy goods, pictures and books, dolls and all the long list of "suitable" Christmas presents what an army of men, women and children toil to produce them! And how excellent a thing it would be if that army could be employed at reasonable hours all the year through!

Then after countless workers have prepared the articles for us, there are a million saleswomen and salesmen at our service night and day. In all it is estimated that there are approximately 2,599,709 workers, men, women and little children, who are hurtfully affected by the custom of concentrating each year's Christmas trade within a brief period before Christmas.

And then our gifts are transported from town to town, state to state, and country to country, by the Post Office Department. There are 56,810 post offices in the United States. Besides the regular mail-carriers, there are about 45,000 rural free delivery carriers, traveling altogether 1,050,266 miles daily. Last year a certain welfare association mailed thousands of announcements on December 24, which could have been held over until January. In 1914, during the eight days from December 18 to 25, inclusive, 3,050,232 pieces of letter mail passed through the Washington, D. C., Post Office. During the same period the outgoing parcel post mail amounted to 20,748 sacks, and in addition there were 8,000 parcels too large or too fragile to be transported in sacks. The biggest portion of this mail was a cruel Christmas pack strapped to the back of this faithful servant of the public. What about your own post office?

But there is a very pleasant side to this subject. It is the helpful side. It is the side upon which every Christian man and woman and child should stand. It is called the Shop Early Movement. Stores, corporations, big societies, churches, schools, are showing much interest in the new campaign. The Consumers League is one of the most active agencies to encourage early Christmas shopping, and it is not lacking in results.

Generally speaking the stores do their part. Retail merchants in many cases now have their stocks prepared early in November and customers may complete their shopping in ample time to insure deliveries. All kinds of offers are made to patrons to encourage them to shop early.

A store in Newark, N. J., gives its many charge-account customers who finish their shopping the first two weeks in December the privilege of paying their accounts in February. Last year in New York City twenty-two stores closed at six P. M., one at seven, and four at ten P. M., with supper given in each of the four cases. A large department store in Chicago does much for the welfare of its employees. Advertising is begun at Thanksgiving time, and early in November requests to shop early are mailed to customers. The entire force of the store is increased during the holiday season, and the store is closed every evening at six P. M.

"Early to shop, early to give, Makes our clerks feel that it's worth while to live" is a new version of an old ditty that makes a catchy motto for stores to use in their efforts to induce early Christmas shopping. Another runs like this: "Christmas gifts ripen best if picked early and kept in your own room for a while before sending."

It is also found worth while for stores to furnish printed cards bearing such a message as this: "For a Merry Christmas with no bitterness in it for any one, I send you this little gift in advance of the Day. Your part is not to open it till then." Any enterprising merchant

DETROIT

WEATHERPROOF BODIES FOR FORD CARS

Make Your Ford an All Year Round Car

The Detroit top is handsomely proportioned, richly finished and fits snugly over the regular touring or roadster body.

The Price $77.00 f. o. b. Detroit includes Rain Vision, Ventilating Windshield and Barbour Patent Flexible doors.

Fits so snugly on car body that joint is not noticeable, no overhang. Cannot possibly rattle. The interior finishing is of Gray Cloth, very rich and pleasing. The workmanship is first-class throughout. Absolutely guaranteed. Money back if not satisfied.

Write today for Illustrated Book.

Detroit Weatherproof Body Co.
 196-502 Clay Avenue
 DETROIT

HAVE YOU AMMUNITION?

The nations of Europe now at war are calling for more great guns and more destructive ammunition. A great gun is worth more than a regiment of men, and one high-explosive shell will put a company of men out of action.

Systematic Bible Study

By correspondence is the only way by which many Christians can get the great guns and the destructive shells for their warfare. The Moody Bible Institute of Chicago is now providing eight courses of study that have been tested and proven worth while. The majority of these courses is Bible Study, the remaining courses being on methods of Christian work and allied subjects.

The Scofield Bible Correspondence Course

Is now owned and controlled by the Moody Bible Institute, and is the most comprehensive course ever prepared for correspondence work.

If you are within reach of the mails these courses can be taken in your homes, more than 2,300 students now taking them. 1,368 new students enrolled in the last year.

Full information will be sent on application to the

Correspondence Department

The Moody Bible Institute

Dept. F-8, 153-163 Institute Place, Chicago, Ill.

If you do not know the spiritual value of Prayer-Topic Envelopes to your church, don't you think it wise to find out?

The Prayer-Topic feature is supplied by us—free—at the request of the Laymen's Movement.

FREE—A Duplex Envelope Opener, for the name and address of your Treasurer and S. S. Superintendent. Saves time, energy and trouble.

ADDRESS DESK—1

DUPLIX

ARCHER G. JONES
 RICHMOND, VA.

UNLESS IT'S A IMITATION

DR. JAMES M. GRAY

now writes the expositions of the Sunday School Lessons exclusively for

THE CHRISTIAN WORKERS MAGAZINE

Dr. Robert M. Russell gives the Devotional Lessons, and Mr. E. O. Sellers, Teachers' Problems. This is the best all-round magazine for Christian workers.

10c a copy, 25c for three months, $1 per year.

THE CHRISTIAN WORKERS MAGAZINE, 152 INSTITUTE PLACE, CHICAGO

BLMYER BELL

UNLIKE OTHER BELLS SWEETER, MORE DURABLE, LOWER PRICE. OUR FREE CATALOGUE TELLS WHY.

Write to Cincinnati Bell Foundry Co., Cincinnati, O.

Last Chance Offers

There are comparatively few Last Chance opportunities in magazine combinations this year. Nearly all of the magazines are holding to the regular price for the whole season except those mentioned below in combination with the Christian Herald. In each of the following cases, however, there is a distinct opportunity to save money on your magazine orders if you take advantage of it at once. All of these magazines will be higher in price after November 10th. Now is the time to subscribe if you wish to take advantage of the low price.

Christian Herald	- -	($1.50 a year)	$2.00 save $1.00
Pictorial Review	- -	($1.50 a year)
Christian Herald	- -	($1.50 a year)	$2.30 save 70c
Metropolitan	- -	($1.50 a year)
Christian Herald	- -	($1.50 a year)	$1.90 save 60c
Little Folks	- -	($1.00 a year)
Christian Herald	- -	($1.50 a year)	$3.00 save $1.50
Review of Reviews	- -	($3.00 a year)

Canadian postage extra for each magazine, except The Christian Herald Foreign Postage, $1.00

Subscriptions may be sent to different addresses, and may begin with any month desired.

This is a LAST CHANCE OFFER which will expire, positively, on November 10th, 1915. The very offer you want to accept will probably cost MORE on November 11th. ORDER NOW!

Present subscriptions will be extended for one year from the time they now expire.

SPECIAL OFFER

Christian Herald	- -	($1.50 a year)	$3.25 Save 90c
Youth's Companion	- -	($2.00 a year)
McCall's Magazine	- -	($.50 a year)	Save 90c
(including choice of a 15c pattern FREE)	- -	($.15 retail)

Address THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York

The Hen that Lays Is the Hen that Pays

We want you to know how to raise this kind of hens because they make large profits for their owners. If you want to know all about the Poultry business so that you will be sure of success we will tell you how. Our Philo System of raising poultry has made thousands of poultry farms successful in all sections of the United States and in foreign countries. We will forward book with complete instructions and all the facts about our new discoveries for $1.00.

Philo National Poultry Institute
1605 Lake Street, Elmira, N. Y.

Agents are making big money selling lighting systems. "Akron" complete independent lighting systems. Pressure tank supplies gasoline through hollow wire to lamps all over house and cooking stove. Safest system made. Shipped ready to install. Illumines with clear, soft, brilliant light; best and cheapest known.

AKRON LIGHTING SYSTEMS have the latest improvements and are unequalled for simplicity and handsome design. Big range of styles and prices; portable and street lamps and lanterns.

Handy Demonstration Outfit and our agency proposition cannot be beat—Write quick for catalog and terms.

Akron Gas Lamp Co.,
627 So. Main St., Akron, O.

DON'T PAY TWO PRICES HOOSIER Stoves Ranges Heaters FREE

To try in your own home for 30 days. Show your friends. Freight paid by us. Send it back at our expense if you do not want to keep it. You can buy the best at Actual Factory Prices. Are heavily made, of the highest grade selected material, beautifully finished, with improvements that equal anything ever produced. The Best in the World. Guaranteed for years by a Two Million Dollar Bond. No matter where you live, you can try a HOOSIER in your own home thirty days, without a penny's expense or obligation to you. You can save enough on a single HOOSIER STOVE to buy your winter's fuel. Write or send postal today for Large Free Catalog and prices showing large assortment to select from. No Obligations.

HOOSIER STOVE COMPANY,
164 State Street, - MARION, IND.

"Better Light—Less Cost"

"Like the Angle Lamp so well we've dismantled our costly gas machine," writes one user. "Our Angle Lamps have saved 20 times their cost," testifies another Angle user, "in oil, burners, chimneys and trouble."

The Angle Lamp

makes common kerosene the best and cheapest of all illuminants. It gives clear, bright, shadowless light without odor or soot. It is lighted and extinguished like gas while burning, and can, if desired, be filled with perfect safety. Our proposition is that you shall know the value of the Angle Lamp by a in your own home. Send at once for Catalog O and description of this time, trouble and money saver.

30-DAY TEST

The Angle Manufacturing Co.
244-246 West 23rd Street New York City

One to Eight Burners
Thirty-Two Styles

can devise such helps. They are given only with goods purchased before December 15.

The willingness of merchants to help this movement is shown in their use of valuable advertising space in the daily papers to call attention to the shop early idea. They spend their money to educate the public: we are the public: are we "teachable" in this humane matter?

The stores and organizations may be willing to do their utmost to forward this movement, but the great responsibility lies with the buying public. One backward store last year announced that "All goods bought up to ten o'clock Christmas eve will be delivered the same night within the city limits and early morning to all suburban points." An outrage—yes; but if patrons had refused to buy Christmas Eve, that store would have learned a needed lesson.

If purchases were made early, the delivery force would not have to work like supermen night and day. Such conditions make many a man a groucho to sour all who come in contact with him, including his helpless horse, because Christmas has got on his nerves through his sense of injustice; and this feeling that he is a victim of unfair treatment is no creation of his imaginary powers, but a sad fact.

The time is at hand for every one, offenders and non-offenders alike, to pitch in with a vim, and help remedy conditions. Each person who openly advocates the shop early idea is a decided help to the general cause. Do not let the fact—if it is a fact—that you or your friends or your whole town already observe the spirit of the shop early crusade prevent you from coming out openly in favor of it.

Between intimates who know there is sure to be an exchange of gifts, there can be an agreement to do their Christmas shopping early. Even a contest to see who gets through first can be arranged. When the gift is sent enclose a little card bearing some such greeting as this:

"To lighten toil,
And brighten hearts,
I early shopped to find this gift,
And early send it."

"Its magic charm
To carry love,
Requires that you shall not undo
Its seal till Christmas."

"So by this act
Between us two
We censure custom's cruel habit,
And help to end it."

One of the charms of Christmas is the little personal touch in the message that goes with the gift, but that is quite the hardest part to manage. This new cause furnishes opportunity for a fanciful bit of sentiment.

In small country towns Shop Clubs may be formed in groups of three or more people, the members pledging themselves to complete their shopping by December 15, and have everything mailed by December 20. Where there is a will there's a way, and who can wish to make Christmas a merry season for every one? This is the way to do it for oh, so many who now, every year, dread Christmas more and more.

If people would make a tour of the stores in November, go home and make a list of the things that attracted them from that list of the things they want, then return to the stores and buy them not later than the first two in December, what a blessing it would be to themselves and those who wish to do all, worth doing—not only well, but wisely!

When the vast procession of Christmas shoppers awakens to the fact that the men, women and children who upon them, tie up their parcels, and take them to their very doors, are men, women and children, not machines; when they realize that they are just as human, just as capable of receiving kindness, just as ready for a happy holiday, the flaw will be taken out of Christmas. GERTRUDE GOLDSMID

1840 Diamond Jubilee 1915

NOT a person but a church organization, the German Evangelical Synod of North America, was permitted by the grace of God to celebrate this important event just recently.

And what, pray, is the German Evangelical Synod of North America? It is a church organization having its pastors and its congregations in thirty-five of the states of our Union; in the District of Columbia; in Canada, and in the Central Provinces of East India.

The cradle of the German Evangelical Synod of North America stood in an obscure village, near St. Louis, Mo., formerly Gravois Settlement, now Mehlville, Mo., and the 15th of October, 1840, marks its birthday. The principles for which this organization stands find their expression in the following paragraph of its statutes:

"The German Evangelical Synod of North America, as a part of the Evangelical Church, defines the term 'Evangelical Church' as denoting that branch of the Christian Church which acknowledges the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments as the Word of God, the sole and infallible guide of faith and life, and accepts the interpretation of the Holy Scriptures as given in the symbolic books of the Lutheran and Reformed Church, the most important being the Augsburg Confession, Luther's and the Heidelberg Catechism, in so far as they agree; but where they disagree the German Evangelical Synod of North America adheres strictly to the passages of Holy Scripture bearing on the subject, and avails itself of the liberty of conscience prevailing in the Evangelical Church."

It is plain to the student of church history that these principles are not something entirely new, but that they are in substance the principles of the Evangelical Church of Germany, which came into being under the beneficent reign and through the instrumentality of the God-fearing king Frederick William III of Prussia in the year 1817. These principles were transplanted into this country by men who had compassion upon their countrymen who had left the Fatherland, and who came to preach the Gospel to them, beginning in what was then included in the "Far West," Missouri.

Having labored for some years through formal organization, eight persons on the 15th day of October, 1840, formed the German Evangelical Church Association of the West. These men were E. L. Nollau, G. W. Wall, Hean Garlich, Carl Ludwig Dauber, John Jacob Riess, Phil J. Heyer, John G. Rieger. In the course of seventy-five years this Association of the German Evangelical Synod of North America, has developed to such an extent that in the year of its Jubilee numbers 1,074 pastors and 1,385 congregations.

The Synod supports a preparatory school, the "Proseminary" in Elmhurst, Ill., with an enrolment of 178 students; the "Eden Theological Seminary" in St. Louis, Mo., having 80 students enrolled, and the Evangelical Academy in Fort Collins, Colo. Since 1888 the Deaconess Work has become an important factor in the many-sided mission work of the Synod.

In 1884 the Synod entered the field of foreign missions in the Central Provinces of East India. Now, eighteen missionaries, assisted by 270 native teachers and helpers, labor for the uplift of the outcasts among India's population, looking to the Lord of the harvest for success.

This is a brief sketch of the history and the work of the church organization that has for its motto Eph. 4:1—"The unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace."

A HISTORY of the German Evangelical Synod of North America, a book of 330 pages, has been prepared for the year of Jubilee in the German language, and is obtainable at Eden Publishing House, St. Louis, Mo.

We have been in the Christian Herald for 40 years, wandered away twice in that time for a week or two, but could not remain away and quickly returned.

We consider it the best all around paper in print today. MRS. D. W. BUFFINGTON

The Reason

"Why doesn't Daddy come home?"

HOW IT COULD HAVE BEEN PREVENTED

The above illustration will prevent hundreds of disastrous skidding accidents, because it will make negligent and inexperienced motorists think and act. On the next rainy day they will be prepared for wet, slippery asphalt and treacherous mud—their tires will be equipped with the only positive safeguard against skidding.

Weed Anti-Skid Chains

These Facts Should Persuade You to Think and Act Now, Before It's Too Late:

Dealers who sell the most tires are the largest sellers of Weed Chains, and they recommend Weed Chains regardless of what brand or type of tire they sell. Every car manufacturer uses Weed Chains on his service, demonstrating and test cars.

The great taxicab companies, the delivery services of big businesses in every line—all the great well informed organizations who operate large fleets of cars—use Weed Chains.

They all use Weed Chains to save lives and property. They do it to save themselves from damage suits. They know how often skidding causes disastrous accidents and how much it costs to repair the damage. They all know, through experience, that there is no substitute for Weed Chains.

Weed Chains are sold for all brands and types of tires by dealers everywhere. So, stop at your dealers today and "Weed Chain ALL FOUR TIRES To Safety", before it's too late.

Weed Chain Tire Grip Company
Bridgeport, Connecticut

Also Manufacturers of Tire Chains especially constructed for Single and Dual Solid Truck Tires — Motorcycle Tire Chains, Dobbins Blow-Out Chains, etc.

Manufactured for Canada by

Dominion Chain Company, Limited, Head Office: Shaughnessy Building, Montreal, Canada

By far the most popular Coffee in America

Everywhere the popularity of Arbuckles' Coffee is growing. From one of our branches alone sales in 1914 were six times what they were the year before. In one state, four pounds of Arbuckles' Coffee were sold for every man, woman and child in the state.

Think how good a coffee must taste to be the most popular coffee in America!

American women are famous for their coffee. Americans drink more coffee than any other nation and are known to buy better coffees than other countries. This fact is so well established that coffee-growing countries ship much of their finest coffees to America.

This will give you some idea of how good a coffee must be when for half a century it has been America's favorite coffee.

New friends added all the time

In over a million American homes, every morning, a piping hot cup of Arbuckles' starts the day, and every year we are adding hundreds of thousands of new homes. To know how much Arbuckles' Coffee adds to over a million breakfasts every day — try it.

Get a package today. Serve Arbuckles' when you have guests, when you want your coffee to be particularly good.

When you see the satisfaction it gives, you will know why over a million other women use it, why they have made Arbuckles' by far the most popular coffee in America.

FREE Write today for free catalog of 150 premiums. Arbuckles' premiums are almost as famous as Arbuckles' Coffee. As indicating their popularity, in one year Arbuckles' coffee drinkers sent for more than a million of one premium alone. Address Arbuckle Bros., 71-A 8 Water St., New York.

Save this Signature

Better than Ever

Christian Herald

SUBSCRIPTION, $1.50 PER ANNUM
PUBLISHED 52 TIMES A YEAR

COPYRIGHT, 1915, BY THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 10, 1915

VOL. 38—NO. 45. PRICE 5 CENTS
OFFICES: BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK

THE ROCK MORIAH IN THE MOSQUE OF OMAR, JERUSALEM

Photograph by American Colony, Jerusalem

(see mention inside)

Dromedary Dates

EAST Gives to WEST Her Best All-Around Food

Through the advent of Dromedary Dates the whole world lives next door to the Garden of Eden—where climate, soil and sun all combine to make dates Nature's most favored sweetmeat. But not all dates grown in the Garden of Eden are good enough to be packed in Dromedary Date packages. A very careful first selection is made. Then a second selection. You may be sure that only the plumpest, mellowest and most luscious dates grown in the world's finest date garden find their way into Dromedary Date individual dust-proof sealed packages. Eating Dromedary Dates packed in layers with waxed paper between is like eating dates freshly picked in far-off Arabia.

Take this gift the East offers you. Let the children eat all these "sugar plums" they will. Dromedary Dates are ideal for children because the date habit keeps them away from candy and is a whole lot better for them. Ideal for grown-ups because Dromedary Dates are a fruit-dainty as well as a highly nourishing food. Golden Dromedary Dates are golden—morning, noon and night. Dromedary Dates will make you revise your idea of how good dates really are. Write today for our Prize Date Cook Book about date dishes and how to prepare them.

10c Cookie-Cutter FREE

Send us your name and address and the name of your grocer and 5c (stamps or coin) partially to pay postage and packing and we will send you a "One-Cake" size package of Dromedary Cocoanut, our new product, a Dromedary Cookie-Cutter and a Cocoanut Recipe Book.

The Hills Bros. Co., Dept. S, 375 Washington St., New York

Dromedary Dates received Gold Medals, highest awards, at San Francisco and San Diego Expositions

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

An Illustrated News Weekly for the Home

War Invades the Garden of Eden

By PROFESSOR EDGAR J. BANKS

The Tree of Knowledge

BRITISH soldiers have entered the Garden of Eden and taken it from the Turks.

So state the recent war despatches from the far-away corner of the world, from Mesopotamia, between the Tigris and Euphrates rivers. There is a little corner of land between these two historic streams, just where they meet, which tradition says, and the native Arabs believe, was the Garden of Eden. From the Biblical story, too, we may have that it was somewhere between these rivers that Adam and Eve were created. For nearly a thousand years, that historic spot has been in the possession of Arabs and Turks; but at last it has come Christian. To the north, beyond the meeting-place of the rivers, the Turks have been driven before the enemy and now the greater part of old Babylonia, so far as is present at least, is in Christian hands.

The Tigris and Euphrates take their rise in almost the same spot in the mountains of Armenia, nearly a hundred miles away. At first they flow in opposite directions, encircling the great plain which was once Assyria, and then they approach each other until at Bagdad they are less than fifty miles apart. And then they flow apart, encircling Babylonia, and meet in the south at the little village of Kurna. In the upper part of their courses, both rivers are rapid streams, dashing down the mountains through deep gorges. When they pass Bagdad they enter a perfectly level plain, to wind sluggishly along to the sea.

In the springtime the Euphrates spreads out, transforming the desert into lakes and huge marshes in which reeds grow abundantly. Sometimes at the end of old Babylon the Euphrates dries up so completely that the natives cross it upon the dry sand of its bed, and dig deep wells into the sand for their drinking water. Farther south, even in the winter time, it is so shallow that once, when I was traveling down it in a canoe, we had to wade and carry the canoe to deeper water beyond.

The Tigris, which is a swifter stream and very winding, is navigable for light-draught vessels as far as Bagdad, five hundred and twenty miles above the city of Busreh, by the river. The geologist tells us that all the country below Bagdad to the Persian Gulf is an alluvial deposit brought down from Armenia, and that the rivers are still depositing their silt, filling up the northern part of the Persian Gulf at the rate of one mile every thirty years. About two thousand years ago the Persian Gulf reached northward to Kurna, where the rivers now meet; in more remote times it extended even to Bagdad. All of the old country of Babylonia is therefore perfectly level, without a stone or a hill, excepting the mounds formed by the hundreds of cities which once flourished there.

The northern part of Babylonia is generally dry during the greater part of the year. The lower part, near the junction of the rivers, is generally a great malarial swamp overgrown with reeds. In the springtime one may sail almost anywhere across the country from the Tigris to the Euphrates, and in the dry season great herds of camels, buffaloes, donkeys, sheep and goats graze over the same place. This explains why the war reports describe two battles between the British and the Turks, one a naval battle, the other a land battle, and both fought in precisely the same place. One was when the waters overflowed the valley; the other when the land was dry. But even in the driest of seasons there are great marshes in lower Mesopotamia, and the British soldier village of Kurna now stands. Imagine two great rivers five hundred feet or more in width, flowing together, and in the triangular piece of land at their junction a grove of tall date palms, with foliage so dense that the sun of even the brightest days of summer fails to penetrate it, and you have a picture of this spot. Near the Tigris shore stands the large serai or palace of the Turkish governor. A little nearer the point are the ruins of another large house, where a prosperous Jew once lived; but the Jew was expelled and his house allowed to fall to ruins, for no Moslem would occupy his home. Back from the river, in the densest shade, are the few reed and mud huts of the people. There is a little shop where you may purchase sugar and coffee and cheap English print goods; and there is a little coffeehouse, where bitter Arab coffee and long water pipes are awaiting the guests. The only suggestion of civilization is a tall telegraph pole standing at the very point where the rivers meet. The British telegraph line, connecting Europe with India, passes down the Euphrates, through this traditional site of the Garden of Eden.

With the exception of the Turkish governor and the few soldiers quartered there before the war the occupants of the village are Arabs. Nature has provided them with so many of the necessities of life that they bear little resemblance to the small, active Arab of the plain. They are large, inclined to corpulency and shiftlessness. The rivers abound with fish, which the natives catch in an ingenious manner. The tide of the Persian Gulf reaches up the rivers beyond Kurna, and the natives build fences of reeds, enclosing a small space of the river near the shore. In times of high tide, the water flows over the fences, bringing the fish with it, and when the tide flows out the fish are left stranded in the enclosure.

In the plain to the north of the village, maize is cultivated; but the farmer in the Garden of Eden needs pay little attention to his crop. The soil is exceedingly rich. He merely plants the seed, and when the grain is ripe he stands upon a little tower of clay rising above the grain, and with a rotary sling hurls little lumps of clay to frighten away the passing birds.

But the date trees which flourish in the garden are the chief source of his income. With a tree or two he is independent, for they provide him with shade in the terrific heat of summer, the dead branches are his fuel in the chill winter days, the tree trunk is the support of his roof, from the branches he makes his bed, his chairs, his table, and with the leaf-blades he weaves his plates, baskets, mats, and fans. With the fiber of the tree he makes his ropes and a kind of coarse cloth. The fruit of the date, both fresh and dried, is his chief food. The dried fruit he pounds to flour for making his bread. From the juice of the date he makes a delicious jam, or pekmez, his sugar, his vinegar and a drink which he calls sherba. By distilling the juice he makes his arrak, the most intoxicating of drinks. The date stones he saves to feed to his camels.

Though Kurna is nearly surrounded by water, the native is seldom a sailor. Sometimes he makes a who spends a season among them will probably burn and shiver the remainder of his life away with malaria.

Among the Date Gardens of Busreh

To the archeological student, the upper part of the valley is of the greatest interest, for scattered over its surface are hundreds of mounds which mark the ruins of once great and wealthy cities. There several civilizations have flourished and passed away—the Sumerian, the Babylonian, the Persian, the Parthian, and that of the Arabs of the time of the Caliphate. So many are the mounds that no explorer has yet seen them all, nor are they all marked upon the maps. In each mound the excavator may hope to find sculptured treasures and inscriptions which reveal the history of the ancient world.

In the lower part of the valley, near the junction of the rivers, there are no ancient ruin mounds. Of no less interest, however, is the garden-like spot which the natives call the "Garden of Eden" where the little

Gathering Dates Near Kurna,
the Old Garden of Eden

Arab Women Making Bread
Near the Garden of Eden

canoe-like boat from reeds or date-leaf stems; but the boat he prefers is a coracle similar to a large tub, made of wicker work, and smeared upon the outside with bitumen from Hit, up the Euphrates. This peculiar boat, which is represented upon the sculptured slabs from the Assyrian palaces of three thousand years ago, is propelled with a single paddle. The boatman spins his tub about like a top, and then, paddling in the opposite direction, the boat is sent along.

The climate of Kurna is acknowledged to be the most trying in all the world. The heat is terrific in the summer time. It is claimed that the British government has a record of one hundred and fifty-nine degrees in the shade upon the bridge of a boat anchored in the river at Busreh, a little to the south. The missionaries at Busreh tell of nights when the thermometer registers not less than one hundred and twenty-five degrees. British sailors bound for the Persian Gulf in the summer time, usually desert if they can. Perhaps in Arizona the thermometer rises nearly as high; but there the air is dry while in the Persian Gulf it is exceedingly moist. The Europeans at Busreh must pass the days in underground chambers, or serdaubs, while a native boy pulls a huge fan, or punkah, suspended from the ceiling, to keep the air in circulation. The nights are spent on the roof, for it is impossible to sleep below. In the winter time the air seems exceedingly cold, for the marshes are filled with salt; and as the wind sweeps over the plain the moist salt air is peculiarly penetrating. Frequently the Arab, benumbed by the cold, falls from his horse.

But the chief peculiarity about Kurna, as I have already said, is that the natives believe the place where they live is the exact site of the Garden of Eden. On the Tigris shore, near the governor's house, is a small locust tree leaning out over the water. The natives give it the name of Burhan, and assert that it is the very tree from which Eve picked the forbidden fruit. A few years ago, as I was canoeing down the Euphrates river, one of the soldiers of my guard, who had long been stationed at Kurna, delighted in telling me the traditions connected with the place. Whether or not he believed the tales he told, I do not know; yet he showed a familiarity with the old Semitic stories. He told of the tree of knowledge, with its great hollow trunk in which lived a great serpent which appeared at certain times and played with the Moslem children of the village. It was "the very tree from which Eve had picked the forbidden fruit, and the very serpent which had deceived her." This and similar stories increased my desire to see the famous tree.

It was evening when we drew our boat up on the shore beneath the tree. To my eyes it seemed small, and when I asked the soldier to point out the hollow trunk and the great serpent living within it, he closed the argument by saying that such sacred things were not visible to my unbelieving eyes.

While we were standing there, a Mohammedan priest appeared and joined in the conversation. "It is the tree from which Mother Eve picked the forbidden fruit," he explained. "To you, the tree may seem small, for each hundred years the old tree falls, and a new one springs up from its old roots to renew its youth. It is a very old tree, which stood in the Garden of Eden when Adam and Eve were here." I must have believed the priest, for I sent a man up the tree to bring down some of its bean-like fruit, that I might eat of it as did Eve of old.

Was the Garden of Eden, described in the book of Genesis, really there in the corner of land where the rivers meet, and where the village of Kurna now stands? Probably not. Two thousand years ago the Persian Gulf rolled over the spot. The absence of the ruins of Babylonian cities, so abundant a little to the north, shows that the place was not inhabitable in Babylonian times. In the early days the rivers united farther north, or flowed into the gulf by separate mouths. Perhaps they united near the place where the city of Nasarieh now stands. Both the Tigris and the Euphrates, spreading over the plain, and always cutting new channels, frequently change their courses. At the bow of every Tigris River boat stand pilots with long poles in hand, to feel their way along, for on no two journeys is the channel in just the same place. No man knows just where the rivers used to flow, or where they met six thousand years ago. We may believe that the Garden of Eden was then at the confluence of the rivers, and perhaps some future explorer may yet discover its exact site.

Ancient Babylonia and Eden Where War Rages

If you sail up the Tigris a few miles to the north of Kurna, you may see on the western shore a great rambling wooden building, perhaps the largest structure in Mesopotamia. There you will always find little bands of Jews arriving from distant parts of Mesopotamia. There they say that Ezra, the leader of the exiles, was buried, and they come to worship at his shrine. It is uncertain if the Biblical Ezra, or a later Hebrew leader of that name, was buried there. The history of the shrine may be traced back several centuries. In the towns up the river, especially at Nasarieh on the Euphrates, and at Amara on the Tigris, you will find a peculiar Christian sect called Subi. Some call them the followers of John the Baptist. They are dark-skinned, black-featured race, ignorant and fanatical; yet they are exceedingly expert in manufacturing intricate jewelry by a secret process which they religiously guard. Every traveler brings away souvenirs of their handiwork. Their attitude toward Europeans is even more hostile than toward the Arabs. I suspect this was brought about by an early trader who sold to them for pure silver a large number of pewter works. The Subi is hardly worthy of the name Christian. To perform ablutions upon certain occasions seems to be the one chief duty enjoined upon him by his little understood religion.

Throughout Mesopotamia, too, you will find the descendants of the ancient Babylonians still living. They call themselves Nasrani or Christians. Europeans frequently call them Chaldeans. Though they all speak Arabic, they retain among themselves their Chaldean language, which is similar to the ancient Babylonian. They are a large, well-built people, with light skin, and with features resembling those upon the sculptured figures from the walls of the ancient palaces. They are by far the most prosperous and progressive people in the valley.

Also within the boundaries of the traditional Eden, and between the rivers, just where the armies are now fighting, is one of the great licorice fields of the world. Here the plant grows wild, and thousands of the natives dig for its root which they suck up in huge piles along the Tigris shore and bale it ready to be shipped on its long journey to America. But the raising of licorice is the greatest industry of the lower valley. Autumn is a feverish time among the date merchants. Then the dates are ripe, and are loaded onto the ocean steamers at Busreh and the boats race down the Persian Gulf across the Indian Ocean, up the Red Sea along the Mediterranean and across the Atlantic, to be the first to arrive with the delicious fruit for our Thanksgiving table. Once sailed directly from Busreh to New York on one of the annual date steamers—a journey of forty-two days.

It would be interesting to know the future of this old garden spot. For several years before the war began, the Turkish Government was building irrigation dams across the Euphrates, reopening the old Babylonian canals which had long been filled with sand, and building new canals, to reclaim the country. When the war broke out, work upon this great irrigation project ceased. After the war it will doubtless be resumed, and one may easily imagine the country which will then take place. All of that wonderfully fertile valley will be reclaimed. The wide plains where now the herds of the Bedawin find scant pasturage, will be dotted with date groves and grain fields, and millions of people will find homes here now but few can gain a livelihood. Again Eridu, the city of the Califs, will be as glorious as when the famous Haroun er-Rashid used to wander in disguise about the streets, and when Sindbad the Sailor made it his home. The buried cities will be uncovered, revealing the treasures long hidden among their ruins. The history of modern Egypt will be repeated in Babylonia. The desert and the swamps will again become a veritable Garden of Eden as in the ancient days.

The Race-Wide War on the Liquor Traffic

By FERDINAND C. IGLEHART, D.D.

ON November 14, the World's Temperance Sunday, mention will be made of the wonderful victories over alcohol at home and abroad; good people will express gratitude to God for his leadership in the battle and for the inspiration of his Spirit quickening the human stroke, and will pray for a continuance of the divine leadership, and will promise their service and support in the continuation of the conflict for the destruction of the liquor traffic in this country.

For the first time in many years the government statistics show a reduced consumption of both fermented and spirituous liquors of 200,000,000 gallons of beer and 16,000,000 gallons of distilled spirits. This report means that one billion five hundred million less glasses of beer and five hundred million less glasses of spirituous liquor were consumed than the year before. Up to 1907 there were but three dry states—Maine, North Dakota and Kansas—as the result of sixty years of moral conflict. Since then Georgia, North Carolina, Oklahoma, Mississippi, Tennessee, West Virginia, Virginia, Arizona, Colorado, Washington, Oregon, Alabama, Arkansas, Idaho, Iowa and South Carolina have adopted No License. This is the addition of sixteen Prohibition states in the past eight years, making nineteen in all. South Carolina adopted constitutional Prohibition last September by a popular vote of almost two to one, every county but one voting for No License.

Among the surprises of the state contests was that Oregon and Washington, less than fifty per cent. of whose population was under No License, and Arizona with less than twenty-five per cent. of the population under No License, should have adopted Prohibition, all of them by a popular vote. The majority in Arizona was over 3,000 in a total vote of less than 50,000; in Oregon it was 36,000, and in Washington it was 18,632. As the result of the law in Oregon, which goes into effect January 1, 1916, nine hundred saloons and eighteen breweries in ninety-eight towns will be closed. There are twelve other states fifty per cent. of whose population are under Prohibition. They are Florida, Idaho, Indiana, Iowa, Kentucky, Louisiana, Minnesota, Nebraska, New Hampshire, South Dakota, Texas and Vermont. It is expected that they will move up pretty rapidly into the Prohibition ranks, making thirty-one of the thirty-six necessary for the ratification of the national constitutional prohibitory resolution. Only five more states would be needed. There are eleven other states from twenty-five to fifty per cent. of whose population are under No License, from which the temperance people hope to get the other necessary five states. New York, New Jersey and Pennsylvania are among the eight states at the rear of the temperance army, with less than twenty-five per cent. of the population under No License. The Anti-Saloon people are planning to carry the constitutional amendment without the help of these three states, two of which are the largest in the nation.

The liquor dealers can blame themselves for much of the misfortune that has befallen them. Their institutions have been so essentially bad, the home and parent of about every vice and crime; they have manifested such cruel avarice; they have so shamelessly corrupted American politics; they have made such persistent onslaughts on the Sabbath, that the public conscience will no longer quietly tolerate the saloon. Science is against alcohol, charging it with being a poison and teaching so to the children in the schools. The medical profession has ceased to be its friend. Business is against it. On the grounds of efficiency the railroads, manufacturers and other establishments put a ban on those who frequent the saloon. The workmen's liability laws in most states have made employers more careful to demand temperance in the men. Leading members of the trades union commend abstinence to their fellow workmen.

THE women of America have been the worst enemy the liquor traffic has ever had. Nemesis as an angel pursuing the criminal is mercifully compared with woman's fierce warfare on the saloon. She began the organized movement in the Women's Crusade in 1873, which became the Woman's Christian Temperance Union at Cleveland, Ohio, in 1874. Miss Frances E. Willard, who was the first secretary, became the president of the organization in 1879 and remained in that position till her death in 1898. Hers is the first and only woman's statue in Statuary Hall at the Capitol at Washington. Her name is among those accorded a place in the Hall of Fame at the University in New York City. Miss Lillian M. N. Stevens became a worthy successor of Miss Willard as the president, and at her death Miss Anna Gordon was made the head of the W. C. T. U. There are in America 15,000 branches and 400,000 members affiliated with the organization. And whatever opinion may be held on the question of universal suffrage, it is

Continued on page 1141

Good Roads Everywhere

By CHARLES HENRY DAVIS, C. E.
President National Highways Association

IN this great land of ours we give too much thought to our material gains. We are doing better, but we are far behind the older countries of Europe. They know more fully the value of the beautiful things, and they have applied this lesson to their road-building. Their roads are not only beautiful in themselves, their structural characteristics at their location, but because of the insistence that their immediate surroundings shall conform to the general scheme. Their roadways are laid out with relation to parkways, and surrounding buildings are designed so as to be appropriate thereto. Great attention is paid to landscape engineering, architecture and gardening, thus giving their roads a setting. But more than this, European roads are often built almost for their scenic beauty alone. Such highways abound throughout Europe, and there are several thousand miles of such roads. One cannot measure the value of such taste and beauty, not only in the roadway itself, but in what one gets from such highways. If a thing be beautiful the enjoyment and therefore the use thereof is increased by many fold. Fine roads through a fine country attract the would-be user and by just so much increase the traffic upon them. This in turn acts favorably on the economic side of good roads.

It is the economic side of our problems that gives impetus to the desire for good roads in this country. The esthetic demand may appear in winter or summer touring sections, such as the Pacific slope, Florida and New England. But the esthetic side is not the backbone of the present popular and universal demand for good roads everywhere. Every one is in favor of good roads, and every one has been for a long time, and yet in the aggregate we have but few really good roads. In the first place, it is surprising how many people do not know that it is only a hard road that can be a good road every day of the year. This is due to the fact that they have not seen or used a hard road. Until they do see one and realize what it means to them in decreased cost of living and increased value of their lands, they will oppose a plan to build aught else than the usual country road typical of their locality. A hard road at $100 to $10,000 a mile, when the so-called good road, which is the only one they know, costs a few hundred, looks large on the tax rate of the average farmer. Until he actually sees and uses a hard road, appropriations therefor are not made by his county or his town.

The result has been that really good roads have not come to local communities until the larger unit, the state, built state highways. Almost immediately on the advent of the state highway comes the desire for hard roads to connect up. Then the farmer, seeing the increased loads that can be hauled uninterrupted throughout the year, votes the necessary moneys for the hard roads he uses every day. Only two months ago, in the state of Ohio, the writer was delayed over night at a small country town by a thunder storm lasting barely a few hours. The roads became temporarily impassable, but the people took it as a matter of course! After fourteen hours' delay was started, and by steady going made five miles in the first hour. We were happy at that, for the roads were unspeakably bad, due to that rain of a few hours. Think of the conditions that must exist in the winter and spring conditions that last for days! Think of this existing, not only generally throughout Ohio, one of our wealthiest and most populous states, but substantially throughout the United States, excepting upon a mileage so small that one dares not mention the exact amount!

THE Roosevelt Commission on Country Life reported that "education and good roads are the two needs most frequently mentioned in the hearings." It was in 1909, and while there has been great advance since then it has only been beginning. But how can our rural schools get proper schooling until they get good roads to reach the schools? Good schools must have good teachers. Teachers must be paid well, or they won't be good teachers. In other words, larger schools with more scholars are the only ones to whom good teachers can be supplied. This means good roads to reach them, or the children do not go. In Germany illiteracy is about three hundredths of one per cent., while in the United States it is over 250 times greater. What a reflection upon our roads—and other things! What is true of the schools is true of the churches and their influence upon the body politic. If country people cannot get to church over good roads, many of them do not go as often as they would.

Few Communities Get Above the Level of Their Roads

Every Mile Tempts You Onward

What has been true in our smaller political units is equally true among our states. Not until the larger unit, the nation, builds the through interstate or so-called National Highways, will many of our states begin to get any substantial good-road mileage. This has been the history of Europe, and we are not likely to escape the same influences. France has 24,000 miles of National Highways, 160,000 miles of Departmental and Intercommunal Highways equivalent to our state highways although more nearly the size of our counties, and 185,000 miles of Parish or Vicinal Roads, equivalent to our townships' or towns'. This is a total of 369,000 miles of road within an area of 200,000 square miles (about), with most of these good roads serving 40,000,000 people. Our six New England states, with New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania and Ohio (the most densely populated area of the United States), have almost exactly the same square mile area, a population of 30,000,000 people and about 360,000 miles of roads, mostly bad. Of these roads a very small mileage is state and none national!

Abroad They Know How to Get the Good of Their Scenery

WHAT is true of the oldest, most populous and wealthiest part of our country is worse, infinitely worse, literally throughout our nation, with but such few bright spots as to make them shine out in contrast. This should not be and must not be allowed to exist to our shame. Were we to follow the example of our sister state, the French Republic, this country would have a system of National Highways about 150,000 miles long, 900,000 miles of State Highways, and 1,125,000 miles of county and township or town roads to make up a transcontinental system of about 2,175,000 miles. We already have nearly that mileage now in ordinary public roads as the basis.

We all approve of our ownership of the Panama Canal. We none of us begrudge the cost—or for the matter of that, feel the cost. We own it and want to own it even though it continue to slide! Our entire road mileage could be made good roads for only twenty times the cost of the canal. But this cost could extend over a period of twenty years and not be more than three-fourths of our present expenditures in so-called "preparedness" for war. And while we were paying for these roads we would get back their cost in economic savings and increased values. To mention some:

Much of the $250,000,000 estimated as going with tourists to Europe each year, would be spent at home. If only one-half, this amounts to $2,500,000,000 plus interest in the twenty-year period of building.

There are 1,700,000 motor cars in operation today. How many will there be twenty years hence? Let us figure on an average of 2,500,000 for the period. Too few, you say? Well, we should be conservative even when dealing with figures almost beyond the imagination. These 2,500,000 motor cars may make five miles per working day, or 75,000,000,000 miles in twenty years. It costs from ten to thirty cents a mile to operate a motor car. Take the lower figure. Will not good roads everywhere reduce the cost at least one cent per mile? If fair, our saving would be $750,000,000 in twenty years!

But there are somewhere between three and five million animal-drawn vehicles. There is another saving of as much or more, and we still have interest to add on both items. But how about depreciation on all this? And while we are figuring let us include thirty million horses, mules, and so forth, two million bicycles, 100,000 motorcycles we now have, plus what we shall have in twenty years. What are they worth? More, much more than $10,000,000,000! Another saving of $1,000,000,000 in twenty years.

The wealth produced by our nation per annum amounts to twenty billions in manufactured products, nine billions in farm products and two billions in mining products. say thirty billions for short measure! A very large part of this passes over our highways. As a result of good roads, a possible saving of one per cent. per annum for twenty years would amount to $6,000,000,000.

The value of our farm real estate and buildings is thirty-five billion dollars. Such lands increase enormously in value on the advent of good roads, sometimes several-fold. If such increase were only at the rate of one per cent. per annum we get a total of $7,000,000,000!

But why go on?—and we can go on—multiplying the benefits? Let us collect them! (A) $2,500,000,000 from tourists. (B) $1,500,000,000 reduced cost of operating motor-driven and animal-drawn vehicles. (C) $1,000,000,000 saved in depreciation of these. (D) $6,000,000,000 added to the nation's wealth-producing capacity. (E) $7,000,000,000 increase in the value of farms. (F) Interest on these vast sums. Money doubles itself within the period, but we do not need this, for we have $18,000,000,000 total, or more than enough saving to pay the entire cost of this great road system with many benefits unmentioned still to the good!

A Week in the World's News

NEW DEFINITION OF WAR. Speaking in the Mount Morris Baptist Church, New York, David Starr Jordan, chancellor of Leland Stanford Junior University, California, said on Sunday, October 21, that every war "is a brawl in the dark." He also fixed the causes of war as either "hot-headed aristocrats or gray old strategists." Bryan's peace treaties, which Dr. Jordan called "cooling-off treaties," offer excellent obstacles to war, in his opinion. He spoke as a representative of the League to Enforce Peace, and declared that "there is one thing that the people in this country ought to resent, and that every teacher ought to resent. That is the intrusion of militarism on the already overcrowded program of our public schools." The way to permanent peace, in the opinion of the noted advocate of international arbitration, is world federation.

ELECTION DAYS WERE INCIDENTS TO THE SUFFRAGISTS. Undeterred by their positive defeat in New Jersey, and looking past whatever might happen in New York, Massachusetts and Pennsylvania on November 2 with unmoved confidence in their ultimate triumph (this page is going to press too late for late election news), the advocates of equal suffrage are planning to make November 16 a twenty-four-hour question-mark to all Congressmen who did not vote for the suffrage amendment in the last Congress and to all new members of doubtful sentiments. In Maine, Connecticut, Rhode Island, Maryland, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, South Carolina, Florida, Alabama, Louisiana, Tennessee, Kentucky, North Dakota, Wisconsin, Michigan, Missouri, and Nebraska suffrage conventions will be held at which senators and congressmen are invited to speak, and resolutions will be adopted calling upon Congress to pass the Bristow-Mondell Federal suffrage amendment. In other words, the equal suffrage party intends to let all congressmen know that they know where each member of the National Legislature stands on this question. New York City turned out on Saturday afternoon, October 23, to watch nearly 50,000 women and several thousand men march over a long route in the interests of equal suffrage. This is said to have been twice as long as any previous parade of the kind. More than 3,000 large banners and upwards of 20,000 pennants gave the event its name, the Banner Parade. Everything was done in excellent taste, and the great column made a decidedly good impression on the vast numbers of spectators.

PREPARING TO CONQUER THE (COMMERCIAL) WORLD. If Congress heeds the recommendations of the Department of Commerce, appropriations will be granted that will enable the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce to increase the number of commercial attachés (a service of one year's existence now) assigned to the important commercial centers of foreign countries, and with these agents scattered practically over all the world to report home on the state of the world's markets, it is expected that American industries will be able to assume the supremacy in world trade upon the close of the European war.

WAR HAS MORTGAGE ON THE AIR. The experiments in wireless telephony, which were progressing so favorably between Arlington, Va., and Paris, have been ordered discontinued by France because they interfere with the transmission of important war messages. Just what important war messages are being sent between France and America is not disclosed.

JUST PLAIN, STRAIGHT-OUT, ORDINARY AMERICANS. A movement that is on foot to eradicate the hyphen from American citizenship has received the jubilant endorsement of Colonel Roosevelt, who would have every one just plain, straight-out, ordinary Americans like himself. It is difficult to see the traitorous quality in the custom of indicating one's racial origin as by saying, "I am an Irish-American." Why does the Colonel think that that means "I am part Irish and part American"? Doesn't Colonel Roosevelt belong to our oldest fatherland society, the Holland? If so, why? Can't he for the life of him break wholly away from his Holland ties? Nonsense! Drop the hyphen, of course, those who wish to do so; but also let us drop this foolish idea that a hyphen binds an American to another land. It is such wild denunciation of what does not exist as our former denunciatory President now indulges in against an imaginary division of patriotism, that breeds class hatred and real division of our population into "pro" groups.

THIRTEEN GIRLS BURNED TO DEATH BY SOLDIERS! Or, rather, by Pittsburg men who had failed to supply their factory building with adequate fire escapes, according to the inspector, and in consequence thirteen girl employees of a paper box making concern were unable to escape from the burning building on October 25. Many others were saved by heroic efforts of men employees. True, the owners of the building did not start the fire. But the girls are dead, just the same. And municipalities are still being "governed" by politicians instead of by men (and women?) who seek—for their fellow men and women—first the kingdom of God, i. e., the principle of the Golden Rule in business.

NEW MINISTER FROM CHINA APPOINTED. A graduate of Columbia University, Dr. Wellington Koo, at present minister from China to Mexico, Peru and Cuba, has been appointed by President Yuan Shi Kai minister to the United States, succeeding Kai Fu Shah. Dr. Koo was in England when his new appointment was made known to the State Department, October 25. He is under thirty, and received a Master of Arts degree and a Doctor of Philosophy from Columbia, and was elected to the Phi Beta

Copyright, International Film Service, Inc.
The Nevada, First Oil Fuel Battleship Built

The Banner Parade for Equal Suffrage

Copyright, International Film Service, Inc.
A Detail of the 50,000 Marchers

Kappa Society for scholarship. The new minister is said to favor the movement for a parliamentary monarchy for China, and to be very much in the confidence of Yuan.

OUR BIGGEST SUBMARINE TARGET. The Fore River Ship Building Company turned over to the government the new superdreadnought Nevada on October 22 for her testing, and the great vessel sailed at the Brooklyn Navy Yard October 25. The Nevada burns only oil fuel, the first in any navy to do this, carries anti-aircraft guns, and in various other respects outclasses all her sister ships. The official christening before acceptance by the government takes place at Rockland, Me.

RAILROAD ACKNOWLEDGES AUTOMOBILE COMPETITION. The annual report of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company for the year ended June 30, just published, states that of the total reduction of $8,654,583 in operating revenues, 41 per cent. was the passenger department, which had felt "the serious inroads made upon local railroad travel by automobile competition, which the improvement of highways has encouraged and rapidly developed." No fault occurred during the year among passengers in train wrecks, and only one has occurred in the last seven years, according to the report. In that time the road has carried 282,719,444 passengers, 373,233,119 locomotive miles. Six employees out of 8,664 lost their lives in train accidents during the year, as against 40 such deaths in 1912. The Mexican war and the Panama Canal have cut into the Southern Pacific's revenues.

ALL FAITHS UNITED. Five hundred young men and women students at Teachers' College, Columbia University, have united in a Students' Religious Organization which includes the Y. M. C. A., the W. C. A., the Catholic Club, and the Jewish Forum. The societies composing the new organization have entered into an agreement that they will not interfere with the religious leanings of any student, but each will look after its own. The secretary of the new organization is arranging dates for various religious services so that there will be no conflict. It is the plan that Catholic, Jew and Protestant shall labor in common in doing means for making religious instruction more efficient, and each is pledged against proselyting.

JAPAN CONTROLS COMMERCE. The withdrawal of the Pacific Mail Company from the carrying trade of the Pacific Ocean has placed a great commercial advantage in the hands of the Japanese. United States Consul General Anderson at Hongkong advises that the Japanese companies, with official sanction, are planning to increase their rates from American ports to Oriental ports, while eastward rates remain as they are. The advantage to Japanese manufacturers is obvious. The Japanese now control 43,000 tons of a total of 490,000 tons in the trans-Pacific service.

CHURCH COUNCIL URGES PEACE. At the international council of Congregational churches in session at New Haven, Conn., October 26, resolutions were passed urging international peace and calling on the President to use his influence for the protection of non-Mohammans, especially Armenians, in Turkey. The resolution sets forth that "the present war has laid bare the fallacies of a false peace and has proved the futility of armaments as a guarantee of international security and justice, and that God is revealing through this conflict the essential need of world-wide brotherhood." The resolutions further appeal to the President and Congress "to take no steps toward increased armaments or to bend their energies toward working out, with other governments, a plan of international organization which will render impossible a recurrence of the present world tragedy."

REFORMING OUR SPELLING. The Illinois Daily Newspaper Association, in session in Chicago, October 19 and 20, expressed approval of the list of twelve words proposed in 1898 and in use since that time by the National Education Association as follows: tho, altho, thru, thro, thoro, thoroly, thorofare, program, prolog, catalog, decd and pedagog. The Association adopted the simplified spelling of these words for printed matter and for the correspondence of the Association, and urged their adoption by the individual members of the Association for use in their respective publications. At the present time the total number of newspapers and periodicals using simplified spelling is 156; their combined circulation is more than 4,000,000. The total number in July, 1914, was 38.

RUSTED RIVETS BLAMED. In the final report of the Board of Inquiry into the loss of the United States submarine F-4, it is found that certain rivets in one of the battery compartments had rusted and had become loose sufficiently to admit water at ordinary pressure. Under the pressure sustained by a submerged submarine a considerable amount of water could be so admitted. This water leaking into the batteries is held to have caused an explosion which crippled the vessel. Mechanical deficiencies showed that the crew had made every effort to overcome their difficulties, the majority having been found in the engine room with the ruptured bulkhead closed. The finding of the Board as regards the crew is as follows: "From the facts established, we find that the accident resulting in disaster to the U. S. S. submarine F-4 on March 25, 1915, was not due to carelessness, negligence or inefficiency on the part of the officers or men of the vessel and that, furthermore, the personnel remained at their respective stations until all effective means employed to avert the disaster impending had failed, and thereafter sought refuge."

MORGAN OPERATED ON. On October 29, Mr. Morgan, chief financial representative in America of British and French allies, was taken suddenly ill with appendicitis and his physicians operated at once. The patient remained in the hospital for several days, but this was denied and Mr. Morgan was reported to have come through the operation successfully.

SEVERING HOW DENOMINATIONAL WALLS MAY BE BROKEN. Rev. Reginald J. Campbell, who began his ministerial career in the Congregational Church in England, and who afterwards drifted into the Free Church, has now transferred his activities to the Established Church. He has had considerable theological experience and at one time swung to the limit of the pendulum, renouncing not a few of the tenets that are held in common by the great body of Christians throughout the world. In recent years, however, he has returned to the orthodox faith and has been preaching with great acceptance in the City Temple, the scene of the late Rev. Joseph Parker's famous London pastorate. The cause of his conversion to Anglicanism is not stated, but it is recalled that his early purpose as a student was to enter the ministry of the Established Church, a desire that is now fulfilled.

ANOTHER NAVAL VETERAN RETIRED. To every man who loves his country's history, the traditions of the navy are a treasure. One more of these veterans, a man who served in the old frigates, has retired. One more of these veterans, a man who served in the old frigates, has retired. One more of these veterans, a man who served in the old frigates, has retired.

DO THE DOORS OF PEACE OPEN? St. John's parochial school at Peabody, Mass., a brick and frame building, was destroyed by fire on October 28. Of the 600 children who had just entered the building for their morning session at least 100 were burned to death or died under the feet of their comrades. The doors, which are reported to have opened inward, but the Mother Superior and the other nuns, who were in charge of the children, saved their own lives and gave proof of the inherent heroism of woman. The loss of the school would have been greater had the Mother Superior been seriously injured. The building laws now in force in nearly all states would make such accidents impossible. It seems incredible that in the Collingwood horror no responsible officials anywhere could permit an inward-opening door ever again to menace human life behind it. No building more than two stories high in which people gather for any purpose should be unprotected by fire-escapes and outward-opening doors. Who is to blame if they are not equipped? Most of us would say, "the officers charged with the enforcing of the law." We, who make use of these buildings without protest, are tacitly consenting to the condition, which we are the first to condemn after the accident. We believe Massachusetts has a law against inward-opening doors.

WAR REACHES A KING. While inspecting British troops in France on October 28, the horse that King George of England was riding became frightened, at the enthusiastic cheers of the troops for their king, and slipped and fell. The king was considerably bruised but his physicians have announced that his injuries are not serious.

JAPAN ADVISES CHINA TO REMAIN A REPUBLIC. The announcement made some weeks ago that President Yuan Shih-kai contemplated changing the republican government of China into the form of a limited monarchy has awakened considerable opposition in China, especially in the southern provinces which are almost certain to revolt if any change is made in the form of government. This opposition has not, however, been apparent in the voting that is now going on upon the question of the change. Official reports show an apparent unanimity for the monarchy. In the present disturbed condition of the world a revolution in China, serious in any event, would assume grave proportions. On October 29 the Japanese Chargé and the British and Russian Ministers at Peking made a formal visit to the Chinese foreign office and presented a "note verbale" advising the Chinese government to suspend temporarily the contemplated change. The American minister took no part in the conference, although it is the hope of the American government that China will remain a republic.

Aristide Briand, New French Minister

A BUILDING FOR SERVICE. The finest Y. M. C. A. building in the world was formally opened in Brooklyn October 29-November 7. It is the new home of the Central branch of the Brooklyn association and is a memorial to the memory of Clarence E. Smith, his mother having contributed a half million dollars to its construction in memory of her son.

MAIL-BAGS MAROONED AT PANAMA. When the Panama Canal demonstrated its self-closing feature, a shipment of 168,000 mail-bags, being returned from the western to the eastern coast of the United States, was held up at the Pacific end of the Canal. Instead of transferring these bags to the Panama Railway and reshipping them on the other side of the Isthmus, the vessels were re-routed around the Horn and these mail-bags, which should have been ready in October to carry Christian Heralds and other magazines to waiting readers, were delayed until some time in November. The Post Office Department has been seriously handicapped and has even gone to the extreme of using burlap bags which, while strong, are by no means dirt-proof. If any of the readers of the Christian Herald receive the paper in a somewhat soiled condition or receive it late, these missing bags will be the explanation.

STAMPS AT HALF PRICE. Many stamps of large denominations are abroad in the world, absolutely useless to the owners. How could you use a dollar postage stamp? Possibly by sending it to the Christian Herald as part payment for a subscription. BUT PLEASE DON'T! We cannot use them, the United States government will not buy them, and we have over a hundred dollars' worth on hand. Who wants some of them at half price?

Where American School Children Were Crushed and Burned to Death

Where a Shell Dropped Into a Quiet Village Street

Copyright, International Film Service Inc.

TERRORS OF PEACE AND WAR

The War in Europe

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

European journalist of many years' standing; military critic; staff writer of the Paris Daily Mail and Le Temps; contributor to L'Indépendance Belge

URING the week ended October 29, the attention of the world has been concentrated on the situation in southeastern Europe, which the invasion of Serbia by the Teutons is but one phase. They to this whole situation will probably be found in the ultimate action of Greece and Rumania, as whatever these two countries finally decide to do either one of two things; either the military effect of the Teutonic drive towards Constantinople, in so far as they conclude to cast the lot with the Central Empires; or the negatory effect of this drive, the event that they enlist under the standard of the Allies. Greece has about 100,000 men and Rumania, approximately, 350,000 men, and both are well equipped and composed of well-armed soldiers to a very large degree in the case of Greece, and to a lesser degree in the case of Rumania. If Rumania joins the Allies, such action will permit Russia to send that army high Russia states she now has concentrated near Odessa, through the efforts of Rumania to the relief of Serbia the transportation of which to the scene of action otherwise seems, for geographical reasons, impossible in time. The use of use in averting from Serbia the doom which appears impending over her. Then, too, Rumania could throw part of her army into Serbia. It is, of course, true that by conquering a Bulgarian port and fighting a way through the whole length of Bulgaria on the Black Sea to the Serbian border Russia could get an army into Serbia; but such operations would take so long that Serbia most probably would be crushed long before.

If, however, Rumania should throw her lot with the Central Empires, her army would probably immediately attack the Russians in Bessarabia, the Russian province abutting on her northeastern frontiers.

At the present time the Allies are landing troops on Grecian territory at the city of Salonica on the Aegean Sea, from which point these troops are being sent northward into southern Serbia. If Greece should join the Allies her army could aid in the advance into Serbia from the south, and the full assistance of the Greek government could also be afforded to the Allies by placing other ports at their service for landing troops, as well as giving them full use of the Greek railroads, etc., etc. Should Greece, however, turn to the other side, it is difficult to see how in view of their announced policy of respecting the rights and territories of small nations, the Allies could continue to land troops at the Greek port of Salonica, to say nothing of the possibility of Greece using force to expel such invasion.

As to which way their decisions will go, there are at the present writing no sure indications. Both are fully mobilized and both could, in a military sense, enter the war tomorrow. Participation on the unsuccessful side, whichever that may finally be, would seriously imperil their existence as independent nations.

In France, during the week, the Balkan situation had an echo in the resignation of the Viviani ministry, which had been in power for nearly the whole period of the war. Aristide Briand, a prominent French statesman, has been charged by President Poincaré with the formation of a new cabinet. The downfall of the Viviani ministry was brought about, the cables tell us, by popular and parliamentary discontent with the manner in which this ministry had handled the French end of the Balkan situation.

In Great Britain, the political situation still continues obscure and Mr. Asquith has continued all the week too ill to appear in Parliament.

According to Mr. Asquith, Great

Britain's total casualties up to the 9th of October in all fields on land are officially announced as 493,294, of which number 365,046 took place on the western battle line in Belgium and France. Of this aggregate, 6,660 officers, 99,992 rank and file were killed, 12,633 officers and 304,832 rank and file were wounded, and 2,000 officers and 72,177 men are missing.

The last Prussian list brings the German casualties up to 2,166,985, but to this list must be added the lists of Bavaria, Wurtemberg and Saxony, which will add several hundred thousand more. In addition, we do not know, as we do in the British, to what date the German casualties are brought down.

My readers will, perhaps, remember that last winter and spring there were very many deaths reported in nearly all the contending armies from tetanus or lockjaw, and that the mortality among those attacked by this disease was extremely high. A serum was discovered early last spring for this malady which has in the six months or so which it has been in general use, proved capable of mastering this trouble, both as a preventative and as a cure, and has reduced the mortality to under seven per cent. of those attacked; thus another valuable medical discovery for the good of humanity, in peace as well as in war, has been made.

The campaign in Serbia has been important, not only from a military standpoint actually, but potentially. Serbia is now being invaded from six directions, and by three forces, the Bulgars, the Austro-Germans and the Albanians, though the invasion of the last probably never will amount to

Continued on page 1142

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is published weekly by The Christian Herald, at the Bible House, Fourth Avenue, 4th and 9th Sts., New York City. The Officers are: Otto Koehn, President and Treasurer, Bible House, N. Y. City; Geo. H. Sandison, Vice President, Bible House, N. Y. City; Theodore Waters, Secretary, Bible House, N. Y. City.

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE $1.50 a year in advance. Remittances should be made in the best manner available. Make checks and money orders payable to the Christian Herald.

FOREIGN POSTAGE.—For copies mailed outside

Entered at Post Office, New York, as Second-class Matter

Entered as Second-class Matter at the Post Office Department, Ottawa

the United States, Canada and Mexico, add one dollar a year to subscription price.

CHANGE OF DATE.—It takes at least two weeks to change the date, after your subscription is renewed.

EXPIRATION OF SUBSCRIPTION.—The date on the wrapper indicates when your subscription ends.

CHANGE OF ADDRESS.—It requires three weeks time to make the change. Give both old and new address.

LETTERS should be addressed, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

Dying Daily

A SERMON BY REV. RUSSELL H. CONWELL, D.D.*

TEXT: I Cor. 15:31: "I protest by your rejoicing which I have in Christ Jesus our Lord, I die daily."

IF I could have had any choice, I would have selected a subject more fitting for the briefness of the services. But I have had no choice but to grapple with one of the greatest and deepest subjects in Christian thought. I turn your attention in this discussion and meditation to the 15th chapter and the 31st verse of First Corinthians, in which the apostle Paul wrote that wonderful protest, in which he said, "I die daily."

Paul gave a definition when he referred to the fact that "If Christ be not raised your faith is vain; ye are yet in your sins," and "If in this life only we have hope in Christ, we are of all men most miserable. But now is Christ risen from the dead and become the first fruits of them that slept. For since by man came death, by man came also the resurrection of the dead," and then, as if in explanation, he wrote: "That which thou sowest, thou sowest not that body that shall be, but bare grain, it may chance of wheat, or of some other grain. But God giveth it a body as it hath pleased him, and to every seed his own body."

Paul said: "I die daily." It could not have meant that the spirit left the body every day, yet he said, "I die every day." The importance of this question to you and to me is to get some idea, if we can, as to what death is. It is not a gloomy thought; it is not a sad one; it is a great philosophical question that becomes exceedingly interesting to any one who gets into the inner part of its consideration. He meant that we all die daily; not that it was peculiar to him, but that it was a general, universal truth.

WHAT is death? It is a change. The Bible defines it very frequently as a change. "We shall all be changed. In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump, for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised." We shall all be changed, so that the word "death," whether in the original language or the English, means a change. You do not lose anything unless you become dead to it. Every little loss is a little death. The Bible, then, presents death as being a present loss; something gone today which we value and desire to retain.

It is also defined as a transition. If we go from one room to the other, we die to the first room, and it is a resurrection and a new life in the other room. It is a transition, and when the apostle Paul uses the word "death" he means all these things.

Death also means change of form, but never change of essence. The Bible never teaches that death is annihilation. That is an impossible thought. No person can comprehend how God created this world out of nothing. It is an impossible mental condition; neither can you argue the other way and think that which is now in the material world can become nothing. You cannot think it. The human brain is not so constructed that it can take a thought like that. At all events, man's common sense teaches him that death is not annihilation; it teaches that death is simply the letting go of one thing that we may fill our hands with another; transition from one state to another state, and that is all it is. That covers the whole ground.

Death, then, in a scriptural sense is a very philosophical question. For instance, if you had a large amount of gold hidden in your cellar, and bonds and stocks in your safe, and you live with them in miserly joy and satisfaction, you count your gold over every night, and you bury it again beneath the soil, and the next night you live with it again, or you go to the safe and open it and take out the stocks and bonds and count them over, and you live with them. Then the time comes when you conclude you will die to those things, that you will give them up, that you will take your gold from the cellar, that you will invest it in a hospital or some school or church, or some institution for the good of humanity, then you die to the gold in your cellar, and you live to the new form in which that gold appears. You take those stocks and bonds and you invest them in a home, and you furnish it with the luxuries of life, you live in it with your family, and you surround it with all the joys of domestic comfort, and you die to the bonds; let them all go; you have lost them, you are dead to them, but you are alive to the new home and all the blessings that come with it. You simply die to one form and rise again in another. That is the Bible teaching as to what death means.

* Pastor, Baptist Temple, Philadelphia.

EVERY man's labor is a continual dying. The apostle says: "I die daily," when he meets the beasts in Ephesus. Labor is a continual death because every single stroke of a man's arm takes from his body and from his brain and muscle something of that which composed that body. He lives with those forces, but with every move comes the elimination of a certain part of his body. Something dies within him, particles are drawn off in the various processes of nature because he is active, and every action requires the sacrifice of some part of his body, and that is death, continual death. The death of the workman reappears in all products of labor.

When a seed is planted in the ground, as the apostle so familiarly mentions, it begins to die, it decays and is dead. That produces a change that it may bring more fruit. It has gone through death unto a new life, and we are doing that all the time, continually, in one state or another, and death is as ever present as life.

In Pittsburg I saw a piece of pig iron—a great piece of cold iron—thrust into the fire, they told me, to go around to the other side of that factory. I followed the man down a long avenue, to see where that piece of iron would come out. There the wheels were turning, and the men were very busy winding on, by another machine, very fine wire, so fine that I had to use my glasses. They told me that the wire that came out of that machine was the iron I had seen going in at the other end of the furnace, and in the meantime it had gone through a transition. The iron had died to its former shape. It was dead, destroyed, so far as that was concerned, but it came out as wire at the other end of the machine. All things are going through such a transition.

The death that the apostle speaks of is a transition—going from one form to another. Did it ever occur to you that Christ died twice? Not only once did he die for us, in the form that we read about, when he died and went home to heaven. But he left those fields of glory, left his association with the angels and gave up his home in heaven, he died to heaven when he came down to live as a man upon this earth. The greatest trial of his existence must have been there. Christ died twice. Not only twice did he die, but he is dying all the time, ever since the world began, and he is dying now and will continue to die, and we cannot understand that deep philosophy without studying this thought, as in all nature around us the same principle applies. There is no life without death, no death without life, and the only moral question that seems to present itself is whether our present death produces greater life, or whether our present death produces less life. If a person having an abundance of life shall die to it all and in the transition have that amount of life decreased, it is a very bad bargain. We find that in nature, God is working toward improvement to produce a larger amount a little further on. If we invest $5 and secure $10, then we have died to the $5, but we are alive to $10. If we have died to $10 and secured but $5, then we are alive to only $5. The philosophy is very clear, it seems to me, if a person thinks very fully upon it.

All sacrifice is death, and what is going on every day in the natural world, as we meet it everywhere, is but analogous to what takes place in the spiritual world, all dying, and any person who makes a sacrifice today for the betterment of the future is dying today that he may live doubly tomorrow. It seems a part of wisdom that a man should sacrifice today in order that he might have more tomorrow.

SACRIFICE brings something else. Lately there stood at this altar those who entered their married life, and began to set up a home, and I could not but be impressed. I always am impressed more and more deeply with the sacrifice that a woman makes when she gets married. There is a sacrifice on the part of the husband—before he marries he could go wherever he would, he could spend all his money upon himself, he was free to follow his personal ambitions without hindrance—he sacrifices much, and he is dead to many things that he enjoyed before the marriage. But a woman, it seems to me, goes further, because while she has lived a life of social activity, is more sensitive to them than man is, she goes into the quiet of that new home, disappears from the public and from her old friends and associates, she dies to the world, and as a result of that death she becomes the mother of a family or the keeper of a home, and around her is all that domestic felicity which is supposed to satisfy her more fully than did all she left. Every gift we make, every sacrifice we make, is dying to something, so that in that death we may secure ultimate gain.

It is a very broad and plain presentation of the Gospel on the part of the apostle. I must put the gospel moral which it teaches us, and that is that we need never dread death. There is nothing to read unless your sins are heavy on your heart, or unless you have failed to do what you could do, and that is put your trust in Christ. If you have faith in Christ—nearly every one here has—you should have come by now not to have any fear of death, and if you have resolve now that you will not have any fear of death that it is but the natural thing anyhow. You are dying all the time. Your body has died many times. This entire body goes through a change in less than eight years, so that there is not one particle of the body left that was there eight years before. All is dead, gone! It has disappeared, as the whole body ultimately will; and when death comes to you remember that nature, instinct, and everything that death is but transition; that it is not a transition, but the natural going from one natural state to another natural state; that you live in this body while in this world, and it is your natural condition to maintain in this body so long as it is of any use to you, but when you go out of this body, you do not die—you are the same person living with identically the same character, the same thoughts, and wishes, and desires in the country of changed conditions, so I say do not fear the moment of death! Don't fear that transition.

When day before yesterday at noon I saw a sweet and beautiful young woman die, there was nothing about her to indicate that it was her last earthly life. When she went out of that body, and entered into that other existence, she lay there upon her pillow. Only a few minutes before she had spoken to her brother and introduced him to friends, and yet while I was there and looked into her face, she closed her eyes and "went to sleep" in the body, but awoke to live in the soul. This is something we should dread because we do not think, or because we do not study deep enough. There is no pain, no suggestion of horror in going from one state to another, for as there is no change in the real personality, no change except a change to wider vision.

BUT what I want to urge upon you Christian people is that you look the world in the face and tell the people that you are not afraid to die. Say so, not only because the Bible tells you that you should not be afraid, but because you have thought deeply enough to see that what we call death is something going on daily all around us, and that when we leave this body finally, it is only a continuation and a fulfillment of God's promise that we shall not be annihilated. I shall not feel the pangs of pain that many people feel.

Death itself is the easiest thing that remains to man, and you need not fear it. God was kind to that child who is put to bed in the evening, and wakes up in the morning, and the night and the darkness are over. All death is past and the life and glory of a new day is springing up in the east. The sun is coming and believe that when a person leaves this body is but gets the last glimpse of the darkness of this world. He gets more and more of the light of the morning. It may be night here, but it is morning there, and dying is not a thing to dread, but a thing to anticipate with great joy—going from pain, and sorrow, and disappointment here, going from gloom, and darkness, and midnight, into the dawn of everlasting morning. That is what the apostle Paul means when he says: "There is one glory of the sun, and another glory of the moon, and another glory of the stars; for one differeth from another star in glory."

"So is the resurrection of the dead." All is joy. Let us count it all joy when the time comes for us to leave this world, for it will not be sad or sorrowful, but it will be triumphant and filled with joy and glory.

O Lord, we thank thee that thy Gospel doth remove from those who are in Christ Jesus the fear of death, and consequently they leave this life in the brighter, filled with higher and wider hopes. Give us the assurance of thy Almighty love. Grant us thy benediction, for Jesus' sake. Amen.

Comment by the Way

A CORRESPONDENT of the London Times, writing from Mesopotamia, has this interesting passage: "Students of divinity may be interested to hear that in this year two important actions have been fought on the supposed site of the Garden of Eden. Nothing will shake the local conviction that in Kurna, at the junction of the Tigris and Euphrates, Mesopotamia possesses the original Garden of Eden, though units of the garrison who occupied its defenses during the torrid months of May and June express doubts as to its authenticity."

Daily Meditation

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR, LED BY

J. H. JOWETT, D.D., F. B. MEYER, D.D., REV. E. WHITTIER CASWELL AND CLAYTON SEDGWICK COOPER

Sacrificial Remembrance

SUNDAY, November 14. Heb. 13:3. "Remember them that are in bonds, as bound with them." There is a cheap kind of remembrance: it is an affair of the memory. There is an expensive kind of remembrance: it drains the energies of the heart. I can remember them that are in bonds, I can give them a passing thought, and it no more affects me than the wings of a fly, playing over the surface of a lake, affects its profoundest depths. And I can remember them that are in bonds that my heart aches, and I yearn to be busy in ministries of succor and relief. In the one form, I call the bondsmen to mind; in the other, I identify myself with them. One is collection, the other is sacrifice.

If I am to feel bound with them that are bound, how keenly vivid and sensitive my sympathies must be! To feel the smart of another's wound demands an opposite fellowship. All that we may call the mutual powers of the soul, the powers which are purposed for human communion, must be very quick and vivid. They must be like the strains of the most delicate Eolian harp, responding to the movement of the slightest breeze.

The apostle Paul remembered the bondsmen. "We is made to stumble and I burn not?" He gives his own counsel—"Weep with them that weep." The sighing of his brethren made his own heart moan. And all this because he was able to say, "I have your heart." When we carry our brother's burdens in intercession, we shall most surely be fervent crusaders in their relief. We shall be swift in service when our prayers are sacrificial.

Six months before the war broke out, President Wilson used these words: "To die in a war of aggression not a thing to be proud of, but to die in a war of service is." A war of service for the emancipation of the that are in bonds! That is part of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus. That war is fought in the life of life. The strength of such warriors is found in the joy of the Lord. They are fed on hidden manna, and their companionship is divine. J. H. J.

Our Ideal Selves, as God Sees Us

MONDAY, November 15. Isa. 49:13-23. "I have given thee upon the palms of my hands." It is said that it was an ancient Oriental custom to tattoo the name of a beloved friend on the flesh. But notice that the name of Zion is not graven on a part of the body covered by the dress, but on the palms of the hands, and therefore constantly in evidence. Not the name of Zion merely, but Zion herself. Not on one hand only, but on both. Not Zion's ruins, but her walls, as they were before Nebuchadnezzar broke them down. For fifty or sixty years they had been in ruin. Nehemiah tells us that the rubbish forbade the way on which he rode to pass, when by moonlight he made his first tour of inspection. Sanballat mocked about those heaps of rubbish; but God kept those walls before him, not only as they used to be, but as they could be. Amid all the hopeless desolation of the city God beheld those walls, standing in their strength and completeness. Zion's walls were ever before him. This is also with ourselves. God keeps before us not the poor sorry self that we are, that we know over, and that our friends see, but our ideal self, that self which will one day emerge in perfect beauty, in heaven's unchanging climate. What we are is useless; what we long to be in our best moments; what we will be when grace has perfected its work and we have become comely in the comeliness that he has put upon us—this is the ineffaceable conception of us that is ever before God. The believer, considering his condition, is apt to deem himself a castaway; but in the time of deepest despair God thinks of him as a mother thinks of her first-born babe. F. B. M.

The Idol in the Heart

TUESDAY, November 16. Joshua 24:15. "Choose ye this day whom ye will serve." As in the days of Joshua, we live in a time of polytheism. It is an age of many gods. It is a period when each person chooses the god whom he will serve. That choice defines his religion and gives color to all his life and work. In studying conditions in foreign lands, I have become accustomed to find out as soon as possible the character of the god whom the people worship, as the quickest way to discover the characteristics of the nation.

Esau's god was his senses; Napoleon's god was power; Francis of Assisi's god was poverty; John the apostle's God was Love. It is often said that the American's god is money, or, at times, success. The quality of our ideal shines out in all we do. We strive in vain to cover our true idol by profession or by fine words; the truth will out. We deceive no one but ourselves. Our choice is manifest in the smallest detail of our daily living. The character of our god is written in our very faces. We unconsciously reflect that which we serve.

A noted prisoner cried, in his despair: "I allowed pleasure to dominate me. I ended in horrible disgrace. . . . I ceased to be lord over myself. I was no longer the captain of my soul, and did not know it."

To stop to realize before it is too late the gods we are serving is one of the messages of these Meditations. No one intentionally, or at least very few premeditatedly, take to themselves false gods. We more often go with the crowd. We fail to take time to ponder the results of our course of life. We plunge into life and an endless round of activities, and often only a great disaster or a heavy illness brings us to consider whither we have been tending.

Today let me go apart and truly, honestly, find out the nature of the god I am serving. If I am wrong, it is not too late to change. "Choose ye this day."

C. S. C.

The Friendship of Jesus

WEDNESDAY, November 17. John 15:9-17. "I have called you friends." "What is the secret of your life?" asked Mrs. Browning of Charles Kingsley; "tell me, that I may make mine beautiful too." He replied, "I had a friend."

It is this power of idealizing that gives to love its beauty, its patience, its tenacity, its mighty leverage on character. We love, and we cannot always tell why; and loving we see only what we want to see, and interpret the least in terms of the greatest, the poorest as though it were richest. When Bunsen was dying, he looked up in the eyes of his wife, as she bent over him, and he said, "In thy face have I seen the Eternal." The same thought is present in this characterization of a noble Christian woman: "I have no doubt that she saw expressions, heard tones, and received thoughts from her friends, which no one else saw or heard from the same persons."

When our Lord says that he loves us as the Father hath loved him, surely something of this kind must be in his thought. It is absolutely impossible to suppose that—taking ourselves as we know ourselves to be—we can bring to him anything worthy of his love. "Poor and miserable, and blind, and naked"—this description of the church in Laodicea is true of us. Our Lord loves his ideal—what we are capable of becoming. But before he calls us friends, we have to show ourselves his faithful servants. We first obey, and are next invited to sit at his table, while he serves us. At first we obey blindly, doing what we are told; but afterward the Master takes us into his secret counsels and explains his reasons and program. We know what our Lord is doing! F. B. M.

Sympathy with Success

THURSDAY, November 18. Matt. 25:21. "Well done, good and faithful servant; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord." It is usual to think of sympathy in connection with those in sorrow or suffering of some kind. The verse quoted exemplifies sympathy and generous praise for those who succeed.

To sympathize with afflicted humanity is comparatively easy and natural. Our pity goes out without effort to people in trouble. To rejoice with those who rejoice is not always so easy. It is taught by our Master as a privilege and a duty. The most dejected figure in the New Testament is the elder brother in the parable, whose jealousy shut him out from sympathy with the merry-makers at the triumphant recovery of the lost son.

I recall a memorable visit to the home of the late Sir George Williams in London. The founder of the Young Men's Christian Association led me through room after room in his house, showing the generous signs of appreciation of those whom his great and far-reaching lifework had helped. There were loving-cups, tablets and memorials from all over the world; and, with hands that trembled with gratitude, the old man showed me an expression of high praise from his sovereign. These made the work and the success doubly valuable.

There are few traits lifting the memories of men into such splendid light as unselfish, ungrudging admiration and glad sympathy with another's success. Happy is the person who learns early that to partake heartily and sincerely with a friend in his joy is one of the surest ways to become useful and beloved.

Jesus was notable for his generous distribution of praise for good work and good motive. He had sympathy for goodness and efficiency, as well as for grief. He made the faithful workman thrice blessed by his unstinted and unmeasured "Well done!" He gave sympathy to success. C. S. C.

The Barrenness of a Life of Pleasure

FRIDAY, November 19. 1 Tim. 5:1-13. "She that giveth herself to pleasure is dead while she liveth." These are very solemn words. Satan, that great enemy of the soul, whispers to young men and women that he will give them a full and happy life if only they will obey the desires of the flesh and of the mind. "We want to see life," is the cry of each generation as it pours forth on the greensward of Mother Earth. "Granted," says the prince of this world; "walk according to the spirit and course of the age; sip every cup of pleasure; be carried by every passing breeze; eat and drink, laugh and frivel; throw the reins on the horses' necks, and let them bear you whither they will." They do as they are bidden, but like Lord Chesterfield, at the end of life they confess that they have only been behind the scenes, helping to shift the scenery and seeing only the machinery and nakedness of life. God's verdict in the meanwhile is, Dead! They who live solely for pleasure are dead while they live.

The prodigal thought himself very much alive when, in the far country, he squandered his substance with the fallen and degraded. But the father in the old home said of him, "This my son is lost and dead." The apostle reckoned that his was dead to the appeals of the world, the flesh and the devil. They excited no response in him. It was like the appeal for action from a paralyzed limb. But he was alive to every motion of God's Spirit. The quick susceptibility of his nature to every force of the eternal world was phenomenal. The children of this world are exactly the reverse. They are dead to the eternal, and alive to the transient—dead to holiness, but alive to sin. May those in their graves hear the voice of the Son of God! F. B. M.

Praise for Blessings and Mercies

SATURDAY, November 20. Luke 10:21. "I thank Thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth." Thanksgiving and praise to our heavenly Father should be a perpetual incense from the soul's gratitude. We should thank him for life, health, happiness, for hope, peace and prosperity, for body, soul and spirit; for the beauty of earth and the glory of heaven, for Christ, our Saviour, and the Holy Spirit, the Sanctifier.

Gratitude is the memory of the heart; thanksgiving unexpressed is like a grate filled with fuel, but unlighted. Many have shackled tongues when praise is in order. The tongues of the dumb could sing if they would think what the Giver of every perfect gift has done for them. The wealthiest and happiest are those who see the most blessing in blessings, mercy in mercies, joys in sorrows, riches in God's munificence.

When we count our mercies, we have a thousand-fold more blessings than calamities, and every loss is tinged with the rainbow of hope. The thankful heart extracts sweetness from every flower, drinks gladness from every cup, treads on gems at every step, while the golden goal of the Father's home and heart beckons onward. It is said that in prayer we yield to the pressure of our wants, while in praise we respond to the pressure of our love. E. W. C.

THE London Times recently published the following: "The Bible! What is it? To this stupendous question there is but one equally stupendous answer. It is the written Word of God. It is God speaking to men individually and collectively, through the instrumentality of other men, specially inspired for the purpose. It is the authoritative Revelation from God of supernatural things and things of God and of eternity. It is the one fountain of truth."

Our Editorial Forum

PRESIDENT
OTTO KOENIG

MANAGING EDITOR
GEO. H. SANDISON

SECRETARY
THEODORE WATERS

In God's Keeping

HE CARETH for you" is one of those blessed passages of Scripture that has brought the cheer and comfort of heaven's peace to many a troubled soul. In these strenuous days, when business affairs vex us, and when the ordeal of fire and blood through which the whole world is passing weighs heavily upon all of us, like a great overshadowing storm-cloud, we can find rest and reassurance if we take our Father at his word and let him care for us, as he alone can. The whole of Christianity is love and helpfulness—love to give us strength and courage, and helpfulness to lighten our burdens and to take away not merely a part but all of our cares, if we will only trust him.

There is no other cure for the burden of worldly affairs which, if unrelieved, bears down with its weight the strongest and the bravest. Take all your cares to the Cross and there lay them down and learn the lesson of gladness and the preciousness of divine help. A little season of daily communion with God, of contact with his Holy Spirit, of new consecration to his service, of refreshment at the fountain of his promises; a renewed expression of our faith in the finished work of the living Saviour, who came to reveal the Father as a God of abounding pity and compassion for all who struggle with human weakness—that is the source from which we may drink in new life and strength for each day. Thus fortified, we can go forth to our tasks with a heart full of the consciousness of divine power to overcome all troubles that may arise, with a mind unvexed by fear of whatever may come, and with a new gift of power to help others.

All Help Armenia Now

WHEN the news was received here of the frightful suffering among the Armenian population of European Turkey and Asia Minor, following the recent massacres, an appeal was made to the Christian Herald for aid. Willing as we were to answer the call, it was essential that the relief should be distributed through some trustworthy organization. Several weeks ago we communicated with Constantinople, but war conditions throughout Turkey are such that cable service is still greatly interrupted. In the letter below, just received from the State Department in Washington, we have at last the welcome news that a Christian Herald Relief Committee has been formed in Constantinople, with United States Ambassador Morgenthau at its head and Mr. W. W. Peet of the Bible House, Constantinople, as treasurer.

"Department of State,

"Washington, October 23, 1915.

"The Christian Herald, New York City.

"GENTLEMEN: The Department is in receipt of a telegram from the American Ambassador at Constantinople, stating that the Committee is completed, with Morgenthau as Chairman and Peet as Treasurer; that there is great distress, and that prompt, substantial relief is urgently needed.

"For the Secretary of State:

"(Signed) ALNEY A. ADEE,

"Second Assistant Secretary."

Since the war began the bounty of Christian Herald readers has reached out to all the great centers of suffering in the countries engaged, Turkey alone excepted. Through our relief committees countless multitudes have been cheered and materially assisted. Now we have the opportunity to do a similar good Samaritan work in a land where it is sorely needed, and where the sufferings and privations of the non-combatants are almost unbelievable. The treatment of Armenians, Greeks and Persians (all our brothers and sisters of the Christian faith), and also of the Jews, is without a parallel in history.

As the Red Cross does not operate in Turkey, the Christian Herald Relief Committee organized by Ambassador Morgenthau is the sole medium in a very extensive territory through which American aid can reach the sufferers. The Ambassador's influence has secured this great privilege and Christian America should take the fullest advantage of it at once, to save the remnant of the Armenians who are doomed to extermination by starvation unless a strong and earnest effort is made for their rescue.

Let us make a combined effort to render quick aid now that the way is open. Send in your contributions and let us pour out before the Lord such a Thanksgiving offering in aid of those persecuted multitudes as will bring cheer and hope to hearts that have for months past been filled with despair. In anticipation of contributions not yet received, the Christian Herald is cabling $5,000 to Ambassador Morgenthau for immediate use in relieving the most urgent cases.

This is merely the beginning. With your generous aid we should be able to treble this sum, so that the greatest good may be done in the next few weeks. Send your contribution today to the War Relief Fund, care of the Christian Herald, Bible House, New York. Let it be as liberal as your heart suggests. And may it be a means of blessing both to the givers and those you are helping in their time of greatest need.

Bigotry vs. Religious Freedom

IT DOES not need a prophet to foretell that the time is drawing near when every denomination of the Christian Church in America will have to proclaim its attitude on the Roman Catholic question. Some have already done so; indeed, a majority of the denominations have taken the ground that Rome's encroachments, political and otherwise, must be firmly met, if we are to continue to preserve a separate church and state, and to force back the tide of Romish conquest which aims to "make America Catholic."

Sooner than was expected, although foreseen for some time past, the inevitable split has come in the Protestant Episcopal Church on the question of its attitude toward Rome. At a meeting of the Protestant Episcopal Board of Missions in New York on November 26, five High Church dignitaries resigned from the Board after a hot debate, in which they fought strenuously to prevent that body from sending delegates to the Pan-Protestant Congress at Panama, on the ground that such action "would be an affront to the Roman Catholics." The dissentients who took up the cudgels for Rome were the Right Rev. Reginald H. Weller, Bishop of Fond du Lac, Wis.; Right Rev. Alfred Harding, Bishop of Washington, D. C.; Right Rev. G. Mott Williams, Bishop of Marquette, Mich.; Rev. William T. Manning, rector of Trinity, New York, and the Very Rev. Seleden P. Delaney of All Saints' Cathedral, Milwaukee, Wis. Last May the Board voted to send delegates to the conference, which takes place next February, and the purpose of which is the evangelization of the Central and South American republics by the Protestant bodies of this country. At the recent meeting in New York, the whole question was brought prominently to the front. Bishop Weller took the platform and in ringing tones declared that the matter, as far as he and his associates were concerned, was "one of life and death!" Such action by the board, if carried out, he said, would create "between us and the Church of Rome an unfathomable chasm which God only can close. . . . I regard this Panama Conference as a direct attack by one part of Christendom upon another. . . . We are here to say that we will not make such an attack, and will not let you attack. We have to fight. One part of Christendom is not going to war with another branch, while the heathen are unconverted. I say here that we will not join in fighting against another part of Christendom. We will rather walk on the other side of the line! I want to say to you candidly that, when it comes to joining with Protestants against Roman Catholicism, there are some of us here, if you make us, who would take our place on the other side." He insisted that the Board rescind its action of last May, instead of sending delegates.

In the course of the debate, Dr. Manning, rector of Trinity, took ground which puts him in direct conflict with Bishop Greer. He referred to the recent action of Bishop Rojas, the Catholic Bishop of Panama, who had issued a pastoral letter warning his flock against the coming missionary conference—a document which, as we read it now lying before us, is more like a production of the sixteenth century than one of the year of grace 1915. It shows convincingly that "Rome never changes." It vituperates the proposed congress as an "insult to all Latin-American people," and as misrepresenting American sentiment, and warns the Catholics of the Panama Diocese that the purpose is "to evangelize us, for, according to the opinion of those Protestants, we are a lot of ignorants." He forbids, under penalty of mortal sin, the Catholics in his jurisdiction to attend the congress, and announces that he has urged the President of Panama to refuse permission to hold the conference in the National Theater. It should be added that in a postscript to his pastoral letter the Bishop announces with evident satisfaction that the President has withdrawn the license granting the theater to the Congress.

Some of the speakers at the Episcopal meeting in question—in fact the majority of them—took quite a different view of the matter. They disclaimed any undue hostility on the part of their denomination toward Rome; the Episcopal Church is identified with religious work in South America, and they held that there was no reason why the of the Episcopal communion should be destroyed by the issue raised by Bishop Weller and his associates. The motion to rescind was finally defeated by a vote of 26 to 13. The delegates will be appointed but they will not be necessarily bound by the action of the Panama Congress.

Thus the issue whether not only the Episcopal Church but the whole Protestant Church in America shall or shall not make a stand for religious freedom and an open Bible on the Isthmus and in the American republics generally, becomes sharply defined. For generations past the common people of our sister republics south of us have been kept in a condition of spiritual ignorance. Education and progress have been retarded, and freedom of religion, save in a few of the more progressive states, has been almost unknown. Shall the hosts of American Catholics, with their Great Commission to spread the Gospel abroad throughout the world, be denied the right of free proclamation, in obedience to Catholic bigotry, supplemented by spiritual indifference, the American churches at home? This is the question which may soon become acute, and which even one of the Protestant denominations must squarely meet in the near future.

Viva Carranza!

THE American people are glad to greet Carranza as President of Mexico. His average, scholarly, kindly face has become familiar to the great body of American newspaper readers, and they have come to think of him as the man most likely to be a trustworthy pilot for the Mexican state through the wild waters through which it is passing.

From all that can be learned, Señor Carranza stands for the people, the mass of the people, of Mexico. He is the champion of the peones against their landlord oppressors; he is the champion of Mexican resources against the oppressions and the manipulations of foreign capital. There was doubtless bitter opposition to his recognition by the American government on the part of unscrupulous American capital, which saw in him a menace to its schemes. His success will mark not only the beginning of a new history of Mexico, but an advanced step in the history of liberty, democracy, clean business and clean government.

Viva Carranza!

When Peace Comes

AS the war progresses, peace rumors multiply. But they are merely rumors. The fact that a number of leading German newspapers have seen fit to discuss what they regarded as the "probable terms of peace" cannot be taken as conclusive evidence that peace is near, or that it is even in the thoughts of the Powers engaged on either side. Nor can the cabled report from London that ex-Chancellor von Bülow will shortly submit to the United States and Spain an outline of Germany's peace conditions be regarded seriously at this time.

It is not improbable, however, that the great struggle at the Straits, which has now begun, may prove to be the event the outcome of which will give opportunity for a decision in the war. Will the co-operating forces accept it as such when it comes, or will they still fight on to a finish in farther fields, till the point of exhaustion is reached?

Holland is apparently the breeding-ground of these peace rumors; but whatever their source, we must believe that any human agency, however well informed, can foresee the complexion of the final agreement that is to adjust the issues of the war. Our own government may have no voice whatsoever in the final settlement; but if it should be represented, its influence would be exerted, whichever side ultimately victorious, in favor of a magnanimous peace, that would leave no heart-burnings—a peace that would not aggrandize any Power at the expense of others; that would recognize no supreme dominion by land or sea; that would impose no crushing burdens on the weaker nations; that would secure just recognition of racial rights, and, while yielding to the victors their due, would endeavor to make the burdens of defeat such as could be borne without undue hardship. There has been enough of suffering. Let us hope that when the end is reached the spirit of graciousness and magnanimity may rule, and that the higher qualities of humanity and generosity may shine conspicuously in the hour of triumph.

The Bible and Newspaper

CONDUCTED BY
FERDINAND C. IGLEHART, D.D.

a Fayette's New President

DR. JOHN HENRY MACCRACKEN was inaugurated President of La Fayette College at Easton, Pa., on October 20. The representatives of nearly 200 universities and colleges of the United States and Canada present. On the afternoon of the 19th there was an alumni conference, and at night the inaugural banquet was given, presided over by Edward J. Fox of the Board of Trustees. The speakers were John G. Hibben of Princeton, Oswald Ford, Principal George Morris Philips of the Westchester Normal School, President Harry B. Hutchins of the University of Michigan, President Warren of Wilson College, N. A. Emery of the University, Chancellor MacCormack of the University of Pittsburgh and Chancellor Richmond of Union University. Among other degrees conferred was that of Doctor of Laws upon thirteen distinguished men. At the inauguration exercises on the 20, Israel P. Pardee of Haddonfield, Pa., president of the Board of Trustees of La Fayette College, presided. President MacCracken made an appropriate address, saying among other things: "What this college possesses today has come to it largely as the result of the efforts of a few consecrated individuals and from the gratitude of that splendid company of sons which it has reared up. It stands today as the type of the voluntary college, in official and sympathetic relation with the great Presbyterian Church prepared to serve the commonwealth." Judge Elbert Gary, one of those receiving the degree of Doctor of Laws, closed his address with these words: "One of the tendencies of the times are vicious and dangerous to society and civilization. But they will be checked; first because of the elimination by the representatives of each of all grounds of just complaint; second, as the result of what is taught by great and worthy colleges and schools and other kindred institutions, and by wise and good men, who are persuasive because they advocate what is right; and third, for the reason that the large majority of the people are intelligent and fair and will always sooner or later properly settle all questions, however difficult or imminent." Dr. MacCracken is the son of Dr. H. M. MacCracken, formerly chancellor of New York University, and a brother of Dr. M. Cracken, the president of Vassar College. Of the young men attending the annual conference with a healthful moral, moral and religious atmosphere it may be said: "Happy is the man that hath wisdom, and the man that getteth understanding." (Prov. 3:13.)

Gold to the President

MISS DOROTHY STARR and Miss Esther Bull, eighteen years of age who were members of a delegation of our sent from California on an errand to the White House, gave Mr. Wilson a bar of gold, which they said he would have fashioned into a wedding ring for Mrs. Galt. They told Mr. Wilson that they had brought a bouquet of orange blossoms also, but had left it at the hotel, as they had concluded to present it to Mrs. Galt. Mrs. Gaillard Stuey, their chaperon, accompanied the young women to the White House, together with little Miss Altha McCuen, eleven years, who had written a prize essay on the "Best Reasons Why the President Should Visit the Panama Exposition at San Francisco," and was rewarded with the trip. In a low voice Miss McCuen gave some of the reasons why the President should go and he shook hands with her. Miss Bull said enthusiastically, "Can't you and Mrs. Galt come on to California on your wedding trip?" The President, smiling, said, "There has never been a time when I had to be urged to go to California. It has been merely a question of finding time to go." The President was handed a petition signed by 300,000 school children asking him to visit the Expositions at San Francisco and San Diego. The delegation gave the President a piece of gold quartz from the oldest mine in California, fashioned like a

Following the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States upholding the alien hunting law of Pennsylvania, legislation prohibiting aliens from shooting or owning shotguns or rifles was enacted in Massachusetts, New Jersey, North Dakota, and West Virginia. Closed season extending for several years was provided for certain kinds of big game and also for game birds. Shooting mountain sheep was suspended in Idaho, Montana and Washington. Moose were protected for four years in Maine, the first closed season on this species for thirty-five years. Antelope receive indefinite protection in New Mexico and Montana. In Michigan, New Mexico and Oklahoma prairie chickens were protected for several years. In a few cases protection was removed from certain species, notably the turkey buzzard in Delaware, Florida are while already to harvest and he that reapeth receiveth wages." (John 4:35-36.)

Finley Shepards Adopt Waif

A YEAR ago on a chilly night a policeman found a poor little waif asleep on the steps of St. Patrick's Cathedral in New York, where it had been left by its inhuman parents. The child was a beautiful blue-eyed, flaxen-haired boy. When the policeman took him to the Children's Society he was booked as "John Doe No. 104." So this poor little fellow was motherless, fatherless, nameless. But he has a name now, one of the most honorable in the land. It is Finley J. Shepard. Whom the heart of man casts out, the heart of God takes in. The child was received by St. Christopher's Home at Dobbs Ferry, N. Y., a Methodist orphanage. Mrs. Shepard, who was Miss Helen Gould, is one of the supporters of that benevolence, and her husband and she were greatly attracted by the lovely blue-eyed boy as they visited the institution, and arranged to adopt him as their son. Surgeon Sawyer of Yonkers made out the papers of adoption, which were properly signed. We do not congratulate the child because he lives in a palace, amidst fabulous wealth, heir to an earthly inheritance; ordinarily such surroundings are serious handicaps to a boy. But we do congratulate him upon the fact that Mrs. Shepard is to be his mother, which is a guarantee that he will have the sweetest care, the best education, the safest moral training, and the deepest spiritual life. Mrs. Shepard would be rich if she were not worth a penny, on account of her ability, her love for Christ and life of benevolence in his name. There is this account of the child found that was taken to the king's palace and adopted into the royal family to become the greatest law-giver the world has known: "And the child grew, and she brought him unto Pharaoh's daughter, and he became her son. And she called his name Moses." (Ex. 2:10.)

Cattle-Trail Founder Dies

JOSEPH G. MCCOY, pioneer plainsman, who laid out the famous cattle trail from the state of Texas to Abilene, Kan., died at Kansas City, Mo., recently. He contributed much to the development of the Southwest before the building of railroads. The men who have the courage and push to do pioneer work in the material, mental, social or religious realm are real heroes. Society is likely to overlook the value of their sacrifice and service, and withhold the reward that belongs to them. The men who go out to make the cattle trails are as important factors in our civilization and evangelism as those who follow them and make roads for horses and wagons, or lay tracks for the cars. Did any greater heroes ever live than the pioneers of the primitive Church, or the pioneers of our land who made paths before roads were built over which to carry the Bible and the cross for the salvation of men? There is this reference to a pioneer opening up a path for Christ and his kingdom: "I am the voice of one crying in the wilderness. Make straight the way of the Lord, as saith the prophet Esaias." (John 1:23.)

Sound as a Detective

SINCE submarines made their entrance into war, inventors have been seeking a device to discover them by sight from aeroplanes above, and by hearing them under the water. Microphones placed in the water detected not only the noise of the submarine propellers some miles away, but also that of all other boats and the washing of the water against the shore, so that the inability to detect the kind of ship made the device valueless as a protection. William Dubelier, an American electrical engineer with wireless telephone and wireless telegraph inventions to his credit, who was in France installing the wireless in war aircraft, was called upon to help solve the problem. Dubelier went to Cherbourg, where he found Professor Tissot of the French Academy of Sciences hard at work on the detector system. The two men in conjunction discovered that the revolutions of the submarine propeller were of much greater velocity, and made a sound different from the rest, and after several months of experimentation they made a machine which can detect a submarine fifty miles away and can tell the direction it is going. An apparatus (shown in our picture) has also been devised for detecting the approach of aircraft by night and by day. Oh, that God in his mercy would stop the war and turn the minds and inventions of men to the arts of peace and prosperity! "He maketh wars to cease unto the end of the earth; he breaketh the bow, and cutteth the spear in sunder; he burneth the chariot in the fire." (Ps. 46:9.)

rose. Mr. Wilson did not promise the delegation to make the visit to California, and yet it is thought he is likely to comply with the request made. The descriptions of the delegation represented California as one of the most beautiful regions on the earth. There was a beautiful country in olden time thus described: "A land of wheat, and barley, and vines, and fig trees, and pomegranates; a land of oil, olive and honey; a land whose stones are iron, and out of whose hills thou mayest dig brass." (Deut. 8:8-9.)

Important Game Laws Enacted

DURING 1915 new state game laws to the number of 240 were enacted. Of the forty-three states holding legislative sessions all made changes in the game laws save Arizona, Georgia and Nebraska. In Illinois the seasons for migrating birds, except coot and water fowl, and in Washington for small or shore birds, were made to conform to the Federal law. Uniformity also was obtained by provisions in Connecticut, Maine, New Mexico, North Dakota, Washington, and Wisconsin prohibiting hunting between sunset and sunrise. On the other hand Delaware adopted a resolution condemning the law, and Ohio and Rhode Island, which harmonized their seasons in 1914, this year changed the seasons for waterfowl.

and North Carolina, owls and starlings in New Hampshire and cormorants in Illinois and North Dakota. Under the present laws deer-shooting is permitted in thirty-six states, in about one-third of which the sportsman is limited to one deer a season, and in most of the others to two. Eighteen states protect deer at all seasons and only bucks are allowed to be killed. The massacre of the wild of the forests and of game became so general and swift that civilization and government had to enter a protest. The escape of game from the hunter is thus made the basis of a moral and religious lesson: "Deliver thyself as a roe from the hand of the hunter, and as a bird from the hand of the fowler." (Prov. 6:5.)

City Children's Farm Harvest

PARK COMMISSIONER INGERSOLL of Brooklyn announced that the final harvesting of the crops on the McCarren Park School Farms would take place, and on a beautiful October day more than 400 children who had cultivated their plots gathered and took home their vegetables. This school gardening is splendid for the health, the industry, the morals of the city boys and girls. Christ thus uses the harvest time as a symbol of spiritual truth: "Behold, I say unto you, Lift up your eyes, and look on the fields; for they

Then I Watched the Butter Making

"WHEN I last saw the Shakers," I began—"Shakers?" questioned the Girl. "Shakers? You mean Quakers, don't you?"

"No," I answered, "I mean Shakers."

The Girl looked at me queerly, her brow puckered in a frown—a puzzled little frown—"What is a Shaker?" she asked.

And so I told her.

I WENT slowly up the hill, pausing from time to time that we might rest—for the way was long and the road was dusty. Huge clumps of golden-rod and purple asters made the side of the path look like some monarch's throne room; scarlet and yellow and bronze glowed down from the trees until the way shone brightly with their vivid glory.

It was not my first trip up that same hill and yet the trip, as always, held a thrill for me. I knew just what time to turn and look down on the valley below—for if you turn and look too soon you miss the white slenderness of the church spire. I knew just what landmarks to expect as I walked slowly along. There came first the dilapidated house, then the red apple orchard, then the tiny mill pond, and then—the Shaker Village.

Somewhere on the state road between Albany and Pittsfield there is a valley that grows jewel-like from a green setting of hills. It is called the Lebanon Valley, and one of the hills is called, by the uninitiated, Mount Lebanon. The townspeople—who know—call it Shaker Hill, for it is on the summit that the Shakers have made their home.

IF I wanted to give a history of the Shakers I could tell a great many things. I could tell how a religious sect, an order that believed in the second coming of Christ, sprang up in England and, after innumerable persecutions, fled to America in 1774. I could tell how the band, just eight in number, landed on the shores of a very troubled country and yet managed to struggle against all obstacles until they had a firm, strong community. I could tell how they have taken vows to eat no meat and never to marry. I could tell how they call each other sister and brother. I could tell how they have waxed rich in property and land and flocks because of their increasing industry. I could tell how they sit in meeting house silently, and how they rise to dance in a solemn shaking when the Spirit moves them—so they have gotten their name. I could tell all of these things and many more—if this were a history. Instead, it is only an intimate little mind picture that I'm showing you.

I passed the dilapidated house and the apple orchard and I saw the mill pond, so I knew that I was nearing the end of my journey. I passed the mill pond and reached a turn in the road and paused, as I always have paused. For I knew that just around the bend of the road the tiny Shaker city was waiting for me, to give me greeting. And then I walked slowly around the curve.

STREETS are quiet in the Shaker village, and well shaded, and paved smoothly with white, dustless paving stones. Lawns in the Shaker village are cut until they look like soft green velvet, and fences are painted a smooth spotless white. The houses, as you approach them, are more dignified than most houses for they are tall, squarely built houses with wide windows and hospitable doors, and no waste room. Some of the houses are made out of smooth white clapboard, but many of them are made of rich red brick.

The Shaker village streets are usually deserted, and as I walked up the path I looked in vain for some sign of life. It is seldom that one sees a Shaker sitting down doing nothing, so I was not disappointed at the empty air of the place—neither was I lonely. For quietness and calmness and peace descend on one like a wonderful coverlet—with the grateful comfort of a down quilt on a winter night—when one has passed the turn in the road.

The Shakers of Lebanon

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

The Shaker village is divided into three groups called "families," the South Family, the Church Family, and the North Family. Each family has a huge house and eats in a huge dining hall, the men on one side, the women on the other. And in each family the tasks are divided and systematized until the members have learned to work together in an efficient way.

Going up the path through the village one passes the home of the South Family first. I never pause when I come to that home, for I do not know any of the South Family Shakers. Then a quaint white building surrounded by an old-fashioned picket fence stands out from the side of the road. A sign hangs over the door, a sign that reads "Office and Store." But on my way to the Shakers even the fascinations of the store cannot stay me.

THE home of the Church Family Shakers is a huge brick building that somehow manages to look absolutely warm in winter as well as invitingly cool in the summertime. I walked down the narrow path and knocked at the door, and as a sweet-faced little lady in a dull dress and white kerchief opened the door, I asked for Sister Corinna Bishop. For Sister Corinna Bishop is my special friend among the Shakers.

"She is up in her room," the sweet-faced little lady told me; "shall I get her? Or can you find your way?"

I could find my way, and so I started out alone the spotless halls, and up the two flights of white stairs. Sister Corinna lives up high enough to see the views and hear the birds sing of a morning.

Some famous American once said in an essay that the Island of Marken in Holland was the cleanest place in the world. I should advise said American to visit the Shaker village at Mount Lebanon. The Shaker village would, I am sure, make the Island of Marken look rather soiled and shabby by comparison. As I walked through the cool, airy halls, I could see my face in the floors, they were so highly polished. I felt like apologizing for having stepped on them.

I reached Sister Corinna's door and she opened herself, while blank amazement gave way to a smile on her face. Her arms went softly around my neck.

"Why, Margaret Sangster," she murmured in my ear, "how do you happen to be here?"

"Didn't you expect me?" I questioned. "I was a visitor from the city travels fast when one lives in a tiny country town."

"Nay," said Sister Corinna. The Shakers use "yea" and "nay" in place of our yes and no.

SISTER CORINNA and I have known each other for a long time; such a long time that I have no memory of meeting her; and we had much to say to each other. She had a wonderful new clock, she told me, a clock that plays a tune every quarter of an hour. Sister Corinna loves her clock better than any of her possessions.

I wish that I could draw you a word picture vivid enough to make you see a Shaker's room. Sister Corinna's room is the loveliest of all, I think, for it is furnished with wonderful braided mats, and soft-seated chairs, made of wood, and woolly footstools. On the wall is a picture of Dr. Louis Klopsch on the wall, and a copy of the Christian Herald on the table made me feel very much at home.

We talked for a little while—oh, a pitifully short while!—and then we went down stairs together toward the great fragrant kitchen (fragrant is the only adequate word to use). Sister Corinna, a tiny little woman with a form and white hair, reigns in the kitchen where she makes ambrosia in the form of pie and bread and cake. One could love Sister Corinna for herself, but one could love her for her marvelous cooking, too. With her we went through the store rooms and baking rooms; saw the huge Dutch ovens, and I saw the myriad glasses of gleaming jelly. When I left the kitchens, I began to wonder if writing ever was so much of an accomplishment—I have never seen a more perfect poem than Sister Corinna's cooking.

OUT through the side door we went to the creamery, down a path paved with red flags and bordered with spicy crimson ivy. Sister Corinna picked one for me to pin on my dress when she kissed me good-by, after she had watched her make the butter and start the cream separator.

It would be a sacrilege to visit the Shakers without seeing their store.

Everything is made by the gentle, dust-free hands of the Shakers, from the smallest pin to the largest chair. The ceiling of the shop is hung with woolly feather dusts, and the glass cases are filled with automobile bonnets and sewing bags and baskets and hand-made boxes. I looked with vast longing at the Shaker coats made of wonderful homespun materials with wonderful workmanship. Sister Sadie New gave me maple sugar candy as sweet as herself.

I WALKED away down the immaculate road, past the lawns and lawns, and as I came to the turn in the road I paused for a moment to look once more at the Shaker village, as it stood, apparently deserted but not really, in the last rays of the sun. I started down the hill.

Half way down I passed a boy. He was singing a popular song under his breath. It was like this:

"Just a little bit of Heaven here upon this earth below—"

A Group of the North Family Shakers

Making the Delightful Shaker Cloaks

At the Turn of the Road You See It: The Shaker Village

The "Campaign for Millions"

By REV. FRANCIS E. CLARK, D.D., LL.D., President of the United Society of Christian Endeavor

THE magnitude of the present Christian Endeavor "Campaign for Millions," on which the Endeavorers are hard at work, take away the breath of many hearts that are mobilized for it.

The campaign contemplates obtaining, during the next two years, no less than a million new members for Christian Endeavor societies, and at least ten thousand new societies, but these efforts do not exhaust it by any means, nor are its objects first in the program. "A million young people brought to God and into the church," is, after all, the more important goal. "A million new dollars for missions" gives strength for evangelization in all parts of the world.

"A million advocates of the Christian Endeavor Peace Union" means education for a multitude of young people for the lines of this most important pressing theme.

"Twenty thousand new Comrades for the Quiet Hour" means that in addition to the more than one hundred thousand who now agree to spend a little each day in communion with God, the numbers will be increased by twenty thousand.

"Ten thousand new members of the Tenth Legion" will add indeed a great gift to those who give regularly and proportionately at least a tenth of their incomes to the cause of Christ.

"Ten thousand new Christian Endeavor Experts" will raise up an army of leaders who are thoroughly equipped, by study of the principles and methods of Christian Endeavor, to meet the way for their younger comrades.

"Ten thousand new Life Work recruits," or those who will give themselves, if God opens the way, to the duty at home or abroad or to some form of service, means a multitude of young people for our theological studies and religious training schools, and will eventually find their way to the front in this or other lands.

These goals, I say, will look far-off and even, if not absolutely impossible of achievement, to many of faint heart and weak faith.

But it is not impossible is proved by the multitude of young people who have enlisted to carry out the campaign. It is not only a campaign for millions, but by millions as well. If one Endeavorer in four throughout the world, during the next two years, win one other young person to Christ, into the church and the society, the best part of the campaign will be accomplished, and the million new members and new church members will be gained. Even making all allowance for the Juniors and for those in foreign countries, and for those who cannot be reached by this campaign, two Endeavorers out of every four, in the course of two years, ought to bring at least one other young person into the fold.

ANOTHER reason which goes far to make this campaign not only possible, but to give assurance of complete success, is the definiteness of the goals set. This indeed is one of the characteristics of the Christian Endeavor movement, and has been from the beginning.

Some people are constitutionally opposed to anything that is definite and specific. Our church covenants have fostered this disposition because, for the most part, they are exceedingly general, and perhaps need to be, when we remember that we must appeal to young and old, rich and poor, to all classes and conditions of men. But their very indefiniteness and the general terms in which they are couched often make the covenant very easy to take and equally easy to forget and ignore.

The Christian Endeavor Covenant, since it appeals to young people, and to a special class of young people, for the most part those who are particularly earnest and devoted, has always insisted on being particularly definite.

Not only do the Endeavorers say, "Trusting in the Lord Jesus Christ for strength, I will strive to do whatever he would like to have me do," but they say, "I will do certain specific things for him. I will read the Bible and pray every day; I will attend and take some part, aside from singing, in the weekly meetings of the Society. I will support my own church by attending her regular services."

Thus, by all these thirty-five years of definite and specific forms of service, the Endeavorers have been educated to believe that the Christian should have specific duties, definite obligations, things to be done for the Master at definite times, whether one is in the mood for them or not. On this account, therefore, they are ready to take up this definite and special campaign, with its goals and its limitations, even though the limitations be set among the millions. On this account it is possible to divide among the different states and Christian Endeavor Unions the numbers to be gained. Every state in the United States, and every province in Canada, now has its well-organized Christian Endeavor Unions. In many states every county is organized in the same way, and there are thousands of local unions of Christian Endeavor throughout the country.

To these states and unions are assigned a definite proportion of the millions to be gained—so many new members for the church and the society, so many new dollars for missions, so many members of the Quiet Hour and the Tenth Legion, so many Life Work Recruits. When this proportion is divided up, the share that comes to the individual unions is often not an appalling one, but one that is within the scope of their activities.

BUT another reason why I believe this campaign will be successful is because of the interest and the enthusiasm of the young people to whom it has been proposed. I have known much of the genuine devotion of the young people of these societies now for more than a generation, and I have often been rebuked by it for my own little faith. During all these years I have never seen such intense interest as has been shown in this present Campaign for Millions. Everywhere they are taking it up with the vigor of youth, and with its zeal and determination.

Though this campaign was announced but a comparatively short time ago, already many of the states have accepted their apportionments of the millions and some have even taken more than was asked of them, for good measure. This enthusiasm is contagious. The leaders communicate it to those in the rank and file. A gen-

The Plea

YEARS gone, on a day sweet to mem'ry,
My child, who some slight wrong had done.
Came meekly, and knelt down before me,
A trembling, forlorn, little one.
Two tear-bedimmed eyes gazed up at me,
A heart-broken sob came, and then—
"I'm sorry I did yat, dear papa;
Will oo jes' fordiv me aden?"

So earnest, so wistful the pleading,
That sweet tot I took on my knee,
And there, as her tears quickly vanished,
None ever more joyous than we.
She knew that her wrong was forgiven—
As e'er with that plea it has been—
"I'm sorry I did yat, dear papa;
Will oo jes' fordiv me aden?"

To-day, with mine own evil doing,
As cometh that mem'ry to me,
I go to the Father in secret.
I go, with my child's simple plea.
Then know I her joy at forgiveness,
And ne'er have I pleaded in vain—
"I'm sorry I did it, dear Father, Wilt thou just forgive me again?"

GEORGE WHITEFIELD D'VYS.

Amarilly of Clothes-Line Alley

By BELLE K. MANIATES

Copyright, 1915, by Little, Brown & Co. All rights reserved

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

AMARILLY made her bow to Christian Herald readers from the threshold of the Barlow "Theater," where she would begin a struggle for the education necessary to the career of her dreams, and they went with her to St. Mark's, to the classroom where real hair and wasn't made up. Through this teacher, Colette King, Amarilly's mother became the laundress of St. Mark's and Amarilly met the rector, Rev. St. John Meredith, who invited her to attend morning service and who showed something more than a pastor's interest in Colette. Amarilly's soul responded to the church service and she thought it must be what Heaven was. Then scarlet fever quarantined them, and it came a morning when Amarilly had to face breakfast. The family fund once more of a modest start, which was accelerated by the mundane career of the minister's wife, through which Amarilly and her thoroughness entered the world of art and the studio of Derry Phillips. Lunch with the artist preceded a permanent engagement as maid to begin the fall. Meantime the boarder fell in love and the surprise continued its career.

CHAPTER X—Continued

ONE day there came to the Jenkins home a most unusual caller. The novel presence of the "mailman" at their door brought every neighbor to post of observation. His call was for the purpose of leaving a gayly-colored postal card addressed to "Miss Amarilly Jenkins." It was from Derry, and she spent many happy moments in deciphering it. His writing was microscopic, and he managed to convey a great deal of information in the allotted small space. He inquired solicitously concerning the surplice, and bade her be a good girl and not forget the two words he had taught her. "I have ordered all my meals as though you were with me," he wrote in conclusion.

Amarilly laid the card away with her wedding waist. Then, with the Boarder's aid, she indited an answer on a card that depicted the Barlow Theater.

The next event for Amarilly was an invitation to attend the wedding of Mrs. Hubbleston, a buxom, bustling widow for whom Mrs. Jenkins washed. In delivering the clothes, Amarilly had come to be on very friendly terms with the big, light-hearted woman, and so she had been asked to assist in the serving of refreshments on the eventful night.

"I've never been to a wedding," said Amarilly wistfully. "I've been to most everything else, and I would like to see you wed, but I ain't got no clothes 'cept my hair-ribbons."

Mrs. Hubbleston looked at her contemplatively.

"My last husband's niece's little girl left a dress here once when she was going home after a visit. She had hardly worn it, but she had outgrown it, and her ma told me to give it away. I had 'most forgotten about it. I believe it would just fit you. Let us see."

She produced a white dress that adjusted itself comfortably to Amarilly's form.

erous and friendly emulation exists between the different states and unions to do their share. Challenges to obtain even more than has been asked for are issued by some of the states. But all this in the most fraternal manner and all with the idea of accomplishing the largest things for the Master's cause.

Once more, the united efforts of these young people is a guarantee of their success. It is not a sectional or sectarian movement. Eighty denominations are united to a greater or less degree in this campaign. In fact, every considerable evangelical denomination in America and in other parts of the world is united in it. In the Pennsylvania Christian Endeavor Union alone, 46 different denominations are represented. Each one stimulates the other. The blessed fellowship of their union meetings and their combined efforts is a most beautiful prophecy of the time when our Lord's prayer shall be fulfilled—that they all may be one.

Still another reason why I have confidence in the success of this campaign is because of the history of the past. Some few years ago the Endeavorers had set before them the goal of gaining within two years a million new members and ten thousand new societies. That was thought by many to be an impossible task. Even the Endeavorers themselves in some cases were staggered by it, but not for long. Vigorously and earnestly they took hold with both hands, and with all their hearts. Their plans were laid; the apportionment was made to the different states and unions, and before the two years were up it was found that actually more than ten thousand new societies had been formed and more than a million new members had been gained.

The campaign of the next two years is on a far broader scale, to be sure, and contemplates the building up, not of the Society alone, but of every church with which the Society is connected, and the kingdom of God throughout the world. But the principle is the same, and the larger motive will appeal to the larger efforts of the young people.

An evangelistic campaign that brought a million new members into the Kingdom and established these million along the lines of practical Christian service would be thought a wonderful thing indeed, and so it would be. This campaign, though conducted quietly, in tens of thousands of communities and churches, may not make the stir that a company of evangelists would make who might go from place to place, but it will be none the less effective, and though the daily papers may have no headlines to record it, the record will be made in heaven, and the faithful, persistent, unflagging work done by these young disciples will indeed be a glorious one.

"You look real pretty in white, Amarilly. You shall have this dress for your own."

On the nuptial night Amarilly, clad in the white gown and with black velvet hair-ribbons, went forth at an early hour to the house of festivity.

Mrs. Hubbleston, resplendent in a glittering jetted gown, came into the kitchen to see that things were progressing properly.

"Ain't you flustered?" asked Amarilly, looking at her in awe.

"Land, no, child! I have been married four times before this, you see, so it comes natural. There goes the doorbell. It must be Mr. Jimmels and the minister."

In a few moments she returned to the kitchen for sympathy.

"I am so disappointed," she sighed, "but then, I might have expected something would happen. It always does at my weddings."

Continued on page 1140

Our Mail-Bag

NOTICE

THE editors of the Christian Herald will be glad to answer any question addressed to the Mail-Bag provided it be of general interest and not merely personal. Correspondents may use a nom de plume to identify the question, but all letters must contain name and address of the sender, in addition to the nom de plume. No attention will be paid to anonymous letters.

Questions and Answers

READER, Nebraska. Is there definite Scripture to prove that our friends who have passed over to the other side recognize earthly conditions here and are solicitous about those that remain? Are our departed ones still mindful of the joys and sorrows, the successes and disappointments that come to friends on earth?

There are several passages that clearly imply recognition of friends in heaven, and others that imply an interest on the part of the redeemed ones in the spiritual struggle here below. Our Lord himself emphasized this in the parable of Dives and Lazarus, which teaches not only recognition but continued spiritual interest. See these passages on the subject: II Sam. 12:23; Phil. 3:20; Heb. 12:1; Matt. 17:3; Rev. 6:9, 10; Rom. 14:12; Luke 16:23; I Thess. 4:13-18; Heb. 13:17; Matt. 8:11; Eph. 3:15. These indicate the preservation of identity. But even if there had not been a single passage in the Old or New Testament on the subject other than the Lazarus parable, the conviction that memory and identity would be preserved in the hereafter would be justified for the reason that a heaven in which the redeemed would not know each other would be unthinkable and wholly out of keeping with God's just, beneficent and loving purposes. What could be more explicit than the language of Jesus himself in Matt. 8:11, as proving heavenly recognition? Or what more assurance is needed than that in Heb. 12:1, as showing the interest of the heavenly inhabitants in the progress of the spiritual struggle here below?

Mrs. C. J. H., New Plymouth, O. Were Elijah and John the Baptist the same person? I recently heard a Bible teacher say that they were, and that Elijah descended to earth three times and ascended to heaven three times. Is this true?

No. There is nothing to indicate in the New Testament comparisons of John the Baptist with Elijah that the two persons were identical. Jesus meant, in saying that Elijah had come already, that John the Baptist had done for his era what Elijah had done for his. The promise in Malachi that the forerunner of the Messiah would come in the spirit and power of Elijah did not mean that this forerunner would have the personality of Elijah, but that he would have the same power and the same sort of a spirit. When the disciples saw Elijah on the Mount of Transfiguration there is nothing in the narrative to indicate that they recognized in Elijah their personal friend John the Baptist. The teacher you refer to evidently holds the opposite view, and means that Elijah came to earth first as a prophet in the time of Ahab, next as John the Baptist, next on the Mount of Transfiguration. But we believe positively that this view is incorrect.

Reader, Pray that I may have God in my heart again. (From a letter to the Prayer League.)

This is the truest and best wish any soul can have, and the wish he can be sure of having granted. There is nothing God desires so much as to be present in every heart.

"All the fitness he requirerth
Is to feel your need of him."

You can be sure that God is far more eager to enter your heart than you can possibly be to have him, so there is not the slightest reason for thinking that he will not answer your prayer. One of two things has happened to cause you to need this prayer. Either you disobeyed God in some way and so lost your sense of his presence; or else you simply began to doubt his presence, which also prevents us from enjoying the sense of his nearness. Now if you do not know definitely of any willful disobedience, ask him to show you if you displeased him in any way. Remember that you are dealing with a Friend and Father, not with a Master and Judge. If he shows you that you did wrong, ask him to forgive you and believe that he does it. If your sin was something that harmed some one else, make it right just as far as you can. Settle everything up squarely and then trust God to blot out your sin. Think of Christ's great love as shown on the cross, and realize that such love as that will not deny you anything. Hunt up the beautiful passages in the Bible about forgiveness, and believe that they were written for you. But if, in answer to your prayer for God's searching, there comes no revelation of outward sin, then trust him to fill you with his Holy Spirit, cleansing your heart from inward impurity as he has so plainly promised to do. See Ezek. 37:25-27; II Cor. 7:1; I Thes. 5:23, and many other passages. Remember that doubting is an act of the will, and that you can stop it just as you can stop doing anything else that is wrong. Stop doubting at once and begin to trust God's grace, remembering that

"There's a wideness in God's mercy
Like the wideness of the sea."

It may be, however, that you are simply too weary or ill to grasp clearly any of these spiritual truths. In that case, just trust more simply, and wait patiently until rest and health are unchangeably fixed. (See Rev. 22:11.) Therefore, now is the time for repentance and reformation, and for beginning that new life of faith and obedience which comes with a full acceptance of Christ as Saviour and Redeemer. 2. We are not to judge others. It is doubtless true that there are very many good Christian soldiers in the armies now fighting each other. We have seen many letters from the front which show this to be the case.

J. N. M., Wichita, Kan. The attitude of Christians with regard to the prophecies that are held to point to the Second Coming should be one of prayer and preparedness, in accordance with Jesus' own words. We are distinctly told that "the day and the hour no man knoweth, not even the angels."

Mrs. L. T., Polar, Wis. There are so many conflicting opinions on the interpretation of the prophetic passages in Jeremiah, Ezekiel and Daniel, and particularly as to their appli-

10:26-29; John 6:37; Heb. 6:4-6; C 6:1 I John 1:9, and other passages on this subject. God's abundant mercy, however, cleanses and restores even the backslider.

H. D. C., Port Vincent, La. See a letter from Mary L. E., Morganton, N. C.

A. J. K., Philadelphia. 1. We are sending you a printed slip dealing with your question. 2. The opening of a door in the Lord's Day may reasonably be regarded as either a work of necessity or of mercy.

The Christian Herald would be glad to hear from any relatives of the late W. H. Fulling, mining prospector, who was murdered in California. Mr. Muller had been in California many years and at the time of his death was 74 years old. He is believed to be a brother and a sister residing in New York.

Mrs. G. W. B., West Benton, A. T. The passage in Job 19:26,27 which was translated in the old version, is correctly translated in the Revised to read, "Yet without my flesh I see God." The Scripture expressly states that flesh and blood shall not inherit the kingdom of heaven. Paul speaks of the "natural body" as the "spiritual body." All the evidences go to show that the resurrection body is purified, changed and spiritualized body (Read I Cor. 15:49; Rom. 6:9; Phil. 3:21; II Cor. 5:4; I Thess. 4:15.)

Reader, Brattleboro, Vt. The custom of praying for the dead arose in the church at an early period. Tertullian (220 A. D.) referred to prayers by widows for the souls of their husbands. Origen (254 A. D.) at the Council of Jerusalem commended it, and many of the ancient liturgies contain forms of such prayers. There was at that period, however, no notion of purgatory, and the early fathers apparently regarded such prayers as being more a commemoration of the dead than anything else. At a later time, the prayer book expressly included prayers for the dead, and this has since been emphasized in the Anglican Church and in Protestant churches generally. "The ancient being to denote that prayers are not offered up for the dead, whose spiritual welfare is accomplished, but pray for the living who are fighting the good fight of faith, who are consequently in a capacity of receiving our prayers." Today, the universal Christian attitude is to reject prayers for the dead as having no ground either in Scripture or reason.

A very large proportion of the letters sent to the Mail-Bag deal with the war. Almost without exception the writers condemn it as inhuman, un-Christian and a kind of madness which has seized the world in ignorance and which is the outcome of inordinate selfishness, love of power, and the desire of commercial supremacy. W. C. P., Newton, N. J. writes that the money-lust is the principal motive, and adds: "I do not think it been in the war fight with a will. They are the machines, because the great leaders lead them. I hope our President and cabinet are all neutral nations will not let the thought of entering this man-slaughtering war pass through their minds, but rather that they will do all that lies in their power and the utmost influence to stop it in the interest of civilization and humanity. Those who are furnishing the war-fuel may be putting powder in their pockets, but it will be a blame against them hereafter."

J. M. H., Vertrees, Ky. I have been told there is but one deathbed repentance recorded in the Bible. Where is it recorded?

Those who make this statement habitually refer to the repentance and forgiveness of the thief on the cross. We do not recall a similar instance in the Scriptures of a person repenting at the moment of death. If any of our readers find such a passage we should be glad to have them point it out to us.

F. V., Belle Plaine, Iowa, writes: Some time ago your excellent paper conducted a symposium on 'The Problem of the Hare and the Laboring Man.' All or nearly all of the replies were from men of high standing. Being a laboring man, I take the liberty to write the ideas of a man on the other side of the fence. It is primarily a problem of wrong ideals and false standards. All true Christians recognize the fact that Christianity is so powerful of so broad a nature as to include mankind in a universal brotherhood. First, recognize this fact in a practical way as the cause of the ever-widening breach between the church and the laboring man. The church must have to existence is their recognition of right principles. Right ideals and true standards make for unity, harmony, brotherhood and progress."

Not a Branch Post Office, Just Meeting the Postman Halfway

Getting their Mail by "Post"

HOW the question of mail delivery was solved by a number of suburban residents of Los Angeles, California, is shown in the two accompanying illustrations. In one of the pictures we see a photograph of what these residents call "Our Postboard." This is twelve feet long and three and a half feet wide. This board has a capacity of seventy city type mail boxes, but at the time this photograph was taken there were only fifty-six boxes in position. However, this board was at one time filled to its capacity. This postboard was built by people who had purchased homes in a new section of a large tract, to which section the city delivery had not yet been extended. Rather than to be satisfied with the one-mail-a-day rural delivery, they constructed this board just within the established delivery limits, and by this action compelled the city to deliver their mail.

The other illustration shows how a street sign post was pressed into service as a mail box holder. On this post there are sixteen boxes of the city type, clinging like leeches to its sides and extending up even to the sign itself.

ALBERT MARFLE.

bring your mind back to a normal condition in which you can recognize again the gracious, unchangeable fact that God is with you.

A. M. C. R., Regina, Canada. 1. What are the meanings of the words "mir" and "zemstvo" which I have run across in books about Russia? 2. Please tell me something about communal lands.

1. A "mir" (pronounced meer) is a local community of Russian peasants in which the land is held in common and the part which each peasant has to work is apportioned to him by lot. The word "mir" is said to mean "world." A "zemstvo" is an elective assembly, like a county council, which in Russia exercises certain legislative functions. 2. The holding of lands in common, as in the Russian mir, is widely spread among the less advanced races. It was the universal system of land-holding among the agricultural tribes of North America, such as the Iroquois, and was carried to a high degree of perfection in ancient Peru, where governmental officials regularly divided the land, apportioning to each citizen his plot of ground and his task.

V. H. J., Robin, Man., Canada. 1. The passage in Eccles. 11:3, to which you have reference, is interpreted as meaning that when death overtakes us, our character and destiny are determined. An interesting book on the subject is "Exposition of the Book of Revelation," by J. B. Knappenberger, Syracuse, N. Y. This covers the ground mentioned in your letter and much more, but its conclusions, like many others, are purely speculative.

Mary L. E., Morganton, N. C. The subject is controversial. It will be found fully discussed in any standard religious encyclopedia. It is generally recognized that immersion was a popular form of baptism in apostolic times.

Reader, Winter Haven, Fla. We cannot judge of the books, never having seen them, but from your brief description we think it would be the wisest course to leave them alone. Send us your full name, so that we may write you on the other question.

Mrs. J. C. Chandler, Lowndesville, S. C., writes that the poem entitled "The Good Old Hymns," lately published anonymously in this paper, was written by Frank L. Stanton. We take pleasure in giving the proper credit.

M. M., Maxton, N. C. There is such a thing as falling away from grace. The cases of such persons are regarded as very serious, as they "crucify Christ afresh." See Heb.

Martha's Faith: A True Story

MARTHA was singing as she scrubbed. The strains of "Greenland's Icy Mountains" subtly smoothed the passage of the rubbing-brush over the marble hall floor. Her voice was low-pitched and velvety, and her mistress paused to listen to it as she passed out of the front door.

"They call us to deliver Their land from error's chain."

Mrs. Bennett was shutting the front door when Martha's voice stopped her. "Please, ma'am, may I have the afternoon off?"

The girl stood, her clear-eyed, honest face upturned as she waited for an answer.

"Why, certainly, Martha; only be back at five," replied Mrs. Bennett. When the door closed and Martha resumed her scrubbing.

At half past two that afternoon, she emerged from the house, spick and span. She walked rapidly to the avenue and half an hour later presented herself at the door of a great building, missionary headquarters for the whole city.

With firm step Martha mounted the stairs and inquired the way to the place where applicants for missionary work were received. There she stood, with adfast face, her clear eyes shining. This was the crowning moment in her life. She always heard somewhere within her a voice which said: "God wants you to be a missionary." Even back in her little country home she had heard that voice.

It had led her to New York and now to this spot.

"What are your qualifications?" said a business-like young man who faced her. She hesitated—then told the simple truth that "she had always wanted to be a missionary." After looking her over and asking a few questions the young man told her kindly but decidedly that she was quite sure she had not the necessary qualifications. "Better go back to your housework," he said, not kindly, and turned aside to more important business.

Martha walked away with undoubting faith. Just as loud as ever something rang in her heart: "God wants you to be a missionary. God wants you to be a missionary." At five she could be seen in her print dress busy with her evening duties. Mrs. Bennett noticed nothing changed in her expression. Did you have a good time on your afternoon out, Martha? she asked. Martha nodded. It did not come very easy to speak just at that moment.

THE month of November passed, and December came with its Christmas season, so glad to the heart-free, and sad to the heart-sick; and four months more. It was full bright spring when Martha once more walked up the steps of the great stone building where her fate was to be decided. She was humming "I'm but a stranger here" as she mounted, with her elastic step, the great stairs again. Another young man was at the office. "I hope this one will be better to me," she thought to herself.

Very much the same dialogue ensued had occurred six months before. He said "Good day," and Martha went out, with faith undaunted, and hummed "Greenland's Icy Mountains." "They call us to deliver their land from error's chain," she sang, as she walked back to her room. It was a little fourth or fifth floor back, overlooking some roofs, and, oh, thank God! looking up to a rare mile of blue sky, where a few feeble swallows and a bank of fleecy clouds gave one a sense of light, space and freedom illimitable.

In front of that window Martha sat down, and before she put on her work dress she went on those knees which supported her during so many hours of idle toil. What she said to her God she did not for us to know; but what he said to her we may be sure of, for when she rose her face shone, and she repeated softly to herself, "God wants me to be a missionary!"

Summer came and went. Martha had been one of the two faithful maids that Mrs. Bennett had left in the house during the hot summer. But the park was near, and she had not suffered. She suffered! If she suffered from New York heat, how would she stand that of India's coral strand? So the loneliness and heat all counted as preparation for that time when God's wish for her should come true. So thought Martha.

In early October Mrs. Bennett returned. She had many pleasant words for Martha's faithfulness, and in consideration for it gave her a day to herself at once.

She walked with a step, as elastic as if she had not behind her two heart-breaking disappointments, and before her—well, anyway, the prospect didn't daunt her, for all the time something was singing within her, "God wants me to be a missionary—God wants me to be a missionary."

Young man number one was in his place. He had a good memory and recognized Martha. Although he was inwardly pleased with her fresh face, he preserved an aspect of official dignity as he went once more through the prescribed questions. Then he leaned over the desk, and said to her, "Now, look here; you've got your heart set on this thing, I see, but it's really no use for you to try. You say you've a job—well, stick to it, or if you've got a sweetheart, marry him. That's the life for you, I'm sure. Why do you want to be a missionary?"

Evidently it was the end. A little less springy than before was Martha's step as she went out; a shade duller her bright face. Low sang the voice in her heart: "God wants you to be a missionary."

THE next morning saw her silent and very busy. The night with its prayers had brought new faith. "Ask and ye shall receive," she knew she could trust the Speaker of those words.

Only two blocks away from Mrs. Bennett's house the great decennial Missionary Convention was meeting. From all quarters of the globe had come the delegates; bishops, and workers, and teachers; earnest, serious men, yet happy-looking, though in a different way from ordinary New Yorkers.

That night, instead of a general gathering, it was decided that they should attend local prayer-meetings. So in one of the big rooms on the Avenue could have been seen twenty or more of the delegates mingled with the usual attendants. Martha, who always went to the weekly prayer-meeting, did not suspect the identity of the group of men seated in front of her.

Of course, "Greenland's Icy Mountains" was given out, and Martha, raising her lovely voice, put into the old hymn all her sore disappointment, all her prayer, all her faith. At the end of it, two of the men turned squarely around and looked at her. Again they sang—"I am but a stranger here." After the meeting, the two who had noticed Martha spoke to her.

"Will you come and sing hymns to us all to-morrow night at—?" said one of them (naming one of the largest audience halls in New York).

The next evening, then, found her standing alone upon a great platform. Behind her sat the black-coated bishops presiding; and around and before, as far as she could see, almost, were rows and rows of people, all watching her.

But she was not afraid. God wanted her, evidently, to give pleasure by singing to this company. "From Greenland's Icy Mountains," and "Heaven is My Home," and then one more of the old hymns she sang. It was the end of the program, and when she had ceased twenty of the leading delegates crowded around her. "Will you come with me"—"and with me?" she heard.

"You can make more converts by your singing than I can by my preaching!" they said, one after another. "Your singing will send scores of missionaries to those distant lands," said another.

And so was Martha's faith rewarded.

EDITH A. TALBOT.

IT GOES WITH THE TURKEY

Just "fits in" as smoothly as if it was intended specially for your turkey-dinner.

Yet in fact Campbell's Tomato Soup goes just right with almost any meal. And it makes that meal more palatable and more inviting.

Use it for the children's luncheon or your own, or for the family supper any time. You can prepare it in many different ways. You can make it as light or as hearty as you choose.

It is always appetizing, always wholesome and nourishing. There is no labor nor fuss about it; no delay, no uncertainty. And you cannot serve it too often for your family's enjoyment and health. Have it again today. Why not?

21 kinds

10c a can

Asparagus
Beef
Bouillon
Celery
Chicken
Chicken-Gumbo (Okra)
Clam Bouillon

Clam Chowder
Consommé
Julienne
Mock Turtle
Mulligatawny
Mutton
Ox Tail

Pea
Pepper Pot
Printanier
Tomato
Tomato-Okra
Vegetable
Vermicelli-Tomato

Campbell's SOUPS

LOOK FOR THE RED-AND-WHITE LABEL

*"The Invo
$0*

Our recent announcement of this famous car at this price has created a profound sensation in the world of motoring. ¶ And rightly so, for this new refined, improved Reo the Fifth is the epitome of Reo engineering, Reo experience and Reo aspiration. ¶ Your Reo dealer will give you detailed specifications. ¶ When you've seen and ridden in this big, beautiful car you too will marvel at the value.

Reo Motor Car Company, Lansing, Mich.

"The New REO the Fifth"

The New REO the Fifth

Christmas is just around the corner

Dear old dad! You sometimes wonder what makes him so quiet or why he is so touchy. Every now and then he is so jolly you wish he would be like that oftener. Do you ever stop to think of the burden dad carries, business affairs, family responsibilities—bills, bills, bills? Yet when things do let up on him a little he just gets natural and boyish again.

Christmas is just around the corner. This year make it up to dad for some of the good times he's given you.

What kind of a watch has your dad? Unless he is well timed there is nothing under the sun that will please him more than a handsome, dependable, accurate watch.

Buy him an Elgin—a Lord Elgin, the aristocrat of the watch world. You can't buy anything finer in beauty or durability. It will cost you $100 to $115. A lot of money? That is why we are talking Christmas gifts now. Take time by the forelock; club your contributions together and give dad something worthy of him and worthy of you. There is no watch accuracy greater or more famous than Elgin accuracy, whether it is the elegant Lord Elgin or the more modest Wheeler movement.

ELGIN
Watches
KEEP TIME

ELGIN NATIONAL WATCH CO.
Elgin, Illinois

LORD ELGIN

Ask Your Engineer

Write for Elgin Booklet
—"Time Taking—Time Keeping." Send stamped and addressed envelope for set of Elgin Poster Stamps.

Rome in Quest of Learning

How Cardinal Gibbons's Dream of a Vast Catholic Educational Center is Being Realized

SOME of our Eastern papers have recently circulated news regarding efforts to centralize the work of higher education which the Roman Catholic Church is doing in its many colleges and universities in the United States and Canada, by making these schools units of the Catholic University of America at Brookland, D. C. It was reported, in particular, that the Society of Sulpician Priests, which conducts St. Charles's College at Baltimore and a theological seminary, "has purchased a large tract of land exactly opposite Gibbons Memorial Hall, a recently built part of the Catholic University, and it is understood, as soon as arrangements can be made, at least part of the student body of the seminary, most likely those young Levites who are in the philosophy classes, will be transferred to Brookland." Also Rock Hill College of Ellicott City, Md., conducted by the Christian Brothers, the Jesuit College at Woodstock, Md., and St. Mary's Seminary, with its annex, St. Joseph's, where priests are being prepared for work among the colored people, are reported to be on the verge of removal to Brookland.

This movement is in accord with the original plan and scope of the Catholic University.

The desire for this institution, which bids fair to become one of the most powerful educational organizations of our country, was first voiced at the Second Plenary Council at Baltimore, October, 1866. However, eighteen years passed before the first step could be taken to make the idea a reality. In 1884 Miss Mary Gwendoline Caldwell came forward with an offer of $300,000 for the new university. The offer was laid before the Third Plenary Council at Baltimore, which passed a resolution to found the university and accepted Miss Caldwell's gift.

From the beginning the ambition of the founders of the university seems to have been to make this the greatest and grandest Catholic school in the United States, not only as regards the number, size, and equipment of its various buildings and the number of its instructors and students, but also the greatest in authority and dignity. For, before even its first unit had begun to operate (the School of Sacred Sciences, opened in November, 1889), the direct, definite, and permanent interest of the Holy See in this school had been secured.

In 1887, Pope Leo XIII sanctioned the undertaking, and on March 7, 1889, the same Pope approved the constitution and statutes of the university. This was done by means of the Apostolic Letter, "Magni nobis gaudii." In this document, Leo XIII defines the scope of the university as follows: "To provide instruction in every department of learning to the end that the clergy and laity alike might have an opportunity to satisfy fully their laudable desire for knowledge." The document also empowered the university to grant the usual degrees. Two provisions, however, contained in this document are of special interest in view of the news we cited above: the seminaries, colleges, and other Catholic institutions already in existence in this country are urged to become affiliated to the university, and the Pope ordains that, without the approbation of the Holy See, no other university shall be founded in the United States. The Catholic University of America is now termed by Catholic writers "a pontifical institution," and declared to be "under the supreme authority of the Holy See."

THE name of Cardinal Gibbons is frequently connected with the Catholic University, also with the centralizing movement, which the papers call "the dream of Cardinal Gibbons." There is a practical reason for connecting the Cardinal with the university: he is the local governing head of the institution. "The governing power resides in the episcopate of the United States, and by their delegation in the board of trustees, composed of bishops, priests, and laymen. The President of the Board is the Chancellor of the University, and this office is held by the Archbishop of Baltimore ex officio."

The movement to group around the university the other important organizations which pursue the work of higher education in the American Catholic Church began in the year when the university was opened. The Paulist Fathers in 1889 established St. Thomas College, in close proximity to the university. They were followed in 1891 by the Marists with their Marist College; in 1895 by the Congregation of the Holy Cross, who founded Holy Cross College; in 1897 by the Franciscans, who established the College of the Holy Land; in 1901 by the Sulpicians with their St. Austin's College; in 1902 by the Catholic Mission with the Apostolic Mission House, and in 1903 by the Dominicans, who established the College of the Immaculate Conception. The orders which have established schools in connection with the university connect with the university in this way; that their matriculated students, or novitiates, pursue the common studies at their colleges, while they take their advanced courses at the university.

The affiliating process, however, has begun to extend beyond the confines of the city of Washington and the District of Columbia. We know at least of two institutions at a distance from Washington that are affiliated to the Catholic University: St. Paul Seminary of St. Paul, Minn., and the Institute of Scientific Study of New York. Besides, the university has taken an active part in the organization and proceedings of the Catholic Educational Association, which aims, among other things, at the unification of Catholic educational work in our country.

THERE is not a place in our country which offers such advantages to a school of the character and with the aspirations of the Catholic University as our national capital. Catholics have not been slow to observe and appreciate this fact. E. I. Devitt, Professor of Psychology in the Catholic University of Georgetown, wrote in 1912:

"Washington is well supplied with institutions for higher education, offers extraordinary advantages for scientific and literary labor and research, and possesses an unparalleled educational equipment in the great scientific collections and libraries of the government. By authority of Congress, all such facilities for research and information are made accessible to students of institutions of high learning in the District. This provision applies to the Library of Congress, the National Museum, the Patent Office, the Bureau of Education, the Bureau of Ethnology, the Army Medical Museum, the Department of Agriculture, the Fish Commission, the Botanical Gardens, the Coast and Geodetic Survey, the Naval Observatory, several hospitals and other departments supplied with special libraries, laboratories, and equipment for research. The Library of Congress contains 1,100,000 volumes; Surgeon General's Office, 140,639; National Museum, 16,000; Museum of Hygiene, 10,500; Bureau of Ethnology, 5,000; Bureau of Education, 30,000; Department of Agriculture, 25,000. The Law Library of the United States Capitol contains over 100,000 volumes and is free to students seven hours daily.

"Washington presents advantages for the study of American jurisprudence which are unequaled elsewhere, and must remain so. Congress, the Court of Claims, the Supreme Court of the United States, and the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, are in session during several months of each scholastic year, and with the executive departments, the Patent, Pension, and General Land Offices, furnish advantages for professional study nowhere else enjoyed." The same authority informs us that the law school of Georgetown University (Catholic) in 1911 had enrolled 959 students, "the largest registration of any law school in the United States."

There lies in the facts enumerated by Mr. Devitt a convincing force so great that they cannot fail, when published to attract to the Catholic University the cream and the bulk of the Catholic youth of the country who are in quest of literary or scientific attainment, at the choicest portion of the learned men of the Catholic Church. The Catholic University is steadily and quietly increasing its influence. The reports to which we referred at the end of this article speak of much secret in which the centralization movements are veiled. Enough, however, becomes known as opportunities ripen, to indicate the wisely directed and systematized efforts of Catholic educators to lead themselves to the fullest extent of every advantage that is offered to education at the seat of our government.

These advantages are open to all. It is necessary that others beside the Catholics lay hold of them and utilize them as well and better.

W. H. T. D.

Through the Door of Hope

ONE night a young girl was riding down Fourteenth Street, with her face rigidly set, and a determination in her heart to seek the river as quickly as possible and put an end to her wretched life. The singing of the zealous Salvation Army workers adding a street service attracted her attention. A mysterious power suddenly so controlled her steps that she tried to hear the brief message. After the singing an earnest plea was made to the listeners to enter the hall, and she followed, hardly realizing what she was doing. Looking around the hall with some confusion, she was about to make a hasty retreat and carry out her original purpose, when again through the influence of music she was held. Before the meeting closed, with sobs and a great longing asserted in her heart that something might be accomplished in her life, and it ended in her consenting to go home with the young lady officer, who became deeply interested in her. Two days after his officer informed me that the awful girl had mastered the girl again. I invited the poor girl to come to the Door of Hope as my guest. This she did, and it was not very long before she gave her heart to the Lord and afterwards did us something of her story.

Her father was a minister some distance from New York, her mother a very godly woman. But, under weak influence, she ran away from her breaking her parents' hearts. At a brief space of time her eyes were opened, as is the case with thousands of others. Illness followed, and it was through that illness that the morphine habit fastened itself upon her to such an extent that she finally decided there was but one thing to do—die.

After coming to us the battle a few days was hard, but she opened her heart day by day to the mysterious working of God's Holy Spirit. A few months passed, and her growth in grace was very noticeable to all. We wrote to her parents, and she was received by them with gladness and love. She has since become a helper to others.

MRS. E. M. WHITTEMORE,

President.

A Cry from China

LITTLE HAI IEH TSI (the "Aged Leaf"): a Story of Childhood and its Perils in Heathen China. All who are interested in sweet and innocent childhood will find this a fascinating story. A postcard addressed to "China Orphans, Christian Herald, Bible House, New York," will get you free copies of this illustrated booklet.

The way to a Man's Heart

RICE'S "TROIPIKID" says it's through better baking. Therefore, use Dr. Price's Vanilla Extract because it is made from the finest Mexican vanilla bean. It's pure.

Long aging in wood gives it remarkable strength. Tones down the flavor to a rare mellowness.

Look for Price's "Tropikid" on Label

DR. PRICE'S
DELICIOUS
FLAVORING EXTRACT
VANILLA

Not an imitation compound, but a pure vanilla-bean extract. Does not cake out or freeze out. Is not reinforced with either artificial vanillin, coumarin or coal-tar preparations and does not contain any tonka (snuff) beans.

We Make All Popular Flavors

15¢ 25¢ 35¢ & up

PRICE FLAVORING
EXTRACT COMPANY
CHICAGO, ILL.

in Business 63 Years

Send Tropikid cut from extract carton and 2c stamp for handsome book of new delicious recipes, "The Way to a Man's Heart," and information how to secure "Tropikid" suit for your boy.

Also Makers of Price's Jelly Dessert

"Packed Expressly"

By LOUIS E. ORCUTT

WILLIAM BROWN was considered a good merchant. His stock was clean, in good variety, and he prided himself on the quality of his offerings. He had the confidence of his trade and the best trade of his town, and had even been suggested as a candidate for mayor. Into this happy situation there injected himself, one morning in midsummer, the representative of a manufacturer unknown to William Brown.

He introduced himself as Philip Morgan Jones, general western agent for the Climax Canning Company, and asked for just fifteen minutes in which to show Mr. Brown how to do more business at a larger profit. Mr. Brown had learned that it paid to hear every man's story, so he left an invoice he was checking and went with Mr. Jones to the front of his store.

While opening his samples Mr. Jones dilated upon the merits of Climax goods, incidentally comparing them with several standard, advertised brands which were displayed on Mr. Brown's shelves. The comparison was not unfavorable to Climax goods. Mr. Brown was beginning to dislike the man, yet there were occasional statements as to rates of profit which caught his ear. He had been figuring the rate of profit on his business for several years, and it had been steadily declining. When the display was complete Mr. Jones opened a jar of strawberry preserves and offered Mr. Brown a sample.

"Ever taste anything better, Mr. Brown? Real berries, sir. Grown specially for us; ripened on the vine and put up the day they are picked. Just enough preservative to prevent spoiling after they are opened."

"The brand I have now has no preservative; the manufacturer says clean methods make it unnecessary."

"That is advertising. No methods could be cleaner than ours. Those goods must be consumed at once after opening. Our goods can be used up naturally and will keep until the last taste. Our preservative has been found harmless by the United States Department of Agriculture."

"I have always preferred to handle goods that required no explanation."

"Explanation! This isn't an explanation; it is a selling argument. Now, Mr. Brown, do you make over 15 per cent. on that brand you handle?"

"No, not quite that."

"There you are. Can you run your business on less than 15 per cent. profit? You make 25 per cent. on these goods. They are put up under your own name, and every jar advertises only William Brown. How do we do it? We cut out the expensive advertising campaign and add the cost of it to your profit. Who pays for all these national campaigns? You can be sure the advertiser doesn't. If he doesn't, you do. They say it makes business and a lot of merchants hand out the goods and think they're making money. Every one is losing. How do I prove it? Average profit on these big lines is under 15 per cent.; average merchant's cost of doing business is over 20 per cent. There's your answer. What is your cost, Mr. Brown? Pardon me for seeming inquisitive."

"Oh, that's all right, it's no secret. Our cost last year was 13 1/2 per cent. on a business of $22,000. So far this year it has been 12 3/4 per cent. on a little over $12,000."

"Does that include your salary?"

"Why, no. Of course not. I'm the owner."

"How much would your cost figure if you added in your own withdrawals? Unless your profits would pay an employed man for the same work, you are losing money."

"I can't tell exactly, but it would add between six and eight per cent."

"There you are, and you are selling goods that only yield you fifteen per cent."

The rest of Mr. Jones's selling argument is immaterial. William Brown placed the largest order of his career for canned goods, and began an active search for other goods that he could sell in competition with the better known brands at a larger gross profit for the store. He found a great deal of creditable merchandise, and became really enthusiastic over his own brand.

BY the early days of October the displays in William Brown's store presented a marked contrast to those of midsummer. Few advertised articles were in sight. Everywhere the eye met the caption, "Packed expressly for William Brown." If you desired a well-known brand you had to ask for it. If you merely asked for crackers, you got crackers, but the imprint was unknown. The crackers were frequently good, however. One thing Mr. Brown had not considered. It takes time to execute a perfect piece of salesmanship. He found it necessary to add another clerk. Another thing he had not considered: the psychology of taste. He did not yet know that a widely advertised article always tastes better to the customer than an unknown brand. He found it out about Thanksgiving time. One of his best customers had ordered the old brand of strawberry preserves and had received a jar, "Packed Expressly for William Brown." She came back with it as quickly as gasoline could bring her, and confronted the bewildered merchant. She would not listen to explanations, but turned on her heel, declaring that she could taste the preservative, and left him tongue-tied. Moreover, after this occasion her telephone line remained silent, as far as Brown's store was concerned.

Nor was she the only one. Brown had been so busy selling his own branded goods that he had had little time to figure; but when it came time to send out the usual holiday cards to his trade, he was surprised to find that some old accounts had been closed or were now running to rather small balances. This set him to figuring. He kept at it nearly all of two nights. The third morning he had completed the record for the five months and found to his amazement that he had done $2,000 less business than he had expected to do and that his cost of doing business had increased more than five per cent. His net profit for the five months was less than for any similar time in seven years. He could not believe the figures. What was wrong? His store door opened and two men entered. He recognized one of the men as Robert Manning, salesman for the brand of canned goods supplanted by those "packed expressly, etc."

Manning introduced the other man as his sales manager and said they had come to find out what had happened to the store of William Brown. Mr. Brown replied that that was just what he had been wondering himself; and he showed them the figures that had so puzzled him.

"Got you going on that old gag about gross profits and the cost of doing business, didn't they, Mr. Brown?" queried the sales manager. "That fellow who sold those Climax goods was a smooth one. We've been running across his trail everywhere. Has he been back?"

"No: I believe he is due next month."

"Well, don't look for him. I don't believe he will get this far. However, to business. Regardless of our advertising, Mr. Brown, if we fail to get our goods on the dealer's shelves we fail completely."

"Why don't you give him a decent profit, then? It costs me nearly twice my rate of profit on your goods to do business."

"Yes, that may be, but did you ever consider what it costs to sell individual lines? Never thought of that, did you? You sell sugar at nearly cost, yet it costs you almost nothing to sell it. You lose money on sugar, I'll grant that. That, however, is only an illustration. You make nearly one hundred per cent. profit on some goods. How much does it cost to sell them, counting interest on the money invested while they stay on your shelves? Costs almost the one hundred per cent. on some of them, doesn't it?"

"I don't know. I have no way of

What Fels-Naptha Did for Five Women

Mrs. Wideawake

she was able to buy a vacuum cleaner.

Mrs. Anxious

was worn out and sick all the time. Starting with washday everything went wrong and her work piled up. Now she uses Fels-Naptha Soap, starts her washing after breakfast, finishes it long before noon, gets all her work done quickly and easily, and has time every day for rest and pleasure.

Mrs. Youngmother

worried over the expense of the baby's woolens. They shrunk and got hard after a few washings. But now they are as soft, white and woolly as when new, and last much longer because she washes them with Fels-Naptha Soap which does not shrink or harden them.

Mrs. Muchpleased

spilled some furniture oil on her new rug. She was afraid it would cost her a lot to have it cleaned, but a friend advised her to try Fels-Naptha Soap. She used it according to directions; every trace of grease came out of her rug, leaving it like new, and saving her the cost of professional cleaning.

Mrs. Sensible

finished her housecleaning this year in less than half the time it used to take—washing curtains and all. She used Fels-Naptha Soap for all the soap-and-water work and was surprised and delighted with the easy, quick way the work got done.

The Reason? Fels-Naptha Soap really contains naphtha and other wonderful cleansers, which stay in the soap until it comes in contact with water. Then the cleansers get busy on the dirt and make it disappear. Clothes soaked with Fels-Naptha do not need hard-rubbing—only a few light rubs and rinsing. It does all your soap-and-water housework with less effort on your part and in much less time.

Fels & Co., Philadelphia

Gold Dust makes pans look so new That they gleam as mirrors do.

GOLD DUST, the active cleaner, is inexpensive.

Its activity begins the moment it is applied to any article that requires cleaning.

It cleans everything from kitchen utensils to the finest woodwork, without scratching or marring.

Follow the simple directions on every package of Gold Dust.

THE N. K. FAIRBANK COMPANY
MAKERS

The Active Cleaner

GOLD DUST

5c and larger packages for sale everywhere

Crooked Spines Made Straight

by the Sheldon Method

Thousands of Remarkable Cases

An old lady, 72 years of age who suffered for many years and was absolutely helpless, found relief thru the Sheldon Method. A man who was helpless, unable to rise from his chair, was riding horseback and playing tennis within a year. A little child, paralyzed, was playing about the house after wearing a Sheldon Appliance 3 weeks. We have successfully treated more than 20,000 cases in the past 14 years.

30 Days' Trial At Our Risk

We will prove its value in your own case. There is no reason why you should not accept our offer. The photographs show how light, cool, elastic and easily adjustable the Sheldon Appliance is—how different from the old torturous plaster, leather or steel jackets.

Every sufferer with a weakened or deformed spine owes it to himself to investigate thoroughly. Price within reach of all.

Send for Our Free Book If you will describe the case it will aid us in giving you definite information at once.

PHILO BURT MFG. CO.
207 11th Street, Jamestown, N. Y.

THE guarantee to refund your money if your Church Envelopes are wrong, anybody can make. The only guarantee worth having is that you won't want your money refunded.

FREE—A Duplex Envelope Opener, for the name and address of your Treasurer and S. S. Supt. Saves time and trouble.

ADDRESS DESK 1
DUPLIX
RICHMOND, VA.
(ARCHER G. JONES)

figuring the cost of selling any single item."

"Probably not, yet you must realize that your selling cost is an average, just as the net profit is an average; some items yielded more than their share of cost, and others yielded more than their share of profit. You've just discovered that it has cost you more, in proportion, to sell goods under your own brand and has realized you less net profit than when you were pushing advertised brands. You say you can't figure it out. Now I'll tell you something. When you sell a woman our goods you haven't spent five, ten or fifteen minutes creating a demand for them. She comes into your store with the demand already created. She asks for our goods, or if not, and you suggest them, she knows at once the quality offered her, and you take her order and pass to the next customer. It's all over in the length of time it takes you to write the order down. How long does it usually take you to sell these other goods?"

"Sometimes it takes quite a while, and sometimes I don't sell them."

"Exactly. In spite of your business reputation a good many women don't consider your judgment good against the advertisement in a reputable magazine. We can't explain that fact; but we can and do profit by it, and so may you."

"But some of the goods I have under my own brand are very much better goods than the better-known brands. There are a number of items on which I am building up a growing trade."

"Very good. There is no harm, in fact there is good business reason for selling good merchandise as your own brand. The idea is good; but it takes a long while to find the items and a longer time to gain public confidence in them. How long do you suppose it took our advertising to bring us the full confidence of the public? It took us nearly ten years of constant advertising to prove our case, then in one or two years our business doubled and doubled again; we had arrived. When you put our goods on the front of your shelves you merely take advantage of that ten years' fight for confidence. More than half the cost of selling those goods has been paid by us. That is one reason why your gross profit is less on our goods than on unknown brands. Another and the principal reason is that we have to back up our advertising with a quality that will satisfy the person who gets the most favorable impression from the ads. We can't afford to disappoint one buyer. That quality costs money and reduces both our rate of profit and yours. We both more than make it up in gross sales. It is better to sell $30 worth at fifteen per cent. profit than $10 worth at thirty per cent. profit, the cost of selling being the same. Any way you look at it, it pays to take advantage of the business created by advertising. The cost of selling any reputable, advertised article is less than the profit you make on it. If people know they can find standard goods in your store and that you will not send substitutes, they will come to your store; and while they are there they will buy not only the goods that are known through advertising, but all those other staple articles and fancy goods which make up your stock and contribute a large percentage of your net profit. If they feel that you will attempt to sell them inferior or unknown brands they will stay away and you won't sell them anything."

"That is just what I have discovered; they are staying away."

It is not necessary to follow the conversation further. William Brown was a good merchant; and if you should happen into his store today you would find his shelves a fair index of the advertising columns of any one of the big magazines; you would see as well an occasional label marked "Packed Expressly for William Brown," and the clerk who waited on you would call your attention to these lines. Business is good in the store, and over in the savings bank there is a snug sum that has been "packed expressly for William Brown."

TURN OVER TIME

When Nature Hints About the Food.

When there's no relish to food and that one eats doesn't seem to do any good then is the time to make a turnover in the diet, for that's Nature's way of dropping a hint that the food isn't the food required.

"For a number of years I followed hard road work, much of it being office work of a trying nature. Meal times were irksome; and eating too much and so quickly of food such as is commonly served in hotels and restaurants, together with the sedentary habits, were not at all in giving me dyspepsia and stomach trouble which reduced my weight from 205 to 160 pounds.

"There was little relish in any food and none of it seemed to do me any good. It seemed the more I ate the poorer I felt and was always hungry before another meal, no matter how much I had eaten. Then I commenced a trial of Gran-Nuts food, and was surprised how a small saucer of it would carry me along, strong and with satisfied appetite, until the next meal, with no sensations of hunger, weakness or distress as before.

"I have been following this diet now for several months and my improvement has been so great all the others in my family have taken up the use of Gran-Nuts with complete satisfaction and marked improvement in health.

"Americans eat hurriedly, have lots of worry, thus hindering digestion and therefore need a food that is predigested and concentrated in nourishment."

"There's a Reason."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

Christian Herald Prayer League

A MOTHER writes from Wise, Va.: "I want to acknowledge answer to a request for a revival in Wise which I sent to the Prayer League some time ago. Oh, how God did pour out his Holy Spirit upon us! I want to give him all the praise and glory." A Reader, Bogard, Mo., writes: "About a month ago I sent a request for the prayers of the League for a revival in progress in the Bogard Baptist Church. I wish to acknowledge that the power of God was evident in the saving of souls." From Lebanon, N. J., Mrs. W. B. H. writes: "I want to acknowledge the answer to prayer for the conversion of a dear son." D. W. DeL. writes from Wheaton, Ill.: "I have a son now past fifty years of age who has for many years led a sinful life, but has recently been converted in answer to my prayer and that of others who have joined me." "Some time ago I wrote you asking you to pray for my son-in-law," writes W. B., Gilboa, N. Y., "that he might be led to Christ and healed of his trouble. Since then he has found the Lord, been baptized and united with the church." Mrs. G. E. C. writes to say: "One of my prayers has been answered. My little granddaughter has given her heart to Jesus." A Happy Mother, Garden, Ill., writes: "Some months ago I requested the prayers of the Prayer League that my son might be saved from the drink habit. I am thankful to say that for two or three months he has not used any liquor." A Reader, Montana, writes: "Several months ago I requested the prayers of the League that I might be restored to complete health after a severe operation. I am very grateful to God that our prayers have been answered. I am now perfectly well."

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS of answered prayer have also been received from A Reader, Nashville, Tenn.; Mrs. W. M., North Lake, Wis.; Mrs. M. E. F., Troy, N. Y. (for bringing husband safely through a serious operation); M. K., Allentown, Pa.; Mrs. F. B. H., Delia, Kan.; E. B., Gloversville, N. Y.; Mrs. C., Charlotte Hall, Md.; A Reader, Boulder, Colo.; M., Wilkinsburg, Pa.; Reader, Wayne, Ala.; Mrs. A. J. T., Ainsworth, Neb.; Mrs. G. P. R., Akron, Ohio; F. P., East Orange, N. J.; J. R. B., Dunn, N. C.; A Subscriber, Emerson, Neb.; J. H. N., Chicago, Ill.; Mrs. M. K., Oshkosh, Wis.; D. B. S., Myndus, Va.; Reader, S. C.; A Believer in Prayer, Richwood, Ohio; M. E. S., Indiana, Pa.; A Friend, Mrs. L. C., Ocean Grove, N. J.

Prayers are asked for revivals of religion at Dawson, Ill., Aleddo, Ill.; Killinger, Pa.; Baraboo, Wis.; Wise, Va.; Columbiaville, Mich.; Bidwell, Iowa; Delevan, N. Y. (for evangelistic services now in progress); Cleo, Okla.; South St. Paul, Minn.; Nashville, Tenn.; Van Wert, Ohio; Fishersville, Va.; Bogard, Mo.; Syracuse, N. Y. (for the success of the Billy Sunday campaign beginning October 24). M. F. J. asks prayers that the voters in Lawrence County, Pa., may elect a dry judge; C. P. N., that temperance may win a victory in coming election in New Castle, Pa.; H. G. J. and Wife, Henderson, Ky., that the state of Kentucky may be voted dry. B. R., Canada, asks prayer that they may have an earnest minister who will conduct meetings; Mrs. E. F. G., South St. Paul, Minn., that they may secure money to build a church.

A Relative requests prayer that mother's mind may be restored; Mrs. L. K. F., a brother's; E. S. F. and B. L. C., their sisters'; A. S., a nephew's; A Believer, an aged lady's. Thirteen other friends ask prayer for mental restoration or strengthening for themselves or other friends.

C. J. S., A Relative, L. F., and A. S. ask prayer that their mothers' sight may be restored; Mrs. J. B. W., her husband's; M. E. M., and Mrs. C. H. S., their sisters'; Mrs. D. J. M., that husband's sight may be strengthened. Ten other friends ask prayer for the

"I Now Hear Clearly"

Mr. Garrett Brown (photo above) is but one of the 200,000 deaf people whom the Acousticon has enabled to hear clearly and usefully. This makes us feel so certain of its efficiency that we will gladly send to every deaf person, simply on request, our new

1916 ACOUSTICON FOR FREE TRIAL
No Deposit—No Expense

Just say that you are deaf and will try the Acousticon, and the trial will not cost you one cent, as we even pay delivery charges.

WARNING! There is no good reason why everyone who is deaf should not make as liberal a trial offer as we do, so do not send money for any instrument for the deaf until you have tried it.

We most sincerely state that we do not want one cent of your money if you cannot hear; that's the reason we want you to try the Acousticon first and convince yourself—you alone to decide. Just write today for your absolutely free trial and interesting particulars.

GENERAL ACOUSTIC CO., 1314 Candler Bldg., New York
Toronto, Ont., Royal Bank Bldg.

George Frost Co. Boston

oration or strengthening of sight themselves or other friends. Twenty-nine friends ask prayer for deeper work of grace, assurance of forgiveness, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing. Mrs. E. G. asks prayer that husband and three sons may be saved from the risky habit; eleven parents ask prayer that sons may be delivered from this habit; Mrs. M. R. R., Mrs. K. E. S., Mrs. C. C. and L. F., their brothers; Mrs. R. K. M., her husband. Four other friends ask prayer that friends or relatives may be delivered from the bad habit.

An Anxious Mother asks prayer that her son may be delivered from false doctrines. Fifteen other parents ask prayer for the conversion of sons; ten wives, for the conversion of their husbands. Thirty-nine other readers ask prayer for the conversion of other relatives and friends.

A Universal Text Book

IN the autumn of 1903 the writer had been speaking to the students at West Point relative to the student Bible study movement in America. A conference of the cadets followed at which the leading ranking student of the Academy said: "The cadets of West Point know comparatively little concerning the English Bible. The students of North America are planning to increase twofold the number of men studying this Book this year. We in at West Point should have a part in it. It will have a part in this enterprise." In less than two weeks 200 cadets are enrolled in Bible classes in West Point. This number has been maintained and steadily increased year by year until at present there are upward of 300 students now engaged in weekly study and discussion of the Bible at the United States Military Academy. The work is carried on under the leadership of the Young Men's Christian Association, and the chaplain and members of the faculty assist.

Colonel Larned, the late dean of the West Point faculty, speaking of this work, said: "I am inclined to believe that this student uprising for the study of the Bible is one of the most profitable and strategic movements of our times."

WHERE are 500,000 young men and young women enrolled in organized Bible classes in the churches of the United States; somewhat over 10,000 college students were reported in voluntary Bible classes in the colleges last season; and the Sunday schools of the world report yearly more than twenty-five million persons representing fifty nationalities who are engaged in Bible study on Sundays. In a letter recently received from Dr. Booker T. Washington, Tuskegee, we learned that somewhat over 800 of the colored students of that institution were engaged in voluntary study in the Bible, coming together once and sometimes twice a week in this study, the classes being taught by the instructors.

TO present the Christian Scriptures in all languages and dialects, and the average circulation yearly is 19,000,000 copies. At the close of the Boxer uprising in China it was said that this would put an end to the publishing of the Bible in the Middle Kingdom. The following year, however, 428,000 Bibles were sold and distributed in China. The work of Bible societies has steadily increased in China during the last five years. Twenty-seven Bible societies are printing the Bible; one in the United States, three in Great Britain, and twenty-three on the European Continent. It was estimated that more copies of the Bible were sold last year in any hundred books of the world than ten together.

WE were walking through the apartments of his excellency, Mr. Bhabha, the prime minister of the Government of Baroda, about two years ago, and noticed an open Bible on a table at the head of the prime minister's bed. I asked why he, a devout Hindu, was interested in the Bible. He replied, "I spend a half hour each day reading this book along with the sacred books of Hinduism. I have found it one of the greatest influences in developing my intellectual as well as my spiritual life. You may be interested to know," he continued, "that the educated men of India know the Bible as a rule quite as well as they know any one of their own sacred classics."

Eleven readers ask prayer for special spiritual blessing for relatives or friends. Seventy-three friends ask prayer for the healing of relatives or friends, including one that a brother and sister may regain the use of limbs. Forty-nine friends ask prayer for the healing of themselves, including one that voice may be restored and another that she may be cured of stammering.

M. C. and A. S. ask prayer for the healing of mothers' hearing. Five other friends ask prayer for the healing of hearing for themselves or other friends.

Forty-five readers ask prayer for help or guidance in financial affairs.

Sixty friends ask prayer for the granting of varied desires and needs, including two parents who ask that they may learn of the whereabouts of their lost sons; and another that he may hear from a lost brother.

plied, "I spend a half hour each day reading this book along with the sacred books of Hinduism. I have found it one of the greatest influences in developing my intellectual as well as my spiritual life. You may be interested to know," he continued, "that the educated men of India know the Bible as a rule quite as well as they know any one of their own sacred classics."

AT the edge of the Sahara desert, near old Biskra, we were interested in a long camel caravan carrying huge packages and evidently starting upon a long journey into the desert. I asked what they were carrying, and was told that they were transporting 2,000 copies of the New Testament, translated into Arabic, into the desert country. These Gospels were purchased by the Moslems at two cents apiece and were the means of bringing to many a desert nomad the first real knowledge of this text book of Christianity.

IN Assiut College in Egypt we found that virtually the entire student body engaged in voluntary Bible study for a full hour each morning. These students (nearly 400) were most of them Copts and followed the Oriental habit of studying aloud, walking back and forth in the student quadrangle with their Bibles in their hands.

IN one of the Japanese universities which was visited not long ago by the writer, there was sold in a short space of time on the campus 300 Bibles to Japanese students. These students were Buddhists, Shintoists and Confucianists, while a good number of them professed to be agnostics; yet they were interested in trying to find out the meaning of Christianity.

THIS desire of the Oriental student to really discover the significance of the Christian faith was exemplified by the Chinese student who said that he was spending six months in the study of the Bible to find out whether he could or could not become a Christian. He said, "I cannot tell yet because I have not read far enough to find out for myself what it really means to be Christian according to the Bible."

SHORTLY before the death of the late Senator J. P. Dolliver, Iowa, I asked him what he considered to be the greatest present need of American life. He replied, "The greatest need of our people is a new dynamic which will touch the inner springs of religious activity; it is not merely ethical or political reformation which we need, but a revival of religion, and this revival will find its springs in the Gospel of Jesus."

THE spirit of the Bible depends largely upon having the right point of view in approaching it. As Robert Louis Stevenson said: "We should learn to read the Bible as though we were reading it for the first time, to find out its particular message for us." One great Bible teacher required his students to answer this question for each passage: "What does it actually say?"

CLAYTON SEDGWICK COOPER.

Sis Was Trapped—but Pyrene Saved Her

I tumbled out of bed when I heard Sis scream. Her room was afire. The doorway was blazing. She was trapped.

Mother and Father were away. I ran for the Pyrene Fire Extinguisher that hung by the 'phone. Father had showed me how to use it.

With a few pumps most of the fire was smothered and Sis escaped from her room. A few more pumps and the fire was out. Goodness! I hate to think what might have happened that night without Pyrene.

Write for booklet "The Vital Five Minutes"

A Pyrene put on your automobile saves 15% on your car insurance.

There are thousands of Pyrenes used in factories, schools, churches, theatres, etc.

Inspected, Approved and Labeled by The Underwriters' Laboratories, Inc.

PYRENE MANUFACTURING COMPANY
52 Vanderbilt Avenue New York City

Branches in 41 Cities

The Pyrene Co., Ltd., 19-21 Great Queen Street, London, W. C.

The Jeffery Four

STANDARD
SEVEN-PASSENGER $1035
F.O.B. Kenosha, Wis.

WITHOUT AUXILIARY SEATS
$1000
F.O.B. Kenosha, Wis.

Thousands of people paid $1550 for the original Jeffery Four—and gained a new conception of motor car quality, comfort, economy and efficiency. Today, in the new Jeffery Four, you are offered a still finer car—for $1000.

Body, standard seven-passenger Chesterfield type • Front seats, divided • Driver's seat, adjustable • Upholstery, deep real leather • Shipping weight, 2750 pounds • Motor, Jeffery high-speed high efficiency • Ignition, Bosch magneto • Starting and lighting system, Bijur electric • Equipment, complete • Entire car 93% Jeffery-built.

"AMERICA'S STANDARD AUTOMOBILE AT A $1000 PRICE"

The Jeffery Six, $1650
108
Kenosha, Wisconsin

The Thomas B. Jeffery Company
Main Office and Works • Kenosha, Wisconsin

The Jeffery Four Roadster
Seven-Passenger $1000
F.O.B. Kenosha, Wis.

Jonah a Missionary to Nineveh

International Sunday School Lesson for November 21.

Jonah 3:1—4:11

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By REV. F. B. MEYER, D.D.

"Go ye therefore." Matt. 28:19, 20.

There are four Alls in the Lord's great parting commission. "All power." What a majestic claim! But it is true. All power was his originally as the only-begotten Son of the Father—his Fellow and Equal; but he won all power to be the Mediator, Priest, Brother, and King of men, because he became obedient to the death of the cross. Our David hath slain Goliath and wields his sword. Satan promised him all authority if he would do him homage, but not thus would he become the crowned King of the world. "Thou art worthy to take the book, for thou wast slain." "All nations." Like the corn-plant, the Gospel will take root and grow on every soil and beneath every sky. All men, wise and foolish, civilized and savage, are made on the same principle, and the Gospel like a master key fits every lock. "All things." There are no secrets in the family of God. All faithful and loving souls may be initiated into the deep things of the Kingdom. All our Lord's commands must be promulgated and obeyed. "All the days." "For years ago," said a great missionary, "I landed on the shores of China. I have done very little there, but I have received very much, and I have learned to know something of my heavenly Father. It is worth while going to the ends of the earth to get near to that great heart of love. And the Almighty arm is linked with that heart, for when the heart moves, the hand always moves."

The Man Who Ran Away

By Arthur H. Howland

POOR Jonah has had more than his share of discussion. A little wholesome jesting may not be out of place in the Sunday school, and I like that story of the young woman Salvation Army officer of whom a heckling objector asked an opinion about Jonah. Did she, he urged, really believe the whale swallowed the prophet? "Well," she replied, "I've often thought about that, and I've made up my mind that when I find Jonah in heaven I'm going to ask him about it."

"But suppose he isn't there," the man insisted.

"Oh," said the girl quickly, "in that case you can ask him."

So far as the existence of a fish big enough to swallow him goes, science has a plain enough answer about that. Dr. Peloubet and Dr. Wells have brought together in their published notes on this lesson two striking testimonials. A diagram is reproduced from the Scientific American showing a man standing up, straight and comfortable, in the mouth of an eighty-foot shark, with apparently about 12 inches headway, and the statement is quoted from the Scientific American that "the jaws are sufficient size, opened up, to allow five or six men to walk abreast right into the mouth." Professor George McCloskie of Princeton University is quoted from the New York Independent of February, 1912, as saying that the word rendered "belly" means not stomach, but any cavity or sac in the body, such as is found in the sperm whale of the Mediterranean. He says: "The whale's air chamber is as large as an ordinary bedroom, extending from chin to chest, so as to make the neck bulge in front with a thick muscular wall which is sometimes wrinkled in front, and with an entrance from the windpipe large enough to admit any modern prophet who ventured that way. There has been some mystery as to how the mother whale manages to shelter her young during tempestuous weather at sea. In medieval times it was reported that the young found refuge in air-chambers close to the mouth of the mother. Abbé Grosin informs us that whales can take in two of their young when weak. Hence we may infer that Jonah's presence would not greatly incommode the animal. The blowing of the whale, and its habit of coughing when stranded, may help the exit of its guests."

But while this may be, at least for the younger pupils, the most interesting part of the story of Jonah, it is clearly the least important. If any Bible students feel more comfortable in believing that the whole story of Jonah is a skillful, powerful and beautiful bit of Jewish fiction, and that when Jesus referred to it he was doing so as any speaker today would refer to King Arthur, or Faust, or Parsifal, they may hold this view of the case and still retain the tremendous spiritual truths of the whole narrative.

BUT Jonah has not only had to submit to a lot of controversy about his experience with the whale. People are at a loss whether to think of him as the man who ran away or the man who ran at length and did as he was told. In the story of the noble missionary no fearless prophet is spoiled by the pique of the churl, angry because the reluctance of the people had spoiled his prophecy.

But for the real meat of this Jonah narrative. First, the hopelessness of trying to get away from God—and the misery of it. We don't have to go back to ancient history or to legend to know how grievous and perilous a thing it is for a man—or a woman, or a child—to try to run away from God. On millions of pillows every night weary heads are resting, tired with the struggle of trying to disobey God; and upon these countless beds sad, heavy hearts are lying hopelessly to find the comfort in disobedience that only obedience can bring.

Jonah got his second chance to cry, "The word of the Lord came to Jonah the second time, saying . . ." Sang what? Precisely the same thing he voice had said years or months before: "Arise, go into Nineveh, that great city, and preach unto it the preaching that I bid thee."

This time he obeyed. He went and preached—preached faithfully and literally the word he had received; and a whole city turned to God.

Bring into the lesson some of the recent good tidings from the foreign field showing how in heathen lands too people are repenting and receiving illumination. Read the paragraphs about Sherwood Eddy's wonderful tour of China in the Christian Herald for October 13, page 1038; also the article "Triumphs of the Cross," in the issue of September 1, page 859. Notice especially Mr. Oreuti's article in the Christian Herald of October 27, about the present campaign in America of the Laymen's Missionary Movement.

The best news of all is coming from China and India. In India thousands of natives are asking for Christian baptism and there are not missionaries enough to instruct and baptize them. We should not forget the tormented Armenians while studying this missionary lesson. They are fellow Christians exposed to torture and death by their enemies. Multitudes of them have been slain; many have endured untold horrors; many now are in dire want.

But, after all, the main issue of this Jonah-missionary lesson is "What are you going to do about it?" Have you heard God's call to help? Are you running away, or are you running toward your Nineveh with God's message upon your lips? Maybe God was calling you on the foreign field. If he does, he surely does want your gifts and your prayers and your work for the cause of missions. He has some definite Nineveh to which he will direct you if you will listen. It may be after all the town you live in, the office you work in—somewhere he has a word for you to save a group of souls for you to help.

Don't run away. Don't close your ears to God's message nor your lips to its utterance again. Jonah's Nineveh lapsed again into sin—sinned horribly and deeply—and it was destroyed.

Get Wholesale Prices

We Pay the Freight and Ship Within 24 Hours

on stoves, ranges, base-burners, cook stoves, gas stoves, etc., from Kalamazoo factory.

WRITE for 1916 catalog—see new styles—1916 prices. 300,000 satisfied customers endorse Kalamazoo offer—low wholesale price—30 days' trial—year's test—cash or easy payment—$100.000 guaranty. We pay freight and start shipment within 24 hours. Mail postal today for catalog also receive new 1916 souvenir, "Recipes in Rhyme." Both free. Ask for Catalog No. 103.

KALAMAZOO STOVE CO., Mfrs., Kalamazoo, Mich. We manufacture stoves, ranges, gas stoves, furnaces and white enameled metal kitchen cabinets and tables. Mention which catalog wanted.

"A Kalamazoo"
Trade Mark Registered
Direct to You

LUDEX'S MENTHOL CANDY
COUGH DROPS

The Outdoors "Health Guard"

Throat and nose protection against dust or dampness. Quick relief from coughs and colds. Have many uses.

In the "yellow box" the world over 5c

Wm. H. Luden, Confectioner Reading, Pa.

that for two thousand years men did not even know where the old city stood. But we are helping to build a new heaven and a new earth. We are helping to build a civilization, a brotherhood, that shall endure, based on the changeless principles and promises of the Christ. We have the tremendous opportunity of laboring together with God to build up a structure which, at the great testing, when all the things that can be shaken shall be removed, shall be found to be among those things that cannot be shaken and shall remain.

Shoes from the Holy Land

Jonah, a Missionary to Nineveh

The ruins of ancient Nineveh on the Tigris River are now fairly well denuded. The north wall extending east from the river was 7,000 feet long, the eastern wall was three miles long, the southern wall only 1,000 feet long, the western or river front extended for two and one half miles along the Tigris. The actual extent of the city occupied about 1,800 acres. But Greater Nineveh compare Greater New York—was made up of a tetropolis of four cities. Nineveh proper, Khorsabad, the Calah and Keramlis, which agrees with the dimensions given by Diodorus the Greek historian and fully justifies Jonah's path into the exceeding great city of three days journey.

It was to Jonah a city of refuge and standing in its glory 2000 B.C. It was a great field for the lonely missionary, discouraged as he was. Truth, always stronger than fiction, is transforming the ancient site and region into a great field for the modern missionary of his present hour. The central part of Asia Minor from the Bosphorus to the boundaries of Persia are being systematically devastated and depopulated by the cruel banishment of the Armenian people from their ancestral homes. The long lines of these fugitives who survive the brutal massacres are all moving Eastward and Southward from Trebizond, Sivas, Angora, Aab, Harput, Erzerum, Diarbekir, Bas and Van to the Syrian Desert at Mosul, which occupies the site and region of ancient Nineveh.

Many of the American missionaries, both men and women, have tried to accompany these sad fugitives into their activity, ministering to their sick, their wives and their orphans; and others who most certainly follow them into their exile. The Red Cross of Christianity will be the only gleam of sunshine over this reversion to barbarism dealing with this unhappy race.

One of the finest mission work in the modern world has been done in the region occupied by the Armenian people. Today that country lies in ruins, stained with blood and defiled by the awful memories of human suffering, fiendish lust and plunder such as no other race has ever experienced, excepting the Jews.

Well might the whole of Christendom see itself in sackcloth and sit in the ashes of ruined cities! Well might the Christians of all lands "cry mightily to God" to turn men from their evil way and from the violence that is in their hands.

The How Column

By Frank L. Brown

General Secretary, World's Sunday School Association

Planning the Lesson

Last week's Christian Herald has many teachers bore testimony as to their individual plans of lesson preparation. Before summing up this wealth of suggestion, a few additional plans may be given from the number received:

TEACHER of a class of fifteen-year-old girls says: "I prepare my Sunday school lesson as I do my school work, looking up references; if in the Gospels, finding out whether more than one Gospel gives it, make close notes on pieces of paper small enough to fit in my palm."

A teacher of fourteen boys sixteen to eighteen years old writes: "I assign one member of the class a three-minute period to talk on the lesson. I put a couple of hours' preparation on it myself."

From the teacher of a class of seven girls twelve years of age comes this: "I study and prepare the lesson on Sunday afternoon, generally a week ahead; then go over it carefully on Saturday evening, keeping in mind during the week the main thought and object."

One teacher says she gets her plan at a special meeting for teachers conducted by the pastor before the Wednesday evening prayer meeting.

A teacher of a class of twelve-year-old girls says: "I first gain the principal facts, then some idea of the motives, the ideals, and the lesson aim, also the point of contact with the children."

From a teacher of sixty children three to six years of age comes this: "My lessons are in story form. I read the story as given in the Teacher's Text Book, also as the Bible gives it. Then, after reading any other helps I can find, I weave a story of my own adapted to the minds of my class. I also collect any objects, pictures, etc., which will serve to illustrate the lesson."

A teacher of fourteen girls, ranging from seven to twelve years, states: "First, I read the whole chapter in which the lesson is found. I then seek for the explanation of each verse. Then I work out an outline and try to frame a picture in my mind. And when I open the Bible in my class I know how to begin the lesson."

A teacher of a class of girls twelve to sixteen years of age says: "I do the work in the pupils' work-book as an example to them and then thoroughly study the lesson in a story form. I go through the lesson early in the week and then keep it in my mind and try and build it up for Sunday. I refresh my mind again on Friday or Saturday."

A busy teacher of sixteen boys from thirteen to fifteen years finds time by substituting the lesson study for the morning newspaper on the cars. He writes: "I make a short outline of the lesson. I study the lesson while riding in trolley cars to and from my work on Friday, Saturday and Sunday morning. This gives me five hours' preparation if I need it. I don't always use it all."

An enthusiastic teacher of sixteen-year-old girls has this method: "I read everything I can lay hold of bearing on the subject matter of the lesson, simply get soaked in it; make a few notes of the leading points, then go before my class and feel my way as to what phase of the subject they are ready for. More than likely I don't use one fourth of what I've read but the preparation has enlarged me."

The next teacher has fourteen girls in the critical years of sixteen and seventeen. She first puts herself in the scholars' place. She says: "I carefully fill out the scholars' questions in the Quarterly, selecting which of them I want to dwell upon. Have one chief thought for the lesson. I find the Teachers' Manual an excellent help."

The teacher of the graduating class in a Junior Department writes: "I pick out the most important events, and put it all in story form."

One teacher who has the problem of fifteen boys from thirteen to fifteen years old writes significantly, as he keeps that live class in mind and their weekday life: "I study the Graded Lesson Helps and the ball game scores for the past week."

A woman's class teacher has this testimony: "I begin the study of the lesson a week ahead. I prepare topics during the week while about my work."

Like Mary Used to Smile

By JOHN QUILL

I SAW a couple walkin'
Out in the park one day.
The fellow was a-talkin',
Girl hadn't much to say;
He'd emphasize his subject,
An' ev'ry little while,
She'd sorter smile up at him,
Like Mary used to smile.

A kind of soothin' sweetness,
I never can forget,
Delight o' joy in livin',
I see her sweet eyes yet;
A lot of folks are praisin'
Such things as dress an' style,
But all that's true is smilin'
Like Mary used to smile.

I feel so kind o' lonesome,
A-goin' through this world,
A dizzy-like sensation
Has got me sorter whirled;
They're gettin' few an' fewer,
But yet, once in a while
You'll see a girl a-smilin'
Like Mary used to smile.

I've ben so weak, here lately,
Ain't felt like doin' much;
I don't feel good for nothin'
Like doin' chores an' such;
Last night I was a-dreamin'
Could see a thousan' mile—
I saw an angel smilin'
Like Mary used to smile.

Some Queer Facts About Puffed Grains

A Scientist Says

"In every Puffed Grain there must occur in the making 125 million separate steam explosions. That's one for every food cell."

A Professor Says

"This process makes Puffed Wheat and Rice the best-cooked cereals in existence."

A Doctor Says

"There would be millions of users if more people knew how easy and complete is Puffed Grain digestion."

An Expert Says

"Nearly all wheat's minerals are in the outer coats. The lime, the phosphates and the salts. Also most of the cellulose." Puffed Wheat makes them all available.

A Writer Says

"I am amazed to note how light and satisfying is a mid-day meal of Puffed Wheat."

A Grocer Says

"No other cereal is so largely used by those who know them as Puffed Wheat and Rice."

A Mother Says

"They're the only foods for which my boy passes back his dish four or five times."

A Boy Says

"A pocket-full of Puffed Wheat when I go out to play ball is better than peanuts or popcorn."

Puffed Wheat, 12c
Puffed Rice, 15c
Except in Extreme West

CORN
PUFFS

These grains supply a variety of fascinating, scientific foods. They are bubbles of grain, crisp, fragile and flaky. And the taste is like toasted nuts.

An hour of fearful heat is applied in the making. Every food cell is blasted. And the Wheat and Rice are whole grains puffed to eight times normal size.

These are, in these ways, the greatest foods in existence. Serve with cream and sugar; in bowls of milk or doused with melted butter. And use them like nut-meats in all ways.

The Quaker Oats Company

Sole Makers

(1067)

You Can Weigh Exactly What You Should

You can be Strong, Vigorous—full of Life and Energy.

You can be free from Chronic Ailments—every organ of your body strong as nature intended.

You can have a Clear Skin.

You can have a Good Figure—as good as any woman.

You can increase or reduce your weight.

I no longer need to say what "I can do" but what "I HAVE DONE." I have helped 75,000 of the most cultured, intelligent women of America to arise to their very best—why not you?

No Drugs—No Medicines

My pupils simply comply with Nature's Laws.

What My Pupils Say:

"Everyone notices the change in my complexion, it has lost that yellow color."

"Just think what you have done for me. Last year I weighed 216 lbs., this year 146, and have not gained an ounce back. I am not wrinkled either. I feel so young and strong, no rheumatism, or sluggish liver. I can breathe now, too. It is surprising how easily I did it. I feel 15 years younger."

"Just think I have not had a pill or a cathartic since I began, and I used to take one every night."

"My weight has increased 80 lbs. I don't know what indigestion is any more, and my nerves are so rested! I sleep like a baby."

"I feel as if I could look every man, woman and child in the face with the feeling that I am growing—spiritually, physically and mentally. Really I am a stronger, better woman. I don't know how to tell you or to thank you."

Reports like these come to me every day. Do you wonder I want to help every woman to vibrant health and happiness?

Write me your faults of health or figure. Your correspondence is held in strict confidence. If I cannot help you, I will tell you what will.

My interesting book tells how to stand and walk correctly and contains other information of vital interest to women. You are welcome to it. Write for it. It is FREE. If you do not need me, you may be able to help a dear friend. I have had a wonderful experience and I'd like to tell you about it. I am at my desk daily from 8 until 5.

SUSANNA COCROFT,
Dept. 18, 624 Michigan Ave., Chicago

Imagine Your Little Boy or Girl in this ADASON ANGORA!

How warm and cozy they'd be even in coldest weather!

CHILD'S set consists of cap, sweater and leggings, made of fine quality Angora. The leggings are in one piece and come well up under the sweater, giving double warmth. The Adason Angora comes in colors that children love—Golden Brown, Oxford, Copenhagen and Cardinal.

When ordering give age of child and color desired. Sent parcel post $2.00 paid.

WRITE FOR BEAUTIFULLY ILLUSTRATED catalog, showing our line of Guaranteed Truss, Upholstery, Tapestry Curtains, Covers, Pillow Tops, Dresses. It's yours—FREE. This Adason Angora makes a beautiful gift for Christmas. Money back guarantee.

AGENTS: Several territories open. Special proposition. The ADASON Co., 1033 Chestnut St., Phila., Pa.

The Giant Heater

WILL HEAT ANY ORDINARY ROOM IN ZERO WEATHER AT ALMOST NO COST

Applied to round wick lamp or gas jet (naked flame or mantle burner).

HEAT AND LIGHT AT ONE COST

Mr. Homer Smith, Wyoming, Del., writes: "We have used your Giant Heater in our home five years and are certain it saves us a ton of coal a year, besides its convenience."

Sent Postpaid, Black Iron, $1.00
BRASS, $1.50; NICKEL PLATED, $2.00
Attractive Illustrated Booklet Mailed Free

THE GIANT HEATER CO., 103 Temple Street, Springfield, Mass.

PIANO TUNING AT HOME

A LUCRATIVE PROFESSION easily acquired. Anyone can learn. Our PATENTED TUNE-A-PHONE METHOD makes success more certain than best oral instruction. Guaranteed. Write for FREE BOOKLET, telling how our STUDENTS MAKE BIG MONEY. Niles Bryant School of Tuning, 22 East 8th, Battle Creek, Mich.

Amarilly of Clothes-Line Alley

Continued from page 1129

"What is it?" asked Amarilly, apprehensive lest the wedding might be declared off.

"I've been married once by a Baptist minister, once by a Methodist, and the third time by a Congregationalist; last time a Unitarian tied the knot. So this once I thought I would have an Episcopal, because their white robe lends tone. And Rev. Mr. Woodthorn has come without his. He says he never brings it to the house weddings unless specially requested. He lives clear across the city, and the carriage has gone away."

"Oh, I have a surplus!" cried Amarilly enthusiastically. "I'll telephone our grocer. Milt's a-helpin' him tonight, and he can ride over here on the grocer's wheel and fetch it."

"Why, how in the world did you come by such a thing as a surplice?" asked the widow in surprise.

Amarilly quickly explained, and then telephoned to her brother.

"He says he'll be over here in a jiffy," she announced. "And ain't it lucky, it's just been did up clean!"

"My, but that's fortunate! It'll be the making of my wedding. I shall give you a dollar for the use of it, the same as those others did."

"No!" objected Amarilly. "I'll be more than glad to let you hev it arter your givin' me this fine dress."

"I'll have Mr. Jimmels pay you for it. He can take a dollar out of the fee for the minister. It will serve him right for not bringing all his trappings with him."

Amarilly's sense of justice was appeased by this arrangement. She went into the double parlors to witness the ceremony, which gave her a few little heart thrills.

"Them words sounds orful nice," she thought approvingly. "The Boarder and Lily Rose must hev an Episcopal fer to marry them. I wonder if I'll ever get to Miss King's and Mr. St. John's wedding or Mr. Derry's; but I guess he'll never be married. He jokes too much to be thinkin' of sech things." Then came the thought of her own wedding garment awaiting its destiny.

"I ain't even hed a beau, yet," she sighed, "but the Boarder says that I will—that red-headed girls ain't never old maids from chice."

With this sustaining thought, she proceeded to the dining-room. She had been taught at the Guild how to wait on table, and she proved herself to be very deft and capable in putting her instructions into effect.

"Here's two dollars," the complacent bride said to Amarilly before departing. "One is for serving so nicely, and one is for the surplice. I told them in the kitchen to put you up a basket of things to take home to the children."

Amarilly thanked her profusely and then went home. She deposited her two dollars in the family exchequer, and proceeded to distribute the contents of the basket.

"Now, set around the table here, and take what I give you. Thar ain't enough of one thing to go hull way round, except fer ma. She's goin' to hev some of each. Yes, you be, ma. This here basket's mine. Here's a sandwich, some chicken, salad, jelly, two kinds of cake, and some ice-cream fer you. Bud can hev first pick now, 'cause he ain't so strong as the rest of you. All right, Bud; take the rest of the ice-cream and some cake."

"Tain't fair! I'm a girl, and I'm younger than Bud. I'd orter choose first," sobbed Cory.

"Shut up, Co! You'll wake Iry, and then he'll hev to hev something, and if he sleeps right through, that'll be jest so much more fer you. 'Twon't hurt him to miss what he don't know about. All right, Cory, you can hev cake and jelly. That's a good boy, Bud, to give her two tastes of the cream, and ma'll give you two more. Bobby? Sandwiches and pickle. Milt? Chicken and salad. Flammy and Gus, pickle and sandwich is all that's left fer you. The rest of this chicken is a-goin' into the Boarder's dinner pail tomorrer."

CHAPTER XI

MILTON came home from the grocery one night with a telephone message from Mr. Vedder requesting Amarilly to bring the surplice to his rooms on the next day.

"How is business?" asked the ticket-seller kindly, when the little girl appeared in answer to his summons.

"Fine! The surplus has brung in nine dollars and seventy-five cents a'ready. It's kept things goin'."

"The theater will open in a couple of weeks, and then you will have steady work, though I wish we might get an easier and pleasanter occupation for you."

"I'm a-goin' to hev one, Mr. Vedder," and she proceeded to tell him of Derry and her engagement at his studio.

"It kinder seems as if I b'longed to the theayter, and you've been so orful kind to me, Mr. Vedder, that it'll seem strange-like not to be here, but Mr. Phillips's work'll be a snap fer me."

"You've been a good, faithful little girl, Amarilly, and I shall want to keep track of you and see you occasionally, so I am going to give you a pass to every Saturday matinee during the winter."

"Oh, Mr. Vedder, there's been no one so good as you've been to me! And you never laugh at me like other folks do."

"No, indeed, child! Why should I? But I never knew before that you had such beautiful hair!"

"It's 'cause it's fixed better," said Amarilly with a blush. "But who wants the surplus this time?"

"I do," he replied smiling. "I am invited to a sheet and pillow-case party. I thought this surplice would be more comfortable than a sheet. Here's a dollar for it."

"No," declined Amarilly firmly. "Not arter all you've done fer us. I won't take it."

"Amarilly," he said earnestly, "I have no one in the world to do anything for, and sometimes, when I get to thinking about it, I am very lonely. So if you want to be kind to me, you will give me the pleasure of helping you a little now and then. I shall not enjoy the party unless you will take the money."

Amarilly cried a little that night, thinking how good he was.

"I hed orter like him best of all," she thought reproachfully.

Two or three days later Peter Noyes came to the house.

"Hello, Amarilly! I ain't seen yer in so long I'd fergit how you looked. Say, why didn't you ever fix yer hair that way afore? It looks swell, even if it is red!"

"I am older now," she explained in superior, lofty tones, "and of course I hev to think more about my looks than I used ter."

He gazed at her with such ardent admiration that she was seized with an impulse to don her white dress and impress his young fancy still further.

"He ain't wuth it, though," her sober second thought decided.

"What does yer think I come fer, Amarilly?"

"I dunno, 'less Mr. Vedder sent you."

"He did, sorter. You see, I'm invited to one of them kind of parties whar you dress up ter be the name of a book. One of the stock company is givin' it fer her kids. I don't know the name of any book except 'Diamond Dick' and 'The Curse of Gold,' and I didn't know how to rig up fer them. I went to Vedder, and he sez thar's a book what's called 'The Little Minister,' and I could rent yer surplus and tog out in it. He said you would take tucks in it fer me."

"Sure I will. I'll fix it now while you wait, Pete."

"Say, Amarilly, I thought as how, seein' we are both in the perfeshon, sorter, you'd come down on your price."

"Sure thing, Pete. I won't charge you nothin' fer it."

"Yes; I wanten pay. I'll tell you what, Amarilly, couldn't you take it out in gum? I hed a hull lot left over when the theayter shut down. It'll git stale ef I keep it much longer, and I'd like to git some of it offen my hands."

"Sure, I will, Pete. We all like gum, and we can't afford to buy it very often. That'll be dandy."

Thus it was that for the next fortnight the Jenkins family revelled in the indulgence of a hitherto denied but dearly

Genuine Imported English Serge Made-to-Order

$14.50!

Think of it! A genuine imported English serge suit, made to your measure, for only $14.50. Pay $4.50 now and the balance in small payment. Your credit is good.

On Credit

You do not pay a cent unless you are delighted with the suit after it has been made up for you. Tailor made—Imported English serge—$14.50.

Write for our style book and samples at once. No obligations. Get posted on the greatest high-class clothing offer ever made. Write quick for these samples, so that you can measure yourself and order your suit—and have it new week.

The Greatest High-Class Clothing Offer Ever Made

This offer is positively limited. These imported serges are the very latest English weaves—the newest thing in serges—a splendid, fashionable material. Your suit will be made up by expert tailors in any of the latest styles you select.

Don't miss this chance. It's a real opportunity. Remember this is a very special offer, made for the purpose of showing new customers the remarkable values we give. You pay no commission for merchants' or salesmen's salaries. You buy direct, and save all profits.

Write Today! For free, colored style book and samples of serge and other materials for suits and overcoats. We can have your suit ready in ten days. Send for booklet and free imported samples.

Babson Bros., Dept. 2498, 19th St., Chicago.

The Truth About Poultry

Get the Facts by Reading

The One-Man Poultry Plant

Successful Methods of Men on Farms or Small Acreage Complete in twelve parts; printed in one volume

By DR. N. W. SANBORN

REAL work, with real poultry, on a real New England farm. This is a simple story of what has been done by a man, at forty-five years of age, town bred and educated, getting out of practice of medicine, buying small farm in the hill country, and making a success of the venture. Not only is the rearing of chicks and management of adult fowl completely covered, but interesting side issues of fruit growing, grain raising and the production of milk, that cannot be escaped on a real farm. You get the facts—rarely found in print. The truth about poultry as found in actual on a one-man poultry farm.

You Can Do the Same, Book Tells How

OUR SPECIAL OFFER—The One-Man Poultry Plant in twelve parts (book form), and the American Poultry Advocate, get out of practice of medicine, buying small farm in the hill country, and making a success of the venture. Not only is the rearing of chicks and management of adult fowl completely covered, but interesting side issues of fruit growing, grain raising and the production of milk, that cannot be escaped on a real farm. You get the facts—rarely found in print. The truth about poultry as found in actual on a one-man poultry farm.

AMERICAN POULTRY ADVOCATE
580 Hodgkins Bldg. Syracuse, N. Y.

FREE!

—Just send me a post card with your name and address and I'll send you my big new buggy book with the most surprising, money saving, announcement any manufacturer ever made. I'll show you how my sensational Split Hickory Offer has split prices on my famous Split Hickory buggies.

SPLIT HICKORY

—the lightest, strongest and most stylish buggies that ever rolled over the road. 150 styles to choose from—all guaranteed and shipped on 30 days free trial test. More than 200,000 now in use. Write for big free LUGGY book today. Special Farm Wagon and Harness Catalogs also sent free on request.

H. C. Phelps, Pres.
THE OHIO CARRIAGE CO.
Station 323
Columbus, Ohio

$39.25 and up

Valuable Poultry Book

If you raise chickens and want them to produce real profits, write E. J. Reefer, the poultry expert, for one of his fascinating books which tells how to make the average hen lay 200 eggs every year. It contains scientific facts of vital interest to every poultry raiser. Send name and address on a post card or a letter and the book is yours absolutely free.

E. J. Reefer Dept. 2498 Nelson Bldg. Kansas City, Mo.

zed luxury. Their jaws worked instantly and joyously, although ferently. Mrs. Jenkins, by reason of pending upon her third set of teeth, chewed cautiously and with camel-like decision. The Boarder, having had practice in the art, craunched at highway speed. The older boys munched readily and easily, while Bud and Abby pecked intermittently in short nibbles. Amarilly had the "star meth-" which they all vainly tried to emulate. At short and regular intervals a pedo-like report issued from the gum she snapped her teeth down upon it. They kept hers strung out elastically in her mouth, occasionally rolling it back.

The liberal supply of the luxury rapidly diminished, owing to the fact that Iry swallowed his allowance after effectual efforts to retain it in his mouth, and then like Oliver Twist asked for more.

"I declare fer it!" remarked Mrs. Jorgers to Amarilly. "That child's sides will all be stuck together. I could think yer ma would be afeared let him chew so much."

"He's a-teethin', and it sorter soothes gums," explained Amarilly.

During the summer season, Pete had resumed his profession at a vaudeville theater, and one day, not long after his literary representation, he came to Amarilly with some good tidings.

"I hev another job fer yer surplus. Down to the vawdyville they're goin' to put on a piece what has a preacher in it, and I tole them about yer surplus, and the leadin' man, who is to be the preacher, says 'twould lend to the settin' to wear it. I told him mebby you'd let him hev the use on it fer a week fer five dollars. He said he could buy the stuff and make a dozen fer that price, but they gotter start the piece to-night, so that'd be no time to make one. I'll take it down to them to-night."

This was the longest and most remunerative act of the surplice, and served to pay for a very long accruing milk bill. When the engagement at the vaudeville ended, the Boarder came to the rescue.

"Thar's a friend of mine what brakes, and he wants the surplus to wear to a maskyade. I told him he could go as a preacher. He's a-savin' to git married, so he don't want to give much."

"He shell hev it fer a quarter," said Amarilly, friend to all lovers, "and I'll lend him a mask. I hev one the property man at the theayter give me."

To be continued

The War on the Liquor Traffic

Continued from page 1120

mitted that suffragists and saloons set in battle array against each other.

THE church is against the saloon, and that is why the saloon is going and will soon be gone. About all of the churches, including the Catholic, have ended temperance societies under their care. The Anti-Saloon League is a church in action against the saloon. It was founded by Rev. Dr. Howard H. Russell, a young Congregationalist minister, himself the son of an Episcopal pastor. The League asks for the privilege of speaking in the churches on Sunday once a year, and of taking up subscription for the campaign against saloons. And forty thousand pastors and official boards grant the request, and a million dollars each year is given to these churches for the League's support. With its federated church and temperance societies it has driven the saloon from seventy per cent. of the territory, and over fifty per cent. of the population of the country.

THE moral miracle of the century is the fight the nations of Europe are making on alcohol as a war measure. The ages present a much more sublime picture than that of the poor peasant of Russia who had grown to be a proprietor, who at the open coffin of the wife of one of his tenants slain by rum took a vow before God to spend his life fighting vodka, and so impressed that tried on the 175,000,000 of his countrymen that it was translated into a law for the empire? He persuaded the Czar to prohibit vodka during the mobilization of forces. Prohibition during mobilization worked so well that it was extended till the close of the war. The end of Russian finance, in an interview recently, said that prohibition was a success beyond expectation; that the idleness of the peasantry had been increased one-third; that vice and crime had decreased in a marked degree, and that the deposits in the savings banks had increased one-third.

The Kaiser before the war surprised the world by the stand he took against intoxicants, discouraging their use and selling. "That nation which in the future will rise highest in art, civilization, commerce, government and religion will be the one which consumes the least amount of alcohol." The Kaiser has strictly restricted the manufacture and consumption of intoxicants during the war. Not a single officer or private in any department of the government is allowed to enter a drinking place in Berlin any hour of the day or night.

In France before the war there were taverns put up in public places in Paris municipal expense, such as "He who takes alcohol in his mouth takes out his sins. He who puts alcohol in his mouth takes money from his pocket. He who drinks intoxicants steals away his health, usefulness, honor, and the happiness of himself and family." And yet we are told that there is no drunkenness in France, and that the wine-drinking so nearly universal there is not only innocent, but even beneficial as a temperance measure. The French Government, recognizing the great damage of wine-drinking, and determined to save every particle of physical, mental and moral energy in soldiers and people for the war, passed the most drastic anti-drink law the nation ever had, which took effect October 18. It prohibits wine-shops in Paris and throughout France from selling any form of alcohol before noon. Sales to women and children at any hour are forbidden.

It is well for a great nation thus to protect its boys and girls so soon and easily led by drink into the paths of sin and shame. It is claimed by some that the habit of drinking among the women of America is increasing. We trust this is not the case. We do not believe it is. But it would be well for American women who go to Paris for the fashions to notice that France has put the ban on the drinking of her women, forbidding them to buy a gill of even the lighter wines. Early in the war absinthe was forbidden in France, as it had been in Switzerland. Italy, in coming into the war later, adopted severe measures for the suppression of the drink traffic, which drove a great many of the dealers out of business. In England the king and his family, the members of the cabinet, the distinguished men of the realm, set the nation and world the splendid example of total abstinence during the war. But, sullen at the damage which the bars did to the industries, and especially to those furnishing munitions, the government set its foot down upon them, shortening the hours and otherwise limiting the sale of intoxicants. And just now it has dealt the trade a tremendous blow in its order forbidding one man treating another.

Sweden, a pioneer in temperance reform, though neutral, adopted the "Stockholm" system of excise as a war measure. It allows every citizen in good standing to buy one litre and no more of spirituous liquor every five days. The system has extended to thirty-one of the one hundred districts, and by government act is to become the law for all Sweden, January 1, 1916. The results of the system are remarkable. In 1914 the total amount of liquors consumed was only 2,979,682 litres as compared with over 5,000,000 litres the year before. The decrease in 1915 has been even more marked. This system is a long step toward national prohibition.

The great world movement against alcohol is helping to answer Christ's prayer: "Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done on earth, as in heaven."

For Him - from You

As for the Men Folks on your list—don't let them worry you another minute

A Gillette Safety Razor is the one gift that always makes a hit with a man. Even if he owns one he is glad to have a new set—the "Bulldog," the "Aristocrat," "Pocket Edition" or a Combination Set. No Stropping—No Honing.

The No. 00 Standard Combination Set is one of the most popular Gillette models. Has triple silver plated Razor, and Badger Hair Shaving Brush and Stick Gillette Shaving Soap in triple silver plated containers. Seal $6.50 Grain Leather Case.

GRAND PRIZE—HIGHEST AWARD
Panama-Pacific Exposition

KNOWN THE WORLD OVER
GILLETTE SAFETY RAZOR COMPANY
BOSTON

Choose VELLASTIC. It is cheaper than doctors' bills.

VELLASTIC

Elastic Ribbed, Fleece-Lined
UNDERWEAR

THE luxurious downy VELLASTIC fleece holds a cushion of dry, warm air next to your skin which protects you from chills and cold. The pores in the elastic ribbed outer fabric keep the inner fleece dry and hygienic—and the ribbing of the fabric permits perfect freedom of movement and insures smooth fit. No other underwear in the world is so cleverly constructed to combine health and comfort as VELLASTIC. At all dealers.

UNION SUITS $1.00 For MEN, WOMEN and CHILDREN SEPARATE GARMENTS 50c
UTICA KNITTING CO., Makers Dept. 10, Utica, N. Y.

Wonderful New Kerosene Light

Burns Vapor Saves Oil Beats Electric or Gasoline

10-Days FREE TRIAL

Send No Money, We Prepay Charges

We don't ask you to pay us a cent until you have used this wonderful modern light in your own home ten days—we even prepay transportation charges. You may return it at our expense if not perfectly satisfied after putting it to every possible test for 10 nights. You can't possibly lose a cent. We want to prove to you that it makes an ordinary oil lamp look like a candle; beats electric, gasoline or acetylene. Lights and is put out like old oil lamp. Tests at 33 leading Universities and Government Bureau of Standards show that it

Burns 50 Hours on 1 Gallon common coal oil, (kerosene) and gives more than twice as much light as the best round wick open flame lamps. No odor, smoke or noise, simple, clean, no pressure, won't explode. Children run it. Several million people already enjoying this powerful, white, steady light, nearest to sunlight. Guaranteed.

$1000.00 Will Be Given to the person who shows us an oil lamp equal to the new Aladdin (details of offer given in our circular.) Would we dare make such a challenge if there were the slightest doubt as to the merits of the Aladdin?

MEN WITH RIGS OR AUTOS MAKE BIG MONEY DELIVERING the ALADDIN on our easy plan. No previous experience necessary. Practically every farm home and small town home will buy after trying. Conrad, a farmer near Basil, O., and subscriber to Christian Herald, used an ALADDIN one year in his own home, then started distributing among his neighbors and has disposed of several hundred lamps in his County the past three winters, making splendid money. Thousands who are coining money, endorse the ALADDIN just as strongly.

No Money Required We furnish capital to reliable men to get started. Ask for our distributor's plan, and learn how to make big money in unoccupied territory. Sample Lamp sent for 10 days FREE Trial.

We want one user in each locality to whom we can refer customers. Be the first and get our special introductory offer, under which you get your own lamp free for showing it to a few neighbors and sending in their orders. Write quick for our 10-Day Absolutely Free Trial. Send coupon to nearest office.

MANTLE LAMP CO., 116 Aladdin Building
Largest Kerosene (Coal Oil) Mantle Lamp House in the World
Chicago, New York City, Portland, Ore., Montreal or Winnipeg, Can.

10-Day FREE TRIAL Coupon 116

I would like to know more about the Aladdin and your Easy Delivery Plan, under which inexperienced men with rigs make big money without capital. This in no way obligates me.

Name _____ P.O. _____ Address _____ State _____

6% PERKINS & CO. Lawrence, Kan.
For 36 years we have been paying our customers the highest returns consistent with conservative methods. First mortgage loans of $200 and up which we can recommend after the most thorough personal investigation. Please ask for Loan List No. 708. $25 Certificates of Deposit also for saving investors.

The War in Europe

Continued from page 1123

much more than irregular fighting. This Albanian invasion was launched in the southwest frontier of Serbia from Driva, and is moving to the east in the general direction of the Serbian town of Kritchava, with which brief mention it can be dismissed. The Austro-Germans have crossed the Drina river from Bosnia, and are moving due east towards and along the railroad running from Ushitz to Kruchevatz, the western terminal of which is already in their hands as well as a portion of the line farther to the east. The force which crossed the Danube near Shabat on the northern frontier, and took that town, has moved southward and has occupied Ribari and other towns. Both of these invasions are, however, by comparatively small forces.

The brunt of the Teutonic attack has been made on the line running east from Belgrade to Semendria, and the forces employed therein have now reached a line running east and west of about the same length, as their original line in the north, but some forty miles to the south thereof. This line now runs from Valievo, which was taken during the week with the railroad connecting that place with Belgrade; eastward through Kraguevatz, then across the Belgrade-Nish railroad to about the center of the range of the Golumbinie mountains, and is slowly but surely overcoming the gallant and desperate resistance put up by the Serbians. Practically all the country north of this line is in the hands of the Teutons, who are apparently intending to force their way through to Nish in order to link up there with a Bulgarian army moving on that town from the eastward.

Farther to the east the Teutons forced the passage of the Danube south of Orsova, moved southeastward along the Danube, and effected a connection with a Bulgarian army which had advanced northward to meet them, also along the Danube, from the nearest point in Bulgaria. In the course of these combined movements the Serbian towns of Nagotin, Prahvo, Kladovo, and Brsa Palanka passed into the hands of their enemies.

But the importance of this juncture of these Teutonic and Bulgarian armies was not in the fact of the taking of a few more or less Serbian towns, but was in the fact of the union itself, since this union of the two armies creates a route by which men and supplies of all kinds can be shipped to and from Constantinople, via the Danube river from the Austrian border to the Bulgarian town of Nikopol, and thence by rail, which facility of communication will have extremely important consequences on the whole war, but particularly on the Dardanelles and Mesopotamia campaigns, as well as on the Turkish army. As regards the latter, it will enable arms and other necessities to be supplied to some 500,000 men, who are already concentrated but who lack modern equipment to become a vital and active part of the Turkish army. It is, however, among the possibilities that the Allies will endeavor to cut this line of communication somewhere between Adrianople and Constantinople, where it runs within twenty miles or so of the seacoast.

Turning to the eastern frontier of Serbia, the Bulgarian army advancing on Nish, the city to which the capital was moved when Belgrade was abandoned, have captured Pirot, the strongest fortress in Serbia, on the river Nisaria, which defended the approach to Nish from the east, and have advanced still further west. This column is now within a few miles of Nish, which is being abandoned by its civil population. The Serbian government moved to Prisrend early in the week, and there are almost no troops left in Nish.

Further south the Bulgarian army, which last week had arrived at and cut the railroad running south to Salonica, has spread south along the line from Vrania, the town then captured, and now is in possession of Uskub and probably Veles as well, so that for a distance of about forty miles the main line of the Serbian railroad is in alien hands. Still further south there is another Bulgarian force which has taken contact with the French and British sent to the aid of Serbia, and as these lines are being written reports reach us from both sides that heavy fighting is taking place between Veles (Kuprulu) and Krivolak, around Ishtip, and as far east as a point in Bulgaria a little south of the Strumitza river between these forces. How strong this Franco-British force sent up from Salonica may be we do not know, but it was officially announced by Lord Landsdowne in the House of Lords Thursday night (October 29) that at that time the British force which had landed at Salonica was but 13,000 men; but no information was given as to how many French have been landed there. A large number of additional troops from both countries were, however, stated to be on transports hurrying to this point.

On the Dardanelles front there has been but little activity during the week, the fighting being of routine order. General Hamilton has reached London and probably it will be decided soon whether or not the effort to reach Constantinople by this route shall be given up or not. The demand for troops for the needs of the Allies elsewhere is very pressing, which may have some effect on the decision. Late French papers say that General Joffre was always opposed to this expedition.

In the Caucasus there has been little activity, but the British advance through Mesopotamia on Bagdad continues to make real progress and is now not more than eighty miles or so from its objective.

The British lost a ten-thousand ton armored cruiser during the week, the Argyll, wrecked off the northern Scotch coast in a storm, and also a transport, the former Marquette of the Atlantic Transport Line, in the Aegean Sea, torpedoed. The loss of life in the Argyll disaster was small and about a hundred were lost on the transport. A British submarine torpedoed the German armored cruiser, the Prince Adalbert, in the Baltic near Windan, of nine thousand tons displacement. Here the loss of life was very heavy. This is the sixth armored cruiser Germany has lost since the war began.

On the western line the events of the past week were not at all out of the ordinary. At only one part of the line, Le Mesnil, and north of Tahure in Champagne, was there any infantry fighting of importance, and even here the results achieved were insignificant. There are some signs that this comparative calm is precursory to another offensive on the part of the Allies.

Our Cover Picture

WE have given this the common but erroneous title of the Rock Moriah in the Mosque of Omar. The proper name for the stone is the Holy Rock, and the building is the Dome of the Rock. The latter is of Arab construction, octagon in shape, and with four gates which face the four cardinal points of the compass. The decorations and furnishings of the structure are of great artistic beauty and material value. The present Dome was erected in 1022 on the site of an earlier building which collapsed six years before. Many religious treasures are here, but the chief is the Holy Rock.

The rock is the subject of much tradition and more superstition. It is fifty-eight feet long and forty-four wide, and rises about four feet and a half above the surrounding pavement. It doubtless formed some part of the floor of the original Temple, but hardly of the Holy of Holies, as is claimed, for that chamber was too small to contain it. There is a hollow space beneath the rock only partly revealed by steps leading down, and supposedly a cistern was once beneath. The Talmud is the principal source of tradition about this relic, and the following are some of the things claimed for it:

The Holy Rock covers the mouth of an abyss in which the waters of the Flood can be heard. On this rock Abraham was about to slay Isaac. The Ark, concealed beneath this stone by Jeremiah when Jerusalem was destroyed, is still there. There is no support for the rock according to some, but others assert that it rests upon a palm waved by a river of Paradise. Still others believe it is the gate of hell. From this rock Mohammed was translated upon his horse to heaven, and the impression of his head in the ceiling still shown.

Naturally this object is of the first interest to pilgrims and tourists, and to the faithful of Islam. It is strictly guarded, and visitors are impressed by the reverence shown by its Turkish custodians. The Crusaders in their day held the spot in awe, and erected an altar upon the rock. The name, Rock of Moriah, was given to it by Jews because of its crowning position upon the mount where stood Solomon's temple.

New Idea

A new kind of Electric lamp—a wonderful invention that overcomes Electric Hand Lamp nuisances. Now have all the powerful light you need whenever you need it.

FEDERAL Electric Lamp

Exclusive new features: a powerful concentrating and magnifying double Lens and pure-silver-coated Reflector—pure Tungsten bulb—nickel plated heavy steel hood to protect Bulb, Reflector and Lens—plain—simple with or break. Thumb-pressure switch, fitted with notch for continuous light. Metal battery container, black enamel. Uses standard No. 6 dry cell.

A Thousand Uses

Great for indoor and out—lighting your way wherever you want to go and a thousand other uses. Every autoist—every household, physician, deliveryman, etc., should own a Federal. Don't grope around in the dark—don't court fire with dangerous oil lamps or matches. Federal Lamp stands 1½ in. high.

Money Back—Low Price

For the first time—a big Lamp for little money—only $1.50, reduced from $2.00, complete with battery, postpaid. Try a Federal at our risk. Send $1.50 now for your Federal Lamp postpaid. If you are not fully satisfied, we will refund your money without delay. You risk nothing. You need a Federal—send now.

FEDERAL SIGN SYSTEM (Electric)

643 West Lake Street
CHICAGO

You Can Make Delicious Pies and Cakes

Light, flaky, rich and wholesome—with

Gail Borden EAGLE BRAND CONDENSED MILK

THE ORIGINAL

Only the richest and purest cows' milk is used in making Gail Borden Eagle Brand Condensed Milk. All the richness and nourishment of the pure, full cream is there. Always ready. Use it in all your cooking.

Is YOUR Clock Reliable?

WOULDN'T you like the satisfaction of having an artistic time piece in your home or office—that you knew was accurate? Of course you would. Our large stock of famous SETH THOMAS clocks, sold by mail, all charges prepaid and every one guaranteed to be as represented. Let us save you money.

Write for our FREE catalog C, handsomely illustrating 101 different models—all splendid time keepers.

W. H. ENHAUS & SON
Jewelers Since 1847
31 John Street, New York

Seth Thomas, Mahogany Case Cathedral Strike $5.50 Prepaid

PASTOR'S COMMUNION SERVICE

For Visiting the Sick

Every Pastor should have one. Leather Case Silver-plated Flagon and Wafer Box, six cups, cal glasses. An ideal gift for the pastor. Special price, $6.50 postpaid, satisfaction guaranteed. THOMAS COMMUNION SERVICE CO. Box 611 Lima, Ohio

BOYS AND GIRLS

Earn Christmas money. Send for 25 XMAS PAID AGES. Each pack containing 48 assorted Xmas Seals, Cards and Tags. Sell for 10 cents each. When sold each pack nets you $1.50. Keep $1.00. We trust you. CHRISTMAS CARD CO., Dept. F, Beverly, Mass.

DETROIT

WEATHERPROOF BODIES FOR FORD CARS

Make Your Ford an All Year Round Car

The Detroit top is handsomely proportioned, richly finished and fits snugly over the regular touring or roadster body.

The Price $77.00 f. o. b. Detroit

Includes Rain Vision, Ventilating Windshield and Barbour Patent Flexible doors.

Fits so snugly on car body that joint is not noticeable, no creaking. Cannot possibly rattle. The interior finishing is of Gray Cloth, very rich and pleasing. The workmanship is first-class throughout. Absolutely guaranteed. Money back if not satisfied.

Write today for Illustrated Book.

Detroit Weatherproof Body Co.
496-502 Clay Avenue DETROIT

Don't Pay Two PRICES

HOOSIER Stoves & Ranges FREE

Try a Hoosier stove for a few days. Show your friends. They will want to have one. See it at the Hoosier Store. You can see the latest at Actual Factory Prices. Our new improvements equal anything ever produced. Save money by a single stove to buy your winter fuel. ALL HOOSIER STOVES Guaranteed for Years. Send postal today for large FREE Catalogue, showing large assortment of stoves from.

No Obligations.

HOOSIER STOVE CO.
164 State St., MARION, IND.

"ON'T SHOUT"

"I hear you. I can hear now as well as anybody. How? With the MORLEY PHONE. I've a pair in my ears now, but they are invisible. I would not know I had them in, myself, only that I hear all right."

"The Morley Phone for the DEAF" is to the ears what glasses are to the eyes. Invisible, comfortable, weightless and harmless. As it can adjust it. Over one hundred thousand sold. Write for booklet and testimonials.

THE MORLEY CO., Dept. 754, Perry Bldg., Phila.

MAGAZINES

J. M. Hanson-Bennett Magazine Agency is the largest in the world. You can save money on the magazine you want by writing for This Catalog FREE

Our new Catalog lists more than 3000 Periodicals and Club Offers. IT'S A BIG MONEY SAVER. Send us your name and address on post card today and get this big free catalog. Deal now. Agents Wanted. Write for full particulars.

J. M. HANSON-BENNETT Magazine Agency
22 Brooks Building Chicago, Illinois

WOULD YOU

show this standard high grade fully visible typewriter to your friends and let them see where in it excels any other $100 typewriter. If by doing this and rendering other small assistance, you could help a young poultry business write us today for our Illustrated Free Book, "Dollars and Sense in Poultry Business."

Order to us simply say "Mail Particulars."

WOODSTOCK TYPEWRITER CO., Box 1176, Woodstock, Ill.

MAKING POULTRY PAY

ends more on the knowledge you use of Poultry Culture than on expensive equipment or extensive space. Let us teach you how Director Quisenberry of Missouri State Poultry Experiment Station made each hen pay a profit of $7.16. If you want to save money and make money in poultry business write us today for our Illustrated Free Book, "Dollars and Sense in Poultry Business."

AMERICAN SCHOOL OF POULTRY HUSBANDRY Mountain Grove, Missouri.

PATENTABLE IDEAS WANTED.

Manufacturers want Owen patents. Send for 3 free books: inventions wanted, etc. If patent or no fee. Manufacturing facilities.

RICHARD B. OWEN, 53 Owen Bldg., Washington, D. C.

Young People's Topics for November 21

How God Wants to Be Thanked Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topic.
Ps. 67:1-7 (Thanksgiving Meeting)

WRITE down this praise poem, separating the lines as they were originally written. You will find the lines separated so in the Revised Version, but you can do it easily yourself, two lines to every verse except the 4th, which has three.

Now first study some pronouns. This may appear to have more to do with a schoolroom than with a Thanksgiving holiday—with turkey and good cheer and anthems. But let us see. Three "us's." "God be merciful unto us, and bless us, and cause his face to shine upon us." That seems still more out of place on Thanksgiving Day, for it sounds selfish. But see: "That thy way may be known upon earth, thy saving health among all nations." That blessing, which was to come upon those who worshiped, is to flow over all the earth. Then the refrain:

"Let the people praise thee, O God,
Let all the people praise thee."

You remember Browning's lovely little poem about Theocrite. Morning, noon and night he kept singing: "Praise God." They noticed his piety, and promoted him till he became Pope. But God missed that pure, free note of praise that the boy had sung. So when your voice stops praising, God misses it.

"Let all the people praise thee."

Now the singer thinks of the outside nations again—and this is quite wonderful for a Jewish hymn, for it was hard for the Jews to believe that God was greatly interested in any nation but their own. "O let the nations be glad and sing for joy." See how the happiness is spreading. First us, then all the world, God will bless. They will sing his praise, and he will judge and rule them righteously.

THEN the refrain again—"Let the people, all the people praise thee." Next comes something that seems really like Thanksgiving Day: "Then shall the earth yield her increase." Earth's bounties are never thoroughly enjoyed till we enjoy them with the thought of God in our minds and his praise in our hearts.

And the song reaches its great climax: "God shall bless us, and all the ends of the earth shall fear him." That is one of the greatest verses in the Bible. It sums up the message of revelation: God is good; he will bless us; if we let him bless us, all the rest of the earth shall turn to our God.

That is the way God likes to be praised. He likes to hear praise from those whose souls he has richly blessed; he likes to hear praise that has in it the hope that all the world may share the blessings we have received.

Go back for a moment to the 4th verse. God's blessings are to introduce and accompany justice. He does not like to listen to praise from people who are unjust or who are helping to promote injustice. Read from the 10th to the 17th verse of the first chapter of Isaiah to see how he feels about that. Read what Jesus said about making wrongs right with brother before coming to God's altar (Matt. 5:23). Find the passages in the Old Testament and New, such as Isa. 3:13-15, Prov. 22:22-23, James 5:1-4, about God's demands for justice, and put this into your Thanksgiving thoughts. With these thoughts in mind the 6th verse has a new significance: "Then shall the earth yield her increase." With such a bountiful earth, it is not reasonable or just that half the people on it should always be hungry. God's blessing and God's justice must mean that some day earth's bounties shall be shared more equally by men. Part of our praising should take the form of looking after this matter.

So, making the promise of this ancient psalm your prayer that God's perfect justice shall come at length to all the world, and his bounties be shared by all, and giving yourself up to be blessed by him and to be used in carrying his blessing, his justice, his bounty to all the world, join in that refrain of long ago:

"Let the people praise thee, O God,
Let all the people praise thee."

How Can We Show Our Gratitude?
Epworth League Topic. Ps. 40:9-11;
116:12-19

THE Epworth League references emphasize the same ideas discussed in the Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. lesson. Psalm 40:9-11 talks about preaching, or proclaiming, or publishing God's righteousness. "I have not restrained my lips," the singer declares. "I have not hid thy righteousness within my heart"; "I have not concealed thy loving kindness and thy truth." Are we doing this—hiding the news of God's goodness? It is not fair to God, to ourselves, to our neighbor, to the world, if we are. Then, notice, if we are not withholding the declaration of these blessings, God will not withhold from us his tender mercies, his loving kindness, his truth. But they shall continually be ours.

Study the whole lesson given above for the other societies. We show our gratitude by praising and by working to bring God's good gifts to all the world.

The Quaker Attitude on War

THE Conference of the Religious Society of Friends to protest against the reliance upon military force in adjusting international affairs, and to advance the cause of universal peace, held at Winona Lake this summer, appealed to all the bodies of Christians to make the teachings of Jesus Christ more potent in the affairs of men. "The profession of the acceptance of Christ's teachings, without putting them into practice, is but a mockery," declared the conference. "We regard the Sermon on the Mount as a practical constitution for the kingdom of God upon the earth; that its declarations are to be obeyed by the members of that kingdom, and that they apply alike to individuals and to all groups of individuals, including those that form the nations of the earth. Not otherwise can the kingdoms of this world become kingdoms of our Lord. We advocate peace, not merely as an end in itself, but as one of the means for obtaining the greatest of all ends, the establishment of the kingdom of God upon the earth."

"The present crisis in the world's affairs presents an opportunity, beyond any the church has before known, to call men to Christ's ideals of human government. A heritage of two hundred and fifty years places a peculiar responsibility upon us. In 1660, Friends presented to King Charles II a declaration which stated, 'We utterly deny all outward wars, and strife, and fightings with outward weapons, for any end or under any pretense whatever: this is our testimony to the whole world. The Spirit of Christ by which we are guided is not changeable, and will never move us to fight and war against any man with outward weapons, neither for the kingdom of Christ, nor for the kingdoms of this world.'"

In 1914, the London Society of Friends declared that it "believed that all war is contrary to the mind of Christ, and that the early Christians who said, 'I am a Christian and cannot fight,' were expressing a fundamental truth. The Friends today regard their protest against war as an essential part of their faith in Christ, and as rooted in their whole conception of man's relation to God."

UNDER the title "Old Wine In New Bottles," Samuel Tilden Larkin has written in fiction form a story of social welfare work among the poor Mountain Whites of the South, which gives some very interesting pen pictures of conditions in those regions. He has introduced a pretty love story into the narrative. The book is published by Monfort & Co., Cincinnati, Ohio.

The True Flavor of High-Grade Cocoa Beans is Found in

BAKER'S BREAKFAST COCOA

Registered U. S. Patent Office

This is due to the perfection of the mechanical process by which it is manufactured, no chemicals being used, and to the care and skill used in the selection and blending of the beans. A high authority on cocoa has recently said: "A pure cocoa, unchanged by destructive chemicals, is the best cocoa. There is no more need for introducing alkalies into cocoa than there is into cracked wheat or oatmeal."

Baker's Cocoa is Delicious, Wholesome, Pure and of Great Food Value

Booklet of Choice Recipes sent free

Walter Baker & Co. Ltd.

Established 1780
Dorchester, Mass.

Grand Prize, Panama-Pacific Exposition, 1915
Grand Prize, Panama-California Exposition, 1915

She Bought One Pair—and then A Box

BURSON

FASHIONED HOSE

By a patented process are shaped as they knit, without seams. Trim and snug-fitting, yet smooth and comfortable.

Cotton, Lisle and Mercerized
25c, 35c, 50c, 75c

Ask your dealer
Booklet upon request

Burson Knitting Co.
511 Church Street
Rockford, Illinois

CHURCH FURNITURE

Pews, Pulpits, Chairs, Altars, Book Racks, Tables, Desks—EVERYTHING. The finest furniture made. Direct from our factory to your church. Catalog free.

DeMoulin Bros. & Co. Dept. 54, Greenville, Ill.

TABLE GRACES

For DAILY USE SPECIAL DAYS and OCCASIONS

All Will Welcome This New Book of Graces. Postpaid. Paper, 25c. Cloth, 50c. M. E. MUNSON, 77 Bible House, New York, N.Y.

An Active Holiday

NEW Book of Knox Gelatine Recipes is just out— we will send it to you FREE

Besides the NEW recipes for Desserts, Salads, Puddings, Candies, Ice Creams and Ices, this book contains the very latest in Table Setting and Serving. Valuable recipes, too, for the Invalid and Convalescent.

This is one of the NEW IDEAS from the NEW BOOK

A SALAD-DESSERT

1 envelope Knox Sparkling Gelatine	2 tablespoonsful lemon juice
$\frac{1}{2}$ cup cold water	$\frac{1}{2}$ cup sugar
2 cups boiling water	1 teaspoonful salt
$\frac{1}{2}$ cup mild vinegar	3 cups fresh fruit, cut in small pieces

Soak gelatine in cold water five minutes, and add boiling water, vinegar, lemon juice, sugar, and salt. Strain, and when mixture begins to stiffen, add fruit, using cherries, oranges, bananas, or cooked pineapple, alone or in combination. Turn into mold, first dipped in cold water, and chill. Remove from mold to nest of crisp lettuce leaves, and accompany with mayonnaise or boiled salad dressing.

Remember, the
NEW BOOK IS FREE

Just send us your grocer's name. If you wish a PINT SAMPLE, enclose a 2c stamp.

CHAS. B. KNOX CO., Inc.
455 Knox Ave., Johnstown, N. Y.

ONE DROP OF 3-IN-ONE

will go farther and do more than a whole bottle of inferior oil. 3-in-One oils, cleans and polishes, prevents rust. The first and only lubricating oil for sewing machines, clocks, watches, typewriters, bicycles, talking machines, roller skates, fishing rods. Best preparation for cleaning and polishing furniture. Only gun oil recommended by all leading firearm makers. Can't gum or soil or dry out quickly—contains no acid. 10 cts., 25 cts. and 50 cts. sizes. Also Handy Oil Cans, 3½ ozs., 25 cts.

FREE generous sample and Dictionary—both free. Write for them.

THREE-IN-ONE OIL CO.,
42 CG. Broadway, New York

THERE was an old friend of our family who operated a large farm about twenty miles east of the city in which I grew up. About twice a year for several years I received an invitation to spend a week or ten days with the farmer's boy, Harold, who was about my own age. The invitations always coincided with one of the harvest times. Either it was August and the oats were to be cut, or it was late November and corn-husking time. At both those seasons an extra boy is a very handy thing to have about the place, especially if he has a native fondness for work; and I have often wondered since then whether I was really a guest or an extra hand working for my board. My mother always cautioned me, when I started, to remember that it was a busy time on the farm and that I must not expect to be entertained, but must help in every way I could. If there was any underlying secret motive in those invitations she either knew of it or suspected it. I did neither then; it was a holiday for me and the work was the making of the holiday. There was a fair amount of play after all, and I was not abused, even if the motives for my invitation were somewhat mixed.

The first of these vacations came the fall before I was twelve. It was beautiful weather; clear and warm enough in the day-time to enable us to work without too great a burden of clothing; and clear and moonlight and cold at night, so that games were possible before bedtime and the deepest of sleep was inevitable between bedtime and the early morning call. I never seemed to really sleep at all. It seemed as if the great gong was ringing at the foot of the stairs almost the minute I dropped off. The gong had actually allowed us eight hours; but those were the shortest eight-hour intervals I ever experienced. We were up at five. Harold and I slipped on our clothes and washed our faces at the pump and then did our before-breakfast chores. The weightiest of these consisted in bringing in some two or three bushels of clean cobs and half a dozen armloads of split wood for the kitchen stove. That stove had an appetite almost equal to the human appetites whose business it was to supply; there were four hired men and myself and a family of eight. The farmer's wife baked only about six loaves of bread and three or four dozen light rolls every day, besides pies and an occasional cake, and yet she and the two grown daughters and the hired girl seemed to keep busy; they also knew how to keep two boys busy. At noon and at night the hired men would have a few minutes' leisure on the bench at the back door, but we boys were carrying more cobs and split wood; the wood didn't split itself either. In spite of all this arduous visiting, I found time to investigate the appurtenances, living and otherwise, of the place.

I WAS greatly interested in the living things on the farm and in their various modes and modulations of speech. I managed to copy the notes of the Plymouth Rock rooster so closely that I kept him crowing at full pressure for several hours before church on Thanksgiving morning. We crowded until my throat was almost sore and his must have been stretched somewhat. He could not locate his rival; but he just would not be outwitted. The Jersey bull refused to get excited over me; he no doubt remembered the fable of the bullfrog, for he merely gave me a calm, bovine look and turned his head away. There was no fun in that, so I tried a mother pig and imitated first her own instructions to her young and then the plaintive protests of the piggy. She was too busy eating everything in sight and keeping those youngsters from making pigs of themselves—they wanted to eat all the time, they seemed determined to grow up and become nice fat sides of bacon and boiled ham—to pay any attention to a mere boy, even if he did in some ways resemble a pig. Old Shep permitted me to bark as much as I pleased, and only opened one eye now and then to make sure I wasn't really another dog. You couldn't fool Shep; he had helped raise four boys and he knew their tricks. A treble whinny, repeated twice or thrice, always started an echo from the stalls of the barn; but whinnying is hard on the nose and not very exciting. There was one other important individual on the place. Harold had warned me not to try my imitative skill on him, but what boy ever took a warning to heart? The strut and ego of that gobbler were more than I could allow to pass unchallenged.

The gobbler had seen his father, his brothers and two generations of his sons pass under the headsman's ax. He had been spared, of course, because of his superior virtue. Why should he not be proud? Why should he walk otherwise than as the acknowledged lord of the manor? He had grown proud as he gained in age and in flesh, and no greater dignity than that which swayed above his shadow ever burdened two feet, either of bird or man. His bright red comb hung down over his beak, his wings were furled and unfurled as he walked, and the turkey hens all did him reverence. The rooster never so much as clucked in the presence of the Turk, and the hens scuttered out of his way with their bodies close to earth and their tails down. It was this fabric of unchallenged superiority that I tore away that memorable afternoon. I had held myself in as long as I could and I just had to "Gobble, gobble."

The Turk was eating corn near the granary and I was just around the corner of the barn. Harold was somewhere around; he said he saw the whole performance, but if he did he was a most ungracious host. At the sound of my "Gobble, gobble," the great body stiffened and the head went full erect, the comb stood straight up, the wings spread out and the gobbler answered the challenge in his best manner. I repeated the challenge and promptly slipped back of the corner of the barn, around which I peeked to see what would be the next move. The barnyard monarch could not locate his opponent. He looked this way and that, his comb getting stiffer and redder every minute. I gobbled again. This time he got the direction and started to walk slowly and deliberately toward my corner. I hastily retreated behind the next corner. The Turk walked on beyond where I had been and kept the course almost to the line of Lombardy poplars at the end of the barn lot. His magnificence was too much for me and I gobbled once more. This time he saw me and he stuck his head straight out in front and started for me on the double quick. I went around the end of the barn and across the space between the barn and the granary as hard as I could run, but it became very evident that I would not be able to reach the gate in the fence ahead of the bird. I was always good at dodging and I thought it might work this time, so I doubled back on my tracks at a sharp angle. The Turk almost sprained a half-dozen toes making the turn to take the new direction; but my actual gain of distance was very slight. Our course lay between the barn and the granary. I was ahead and the bird a close second, very close. His wings beat the ground as he ran, and if it were happening today I would think an asthmatic auto was on my trail. That was before the day of the earliest one-lunger, and I had nothing with which to compare the thing that was after me. I was not greatly interested in comparisons just then.

IT WAS evident that there was no use in going beyond the corner of the granary; before I could get to the fence the bird would be alongside or somewhere in my immediate vicinity; so I grabbed the cornerboard of the building and swung myself quickly around the turn. I gained appreciably on the bird and gained again at the next corner; but the length of the granary gave the Turk another chance to get into his stride, and I barely got around the third corner safely. We made some four or five circumvolutions of the granary without either of us gaining much tance; but I was fast losing breath; there had been any amateur record the Turk-paced granary race, it would have been permanently broken. On the next to the last time around I no cleats on the side of the granary, running up along one corner to the roof. I knew that I could get up there if I could get a fair start. Could I do it? I put on every ounce of speed I had and the Turk flew around the building. The Turk's my increased speed and seemed to me the loss of his prey, for he speeded up too. That was my salvation. He was a heavy bird and the extra speed gave him so much momentum that he lost his footing at each of the three turns. I gained just enough distance to be able to way up the side of the granary when my pursuer reached the bottom of the ladder. He backed off a ways and tried to fly up to me; but I was climbing fast and he only succeeded in peeling at my late footprint on the cleat I had just left. He clung to the side of the building for a minute, while I climbed to safety on the roof. Then he dropped to the ground, made one or two unsuccessful attempts to fly to the roof and to do the sentry go around that corner of the granary. He was mad, very mad, and I was about as scared a boy as ever left a civilized community to brave the elemental dangers of the country.

The ridgepole of that granary was not exactly an easy chair. I tried several times to slip down the ladder without being seen; but each time I scarily got my foot on the first cleat before a warning flutter of wings announced an unwelcome presence just below. The Turk was on guard and he meant to stay. I crawled carefully along to the other end of the ridge to see if there might be any way of escape there. There was a haystack about ten feet away, a fairly high stack, but the end of the stack was at least as far as the ridgepole of the granary as it was away from the building. I looked at that distance with longing eyes. Did I jump it? Would the Turk hear? If he did I would be easy prey for months on top of the stack. There seemed no other way out, and my calls had brought no help. The whole household were apparently indulging in a holiday afternoon siesta. Harold claimed to have seen it all; but when I asked him why he didn't come when I called he just giggled and said it was too funny. I knew it wasn't funny at all, I refused to believe that he had seen a thing. When no help came and the edge of the ridgepole had nearly reached the small of my back, I finally decided to try the jump. I jumped too late and lit beyond the top of the stack, sliding slowly to earth in a grog avalanche of hay. I kept very still for several minutes and then crept very slowly and carefully to the row of poplars and slipped along, all scrooped down, back of the trees to the garden east of the house, then ran through the garden to the road and in the front yard and up the walk to the house. Then I went through to the kitchen to see what the scene of battle might appear. The Turk was still on guard, he was still mad; and he was still there when we went to bed. I treated that bird with the utmost respect during the rest of my visit; there was at least one barnyard language that I did not speak. I had pursued that one to perfection and was satisfied.

THE Hebrew Christian Publication Society, 83 Bible House, N. Y., publishes for free distribution among English-speaking Jews a series of instructive booklets dealing with questions of vital religious importance. The author is B. A. M. Schapiro, a Jewish convert, whose writings in the interest of Hebrew-Christian evangelization are specially adapted to the Jewish mind, and have received the endorsement of many leading American pastors. He will gladly answer inquiries that may be sent to him at the above address.

We still think the Christian Herald the best religious paper there is, and wish you could succeed in the good work you are doing.
HARRIET TIPPIN

She Knows Where to Come

This lady is heading straight for the Sunshine Biscuit Rack.
To explore its many varieties of the "Quality Biscuits of America"—to discover new biscuit creations, exclusive flavors, shapes and appetizing tastes.

Sunshine Biscuits

There's a different Sunshine Biscuit for every day of the year, for every occasion, for every taste. Sunshine Biscuits are unbelievably light, crisp and delicious. No biscuits are quite so fresh, taste quite so good. Sunshine Specialties are different from any other biscuits baked in this country. That you may know how tempting these biscuits really are, we'll send you our containing 14 kinds, if you pay the cost of postage and packing. Send 10 cents (stamps or coin) with your name and address, and your dealer's name, too, please.

Sunshine Revelation Box

LOOSE-WILES
BISCUIT COMPANY
Bakers of Sunshine Biscuits
773 Thomson Ave.
L. I. C.
NEW YORK

Look for this Sunshine
Biscuit Rack

A WARM WELCOME

And in a few minutes' time the spare bedroom will be warm as can be. The PERFECTION SMOKELESS OIL HEATER is easily carried wherever it is needed and takes off the chill in no time at all. Just touch a match—the Perfection is ready. Full heat instantly. Inexpensive—a gallon of kerosene gives ten hours' glowing warmth.

Chases chill from cold corners.

In many styles and sizes at hardware, furniture, general and department stores—look for the Perfection Cozy Cat Poster. You'll know the heater by the Triangle Trademark. Send to Department E for free illustrated booklet.

THE CLEVELAND FOUNDRY CO.

Makers of New Perfection Oil Cook Stoves

7612 Platt Ave.

Cleveland

Ohio

Also made in Canada by the Perfection Stove Co., Ltd.,
Sarnia, Ontario

Do you want the latest fad? It is a fascinating game called "Going to Market." Send 10 cents in coin or stamps.

Perfection Heaters
Awarded
MEDAL OF HONOR Highest Award
at Panama-Pacific Exposition

PR-PUR-PER PERFECTION

PERFECTION

SMOKELESS OIL HEATERS

IT ALWAYS PAYS TO BUY THE BEST

Domestic Let Your Christmas Gift Be An Easy-Running Domestic
(The Original Vacuum Sweeper)

It will lighten the labor of the housewife, make her home more sanitary by keeping it free from dust, and add to her leisure by the saving of time.

Ball and roller bearings make the Domestic light-running and easy to use, while the Sanitary Brush-Control, an exclusive feature, places the sweeper-brush under perfect control of the user.

Send for booklet on "Sanitary Sweeping"

DOMESTIC VACUUM CLEANER CO.
410 Hermon Street Worcester, Mass.

Hoosier Range

DON'T PAY TWO PRICES

HOOSIER

Stoves Ranges Heaters FREE

To try in your own home for 30 days. Show your friends. Freight paid by us. Send it back at our expense if you do not want to keep it. You can buy the best at Actual Factory Prices. Are heavily made, of the highest grade selected material, beautifully finished, with improvements that equal anything ever produced. The Best in the World. Guaranteed for years by a Two Million Dollar Bond. No matter where you live, you can try a HOOSIER in your own home thirty days, without a penny's expense or obligation to you. You can save enough on a single HOOSIER STOVE to buy your winter's fuel. Write or send postal today for Large Free Catalog "and prices" showing large assortment to select from. No Obligations.

HOOSIER STOVE COMPANY,
164 State Street, - MARION, IND.

Base Burner

POMPEIAN

OLIVE OIL

ALWAYS FRESH
PURE-SWEET-WHOLE SOME

ACORN UNI-LITE

FREE

Turns night into day.
300 candle power.
Carry as a lantern.
Use anywhere as a lamp. Weather proof. For house, barn, garage, camp and around the farm. Write for big free offer. Special opportunity to farmers, stockmen and motorists. Agents make big money. Write tonight.
Acorn Brass Mfg. Co., 751 Acorn Bldg., Chicago

Gratitude from Breaking Hearts

FROM the Christian Herald Dutch Committee for Relief to Widows and Orphans of the War, with headquarters at Rotterdam, Holland, have come reports from which we quote below. The terrible wound which Belgium received at the very outset of the war is slow in healing. Acute as is the misery in other sections of the war—and let it never be forgotten that misery is thus far the one product of the war—Belgium's need still seems as fresh and poignant as at the very beginning of her calamity. And the work of our committee is being performed at the very center of suffering. The report from Rotterdam, signed by Mr. P. C. Jongeneel, secretary, acknowledges the receipt of remittances from the fund, and then states:

"WE have paid over 4,000 guilders to Notary Brands, the head of the Home for Belgium Children at Amsterdam, who with this sum will be able to continue his eminently effective work for several more months, whilst the further round sum of 1,000 guilders has been paid to Mr. Kellenaars, treasurer of the Leiden Committee for Belgium Orphans; the latter gentleman regularly goes into Belgium to find and bring with him children without family or support. "Altogether, we are convinced that your readers cannot possibly imagine the actual amount of suffering they have relieved with their contributions. It would require the pen of a gifted author instead of that of a mere business man to make them understand the good they are doing with their gifts."

"It is gratifying to note how the contributions to your Relief Fund continue to come in, which proves that it makes no difference to the American people that the suffering is so far away from home. We would like to assure you that the people in Holland are doing their duty, and perhaps more, in the way of philanthropy, but of course the country is only small and there are limits, and the loyal assistance of the Americans is therefore very welcome. Over here, it has become a somewhat general custom for anybody who makes an extra profit owing to circumstances in connection with the war, to allocate a certain part of such extra profits to help the large number of those for whom the war has had adverse effects. We hear with great pleasure that, on the whole, American industry and trade are doing rather well at present, very high prices being obtained for grain and other articles of export, and we sincerely trust that those of your readers who are lucky enough to have a share in the general prosperity will follow the above described example, thus placing you and your committee in a position to counteract some of the most distressing effects of the war on this side of the ocean."

"Since writing the above, we have received your number of the 8th of September, from which we are exceedingly pleased to see that you are placing another $5,000 at our disposal. This will enable us to continue our work and not only to meet the numerous requests for help that have reached during the last few weeks, but also to continue our regular small weekly to a number of our protégés who during the last few months been entirely dependent upon your Holland Committee."

SPECIAL mention is made this on our editorial page of the formation of a new committee at Constantinople for the especial relief of Armenians. The sum of $5,000 been remitted to this committee, more will be sent as rapidly as the permit. The need here is simply astounding, and there can be no question but that whoever is able should certainly give some assistance in this new direction.

In accordance with our original sentiment and purpose, we have acknowledged all gifts as rapidly as space permitted, in the Christian Herald, and the names below almost complete the list. All future gifts will be acknowledged in the same way. Please address the Widows and Orphans Fund, Christian Herald, Bible House, New York.

Miscellaneous Amounts

L. B. McKinley, $4.00; Skagway, Alaska, $6.00; Mr. John and Alice Gram, $8.00; Grace Baptist Church, San Jose, Cal., $11.41; Grass Valley, Calif., $5.00; B. Havemann, $4.83; Primary Dept., Indianola S. S., No. Topeka, Kansas, 60 cts.; Miss H. S. Watkinson, $4.00; The South Church, Codell, Kansas, $3.35; Mrs. F. R. Abernethy, $30.00.

Gift of $100

J. E. G.

Gift of $25

Ca Phenin Chemical Company.

Gift of $20

Bethel Presby. Church, Starkweather, N. D.

Gift of $15

Mrs. Alden Speare; E. Murray Lucas.

Gifts of $10

A Subscriber, Niles, Ohio; Mrs. W. A. Conner; Subscriber and Friend, Hickory, Neb.; "Anonymous," Butler, Pa.; W. I. Gosnell; T. W. Lorence; Mr. & Mrs. C. V. Shedd; E. Martin.

Gifts of $5

A. Barrow; Richard Glover; C. E. Ann; Lum, Mich.; Mrs. Ann Chester; F. H. Meadsker; A. Friend, Pomeroy, W. Va.; Mr. & Mrs. Jacob Bolinger; Lydia Seipp; W. Hamblen; E. H. Pittsburg, Pa.; S. I. Blake; John H. Blake; A. Friend, So. T. worth, N. H.; Mrs. E. Sitz; Mr. & Mrs. H. Kreider; A. Mother, Los Angeles, Cal.; A. Friend, Adel, Iowa; Mrs. N. Mitchell; R. Gilson; Maggie Gordon; Miss L. V. Pierson; Bennett E. Seymour; A. Friend, Southampton, Mass.

Gifts of $3

Rev. E. P. Savage; Miss Florence M. Peck; Mr. & Mrs. A. B. Church; Pupils of Public School, Britain's Cove, Weaverville, N. C.; Friend of the Cause, Camden, Ala.; A. Friend, Turlock, Calif.; Esther Stone Sherrer; A. Friend, Mt. Mitchell, N. C.; Geo. H. Stephens; Mrs. Sarah A. Woodworth; B. L. Peacock; Mrs. J. B. Cummings.

Gifts of $2

Mrs. F. Shaw; Sunday School, Bob, Minn.; Ira Clynick; Mrs. D. L. E., Uniontown, Pa.; Mrs. W. H. Landry; Mrs. C. Robbins; Sunday School, Talleville, N. Y.

Free Financial Information

THE following free booklets, describing attractive investment opportunities, have been advertised in a previous issue of the Christian Herald. Our readers who have money for investment should write for them.

GEORGE M. FORMAN & CO., 11 South LaSalle Street, Chicago, Ill., describe in list "C-2" five per cent. and six per cent. first lien farm mortgages in denominations of $200 up.

Sheldon, Morgan & Co., 42 Broadway, New York City, describe "Odd Lot" investments in Booklet "E-1." Inasmuch as practically thirty per cent. of the transactions on the Stock Exchange nowadays are in odd lots, bought by the small investor, this free booklet should be interesting and valuable reading.

P. W. Brooks & Co., 115 Broadway, New York City, tell "What To Do With $20" in booklet "A-20."

E. J. Lander & Co., Grand Forks, North Dakota, will tell our readers all about six per cent. farm mortgages if they will write for "Booklet O."

Peabody, Houghteling & Co., 10 South

LaSalle Street, Chicago, Ill., one of the oldest banking firms in America, interestingly advertise in circular No. 892-C, how amounts of from $500 to $12,500 can be safely invested in selected farm mortgages.

North Dakota farm mortgages are believed to be as sound and in every way as attractive as farm loans in any section of the United States. How investors' money is loaned out on farms in that state is interestingly told by Walter L. Williamson, Lisbon, North Dakota, in descriptive Booklet 810.

A. H. Bickmore & Co., 111 Broadway, New York City, in "List H-2" tell the reader how he may obtain $100 and $500 bonds at bargain prices.

Many persons who cannot afford to take the slightest speculative risk in their investments buy municipal bonds. Municipal bonds that will yield from 5 per cent. to 6 per cent. are offered to readers of the Christian Herald by Charles S. Kidder & Co., W. C. T. Building, Chicago, Ill.

Bowman, Cost & Co., Third National Bank Building, St. Louis, Mo., want to tell Christian Herald readers on their mailing for "Investment Factors," their new handbook for investors.

Libby's

Holiday Desserts

Libby, McNeill & Libby, Chicago

We are one of the thirteen National Advertisers who can furnish you with the latest fad—the game “Going to Market.”
Send 10 cents in coin or stamps, address Libby, McNeill & Libby, Dept. T, Chicago

Winners at the Exposition

*Minute Gelatine has won Gold Medal
highest award at Panama-Pacific
Exposition*

*Minute Tapioca
has won Gold Medal
highest award at Panama-Pacific Exposition*

Minute
Tapioca

Minute Tapioca
has won Gold Medal
highest award, at Panama-Pacific
Exposition

Minute
Gelatine

Minute
Tapioca

Millions of Housewives Have Awarded First Place to Minute Gelatine and Minute Tapioca

[illegible]

月 10 日 星期一 晴

Gentlemen Please
to the New "M"
Club is a...
of Minute Gela

MINUTE TAPIOCA CO.
506 E. Main St., Orange, Mass.

Name

Street:

City _____ State _____

Grocery Name _____

Christian Herald

DESCRIPTION, $1.50 PER ANNUM
PUBLISHED 52 TIMES A YEAR

NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 17, 1915

VOL. 48 NO. 46 PRICE 5 CENTS
OFFICES: BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK

*The mother horse looks at the camera.
The foal looks grandly away.
How nice to see the mother to see,
How just to call the foal.*

Photographed by James H. Johnson

REDUCED to $885 — INCREASED to 40 H.P.

THIS FORTY Horse Power, SEVEN - passenger, 4-cylinder Studebaker at $885 represents one of the most remarkable accomplishments of the year. It is a history-maker. Price has been REDUCED from $985 to $885—and yet even with this reduction of $100, the car itself has been GREATLY INCREASED in POWER, size and quality.

Nothing but the price has been decreased. Wherever a change was made in materials, BETTER materials were used. The upholstery, for example, is the finest, genuine, hand-buffed, semi-glazed leather. The wheelbase is INCREASED from 108 to 112 inches. The capacity is INCREASED from Five to SEVEN passengers. The tires are INCREASED from 33 x 4 to 34 x 4 Goodrich. The motor is INCREASED from 3½ x 5 to 3¾-in. bore x 5-in. stroke, FORTY Horse Power, and in power and flexibility equals most of the SIX motors on the market.

Yet the car has the SAME reliable Wagner Electric System; the SAME quick stop brakes; the SAME Safety-INSURING Full-floating rear axle; improved one man top; control equipment—oil gauge, gasoline gauge, speedometer, etc., all grouped on center of dash under one light—in unobstructed view and within easy reach of the driver.

By REDUCING the price and yet giving even GREATER value at the reduced price, Studebaker has set a new standard of value for 4-cylinder cars. See the car at once. And write for 1916 catalog.

STUDEBAKER

South Bend, Ind. Walkerville, Ont. Detroit, Mich.

Address all correspondence to Detroit

Forty Horse Power
7-Passenger
FOUR $885

Four-Cylinder Models

Touring Car, 7-passenger $885
Roadster, 3-passenger . 850
Landau-Roadster, 3-pass. 1185

Canadian Prices

Touring Car, 7-pass. . $1195
Roadster, 3-passenger . 1165
Landau-Roadster, 3-pass. 1495
F. O. B. Walkerville

Six-Cylinder Models

Touring Car, 7-passenger $1050
Roadster, 3-passenger . 1000
Landau-Roadster, 3-pass. 1350
Coupe, 4-passenger . 1550
Limousine, 7-passenger 2250
F. O. B. Detroit

Canadian Prices

Touring Car, 7-pass. . $1395
Roadster, 3-passenger . 1350
Landau-Roadster, 3-pass. 1695
F. O. B. Walkerville

More than 195,000 Studebaker Cars now in use

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

An Illustrated News Weekly for the Home

Yoshihito, Emperor of Japan

Coronation of Japan's Emperor

A New Japan—Religious Freedom—Successful Christian Missions

By FERDINAND C. IGLEHART, D.D.

Mutsuhito, Father of Yoshihito

PERHAPS no nation, ancient or modern, ever sprang so suddenly from obscurity and isolation into the dignity of a world power as Japan; and certainly no other nation since the world began ever passed from an absolute monarchy to a representative government without the taint of blood. And all this the Japanese themselves claim was on account of the wise administration of the great Emperor Mutsuhito, the father of Yoshihito, whose coronation was delayed until November 10, this year.

About the middle of September, the city papers of Tokyo issued an official program of the coronation exercises. It is a few words of introduction by Count Guma and Baron Shibusawa. Okuma said: "It was my privilege to be present at the coronation of the great Emperor Mutsuhito. That was forty-eight years ago, at the beginning of the reign in which Japan attained the highest civilization at material greatness yet reached by her. That position is fully maintained today, and more, for the imperial sway now extends over a greater territory and a greater number of people than ever before. No nation in Asia has ever held a place in the family of great and enlightened powers with an equal prestige or influence. The Emperor makes his formal ascension to the throne in greater glory, therefore, than has been the lot of any ruler of any other country of Asia, ancient or modern."

Shibusawa said: "Every since the day, twenty-five centuries ago, on which the founder of the empire, the Emperor Jimmu, ascended the throne as the living personification of the Three Divine Treasures, the nation has looked up to the imperial line as the inspiring fountainhead of justice, righteousness, and benevolence. The best days of imperial rule, as history shows, were epochs of uplift to a higher plane of civilization and emancipation, as was again seen so magnificently also so brilliantly during the reign of the late Emperor. It was during that reign that Japan stepped forward into the circle of great nations. It was under the Emperor Mutsuhito that we entered into communication with the outside world, and cemented our international relations, advancing in all social intercourse. I believe that the era of Taisho, like that of the illustrious Meiji, will in no less degree be marked by originality and material national development."

ON the death of his father Yoshihito ascended the throne (July 30, 1912), and proclaimed a new reign, and an "era of Great Righteousness." A year of mourning being over, preparations were made for the coronation of the new ruler. But his mother, who had been a worthy companion and helper to her husband, died, and there had to be another year of mourning, so the coronation was postponed until three years after his accession to the throne. The official program announced that the exercises would begin November 6 by the journey of the Emperor and Empress from Tokyo to Kyoto. To "Kashikodokoro" (sign of the Sacred Mirror, Goddess of the Sun), would be taken from the imperial sanctuary and placed on a palanquin called the "Feather Wheels of Heaven," and the royal family in state coach would ride to the depot at Tokyo, amid the shouts of "Banzai!" ("Long live the Emperor") from the thousands. The reception at Kyoto, 328 miles away, as planned would be just as elaborate and enthusiastic. On the following day the "Kashikodokoro" was to be enshrined at the Shunko-den Palace. On the morning of November 10 the actual coronation exercises would take place in the Shunko-den Palace in the following order:

The priests carry offerings to the altar. After their prayer, the Emperor comes into the hall, followed by his suite; then the Empress accompanied by her retinue. Their Imperial Majesties are accompanied by the Crown Prince, members of the imperial family, the Prime Minister, the Lord Keeper of the Privy Seal, and the Coronation Commissioner. Her Majesty, preceded by officers, is followed by court ladies, princesses of the blood and officers, all of the royal party, and attendants clad in magnificent sacred treasures, praying at the same time for the protection of his country by the imperial ancestors. A ritual bell is rung during the reading of the address. When it is finished the Empress arises and makes obeisance before the shrine, as do the Crown Prince and other members of the family. Their Majesties then withdraw, and all present pay homage to the sacred shrine.

Copyright, International Film Service, Inc.

Ancestor-Worship, With Offerings of Rice Cakes, Fruit and Papers Inscribed With Prayers robes. The Emperor is seated in the center of the hall, the Empress to the east of him, the Crown Prince, Princess and others of the royal family stand in the southern corridor. On a table near the Emperor are low him to the capital and the coronation exercises will be at an end.

Mutsuhito will ever remain one of the great figures of history. The ruler of a nation which was born when Romulus founded Rome, and of a family that had ruled it most of the time since its birth; an absolute monarch with authority over property and even life itself, not by the demand of the sword, not by the clamor of an enraged populace angered at injustice and oppression, but from a sense of righteousness and political wisdom, he began quietly to give away his power to the people. On April 6, 1868, about a year after his accession to the throne, in the sacred city of Kyoto, Emperor Mutsuhito voluntarily took the "Imperial Oath of Five Articles" promising the people larger liberty and a share in the government.

He immediately granted legislatures, courts of justice, general education and other democratic advantages to his subjects; also promising them that their happiness and prosperity should be the chief object of his reign. In the presence of that oath the feudalism of the centuries perished without a struggle. He sent out his ablest men in statecraft, education, business, industrial arts, farming and even religion, to visit Europe and America and find out the secrets of the success of Western civilization and report to him, which they did. And when he had secured the information, and gotten the reforms to working practically, feeling that the time had come for national self-government, he sent Ito out to study the constitutions of the ruling empires of the West and with them as models, a con-

Copyright, International Film Service, Inc.

Priests About to Bless the Sacred Rice Crop for Use in the Sacrificial Rites. Prayers Strung Around the Field

the sacred sword and bead necklace. The Emperor arises from his seat, proceeds to the shrine, and reads an address before the sacred "Kashikodokoro" announcing his coronation and his acquisition of the stitution was drawn up which was adopted in due form and signed by the Emperor February 11, 1889. The constitution provided for a Cabinet, an upper and lower house of Parliament and all other departments necessary for the administration of a popular government. When Mutsuhito had given away nearly all of his power he was the strongest man in the Orient and created the most virile empire of the East. He had lost his life for his people, but in so doing had saved it for all time. The progress of the race has made absolute monarchy imbecility. A democracy is the only strong government.

Among the young men sent out by the government to foreign universities to prepare for the making of the new nation, was one who graduated at DePauw University at Greencastle, Ind. He was a member of the village congregation of which the writer of this review was the pastor at that time, some thirty-five years ago. The facility with which he learned our language and customs, the progress he made in his courses of study, and the brilliancy of his Oriental imagination in his essays and addresses excited interest in him. He was respected and loved. That "Jap" student is now Baron Chinda, the Japanese minister to the United States at Washington. The selection of such men for great responsibility is in harmony with the action of the present Emperor in pursuing the wise and progressive policy of his father, and thus promoting the prosperity and happiness of the empire in his administration.

Japan decided to adhere to her original intention not to invite a representative of the Christian religion to the coronation ceremonies of the Emperor. Japanese Christians tried to induce the court and government to change the original plans, on the ground that Christianity is now one of the prominent religions in the empire; but the authorities decided that only representatives of the Buddhist and Shinto religions should attend the ceremonies. The explanation given was that Buddhist and Shinto priests had a court rank in Japan which entitled them to an invitation. On the other hand, the Coronation Board recognized the religions of the West by inviting representative missionaries and Christians to the coronation banquet given by the Emperor in Kyoto, and to banquets which were held simultaneously in many cities of the empire.

The coronation committee should not be criticized. What right had missionaries or Christians to any part in exercises which from first to last were one spectacular expression of ancestor worship? The Emperor went to Kyoto because it was a religious city which for a thousand years had been not only the capital of the nation, but its religious center as well. He went to that city on purpose to meet the gods, his ancestors, at a time of supreme importance in the nation, to thank them for the great prosperity they had given to it, to have them as witnesses to his new vow of loyalty to them and the people in assuming the rulership of the empire, and to ask their specific guidance in the administration of the government in righteousness, courage and benevolence, so that increased prosperity and happiness should come to all the people. This kind of a ceremony is required by the Japanese law to the minutest detail.

THE Japanese government is not unfriendly to Christianity. One of the greatest reforms guaranteed by Mutsuhito, the Emperor's father, in the

Copyright International Film Service, Inc.
Well at Kyoto, Whose Waters Make the Sacred Rice Wine Used at the Coronation

new constitution was religious liberty. For two thousand five hundred years, up to the time of the late Emperor, no such thing as religious liberty could be found in Nipponese literature. Fifty years ago, at every gate to both the Flower Capital of the Mikado and Yedo, city of the Shogun, and at many of the entrances to other cities and villages, there stood a large signboard with heavy black characters saying: "The evil sect Christian is firmly forbidden as hereto." To call a man "Yaso," meaning "Jesus," was to heap upon him the deepest possible insult. Forty years ago there were only eleven baptized Christians in all Japan; now there are about a hundred thousand of them, with more than that number in the Sunday schools, with between six and seven hundred churches. In twenty-two years after religious freedom had been guaranteed by the constitution, the first House of Representatives of the nation had elected a Christian as its president. And at that time distinguished admirals, generals, statesmen, educators, professional and business leaders, as well as many of the plain people, have been proud to acknowledge Jesus as the Saviour. The success of Christianity there has not been because it has sought the limelight or occasions of pompous display or worn costly silk robes of yellow, purple and crimson, nor because it has beaten the drums and blown the brazen trumpets of an external virtualism or led in the crowning of kings, but because religious freedom was guaranteed, and Christ had the right of way for his holiness and his love, and because the Christian missionaries lived saintly lives, and rendered Christly services. A true history of the nation will record the fact that Christian missionaries, by their intelligence, sweetness of spirit, purity of character, devotion to Christ and to the mental, moral and spiritual welfare of the people, have been one of the most potential factors in the formation of the new Japan. Count Okuma, the Premier, who next to the royal personages perhaps had the most important part in the coronation exercises, speaking at the centennial of Protestant Christianity in Japan said: "I came in contact with and received great impulse from Dr. Verbeck. He was my teacher in English and history and the Bible. I can never forget the great and virtuous influence of the man. At that time Dr. Verbeck could do but little evangelical work, but all his work was Christian. In everything he did his Christlike spirit was revealed. Only by the coming of the east in its missionary representatives and by the spread of the Gospel, did the nation enter upon world-wide thoughts and world-wide work."

Mock Shrine Carried by Boys in the Temple Parade

God hung a thick curtain over the Island Empire for two thousand five hundred years, till he should have the world ready for it in the establishment of his kingdom, and then he took the curtain off and called aloud to the new nation to take its place in the forefront of the battle for righteousness. God called Mutsuhito to the throne of Japan as certainly as he did any Jewish king or American President to his responsibility. It looks as if God aroused Japan to wake China up out of her sleep into a new education, civilization, government and progress and to open the way for the swifter spread of the Gospel which would make it in numbers and power one of the greatest nations of the earth. It looks as if Christ intends to convert Japan, and China through it, and the Orient through them both, and push the race a long way up toward universal loyalty and love for him.

Into Every City and Place

WHEN a great denomination inaugurates a big movement it is worth while to know what it is and what it does.

In the Methodist Episcopal Church the spirit of evangelism which is moving in all the churches has been expressed in the "Methodist Forward Movement," a plan for a year of nation-wide evangelism.

Evangelism and Methodism are not synonymous terms. There has been much of evangelism in which Methodism had no part, but there is very little of Methodism that is not directly related to the work of the evangelist. Founded in the spiritual awakening that centered about the Wesleys, Methodism has carried the evangelistic message wherever it has gone, and it has gone only as it carried the message. Methodism without its message of salvation for lost souls is the dearest of forlorn hopes; but with its message burning upon its tongue it has achieved, and it will again achieve, victories for Christ and for his kingdom.

There have been years when Methodism seemed to have lost its message, years when it stood still, when all its methods and all its movements and all its infinitude of organizations were only wheels within wheels that turned and turned and wrought to no advantage. The year 1911 was such a year. In 1906 the church had made a notable advance and, human-like, had been satisfied and had lost its power. The year 1911 saw an increase in membership of only .009 per cent. The reason was obvious. The church as a body had ceased to pray and to proclaim the risen Christ as it should. Debts, finance, individual concerns and the sloth that follows ease had filled the mind and emptied the heart, and the work of the Master was being done haltingly and only in part.

The General Conference of 1912 appointed "the Commission on Evangelism" and commissioned them to bring anew the old revival fire of Methodism. Under this guidance and their urging and their planning the church is again vibrant with the life of her Lord. In 1912 the rate of increase was doubled; in 1913 more than doubled; and it increased again slightly in 1914, being .044 per cent. The commission was now ready to plan for large things and the church was ready to respond to its leadership. The plan was announced early in 1915. The "Methodist Forward Movement" is the plan. It is a most comprehensive plan, it overlooks no means, and it strives toward a very definite goal by May, 1916. The goal is: 250,000 net gain in membership; 500,000 Methodists in the Time Legion and 1,000 Methodist young people in special Christian service as a life work.

WITH a net gain of 167,376 in 1914, 250,000 is well within the range of possible achievement; all that is necessary is work and prayer, prayer first and then work, performed in the spirit of prayer, by those 500,000 Methodists in the Time Legion. And who are they? They are members of the Quarterly Conferences and official boards, superintendents of Sunday schools, teachers of classes, fathers and mothers and earnest members of the Epworth League who have taken this pledge: "In the service of Jesus Christ my Saviour and under the direction of my minister, I agree to give, in time, at least two hours each month to definite personal effort in persuading others to begin the Christian Life." The pastor is obligated to furnish the names of persons to be won to Christ. "What the laity needs is not exhortation, but assignment. We dare not say they will flinch when we fail to give them a definite task."

But to whom will those 500,000 lay evangelists bear the message of the Christ? To those to whom the pastor sends them. Yes, but to whom will he send them? The pastors of Methodism are charged to prepare a roster of their constituency, a list of names of people who by right should be Methodists. This constituency roll is to be made up from the church and Sunday school records and is to include all unconverted husbands of wives who are members; all unconverted wives of husbands who are members; all unconverted children of members; all unattached persons of families who are contributors, occasional attendants, or whom are known to be unidentified with another church in the community. From this list the 500,000 Time Legioners are to see he 250,000 new members. In churches where the list has been completed, pastor and people have been astounded at the unworked field for which they are responsible before God. One church of ninety members found that its constituency numbered 354, another of 224 members faced 2,149.

Pastors and members of the "Time Legion" and all the members of the churches are being urged to join the Methodist Forward Movement Epworth League and to pray daily for the success of the work of the movement locally and throughout the world.

IN the first announcement of the Forward Movement the Commission on Evangelism sought one thousand centers in Methodism which would stand for the definite all-the-year program of the "Forward Movement." A center might be a great city, a smaller city, a town or a circuit. It was felt that the goal of the movement would surely be alized if one thousand centers could be organized. Before October 1, the first thousand centers had been secured and the goal was put forward to two thousand.

The program of the movement is based first upon "Organized Personal Evangelism," and this is not a new thing. It was just this, the carrying of the "word" from individual to individual, that gave the church of the first century its evangelistic power; and no great ingathering has ever been otherwise obtained.

The second main element of the program is "Continuous Public Evangelism." At least once every Sunday from all of the pulpits of Methodism a public invitation is to be given for people to accept Christ and an opportunity is to be given them to declare their purpose. This is an old practice which has fallen into disuse. The ministers have been putting up religious singing talks without endeavoring to reach the sales. From now on the ministers will be better salesmen and the man whose heart has been touched will find the bearer of the message waiting, with extended hand, to lead him on to full surrender and acknowledged faith.

The third point of the program is the observance of "Epochal Days and Seasons." The Day of Pentecost, May 23, 1915, was celebrated by ringing messages on the baptism of the Holy Spirit. This was early in the work of the movement. The first Pentecost came by the baptism of the Spirit on a morning that followed a night of prayer. Throughout Methodism earnest souls are praying for another Pentecost in 1916. At many notable gatherings during the summer the plan of the movement was outlined and demonstrated and foundations were laid for aggressive work in the fall and winter.

Win-My-Chum week, November 7-14, opened the winter program. During the week the Epworth Leagues united in a definite effort to win young people to Christ.

The next week, November 15-19, is set apart as "Go-to-Prayer Meeting Week." Methodists are summoned to meet on the regular prayer meeting night, and thereby seek a revival of prayer and public testimony.

On Watch Night Methodism will review the spiritual achievements of 1915 and pray mightily for a world-wide revival in 1916. January 2, 1916, will be "Go-to-Church Sunday" and will be followed by the week of prayer which will be devoted to intercession and which will be followed on January 9 with a united plea for a family altar in every Methodist home. February 10 is the Day of Prayer for Colleges, and Sunday, February 13, is "Life Word Sunday," on which day the church will present to her young men and women the call and the claims of Christ on their service. Then will come a special thirty-day evangelistic campaign to close with Holy Week and to be marked on Easter Sunday by the adding to the church of the final section of the 250,000.

The 653 district superintendents are the key men in the plan of the movement. The 20,522 pastors are called to be evangelists, for "not until the conviction burns itself into a pastor's soul that men are now helplessly and hopelessly lost without Christ, will there be enough conviction in his church to impel men to seek Christ who came to save lost men." The thousands of Methodist laymen, now spiritually idle, are called to serve in the "Time Legion" or the Prayer League. Two hours a month is the specification of the pledge and this time is to be employed under the pastor's direction. The world cannot be saved by ministers alone, they are too few. But the world can be saved when the men and women of the churches work with their ministers and go out two by two as they are sent.

THIS plan of personal evangelism has been tried and it has worked. At Blue Island, Ill., a four weeks' "campaign for souls" ended last Easter. The pastor had set his mark at 50, his people worked hard; and on Easter Sunday 130 people, forty of them children from the Sunday school, came forward to confess Christ and join the church. It has worked elsewhere.

Everyone who joins the "Time Legion" will not be able to lead a soul to Christ; but everyone who tries, honestly and prayerfully, will be greatly blessed in his own heart and life; and the year's campaign cannot fail to result in a more intense and living fire of evangelism within the whole denomination. We cannot set bounds and limits for the Spirit of God; but we can be sure that God will bless earnest efforts in his name. The response of the churches to the call of the "Forward Movement" has been so enthusiastic, the consecration of the people, in the meetings held in the various centers, has been so sincere and the spirit so earnest that the goal of the movement is not the ultimate, but the minimum figure. The movement is bringing the church to its knees and is bringing the life of the church to the altar of service. The year of the movement will surely be a year of great blessing and of large gains for Methodism, but if the movement does succeed, as it promises to succeed, it must, by its very nature, so energize the whole fabric of the connection that it will be many years before there is another 1911.

"Peace Should Not Come"

By Ella Wheeler Wilcox

PEACE should not come along this foul earth way.
Peace should not come, until we cleanse the path.
God waited for us; now in awful wrath
He pours the blood of men out day by day
To purify the highroad for her feet.
Why, what would Peace do, in a world where hearts
Are filled with thoughts like poison-pointed darts?
It were not meet, surely it were not meet
For Peace to come, and with her white robes hide
These industries of death—these guns and swords,
These uniformed, hate-filled, destructive hordes, —

From "Poems of Optimism" reprinted by permission

These hideous things, that are each nation's pride.
So long as men believe in armed might Let arms be brandished. Let no Peace be sought Until the race-heart empties out all thought
Of blows and blood, as arguments for Right.
The world has never had enough of war,
Else war were not. Now let the monster stand,
Until he slays himself with his own hand;
Though no man knows what he is fighting for. . . .
Then in the place where wicked cannons stood
Let Peace erect her shrine of Brotherhood.

PERHAPS the most unique settlement in the United States is the Pueblo Indian village located in Arizona. This village comprises fifteen hundred peaceable Indians whose sole and almost only aim in life is to secure a livelihood, as easily as possible. This settlement is located in the best section of the state, but the excessive heat is not uncomfortable to the people, whose ancestors have lived in that desert section for unnumbered generations. Wastes of burning stretch for miles and miles on every side of this village.

A peculiar thing about this people is that they have two distinct villages. The summer village is located upon the floor of the valley, where the Pueblos occupy themselves in agriculture. The place they raise, over what they need to eat during these hot months, is stored away for winter use. There are only a few places in that section of the desert where water is obtainable and in these places the Pueblos pursue their primitive agriculture. Seasons come and seasons go, but as each goes by it finds these people living as they did during the preceding one. Since the white man first knew of this colony, which was back in the 16th century, the habits of this tribe have not changed. They eat the same kind of food, do the same sort of fancy work, and live just as did their ancestors. So far as is known to historians this is the oldest colony of any kind in this country.

Our Oldest Inhabitants

When the winter months come on, the work of agriculture is forsaken and the Indians leave their adobe huts on the floor of the valley and go up into their winter quarters, which are located on the top of a table mountain, known as Acoma Mesa. Upon this mesa are houses one, two and even three stories in height, nearly all of them being surrounded by high walls, these being built as protections in case of war. These homes are made of clay bricks which were baked out in the open by the sun. Their buildings are at once simple and substantial. In addition to being used as winter quarters this mesa is used as a retreat in case of an attack by any hostile tribe, and it is an ideal fortress. Around the mesa on all sides is a smooth vertical rock formation, which makes it impossible for the mesa to be reached except from two points. One of these is so located that when it is desired to close the place to outsiders it is only necessary to roll a huge rock over the entrance. The other entrance is in the form of a stone stairway. This stairway is so steep that to reach the top the one who is entering must secure handholds in the cavities made in the large rocks at the side of the steps. There are several places in this stairway that are very narrow.

Now any one of these points when guarded by a single Pueblo armed with an instrument of war would make it possible for this one person to withstand the attack of an entire tribe. But one man can pass these points at a time and as he would be unable to climb through and defend himself at the same time he would be entirely at the mercy of the defender.

The village looks just as it did years and years ago. When one adobe hut falls to pieces another is constructed in its place. It is doubtful if there will ever be any change in this tribe; civilization may touch it but cannot transform it.

ALBERT MARPLE

From Their Hot Summertime Habitations by this Stairway the Pueblos Climb to Their Winter Residence

A Week in the World's News

DEATH OF PRESIDENT OF WORLD'S SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION. Mr. H. J. Heinz, member of the Executive Committee of the World's Sunday School Association, received word by cablegram on November 5, of the death of Sir Robert Laidlaw, president of the Association, at London. Sir Robert was born in Bonchester, Roxburghshire, sixty years ago, and was knighted in 1910.

OUR TWO EX-PRESIDENTS PAIRED ON MILITARISM. Hon. William Howard Taft is reported in the press as having declined to speak on national preparedness at a recent dinner, declaring that "we are not justified in rushing into militarism. The spirit of the people is certainly at variance with the spirit of militarism." Mr. Taft made it plain that he is opposed to the administration's program: Mr. Roosevelt is all for a huge army and navy and military reserve. So there you are.

VESUVIUS IN ERUPTION. Mt. Vesuvius is again in violent eruption. Lava streams were reported on November 5 to be threatening several villages and the people in the vicinity of the mountains were abandoning their towns and vineyards and fleeing from the threatening danger.

FIRE AND GREED: MURDERERS. Fire aided by human greed claimed twelve lives in a factory fire in the Williamsburg district of Brooklyn on Saturday, November 6. The building was a five-story brick with a frame interior. The regular and emergency stairs were both of wood and were surrounded by wooden partitions. On January 7, 1915, the State Industrial Commission ordered the stairs enclosed with fire-resisting partitions. Inspectors repeated the order on February 23, March 12 and 23 and August 20. The landlord was then instructed to have it done by September 27 or prosecution would follow. At the end of six weeks a little tin sheeting had been put on a partition on one floor. But it was in no sense a compliance with the law. To make matters worse a wooden trapdoor closed over the emergency stairs at the fourth floor and was kept locked by the tenant of the third floor for fear of burglars. The lock was a distinct violation of the fire laws and in the excitement of the fire it was forgotten, rendering the stairway useless. There was a single fire-escape on the building, which was soon choked with people and which became a veritable gridiron upon which struggling human beings roasted or from which they were driven to leap in desperation. The authorities have held the tenant of the third floor and the owner of the building, but this does not restore the twelve lives nor heal the thirty-six injured, nor is it a recompense for ten months of exercise of authority without action.

THE PRESIDENT ON NATIONAL PREPAREDNESS. Before a notable gathering in New York on November 4th, on the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the Manhattan Club, President Wilson delivered his promised speech on the administration's programme of preparedness for national defense. Our ambition as a nation,

American Note to England

A COMPLEXION was given to the discussion between the United States and Great Britain, concerning the rights of neutrals, when our State Department, on November 7th, transmitted through Ambassador Page to the British government a new diplomatic note refusing to recognize the legality of the British blockade, and declaring it ineffective, illegal and indefensible. The note, which contains over 7,000 words, reviews the whole situation since the beginning of the war, and the disastrous effect of the British "Orders in Council" upon American commerce and the trade of neutrals generally. Strong exception is taken to the British contention that "modern conditions" supersede all precedents, and justify, on the ground of expediency, new and arbitrary methods of dealing with commerce carriers and contraband.

In the new note Secretary Lansing, while employing terms that are clear and unmistakable in criticism and condemnation of the British blockade, gives no intimation of what the action of our government will be in the event of the protest passing unheeded. It takes up the complete history of the blockade in detail, in order to show that it is not a real blockade in the sense recognized by international law, but a blockade prompted by the desire of retaliation, and which has wholly failed to regard the rights of neutrals. Practically all of the neutral governments have suffered, and it is in their behalf, as well as our own, that the United States has adopted this more emphatic attitude in order that their rights may now be considered. Under the law of nations, no power has authority to declare the blockade of neutral ports in time of war; yet this has been done in the face of protest and regardless of the provisions of the Declaration of London, which Britain professes to observe. Further, even the very prize courts which decide the cases arising from the operation of this illegal blockade, are themselves incapable of dispensing justice, since they are bound by the "Orders in Council." American citizens cannot be satisfied to submit their wrongs arising out of such seizures, to British prize courts under those conditions, the very jurisdiction of such courts over neutral merchant vessels on the high sea being denied. On this point the note says: "This is a principle of the law and practice of nations, fundamental to the freedom of the high seas. Municipal enactments of a belligerent power cannot confer jurisdiction over or establish rules of evidence governing the legality of seizures of vessels of neutral nations on the high seas. International law alone controls the exercise of the belligerents' rights to seize and detain such vessels. . . . Jurisdiction obtained in such a manner is contrary to those principles of justice and equity which all nations should respect." This being the case our government, the note proceeds, is surprised and concerned at the attempt of the British government to claim jurisdiction for British prize courts under the circumstances. Our government feels that American citizens need not look for redress through such tribunals, which it considers unauthorized by international law.

The concluding passages in the American note, which practically summarize the whole matter at issue, are as follows:

"I believe it has been conclusively shown that the methods sought to be employed by Great Britain to obtain and use evidence of enemy destination of cargoes bound for neutral ports and to impose a contraband character upon such cargoes are without justification; that the blockade, upon which such methods are partly founded, is ineffective, illegal, and indefensible; that the judicial procedure offered as a means of reparation for an international injury is inherently defective for the purpose; and that in many cases jurisdiction is asserted in violation of the law of nations. The United States, therefore, can not submit to the curtailment of its neutral rights by these measures, which are admittedly retaliatory, and therefore illegal in conception and in nature, and intended to punish the enemies of Great Britain for alleged illegalities on their part. The United States might not be in a position to object to them if its interests and the interests of all neutrals were unaffected by them, but, being affected, it can not with complacency, suffer further subordination of its rights and interests to the plea that the exceptional geographic position of the enemies of Great Britain require or justify oppressive and illegal practices.

"The Government of the United States desires, therefore, to impress most earnestly upon His Majesty's Government that it must insist that the relations between it and His Majesty's Government be governed, not by a policy of expediency, but by those established rules of international conduct upon which Great Britain in the past has held the United States to account when the latter nation was a belligerent engaged in a struggle for national existence. It is of the highest importance to neutrals not only of the present day, but of the future that the principles of international right be maintained unimpaired.

"This task of championing the integrity of neutral rights, which have received the sanction of the civilized world against the lawless conduct of belligerents arising out of the bitterness of the great conflict which is now wasting the countries of Europe, the United States unhesitatingly assumes, and to the accomplishment of that task it will devote its energies exercising always that impartiality which from the outbreak of the war it has sought to exercise in its relations with the warring nations."

he declared, is not only to be free and prosperous, but to be the friend of those who desire freedom, the world over. "We shall never again, I confidently believe," he said, "take another foot of territory by conquest. We wish for ourselves nothing but the full liberty of self-development, and we have the same desire for all the peoples of our own hemisphere." Referring to the European war, he said:

"From one end of our own dear country to the other, men are asking one another what our own force is, how far we are prepared to maintain ourselves against any interference with our national action or development."

"In no man's mind, I am sure, is there even raised the question of the willful use of force on our part against any nation or any pole. No matter what military or naval force the United States might develop, station throughout the whole world might reassure that we were gathering that force not for attack in any quarter, not for aggression of any kind, not for the satisfaction of any political or international ambition, but only to make sure of our own security.

"We have it in mind to be prepared, but not for war, but only for defense; and while we thought constantly in our minds that the principles we hold most dear can be achieved by the slow processes of history only—the kindly and wholesome atmosphere of peace, and not by the use of hostile force. The mission of America in the world is essentially a mission of peace and good-will among men. . . . America has been made up out of the nations of the world and is the friend of the nations of the world.

"But we feel justified in preparing ourselves to vindicate our right to independent and unmolested action by making the force that is in us ready for assertion. And we know that we can do this in a way that will be an illustration of the American spirit. In accordance with our American tradition we want and shall work for only an army adequate to the constant and legitimate use of times of international peace. But we do not to feel that there is a great body of citizens who have received at least the most rudimentary and necessary forms of military training; that they will be ready to form themselves into a fighting force at the call of the nation; and that the nation has the munitions and supplies with which to equip them without delay should it be necessary to call them into action.

"It is with this idea, with this conception in mind that the plans have been made which it will be my privilege to lay before the Congress at its next session. That plan calls for only such an increase in the regular army of the United States as experience has proved to be required for the performance of the necessary duties of the army in the Philippines, in Hawaii, in Porto Rico, upon the border of the United States, at the coast fortifications, and at the military posts of the interior.

"For the rest, it calls for the training within the next three years of a force of 40,000 citizen soldiers to be raised in annual contingents of 133,000 who would be asked to enlist for three years with the colors and receive

Continued on next page

The War in Europe

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

European journalist of many years' standing, military critic; staff leader of the Paris Daily Mail and Le Temps; contributor to L'Indépendance Belge

THE eyes of Europe have been, all this week, fixed upon Serbia and Greece because of the military situation in the former and a new political crisis which developed in the latter.

Taking up the Greek crisis first: it will be remembered that in the very early days of October, King Constantine for the second time dismissed Premier Venizelos, who favored entering the war on the side of the Allies, and that a new ministry was organized under Alexander Zaimis, a former premier, which to a degree obtained the support of the adherents of Venizelos in the Boule, the Greek parliament.

This ministry managed to sustain itself in office, though not commanding a majority in the chamber of its supporters, until Thursday, Nov. 4. On that day a debate in the Boule took such a turn that the premier felt compelled to demand a vote of confidence which, however, was declined by some thirty majority. On the result being announced, the premier and his colleagues resigned their offices and under the Greek constitution it became the duty of the king to select a person to form a new ministry.

The King at first refused to accept these resignations, but finally commissioned M. Skouloudis to form a new Cabinet. This diplomat is understood to be favorably disposed toward the Allies. He accepted the commission and has organized a new Cabinet all the members of which were members of the former Zaimis Ministry. It was feared for a little while that the King would dissolve the parliament, thus bringing about a general election. Although the Venizelos party has a majority in the Chamber, it cannot yet be foretold if a clash will be brought on with the new Ministry. The popular wish seems to be to avoid a dissolution of the parliament.

To the north and east of Greece there is a force composed of some 300,000 Austro-Germans, 350,000 Bulgarians and perhaps from 200,000 to 225,000 Turkish troops, within striking distance of the Greek border towards which they are making strides, as the Serbian resistance is broken and the Serbian armies dispersed. The total Serbian force left active cannot be over 200,000, if it attains this number.

Therefore, any decided move by Greece in favor of the Allies would ultimately bring this avalanche down upon her, and thus her army of 300,000, with the help of say 200,000 Serbians, would be called upon to face double their number. The Allies are, it is true, sending troops to Salonica as rapidly as possible, but up to the present writing have only about 40,000 men, in a position where they could be of use, and to bring up the 400,000 more, which would be needed to equalize the strength of the combatants, would take even under favorable conditions six to eight weeks, during which time the enemy would necessarily not be idle.

On the other hand, should Greece favor the Teutons and their Allies, while such a move would save her from a land attack, the Allies with their strong fleets concentrated in the immediate vicinity of her long and exposed coast line would find no difficulty in attacking her coast and causing irreparable damage. These considerations make it imperative for Greece to align herself in the present circumstances with the most circumspection, as a miscalculation might threaten her independent existence most seriously.

In Serbia, the Teutonic and Bulgarian invasion has been making steady progress during the past week, more rapid in proportion as the Serbian resistance grows weaker. There have been several reports during the week that the Serbian government had notified the Allies that unless help reached it at once it would be obliged to treat for peace, and while there has been no official confirmation of these reports, they seem to be given an air of probability by the circumstances.

An east-and-west line drawn through Parachin, from the Bulgarian frontier to the frontier of Montenegro, represents approximately the position which the Austro-German invasion had reached at the end of the week, all the country to the north of such line to the Danube on furlough, but who, during their three years of enlistment with the colors, would be organized as a standing force, but would be expected merely to undergo intensive training for a very brief period of each year. The training would take place in immediate conjunction with the organized units of the regular army.

Continued on page 1171

The President explained that these plans were not meant to supersede or subordinate the National Guard. The latter would be put on a better and more permanent footing.

In the Navy, he said, is "already a very great efficient force . . . one of the most efficient and notable of the modern time. All it is needed in order to bring it to a point of extraordinary force and efficiency as compared with the other navies of the world is that we should hasten our pace in the policy we have long been pursuing, and that chief of all we should have a definite policy of development, not made from year to year, but long well into the future and planning for definite consummation."

There was no "panic haste," he declared. We were not threatened from any quarter, and in friendly relations with all the world. Our resources are known and our self-respect and ability to care for our citizens and our rights are admitted. He was more interested in "safeguarding at every cost the good faith and honor of the country." Than he was in programmes. If men differed with him he invited them to make their grounds of difference clear. He asked for the support of the whole country—of men of all shades of political opinion—for the carrying out of this programme.

Then followed a passage in the address which threatened gathering—representing many different nationalities heard with mingled fears. The only thing that gave grave concern in recent months "has been that we have been raised in America, professing to be the voices of Americans, which were not kind and in truth American, but which sprang from alien sympathies, which came from men who loved other countries better than their loved America, and had forgotten that the chief and only allegiance was to the government under which they live. The voices have not been very many but they have been very loud and very clamorous. They have proceeded from a few who were big and who were grievously misled." Then as though appreciating the injustice of a characterization so sweepingly applied the President, a little farther on in his address, said: "The vast majority of those who have come to take advantage of America's hospitality have united their spirit with hers as was their fortunes."

Another danger he indicated as religious or sectarian antagonism. "It does not become America," he said, "that within her borders, where every man is free to follow the dictates of his conscience and worship God as he pleases, men should raise the cry of civil against church. To do that is to strike at the very spirit and heart of America. We are a God-fearing people. We agree to disagree about methods of worship, but we are united in believing in Divine Providence and in shipping the God of Nations. We are the champions of religious right here and elsewhere that it may be our privilege to give it our countenance and support. The Government is conscious of the obligation at the nation is conscious of the obligation. No man create divisions where there are none."

The address closed with a passage in which the President's rhetorical art—which is always in evidence in his public addresses—was fully displayed: "Here is the nation God has made by our hands," he said. "What shall we do with it? Who is there who does not stand ready at all times to act in her behalf in a spirit of devoted and disinterested patriotism? We are yet only in the youth of our first consciousness of our power. The day of our country's life is still but in its fresh morning. Let us lift our eyes to the great tasks of life yet to be conquered in the interests of righteous peace. Come, let us renew our allegiance to America, conserve her strength in its purity, make her chief among the who serve mankind, self-reverenced, so commanded, mistress of all forces of quietness, strong above all others in good-will and in the might of invincible justice and right."

RENFELL'S VACATION. Wilfred T. Renfell, "pastor of Labrador," will spend his monetary furlough this winter in active service with the Harvard Unit of Red Cross workers in some hospital in France.

SAPPOINTED, BUT NOT DEFEATED. Whatever capacities for suffrage the women may have shown in states where they are voting in the past, they have at least shown that they are good losers. Defeat in election seems only to stimulate them to greater effort. The day after election the women of New York had begun the new campaign for the franchise, and at a great mass meeting at Cooper Union $100,000 was subscribed in a few minutes. The equal suffrage states are all west of the Mississippi, except Illinois, where there is partial equality. They are largely states of small populations and their example was not sufficient to convince the average conservative Easterner that woman suffrage was either just or desirable. Since 1910 suffrage has been defeated in Massachusetts, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Michigan, Wisconsin, Missouri, Nebraska and the Dakotas. Ohio and Wisconsin having voted twice and having increased the adverse majorities at the second elections. Women now vote in Arizona, California, Colorado, Idaho, Illinois (limited), Kansas, Montana, Nevada, Oregon, Utah, Washington and Wyoming. The adverse majorities just piled up in Massachusetts, New York, New Jersey, and Pennsylvania were large enough to show that the East is not yet ready for this radical advance in the theory of government. New York's majority against the proposition was more than 200,000; Massachusetts' 127,650, and New Jersey's 51,000. On the other hand, boss-ridden Pennsylvania almost gave the women the vote, the majority against them being not far from 60,000. A great many thousands of men voted for suffrage and the number of men whom it is necessary to cause to change their minds in order to carry the proposition next time is comparatively small. It will be impossible for suffrage again to reach a vote in New York before 1919, and in Jersey before 1920, though meanwhile the women may succeed in securing the equal suffrage amendment to the Federal Constitution. The conduct of the women at the polls in New York, and the quietness of the election as a earnestness." "It may here be recorded for the first time," says one society of which Mr. Ridder was a member, "that his personal gift made possible one of the large buildings at Spring Valley used every summer by hundreds of the poor children of New York. . . . He came to be looked upon by all his fellow citizens as a leader in every worthy project." The Publishers' Association of New York City adopted a minute in which occur these words: "We, his business associates, remember Mr. Ridder as just and fearless, fair and courteous, helpful and friendly, always preferring the common good to personal advantage. . . . The city and the newspapers of the United States will miss him gravely." The American Irish Historical Society, the Industrial Emigrant Industrial Savings Bank, and other societies and institutions to which he belonged passed special resolutions of respect and sorrow. The funeral services of Mr. Ridder, held at the Church of the Blessed Sacrament, at which Cardinal Farley and other high dignitaries of the church officiated, were attended by great throngs, among whom were such eminent men as Prince Hatzfeldt of the German Embassy at Washington, Mayor Mitchel, Melville E. Stone, and many other equally prominent men from both business and political circles. Mr. Ridder's death was

Secretary of Labor Wilson, in the Presence of Leading Labor Representatives, Including Samuel Gompers, President of the American Federation of Labor, Turns First Shovelful of Earth for the New $200,000 Building to Be Erected at Washington by the American Federation of Labor result of their presence there as watchers, gave many men a new idea of some of the possibilities of suffrage.

WAR-CARE STRIKES DOWN A PROMINENT AMERICAN. Characterized by all who knew him as a man of friendships, Herman Ridder, publisher, died at his home in New York on the first of November after a lingering illness, at the age of sixty-four years. As publisher of the leading German newspaper of the country, the Staats-Zeitung, a powerful organ, Mr. Ridder's name became well known throughout the world. In a smaller circle he was best known for his untiring interest in civic affairs, especially such as made for the betterment of the poor. Born in New York City, he had but a few years of public school instruction, and then began his business career as an errand boy, and in 1880 became a stockholder in the paper that he eventually controlled. The war made a deep and, as it proved, a mortal impression upon Mr. Ridder, and he cast all his strength into a frank effort to allay anti-German feeling in this country. In doing so he said: "I could not be blind to the dangers of misinterpretation to which I might be open. I assumed the task as in duty bound, not as a German subject, which I am not, but as an American, which I am; not to create ill-feeling among Americans of diverse sympathies, but to allay it. Truth alone can survive, and upon truth alone can be founded the lasting impressions which must follow inevitably the present war." The New York Times says of him editorially: "His interest in public affairs was very broad indeed, and he gave his personal influence and support and the influence and support of his newspaper to many causes, and to none without sincerity and brought on largely by his intense concern in the war, and by business troubles that involved his fortune in the failure of a newly projected typesetting machine company. For some months before his death he was in the doctor's care, but the end came suddenly, and scarcely an hour before he became unconscious he uttered practically his last words: "May peace soon be with us."

EVANGELIST SUNDAY AGAIN IN THE EAST. Rev. William A. Sunday began a campaign in Syracuse, N. Y., October 31, with a combined attendance at three meetings of 30,000 in a tabernacle which will hold 11,000. A definite arrangement for his New York City campaign may be made during these meetings.

ADHESIVE EXHORTATIONS. "Go to church next Sunday" is the message which will be carried by your correspondents if you make use of an attractive stamp which the American Tract Society has prepared. The stamp is intended to be used to seal the flap of your envelope. The proceeds from the sale of the stamps are to be used in creating Christian literature in the Spanish language for Latin America.

HIGH OFFICIALS LAUNCH MILITIA AIRBOAT. It was doubtless a pleasantry on the part of the National Guard of New York State to delegate some of its "highest officers" to attend the launching of the first hydroaeroplane as yet acquired by the naval branch of the state's militia. However, the craft, which is of course a flying boat, not sooner was flicked off the pier into the water after a bottle of champagne had at the sixth blow been smashed against its side to make the name "N. Y. N. 1." stick, than it rose out of reach of even the highest of the officers and sailed away to alight later off Grant's tomb. Governor Whitman was present with his six-year-old daughter, who made the first of the unsuccessful attempts to break the bottle. His staff also attended, as well as representatives of the regular army and navy. The craft is a gift made possible chiefly by Glenn H. Curtiss. Naval militiamen are expected to man the flying corps of the regular navy.

AGED CANADIAN STATESMAN DIES. The Right Hon. Sir Charles Tupper, Bart., Privy Councillor, died in England October 30, aged ninety-four years. This noted statesman was born in Nova Scotia, and rose to a position of much influence during the formative period of Canadian politics. He was a contemporary of Lord Strathcona in the development of Canada's railroads and canals.

THE PEOPLE SPEAK AGAIN. Politically this is an off year, yet because of certain well-defined issues and the relative importance of this year's expression of the voters as a guide to next year's possibilities, the elections held on November 2 in eight of the states received more than the usual amount of attention from national political organizations. In Ohio the prohibition question was before the voters, and they were also asked to vote upon an amendment to the constitution that would have prevented another submission of the prohibition question for six years. Both amendments were defeated; but the majority against prohibition was less than 40,000. Last year the adverse majority was 84,152. Pennsylvania, New York and Massachusetts voted on equal suffrage and in each state the women were defeated. In Kentucky, former Congressman A. O. Stanley was the Democratic candidate for governor. He ran on a "local option" platform, his Republican opponent championing prohibition. The reports do not indicate to what extent the temperance question influenced the voting. At the time of this writing Stanley appeared to have been elected, although the election was not yet conceded by his opponents. In Maryland a Democratic governor was elected by a slender majority, and the Democrats retained control of the legislature by a narrow margin. Four amendments to the constitution were ratified; they provide for the referendum, reform in taxation, home rule for Baltimore and parole in criminal cases. In Massachusetts Governor Walsh, a Democrat, was seeking reelection. The Bay State is normally Republican. Although Walsh ran better than he did a year ago, yet a large falling off in the Progressive vote and an even larger increase in the Republican vote left Governor Walsh 12,000 votes behind at the finish. The result in Mississippi was forecasted in the Democratic primaries in August, and the Democrats retain the government of the state intact. In New York the voters decided not to adopt the new constitution, prepared at a cost of $1,000,000. Its outstanding features were a provision for the short ballot, the governor and principal officers only being elective, all other offices being appointive, and a provision for a budget system of state finance. The proposed constitution was too radical for the conservatives and too conservative for the radicals, and most of the electors couldn't understand what it was all about anyway, so they buried it deeper than any similar proposition has ever been buried in our political history. The chief interests in Pennsylvania were equal suffrage, and the municipal contest in Philadelphia. The Penrose interests recaptured the city government by a majority of more than 70,000. Tammany also annexed the district attorney's office, the sheriff's office and the Board of Aldermen in New York City. The Republicans retained control of the legislature of New York.

IMMIGRATION AT EBB TIDE. The increase of our population by immigration in the fiscal year ended June 30, 1914, was 769,276; for the year ended June 30, 1915, it was 50,070. During the next three months, July, August, September, 85,606 immigrants arrived here and 90,813 aliens left, a net decrease in our alien population of 5,207. Of these latter totals nearly 50,000 Italians sailed away and about 7,500 arrived; and also over 13,000 English.

AMERICA THE ONLY NAVAL GUEST AT CORONATION. The cruiser Saratoga, flagship of the Asiatic fleet, Admiral A. G. Winterhalter commander, was reported ordered to represent the United States at the coronation of the Japanese emperor (described elsewhere in this issue), and it is stated that this will be the only foreign warship to be present—a sign of special friendship to us, in the opinion of some. Few other nations have warships to spare for peaceful demonstrations at present, however. As early as November 1 the Japanese had begun to don their coronation clothes preparatory to the three weeks' ceremonies.

PRESIDENT'S WEDDING PLANS. It is officially announced that the wedding of President Wilson and Mrs. Galt will take place at the bride's home in Washington, near the close of December, probably in the last week, the honeymoon journey being likely, therefore, to rob Washington of the customary presidential New Year's reception.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is published weekly by The Christian Herald, 100 North House, Fourth Avenue, New York City, N. Y. Subscriptions: $1.00 per year in advance. Single copies, 10 cents. Entered as Second-Class Matter, October 3, 1879. Postage paid at New York, N. Y., and at additional mailing offices. Accepted for mailing at special rate of postage provided for in Act of October 3, 1917. Authorized to mail at this rate. POSTMASTER: Send address changes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 100 North House, New York, N. Y.

the United States, Canada and Mexico, all one dollar a year in advance, prepaid.

CHANGE OF DATE.—It takes at least two weeks to change the date, after your subscription is renewed.

EXPIRATION OF SUBSCRIPTION. The date on the wrapper indicates when your subscription ends.

CHANGE OF ADDRESS.—It requires three weeks to make this change. Give both the old and new address.

LETTERS should be addressed to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 100 North House, New York.

Editor: Walter D. Miller
Business Manager: Walter D. Miller
Office Department, Ottawa

Inexcusable Transgression

A SERMON BY REV. S. PARKES CADMAN*

TEXT: John 15:22. "If I had not come and spoken unto them, they had not had sin."

THE advent of Jesus fulfilled with culminating solemnity the laws of Holy Scripture as laid down by Moses and the prophets. His judicial and convicting work was subordinated to the transcendent graciousness and compassion of his ministry, but those who suppose it was entirely absent, or who underrate the sterner aspects of the Gospel, should recall that he re-established Sinai in every human soul.

Such mistaken people are inclined to regard the sacred ordinances as the enemies of their gains, pleasures, conveniences, caprices and gratifications. Others, scarcely less reprehensible but more vile, permit their lower nature with its sinful appetites and lusts to dictate to their higher and spiritual being. In reality, the divine legislation which forbids these debasing habits and pursuits is a series of wise and beneficent provisions issuing from the heavenly Father, who is deeply concerned for the honor and welfare of all his children. And when Christ appeared, he enforced these provisions both by example and precept, illuminating them with a clearness divine which forbade error or confusion as to their meaning.

For God is not a greedy potentate, proclaiming mandates which exact the utmost they can give from his unfortunate subjects, nor a wilful tyrant compelling obedience to the motions of his unlicensed will. The Law-Giver is also the Life-Giver; he hates nothing, but loves all he has created in benevolence for his glory. His prohibitions are concealed mercies; every "thou shalt not" of Holy Writ is a bolt and bar on the gates of perdition; every positive requirement is in absolute harmony with the highest functions of human intelligence and conscience. Notwithstanding the undoubted good of these regulations they have met with undeserved antagonism. Secret or manifest rebellion against them brought sin into the world, and after sin came death, and after death, the judgment. Even those whose lips vowed obedience were recreant in heart, and found excuse in the severe majesty and inexorable consequences of the law. They did not lack faith in its origin or its surety, but they declared it was too lofty and noble for mortals to attain. Blessed with a code of infinite superiority, which stood forth from those of surrounding tribes as a rock rearing out of a desert place, nevertheless the Hebrews confessed their failure to be governed by such ineffable justice, and St. Paul, who had made a signal effort in this direction, admitted that by the deeds of the law no man living could be justified.

IN after generations the same difficulty prevailed. Cursed by the wayward impulses of their unregenerated spirits, men were scandalized and agitated by the vision of excellence in revelation, in contrast with their actual reprobate and degraded condition. Their eyes gazed on the stars above, their feet were detained in the clay beneath, helpless and distracted. They longed for a Deliverer who could end the breach between what they were and what they knew they ought to be.

Then came the Christ, the Desire of all nations, to show that law and love were one in the Father's purpose; that both were given as a unity to save and bless, not to repudiate and condemn. The all-comprehending affection Jesus incarnated presented this vital truth with such overwhelming sweetness and attraction that he left us without reason for our evil conduct, or a sufficient answer for our failure to obey the eternal will. Yet he consented to spare the guilty, and where punishment might have been fittingly inflicted it was patiently restrained.

Every word and action of the Redeemer during the days of his flesh were bent to the softening of hardened hearts, the taming of fiery tempers, the subduing of stubborn wills, the reconciliation of alienated offspring. Those who in ignorance and in the despair which ignorance fosters had contended against heaven were now shown that their Judge was their Friend; that further resistance became treason; that the goodness of God was meant to move them toward repentance, and to enable them to fulfil the glorious aims of their existence. Yet, then as now, the sinful and depraved, rendered morally blind and incapable by inherited and personal iniquity, extenuated their offenses, and plead that their hapless state was an invincible despotism which they could not control, and for which they should not be held responsible. Sin for them was either an abstraction or an unescaped reality.

SO far as this apology applies to us, there are some natures in which hereditary tendencies and environment have made a fearful havoc. Circumstances sway weak and yielding souls, inborn instincts move them toward the gulfs of moral anarchy. Habit fastens its fetters on action till it seems irreversible. The gracious promises of salvation fall unheeded on ears deafened by the tumult of illicit passion. We look upon these struggling waifs in the whirlpools of life, men and women of open and abandoned shamelessness, with mingled pity and hopelessness, yet the more fortunate ones who have received the godly instruction and clean blood of Christian parentage should not judge them heedlessly. None but the All-knowing can determine what is the residuum of self-directing power left in sinners of prolonged vices. It is far more salutary to set before them the Christ who is able to save men to the uttermost, to remind them that he came upon the scene of sin and woe, not only as the Revealer of the heart of God, but as the Master of the hearts of men.

As he once cast out the demons, restored the fallen, forgave the contrite, upraised the low and illumined the slaves of darkness, so has he ever continued to do. The shadows that haunt the prospects of the worst can be dispelled, the manhood which has lowered its banner to the foe can be reinstated. In the strength which he imparts we become rulers of our own domain, and order, peace and authority obtain in every province of the heart and mind. These are unalterable truths in which the servants of God can rejoice, on which the sinner can always rely. The regenerated man looks upon the law, not with fear and aversion, but with delight; hails it as the lamp for his path, and runs in the way of its commandment. The fact that such immense possibilities for our renewal and obedience are found in all who have heard the Gospel brings with it commensurate responsibilities. The indwelling Spirit who is the gift of the Godhead searches every nook and cranny where our villainess hides, and rebukes transgression, whether it skulks in privacy or stalks in the open. Hereafter we cannot be as we were, nor elude the fate which has thus been demonstrated.

When a man is held captive by brigands in a mountain cave, he is unable to respond to the call of his king for help against the invader. It is not infidelity in him if he does not appear to aid in the rescue of the state. But if his ransom has been paid, his bonds snapped, and he is once more a free man, if he should then turn back in the day of battle and betray the cause, his blood is on his own head.

Think of the commonwealth of God to which we are debtors, of its present necessities, of its loud cries for help, of the millions at home and abroad who literally perish for lack of knowledge. Think again that the risen Christ is in the midst of the Church, ay, in your own soul's furthest depths; that his life may be our life, his omnipotent redemption our endowment. And what answer have we for lingering and halting when his trumpets sound the advance? Awake, thou that sleepest, and arise from the dead, and Christ shall give thee life. He cannot be one thing for himself and another for his brethren. Wherever he is there is liberty, in him we are God's husbandry, through him we can overcome individual and social sin and selfishness, and make mankind to share in the domestic protection and bliss of the one fold and the one Shepherd.

THE trouble is that we usually associate everything relative to the supreme victories of Jesus to apostolic days, forgetful that the influence of the Gospel is far greater now than then. The attestations of twenty centuries of Christian history and experience confirm the grandeur and significance of God's law and his mercy. We are not left to the deceptive and diluted stuff which is frequently paraded as divine truth. Excessive dogmas and usurping priesthoods cannot veil the ancient sacrifice on Calvary. There it still stands, and around that cross gather myriad hosts of the saints who set to their seal that this deliverance standeth sure and that the voice which rolls the stars along speaks all the promises.

Again, the real temple of the Highest Will is not in cloister nor sanctuary; it is in your own reason, conscience and will. Without the actual presence of the Lord there, these faculties would be as dumb as the shrines of Luxor or Karnak. Let the teaching of Jesus standardize your moral and spiritual sense and whatever they ask of you, render them without hesitation. Do not approach the New Testament merely anxious to avoid the penal outcome of your transgression. For the most mischievous form of skepticism are seen in that mind which is quick to believe but slow to obey, ready to make a mat of offering but unwilling to submit. The self-deceiving policy, which endeavors to purchase relief in belief of further wrong-doing, can never take the place of an unconditional surrender to the will of heaven or know the joy of that fellowship wherein all we live and are is blended in the current of everlasting righteousness.

The lack of immediate perfectness in the Christian life has also kept back many from seeking its possession. Because they cannot be saints at a bound, they decline the overtures of their High Priest. Yet of all the lost ones he recovered, while here on earth became complete on the spot. He labored with the twelve apostles and prayed for their leader, yet Satan might have him and sift him as wheat, yet every cripple he healed became a Hercules, nor every blind man an astronomer. But they could at last walk and see and live again, and a band of fishermen were crowned as monarchs in a renewed world.

Having Jesus, we possess all things; never again can men lament that life is not worth while, at its pernicious hindrances cannot be overcome. For Man, even the God Man, is indissolubly bound up with our growth in purity, in truth, in justice and service. To reject him is to reject the best we know, the only source of eternal life, and no action could be more appalling in itself, or in its ultimate results.

IF his manifestation had been made in aloofness, without any consideration for our humiliation and disgrace, we might have turned from it. But Christ never sought his reputation at our expense. On the contrary, he was found in fashion as a man, and in his solicitude for us became obedient to death, even the death of the Cross. He came to share the throne with the slave, to pluck the tef and the harlot from the stew and make them to sit in heavenly places with himself. Closely identified as he was with his Father's government, its laws and penalties; knowing as he did the bitter root and fruitage of the sin he hated, he placed the law in the keeping of regenerated hearts, and translated in such acts of filial reverence and affection that we have discovered in it our springs of healing and satisfaction.

How then can we face unrepentant and unforgotten the Judge who is also our Brother and Redeemer? The ministry he has borne toward the conscience of the will make our continued resistance a gratuitous malignancy, a cold and callous contempt for a suffering, bleeding, dying Christ. Self-caused separation from that which is right and holy exhausts even the faculties of God. We have but to ask, Does sin shorten life, and fill the balance of days with useless remorse? Does it pollute the very being, the altar, the heart, the whole existence of the individual and the race? Does it inflict untold misery and desolation on the innocent as well as the guilty? Before heaven demand it does these and more than these. So severe is the law of God, the statutes of man, the testimony of science, the evidence of the physical, the ghastly spectacles of moral depravity, the horrid throngs of the lazar house, the jail, the asylum.

Cease then to fulminate against those faithful preachers who assert the doctrine of retribution. If they ceased their efforts to warn and instruct a helpless age, the very stones of the street would take up the parable. Accuse law, accuse science, accuse history, accuse the courts of justice, before you turn those who remember that every sin brings its entail, and that the offense and the retribution grow on the same stem.

Caiaphas was far worse than Pilate, when he conspired to slay the noblest benefactor that the world has known, because Caiaphas had been the creator of truth which he scorned and of light which he could not darkness. Those to whom this message comes have a greater truth and light than Caiaphas enjoyed. They are forever associated with him who said, "If I had not come and spoken unto them, they had not had sin." Encircled by all his offers they plunge into the gulf in the full blaze of heavenly radiance and privilege. The lesson is this: avoid as you would a fatal pestilence any trifling with the most solemn and awful facts which arise out of this consideration of divine love.

*Pastor Central Congregational Church, Brooklyn.

Daily Meditation

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR. LED BY

J. H. JOWETT, D.D., F. B. MEYER, D.D., REV. E. WHITTIER CASWELL AND CLAYTON SEDGWICK COOPER

Self-Communication

SUNDAY, November 21. John 7:38. "Out of him shall proceed rivers." Every life is the birthplace of a river. A current of energy flows out of it which we call its influence. A man liveth unto himself. A man may limit his visible fellowships. He may restrain his speech and live in comparative silence. He may control his activities, and live in comparative solitude. But he cannot destroy his influence. By no device or expedient can he confine that river. That river comes from every life, a bearer of vitality and benediction, or a bearer of devastation and death. I have no choice as to whether or not my life shall give birth to a river, but I can choose what kind of river it shall be. The Master speaks of men and women from whose lives flow "rivers of living water." We must go to Egypt, or to Galilee, or to some parts of Asia Minor if we want to gather the full power of the Saviour's words. We must watch the streams of vitalizing power irrigating the otherwise parched and barren ground. The river is the minister of quickening, and anything it touches lifts its head in an access of new life. And there are lives whose influence is just like that. They are quickening ministers in the fellowship. The faint are heartened in their presence. The weary are refreshed. The sluggish are awakened. Those who have had a hard lot to till mysterious powers of irrigation in their communion. There is a certain positiveness about their lives which stirs the hesitant, a certain strength of purpose which confirms the timid. They are "rivers of life," and the river flows in their silences as well as in their speech, when they quietly wait as they adventurously serve.

Who is the man whose life is so vital and vitalizing? "That believeth in Me!" It is the man who by faith is in communion with the Lord. By faith we sit with him on his throne; and "out of the throne" he proceeds a river of water of life, clear as crystal. We become "partakers of the divine nature."

J. H. J.

Comfort for Weary Souls

MONDAY, November 22. Isa. 49:24-50:11. "A word in season to him who is weary." All at one time or another, become weary. There is no novel in this; but the great novelty consists in the infinite care that God takes of the weary. There is nothing like it outside the Bible and the creature to which it has given birth. Man hears the composure that scores of weary ones have fallen out of the march of human life, and lie stretched on the burning sand, doomed to expire unless help is sent to them. God, on the other hand, though inhabiting eternity, expends his care on the lame, the maimed, and blind; gathers up broken fragments, and broods over every weary heart.

But God's tenderness would have been largely hidden from our knowledge, had it not been for the great Servant who speaks from these pages, and combines with the form of a servant equality with Jehovah. No one ever comforted the weary as he did. He could not behold a great multitude without being moved with compassion for them and beginning to comfort them with promises of eternal rest. How many weary ones he sustained by his words; to how many did he speak a word in season! Ask him, speaking after the manner of men, whence he derived that matchless power and he will answer, "The Lord God gave it me. In his great love my Father redeemed me up to be their Shepherd, wakening me morning by morning to a fresh lesson of mercy and sympathy, comforting me amid the assaults of my foes and the gloom of dark hours, that I might be able to comfort others, as I had been comforted by my Father." There is no other way in which we can be taught to do the same divine work. F. B. M.

The Temple of the Holy Spirit

TUESDAY, November 23. I Kings 8:27. "But will God indeed dwell on the earth? Behold, the heaven and heaven of heavens cannot contain thee; how much less this house that I have builded?" The Temple of Solomon is suggestive to us of many things; one of the lessons we learn from it is the truth of co-operation in the building of a nation or a character or the temple of God on earth. Solomon engaged a vast army of workmen; a hundred and eighty three thousand and six hundred, for a period of seven years labored in common interest on the temple of the wise Jewish king. The whole nation had a hand in the building.

There is a greater temple to which allusion is made in the verse of the day—a temple not made with hands, the temple in which dwelleth the Spirit of God. We are all to be contributors to it—a vast myriad of workers; each bringing his or her little bit of service or talent. We are each and all responsible for the raising of its invisible walls. I may add a material brick to the foundation of its earthly worshiping place; you may give your song to its choir; another may add patience for the long years of building; still others may lend their strong arms for the carrying of the burdens in the hours of noon, while the weak and faint may bring their sins to its altar of sacrifice.

The gates of this temple of the living God are open to all. Through many different portals, the sons and daughters of men will enter to give their thanks and to bring their offerings. Some whose names we do not know have been working with us in the construction of this spiritual dwelling-place for the soul. Some whom we have placed as among the least helpful are working at some obscure task which will enrich the eternal beauty of the finished House of the Spirit. C. S. C.

Fruitfulness Through Training and Discipline

WEDNESDAY, November 24. John 15:18-27. "Appointed you that ye should go and bring forth fruit." The word translated appoint carries with it the idea of being fixed to a definite place by the gardener, who desires to get the utmost from the branch of an unusual plant.

Go into your hothouse, and see how the experienced hand brings the wild and wayward branch under control. At first it sways to and fro after its own wild will, but in doing so it misses the golden sunlight that awaits it on a certain unoccupied space of the vineyard wall. There, ultimately, it is fixed with a bit of cloth to bind and hold it fast, and a nail driven into the wall itself. The position is a constrained and painful one. The branch resists and threatens to expire in the anguish of its despair. It is as though it were crucified. But after a while, as the sap pours itself upward, attracted by the golden sunshine, it finds itself bearing much and abiding fruit, it acquires power with God in prayer, before undreamt of, and things which had previously seemed hopeless become pleasant and easy.

Is not this a parable of life? The great husbandman desires fruit that may redound to his glory and abound unto our own account. But we are strong and wayward. We gird ourselves and walk whither we will. Finally the hand of Love and Pity takes us in hand and fixes us to a cold barren piece of wall. The means he uses to effect his purpose are often very clumsy in appearance. We resent the iron of the nail and the coarse texture of the cloth. We go through the world rattling our chains and complaining. We lift our manacled hands, saying in a tone Paul never used, "Remember my bonds." But through it all Jesus is glorified and souls are won, and our fruit remains. F. B. M.

Concentration in the Christian Life

THURSDAY, November 25. Phil. 3:14. "I press toward the mark for the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus." Paul was a believer in concentration. He wrote to his friends at Philippi that he was determined to turn his back on the past and to give himself with determined resolution to the prize which was his chief and worth-while goal, "his high calling of God."

It was said of Rossetti that he could paint as well as he could sing. This is not usually true. Versatility is inclined to spell failure in most men's lives. Even in this age of specialists most of us are in danger of scattering. We attempt too many things. We fail because we do not focus our energy and effectiveness upon one main issue that for us is the thing in life. "Too many irons in the fire" is the popular epitaph the world places above many a brilliant man's scattered genius and multitudinous work. There are different causes for this kind of failure. One cause is resting on some past victory or fine accomplishment or great experience. Certain modern writers who have written fine things are in danger of living on their past, and do not attain, by lack of steady concentration on some great present point of their power. The prizes and the honors of yesterday are the marks of their ruin.

Some of us as Christians think and speak and live on the religious experience that happened years ago. We have not forgotten the things behind and we are not stretching forward to the things before. We are frustrating our present by our memory of the past. Paul had much reason to be satisfied. He had become a great preacher to the Gentiles and had endured many stripes and imprisonment for the sake of the Name, yet he counted not that he had attained. He felt he was in danger of resting upon his past and not realizing sufficiently and clearly enough the great glowing ideal of the present.

What is the luminous goal of the Christian? Paul would call it the high calling of God in Christ. Another way to phrase it would be the "spirit of Christ." There are many great men whose example would help. There is only one whose light was not dimmed by any darkness at all. Concentration upon the spirit of Christ as a working norm—in this lies Christian certainty. C. S. C.

Keeping "Unspotted from the World"

FRIDAY, November 26. I Tim. 5:14-25. "Keep thyself pure." This is a great injunction, which needs to be carefully obeyed. The world is so filled with the microbes of corruption that we can very easily become tainted in heart and imagination, if not in outward act. We may have inherited through our bodies the evil tendencies and proclivities of our ancestors; and for us, therefore, the fight is harder than if we had come of a race which had practiced the grace of continence until it had become a firmly ingrained habit. But still, whatever our heredity amounts to, let us dare to believe in the redemption that is in Christ Jesus, and offered to us according to the riches of God's grace.

There are some who are always avoiding, we might almost say, "dodging," the microbes of evil, and we honor them for it; but it is still better to be so filled with the purity of our Lord that we may present no foothold for sinful suggestions and desires. Just as the cloud of the Shekinah-glory settled down on Solomon's temple, so that the very priests could not remain, so the consuming fire of the Spirit's indwelling may make us impervious to temptation.

So long as we are in the world we shall be liable to temptation; in fact, the nearer we live to Christ, the more furious the attacks will be. The enemy's missiles will be aimed at the Captain and those who are in his close proximity. But where the strong life of the indwelling Saviour is regnant within us, there will be no response in our soul, but horror and loathing. We shall become more and more sensitive to evil, and meet it on the horizon, instead of waiting for the bayonet-point in the entrenchments. F. B. M.

The Soul's Love for Its Redeemer

SATURDAY, November 27. John 21:17. "Thou knowest all things; Thou knowest that I love thee." Why should I not love thee, "Jesus, Lover of my soul?" Thou didst choose me from before the foundation of the world, that I should be holy and without blame, before thee, in love. Thine eyes didst see my substance before my birth; thou didst bend over my babyhood with the compassion of the mother God, when I was too little to love thee back. I am accepted in the Beloved; how precious are thy thoughts unto me! Having loved me before my beginning, thou wilt love me unto the ending, and then in the unending life. Thou didst ascend to prepare a place for me among the palaces of eternity. Thou hast wrought out robes for my wedding feast, that are without spot or wrinkle or blemish, worthy of the Bride, the Lamb's wife, made white in his blood. Thy heart has become as my heart, that I may love as thou dost.

O may I never distrust thee, displease thee, or dishonor thee, who hast loved me with an everlasting love! May I always believe that thou wilt never leave me alone, never forsake me nor forget me! May I at last hear thy voice, whispering, "It is enough; come up higher, unto the riches of my glory, unto the love of my bosom, unto the home of my everlasting residence." E. W. C.

Our Editorial Forum

PRESIDENT
OTTO KOENIG

MANAGING EDITOR
GEO. H. SANDISON

SECRETARY
THEODORE WATERS

Who's Who in Heaven

WHO'S WHO" has long been the standard of social, political, artistic, military, educational and ecclesiastical achievement. It is a book, published yearly in England, including graciously a few Americans, giving the names of men and women who, the editors believe, have earned a place in this hall of the living famous. For a number of years an American "Who's Who" has been issued, in which persons who are considered great in America but are not so considered in England have their names and records inscribed. Now a great Protestant denomination in the United States is getting out its own "Who's Who," in which will appear the names and records of those whose achievements and preferences have attracted the attention of its editors. Probably there is nothing seriously objectionable about this project. The book will undoubtedly be valuable. It will give the rank and file of the denomination an opportunity to keep posted on the personalities and careers of their leaders; it will afford reporters and editors both of the secular and religious press a valuable guide in their work; it will get the leaders themselves more intimately acquainted with one another and so should promote a more efficient cooperation.

But, after all—Who's Who in Heaven? Is not that the big question? To have one's name in a book of successful or famous people—there is something gratifying about that. But every one so included might humbly ask himself the question: "How do I stand in the Honor Roll of heaven?" And those who have never been thought of for any earthly "Who's Who" should not spend a moment's regret over that. They have all the opportunity in the world for winning a high place in the eternal records. There will be some great surprises when these records are disclosed. Two the world already knows of will be among the highest—a poor woman who put two farthings into the temple treasury, another who anointed the feet of a tired teacher-healer in a dusty country long ago. But how many more—those who have remembered that inasmuch as a thoughtful, helpful deed has been done to a child, a prisoner, an invalid, it has been done to heaven's King!

Real riches, highest honor, thorough success—and these noted on eternal records—all may be had by any who will take them. To love most, to give most, to forget self most, to serve most—this is the way into the pages of heaven's "Who's Who."

The Panama Conference

AS THERE seems to be a good deal of misapprehension concerning the object of the Panama Missionary Conference—which has, no doubt, helped to intensify the dissension at the recent meeting of the Board of Missions of the Protestant Episcopal Church in New York—we welcome an authoritative statement on the subject by the Rev. Randolph H. McKim, of Washington, D. C., which appears in a recent issue of the Chronicle, of Poughkeepsie, N. Y. Dr. McKim shows conclusively that there is no ground for the assumption that the predominant note in the conference will be anti-Roman, and Dr. Manning's assertions to that effect are pronounced purely gratuitous. The Edinburgh conference, in 1910, at which the call was issued, by unanimous vote declared the policy of the proposed conference at Panama to be "to recognize all the elements of truth and righteousness in any form of religious faith. Our approach to the people shall be neither critical nor antagonistic, but inspired by the teachings and example of Christ, and by that charity which thinketh no evil and rejoiceth in the truth." The Panama Conference, he declares, is not to be organized for legislation on ecclesiastical questions, or even on missionary policy, "but for the honest investigation of the problems of missionary work in Latin America, and for full brotherly conference as to how the needs of Latin America can be most effectively met by the Gospel of Christ." Nor is it true, he adds, that the Catholic Church is excluded from the Conference; indeed, no church has been specially invited. The Catholic Church has had just as much notice and invitation as any other community.

In view of this authoritative statement, the attitude assumed by Bishop Weller of Wisconsin, Dr. Manning, and their associates, was altogether unjustifiable. It is now shown to have been based, first of all, on a wrong presumption. Their attempt to raise the cry of anti-Catholicism against the Conference could have but one interpretation: they judged that at last the opportunity had come for the Catholic propagandists in the Protestant Episcopal Church to raise the banner of revolt and fight it out in the open. "For years," says the Chronicle, "they have been blasting and burrowing at the foundations of our faith. They have manipulated bishops into their sacred office for political purposes. They have demoralized the minds of many of the laity, men and women and children, by the insidiousness of papers, books, tracts, preaching missions, and through the media of private schools for boys and girls. Now, by attacking the Board of Missions for its sensible and plainly Christian attitude toward the Panama Conference, for what seems to us unworthy motives, they would discredit the Protestant Episcopal Church throughout Protestant Christendom. For what? For their own narrow selfish ends."

Dr. McKim quotes the Bishop of Argentina as having declared that Latin America is largely without true religion. This statement is supported by many other sources, missionary and secular. It has been asserted by no less distinguished an authority than Viscount Bryce that pagan idol-worship is mingled with Christian worship in some of those countries. That a large part of Latin America is good missionary ground cannot be successfully disputed, although occasional fanatical outbursts, like that of the oburgatory and demagogic pastoral issued by the Bishop of Panama, may be expected.

Real Stories of Christian Experience

THERE are few things so helpful and inspiring as the record of actual Christian experiences. In these trying times, when it is becoming the fashion to say that Christianity is a failure, there are none who know so well the untruth of this as the humble, earnest follower of Christ, who is living a daily life of faith and service. The Christian type is very far from being run out in the world. This is a time for godly, consecrated men and women, who are making the service of Christ and humanity their chief object in life, to proclaim their experiences for the spiritual benefit of others. Among our readers there are many such, who are making the world better for living in it. We invite them to send to the Christian Herald a brief account of their experiences and of their methods of spreading the truth and winning souls. The world already knows of those who are prominent in public Christian activities; now we want to know about the quiet workers, those who are not in the public eye, and yet who are advancing the interests of the Kingdom by every means in their power. We hope to publish these experiences from week to week, for the sake of the stimulating influence they will exert on others.

Nations That Fell

IN his notable book entitled "Divine Inspiration," Dr. George Preston Mains has this striking passage: "God's spirit has always been present in the world and in all nations there have been men who have responded in larger or less measure to the illuminations of this spirit. Christ's redeeming work did not begin when he was born in Bethlehem; it had begun as the Word of conscience, the Word 'very nigh' to man, in all men, in all ages."

That God has had his witnesses in all ages of the world and in all lands—men and women whose spirits were divinely illuminated—is not inconsistent with Christian doctrine. We know from their writings that many of the early philosophers had views which could only have been inspired from a Divine source. And this line of witnesses will be found to exist however far we penetrate backward in the history of human thought. We unfailingly find the assured evidences of spiritual inspiration.

A distinguished student of archeology and the religions of the human race, Mr. J. Henry Smith of Washington, D. C., in a recent letter to Professor Edgar J. Banks makes some very interesting deductions bearing on the references in prophecy to the earliest forms of religion in Assyria, Arabia and Mesopotamia. He writes: "I have been much interested reading in the Christian Herald of September 8 your article entitled 'The Sumerian Epic of Paradise.' It is marvelous what excavations have brought to light in the lands of the Bible, changing materially views of the past and showing indubitably, what was once never dreamed of, that long prior to Moses and the generally accepted time of Creation, great nations flourished in the valleys of the Tigris and Euphrates, having long established religions and possessing a knowledge of spiritual things once supposed to be exclusively the product and property of the Jews. . . . That a religion of a high order once flourished in Assyria seems to be evident from what is said in a symbolic way of Assyria in the 31st chapter of Ezekiel, which opens with the declaration that the Assyrian was a cedar in Lebanon with five branches, whose height was exalted above all the trees of the field. All the trees of Eden which were in the garden of God envied him, it is said. Not any tree in the Garden of God was like unto him in his beauty. But the Assyrian became lifted up and vain in the imagination of his heart and fell from his high estate. He descended into hell and in the 15th and 16th verses of this wonderful chapter, which every theologian ought to make a study of, the Lord pours out a lamentation over the spiritual decline and fall of Assyria. . . . I consider this one of the grandest passages in our language, and it contains a hint as to a high spiritual state in Assyria at one time that is well worthy of thoughtful consideration. Of Tyre it is said (Ezekiel 28), 'Thou hast been in Eden the Garden of God. . . . Thou wast perfect in thy ways from the day thou wast created till iniquity was found in thee. . . . therefore will I cast thee as a defilement out of the mountain of God. . . . Thou hast defiled thy sanctuaries by the multitude of thine iniquities.' This language shows that Tyre once had sacred places of true worship, which became defiled by filthy abominations. I think our sacred Scriptures bear abundant testimony to the fact that many years ago there prevailed a spiritual religion among mankind which declined and became idolatrous."

These suggestions are far-reaching and indicate a practically new line of investigation for students of the old Bible, which contains many treasures that are yet undeveloped. In those far-off days, as now, the Divine hand was beneath and back of all great world-movements—a controlling power and a directing or restraining influence. The same omnipotent Ruler who raised and put down nations at will governs the world's destiny today.

China's Drift to Empire

IT is not an easy matter, at this distance, to get a true perspective on affairs in China, and to comprehend the conditions that seem to be driving it back to monarchy. An American, long resident in the East, and familiar with the politics of both China and Japan, gives this lucid explanation: "China was not ready for the republic. Yuan Shikai has the confidence of the entire nation, but he has found it impossible to secure that cooperation which is necessary to the smooth working of the government. During the whole of last year, the Assembly frittered away the time during the sessions and accomplished nothing. Indeed, the only thing that reached a vote was the question of fixing the members' salaries. The nation is not ready for self-government, and cannot be, under the circumstances. Yuan could have been monarch of China at any time, had he wished—even after the expulsion of the old dynasty he could have grasped supreme power. Now, the drift is unquestionably backward to imperialism and the old ways, and the advice given by Japan and other Powers, to retain the republic, probably comes too late. Besides, Japan does not trust Yuan implicitly. As Emperor he would probably adopt a policy which would not be altogether friendly to Japan's interests, and the latter Power desires to avoid any change in the East which might open the way to a breach, especially at the present time. Yuan is wholly for China, while Japan wishes, above all things, to retain the solidarity of the Far East, in case of eventualities."

This, from a well-informed source, is probably the best explanation of Japan's attitude. It would seem, on the whole, that the drift in China is unmistakably empireward, with Yuan as the Man of Destiny. The result of the pending elections can almost be foreseen.

Not Yet

THE defeat of woman suffrage in New York, Massachusetts, New Jersey and Pennsylvania does not mean that women are never to have the vote in these states. It probably means simply that they will not have it for five or possibly ten years.

Women have full parliamentary suffrage in Norway, Finland, New Zealand, Australia, the Isle of Man, and Iceland. In Great Britain they have municipal suffrage; also in Denmark and Sweden. In some parts of Germany, Austria, Hungary and Russia women have the right to vote on local matters.

Although they were defeated, the workers for woman suffrage ought to congratulate themselves at so large a vote for their cause was polled in each of these great Eastern states, that their conduct in the campaign was so much commended even by those who are not converted to their position, and that their presence at the polls on election day, particularly in turbulent New York City, was so generally appreciated and appreciated.

The Bible and Newspaper

CONDUCTED BY
FERDINAND C. IGLEHART, D.D.

Asylum Orphan Invents Sweeper

THE other day there came a big envelope from the United States Patent Office addressed to Mr. Frederick Start, care Hebrew Altering Guardian Society, Pleasantville, New York. The letter said: "MY DEAR SIR: So far as can be learned there is no prior claim on file in this office for your combination of broom, brush, and dustpan, working drawings of which you sent." The letter was sent for little Freddie Start, thirteen years old, an inmate of the home. Dr. Ernest, the superintendent, called the little fellow into the office and asked him if he knew anything about the matter, and he went off and brought him a place of hiding the model of his invention, which, without the knowledge of any one else, he had made in the shops of the asylum. The free-in-one sweeping appliance looks like a broom. As soon as a pile of dust accumulated the sweeper may press a button, which releases a spring and lets down a span. Another motion, and the operator takes him the back of the dustpan in a small hand brush with which he transfers the sweepings into the bin. A lawyer in New York City is securing the patent, and the plan is to take the new invention on the market to make money enough to send the boy to college. What a gracious institution is such an orphanage. Its wise methods of instruction inspired the ambition of little Freddie Start. But no environment on earth, however ideal, can make a genius in the lad. God made that in the boy when he was born and in his rears before he was sent to be handed down to him. If health and wit shall keep good, that may be expected of the boy who met the end next to him, the gaining of a room, with a machine, when all of his duties shall have come to their full, and education shall have opened a new field to him? The genius of the boy is the will of the Hebrew's God to which he is responding. Oh that he may hear the voice the Hebrew boy heard in the temple and make the same answer he made: "Then Samuel answered; Speak; for thy servant heareth." (1 Sam. 3:10.)

Lord "Mother" Restores Mind

THE word "mother," which saves lives and the honor of innocents in the melodrama, has, it is said, actually restored reason to a French soldier whose mind had been left blank by the shock of a bursting shell. A night party had gone over from England to cheer up the sick, and one of the number, a well-known tenor, singing the old favorite, "Mother Marie." Among the audience was a nerve-shattered soldier who had come out of a bombardment almost an idiot. The word "mother" repeated in the song brought him to himself. It was the key that unlocked his memory. He began to recall detached incidents about himself, and later fully recovered his mind. Mother is next to the sweetest word on earth; Jesus is the sweetest. The name of mother in the song brought back reason to the soldier. The name of Jesus, like music, charms the soul deranged by sin into spiritual sanity. Christ himself thus describes a return of a soul to its spiritual senses: "And when he came to himself, he said, How many hired servants of my father's have bread enough and to spare, and I perish with hunger! I will arise and go to my father." (Luke 15:17, 18.)

Savages in Brazilian Wilds

THE University of Pennsylvania Museum's Amazon Expedition is in charge of Dr. W. C. Farabee, who has out. A heavy landslide involved a portion of the volcano of Mayon. There is the gentle zephyr and the terrible tornado in earth and sea and in human nature. Paul writes: "And when the south wind blew softly, they sailed close by Crete. But not long after there arose against it a tempestuous wind called Euroclydon." (Acts 27:13, 14.)

Gifts to Education

AMOS F. ENO, who died in October, bequeathed specifically $7,644,000. He left $2,930,000 to public institutions in addition to the residuary part of his estate to Columbia University. The Metropolitan Museum of Art, American Museum of Natural History, New York

Richard Henry Dana Honored

THOUGH Richard Henry Dana, Jr., was born in August, 1815, the Cambridge Historical Association appointed the 20th of October, 1915, as the time for the celebration of the one hundredth anniversary of his birth. Under the auspices of that society a Dana exhibition was opened in the Widener Memorial Library at Harvard, consisting of paintings, books, letters and other articles closely connected with Mr. Dana's life. In the Harvard Memorial Hall formal exercises were held at night with Bishop Lawrence in the chair. Addresses were made by Joseph H. Choate, who was a legal associate of Dana; by Professor Bliss Perry, and by Moorfield Storey. Like his father,

Dana was a graduate of Harvard, a lawyer of ability and reputation, and an author. During his college course his eyes became affected and he went on a voyage as a common sailor to California and back. The result of this voyage was his book "Two Years Before the Mast," which is thought by good critics to be the best sea story ever written. He sailed on the brig Pilgrim, 86 feet long, on his famous voyage around Cape Horn. He told a straight story as a literary man, a keen observer of nature and a brave sailor before the mast. He hated his captain because the captain was a small man and a big tyrant and flogged the tars. Dana had to summon all of his powers to match the native ability of some of the common sailors, and opened his heart to the sympathies and confidences of the humble men of various nationalities. He loved the high, and wide, and deep in nature and in human hearts, and described them with such a charm as to compel the honor of his alma mater and of the world. The copyright of "Two Years Before the Mast," like that of so many other great books, was sold for a song. Though William Cullen Bryant interested himself in securing a good financial return for the manuscript, all that Dana got for it was $250. This was the pittance for a book which has been read by two generations, and is being read by the third, and has been translated into foreign languages and read in all lands. In the centennial of this book this truth is illustrated: "He being dead yet speaketh." (Heb. 11:4.)

Closing of Night Schools

THE serious threat upon the part of high authorities to close the night schools of New York City has stirred up fierce public indignation. It is a shame to close a door to the education of any boy or girl, any man or woman. It is the greater shame to close the school door to the poor who have not money for an education. Our public schools are one of the foundation stones of our republic. City and nation, as well as the individual, should heed this injunction: "With all thy getting get understanding." (Prov. 1:5.)

President's New Summer White House

A NEW JERSEY delegation led by Representative Scully visited Washington the other day and told President Wilson the people of their state had arranged to lease the McCall home at Long Branch if he would consent to occupy it as his summer residence. Among other things the President said "My heart constantly goes back to New Jersey, and when you come on a mission like this, and with such peculiar generosity, and invite me home, the only thing that I can say is that I will come. If you would be generous enough to let me pay the rental I have been accustomed to pay for a summer place, I would feel easier about it." This mansion, popularly known as "The White House by the Sea," was erected at Long Branch in 1902 by the late John A. McCall, president of the New York Life Insurance Company, at an expense, including grounds and furnishings, of $1,050,000 and is considered the finest home on the New Jersey coast. The great front portico faces the ocean. On the main floor at the entrance is a hall measuring 75 by 85 feet, with a stairway 25 feet wide from base to mezzanine floor, and branching into a promenade gallery surrounded by an open court 20 by 55 feet, surrounded by a glass dome. It is a long distance from the Presbyterian College in the Southland where Mr. Wilson was born to the White House at Washington and the White House by the Sea, but he has traveled the distance fairly and naturally, and the people of New Jersey have honored not only themselves but the nation in providing the magnificent home for its head. The rulers of nations from the earliest times have been provided with splendid homes. A queen visiting the palace of a Hebrew king marveled at the magnificence she saw. "When the queen of Sheba had seen all Solomon's wisdom, and the house that he had built, and the meat of his table and the sitting of his servants, and the attendance of his ministers, and their apparel, and his cup-bearers, and his ascent by which he went up into the house of the Lord; there was no more spirit in her." (1 Kings 10:4, 5.)

just spent months in the wilds of Brazil. He states he never saw a white man, and has just reported the discovery of the Mundurucu Indians. He made a vocabulary and wrote down much of their folk lore, and hopes to settle the long vexed question of the relations of this tribe to the Tupi. The explorer says these Indians cut off the head of an enemy killed or caught in battle, boil and eat it, and with the teeth strung in a belt and the skull on a pole they have their dance. There is this reference to the cannibalism of olden times: "When the wicked, even their enemies and my foes, came upon me to eat up my flesh, they stumbled and fell." (Ps. 27:2.)

Luzon Typhoon Kills Many

A TYPHOON which swept over southern Luzon October 26 killed at least 170 persons and injured nearly 800. The damage to property and to hemp and rice crops is estimated at $1,000,000. One town was partly wiped Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor and New York University each received $250,000. The New York Public Library is to receive $50,000. The largest public bequest was to the General Society of Mechanics and Tradesmen of New York City, to which the decedent gave $200,000 during his lifetime. His will directs that $1,800,000 additional be turned over to this institution. Generous provision was made for relatives, among whom are Gifford and Amos R. E. Pinchot and their sister, Lady Johnstone of London. How wise this man was to put his money to good use. Eternity alone will be able to calculate the result. How doubly wise he was, like Peter Cooper, to give money for the elementary education of the working people and for otherwise improving the condition of the city's poor. How nobly do such men heed that saying of the Master, never truer than now, that "ye have the poor with you always, and whenever ye will ye may do them good." (Mark 14:7.)

Rev. Benjamin Cox

This Church Prays.

And When It Prays It Counts All Men Brothers

BY WHAT seems a striking coincidence, at just the time the Christian Herald Prayer League was being organized, another Prayer League was begun in the South, having its inner circle in a single church, but rapidly reaching out to almost every state of the Union. Soon these worshipers, too, appointed the noon hour for the daily prayer time, and the requests and acknowledgments sent are strikingly like those received every week by the Christian Herald Prayer League.

The headquarters of this sister league are at Central Baptist Church, Memphis, Tenn. Pastor Benjamin Cox, in a letter written after the league had been in existence a year, said: "You will be interested to know that January 19 was the occasion of the first anniversary of our Noon-Day Prayer Meeting. There were 160 people present. During the year five hundred and seventy-two letters asking for prayer had been received from persons in thirty-six states of the Union. Six thousand four hundred meals were furnished to men out of employment. Today we fed one hundred men."

The last remark discloses a most practical feature of the work of this prayer league. Orders are issued for meals at a restaurant near the church, where weary, discouraged men learn that believers in Christian prayer believe also in caring for the bodily needs of those whom they would lead Godward. Women as well as men who are out of work or in trouble come for counsel and relief.

On the first Thanksgiving day after the league was organized the wayfarers treated to Thanksgiving dinner represented seventeen states, ranging from Washington to Florida and from Maine to California. There was also one man from Canada and one from Australia. Many men have secured employment through the activities of the league. Good letters come back from distant cities telling of new, happy, useful lives dating from one of the noon-day prayer services at Central Church. At every service an opportunity is given to accept the Saviour. At one service eighteen professed conversion. Not only food for body and spirit is furnished, but clothing as well. A "wardrobe" has been established, where needy men may be outfitted with clothes, hats and shoes.

But the attendance at this noon-day prayer service is not by any means limited to the outcast and desolate. Business people drop in for all or part of the noon-time service and all together share gladly in the grace of God. Laboring men come, too. One week every meeting was addressed by some member of the Carpenters' Union, whose hall is near the church.

At every service the requests for prayer which have been received since the meeting of the day before are read by the pastor or his representative, and while those present unite in supplication that these petitions be granted, hundreds of others throughout the city and in other states who have joined the league blend their prayers with those who are worshipping at the church.

Pastor Cox writes: "Many testimonies to answered prayers are coming in. A wife who made requests for her husband, who was a drinker, testifies that he has quit drinking and become regular in Sunday school attendance. A young man came to my office who said he had met two 'hobos' near Chicago, and they told him to be sure to come to Central Church. He now has a good position and takes a prominent part in church work. His mother, who lives in another state, is very cordial in her thanks. I wish that I had time and space to give quotations from many mothers' letters."

One of the most interesting facts in connection with the whole history of the Central Church Prayer League and the other activities of the church is that before the league was organized there was a strong sentiment for selling the church property and rebuilding in the residential district. Many "down town" churches have surrendered to these conditions and gone away from work that might have been accomplished if they had put their reliance in prayer and faith. Central Church has held its ground and won its victory. The church is open every day from 8.30 in the morning until dark, and on most nights of the week long after dark.

One day Dr. Cox was called to the bedside of a man who was very ill. The man reminded him that some months before the two had met just outside the church. The man was taking a drink from the ice-water fountain which stands at the door. Dr. Cox spoke to him, expressing such an interest in his welfare that the man declared, when the pastor came to his sick-bed, that since that meeting "water had been good enough for him." Tracts as well as drinking-water are to be found outside the church door.

Credit for the organization of the Central Church Prayer League is given to Mr. James W. Turner, a consecrated traveling man who had been called to preach and who is a great believer in the power of prayer. Mr. Turner is now a pastor at Mobile, Ala. Dr. Cox insists that much of the success of the noon-day meetings and the other aggressive and efficient work of the praying church is due to his young assistant, Mr. Forest Cole.

Members of the league sign a pledge: "Believing in the power of united prayer, I desire to become a member of the Noon Prayer League and I pledge myself to be in prayer some time between 12.30 and 1 P. M. daily, if possible, for the requests presented at this meeting."

Amarilly of Clothes-Line Alley

By BELLE K. MANIATES

Copyright, 1915, by Little, Brown & Co. All rights reserved

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

AMARILLY made her bow to Christian Herald readers from the threshold of the Barlow "Theater," where she mopped floors and dreamed dreams. They saw her begin a struggle for the education necessary to the career of her dreams, and they went with her to St. Mark's, to the class whose teacher wore real hair and wasn't made up. Through this teacher, Colette King, Amarilly's mother became the laundress of St. Mark's and Amarilly met the rector, Rev. (St.) John Meredith, who invited her to attend morning service and who showed something more than a pastor's interest in Colette. Amarilly's soul responded to the church service and she thought it must be what Heaven was. Then scarlet fever quarantined them; and there came a morning when Amarilly had to forage for breakfast. The family fund once more got a modest start, which was accelerated by the mundane career of the minister's surplice, through which Amarilly and her thoroughness entered the world of art and the studio of Derry Phillips. Lunch with the artist preceded a permanent engagement as maid to begin in the fall. Meantime the boarder fell in love and the surplice continued its career.

CHAPTER XII

"I WONDER," meditated Gus, "where the surplus will land next?" "It has been most everywhere except to the police court," said Bobby. "Spect 'twill land there next!"

His prophecy was fulfilled. Mrs. Jenkins was called for the lucrative garment late one afternoon and left it on the line all night. The next morning, to the great consternation of the family and the wild distress of Amarilly, the beloved surplice, that friend of friends in time of need had vanished. Other clothes-lines in the vicinity had also been deprived of their burdens, and a concerted complaint was made to the police, who promptly located the offender and brought him summarily to trial. Mrs. Jenkins was subpoenaed as a witness, which caused quite a ripple of excitement in the family. Divided between dread of appearing in public and pride at the importance with which she was regarded by her little flock, Mrs. Jenkins was quite upset by the occasion. She hadn't attended a function for so long that her costuming therefor was of more concern than had been Amarilly's church raiment.

Mrs. Hudgers loaned her mourning bonnet and veil, which was adjusted at half mast. They appeared in direct contradiction to the skirt of bilious green she wore, but the Jenkinsons were as unconventional in attire as they were in other things.

The family attended the trial en masse, and were greatly elated at the prominence their mother had attained. The culprit was convicted and the surplice duly restored. The misfortune was not without profit. Mrs. Jenkins received thirty-five cents as a witness fee.

They had managed to pay their household expenses through the summer, but when the rent for August was due there was not quite enough cash on hand to meet this important item of expenditure. Noting the troubled brows of Mrs. Jenkins and Amarilly at breakfast time, the Boarder insisted on knowing the cause.

"We're broke, and the rent's overdue," tersely explained Amarilly.

"I'm broke, too," sighed the Boarder, "except what I've got in the savin's bank towards—"

"Lily Rose," suggested Amarilly softly.

"Yes," he admitted, with a beaming look. "But when I go broke, all other things failin', I allers tackle a pawn-broker."

"We ain't got nothin' to pawn," sighed Amarilly.

She recalled the lace waist, but that, like the Lily Rose fund, was sacred. There was always, today, yesterday, and forever, the surplice, and her scruples regarding that article had of necessity become case-hardened; still, Amarilly hesitated. A pawnshop seemed lower than a police court.

"It's been everywhere else," she said loudly to the accusing still, small voice, "and it might jest as well go the limit. 'Twon't bring much, but 'twill help."

Through byways and highways Amarilly sought the region of the three-balled porticoes. The shop of one Max Solstein attracted her, and she entered his open door. Max came forward propitiatingly.

"What'll you gimme on this?" came with directness from the small importuner.

He took the garment, shook it, and held it up for falcon-gaze inspection. "Not worth much. A quarter of a dollar."

Amarilly snatched it from his grasp and fled. Not because of his low-figured offer; she had fully expected to have to "beat him up." But when she had entered, a youth who had all the recognized earmarks of a reporter was lounging in the doorway. At sight of the uplifted garment he had come eagerly forward, scenting a story. She knew his kind from snatches of conversation she had heard between the leading lady and Lord Algernon. In the lore of the stage at Barlow's, reporters were "hovering vultures" who always dropped down when least wanted, and they had a way of dragging to light the innermost thoughts of their victims.

"You read your secrets," Lord Algernon had dramatically declared, "in blazoned headlines."

Hitherto Amarilly had effectually silenced her instinctive rebellion against the profaning of St. John's surplice, but she had reached the limit. No Max Solstein, no threatening landlord, no ruthless reporter should thrust the sacred surplice into the publicity print.

She darted from the shop, the porter right at her heels, but chasing of his covey to corner was easily accomplished. He was a new-fledged reporter, and Amarilly had the instinct of the lowly for locality. She turned and doubled and dodged successfully. By a course circuitous she returned to Hebrew haunts, to time to seek one Abram Canter, a little wizened, gnome-like Jew. Assuredly herself that there was no other than the proprietor within, Amarilly entered and handed over the surplice for appraisal.

Once more the garment was aloft. At that psychological moment an elderly man of buxom build, benevolent in mien, and with smooth, long hair that had an upward rolling tendency the ends, looked in the shop as he was passing. He halted, hesitated, and then entered. Of him, however, Amarilly felt no apprehension.

"My child, is that yours?" he asked of Amarilly, indicating the garment with a protesting forefinger.

"Sure thing!" she acknowledged frankly.

"Where did you get it?" If he had been a young man, Amarilly would have cheerfully reminded him

Continued on page 1172

The New Era in Housekeeping

By MRS. JULIAN HEATH, Founder and President of the National Housewives' League

"BELIEVE my husband could run our home better than I," said a member of the Housewives' League to me a short time ago. My query "Why?" she replied, "because he would run it as he runs his business."

Think this over carefully and see if you do not agree with the writer that in lies the fundamental principle upon which true economy in the home is based. There has been and still is much misunderstanding of the word "economy" as applied to the home. It seems to mean a saving here or a saving there, a skimping here or a skimping there, whereas in the light of the new awakening of the housewife to the fact that housekeeping is a business and must be run on a business basis, it has come to mean efficiency; full value received for money expended. In the commercial world we speak of efficiency in business, and efficiency in business is known to produce economy in business. Why then have we not hitherto maintained that "economy in the home is efficiency in the home"? The reason is the main just because women have not run their housekeeping on a business basis.

We hear a great deal in these days, of "women not being on their jobs as housewives"; we hear that they "do not keep house as their grandmothers did." Let us grant this, because we recognize it; but we also recognize that there is a reason, and it has been because the new housekeeping has been shaping and we did not realize it. There has been a struggle going on between the economics old and home economics new.

The "New Housekeeping" Era

WHAT then is this new housekeeping? We speak of it, but comparatively few people realize what it means or how today's housekeeping is different from that of yesterday. Few realize that it means an entire change in woman's economic function; that under the new housekeeping she buys with money what before she produced out of her material.

Look at any picture of an old-fashioned kitchen and what do we see? The women of the family are weaving and spinning, dyeing and cooking before the open fireplace; over in the corner the men are making shoes; in another part of the room the weekly wash is in progress, and all over the side walls and rafters are hanging dry fruits and vegetables, ham and bacon. To put this picture into words, this old-fashioned line of our great-grandmothers was a huge manufacturing plant, grocery store and home combined. The family produced in the home all or nearly all consumed.

Then came a change, so gradual that we were hardly aware of the fact; the weaving, the spinning, the soapmaking, the baking, the washing, the dyeing, the tanning, slowly but surely, one by one, were transferred to buildings outside of the home—to factories. Of course, that freedom came to the housekeeper with the removal of these industries, and for this freedom not only women but the whole world can be grateful. Emancipated the home and made it a place where human beings could not only live but could get requisite rest and development.

The New Day in Economics

RIGHT here, however, began the dawn of the new housekeeping of which we speak, and a new position in economics was given to woman. The housewife remained no longer the producer; she became the consumer. And repeat, here it was that she had to begin to buy with money what before she produced out of raw material. From that time to the present day this new housekeeping has been shaping up. It is in a formative period, and all formative periods are chaotic periods, and that is the reason that things have seemed to go wrong with our profession of housekeeping; and that they have gone wrong there is no denying. This formative period is over, however; the new housekeeping is here, and we women must assume our new economic function as the disbursers of the family income and learn to be efficient home managers.

There has been a great awakening of the housewives of the nation. They are recognizing, as never before, their new function as the managing partners in the marriage contract; their true economic function as the dispensers of the considered and the home established according to the income. This makes home-making a real partnership and makes the responsibility mutual.

With the budget made and carefully apportioned the housewife becomes the disbursing officer of the funds. Here is where our training has failed us. We have not been trained to spend money. I say "trained to spend money" because I believe in the main that women are economical and that extravagant or wasteful buying comes rather from untrained buying than from sheer extravagance or carelessness. Right here, let us repeat again that economy is as a shipwreck or a cyclone or an earthquake, and the "price has gone up." Many excuses are given for this high-water mark, and we do not know enough of market conditions to know whether this is true or not, and so we pay the price without further question. The men in their business know the market price of every product which they buy. If they are in the automobile business they know the market value of the rubber which they use in their tires. A carpenter knows the value of the nails which he uses, and the merchant knows the value of the twine with which he wraps his parcels; but we women have not known the market value of a single product which we buy, and this knowledge of the market is the first requisite to efficient home management and economy in the home.

Knowledge of Marketing Conditions

WE know little of the seasons of production, and still less of marketing conditions. A retail dealer told me not long ago that he "never knew what to buy when he went to market, for," he said, "when lima beans are in season, the women want peas, and when peas are in season, the women want lima beans." In other words, having no knowledge of the market we try to make this market fit our daily menus rather than make our daily menus fit the market. Efficient buying, economy in the home, means a full knowledge of the seasons of production in order to buy those things which are in season; in other words, to buy on a "down market."

Then we must know grades and quality in order to get full value for our money. We must not confuse the word "cheapness" or extremely low-priced goods with economical goods, neither must we think just because the price of a commodity is low the goods are necessarily of no value.

We must know values, we must know grades, we must know qualities. Herein lies the great value of the trade mark or maker's name to the housewife. When you buy a product, be that product food, clothing, utensil or furniture with the maker's name plainly marked upon it, you have the opportunity of becoming thoroughly acquainted with the value of the goods and learning whether or not you get value received for your money. You can hold the maker responsible for the quality of those goods, and you can always identify the goods, when you have proven quality, for future purchases. If you buy goods with no name attached, anonymous goods we will call them, you have no way of identifying those goods. The consumer can be fooled again and again by unidentified goods (goods without the maker's name); she can be fooled but once with identified goods whose maker's name and address is plainly marked upon the container. This is becoming so fully recognized that even our apples, our oranges, and many other products heretofore unbranded, are being marketed under a distinguishing name.

Getting Full Value for Your Money

THE whole tendency of the present day is toward trade-marked goods. Is this advantageous for the housewife or consumer? It is, because when we buy an article which has a distinguishing name upon it, we at least always know what we are buying. If you buy your goods unnamed or in bulk you have no way of ever identifying those goods; but if you buy a brand of cereal, a brand of flour, a brand of baking powder, a brand of matches, a brand of soup or a brand of sugar and you prove that those products are products of quality you can always get them for the asking.

Then comes the important question of grades; for, if we know grades, we can often buy an economical article. In making this statement I have in mind, for instance, some of our canned wealth of the world; and they are recognizing that their housekeeping must be run on a business basis. Here then lies our first step to economy in the home.

Reopening of Washington Market, New York City, Recently Made the Most Sanitary Institution of the Kind (Mrs. Julian Heath is Seen at Center of Picture)

Keeping House on a Business Basis

IN reply to the question, what is the first step to true economy in the home? let me say: Women of America, put your housekeeping on a business basis. Shall we then throw the entire responsibility of the management of the home upon the woman or housewife? No; the business of home-making is a partnership in which the man becomes the producer of the funds to maintain the home and the woman the administrator of those funds. The man says, "I will go out into the world and earn the money to maintain the home." The woman says, "I will administer the money which you earn so that the home shall be maintained and the family properly housed, clothed, fed and educated to take their place in the world." There should, therefore, be a getting together of the partners and a formal opening of the books of the firm. The income should be stated and in the home means efficiency in the home.

Spending Money to Advantage

IN considering our budget we must not ask, "How shall we spend our money?" but "How shall we best spend our money so as to live and produce more income?" That is one of the serious mistakes of the American family of today; they plan to spend all they make. It is a poor business that does not produce some profit, and this fact should obtain in the business of housekeeping just as well as in the business of the commercial world. We may say, "I am a careful spender; I never waste a penny." Let us grant this; but careful spending may not always be intelligent spending.

For instance, how little we women have known of the market value of things we buy! Mind you, I say "market value," not prices which we pay. We go to a store and inquire, "How much is butter today?" and if we are told, "Fifty cents a pound," we remark, "Rather high, is it not?" We are assured that the price is not high, because there has been some such catas-

1915

The OLD YEAR and the NEW 1916

Thoughts That Help Us All

THIS has been a tremendous year for the world—a year unparalleled in history. Christianity is on trial. It must retrieve the situation, which no earthly power can do. It must redeem the world, bring order out of chaos, and turn the nations once more to the worship of God, and to recognize him as the Supreme Ruler of the universe. Wealth, power, conquest, armies and navies, capitalistic greed and commercial rivalry, racial hatred and all the other elements that have combined to produce war and desolation and suffering, must be overcome by the power of the Gospel. There is no other solution of the great world problem than this.

DURING all these terrible months of universal turmoil and destruction, the Christian Herald has held aloft the banner of world brotherhood and peace. Its readers have carried on a warfare of their own—a war against misery and suffering, sickness and starvation. Its battalions have carried cheer and comfort and consolation and food into all the countries involved in the conflict. Its committees are still at work in twelve national centers of suffering, where, through the generous gifts of our readers, they have been enabled to save many thousands of lives and to minister to the needs of countless multitudes, especially to the widows and orphans of the war, those innocent ones upon whom falls the heaviest and saddest burden of all. And this Christlike work of mercy and helpfulness must go on until Peace comes. God grant it may come soon!

THE work in the war zones has been in addition to the regular charities maintained by the Christian Herald, such as Mont-Lawn, where three thousand children were given a vacation during the summer; the Bowery Mission, where a thousand men are fed in the Bread Line every night from Thanksgiving to Easter; Chinese, Japanese and Indian missions, where thousands of orphans are maintained and brought to an understanding of Christianity, and numerous other charities, to all of which over $4,000,000 have been contributed by Christian Herald readers in the past ten years.

THAT the members of the Christian Herald Family appreciate the efforts of the Editors to keep them up to date upon all matters, spiritual and secular, is evidenced by the thousands of letters of approval commending the stand which the Christian Herald has taken in the matter of American neutrality, in the matter of ammunition exports, in all that might help to prevent the horror of this and future wars. It has proved to us finally that the Christian Herald Family is one great unit for human uplift, an army of the common good, working for the spiritual uplift of the world.

Our Special Features

BUT, however gratifying has been the success of the Christian Herald during 1915, we look forward to the coming year as one that will offer even greater possibilities for Christian service on the part of this journal and its readers. In these pages from week to week they will enjoy the inspiration of contributions from the leading spiritual minds of two continents. They will welcome the announcement that Rev. Dr. J. H. Jowett will not only lead the Meditations during the coming year, but will also preach for them the first sermon of each month. Among the other notable preachers who will contribute sermons throughout the year are Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman, Dr. G. Campbell Morgan, Rev. David J. Burrell, Prof. James M. Gray, Rev. Charles E. Jefferson, Rev. D. H. Steffens, Rev. H. P. Eckhardt, Rev. A. C. Dixon, Rev. C. M. Sheldon, Rev. F. B. Meyer, Prof. W. H. T. Dau, Pastor Charles Wagner, Rev. C. H. Parkhurst, Bishop Luther B. Wilson, Dr. R. A. Torrey, and others. Practically every Protestant denomination will be represented through some one or more of its leading ministers.

But in addition to its regular features, such as the Weekly Sermon, the Daily Meditations, the Bible and Newspaper, the Editorial Forum, Week in the World's News, the Sunday School, Young People's Societies, Margaret E. Sangster's Column, the Prayer League, Our Mail-Bag, etc., etc., the Christian Herald has arranged for many special articles on topics which are of great interest to our readers. Let us tell you of only a few.

PROFESSOR JAMES M. GRAY, Dean of the Chicago Bible Institute, and a recognized American leader in scriptural exposition, has consented to write four articles on subjects of vital interest to all Christians.

Big Subjects by Big Men One of them will be "The Battle of Armageddon: Where It Will Be Fought, When, and What It Means." Another will be "The Psalms in the Light of the War." "The Angels at Mons," which is a discussion of Satan and Satanism at the end of the age; and "The Second Coming of Christ: Is It to Be Visible or Spiritual?" These articles are based on prophecy, and will be richly enjoyed by our readers.

How do you feel about the education of your Child? Do you feel that the Church should take charge of its education, or will you leave it to the State? There are powerful influences at work to compel instruction in morals and religion. Who will give this instruction and how? These questions will form the subject of a series of articles which will command your interest during 1916.

DO YOU approve of moving picture shows? Everyone recognizes in them a tremendous power for good or evil. How may they be utilized by the Church? Do they, in fact, conflict, or can they be of mutual benefit? Here is a big subject handled in a big and convincing way.

The Church and the Movies

In 1916 the American Bible Society will celebrate its hundredth anniversary, and based upon this momentous event the Christian Herald will tell the story of the place the Bible has taken in the world during that period through the activities of this and other Bible societies. It is truly an amazing tale, this onward march of the Book of books. There are more copies of the Bible sold in the course of a year than of any other book, and there is no spot on earth which has not felt and been uplifted by its influence.

ONE of the results of the great war in Europe has been the decadence of formalism and skepticism. In the midst of strife the nations have come to seek God as their only helper and Christ as the real Saviour, all of which is expected to lead to the decline of Churchianity and the triumph of Christianity.

Just how this came about will be explained in an article on "Christianity After the War." In this country, too, people are waking up to the necessity of making a special campaign to turn the minds of young people from plans for a selfish search for success to a life of sacrifice and service for others in the name of Christ. An article describing this movement will be entitled "The Unselfish Career." You will be much interested in it.

So will you be interested in "New Methods of Church Work." Ministers who stick to old methods and ministers who have adopted new plans of church work will narrate their experiences and tell how they achieved success.

SOMEWHAT in line with the question "Shall the Church or State Educate Your Child?" is that other question, "Shall the Church Enter Politics?" True, the subject is not a new one, but there is a great necessity for asking it just now. What would you say in answer?

Church or State—and Other Topics

Perhaps you will find your answer in an article which will be devoted to this subject in the Christian Herald.

"Some Real Stories of Christian Experiences!" Everyone has some knowledge of wonderful experiences of this nature. Some of these have been collated and will form an illuminating series of Christian experiences in the lives of men and women of our own time who have made the world better.

Have you taken part in the "Revolt Against Teaching War in the Sunday Schools?" Do you believe that the old Jewish idea should be pushed into the background and the Christ-idea of a God of Love and a Gospel of Peace and Brotherhood be kept in view and taught in the classes? This is a reform which means teaching Christian theology instead of Jewish history.

On the other hand, the Christian Herald will publish during the year the latest word on exploration and investigation in Bible lands by Edgar J. Banks and Albert T. Clay. Scientific discoveries have thrown wonderful light on the historic accuracies of the Bible.

FRANK G. CARPENTER, the world authority on what is picturesque and interesting, has just spent a year in Alaska and has come out of that strange country with a fascinating story and wonderful pictures. What we miss in our education through lack of travel can be made up by reading what Mr. Carpenter and the few other travelers who can approach him in description have to say about those portions of the world which so few are able to visit. Beginning with the first number in January, this popular writer will tell Christian Herald readers of the unimaginable life in that great northwest corner of the American continent, Alaska.

In the field of fiction we shall provide many stories during 1916, seeking diligently for the best there are. The story of Amarilly which is now running as a serial will continue several weeks in the new year, and other serials are now under consideration. We expect to print more good fiction in this coming year than in the past.

THESE are only a few of the good things you may expect to find weekly in the Christian Herald during 1916. Not only will these articles be readable from the standpoint of their great interest, but the paper itself will be improved typographically so that it will be a delight to the eye as well as to the mind. One of the features we have arranged in this connection will be a series of famous covers illustrating scenes in Palestine in full colors from photographs sent directly from the Holy Land.

A Popular Bible Picture Study Contest

IN all the development of aids to Bible knowledge, the privilege of giving to the public one of the very best has remained for the Christian Herald. We have long had under consideration a plan for freshening everybody's knowledge of the Bible and at the same time imparting a new vigor and a more lasting result to Bible study. This plan makes use of an exercise that is highly regarded by all masters of the art of teaching, namely, the study of pictures whose exact meaning is not seen at a glance. The very best method for doing this is by a contest in which many possible meanings for the picture will suggest themselves, but some are bound to be better than others, thus insuring keen interest in the competition.

IT has been a problem to adapt this invaluable method of teaching to the Scriptures. But the problem has been solved in a most attractive way. We could not ask for a better plan by which to interest every one, young and old, in once more "Searching the Scriptures." All the parents in the great Christian Herald Family will welcome this new departure for their children, and they certainly will welcome it for themselves. Pastors and Sunday school teachers will recognize at once the stimulus of this splendid contest in the Bible knowledge of their charges.

THE contest will be found to be a mighty triangle of interests:— it will provide a fascinating exercise for these winter evenings; it will make it possible for over four hundred of the contestants by good work to obtain rewards, all of them desirable, some of them very valuable; and it will give every contestant a familiarity with the contents of the Bible that should long outlast the usual results of years of more or less casual reading and more or less detached study.

WE announce this coming contest with utmost satisfaction. Details will be given in succeeding weeks, and our readers may look forward with genuine pleasure to this newest of aids to a knowledge of the Scriptures.

Our Book Offers

JUST as the Christian Herald has surpassed its former efforts in the matter of its contents, so have we succeeded in securing some very desirable books to offer for distribution among our readers. One of the most important of these is the

By Leaders of Religious Thought

Rev. J. H. Jowett, D. D. These two companion volumes by this famous pastor furnish new proof that Dr. Jowett's mission in life is to make religion attractive. The titles of these books are "Thirsting for the Springs" and "Brooks by the Traveler's Way." These titles are happily chosen for both books, which are fountains of spiritual refreshment; the current of clear, keen, wholesome thought runs through them like a brook through a meadow, imparting freshness, fragrance and beauty. No one can read Dr. Jowett's writings without getting a mental impression of sunshine and pure air and those spiritually stimulating tonic qualities that give life a new meaning and a nobler purpose. Some of the subjects touched upon are "Roots of the Blessed Life"; "Lightening the Burdens"; "A Song in the Night"; "Beauty on the Heights"; "Desiring and Seeking"; "Saving the World"; "How to Know God Better"; "The Earthly and the Heavenly"; "A Christian Walk"; "What I Would If I Could." As has been said, they will "send the jaded worker back to his work with a new and rare light falling over it and a new and rare motive and hope in his heart."

These two volumes, aggregating 530 pages, handsomely bound in cloth, will be sent together with the Christian Herald for one whole year, postpaid, for $2. Or, we will send to old subscribers, FREE, as a reward, these two volumes for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $1.50.

ANOTABLE event in the world of religious literature will be the new book "Luther in Light of Recent Research," by Heinrich Boehmer, Professor in Marburg, translated by Carl F. Huth, Jr., Professor in the University of Chicago, whose writings are held in high esteem here and abroad. Professor Boehmer's Life of Luther is a new revelation of the character of the great reformer, who, four hundred years ago, on October 31, 1517, began the Reformation by nailing his theses on the gates of the castle church at Wittenberg. Boehmer's work comes with especial fitness in view of the near approach of the quadricentennial celebration of the Reformation, for which all the Protestant world is preparing. The Christian Herald has secured the exclusive American rights of this great book and will issue a large edition for its readers. The translation has been ably made by Prof. Carl F. Huth, Jr., of the Chicago University. It is a book that will fascinate the reader from beginning to end, and will shed much new light on the character and career of the great world reformer.

Boehmer's work is supplemented by a wonderful collection of pictures, illustrative of the life and work of Luther, which we consider one of the finest and most complete collection ever presented to the American public.

The Life of Luther, handsomely bound in cloth, will be sent together with the Christian Herald for one whole year, postpaid, for $2.25 or we will send to old subscribers FREE, as a reward, this volume for sending us two new yearly subscriptions to the Christian Herald with $3.

SOME years ago the Christian Herald published a work entitled "Forty Thousand Sublime and Beautiful Thoughts." It was composed of a collection of the best sayings on every conceivable subject which the compiler could come upon. In the course of time the edition of this book was exhausted. Since then we have had so many inquiries for the work that we have felt constrained this year to republish it, thoroughly revised. The author of the work is Charles Noel Douglas, a prolific writer on many subjects, who is entitled all the more to his renown by reason of the fact that for years he has been an invalid unable to leave his bed. There are actually forty thousand quotations in this book. It will make a very valuable addition to your library.

A Remarkable Book Revised

We will send you this volume, together with the Christian Herald for one whole year, for $3.00, or we will send to old subscribers FREE, as a reward, "Forty Thousand Sublime and Beautiful Thoughts" for sending us two new yearly subscriptions to the Christian Herald with $3.00.

THOUSANDS of our readers will be glad to know that we are publishing a new book by Margaret E. Sangster, Jr. She has called it "Real People and Dreams."

A Dreamer Who Wakes You Up

Margaret E. Sangster, Jr., does not make stories and poems—they just form themselves on the background of her mind as wintry sprites trace wonderful pictures on window panes, and then, simply because she cannot help herself, she sits down and describes these pictures. This is the work of a genius. To say this may unintentionally be taking away some of the credit which should be accorded her for these delightful stories and poems. But there seems to be no other explanation. Miss Sangster describes with entire abandon the picture that has formed itself on the background of her mind, indifferent for the moment to her audience, intent only on the artist's work of truly reproducing a vision. And lo, these visions become realities. The men and women, boys and girls, the sea, the sky, street cars, store counters, hospitals, and family circles all move out of the dreams into realities, and there they stand in her pages grouped in unforgettable scenes. If you order this book to use as a Christmas gift you should certainly order a second copy for yourself.

We will send this new volume by Margaret E. Sangster, Jr., handsomely bound in cloth, with a new photographic frontispiece of Margaret E. Sangster herself, and with illustrations for a number of the poems, together with the Christian Herald for one whole year, postpaid, for $1.85. Or, we will send to old subscribers, FREE, as a reward, this volume for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $1.50.

IN these days of prolific authorship, the creation of a new and delightful character is an event worth noting. This is precisely what Phoebe Gray has done in "Little Sir Galahad," which is the

Where Youth and Age Join Hands story of a brave and high-spirited American boy, a cripple by the way, who wins a knighthood which is, to him at least, very real. He is an up-to-date hero, this little fellow, quick-witted, clever and amusing, and together with his youthful friends who come under the magic spell of his influence he goes through many exciting experiences and keeps the reader's interest absorbed right through the story. "Little Sir Galahad" has quite a variety of friends, including stanch little Mary Alice, who grows up to a winsome womanhood, and poor Len Brown, who had to be helped ever so often. Then there is a big background of old and young folks, who must certainly have been drawn from actual life, as we have all known just such people. Besides, there is a big-hearted millionaire—but we must not anticipate, for to tell the story even in outline would rob you of the pleasure of reading the book for yourselves. It is as good a story as we have encountered in many a day, and that's saying a good deal.

"Little Sir Galahad," 376 pages, illustrated and handsomely bound in cloth, will be sent postpaid with one yearly subscription to the Christian Herald for $2. Or, we will send to old subscribers, FREE, as a reward, this volume for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $1.50.

Continued on page 1168

Our Mail-Bag

NOTICE

THE editors of the Christian Herald will be glad to answer any question addressed to the Mail-Bag provided it be of general interest and not merely personal. Correspondents may use a nom de plume to identify the question, but all letters must contain name and address of the sender, in addition to the nom de plume. No attention will be paid to anonymous letters.

Questions and Answers

A READER, Casey, Ia. Should every one be able to pray the Lord's Prayer? And is a person really a Christian who feels he cannot pray: "Thy will be done" and "Forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us"?

To the first part of your question there is only one possible answer—yes. The rest of the question is more difficult. Scripture and experience both appear to bear out the conclusion that persons who are actual Christians may still have the remains of an unconsecrated will or an unforgiving spirit. For instance, a duty is suggested, and it may be some time before the will brings itself to consent to take up the duty; it cannot be said that the individual ceases to be a child of God during this time of indecision. Or a grievous wrong is resented and it may be some time before the heart finds love enough to forgive; but here, too, it cannot be said that the divine life is wholly lost from the soul. But no one should consent to remain in these difficult, perilous and painful conditions. There is only one happy, victorious, safe kind of a Christian life: that is the life of absolute, uninterrupted, abandonment to the will of God and hearty, all-inclusive, self-forgetful love for others. We are often perplexed as to what our duty is in a certain matter. In such cases we are under no obligation to consent to perform a duty not yet clearly assigned. All that God requires is a comprehensive agreement to do his will as fast as he makes it clear. But we should seek an experience in which the soul is so cleansed from sin and so flooded with love as that we shall be eager and alert all the time to do all we can for God, and that every affront or injustice, even unacknowledged and unrepented, will be met with instant forgiveness.

A. B., Rouseville, Pa. As under the Hebrew law, Naboth had the sole and independent right of holding or disposing of his vineyard, it would have been a violation of the constitution to attempt to force him to surrender it by any ordinary legal measures. It was no doubt a paternal inheritance, and Naboth, in refusing to part with it, meant no disrespect for the king, but was guided by a conscientious regard to the divine law, which prohibited the sale of such an inheritance, except in unavoidable cases, such as on account of debt. Even then it would have been redeemable at any time, and failing redemption from any other cause, would have reverted to its owner in the jubilee year. It would therefore seem that Naboth, if he had sold or alienated the vineyard, would have regarded himself as an offender against the law and, in this sense, a sinner.

Rev. G. R. Buford, Field Secretary of the Social Service Committee of the Evangelical Ministers' Association of Atlanta, Ga., writes: "I note with pleasure your article on 'The Church and the Poor' of October 20. We are trying to work out this phase of church work—which is a great opportunity for the church—and I would welcome any suggestions you might make—what churches are undertaking it, etc. The plan we are following is about as follows—1. To organize a relief committee in every church; 2. To guide this committee until we see that it is ready for work; 3. To relate all charities—whether church, private or civic. The effort is meeting with a ready co-operative spirit. I feel that we have a great opportunity before us." The Christian Herald will be glad to hear from others who have had personal experience in this class of church work. An exchange of views on the subject would be of widespread benefit.

C. A., Augulla, Miss. The gift of tongues is understood to have been not only the power to speak and understand various languages which the speaker had not previously studied or acquired, but also the power to speak a spiritual language unknown to man, uttered in ecstasy and understood only by those enlightened by the Holy Spirit. Paul in I Cor. 12:10, wrote not to depreciate this gift but to warn the people not to be led away by unprofitable or doubtful manifestations of it. Even in those early days of the church, the leaders had difficulty in controlling the tendency to fanaticism among its adherents. God is not the author of confusion and he never gives a message to his children that is unintelligible. Any gift or message that is incapable of being understood is not of God. Try the spirits by this simple but decisive test.

J. G. B., Des Moines, Iowa. In the days of the judges, when Israel demanded a king to rule over them, the prophet Samuel was divinely inspired to warn them of the consequences. He told them that they would have to give their sons and daughters for the king's service and also to give of their substance; that he would make them hewers of wood and drawers of water. In modern times we see this illustrated under the monarchical system in various countries. The common people are expected to die for a king or for a dynasty; to give up of their substance by submitting to heavy taxation, and to toil in order that royal and its satellites may live in ease. They also espouse the quarrels of their rulers, whether they are in sympathy with them or not. The only countries that are at peace at the present time, with a single exception, are the republics.

E. E. C., Boston, Mass. Indian summer usually begins in the late autumn between mid-November and early December, and is characterized by calm, dry, mild weather with occasional haziness, which is frequently noticeable in the upper Mississippi valley, although extending to the Atlantic. The haze is believed to be due to fine dust, which floats close to the surface of the earth. These conditions were first noticed in the central region, which was then occupied by Indians, and the name is supposed to have been given to the season on that account. In his poem, "Evangeline," Longfellow refers to what we know as Indian summer in these lines:

"Then followed that beautiful season Called by the pious Acadian peasant the summer of All Saints."

Reader, Shady, N. Y. The angel-annunciation to the shepherds as related by Luke (2:8-20) is one of the grandest episodes of the whole Gospel record. It is the peace of the angels to this poor world which so seldom resounds to the pure praise of God. One distinguished commentator says: "accord with God and good-will to men is the necessity of a fallen world. To bring it and all other peace in its train, was the message of the Saviour to this earth and along with it, heaven's whole good-will to man." How little does the world reverence or even remember the peace song of the advent day.

Puritan, Hurlock, Md. Such a discussion as you suggest is properly within the province of an art journal. We hold that there is line beyond which art ceases to be instructive and becomes immoral. This may be said of both painting and sculpture and even of dress itself. Wherever the line of good taste is passed and the obvious intention is to pander to sensuality, it is a departure downwards. Instead of elevating art, it degrades it.

W. H. H., Plymouth, Ind. The passage in Job 33:21, 22 is a part of the speech of Elihu, who is alluding to Job's words (chapter 13:8-10), wherein he complains that the fads plead for God, partially "accepting his person." Elihu says he will not do this, but will act impartially between God and the patriarch, as it is not wise or just to have respect of persons in judgment.

H. L. S., Adamstown, Pa. The covenant between God and Abraham, which promises a special blessing to the seed of the patriarch, is still regarded as a living covenant. Bible scholars hold that the restoration of the Jews will take place, although the time is indefinite, and the Jewish people themselves look forward to this event. Moreover, history shows that those nations that have oppressed the Jews have always been visited with punishment.

M. E., Sac City, Iowa. The Scriptural view is that a lie is never justifiable, and that if a person has faith in God, he or she will always be able to "tell the truth and bear it." There are cases where it may be better to remain silent; but even such silence would be wrong, if it were meant to give the same impression that would be given by an untruth.

Mrs. E. E. H., Detroit, Mich. This cannot in any sense be called a religious war, but it is true that the majority of the warring nations are Catholic, but that fact does not enter into the question in considering the causes of the war.

Mrs. D. McS., Buffalo, N. Y. Up to October 28, according to an unofficial estimate, the war debts of the great powers engaged in the struggle were: Britain, $6,163,000,000; France, $4,128,000,000; Russia, $3,724,000,000; Italy, $643,000,000; Germany, $7,380,000,000; Austria, $2,763,000,000.

Subscriber, Erie, Pa. There is no record of any boat or sailing vessel of any kind before the ark, but that boats of the dugout type were known in the Stone Age and in the lake dwellings is asserted by scholars and investigators.

Reader, Canal Dover, Ohio. The general tendency is to discourage marriages between those of near relationship, for physiological reasons.

H. J. H., Hagerstown, Md. The point is not in our collections.

As the Painter in the Post Says:

"When you have a certain varnishing job to do use the varnish that is specially made for that job."

Every woman knows that a recipe for doughnuts will not produce biscuits. Neither will a Floor Varnish recipe produce a Piano Varnish.

Each of these three S-W Varnishes is made to protect and beautify a particular surface and stand the wear that such a surface gets. Get the Varnish for your purpose from the Sherwin-Williams dealer.

Send for These

Send 10 cents for "Going to Market," the clever new game that teaches and entertains, and get this useful book with it, free of charge, The A B C of Home Painting.

SHERWIN-WILLIAMS PAINTS & VARNISHES

Address all inquiries to 719 Canal Road, N. W., Cleveland, O.
Showrooms—New York, 116 W. 32d St.; Chicago, People's Gas Bldg.; San Francisco, 523 Market St. Sales Offices and Warehouses in principal cities. Best dealers everywhere.

MAR-NOT

For floors

Floors are walked on, danced on and furniture is dragged over them. They are scrubbed and swept and rubbed. Mar-not meets these conditions, holds its looks and gives you long service under the most abusive treatment.

SCAR-NOT

For furniture and woodwork

The steam from a radiator, the heat of a dish or the splash of boiling water, has no effect on Scar-not. It takes a rich, lustrous polish and is extensively used by furniture manufacturers.

REXPAR

For outdoor work

Weather is relentless in its attacks on varnish. Rexpa can be exposed to heat, cold, rain or snow, or even submerged under water, and still retain its lustre and never turn white. Use it for all outside varnishing.

DON'T PAY TWO PRICES HOOSIER Stoves Ranges Heaters FREE

To try in your own home for 30 days. Show your friends. Freight paid by us. Send it back at our expense if you do not want to keep it. You can buy the best at Actual Factory Prices. Are heavily made, of the highest grade selected material, beautifully finished, with improvements that equal anything ever produced. The Best in the World. Guaranteed for years by a Two Million Dollar Bond. No matter where you live, you can try a HOOSIER in your own home thirty days, without a penny's expense or obligation to you. You can save enough on a single HOOSIER STOVE to buy your winter's fuel. Write or send postal today for Large Free Catalog and prices showing large assortment to select from. No Obligations.

HOOSIER STOVE COMPANY,
164 State Street, - MARION, IND.

Buy Him a Real Knife FOR HIS CHRISTMAS GIFT

Not the ordinary gift knife, but a genuine hand forged English razor steel knife that will cut and hold its edge—fully guaranteed. We will put any photo or logo emblem on one side of the transparent handle, and any name and address on the other.

SPECIAL CHRISTMAS OFFER

No. 310—Governor Knife, 3 Blades, $1.60. No. 320—Governor Knife, 2 Blades, $1.25. CUT IS TWO-THIRDS ACTUAL SIZE.
FREE A Beautiful Pearl Handle Knife given absolutely free with a purchase of 3 Knives. Get your order in today, now.

Agents Wanted Everywhere. Write for Catalog and Terms.

Solden Rule Cutlery Co., 552 W. Lake St., Dept. 303, Chicago, Ill.

"DUPLEX" will treat your envelope order as if it were the only one in the house, and as if all others it hopes to receive depended upon the accuracy and promptness with which yours is filled.

FREE—A Duplex Envelope Opener, for the name and address of your Treasurer and S. S. Supt. Saves time and trouble.

ADDRESS DESK—1
DUPLEX
RICHMOND, VA.
(ARCHER G. JONES)

Indian Summer

By Margaret E. Sangster, Jr.

DID you notice the hills this morning?" questioned the man who has the desk in front of mine.

"Hills?" I pondered. "Hills—what hills?"

"Any hills," said the man half impatiently; "any hills at all. There was certainly a good bit of inspiration in this morning."

"Why?" I asked. "Why—any more in some other morning?"

"The man who has the desk in front of me gazed with pitying eyes in my direction. "There was a touch of frost last night," he exclaimed, "and this morning the hills were glorious. How could you help noticing?"

"Why?" I murmured, a bit embarrassed. "I didn't see them! I was running for a train—running so hard that I had no time to look."

"Indian Summer—and no time to look—Indian Summer, that lasts for a day and fades in another day. Indian Summer, that is so slow in coming and so quick in going. Indian Summer—and no time to look!"

"Some people say that the Indian Summer is the saddest part of the year. Some people say that there is a certain greenness in the leaves that turn scarlet and then fade to brown and finally fall from the trees. Some people say that Indian Summer is like death—slow and sad and dull-colored at the end. Some folk like Indian Summer. Some folk say that it is like the climax of life."

ONCE knew a middle-aged woman a woman so well along in middle age that some people spoke of her as elderly. Though her hair was gray and her face was not as light as it had been, her heart was the heart of a girl in the springtime of life, and her smile was the flash of a sunny smile of April. One day she was exchanging confidences with me (she was in her element when she told me of her life story).

"I was never a pretty girl," she told me "and, unfortunately, I knew it. (Don't care what folks say about conceit and false pride, but it is unfortunate to know that you aren't pretty.) People were very frank when they spoke to me of my painfully straight hair and my freckles and my awkwardness—so frank that after a time I didn't want to go out, or to have people come in to see me. I wanted to be alone where folks couldn't see me, because I was so painfully self-conscious that I was sure they were whenever I came in sight. 'Here's the homely Nancy Brown again.' Of course I was foolish, but everybody is foolish some time! And I had always been a sensitive disposition. I got so that I refused to have a mirror in my room. Oh, bless you, child, I wasn't worse looking than most of the girls I knew. I just taken chance remarks to heart."

"That was the springtime of my life—or so poets call it. All the time I was alone moping and worrying about things that I couldn't make any better, and I doubt if the worrying and moping did me any better looking. Time went on, a long dull time, and then finally I married. I don't know how I ever met any one I would have cared to marry, I don't know yet, for I never went out; but I do know that I felt apologetic and sympathetic for my husband because I was such a homely girl. Of course he said that he liked my looks, but I thought he was only being nice. You see, those silly little chance remarks had hurt me deeply."

When my first baby was old enough to talk, one day she called me "Pretty ma'am." I knew she didn't know what pretty was, but I knew she wasn't old enough or clever enough to pretend, and the word made me happier than anything I had heard in a long while. But I was too busy making little rompers and taking care of a big house to bother with about whether I was attractive or not. My little family was happy, and it seemed to be the biggest thing in the world.

"My husband died, and my babies grew up and married and left me, and I was all alone again. I suppose the obvious thing for me to do would have been to go back to all my loneliness and self-consciousness, but my life had been full of blessedness and usefulness (which is the same thing as blessedness) for too long. I went out and I dressed myself prettily. My hair was gray, but somehow I didn't mind. I fluffed it out as I would never have dared to when I was a girl, for fear of criticism. I took more pains with my dress, and I began to realize that some things were becoming to me while others weren't. I did social work and helped poor families, but I didn't neglect having a good time once in a while. Yesterday," the middle-aged woman laughed heartily, "yesterday I heard a woman at a tea ask who that handsome woman in gray was. 'That handsome woman in gray' was me."

"This is the autumn of my life, or so folks say. But let me tell you, though autumn has a reputation for being a cheerless dying time, the autumn of my life has been many times more cheerful than the springtime was. I can't agree with folk who cry when they see the leaves fall from the trees, for it isn't a sad sight to me. Autumn time is the Indian Summer of life, and it can be as bright and happy and cheerful as you make it."

I USED to live in a house that had a little tree in the front yard. It was a forlorn, moth-eaten looking tree, with leaves that never seemed quite green enough or strong enough. It was a poorly nourished anemic-looking tree, and oftentimes I felt sorry for it as it stood among its fellows: it was so unattractive by comparison. Oftentimes when we contemplated cutting it down, I felt so sorry that I wouldn't let it be touched. The summer went by and the autumn came, and with the autumn the little tree suddenly seemed to take on new life. It blushed scarlet, with streaks of gold and tiny spots of green, and as I looked at it I felt glad that it had never been chopped down, for of all the trees in the front yard it was the most beautiful. Then the winter came and the leaves, crumpled, pitiful, brown leaves, dropped from the tree. All through the winter it stood bare and bleak and dead-looking.

In the spring no new leaves came out on the trees. When buds appeared on the other branches it was still bare and bleak and tired looking. And so we knew that during the winter it had died. So we cut it down, but somehow I felt that I need no longer be sorry for the little tree. I felt that its one burst of color and beauty had more than paid for its drab little existence. And I was glad that the tree had died content.

OH, the Indian Summer is long in coming and swift in going. Perhaps for only a few days every autumn the hilltops are gorgeous enough to give inspiration to mortals. And then perhaps when they are gorgeous enough, we haven't time to look at them, because we have to hurry for a train.

Some people's lives are like Indian Summer. Some people live joyously through the springtime and then hurry through autumn because they are afraid that they will miss something. That is when autumn is a sad season, for nothing is sadder than the missing of a beautiful thing. But some people who have perhaps never had time to really live pause a moment when Indian Summer comes, and drink in the beauty with the eyes and the heart and the soul. They take time to see the inspiration in the hills. After an Indian Summer like that it doesn't really matter how soon the winter comes.

After I had done writing my letter I picked up my last Christian Herald and the thought came to me. "Never anything but good in the Christian Herald."—Subscriber, Conway Springs, Kans.

When Louise of Prussia Went to Napoleon

ONE hundred years ago she went to Napoleon on a delicate and humiliating mission.

A clever woman, a beautiful woman, was Louise of Prussia. Had she accomplished her mission that night, the history of Europe would be different today.

Beneath the surface of the mighty war now going on are the secret, twisted threads of intrigue and passions of a hundred years.

To understand the fearful upheaval in Europe you must know that hidden history of Europe frankly told in imperishable form in

Muhlbach's Historical Romances

Muhlbach's Wonderful Historical Novels are all founded on history. They tell the private, personal life and character of great men and great women. History is here written in story form. These volumes are beyond question the most fascinating historical romances that have ever been given to the world. They contain a history of the great crises in Germany, Austria, Russia, England, Switzerland, Egypt, France, Holland and Prussia during two hundred years of startling events, told in intensely interesting and romantic form. All classes are represented in these volumes as they lived and loved, thought and acted. Thus the human interest always prevails and has given this set of books enduring popularity. These wonderful historic romances are among the books that never die. They are interesting, instructive, reliable, truthful, wholesome and good. In the volume devoted to Napoleon and Blucher practically every historic character that the life of the great emperor touched in any way is here given—all the men and women of his time. This new edition is printed from new plates, upon extra quality of paper from easy-to-read type, are attractively illustrated and bound in Art Buckram Cloth, titles stamped in gold. The Encyclopedia Britannica says: "Muhlbach's works show a talent for lively description and narration that gives enduring popularity and a power in weaving alluring romances from those stirring times that is unsurpassed."

Here Is Our Bargain Offer—Send No Money

Just sign and mail attached coupon and we will ship you the complete set of this beautiful edition for five days' examination in your own home. You can then decide for yourself whether or not you wish to buy. You can return the set if it fails to give you entire satisfaction. Should you decide to purchase send us $1.00 as first payment and pay the balance at the rate of $2.00 per month for only nine months until our special price of only $19.00 is paid. The regular subscription price is $40.00. Thousands of sets have been sold at this figure. The reason we are able to cut the price to only $19.00 is that our method of sale by mail eliminates all middle-men's profits. There is neither a dealer's profit nor an agent's commission involved in the transaction. We ship direct from factory to consumer and guarantee satisfaction in every way. Mail coupon promptly.

HERE ARE THE CONTENTS:

1. Napoleon and the Queen of Prussia.
2. The Empress Josephine.
3. Napoleon and Blucher.
4. Queen Hortense.
5. Marie Antoinette and Her Son.
6. Prince Eugene and His Times.
7. The Daughter of an Empress.
8. Joseph II and His Court.
9. Mohammed Ali and His House.
10. Henry VIII and His Court.
11. Berlin and Sans Souci.
12. Goethe and Schiller.
13. The Merchant of Berlin.
14. Louise of Prussia and Her Times.
15. Old Fritz and the New Era.
16. Andreas Hofer.
17. Frederick the Great and His Court.
18. Frederick the Great and His Family.

CUT OUT AND MAIL

INSPECTION COUPON

THE RIVERSIDE PUBLISHING CO. (11-17-16)
Marquette Bldg., Chicago, Illinois

Please ship me for examination and approval one set Muhlbach's Historical Novels, eighteen volumes, Art Buckram cloth binding. If satisfactory, I will send you $1.00 after five days' examination and $2.00 a month thereafter for nine months. If the set does not meet my entire approval after five days' examination, I will notify you and hold subject to your order and return at your expense, as offered The Christian Herald readers.

Name.....

Address.....

Amos, the Fearless Prophet

International Sunday School Lesson for November 28
Amos 5:1-15

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By REV. F. B. MEYER, D.D.

"He that hath my word, let him speak my word faithfully." Jer. 23:28.

Faithfulness and faith differ thus. In faith we trust God; in faithfulness God trusts us. The Master's visible presence is withdrawn, but there is no need for the interests of his kingdom to suffer, because he has made ample provision for its continuance and increase. There is money enough lodged in the hands of his stewards, enough wisdom in their brains, and enough love in their hearts. All the gifts of speech and government for each succeeding age are furnished to successive generations; and if the kingdom does not come and the will of God is not done, and the world is not evangelized, it is because his stewards are not faithful. Either they are using their own emolument and pleasure rather than the messages of Christ to men, or they have hidden their talent in the disuse of a hole in the ground. There is great need, if we are entrusted with the messages of Christ to men, that we should speak them faithfully. For the trumpet give no sound, or an uncertain one, who will prepare himself for the battle? And if the warder on the castle tower do not warn the hay-makers in the valley that the foemen are creeping through the brake, their blood will be required at the hand.

A Prophet against Profits

By Arthur H. Howland

AMOS was a farmer who did not like the way things were going. He struck at evil and injustice not because he himself felt the oppression, for he lived across the line—in Judah, not in Israel—and from the facts of the narrative it appears that he was himself in fairly comfortable circumstances. He probably owned the sheep he tended, and perhaps the sycamore trees. But he saw suffering and injustice and crime and impiety, and these sights roused his soul to a great and holy anger.

He went north to Israel, doubtless dressed still as a shepherd farmer, and roared out the divinely inspired denunciations of king, priest and people for their " manifold transgressions and mighty sins."

He had many excuses for not going—probably more than Jonah had for not going to Nineveh. He was not a prophet, nor the son of a prophet; he had no training as scribe or priest. He knew the people of the northern kingdom would resent the coming of a citizen of their neighbor kingdom to tell them of their crimes. But he had heard the voice of God and must tell what he had heard.

How well Amos did his preaching may be gathered from the narrative of chapter 7, verses 10 to 17, which tell of the attempts to drive him out of the country. "The land is not able to hear all his words," moaned Amaziah. "Don't preach in Bethel," he urged, "for it is the king's chapel and the king's court." But Amos rebuked him furiously and went on preaching.

LOOK now specially at the sins Amos rebuked. "Ye trample upon the poor" (5:11). "I know how manifold are your transgressions and how mighty are your sins, ye that afflict the just, that take a bribe, that turn aside the poor at the gate from their right" (5:12). The gate was the place of judgment, the courts of the community. Much has been said lately about the difficulty that poor people and laborers have in getting justice in our American courts. Elihu Root, speaking in favor of the new constitution for New York State, said recently: "We have got our procedure regulated according to the higher trained, refined, subtle, ingenious intellect of the best practiced lawyers, and it is all wrong. Our procedure ought to be based upon the common intelligence of the farmer and the merchant and the laborer. There is no reason why a plain, honest man should not be permitted to do justice in that particular case unhampered by a great variety of statutory rules."

Read some of the other denunciations of this same form of sin: "Ye . . . which oppress the poor, which crush the needy, which say to their masters, Bring and let us drink" (4:1). Here is the picture of a greedy employer commanding his manager to produce more profits: "They know not to do right, who store up violence and robbery in their palaces" (3:10). "Hear this,

O ye that swallow up the needy, even to make the poor of the land to fail, saying, When will the new moon be gone, that we may sell corn, and the Sabbath, that we may open wheat, making the ephah small and the sikel great, and falsifying the balance by deceit, that we may buy the poor for silver, and the needy for a pair of shoes, yea, and sell the refuse of the wheat!" Poor quality, small measure, big price! Oh, you among American businessmen who are guilty of such things, what would this farmer of Tekoa say to you?

Notice the connection Amos makes between oppression and luxury. That is the woe of the ages: the few live oppressed the many that they might live in idleness and luxury. The Christian ought to fear and abhor luxury, not covet them, for they mean that one has been oppressed, some one deprived of the things he ought to have. Our social climbing ought to be instead of up. Aristocracy, exclusiveness—all these things that have been taught as desirable—are really inhuman, because they carry forward these ancient crimes of injustice. Jesus died to be among lowly folk. He went to rich men's palaces when he was asked, but he did not fear to say such an amazing thing as that it is easier for a camel to go through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter into the kingdom of heaven.

WHO will enroll himself with the followers of Amos and of Jesus, standing for the poor, pleading for their rights, warning the nation back to God and his righteousness? Happily such is being done, and being done really in America, to bring the people to their rights. Refer in the lesson study to such men as Henry Ford and Frank P. Walsh and Scott Nearing, a manufacturer, a lawyer and a college professor who have not been afraid to speak and act in defense of the oppressed.

Above all, do not be afraid to stir things up. Amos detested those who were "at ease in Zion." Make our church, your Sunday school, your young people's society, take some stand, say some words, do some things that will help the cause of God and of his people.

My Collective Neighbor

By Amos R. Wells

AMOS is counted one of the great prophets, just because he wrote a short book. If he had written a long book he would have been ranked with the major prophets. He was a poor and not minor in the heroism of his character and deeds. In what we know of the lives of the prophets he excelled by Daniel alone.

It was good for Amos's preaching that he was a day laborer. Perhaps he was not fond of caring for sheep and tending the figs on sycamores. Doubtless he often went to bed with the bare feet. His hands were calloused and he wore old clothes. But he got far more out of day's labor than day's pay. Christ's workmen disciples knew how to do. "The secret of life," wrote

KEEP YOUR CHILDREN STRONG

Some children catch one ailment after another, have colds after colds, while other children are seldom sick. If your children are pale or frail, if they catch colds easily, lack ambition or are backward in school, they need SCOTT'S EMULSION which is rich in the food elements to create good blood to strengthen their bodies and brains—SCOTT'S EMULSION is free from alcohol or habit forming drugs.

CHILDREN RELISH IT. REFUSE SUBSTITUTES.

14-58
SCOTT & BOWNE, BLOOMFIELD, N. J.

Your Wife's Christmas

Torrington VACUUM SWEEPER

No dirt can go so deep into a carpet or rug that a Torrington cannot get it out. No electric or other power is used—the wheels on which it easily runs operate three suction bellows that get all the dirt. These same wheels drive the brush which picks up all litter.

The Torrington scatters no dust—it leaves no dusting to do. Clean cut, simply built, it will last for years. It saves the drudgery of using a broom and costs less per year.

CONSIDER THESE POINTS: Health, economy, convenience. Made in three grades. Prices $6 to $12. Ask your dealer to show you. Write for Free Booklet.

National Sweeper Co., 12 Laurel St., Torrington, Conn. or 52 Bruce Ave., Westmount, Montreal, Canada

TYPEWRITERS ALL MAKES

Prices $15.00 up. SOLD or RENTED anywhere at 1/4 to 1/2 MANUFACTURERS' PRICES, allowing RENTAL TO APPLY ON PRICE. Free Trial. Installment payments if desired. Write for catalog. 71

TYPEWRITER EMPORIUM, 34-36 W. Lake St., Chicago

TYPEWRITERS BARGAIN PRICES

Look at these bargains! Typewriters Rebuilt in our own factories. Every machine is guaranteed for one year.

Remingtons $20 to $55	Smiths $18 to $40
Underwoods $35 to $60	Royals $25 to $45
L. C. Smiths $30 to $50	Olivers $20 to $35

We have others. Send for catalog describing them, and address of nearest branch office.

AMERICAN WRITING MACHINE CO., Inc., 345 Broadway, N. Y.

PATENTS That Protect and Pay

Advice and Books FREE. Rates Reasonable. Highest References. Best Services.

WATSON E. COLEMAN, Patent Lawyer, Washington, D. C.

1819 "Twelve o'clock and all's well!"

1915

In the year 1819 the directors of the Hartford Fire Insurance Company "voted $20 for the town watch," whose duty it was "to patrol the streets with staff and lantern and guard against incipient fires." From that day to this the Hartford has been in the forefront of every intelligent, constructive movement for fire prevention. It has played an important part in the introduction and development of every modern method of fire prevention and control, from the early attempts at fireproof construction to the latest automatic sprinkler system. Thus the same spirit of public service that voted the first $20 for the Hartford town watch of 1819 still characterizes the

INSURANCE SERVICE OF THE TWO HARTFORDS

For 105 years the Hartford Fire Insurance Company has been noted not only for unquestioned financial strength and integrity, but also for its hearty co-operation in every manly progressive movement in American insurance.

The Hartford Accident & Indemnity Company conducts an up-to-date casualty and bonding business along the same sound and liberal lines, and it has justly inherited the parent company's reputation for the prompt settlement of every honest obligation.

The two companies between them write practically every form of insurance but life insurance.

Check on the coupon below any form of insurance in which you may be interested. Mail it to us and we will send you full information.

Hartford Fire Insurance Co.
Hartford Accident & Indemnity Co.
Hartford, Conn.

COUPON—CHECK—TEAR OFF—MAIL

Hartford Fire Insurance Company, (Service Department C11), 125 Trumbull Street, Hartford, Conn.

Gentlemen:

Please send information on the kind of insurance checked to the name and address written on margin of coupon

- | | | | |
|---|---|---|--|
| ☐ Fire | ☐ Motor Cycle | ☐ Tornado | ☐ Sprinkler Leakage |
| ☐ Accident | ☐ Burglary | ☐ Hail | ☐ Marine |
| ☐ Health | ☐ Employer's Liability | ☐ Golfer's Policy | ☐ Explosion |
| ☐ Auto Liability | ☐ Workmen's Compensation | ☐ Parcel Post | ☐ Breeders and Exhibitors |
| ☐ Auto Collision | ☐ Bonding | ☐ Rent | ☐ Teaming |
| ☐ Auto Theft | ☐ Elevator | ☐ Merchandise in Transit | ☐ Salesmen's Samples |
| ☐ Auto Fire | ☐ Live Stock Transit | ☐ Live Stock | ☐ Registered Mail |
| ☐ Baggage | ☐ Race Horse | | ☐ Use and Occupancy |

Jewels. en-face.
permanent se, adjusted to temperature
$35.00

Ask for the Watch with the Purple Ribbon.

A watch you'll always prize

As the watch of a gentleman, the South Bend Watch wins unbounded admiration for its aristocratic appearance, because of the refined elegance of its lines. As its owner you will also appreciate its on-the-second time-keeping ability.

All watches are put through the most rigid inspection and tests before they leave the factory.

THE South Bend WATCH

Carefully constructed with a precision that is itself a real assurance of accurate time-keeping. All movements and cases fully guaranteed. Made in 100 styles—$16 to $100.

See Your Jeweler—no one can get South Bend Watches.

Send for 68-page Catalog. Illustrated in color—showing all the "Chesterfield" series, and also the Studebaker Railroad grades, the Ladies' Dainty models and many others.

It's a Shame to drive ordinary nails or tacks into your precious pictures, posters, etc. Have you ever tried MOORE PUSH-PINS in your pictures? They will save your pictures. The sharp steel points scarcely make a mark.

The transparent case that pins are made of. They're not the thing for pictures with colored engravings, postcards, etc. You simply push them in with your finger. 2 sizes. 10c per packet.

For your heavy pictures, ballroom, etc., use the up-to-date Moore's Hanging Hammer—the hammer with the built-in line. Inexpensive.

At stationery, hardware, woodworth and other stores or send for samples and illustrated booklet: How to Place Your Picture.

MOORE PUSH-PIN CO., 192 Berkley Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

Factory Prices Save $5 to $23

Freight Paid—A Year's Trial

Save from $5 to $23 by buying direct from factory. 5 years' reputation, back of every stove. Our long experience and big output gives you a better stove or range at less cost.

Gold Coin Stoves and Ranges

Use one for a year—money refunded if it doesn't give you absolute satisfaction. We pay freight, guarantee safe delivery, and send you a stove ready set up. BIG FREE CATALOG—Send for it now. See why improved features of Gold Coin Stoves help you save fuel and bake better. Write today.

GOLD COIN STOVE CO., 11 Oak St., Troy, N. Y.

Muloch, "is not to do what one likes, but to try to like that which one has to do; and one does come to like it in time."

A village doctor's daughter complained to her father of her home drudgery, and the doctor showed her a row of empty bottles. "These bottles," he said, "are worth nothing in themselves, but in one I put a deadly poison, in another a sweet perfume, in another a healing medicine. No one cares for the bottles, but it is what they carry that kills or cures. So with your household duties. The dish-washing, the floor-sweeping, the mending count for nothing, but what counts is the impatience and anger or the patience and love which you put into them. Those are what make your life." And those are what made Amos a hero in spite of his commonplace tasks.

The lowly work of Amos gave him sympathy with other lowly workers, and fired his soul to condemn their oppressors. The sycamore trees of Tekoa put backbone into the preaching of Amos in Bethel. Fellow feeling with the wronged is at the base of all true and lasting reforms.

READ our lesson for today, and the rest of the great words of Amos, and you will see that they burn with pity for the injured and oppressed, with wrath for the unjust judges, the grasping rich, the lazy sensual priests, and the spoilers that thronged Jeroboam's vile court.

Washington Gladden, speaking once about Christ's command that we should love our neighbor as ourselves, said: "There is one neighbor whose rights I must very carefully respect, and that is my collective neighbor, the community, the municipality, the state, the nation. This collective neighbor of mine is the victim of enormous and unspeakable perfidies and injuries. Selfish and greedy men, in all sorts of combinations, are constantly bent on plundering him. Against their aggressions I ought to be a swift witness and an unrelenting foe." Amos cared for his neighbors in Tekoa, we may be sure; but he also cared for his collective neighbor, the kingdom of Israel across the border. In this he is a splendid example to the modern Christian and the modern church.

Echoes from the Holy Land

ORDIINARY fig trees in Palestine bear the figs at the outer end of the boughs and twigs. Just above our house in Beirut stands a gnarled ancient sycamore. At certain seasons the trunk itself and many of the larger branches are covered with thousands of small green figs, which grow on small twigs springing directly from the huge trunk and larger branches. They are green, prickly, juiceless, and fall by thousands with not even a hungry child to pick them up. They never mature except when some one climbs the tree and pinches them for a number of days as a boy pinches an apple or orange before eating or sucking it.

Amos had for a part of his occupation the pinching of this poorest of all fruits. But he was also brave enough to face many a Syrian lion, now wholly extinct, and take from its mouth "two legs or the piece of an ear," and then God called him to enter Bethel, Beersheba and Gilgal, where women were rude as kine, where men were wicked oppressors of the poor, and where kings bade him not to prophesy. Beersheba, Bethel and Gilgal were the bench, the bar and the pulpit of his day, all three of which needed a rude awakening from the prophet who came from the "desert of Tekoa."

"IN the gate." In all ancient cities, especially in the Holy Land, the city gate was like the town hall, the place where all public gatherings assembled and where all local disputes were settled by the sheik or old men. Out of this ancient custom grew the "Sublime Porte," or place of judgment and justice in the Ottoman Empire.

"HOUSES of hewn stone." The most ancient ruins, even of kings' houses, are of rude, uncut stone. Hewn stone was one of the marks of wealth and luxury at the time when the tribes of Israel were transformed from dwellers in tents to city dwellers. The same distinction exists till the present day. The real Arabs still dwell in tents, the city dwellers call themselves "onlad el Arab" or "children of the Arabs."

"KEEPING silence in an evil time." We are passing through just such a period in the Ottoman Empire, when all good men seem to have vanished and those who once spoke freely against iniquity no longer dare to open their mouths.

Some of our first Syrian preachers came from circumstances as lowly as those from which Amos came. Many have suffered already for righteousness' sake and many more will do so again before this land can be delivered from its awful oppression.

The How Column

Conducted by Frank L. Brown, Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association.

How to Prepare the Lesson

THE editor of this Sunday school page, with the writer, feels the matter of help in plans of lesson preparation to be so important to teachers that we are presenting a final group of testimonies from successful teachers of classes of all ages, in the small and large school, as to their individual methods for lesson study. Next week we shall sum up these various suggestions in a few simple plans.

A KANSAS teacher of a class of forty ladies gives as her plan:

"1. Read lesson from Bible several times. 2. Then take lesson helps. 3. Get illustrations from every-day life applicable to lesson to be brought out. 4. Keep in touch with scholars so you can apply truths to suit needs."

From Colorado comes the plan of a teacher of thirty-six young men averaging twenty-three years of age. "Try every night and part of each day to read some literature concerning the lesson. Use daily Bible reading as given in the Uniform Lesson Connection."

A New Jersey teacher of a mixed class including all above the Intermediate Department writes: "I give a written assignment on the chapter or chapters for next Sunday, and in studying myself, simply try to plan to bring out and unify these points with some central spiritual truth for the class to take home. To me the only plan is to pray and try to be full of the lesson."

From the teacher of a class of nine young men, sixteen to nineteen, is this word: "Use Sunday School Journal and study with several other teachers who meet weekly for this purpose."

Oakland, California, has a teacher of eighty primary boys and girls. Her careful preparation includes the following points: "1. Read one or two chapters before the one containing the lesson and one or two after. 2. A prayer for help and guidance in preparing lesson. 3. Look up all references to customs, habits and places in Bible Dictionary and other books. 4. Read the lesson passages all through again. 5. Look for illustrations of the lesson truths all about me; Thursday, begin to study the lesson as I intend to give it; Friday, finish it off; Saturday evening, do any handwork preparation for the lesson for the blackboard, or children's papers. Then go over it as a whole. I begin on Sunday evening by reading the lesson for the following Sunday and work on it each night."

A Pennsylvania teacher of twelve girls averaging seventeen years writes: "I begin at least two weeks before I teach lesson. Read lesson and notes. Watch for daily illustrations. Read lesson every day. Have each pupil in mind and what I wish to ask of each."

A teacher of six live twelve-year-old Junior boys in Kansas says as to her plan: "First the Bible story Monday evenings. Then the lesson helps. Friday night the summary and methods, leaving Saturday for possible map or typewriting work. I use the graded lesson."

A group of young mothers in Kansas has a teacher who thus prepares: "I begin with the Bible and master the facts as well as I can, both the connecting links and on past the lesson. I have found reading and rereading the lesson from the Bible is a great help, then use the helps that I have."

One teacher of twenty young men, sixteen to twenty years, frankly says: "To study a few minutes each day is better for me than one hour or two at one time."

A Connecticut teacher of twelve young women bears the same testimony. "Try to do a little work each day, finishing the preparation Saturday evening."

Adherence to the Bible text comes out in an answer from a New York teacher of a men's class, who gives as his method: "Thorough knowledge of the Bible text and the Scripture beyond."

A teacher of a class of girls in the later teens says: "I use the Bible Study Union Course, 'Heroes of the Faith,' and study from the Quarterly and Teachers' Manual."

FAULTLESS "Wearever" RUBBER GOODS

Get a "Wearever" Hot Water Bottle, Fountain Syringe or Combination Syringe and be sure of certain satisfaction, long service and finest value. The numbers shown here will appeal to you.

They have no seams to leak, no bindings to come loose, are made of finest rubber, very durable, and have Patented improvements that make them give more satisfactory service. Ask for them by number at the Faultless Dealer's.

If you cannot locate the Faultless Dealer in your locality, write us what you wish to purchase and we will see that you are promptly supplied.

The Faultless Rubber Company

Makers of a Complete, High-Grade Line of Rubber Goods for the Home.

Ashland, Ohio, U. S. A.

WEAREVER No. 24 FOUNTAIN SYRINGES 2 AND 3 QUART OVER CAPACITY

If you want the finest and most elegant Hot Water Bottle and Fountain Syringe, ask to see these "WEAREVER" De Luxe numbers. They are different, and exclusively "WEAREVER."

Continental World-Famous Economy

"—the most economical motor I ever used"

This oft-repeated praise of the Continental Motor carries a special significance, denoting more than a saving in the petty items of day-to-day operating expense. Continental Economy goes deeper, is more fundamental. It pervades the entire life and performance of the motor, affording the completest satisfaction at the least outlay.

Continental Motors

This world-famous characteristic of the Continental Motor is primarily of engineering origin. It is the achievement of Continental designers, working in harmony with the engineers of over one hundred and forty manufacturers of pleasure cars and trucks. But it results, too, from Continental workmanship with its high standards of accuracy and uniformity.

To drive a Continental-equipped car, accordingly, means not merely an undisturbed pocket-book, but a well-placed confidence and peace of mind. And this, surely, is the best economy of all.

Let Continental Economy ensure you motor satisfaction in your next car or truck

Continental Motor Mfg. Company

Detroit, Mich.

Largest exclusive motor builders in the world

Factories: Detroit Muskegon

Our Book Offers

Continued from page 1163

DID you read "Janice Day," which we offered with the Christian Herald last year? You will remember it was the "Do Something" book. The success of the book was such that the author, and a Sweeter Helen Beecher Long, Janice Day has written another story entitled "The Testing of Janice Day." It is a vivid and delightful picture of typical New England life and character. "Janice Day," by her contagious example, stirred the slow village of Poketown to wonderful possibilities. We shall not tell you the story here, but every reader of "Janice Day" will welcome this second "do something" book as it carries through the good work started in the first volume. The misunderstandings throughout are a severe test of the lovable character of "Janice Day."

We will send "The Testing of Janice Day," 310 pages, with gold stamped cloth covers, together with the Christian Herald for one whole year for $2.00, or we will send to old subscribers, FREE, as a reward, "The Testing of Janice Day," for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $1.50.

HAVE you bought your copy of "555 Difficult Bible Questions Answered"? Notice that word "difficult." Notice how many questions there are. Also that they are "answered."

One of Our "Best Sellers"

How many of them do you think you could answer without this book? Take such questions "What is meant by 'I will harden Pharaoh's heart'?" "Was Jesus Happy on the way to the cross?" "Did Paul discourage marriage?" "What is grace?" "Are all sins pardoned?" "Can evil emanate from good?" "What is the Bible definition of a Christian?" Could you answer these inside of five hours study?

The beauty of this book, which has had one of the most surprising sales of any book ever offered by the Christian Herald, is that it answers those very questions which you are always on the point of asking but for some reason don't. These half-thousand and more questions have been asked in one form or another by thousands and thousands of human beings like yourself and have been answered through the Christian Herald Mail-Bag by experts. The result is a book that is a "very present help in time of trouble" to the Bible reader.

We will send "555 Difficult Bible Questions Answered" together with the Christian Herald for one whole year for $1.85. Or, we will send to old subscribers, FREE, as a reward, this volume for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $1.50.

DON'T forget the Almanac. Year it will be better than any other. In addition to its permanent features its prose and poetry, its wit and humor, it will contain new departments such as the story of the European War up to the date of going to press; it will contain political information which should be at the disposal of every voter in the Presidential Election of 1916.

Two Established Favorites

There will be a comprehensive depiction of the Lincoln Highway. There will be difficult Bible questions answered. There will be a department devoted to Common Law, and there will be many features of especial interest to women.

Add ten cents to your subscription to the Christian Herald and we will send you the Christian Herald Almanac for 1916 postpaid.

DO you remember the beautiful Daily Worship Calendar which we issued last year? War conditions in Europe have prevented us from publishing that calendar this year, but we believe we have substituted for it an even more beautiful Art Calendar. It is composed of a reproduction of a remarkable picture of Christ walking beside the plowman in the field, which was published under the title of "I am with you Always," together with verses by Margaret E. Santer Jr. When this picture was first published in the Christian Herald, we received requests from readers everywhere who wished it published separately or in calendar form.

The Christian Herald Art Calendar for 1916 will prove a source of spiritual help to any household. The original picture was published in two colors. On the calendar it is printed in full colors, achieving a most beautiful effect. It will make a Christmas or New Year's present that will delightfully remind your friends of you every day in the year.

We will send this superb calendar together with the Christian Herald for one whole year for $1.75, or to old subscribers sending us their renewal and one new subscription to the Christian Herald, we will send two copies of this calendar mail to separate addresses if desired FREE.

DO you take advantage of our "bargain" offers? In making up our list of magazines for the year be sure to get the Christian Herald list before you finally make your purchase. The Christian Herald has made arrangements with a number of the leading magazines whereby very special prices (in some cases constituting a discount of not less than 30 per cent.) have been obtained. Make out your list of magazines and send it to the Christian Herald and we will give you the advantage of these bargain rates. It will save you money.

A GREAT SONGBOOK

Hundreds have already written us that "Songs for Service" is the superior of any gospel songbook they have ever met up with. Its 288 pages sparkle with bright, new, snappy songs—songs that have been tested—that are unusually effective—songs such as have made previous Rodeheaver songbooks so wonderfully popular.

Songs for Service

is the best songbook that has yet been issued by The Rodeheaver Co.—no higher praise can be given. It is the book used exclusively in the "Billy" Sunday campaigns.

EXAMINE A COPY FREE—Simply state that you will either return it in good condition within 15 days or will remit the retail price. State binding desired.

PRICES

Cloth 35c, limp 25c, manila 20c per copy, postpaid
Cloth $25, limp $18, manila $15 per 100, not prepaid

Orchestrated for 15 instruments.

Printed in both round and shaped notes.

THE RODEHEAVER CO.
GOSPEL MUSIC
1083 MONON BUILDING, CHICAGO
633 LIPPINCOTT BLDG., PHILADELPHIA

AGENTS WANTED

for independent hollow-wire lighting systems for homes, stores, etc.; also complete line of lanterns and portable and street lamps. Use common gasoline.

AKRON GAS LAMPS are most improved, simplest and safest of all. Best and cheapest illumination known. Shed a clear, soft, bright, white light of high candle power. Fully guaranteed. Handy demonstration outfit. Our Agency Proposition cannot be beat. Exclusive territory. Write quick for Catalog and Terms.

Akron Gas Lamp Co., 627 So. Main St., Akron, O.

LADIES! Ease your feet. Send for our free catalog telling all about our Neat, Noiseless, Flexible, Comfortable, unlined Vici Kid O'Sullivanized PILLOW SHOE. New shoes easy as old ones. No breaking in required. Fit and feel like a kid glove. O'Sullivan's Rubber Heels on all styles.

PILLOW SHOE CO., Dept. 3
184 Summer Street, Boston, Mass.

DON'T Pay Two PRICES HOOSIER Stoves FREE

To try in your own home for 30 days. Show your friends. Freight paid by us. Send it back at our expense if you do not want to keep it. You can buy the best at Actual Factory Prices. Our new improvements equal anything ever produced. Save enough on a single stove to buy your winter's fuel. ALL HOOSIER STOVES Guaranteed for Years. Send postal today for large FREE Catalogue, showing large assortment to select from. No Obligations.

HOOSIER STOVE CO.
164 State St., MARION, IND.

Among the Workers

THE trustees of Sailors' Snug Harbor, the valuable ten New York City blocks extending from Eighth to Eleventh Streets and from Third Avenue to University Place, have announced their intention to close out all saloon leases as fast as they expire. This action will not immediately create that much dry territory in New York, however, for there are many long term ground leases to be considered, and on such property there are buildings erected by the lessees in which liquor is sold, and no change can be made during the life of these ground leases.

NOW and then real proof of the genuineness of humanity becomes available. We all believe in humanity, yet there are those who would have us believe that folks are all mercenary and that good works must ever continue to be their own reward. The Baptist Standard recently told this little story of a Texas boy who did not forget. "Little Joe Farrar's widowed mother sold her only milch cow to send him to Mississippi College. Dr. Farrar became a noted physician and surgeon. When his home was finished he carried his mother to it, saying, 'I must pay you back for selling that cow and sending me to school. This is your home till you go to heaven.'"

WH. Greet, English missionary at Lander, North India, writes to the Christian Herald: "A shopkeeper at one of my camps was admiring a hand I had drawn on a cardboard sign pointing the way. He thought it looked very nice, so he suggested that I should draw others pointing other ways. Very much like the comparative religion we talked. False union in the form of compromise is everywhere, and systems true and false are compromising. A Hindu gentleman, going on pilgrimage to the Ganges, assured me that 'it was not to wash away, but that quiet journeyings amid such impressive scenes assisted religious contemplation.' He was sure that the world was getting used into a true brotherhood, only the war had now hindered it. I assured him that there was no more demonstrative brotherhood between English and German religious leaders before the war, but it was so largely and at by allowing some to shut out the Father and the Son, and now their brotherhood stands split into national camps.

IN a French hospital a German soldier was dying. He was a Protestant, and as the pall hung over him he asked for spiritual isolation according to his faith. The Protestant clergyman at the hospital did not speak German, and the German soldier did not understand French. A Catholic priest who was himself badly wounded had the request of the soldier and the conversation of the nurse and clergyman. He asked to be carried to the side of the soldier's cot, and there, although in severe pain himself, he translated to the dying soldier, until he released him, the words of consolation of the Protestant pastor.

Young People's Topics for November 28

Home Mission Work Done in Our Community

Christian Endeavor Topic. Luke 14:15-24

WHEN we say missions we usually think of foreign lands. Even home missions seem to be work for the Indians, the Eskimos or some people who are strange to us. The work for immigrants in our cities and in the great foreign settlements of the northwest hardly brings the matter right down to the town we live in. Is there some home mission work we can do here, some neglected, unhappy people whose lives we can lighten and brighten, whose hearts we can lead to the Saviour? Are there some reforms in which we ought to help? Of course there are.

Thanksgiving Day has just passed. We studied last week the subject of the man in which God wants to be thanked. Were there some people who did not have a Thanksgiving dinner, who perhaps had but little of any sort of food on this day that ought to have been theirs, whose homes were dark and sad and whose hearts were full of cheer? God would have liked to be thanked by our doing something to brighten these homes. Do not wait till next Thanksgiving. Begin now.

How about the workers in your town? Are the women overworked? Do the children have to work in the factories? Are the men paid so that they can support their families in decent comfort? Are the employers considering fair in their dealings with their employees? These are public questions, and every follower of Jesus ought to have an active interest in their settlement.

What is your society doing to help the cause of temperance in your town? Are the politics clean?

What are you doing in the fight against ignorance? Here we come to the question of the foreigners again. Are there not some groups of men and women, or boys and girls who are not able to go to school, whom you can help to teach? If you have some information they need and a way could be found for your getting it to them, your duty as a neighbor is to share your knowledge with them.

Even on the lowest ground, that of pleasure and amusement, what is your society doing to help? People need amusement just as they need food and sleep. A terribly large percentage of our churches make the mistake in their recreational work of ministering only to the people of their own immediate circle, and do not make the outsider, the unfortunate, the ignorant, the outcast, feel at home.

Most important of all is the direct ministry to the souls of those who are unsaved. Our lesson includes the command "Go out into the highways and hedges and compel them to come in." Are we working like that for the salvation of those who need the beauty and the power of our Christ?

Home Mission Conditions in Eastern States

B. Y. P. U. Topic. Neh. 1:1-11

THE prayer meeting topics for all the young people's societies this week deal with home missions. Read the general discussion under the Christian Endeavor topic above. Our special subject excludes Western, Central and Southern problems. So we need not study at this time work for the Indian, the negro, the Oriental, except to remember that there are in every state some representatives of these classes who should have the attention and service of the church.

But in the Eastern states, home mission problems relate chiefly to the immigrant, the Jew, the unemployed, and those laborers who toil under unjust and oppressive conditions.

Then there are the problems of the saloon, vice and crime, and corrupt politics. The Gospel of Christ has the power and the Church of Christ has the machinery for dealing with these problems. Get in touch with your state home mission organization, get in touch with other organizations or movements that are laboring for better conditions, and make your society felt in making our Eastern states cleaner, happier—and more like heaven.

Our Nearest Home Mission Field

Epworth League Topic. Acts 1:8; 8:5-8; Luke 10:1, 2

STUDY the Christian Endeavor lesson above, and if your League is situated in the Eastern states, also the B. Y. P. U. lesson.

The New Era in Housekeeping

Continued from 1161

fruits and vegetables, canned fish, salmon particularly. The second-grade goods of a reputable manufacturer—well, I say a reputable manufacturer or packer—may have just as much nutriment as first-grade goods.

The Test of Food Qualities

HOW little we know of the grades and qualities of food; butter, coffee, teas, spices! I was told by a butter expert some time ago that there was about two per cent. difference in the first and second grades of butter now on the market, but a very heavy percentage of difference in price, as we all know. This heavy percentage of difference in price had come in the market because of our lack of knowledge of grades and of our constant demand for the "best." In the matter of butter we are often governed by the taste, whereas we ought to know whether or not we are buying clean safe butter.

There is grave danger in much of the butter on the market at the present time. Good taste does not necessarily mean a good grade. While we are governed by taste in butter, there are other articles which we can test in this way—pepper for instance. A housewife said to me the other day, "Why, pepper is just pepper."

Financial Leakages To Be Looked After

I MUST cite these two or three items and ask you to think carefully over the matter of grades as making for economical buying. In our business of housekeeping we must be careful to stop all small leaks, for it is from the small leaks that we often get large bills. There is a great leakage in household expenses by the almost universal use of false weights and measures. At a meeting of the weights and measures officials recently held in New York City it was stated that the "consumers of New York City lost $28,000,000 in one year by the use of false weights and measures." What is your percentage of loss, Mrs. Housewife? Are you checking up what you buy, and do you know that you are receiving full weight and full measure, honest weight and honest measure?

There is another point of economy in the home which I wish to touch upon that does not pertain merely to the buying. It is conservation of the members of the family in order that they may produce for the family; making our home management so efficient and the home atmosphere so restful that those who produce the funds to maintain that home shall get the required rest and recreation in order to be efficient producers.

Truly our business of housekeeping is a great business, a great profession, and we must be well equipped to fulfill our part. It is simple when we take the steps one by one, put our housekeeping on a business basis, learn to be intelligent consumers and efficient home managers. It is interesting and takes our business of housekeeping out of the drudgery class and makes of it a real profession. The housekeeping of our great-grandmothers was one of drudgery, ours is one of efficient management; and efficient management makes for economy.

Beech-Nut

Tomato Catsup

WHY not serve a natural tomato catsup at your table?

Natural Catsup is made from tomatoes ripened on the vines—taken direct to the kitchen, no hauling long distances—the catsup made, bottled and sterilized while the tomatoes are fresh, with all their full rich flavor intact.

We located the Beech-Nut Tomato Catsup plant in Rochester—for the reason that Rochester is in the heart of the region producing the finest catsup tomatoes in the world.

Taste Beech-Nut Tomato Catsup. Notice the fresh-from-the-vine tomato flavor, so different from the ordinary catsups.

Yet the price is the same—two sizes, 15c and 25c (in the extreme West, a little more).

Makers of America's Most Famous Bacon—Beech-Nut Bacon

BEECH-NUT PACKING CO.

CANAJOHARIE, N. Y.

Catsup Plant at Rochester, N. Y.

Send 10 cents in stamps for the newest, most fascinating game—"Going to Market"—amusing and instructive and sure to interest the whole family.

Let the Cornish Profit - Sharing Plan Pay For Your Choice of Any

Cornish Piano or Organ
In Whole or in Part

You buy this beautiful, sweet-toned Cornish Piano or any Cornish Instrument you select and pay for it either wholly or in part out of our bonus profits.

That's the new feature of the world-famous Cornish Plan, which has set music lovers wild all over this world. Now there can be no excuse for your failing to have a beautiful, high grade, Cornish Instrument in your home at once.

No Money in Advance

The new Cornish Plan provides, as always, for 30 Days' Free Use in your home. It provides that you shall buy at lowest Factory Price direct from the factory, saving you one-third to one-half. It gives you All the Credit Needed—terms of your own choice, the privilege of returning the instrument any time within one year if unsatisfactory; and a guarantee for life. We pay the freight if desired. And now in addition comes this great Profit Sharing Bonus Plan—you now share too in our profits. Let our money help you pay. Send today for this new Cornish Book telling how we do without dealers. Our reference of 5,000 Recent Purchasers and full particulars of the greatest Piano and Organ Plan ever offered—our new Profit-Sharing Plan. Send for these today.

Cornish Company, Dept. C.H., WASHINGTON, N. J.

ESTABLISHED OVER FIFTY YEARS.

POMPEIAN OLIVE OIL

ALWAYS FRESH
PURE SWEET WHOLESOME

The "BEST" LIGHT

Positively the cheapest and strongest light on earth. Used in every country on the globe. Makes and burns its own gas. Casts no shadows. Clean and colorless. Absolutely safe. Over 200 styles, 100 to 2000 Candle Power. Fully Guaranteed. Write for catalog.

THE BEST LIGHT CO.

470 E. 5th St., Canton, O.

Pictures sharp to the corners, not dull and hazy.

Type like this — not like zidt

Bausch and Lomb Balopticon

gives entertainment as novel, as interesting, as varied and as instructive as the talking machine gives in its field. The Home Balopticon projects pictures, post cards, solid objects, etc. Pictures in correct position from left to right, not reversed. Now fitted with special 400-watt gas-filled Mazda Lamp, giving illumination superior to any similar instrument on the market. Absolutely safe and automatic and simple enough for child to operate. Lenses, mirrors and all mechanical parts of high quality — not a toy. Ideal equipment for clubs and small schoolroom as well as the home.

Costs but $35—with aluminum coated wall-screen included. Other models for various requirements $20 and up.

"Fun—and Better" is an interesting booklet telling of many novel ways to entertain with the Home Balopticon. Sent free upon request.

Bausch & Lomb Optical Co.

513 ST. PAUL STREET, ROCHESTER, N. Y.

Crawford's ORANGE MARMALADE

Made from a good old Scotch Recipe

The rich flavor of fresh-picked California Oranges is wonderfully well preserved in Crawford's Orange Marmalade, by a process used in Scotland for over a hundred years. Contains nothing but oranges, lemons, sugar and water—no gelatine, preservatives or other adulteratives.

It Is Absolutely Pure

Crawford's has all the fine qualities of imported Orange Marmalade without its bitterness. Once sample it and you will always prefer it. 2 1/2 oz. sample package sent postpaid for 10 cents, stamps or coin, and your grocer's name and address. 10 oz. package 25 cents. One dozen 10-oz. packages express prepaid anywhere in the U. S. for $2.00. Put up in sanitary containers; will keep for many months; money returned if marmalade not in good condition on arrival. Send orders to

THOMAS CRAWFORD
312 Masonic Temple, Anaheim, Calif.

Snug Comfort for Tired Feet

in Parker's Arctic Socks

Warm, restful, healthful, for bed-chamber, bath, sickroom. Easier than stiff-sole slippers. Warm in rubber boots absorb perspiration. Made of knitted fabric lined with soft white wool fleece. Washable, unshrinkable. Parker's name in every pair. In all sizes at dealers or sent postpaid for 25c a pair.

J. H. PARKER CO., DEPT. C, 25 JAMES ST., MALDEN, MASS.

BLMYER BELL CHURCH BELLS

UNLIKE OTHER BELLS SWEETER, MORE DURABLE, LOWER PRICE. OUR FREE CATALOGUE TELLS WHY.

Write to Cincinnati Bell Foundry Co., Cincinnati, O.

MENDETS

Don't Throw It Away

Mend leaks instantly in all utensils, crockery, aluminum, tin, brass, hot water bags, etc. No solder, cement or rivet. Any one can use them. Send for sample box, 10c; large box, all sizes, 25c, postpaid. Agents Wanted. Collette Mfg. Co., Box 303 Amsterdam, N. Y.

The Christian Herald Prayer League

"SOME time ago," writes M. S. from Temple, Texas, "I asked prayer for a revival of religion at Temple. The prayer has been answered, the result of which has been the conversion of over eight hundred souls." Mrs. O. D., Menlo, Ga., writes: "I wish to acknowledge that the prayers for a revival of religion at Menlo have been answered." Mrs. C. H. W., Indiana, writes: "I must tell you your prayers have been answered wonderfully. My husband is now a Christian." Miss J. P. writes from Lynchburg, Va.: "Several months ago I asked prayers that my nephew might be cured of ill health brought on by drink and that he might obtain employment in order to support his wife and five little ones. This prayer has been answered and he stands in line for promotion." M. E. K., Bonners Ferry, Idaho, writes: "I want to acknowledge an answer to prayer for the restoration of a dear son to his family." "Last June I wrote to you requesting prayer for certain members of my family," writes Mrs. F. P. E., Inez, Texas. "Since then they have been wonderfully blessed and I want to thank God for his goodness." S. M. W., Venice Center, N. Y., writes: "A long time ago I wrote you asking for prayers for a dear friend with mental depression. I have just received a letter from her saying that with a glad heart she was writing to tell me she was so happy again. The depression had lifted and she was able to help others take heart." Mrs. K., Alabama, writes: "I acknowledge, and my heart is full of thanks for, an answered prayer for a son and daughter who are now daily gaining health and strength." A Subscriber writes from Kalamazoo, Mich.: "God has answered prayer in a wonderful way, through efforts of the Prayer League in a case which I brought before you."

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS of answers to prayer have also been received from A Reader, Hanover, Ind. (for restoration of health to a friend); Mrs. E. S. and Mrs. F. E., Sapulpa, Okla.; F. O., Hampton, N. J. (for the recovery of mother's health); S. T. E., Mrs. E. McG., Salem, Ore.; Miss M. M., Ohio; Mrs. R. C., Patros, Wash.; Mrs. C. E. S., Youngstown, O.; Mrs. J. E. B., Dove, Mo.; Mrs. J. J., Bethany, Pa.; H. A. R., Ohio, N. Y.; Mrs. O. F. M., Mount Vernon, Ohio; C. F. S., Cameron, Mo.; D. R. M., Taft, Tenn.; Mrs. F. C. W., Spencer, W. Va.; Mrs. J. S. A., Lanesboro, Mass. (for restoration of health); K. M. B., Lock Haven, Pa.; Mrs. L. C. E.; A Reader, Crystal Hill, Va.

Nothing Succeeds Where the Heart Fails

A CONNECTICUT octogenarian has sold an invention for a big fortune. He had worked on it for more than sixty years and had made more than 300 models, each of which was unsuccessful except the last one.

"Many times I was disheartened and was about to smash my models and give up," he says; "but then I thought that if I kept on trying I had a chance to win, while if I quit there was no chance at all. At last, by accident, I hit upon the secret."

By accident?

Is the result of sixty years' work an accident?

All inspirations and great ideas come we know not how or whence, but they come only to the mind prepared. Ideas are opportunities only to the mind that can grasp and utilize them. It took sixty years' study and experiment on the part of this man to fit him to comprehend and apply a certain mechanical principle.

A main basis of his success at last was his persistency. A million men would have given up in failure. He realized that his only chance in winning lay in continued trying, and he, the one man in a million, kept on.

The million who would have quit say it was "luck" with him. But there was no luck except that which is the natural fruit of persistent effort.

The history of every successful man reads much the same. Whatever his work, he mastered it; and pleased nature yielded into his capable hands her secrets, jealously guarded from the unworthy.

Prayers are asked for revivals of religion at Menomone, Wis.; Emporium, Pa.; Windham, Ohio; Temple, Texas (that prohibition campaign in Bell County may be successful); Peterboro, N. Y.; Sharon Center, Ohio; Stanford, Ky.; Agency, Iowa; Lafayette, Ind.; Hamilton, Ind.; Brooklyn, Md.; Lima, Ohio; Hampton, N. H.; Lock Haven, Pa. (that a Sunday school class of young boys may be converted); Catlettsburg, Ky. (that men's Bible class may have a deeper spiritual experience); Prairie View, Okla.; Topeka, Kan. Mrs. C. T., Ashley, Ohio, asks prayer that Westfield Church may be built up; Mrs. S. J. L. and Mrs. S. F. H. ask prayer for statewide prohibition in Ohio. Mrs. O. M., Mount Vernon, Ohio, requests prayer for a greater blessing on a church now without a pastor; that the right one may come and a great power be developed.

Mrs. W. I. H. asks prayer for the restoration of her mother's mind; Mr. and Mrs. B. and J. R. B., their sons; Mrs. C. S., her daughter's; J. H. and B. T. J., their sisters; A Subscriber, her father's; Mrs. S. J. H., her husband's. Nine other friends ask prayer for mental restoration or strengthening for themselves or other friends.

J. H. and Mrs. M. S. ask prayer that their sisters' sight may be restored; R. C., Mrs. C. A. S., and Mrs. S. F. H., their husbands; Mrs. D. M. C., her brother's. Twelve other friends ask prayer for the restoration or strengthening of sight for themselves or other relatives and friends.

Thirty-four friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing.

Mrs. J. T. W., E. L. R., M. C. I., A Troubled Mother, Mrs. S. A. V. and J. R. B. ask prayer that their sons may be delivered from the liquor habit; Mrs. P. R., Mrs. A. H. P., and Constant Reader, their brothers; five wives their husbands. Eight other friends ask prayer that relatives or friends may be delivered from the liquor habit. Mrs. D. E. C. requests prayer that she may be cured of the drug habit.

E. H. A. asks prayer for the conversion of three sons; twenty-six other parents ask prayer for the conversion of sons. Twenty-three wives ask for the conversion of their husbands. Fifty-one other friends ask prayer for the conversion of other relatives or friends, including Mrs. W. A. S. that daughters may be saved.

Fourteen readers ask prayer for special spiritual blessing for relatives or friends.

Sixty-seven friends ask prayer for the healing of relatives or friends, including one that grandson may be healed of St. Vitus Dance; another that son may regain his speech; another that mother may regain use of limbs; and Mrs. W. A. S., that husband may be restored to health and strength. Fifty-two friends ask prayer for the healing of self.

Mrs. C. H. W. and Mrs. J. B. R. H. ask prayer that their husbands' hearing may be restored; R. C., a sister's; T. & A. P., daughter's and brother's.

The keynote to most failures is that detestable phrase, "I can't."

You will not find a confirmed failure anywhere who will not tell you that he has found out there is no use in trying. "Luck" is against him, he says; and so it is; "luck" is against any one who sees no use in trying.

We may think we have failed so often that it is impossible for us to succeed. It's nonsense. There is no real failure except for him who tamely quits trying. Success ever hovers close to any one whose heart is undaunted.

The old man who tried for sixty years and failed more than 300 times might have missed a lot of failures by giving up. So would he have missed success.

He might have given up in a day, as some of us do, or in a month, as more of us do, or in a year, as most of us do, and consoled himself in failure with the belief that he had done his best. He, too, then would have been "unlucky," and dragged out his old age in disappointment and pessimism.

But that was a great principle he followed—as long as one keeps on trying there is chance for success; but when one quits trying there is no chance at all.

We may fail, but what of that? There is no real failure while courage holds out.

Success may ever be smilingly awaiting us in the shadow of some small defeat.

But when the heart fails we are done for indeed.

CHARLES GRANT MILLER.

The True Flavor of High-Grade Cocoa Beans is Found in

BAKER'S BREAKFAST COCOA

Registered U. S. Patent Office

This is due to the perfection of the mechanical process by which it is manufactured, no chemicals being used, and to the care and skill used in the selection and blending of the beans.

A high authority on cocoa has recently said: "A pure cocoa, unchanged by destructive chemicals, is the best cocoa. There is no more need for introducing alkalies into cocoa than there is into cracked wheat or oatmeal."

Baker's Cocoa is Delicious, Wholesome, Pure and of Great Food Value

Booklet of Choice Recipes sent free

Walter Baker & Co. Ltd.

Established 1780
Dorchester, Mass.

Grand Prize, Panama-Pacific Exposition, 1915
Grand Prize, Panama-California Exposition, 1915

REVERSIBLE "Linene" COLLAR

TRADE MARK

Send 2 Cents in U. S. Stamps to pay postage and we will send you free a starch-finished SAMPLE COLLAR State size and which style wanted

REVERSIBLE COLLAR CO., Dept. T, Boston, Mass.

BECOME A NURSE

WE have trained thousands of women their own homes to make $10 to $25 a week as nurses. Send for "How I Became a Nurse"—248 pages of actual experiences. Illustrated lesson pages. Fourteenth Year.

The Chautauqua School of Nursing
341 Main St., Jamestown, N. Y.

INDIVIDUAL COMMUNION SERVICE

Does YOUR Church use the clean and sanitary method? Send for catalog and special offer. Outfits on trial.

Thomas Communion Service Co. Box 150 Lima, O.

YOU CAN AFFORD

Familiar Songs of the Gospel (No. 1 or 2) Round or shape notes. 100 per hundred; samples, 5c each. 83 songs, words and music.

E. A. K. HACKETT, FORT WAYNE, IND.

"Old Wine in New Bottles"

By Samuel Tilden Larkin. Published by Monfort & Co., Cincinnati. Silk-cloth, $1.10 prepaid. Charming, delightful characters, great moral theme. Religious papers and leaders endorse.

S. T. LARKIN, Wellsville, Ohio.

TABLE GRACES

For DAILY USE SPECIAL DA and OCCASION

All Will Welcome This New Book of Graces. Postpaid. Paper, 5c. Cloth, 50c. M. E. MUNSON, 77 Bible House, New York, N. Y.

CHANGE

Quit Coffee and Got Well.

A woman's coffee experience is interesting. "For two weeks at a time I have taken no food but skim milk, for solid food would ferment and cause such distress that I could hardly breathe at times, also excruciating pain and heart palpitation and all the time I was so nervous and restless.

"From childhood up I had been a coffee and tea drinker and for the past 20 years I had been trying different physicians but could get only temporary relief. Then I read an article telling how some one had been helped by leaving off coffee and drinking Postum and it seemed so pleasant just to read about good health I decided to try Postum.

"I made the change from coffee to Postum and there is such a difference in me that I don't feel like the same person. We all found Postum delicious and like it better than coffee. My health now is wonderfully good.

"As soon as I made the shift to Postum I got better and now my troubles are gone. I am fleshy, my food assimilates, the pressure in the chest and palpitation are all gone, my bowels are regular, have no more stomach trouble and my headaches are gone. Remember I did not use medicines at all—just left off coffee and used Postum steadily." Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Postum comes in two forms:

Postum Cereal—the original form—must be well boiled. 15c and 25c packages.

Instant Postum—a soluble powder—dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water, and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. 30c and 50c tins.

Both kinds are equally delicious and cost about the same per cup.

"There's a Reason," for Postum.

—sold by Grocers.

DETROIT

WEATHERPROOF BODIES

YOUR CAR

Can be as Comfortable and Cozy as a $5000 Limousine

The Detroit Detachable Top fits snugly over the touring body. No overhang or ugly joint. Beautifully finished, patent flexible doors absolutely prevent rattle. Large production makes possible remarkably low prices. Built for following models.

Ford '15 & '16	$ 77
Ford '14	82
Buick D-45	125
Overland 83	115
Maxwell 25	115

Ask your dealer—or write.

DETROIT WEATHERPROOF CO.
496-502 Clay Ave. Detroit

The Key To Success

Stop Forgetting

Increase Your Efficiency

The secret of business and social success is the ability to remember. I can make your mind an infallible classified index from which you can instantly select thoughts, facts, figures, names, faces. Enables you to concentrate, develop self-control, overcome bashfulness, think on your feet, address an audience. Easy Simple. The result of 20 years' experience in developing memories of thousands of students. Write today for copy of my book "How to Remember" and Copyrighted Intensely Interesting Memory Test Free, also how to obtain FREE copy of my book "How to Speak in Public"

Prof. Henry Dickson, Principal
Dickson School of Memory, 701 Hearst Bldg., Chicago, Ill.

Amarilly of Clothes-Line Alley

Continued from page 1160

that it was none of his business, but, a respecter of age, she loftily informed him that it had been "give to her."

"By whom?" he persisted.

Perceiving her reluctance to answer he added gently:

"I am a bishop of the Episcopal Church and I cannot endure to see a surplice in such a place as this."

A bishop! This was worse than a reporter even. St. John would surely hear of it! But she felt that an explanation was due the calling of her interlocutor.

She lifted righteous eyes to his.

"My mother works for one of the churches, and the minister, he give us this to cut up into clo'es fer the chillern, but we didn't cut it up. I'm a goin' to leave it here till the rent's paid, and we git the money to take it outen hook."

The bishop's eyes softened, and lost their look of shocked dignity.

"I will advance you the money," he offered. "I would much prefer to do so than to have it left here. How much money do you need to pay your rent?"

"We need five dollars," said Amarilly, "to pay the balance of it. But I wouldn't take it from you. I ain't no beggar. I don't believe, nuther," she continued, half to herself, "that Mr. St. John would like it."

"Who is Mr. St. John?" he asked curiously. "I know of no such rector in this diocese. My child, you have an honest face. Since you won't accept a gift of money, I will lend you the amount. I want you to tell me all about yourself and this surplice."

"Well, mebbly he'd want me to," reflected Amarilly.

"Gimme back that surplus," she said to the Jew, who seemed loath to relinquish his booty.

As she walked up the street with the bishop, she frankly related the family history and the part Mr. Meredith and the surplice had played therein.

The bishop had generous instincts, and a desire to reach the needy directly instead of through the medium of institutions, but he had never known just how to approach them. His presence in this unknown part of the city had been unpremeditated, but he welcomed the chance that had led his steps hither to perform an errand of mercy. He handed Amarilly five dollars, and wrote down her address. He was most reluctant to receive the surplice as security, but Amarilly's firm insistence was not to be overcome. She returned home, rejoicing in the knowledge that she had the price of their happy home in her pocket. The bishop had given her his card, which she laid in a china saucer with other bits of pasteboard she had collected from Derry Phillips, Mr. Vedder, and Pete Noyes. The saucer adorned a small stand in the dining-room part of the house.

"It's the way Mrs. Hubbleston kep' her keards," Amarilly explained to the family.

Meantime the bishop was walking in an opposite direction toward his home, wondering if he should find he was mistaken in his estimate of human nature; and a query arose in his mind as to what he should do with the surplice if it were left on his hands.

CHAPTER XIII

BUD sat in the park—Clothes-line Park, Amarilly had dubbed it—one Monday afternoon, singing a song of gladness. The park was confined by a clothes-line stretched between three tottering poles and the one solitary poplar tree of the Jenkins estate. The line was hung with white linen garments, and smaller articles adorned the grass plot within the park.

This to Bud was the most beautiful spot in the world. He looked up into the sapphire blue of the sky flecked with soft patches of white, then down upon the waving grass latticed by sun and shade; he listened to the soothing rustle of the poplar leaves, the soft flapping of linen in the breeze, the birds in the tree tops, and felt his heart and throat bursting with all the harmony and melody about him. Not always was Bud's refrain one of joy. There were songs of sorrow on the damp days when the washings must be dried within the house, and he could not venture forth because he still was regarded as the delicate one of the family. There were days, too, when the number of garments was not adequate to complete the boundary to the park, and that meant less to eat and worry about the rent and a harassed look in his mother's anxious eyes.

But there was no sob in Bud's song this afternoon. The clothes had been hung out unusually early, and were nearly dry, so his mother had brought out her little lean-back rocker and sat beside him for a few moments to listen to his carol and to hark back to the days when his lusty-voiced father had sung to her in the shadows of a vine-clad porch.

It was not upon Amarilly, the sharer of her burdens, nor upon the baby that Mrs. Jenkins lavished her tenderness. Bud crept closest because he had been the one most dependent upon her care.

When the little singer ceased, the mother arose and unpinned the garments, carrying them in armfuls to the huge basket in the middle of the park. Bud watched her thin, fatigued hands as they performed their accustomed task, and a sudden inspiration came to him. His future field of labor had troubled him. Now his way seemed clear. He stepped nimbly to the grass plot and gathered up the pieces spread thereon.

"Ma," he said, as they met at the basket, "I've jest thought what I kin do, when I grow up, to support you."

"What is it, Bud?" she asked interestedly.

"The teacher said we must plan to do what we knew the most about. I know more about washin' than anything else."

"You'd orter," she replied with a sigh.

"I kin run a laundry," he declared.

"That would be a fine business."

Happy in the hope of this new horoscope, Bud resumed his seat in the amphitheater, and in a voice of clarion clearness ecstatically rendered one of the hymns he had learned at St. Mark's. Ever since he had become a member of the choir, Clothes-line Park had rung with echoes of the Jubilate and Venite instead of the popular old-time school airs. The wringer was turned to the tune of a Te Deum, the clothes were rubbed to the rhythm of a Benedictus, and the floor mopped to the melody of a Magnificat.

On the happy, by-gone Thursdays, cloistered by snow-white surplices, with the little chorister enthroned in the midst, Clothes-line Park had seemed a veritable White Chapel.

Bud was snatched from his carols by the arrival of Amarilly, who was far too practical to hearken to hymns when there was work to be performed.

"I got the money Miss Ormsby's owed us so long," she announced in a tone of satisfaction, "and that jest makes up the money to git back the surplus. I'll give you carfare one way, Bud, and you must go to the bishop's and git it. I'm too beat to go. I've walked most five miles sence dinner."

Bud was scoured and brushed, the pocket of his blouse tagged with a five-dollar bill carefully secured by a safety pin, and he started on his way for the address Amarilly had given him. He stopped at the corner drug store to spend his car-fare for an ice-cream soda.

When the lad's quest was repeated to the bishop by his housekeeper, he instructed her to send Bud up to the library, being kindly-disposed towards all boy-kind. While he was questioning his young visitor, the organ of Grace Church, which was next to the bishop's house, pealed forth, and a man's voice began to chant a selection from an oratorio Bud had learned at St. Mark's. A high, childish soprano voice was essaying to carry the sustained note an octave above the man's voice; once it sharpened.

"Oh!" shuddered Bud in dismay. "He can't keep the tune."

"He isn't our regular soloist," ex-

Continued on next page

Aeroplane Stability

FORE-AND-AFT or longitudinal equilibrium in flying is discussed by Dr. Orville Wright in a recent publication of the Smithsonian Institution, entitled "Stability of Aeroplanes." Mr. Wright says that most of the serious accidents in flying occur after long glides from considerable heights with the power reduced, when an attempt is made to bring the machine to a more level position several hundred feet in the air. The machine quickly loses its speed and becomes "stalled." Those who have seen the novice make a "parade" landing, have seen the beginning of a case of "stalling" which might have been fatal had it taken place at a height of 100 or 200 feet in the air. Experience made during the past year or two have brought about a considerable advance in the development of automatic stability. A device described by Mr. Wright comprises a small horizontal wing vane so mounted on the machine as to ride edgewise to the wind when the machine is flying at the desired angle of incidence. In case the machine varies from the desired angle, the air will strike the vane on either its upper or lower side. The slightest movement of the vane in either direction brings into action a perfect mechanism for operating the controlling surfaces. If the wind strikes the vane on the underside the elevator is raised to cause the machine to point downward in front until the normal angle is restored, and if the air strikes the vane from above an opposite action upon the elevator is produced. The machine maintains that a machine controlled by regulating its angle with reference to the impinging air is not liable to the dangers of "stalling."

Another method for maintaining fore-and-aft equilibrium utilizes the force of gravity acting on a pendulum or tube of mercury, and a second employs gyroscopic force.

Mr. Wright believes that the day is near at hand when the flier will be almost entirely relieved of the work of maintaining the equilibrium of his machine, and his attention will be required only to keep it on its proper course and to land it safely.

When Tired Nerves Jump and Throb

A neuralgic headache will often yield to menthol when nothing else helps

Vaseline Mentholated Petroleum Jelly

is just pure menthol blended with "Vaseline" base. Soothes the nerves and at the same time is absolutely safe and harmless.

One of the handy tin tubes of Vaseline Mentholated should be kept in the house always.

Sold at drug and department stores everywhere. Write for "Vaseline" Poster Stamps, sent free on request with illustrated "Vaseline" booklet.

Chesebrough Mfg. Co.
(Consolidated)
13 State Street New York

ined the bishop apologetically. "He all, and this boy is trying to learn the for an organ recital to be given next week."

Again the choir-master's voice, patient and weary, began the refrain. Instinctively Bud's little chest swelled, and voluntarily his clear, high treble took note and sustained it without break through the measures, and then triphantly broke into the solo. The bishop's eyes shone.

"Come," he said, rising and going towards the door, "come with me."

Vonderingly and obediently, Bud followed him into the church and up to the organ where the choir-master sat.

"This is one of the boys from St. Mark's. Try him on the solo. He just sang it for me."

"I thought I heard it sung just now, I feared it was only an echo of my dreams. Let me hear you again, my lad."

Easily and confidently Bud attacked the high C in alt. At the end of the solo, the long-suffering choir-master looked as if he were an Orpheus, who had found his Eurydice.

"Who taught you to sing that solo?" he demanded.

"My school teacher. She is studying for an opery singer, and she helps me with my Sunday singing."

"I thought the style was a little odd for the organist of St. Mark's," said the choir-master whimsically. "My boy, if you will sing it for us at the altar as well as you did just now, you will have ten dollars."

The laundry now loomed as a fixed part in Bud's firmament. When he got home and told his mother the good news she moved joyfully among her rags and tubs. The turn of the wringer seemed so easy, and she frequently used in the rubbing of a soaped garment to wring the suds from her swollen hands and listen anew to the wail of Bud's call upon the bishop and the choir-master of Grace Church.

CHAPTER XIV

THE next day the flood-tide of the Jenkinses' fortunes bid fair to flow fullness. Word came to the little line that Mr. Meredith had returned to the city and desired the laundry work resumed. Bud was summoned to his practice the following Friday, and Miss King sent her chauffeur with a car-sized washing.

"Everything comes so to onet, it takes your breath away," said Amarilly, to overcome by this renewal of commercial activity, "and next thing I know,—there her heart gave a deer-like bow,—"Mr. Derry'll be hum, and din' fer me. Then we'll all be earnin' cep' Gus."

At the end of the week Amarilly eagerly went to deliver the washings at the rectory and Miss King's, but in both places she was doomed to disappointment, as her friends were not in. "I'll go to church and see 'em," she decided.

This time her raiment was very simple, but more effective than upon the occasion of her previous attendance.

Before Amarilly's artistic temperament was awakened by the atmosphere of the studio, she had been wont to pay herself in things convenient, without regard to color or style, believing herself to be hopelessly homely and needing the aid of personal adornment; since Derry had praised her hair, she had scrupulously cared for it and showed no conflicting color in proximity thereto. On this occasion she fastened with black velvet bows, and arrayed herself in the white dress Mrs. Jimmels had given her.

"I declare, Amarilly," exclaimed her mother, "I believe you're a-growin' pretty!"

Amarilly's eyes danced, and she gave her mother a spontaneous and rewarding smile.

She didn't do her own ushering this time, and was consequently seated most conspicuously near the entrance. Her heart beat rapturously at the sight of Mr. Meredith in the pulpit.

His vacation didn't freshen him up much, she thought, after a shrewd glance. "He's paler and don't look real well. Sorter like Bud arter he got up from the fever."

Her attention was diverted from the

I-Beam, Steering-Arm, Rear Axle Drive-Shaft and Knuckles, tested by powerful machines to test the toughness of the steel.

There's Safety in Axles that Stand Tests Like This——Safety in axles designed to meet the maximum stresses of every-day travel with a big margin to spare—built of materials so good that, if accident does bring strains beyond what the axles should bear, they will stand right up to the last ounce of pressure and the last severe shock—then bend but not break.

WHEN Harry Knight drove his racer head-on into a concrete wall at the Indianapolis Speedway, to save another man's life, the Timken Front Axle was bent by the intense impact. But that axle was afterward straightened and is running under a car today.

It is because Timken-Detroit Axle parts are so tough that they can be bent, twisted and flattened, cold, without breaking, that the man who rides on Timkens can confidently count on riding safely.

It requires terrific blows and tons of pressure, in special testing-machines, to bend these big, tough, cold, steel I-beams, steering arms, knuckles and driving shafts.

Tests like this are necessary to prove in our factory that the work of the steel-makers, the chemists, engineers and metallurgists was right.

To prove that, while wonderfully tough and strong, Timken-Detroit Axles are not brittle.

That the I-beams and spindles will not break under the weight of the loaded car as it drops suddenly into a deep rut or bumps over steel rails. Nor will a steering-arm, or a steering cross-rod snap, and leave the car unmanageable.

Problems in Safety

To get steel that is strong enough, and hard enough to stand the steady stress; and yet so tough that it cannot break under sudden shock, has been no simple problem. And to get it without undue weight has been another problem.

These problems could not be solved through knowledge of the chemistry of steel alone. It meant testing samples of steels from all over the world, observing and recording the effect on these steels of heating them to different temperatures and quenching them in different baths.

Concentrated Study

Out of the multiplicity of analyses, heat-treatments and testings, and out of long experience in every type of car under all conditions of service, has come the best steel for each axle part, and the best formulas for heat-treatment of each part.

Only concentrated devotion to the one problem of axle-building could determine the right steel and the right heat-treatment—just as it has developed the right design, size and relation of the different axle parts.

And Still More Study

Although Timken-Detroit Axles justified themselves from the very beginning of the automobile industry by satisfactory service in motor-cars, pleasure and commercial, the work of study, experiment and investigation has continued through all the years that have followed. It has made, and is making every year, new contributions to the wonderful things accomplished in this Twentieth Century by heat-treatment.

The safety and satisfaction of the man who rides on Timken-Detroit Axles are secure because back of the axle is the great human organization that has worked together for one common object during all the years of motor-car manufacture.

There are no more important parts of your car than the axles and their bearings. Why this is so is told in the Timken Primers, D-9 "On the Anatomy of Automobile Axles," and D-10 "On the Care and Character of Bearings." Both books sent free postpaid, together with a list of Timken equipped cars on request to either address below.

THE TIMKEN-DETROIT AXLE COMPANY
Detroit, Michigan
THE TIMKEN ROLLER BEARING COMPANY
Canton, Ohio

rector by the vision of Colette coming down the aisle. The change in her appearance was even more startling to the little anxious-eyed girl than in John's case. There were violet shadows under the bright eyes, a subtle, subdued air about her fresh young beauty that had banished the little touch of wilfulness. As soon as she was seated, which was after the service had begun, she became entirely absorbed in her prayer-book.

"Vacation ain't agreed with her, nuther," pondered Amarilly perplexedly.

She turned her gaze again to John, who was sitting back of the choir, while his "understudy" conducted the service. His face was shaded by his hand, but Amarilly's gimlet glance noted that he frequently sent a fleeting, troubled look toward the King pew.

"Thar's something up atwixt 'em," deduced Amarilly, "and they air both too proud to say nuthin' about it to the other."

John's sermon was on the strength that renunciation brings, and the duty of learning resignation. There was a pervasive note of sadness in his deliverance of the theme and Amarilly felt her joyousness in the return of her friends slipping from her.

She went out of church somewhat depressed, but was cheered by the hand-clasp of the rector and his earnest assurance that he would see her very soon. While he was saying this, Colette slipped past without vouchsafing so much as a glance in their direction. Hurt through and through, the little girl walked sadly to the pavement with head and eyes downcast.

"Amarilly," duleetly spoke a well-loved voice.

Her eyes turned quickly. Colette stood at the curb, her hand on the door of the electric.

"I waited to take you home, dear. Why, what's the matter, Amarilly? Tears?"

"I thought you wan't goin' to speak to me," said Amarilly, as she stepped into the brougham and took the seat beside Colette.

"I didn't want to interrupt you and Mr. Meredith, but it's a wonder I knew you. You look so different. You have grown so tall, and what a beautiful dress! Who showed you how to fix your hair so artistically? I never realized you had such beautiful hair, child!"

"I didn't nuther, till he told me."

"Who, Amarilly? Lord Algernon?"

"No!" scoffed Amarilly, suddenly realizing that her former hero had toppled from his pedestal in her thoughts. "Tain't him. It's a new friend I have made. An artist."

"Oh, Amarilly, you have such distinguished acquaintances! All in the profession, too. Tell me who the artist is."

"Mr. Derry Phillips. I cleaned his rooms, and he took me to lunch. We ate things like we had to your house."

Have You Ever Owned a Truly Accurate Watch?

Do you know the comfort of owning a watch that tells the true time all the time?

It's a genuine pleasure to carry such a watch—one that you are not always setting or adding or subtracting a minute or so to or from the time it tells.

Hamilton Watch

"The Watch of Railroad Accuracy"

When you buy a Hamilton you buy accuracy that will endure.

You get a watch so accurate, durable and beautiful that a generation from now it will still be a source of pride to its owner.

Hamilton Watches are made in many models at $17.00, $25.00, $28.00, $40.00, $50.00, $80.00, and so on up to the Hamilton masterpiece at $150.00 in 18k. heavy gold case. Movements alone, to fit your present watch case, at $12.25 ($13.00 in Canada) and up.

Write for Hamilton Watch Book
"The Timekeeper"

It pictures and describes the various Hamilton Models for men and women and tells facts worth knowing about watches.

HAMILTON WATCH COMPANY
Dept. T, Lancaster, Pennsylvania

The Hamilton Watch Exhibit at the Panama-Pacific Exposition at San Francisco is in the Palace of Varied Industries, under the dome. Call and see it.

Conductor E. M. Kelley of the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway. One of the thousands of conductors of fast trains who make their runs by the Hamilton Watch.

INVENTORS Do Not Sacrifice
Your Inventions
Get full money value. RELIABLE Book Free. Write
R. S. & A. B. Lacey, 610 Barrister Bldg., Washington, D.C.

KIDDER'S PASTILLES For 50 yrs. Standard Relief for Asthma (Inhalation)
All Druggists; or by mail, 35c
STOWELL & CO., Manufacturers, Charlestown, Mass.

for Whooping Cough,
Spasmodic Croup,
Asthma, Sore Throat,
Coughs, Bronchitis,
Colds, Catarrh.

Don't fail to use Cresolene for the distressing and often fatal affections for which it is recommended. It is a simple, safe, effective and drugless treatment. Vaporized Cresolene stops the paroxysms of Whooping Cough and relieves Spasmodic Croup at once. It is a boon to sufferers from asthma.

The air carrying the antiseptic vapor, inspired with every breath, makes breathing easy, soothes the sore throat, and stops the cough, assuring restful nights. Cresolene relieves the bronchial complications of Scarlet Fever and Measles and is a valuable aid in the treatment of Diphtheria.

Cresolene's latest recommendation is its 36 years of successful use. Send us postal for Descriptive Booklet.

For Sale by Druggists

Try Cresolene Antiseptic Throat Tablets for the irritated throat, composed of slippery elm bark, licorice, sugar and Cresolene. They can't harm you, of your druggist or from us 10c a tin.

THE VAPO-CRESOLENE CO., 62 Cortlandt St., New York or Leeming-Miles Building, Montreal, Canada

AGENTS BIG MONEY MAKER

It's simply wonderful the way this new portable lamp is selling. Burns coal-oil. 10 cents' worth burns 60 hours producing

300 Candle Power Light

Splendid reading lamp for city homes. Absolutely indispensable in the country. Every home a possible sale. Profits run into big money. Your territory is open. Write quick for terms and canvasser's sample.

THOMAS LAMP COMPANY
3124 Rome Street DAYTON, OHIO

Eat Your Way to Health

Use Tyler's Macerated Wheat and other raw foods like I did and get well. A wonderful corrective food. Removes cause of constipation. Users praise it. Doctors recommend it. Send 2 stamps for Free Food Book and Health Guide or send 10c for Trial can of the Food and Book, including recipe for the finest salad you ever tasted, postpaid to your address.
RYAN TYLER, 36 Syndicate Bldg., Kansas City, Mo., U.S.A.

Indoor Closet

More Comfortable Health-ful and Convenient than the Out-Door Privy

Eliminates the out-door privy, open vault and cess-pool. They are breeding places for germs. Have a warm, sanitary, odorless toilet right in your house. No going out in cold weather. A boon to invalids. Endorsed by State Boards of Health.

ABSOLUTELY ODORLESS
Put It Anywhere In The House

The germs are killed by a chemical process in water in the container, which you empty once a month. Absolutely no odor. No more trouble to empty than dishwasher. Closet absolutely guaranteed. Write for full description and price.

ROWE SANITARY MFG. CO.
211-U Sixth St. Detroit, Mich.
Ask about the Ro-San Washstand—Hot and Cold Running Water Without Plumbing

HIRE HER—10c A MONTH

Send 10c for a month's supply of LESWERK LAUNDRY TABLETS. Money back instantly if they do not save time and labor and make your clothes whiter and cleaner. Thousands of women use them every week. Send 10c for prepaid package. Agents can make a great success of this proposition without personal canvassing.

Leswerk Mfg. Company, Richmond Hill, New York City

"Derry Phillips, the talented young artist! Why, Amarilly, girls are tumbling over each other trying to get attention from him, and he took you to luncheon! Where?"

"To Carter's, and I'm to serve his breakfast and take care of his rooms, and he showed me how to fix my hair and to say 'can' and 'ate.' He's fired the woman what red his rooms."

"Merely Mary Ann," murmured Colette.

"No," said Amarilly positively. "Her name is Miss O'Leary, and she didn't clean the mopboards."

Colette's gay laughter pealed forth.

"Amarilly, this is the first time I've laughed this summer, but I must explain something to you. The housekeeper told me that all the children had scarlet fever and were quainted a long time after we left. I wish I had known it and thought more about you, but—I've had troubles of my own. How did you manage so long with nothing coming in?"

"It was purty hard, but we fetched it," sighed Amarilly, thinking of the struggles. "We're doin' fine now again."

"But tell me; how did you buy food and things when none of you were working?"

"When your ten dollars was gone, we spent his'n."

"Whose?"

"Mr. Meredith's. He sent us a ten, too."

"Oh!" replied Colette frigidly.

"Then the Boarder give us all he hed. Arterwards come dark days until Mr. Vedder sent us a fiver. Then thar was an orful day when thar wan't a cent and we didn't know whar to turn, and then—It saved us."

"It? What?"

"The surplus. Mr. St. John's surplus. It brung in lots."

"Why, what do you mean, Amarilly?"

"You see 'twas at our house when Iry was fust took sick—same as the waist you gimme was. They couldn't nuther on 'em be sent him 'ill they was fumygated. Then Mrs. Winders said as how he, Mr. St. John, said as how we was to keep it and cut it up fer the chillern, but we didn't."

"Oh, Amarilly," asked Colette faintly, "do you mean to tell me that the surplice was never delivered to Mr. Meredith?"

"No. Gus didn't take it that night, and in the mornin' when Iry was took it was too late. And then when it got fumygated, Mr. St. John had gone away and he left word we was to keep it." The transformation in Colette's mobile face during this explanation was rapid and wonderful. With a radiant smile she stopped the brougham and put her arms impulsively about Amarilly.

"Oh, Amarilly, I'm so happy, and I've had such a wretched summer! Now, we will go right to your house and you'll let me see the surplice."

Amarilly looked surprised.

"Why, yes, you can see it, of course, though it ain't no diff'rent from his other ones."

"Oh, yes, it is! Far, far different, Amarilly. It has a history."

"—es, I guess it has," laughed Amarilly. "It's been goin' some these last two months!"

"Why, what do you mean, Amarilly? and I forgot in my excitement to ask how it helped you. But first tell me. You know there is a pocket in it?"

"Yes, Miss King."

"Have you noticed anything in the pocket?"

"Never looked onct. But then if thar was 'would hev come out in the wash. It's been did up heaps of times. You see, rentin' it out so much."

"Rentin' it out!"

Amarilly gave a graphic account of the adventures of the errant garment to date. Meanwhile Colette's countenance underwent kaleidoscopic changes.

"Amarilly," she asked faintly, "have you the addresses of all those people to whom you rented it?"

"Yes; I keep books now, and I put it down in my day ledger the way the Boarder showed me."

"There was something—of mine—in—that pocket. Will you ask your mother to look for it, and hunt the house over for it?"

Amarilly, greatly distressed at loss, promised faithfully to do so.
To be continued

Called Higher

MRS. ELMA MILLER STEBBINS, wife of George C. Stebbins, entered into rest on September 1, at Northfield, Mass. Mrs. Stebbins was in her sixty-eighth year. For more than forty years she had been engaged in evangelistic work with her husband, who assisted in evangelistic campaigns by conducting ladies' meetings, in which she especially blessed. In all her public work Mrs. Stebbins never lost the charm of the gentlewoman, combining with her sympathy in her husband's evangelistic labors a grace and humble fellowship. Her loss will be mourned by thousands, to whom she was a blessing, although personally unknown.

Alexander Paul, Jersey City Heights, N. J., September 11, 1915, 86.

Mrs. Levi Clay, Adair, Iowa, September 1, 1915.

George Heffelfinger, Walhonding, O., August 22, 1915, 87.

Francis Whealdon, Twin Falls, Idaho, August 23, 1915, 14.

Mr. Adams, Racine, Wis., July 24, 1915.

Moss Martin, Rescue, Va., August 1, 1915.

Charles Baker, Thompson, Conn., October 12, 1915, 70.

A Gift Suggestion

THE VANITIE

PORTABLE ELECTRIC LAMP

is sufficiently novel to make it a gift of distinction.

—sufficiently beautiful to make it a gift of charm.

—sufficiently useful to make it a gift of value.

Its duty is to show things in a better and a brighter light—thus it truly reflects the Christmas Spirit. Its choice reflects, too, your own good sense and good taste, while the versatility of its uses pleases and compliments the recipient.

It is an appreciable gift and a desirable possession. It covers multitude of merits and, with it all, it is moderate in price.

Your dealer will gladly demonstrate to you its practical value. Its price is only five dollars (in Canada five-fifty).

Or the dainty booklet

"ILLUMINATING NOTES"

will give you a demonstration in pictures. Write today.

ALADDIN LAMP CORPORATION

Suite 1875, 40 E. 45th St., New York

Dealers—Send today for attractive proposition

Copyright, 1915, Kellogg Toasted Corn Flake Co.

HERE is a youngster in almost every home who demands Kellogg's Toasted Corn Flakes, with their zestful, appetizing, crisp-from-the-oven taste.

Think of all the homes where they are the best-liked of the cereals—the oftenest repeated—the most called for. Then ask yourself if there is something here that your folks are missing.

Once get accustomed to having the Kellogg Waxtite package handy and you'll see how many breakfasts begin with Kellogg's—how often they are served for the children's supper—between meals—or as a light repast before going to bed.

Folks who have learned the sense of light foods are enjoying these satisfying golden flakes the year around.

And remember, please, that you don't know Corn Flakes unless you know Kellogg's—the original Toasted Corn Flakes—their goodness insured by our responsibility to over a million homes.

Then too there is the WAXTITE package that keeps the fresh, good flavor in—and all other flavors out.

W.K. Kellogg

Victrola

Mighty as Caruso
 Brilliant as Tetrizzini
 Charming as Farrar
 Sweet as Alma Gluck
 Magnetic as McCormack
 Tender as Paderewski
 Unique as Mischa Elman
 Droll as Harry Lauder
 Martial as Sousa

The Victrola is all artists and all instruments in one. It gives you the actual tones of the renowned singers and instrumentalists of the world. It is the genius, the power, the beauty of every voice and every instrument. It is the supreme musical instrument of all time.

Any Victor dealer will gladly play any music you wish to hear and demonstrate the various styles of the Victor and Victrola—$10 to $350.

Victrola XVI, $200
 Victrola XVI, electric, $250
 Mahogany or oak

Victor Talking Machine Co., Camden, N. J., U. S. A.
 Berliner Gramophone Co., Montreal, Canadian Distributors

Always use Victor Machines with Victor Records and Victor Needles—
the combination. There is no other way to get the unequaled Victor tone.

New Victor Records demonstrated at all dealers on the 28th of each month

Christian Herald

SUBSCRIPTION, $1.50 PER ANNUM
PUBLISHED 52 TIMES A YEAR

COPYRIGHT, 1915, BY THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

NEW YORK, NOVEMBER 24, 1915

VOL. 38—NO. 47. PRICE 5 CENTS
OFFICES: BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK

Photograph by Clarence A. Purchase

*The corn stalks stand like sentinels against the sunset gold,
As if to guard the autumn days from winter's biting cold;
The pumpkins round have gone to deck some gay thanksgiving board,
And every growing thing has ceased the harvest of the Lord.*

Protect Our Good Name

GOODYEAR

Visitors to the Goodyear factories are always impressed with a framed sign which confronts them at every turn.

In every room in every Goodyear building, they encounter the same message: Protect our good name.

It hangs on the walls of all the Goodyear branches throughout the country, and is being adopted by tire dealers everywhere as an expression of the spirit in which their business is conducted.

We believe that the public will be interested in the analysis of this simple but striking sentiment which is published herewith.

The Goodyear Tire & Rubber Company
Akron, Ohio

H. A. Dibelius
President

STRIPPED to the waist, his huge torso streaming with sweat, a workman swings the heavy iron core to an iron table, and wrenches off a tire which has just come steaming from the heater.

His eye falls on the legend over his head, and he smiles.

Our good name is also his good name.

The two are intertwined.

He will protect the one, while he subserves the other.

His thoughts are—as they should be—chiefly of himself, of his little home, and of his family.

Their good name, his good name, our good name—his good work will stand guard over them all.

* * *

Two thousand miles away—in Seattle, we will say—the same thought, in the same simple words.

An irritating moment has arrived—the temptation to speak sharply to a customer, to fling a slur at unworthy competition.

The salesman, or the manager, or whosoever it may be, looks up, and the quiet admonition meets his eye:

Protect our good name.

In a twinkling it smooths the wrinkles out of his point of view.

He is himself again—a man with a responsibility which he could not escape if he would; and would not, if he could.

* * *

Back two thousand miles

again to the factories—this time to the experimental room.

An alluring chance to save—to make more profit by skimping, by substitution. No one will ever know. But—the silent monitor repeats its impressive admonition:

Protect our good name.

What chance to compromise with conscience in the presence of that vigilant guardian?

* * *

Thousands of men striving to keep a name clean.

And keeping their own names clean in the process.

* * *

We Americans, it is said, make a god out of business.

Let the slur stand.

Whether it be true or not—it is true that business is our very life.

Shall it be a reproach to us that we try to make business as good as business can be made?

* * *

Think of this business, please, in the light of its great animating thought: "Protect our good name."

We are thinking of you, always, when we say it—you American millions, and you other millions in the old world.

We think of you judging us, judging us—by what we are, by what we do, by what we make.

We think of tens of thousands of homes in which our name can be made to stand for that which is worthy and worth while.

We must not lose your good will—we must not tarnish our good name.

* * *

You can call that anything you like.

You can call it business, or sentiment, or idealism, or nonsense.

It may be all of these.

It may even be that which our national critics call making a god of business.

But at least it gives to us a motive that is bigger and broader and deeper than money.

It makes thousands of men happier in their work and more faithful to it.

It has made of this business a democracy of united thought—a democracy of common endeavor—a democracy of purpose and principle.

* * *

And here is the oddest thing of all:—

The more we live up to this "impractical" ideal, the greater the business grows.

The more we labor for the future, the more we profit in the present.

The more we strive for character, the greater the reward in money.

The more we put into our product, the more we take out in sales.

Perhaps, after all, there is more than one sense in which it is good to make a god out of business.

We think so.

And we think you think so.

H. A. Dibelius, President
The Goodyear Tire & Rubber Company

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

An Illustrated News Weekly for the Home

The Restorers of Paths to Dwell In

IS not this the fast that I have chosen?" demanded the prophet: "to loose the hands of wickedness, to undo the heavy burdens, and to let the oppressed go free, and that ye break every yoke? Is it not to deal thy bread to the hungry and that thou bring the poor that are cast out to thy house?"

On this one day of the year especially we give thanks for blessings we have received directly and indirectly; for the blessings we share in common with our neighbors and our nation; for a great many things that are very largely in many instances the natural fruit of our own labors. It is just possible we take a sort of complacent satisfaction in the thought that we are the recipients of all these blessings, and that we appreciate our own appreciativeness, our own sense of fairness in giving God thanks.

We do well to remember our benefits with gratitude, but do we do enough in giving just that? Suppose we were to look about us for things in other people's lives for which to give thanks. And then, suppose we should find in our seeking a family here and there who have nothing in the world to give thanks for. Would the finding of such a family be a fit subject for thanksgiving in itself? It would. Would the turning of such a family's mourning into singing be a fit subject for thanksgiving on your part? Is not that the fast that he has chosen to deal thy bread to the hungry, to bring the poor that are cast out to thy house? Is there any more sincere gratitude to God than in causing other hearts to rejoice in him by loosing the bands of wickedness, undoing heavy burdens, letting the oppressed go free and breaking the power of injustice? "Then shall thy light break forth as the morning. Then shalt thou call and the Lord shall answer; thou shalt cry and he shall say, Here I am."

All of which is by way of introducing a most interesting letter received by the Christian Herald from Jerusalem. There is real cause for thanksgiving this day in the fact that throughout the districts in Europe which have been robbed of their joy by war, thousands of aching hearts have been cheered and thousands of despairing lives have been given new courage by the bounty of Christian men and women and little children of America, among whom are many, many Christian Herald readers. It is particularly timely to hear this song of gratitude from that very spot where the prophet said to the chosen of the Lord: "If thou draw out thy soul to the hungry and satisfy the afflicted soul, then shall thy light arise in obscurity and thy darkness be as the noonday; and thou shalt be like a watered garden, and like a spring of water, whose waters fail not. And thou shalt be called, The repairer of the breach, The restorer of paths to dwell in."

AMERICAN COLONY, JERUSALEM

September 12, 1915

THE timely gift from the Christian Herald Relief Fund was received with great thanksgiving. Not only was it a relief that God had blessed our efforts and sent help at a moment when we were considering the advisability of continuing the work unaided, but this generous assistance has enabled us to increase the number of those receiving help to more than double what it was a month ago.

In a previous letter I told you of our efforts in starting a needle-lace industry, which would employ the women while the men are away saving their country, and asked you to help. This seemed the very best way of assisting the poor under the present conditions. I also wrote of how many of the Jerusalem people throw the responsibility upon charity, having received so much from convents and missions, they accept it as their right, and even demand support. We felt that if we could awaken the desire to help themselves through their own efforts, this in itself would be a step in advance. We would give them a chance, at any rate. We are glad to say that we find the majority of the women willing to work, and the gratitude is greater than that shown some months ago, when we were distributing bread and lentils.

Some of the well-to-do families are now in stricken condition, and would be glad to work if they could receive special attention. Many tried coming in by another door, so that the crowd would not see them. It has given us the opportunity to have many conversations with them, and point out how hollow such pride is. We show them that it is more honorable to work, and thus provide for the needs of the family, than to accept of charity which these people accepted with a blush. It has been gratifying to note the improvement along these lines during the past weeks. "A fellow feeling makes us vindictous kind," and this universal calamity which is sweeping over us breaks down many social barriers, thus making it an auspicious moment to begin such a training.

We were giving work to about thirty-two women weekly, although those applying for and not receiving any, on account of our limited means, far exceeded that number. Men from one hundred and fifty to two hundred women gathered in the hall, only to be sent away. This was the sad part of the work. Each case seemed more appealing, more pathetic, than the one just dealt with. Whom should we send away? In spite of our efforts to keep within the limit of expenditure we had decided to lay out, we were continually increasing the amount.

During these moments a severe struggle went on within us. Here were these poor people begging, clamoring for work, and if they succeeded in getting even a small order, which would insure them a few pennies, they went away with beaming faces, and murmuring blessings on our efforts, while on the other hand we were using money which I knew was badly needed in the Colony. We have had no income for over a year, and with the relief work we carry on at all times, supported by our earnings, our resources were greatly taxed. We have taken a number of helpless children into the Colony to clothe, feed and teach, and are providing daily for a large number of sick and poor. Our confidence in a mighty God and protecting Father has carried us over many rough places and through deep waters in years gone by, and we trusted in the same guiding power, at this crisis, to take care of these our little ones.

Jerusalem War Victims Helped by the Widows and Orphans Fund

IT was at this time of perplexity that the welcome news of the Christian Herald Relief Fund was received, and I write the foregoing that you may fully appreciate our gratitude. This gave us courage, but we kept within bounds until we should hear by letter your requirements. After waiting for three weeks without result, we cabled to you, and finally, after some more waiting, the much-looked-for reply came.

It arrived on a Wednesday morning, as we were giving out the work. A large crowd of eager women and girls were waiting in the hall, and our hearts were sore, knowing how many of them would be disappointed. An elderly woman was standing before my table imploring for work, telling a pathetic story of a sick daughter-in-law, who was not strong enough to feed her baby on account of the lack of nourishing food for herself, yet had to keep on nursing her baby, for she had nothing else to give it. There were three other children in the family, and their large eyes and sunken cheeks spoke volumes.

Just at this moment the door opened, and my sister, Mrs. Whiting, came in waving a piece of white paper. As we read your cablegram, tears of joy started to our eyes, and the lump that had weighed so heavily on our hearts rose and stuck in our throats for a moment, and then disappeared. Our poor woman hardly understood our behavior. She only knew that she got a very good job, and went away feeling as happy as we were. As a thanksgiving offering, we gave every woman present something to do, and since then we have put 180 names on our list.

Mr. Whiting has written you how successful we have been in the purchase of thread. We feared this might be a serious barrier in the continuation of the industry. We have succeeded in procuring enough to carry us over the winter, I think. One thing we regret is the variety in the qualities of the thread used, and therefore the different shades in the work. Some brands are whiter than others. I speak of this so that when you receive the work you may understand the cause. It is not serious, however, for the "needle-lace" washes well, and the difference disappears after the first dip.

You ask for the names of the committee. We have appointed Mr. Vester and Mr. Whiting as treasurers, and the rest of us work without any special office.

Some of the sisters have volunteered to help with the care of our five children and with the housekeeping, that I might be free to superintend the work. It needs some one who speaks Arabic. Mrs. Whiting and Miss Baldwin are a great help. Miss Baldwin takes charge of the work after it is bought from the women, examines it carefully, presses it, and gets it ready to send to you. A blind Armenian girl who drifted to us after being sent out of several mission schools (being above the age allowed in these institutions) is learning how to wind the laces and insertions on cardboard and cover them neatly with tissue paper. One of the sisters meets the women, and admits those with cards into the waiting-room, while the new applicants are interviewed. Sister Hannah Johnson is our visiting sister, and the names of these new-comers are given to her. Seeing them in their homes, she can better advise us how to help them.

TRUTH is elastic here, and many clever devices are resorted to in order to deceive. It was noticed that women who had babies were attended to first. After this, women borrowed their neighbors' baby for the occasion. The sudden increase of babies made us investigate, and one "snatched" (to use a word we got acquainted with through Judge Lindsey's book, "The Beast and the Jungle") on the others. Sister Hannah has helped us fathom many a crooked tale. The wholesome lessons they learn in telling the truth are almost as beneficial as the money they get to buy food.

My brother, Mr. Spafford, and Mr. Maurice Goldenthal take turns helping us on Wednesday and Friday in paying the women. It takes a clear head to deal correctly with change in this country.

The work has been helped in more ways than I can tell you. The use of a hall and two rooms, airy and convenient, was offered to us and accepted gladly. For the present, this does away with the unnecessary expense of renting rooms. Several ladies in Jerusalem have assisted us. One has been especially helpful. She is a connoisseur in "needle-lace," and has done much to raise the standard of the work.

We have taken some photographs, which we send under separate cover. One of these is of a young mother with her three-weeks-old baby on her lap, sitting in a broad window seat, working on a collar for our Industrial Relief Bureau. The bracelet she wears in no wise means that she is in good circumstances. They all wear cheap jewelry even if it is only glass. Another picture speaks for itself. It is the work-room. Mrs. Whiting, Miss Baldwin and I are receiving the women.

Mrs. Vester Receiving Applicants for Work Such as Is Shown on the Wall Behind Her

At present we have $800 worth of finished work ready to send to the Christian Herald, to be sold in behalf of the work. The greater part of it is composed of laces and insertions, which Mr. Whiting thought you would be able to sell well. They are all done up in lengths of five and a quarter yards. Then we have table sets. Some are cheap sets, while others, which are more beautiful, are consequently more expensive. Tea cosies and tray cloths to match. Babies' collars and cuffs, and bags of many attractive designs.

Tea-table covers, which can be used for small luncheon cloths, with handsome crocheted borders. These have been much sought after and bought by travelers. We are anxious for you to receive this while it is fresh and when the interest is keen in America for the work. Can you advise us what to do? It might be possible for you to obtain permission for it to be sent on one of the American battleships to a collier. These colliers are continually going back and forth between the home-land and the ships stationed here. We hope that you receive the work, and are able to dispose of it at a profit, so you will be enabled in this way to keep up the good industrial relief work that has been started.

An experience we had which was novel to us—while helping the poor women with lentils, which through the kindness of a friend we were enabled to distribute—was that numbers of them (about fifty) began to attend our Sunday afternoon meetings, where they were treated as every visitor is. But, they continued to come, and not understanding the language, we arranged for an Arabic meeting so they could get the benefit of what was said.

To our amazement, in a fortnight not one came again! However, not without letting us understand that if they attended the meetings they expected special treatment. Otherwise why come?

Mr. Vester and the whole American Colony in Jerusalem join me in cordial greetings to the Christian Herald and its readers, and send heartfelt thanks for your response to our appeal for help.

BERTHA SPAFFORD VESTER

A War Congress and Its Problems

An Enlightened Analysis of the Situation That Confronts Congress at Its Next Session

By a Washington Correspondent

ALTHOUGH the United States happily is at peace, the forthcoming session of the Sixty-fourth Congress, which meets on Monday, December 6, may be aptly termed a War Congress. It will be the first meeting of the National legislative body since the war in Europe involved the taking of American lives and interference with American commerce, and the chief problems confronting it have grown out of that gigantic conflict.

In the opinion of legislative experts it will be a War Congress also in the hostile division of forces in both parties upon the most important issues, marked by acrimonious debates, and probably will be prolonged until the meeting of the national political conventions of 1916.

Despite the great crisis in world affairs and the further fact that a session of the American Congress held under such conditions necessarily must be one of the most important in American history, there are but three big problems up for solution at the forthcoming session: National Defense; the McAdoo Shipping Bill for the establishment of a government-controlled merchant marine; and Tariff Revision, admitted by both parties to be necessary as a result of changed conditions in international commerce due to the war and the desire to safeguard American industries when peace shall have been attained.

Copyright, Harris & Ewing

Hon. James Hay, Va.

Chairman House Committee on Military Affairs

UPON the first, and generally regarded as the most important, of these problems—National Defense—the general inference would be that all parties would be united in the principle however they might differ as to ways and means. The fact, apparent to all, is that upon none of the problems named is there such wide diversity of opinion among senators, representatives and the general public as upon the question of National Defense, with a decided opposition to any abnormal increase in the regular army or in the navy. The Democratic policy, or rather the policy of the administration, is expressed in President Wilson's laconic phrase, "Adequate defense." The definition of this phrase is to be found in the plans already submitted by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy, the former recommending the organization of a citizen soldiery of 400,000 men, and the latter recommending only a moderate enlargement of the regular naval plan.

The Republican policy has not yet crystallized. Republican opinion, as expressed by party leaders, ranges from demands for an army and a navy much larger than proposed by the Democrats down to mere opposition to the Democratic program. Some prominent Republican senators and representatives have tacitly endorsed the Administration's policy. The Republicans were the first to agitate in favor of a strong national defense, and leading members of that party throughout the country were conspicuous in organizing Security Leagues and Defense Societies. Leaders of the Democratic party at the capital charge, however, that the enthusiasm of the Republicans who declared for a big standing army and a navy relatively equal to Great Britain's began to wane when the Democrats began to display a like activity—and proportionately declined in many instances to a point of mere opposition to the Democratic program.

Opposition to a large increase in the naval and military forces, however, is not confined to partisan opponents of the Administration. The strongest opposition to a formidable increase comes from the South—from within the Democratic party—and the prediction is freely made by legislative experts here that it will be more difficult to reconcile the Southern congressman to any plan for big additions to the nation's fighting forces than it will be to harmonize the political opponents of the Administration.

The Southern congressmen naturally would be with the Administration in any policy likely to affect the fortunes of the Democratic party in the next presidential campaign, but Southern congressmen are highly responsive to local sentiment, and sentiment in the South is against anything that savors of militarism—not that the South longer dreads Federal military power, but because of the dread of increased Federal taxes. With cotton on the contraband list and with a decreased acreage this year, the chief staple of the South has been hard hit by the European war.

The South realizes, as the entire country will realize more and more as the details are debated, that an enlarged military and naval establishment must be paid for, and that the costs will not be light. The dislike of the South for Federal taxes is traditional and hereditary, and hence the average run of Southern congressmen cannot be classified as military enthusiasts.

This condition in the South, a Democratic leader pointed out, undoubtedly influenced the Administration to keep its proposed increase far below the demands of the jingoistic element in both parties who want "an army that could wipe Germany off the map and a navy that could wipe Great Britain off the sea."

The projection of ex-Secretary of State William J. Bryan into the controversy as an opponent of the Administration policy, or any policy except the normal army and navy program, did not create this condition in the South, but it is generally believed here that it will emphasize and increase the opposition to any extensive plan for National Defense, both in the South and West, where his influence always has been greater than elsewhere. Party leaders in the Senate and House are inclined to minimize Mr. Bryan's influence, but admit that he has added to the perplexity of an already perplexing question.

The Republicans, it is predicted, will be likewise divided. The element for whom Colonel Roosevelt, Senator Lodge, Congressman Gardner and other "big army" and "big navy" men speak is expected to insist upon

Copyright, Harris & Ewing

Hon. Geo. E. Chamberlain, C.

Chairman Senate Committee on Military Affairs

much larger increase in the army and navy and more soldiery than is contemplated in the Administration plan. There is still another element that will seriously count the cost, and will be much more conservative in its demands. Notwithstanding the present mixed situation on the part of Congress, the most influential leaders of that body expect that both parties will be brought into line upon a non-partisan basis for a national defense bill that will meet popular approval.

In connection with a comprehensive plan of National Defense—and, in fact, a part of that plan, so far as its sponsor can make it—is the second big problem that will come before Congress—an American merchant marine and naval auxiliary. According to the Democratic plan this will take the form of what is known as the McAdoo Shipping Bill, the sponsor of which is the Secretary of the Treasury and son-in-law of the President. It is no secret here that there is powerful opposition to this measure in the Democratic party, while the Republicans are almost solidly against it.

With a majority of only twenty-five in the Lower House of Congress, the experts assert that the bill will only pass, if at all, by a narrow margin and after a hard fight.

The McAdoo Shipping Bill, or the bill for an American merchant marine and naval auxiliary, as some of its friends prefer to call it, is succinctly this, as outlined by the Secretary of the Treasury:

That Congress appropriate $50,000,000 to be put in the hands of a Shipping Board (to be created) consisting of the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of Commerce ex-officio, and three members to be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. The amount, it is stated, will be sufficient to create a naval auxiliary of merchant ships of from 400,000 to 500,000 gross tons.

The Board to have authority to organize corporations to operate the ships, and to subscribe to the capital stock, in whole or in part, and to vote the stock owned by the government for the election of directors. This would enable the corporations to sue and be sued, and enable shippers to enforce their claims. The Board to have power to lease the ships or to operate them itself if necessary. The vessels to constitute a naval auxiliary.

Republican opposition to the Shipping Bill is based on the charge that it is socialistic; that it makes the government a competitor of private enterprise, which would ultimately work the destruction of all private shipping. The Republicans in both houses are expected to take the attitude that all restrictive laws governing shipping should be repealed and liberal laws enacted, and that subsidies should be voted to enable individual shipping corporations to compete with the subsidized corporations of other nations.

The Democratic attitude is that the Democratic party is and always has been opposed to subsidies; that the failure of the shipping interests to build merchant ships has left the United States government without a naval auxiliary, and that because of this failure or misal the government has no choice but to construct a naval auxiliary and merchant marine.

In reply to the charge that his bill is socialistic, Mr. McAdoo retorts that the United States government was a subscriber to the capital stock of the first and second United States Banks; that the Panama Railroad Company and Steamship lines are owned solely by the United States government; that the government through the establishment of the parcels post entered into competition with private express companies; that through postal savings banks it entered into competition with private savings banks; that in the Federal Reserve Bank Act the United States is authorized to take all the stock the national banks fail to take, and that the government has recently undertaken the building of a railroad in Alaska.

THE last of the trio of big problems before the next Congress—Tariff Revision—promises to occupy a considerable part of the session, and to be productive of more political acrimony than either of the others named.

There is every indication here that old commercial and industrial conditions upset by the European war and new conditions created by the war have modified the views of many low-tariff men, tariff-for-revenue-only advocates, and tariff reformers within the Democratic party. It can be said on high authority that Democratic senators and representatives do not regard

A Prayer of Thanksgiving

By Lewis Allen

THAT we can see round about us the faces of friends: the deserving that we may help them; the needy that we may render aid; and little children that we may rejoice:

THAT we can hear the kind words of loving friends, the sweet songs in church and home, the prayers of devout people, and the crooning of a Mother's lullaby:

THAT we can feel loving hands in ours, trusting hands of little children, comforting hands upon our throbbing brow; that we can feel the warm embrace of the old folks who receive us at the homestead, or of our own who, dwelling apart from us, have come back this day:

THAT we can taste the savory good things which, by God's bounty, are this day set before us through the miracle of Nature, which is God:

THAT we can speak to give sincere thanks to him who, in his great goodness, has permitted us to meet once more on this day of Thanksgiving; that we can speak hope and encouragement to our loved ones; words of comfort to the suffering and the discouraged and the lowly; words of hope and cheer and promise to those who have fallen by the way:

THAT we can pray with a knowledge that the prayers of the sincere are answered, that he to whom we offer our prayers is full of loving kindness and pity and forgiveness, and that his help is assured:

TRULY, all these things are God's gifts, and without them there could be no Thanksgiving. Teach us to appreciate them for thine own Glory. AMEN!

the Underwood-Simmons Act as a fetish, and are inclined to seriously consider every adverse effect the war has had upon American business interests and to make liberal concessions in the way of tariff legislation. The Democrats favor the retention of the present tariff on sugar, which yields $60,000,000 revenue, and may favor a tariff on wool.

President Wilson set the mark for his party in Congress, in his recent open letter to ex-Governor Cox of Ohio, in which he expressed himself as having an open mind upon the subject, but was distinctly opposed to the creation of any new machinery to handle the matter, believing that the Federal Trade Commission, a non-partisan body, was equal to the task. The attitude of the President, as interpreted by his friends and advisers, is that he has shown willingness to make a change in any tariff schedule that adversely affects American business.

Without knowing in detail the Republican program on the tariff, there are good reasons for believing that the high tariff men will make a determined effort to restore the principal features of the former protective system. In doing this they will charge that American business would have broken down under the existing schedules, had it not been for the immense impetus given certain industries by the war, which had the effect of ameliorating conditions in other lines. They will make a point of the fact that the proposed large increase in expenditures for military and naval preparedness will necessitate large increased government revenues, and will make the claim that adequate revenue can best be obtained by a large increase in tariff duties.

The Democratic reply to this is that under normal conditions the present tariff bill would have met the expectations of the business world and the United States government, and that under existing conditions there can be no proof to the contrary; that neither the party nor the Administration will assume responsibility for disastrous effects due solely to war conditions, but will make an effort to repair them. Party leaders admit that the fruit industry of California and of some other sections, and the lumber industry are suffering from the war, but claim that the country as a whole is not only prosperous, but that its prosperity is increasing rapidly. They call attention to the big crops and to the recent warning of President Howard Elliott of the New Haven railroad of a possible car famine, and assert that the railroads are scarcely equal to transportation demands.

In ordinary times a readjustment of the tariff would have reference only to normal conditions and their expected continuance. The present readjustment has reference to war conditions at the present, and unknown conditions when peace shall prevail. There is great diversity of opinion among national legislators as to probable conditions of international commerce following the war, the prevailing one being that European nations will try to make a dumping ground of America for their surplus products at any price that brings ready money. To meet this possibility, an anti-dumping act designed to prevent such action will be a big feature of the Tariff Bill, and is likely to meet with little opposition.

While these three topics will mainly occupy the attention of Congress and the public, other important subjects may be brought up, such as that of National Prohibition, the proposed amendment to the Constitution providing for Equal Suffrage, Federal assistance to farmers in the form of Rural Credits, possibly an attack upon the Seamen's Act, and also, it is rumored, a renewal of the attempt which failed at the last session of the Congress to empower and possibly require the President to place an embargo upon the shipment of munitions of war.

With the matters outlined herein, and the conflict of opinion concerning them, the forthcoming Congress promises to be one of the most important and the busiest in American legislative history.

Pastor Sheldon on Preparedness

AN OPEN LETTER TO THE PRESIDENT

President Woodrow Wilson,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. President: In your speech in New York you reported as saying: "If men differ with me in this vital matter, I shall ask them to make it clear by far and in what way they are interested in making the permanent interests of the country safe against disturbance."

I am one of those who differ with you very positively on your program of War Preparation, and I believe the men of the West generally differ with you. I say, "No thoughtful man feels any panic haste in this matter. The country is not threatened from a quarter. She stands in friendly relation with all the world." If that is true, why all this military program for an enemy we do not possess? In the first course of your speech, you do not mention one single reason for an increased army and navy. You do not name one nation in the world that has any sign to threaten or invade our country.

Mr. President, I have lived in the West over twenty-seven years, and within the last year have been in every Western state, and faced over one million and a half of the people, and your program of militarism I meet with earnest and intelligent opposition from every part of the country. Much as I would wish, as a citizen who loves his country, to stand by the President in matters of vital concern, I for one cannot and will not uphold you and your advisers in this matter.

Mr. President, you advise men who differ with you "to make it clear how far and in what way they are interested in making the permanent interests of the country safe from disturbance."

If the money you and your advisers declare is necessary for military preparation against an enemy you do not name, were to be used in the education of the people and the Christianizing of the world, we could put an end forever to the war-lust of the world. If we took a small part of the people's money which your program will take from the people to buy powder, and put it into a campaign for National Prohibition of the liquor traffic, we could prepare our country for a Christian program of conquest over other passions.

If we took the price of one battleship and put it into the building of good roads in one of our states, we could prepare our people for a happier and cleaner and saner life.

If we took a small part of the immense sums your program calls for in the enrichment of munition factories, and spent it in Christianizing Europe after the great war is over, we could once and forever remove even the needless fear of war which exists in this country.

Mr. President, the program you propose to the people of this country to strengthen the military power of this Republic is contrary to the spirit of Christianity. What would Jesus do? Can we imagine him at this crisis in the world's history calling on a nation to spend vast sums preparing itself for war by creating a great army and navy? It is not thinkable. We know what he would do. He would call on the people of this country to give at least a dollar apiece to preach and practice the gospel of justice and brotherhood here at home, and to take what battleships we have and load them with the best of our sons and daughters, and send them around the world to evangelize the nation that will be ready for it as never before, and put an end to war by teaching and practicing the principles of the Prince of Peace.

Over against your program, we who differ with you place this program of preparedness. It is more practical than yours. It is the only program which will in the end bring about the brotherhood of man.

With voice and pen and all the influence I possess, I, as one American citizen, will oppose this program of militarism to the full extent of my power, for it represents not the spirit of the Master, the Prince of Peace, but the spirit of the old-world fear and distrust and hate which has kept alive through all the centuries that which the United States does not represent either by her traditions or by her history. After all these centuries of Jesus Christ, we should have learned the lesson which he has been trying to teach us: "They that use the sword, shall perish by the sword."

I am, very respectfully yours,

CHARLES M. SHELDON,
Central Congregational Church, Topeka, Kan.

A Week in the World's News

Greatest of the Three Fires at the Bethlehem Steel Plant November 10

How Fire Crumpled Part of the Roebling Plant November 11

Copyright, International Film Service, Inc.

GREAT NEGRO LEADER DIES

It was reported early in the week that Booker T. Washington was ill. He was hurried to a hospital in New York and physicians found him to be suffering from hardening of the arteries and told him that he could live but a short time. Mr. Washington said: "I was born in the South, have lived all my life in the South and expect to die and be buried in the South," and he was therefore hurried to Tuskegee, where he died a few hours after reaching home on Saturday morning, November 13. Dr. Washington's career began in slavery, his birth date not being recorded though it was somewhere about 1839. When he was about thirteen years old he heard of Hampton Institute, near Norfolk, which he began to attend in 1871. He was graduated at the head of his class in 1875 and taught school until he had earned money enough to put himself through the Wayland Seminary in Washington. In 1879 he was called to Hampton as a teacher and in 1881 the State of Alabama voted the large sum of two thousand dollars a year to found an industrial institute for negroes. Dr. Washington was selected to head the proposed institution, and the school at Tuskegee is the result. On the 25th anniversary of Tuskegee, the school owned two thousand acres, and its eighty-three buildings and personal property were valued at more than $800,000. In addition to this, it held twenty-two thousand acres of land and an endowment fund of more than a million dollars, and enrolled more than a thousand young men and five hundred young women each year, training them in thirty-seven industries. This has been Dr. Washington's life work. He saw clearly that the hope of the negro lay in farming and in the manual arts; and the greatest element in the success of Tuskegee has been that it fitted young negro men and women to support themselves and to be self-respecting without bringing them into conflict with social conditions which they were powerless to change. Dr. Washington has set the molds for negro education in the South. In addition to his work at Tuskegee and on the lecture platform, Dr. Washington was a prolific writer upon the negro question.

PREPARING FOR DEFENSE. Mayor Mitchell of New York announced on November 13 the personnel of a committee of one thousand business men, which has been organized to render all possible assistance to the President in his efforts to have the coming Congress pass legislation to put the United States in an "adequate state of military and naval preparedness."

ERUPTIONS ARE EPIDEMIC. Taking its cue from Vesuvius, the Italian volcano of Stromboli was in violent eruption on Saturday morning, November 13.

RAILROADS GET MORE PAY. Following a reweighing of the mails in the third contract section, which includes Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Minnesota, Wisconsin, Iowa, and Missouri, the Post Office Department has increased the total compensation to the railroads for carrying the mails in that section about twenty-seven per cent. Increases have not been granted in the other three sections.

A NEUTRAL PEACE COMMISSION. In an interview in Washington November 13, David Starr Jordan said that there was to be held at Berne, December 14 to 18, a meeting of some dozens of the leading neutral advocates of friendly international relations. This meeting will be unofficial, but Dr. Jordan felt that the meeting would "doubtless lead to the establishment of a more formal and permanent commission of continuous mediation and conciliation." Continuing he said, "The commission, if established, might not be successful in its main purpose, though personally I feel sure it will be. It might not shorten the war directly, but it would create a clearing house and center for peace discussions, and for the hopeful feeling of millions of people who are sick and tired of collective murder in every nation of Europe. Whether the United States takes part in it in any official capacity or not, however, such a commission is certain to be established." Dispatches from Lucerne announce the postponement of the conference until after the New Year because "circumstances are not yet favorable and the preparations for holding the conference have been delayed."

THE BONGO AND OKAPI. The bongo and okapi are animals that are seen in their natural state only in museums, after they are stuffed. They are extremely rare both inside and outside of museums, and the American Museum of Natural History is shortly to be enriched by mounted specimens of both along with some 60,000 African insects, 1,500 snakes and 20,000 catalogued subjects of all kinds. The collection is the result of six years' work in the Belgian Congo by Herbert Lang of the museum staff. Among the 20,000 specimens are 3,500 examples of implements, pottery and textiles related to savage arts and crafts, including the art of living. The number of specimens is so large that one is moved to wonder what the natives had left to sell to the next explorer after Mr. Lang had finished his collection. The okapi is a zebra-like animal, very timid, and only two or three white men have ever seen it. Mr. Lang captured a baby okapi, which had been deserted by its mother on the approach of the hunter. The baby got along well until the supply of milk gave out, and then its pelt was added to the collection. Beside the bongo and okapi skins, the collection includes skins of a giant eland, white rhinoceros, lions, elephants, buffaloes, and many rare birds.

PROGRESSIVE ARGENTINA. According to the correspondent of the New York Evening Post the Argentine Government is just granted a thirty-year concession to the Federal Holdings Company, an American concern, for the construction of a powerful wireless plant which within eighteen months will put Buenos Aires in direct communication with New York. The Pan-American Financial and Legislative Congress, originally set for November, has been postponed to April 2, 1916. The Argentine Congress in 1907, passed a law taxing railways three per cent. of their gross income and exempting them from all other taxation. The law permitted the roads to make their own rates, with the proviso that dividends should not exceed six and nine-tenths per cent. The Supreme Court recently upheld some additional taxes and the railroads raised rates ten per cent.

A POSSIBLE CURE FOR PELLAGRA. The United States Public Health Service announced that as a result of a year's experiments at the convict farm near Jackson, Miss., the service believes that it has found the cure of pellagra and that a means of cure is thereby indicated. Previous experiments led the experts of the bureau to believe that the cure of the disease had some connection with

Continued on next page

The War in Europe

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

European journalist of many years' standing, military critic, staff writer of the Paris Daily Mail and Le Temps; contributor to L'Indépendance Belge

THE publication during the past week of the German casualty list to November 2 enables us to get a reasonably accurate idea of the cost of the war thus far in lives to that empire. The total of the German casualties to date is announced as 2,099,154, but this does not include 230 Bavarian, 293 Wurtemberg and 280 Saxon lists, estimated at about 600,000 in all. The naval lists are not included.

Of the aggregate of about 2,699,000 we know about 400,000 are prisoners of war, which leaves around 2,300,000 to be divided into killed and wounded. The old proportion would have been about 5½ wounded to 1 killed, but in this war the ratio of killed to wounded is higher than before, say 1 to 4. This would make the total killed about 460,000 and the total wounded about 1,840,000. The British experience is that about 24 per cent. of the wounded die, so that on this account we would have something like 442,000 more fatalities. Of the remainder (1,400,000) probably over 1,000,000 have returned to duty. These figures may be a little too high, because no allowance has been made for duplication of names in the casualty lists. It seems fairly safe to assume that the German irreparable loss in men since the beginning of the war to November 1 has been about 1,700,000.

The British casualties to the beginning of October were stated by Mr. Asquith as about 496,000. These have been rising since then and one day last week reached the record figure, so far, for a single day, of 3,850.

Our knowledge of the numbers of the French and Italian casualties is very slight. It was hinted last August that the French casualties were large, but no positive figures were stated, while even no hints have ever been given as regards the Italian losses. Russia, of course, heads the list in point of numbers, and her total loss since the war began of men who are irretrievably lost for this war cannot be short of 5,000,000; she starts with 2,000,000 prisoners of war.

A conservative guess, and in the nature of things any estimate is a guess, of the total number of men who have been killed in battle, died of disease or illness since this war began to the middle of November, would be in the neighborhood of 4,500,000. Few of the American states have so large a population.

The resignation of Mr. Winston Churchill from the British cabinet took place towards the end of the week under consideration (November 6-13). Mr. Churchill goes to join the British forces on the Continent, it is stated.

Considerable excitement has been caused in Great Britain by Lord Derby's statement in Parliament regarding conscription, which was made, it was announced, with the authority of the prime minister. Textually this statement was as follows:

"If young men medically fit and indispensable in any business of national importance, or any business conducted for the general good of the community, do not come forward voluntarily before November 30, the government will, after that date, take the necessary steps to redeem the pledge made on November 2." (On the date referred to, Premier Asquith announced in the House of Commons that if the young men did not come forward voluntarily and enlist, "other and compulsory means would be taken before married men were called upon to fill the engagement to serve.") Lord Derby adds: "Whether a man is indispensable or not to his business will be decided not by the man or his employer, but in the diet of the patient and an arrangement was made with the governor of Mississippi that he would pardon convicts who would submit to the experiment desired by the bureau. There was no pellagra at the farm at the beginning of the experiment. The group of convicts selected for the experiment were treated in every way like the others as to work and living conditions but were not given milk, eggs, peas, beans, meats or other foods that would furnish protein. They were fed fried mush, biscuits, grits, corn gravy, sweet potatoes, cabbage, corn, rice, collards and coffee with sugar only. The experiment was begun on February 4 and continued until April 9. In September some of the patients began to show symptoms of pellagra, six of the eleven developing the disease, which did not appear among any of the convicts other than those included in the experiment. The government doctors immediately applied a reverse process in that of the patients, who are all now showing marked evidences of recovery. It is the opinion of the physicians of the Public Health Service that pellagra is entirely due to improper diet.

Continued on page 1199

WOMEN WILL URGE NEUTRALITY. The Organization of American Women for Neutrality will present a monster petition to Congress immediately after it assembles in December protesting against the exportation from this country of "the things that kill." The protest is based on International Law and precedent and among the quotations is one by President Wilson, declaring that "We must be neutral in fact as well as in name, and we must put a curb on every transaction which might give a preference to one side in the struggle over another." Address will delay the above organization at Roland Avenue, Roland Park, Baltimore, Md., on December 11.

ABOUT HUNDRED GUNS SILENCED. A fire in the plant of the Bethlehem Steel Company, on November 10, destroyed Shop No. 1, with a loss alleged to be about three million dollars. The building contained much valuable munition-making equipment. According to early reports, the fire was caused by electric spark which ignited a stream of oil in the boring machines. It was reported that there were 800 field guns in the building in process of manufacture for shipment to Europe. There were nearly 1,000 men at work at five o'clock in the morning when the fire started. All escaped injury, but many lost the outfit of tools. In spite of a stiff wind, the other buildings of the plant were not injured.

On the morning of November 11, part of the plant of the John A. Roebling's Sons Company at Trenton, N. J., was entirely gutted by fire. The building was a modern building covering 100,000 sq. ft. and was a part of the wire rope mill. It had been reported that the rope being run in this mill was the kind of cable that is used by the British navy in trapping submarines. The early reports placed the loss by the fire at about a million dollars. This is the second fire in the Roebling plant this year. There was also a fire at the pattern shops of the Baldwin Locomotive Company, on November 10. The Baldwin works are making locomotives for the Russian Government, but it is not stated whether the patterns destroyed bore any relation to this contract. The evidence of these fires in big munition plants is regarded as indicative of a hostile attitude to all three.

THE STORM DEMON AGAIN. The cyclone which swept across the states of Kansas, Nebraska and South Dakota during the night of November 10 is reported to have cost nearly seventy-five lives and millions of dollars in property. The path of the storm was sixteen miles wide in places; telegraph and telephone service was prostrated along its course. Its first destructive force was felt at Great Bend, Kan., where between fifty and sixty persons lost their lives. Half of the city was wrecked. The storm passed north through Hutchinson and Herington, Kan., and on to Nebraska, where ten persons were killed. From that point it seems to have bent into South Dakota, four persons being killed near Hartford.

FROM THE SUNDAY SCHOOLS TO THE TRENCHES. In response to appeals made by the World's Sunday School Association a million nickels from a million Sunday school pupils for a million Testaments for a million soldiers, already over 340,000 copies of the new Testament have been forwarded to the front.

HOLDING LAWS PERMIT HOLOGRAPH TESTS. Investigations by officials into the causes of the fatal fire in Brooklyn, to which we referred last week, have brought out a serious defect in the laws under which buildings that do not comply with the laws still can be maintained for a long time. This particular building had been reported to the council of the Industrial Commission for legal action on March 23, but the card record had disappeared, and action had not been taken until August 20. The commissioner testified that the last fiscal year 199,000 orders had been issued by the commission, of which perhaps 70,000 had not been complied with. Of 111 stairway violations reported in one year, only 246 were remedied. The inspector in the district of the fire had 950 buildings to inspect and to watch for violations of the law. He had been able to inspect between 400 and 500. When the inspectors have done all they can and legal action is forced by continued refusals to make alterations which would safeguard human life, it is still possible for the building to continue without compliance with the order until the case has been fought through the courts; which in a recent instance has established reading and writing rooms and has provided music for the prisoners. Prison camps in the past, with their long days of idleness, have unbalanced thousands of men.

CONTINUING A NEEDED WORK. The Federal Commission on Industrial Relations ended with a submission of its report. The chairman of the Commission, Frank P. Walsh, has organized a new committee on Industrial

Copyright, International Film Service, Inc.

Viaduct Built to Save Twenty Minutes Between New York and Buffalo required three years. If building laws are to be effective it is necessary that commissions charged with their enforcement be given power to enforce their orders through some process that will give immediate results. There are conditions under which property rights, now so sacred in the eyes of the law, must be subordinated to public policy and welfare.

UNUSUAL EXPORTS. America is now exporting a great many things which were Relations, the committee being made up of twelve members, seven of whom are labor leaders. The new unofficial commission will contain a board of experts who were employed during the official investigation, and will endeavor to carry on the investigations along the same lines that were followed by the official commission and to make possible complete and thorough investigations into all the relations between capital and labor. The commission will also endeavor to obtain legislation which its inquiries indicate to be desirable. The final

Copyright, Underwood & Underwood

Picture of Latest "Slide" in the Panama Canal, But by no Means the Last "Slide," According to the Explanation Which Is Given in a Forthcoming Remarkable Article in the Christian Herald formerly handled through our custom houses only as imports. We are exporting to Great Britain cutlery, lace, embroideries, cotton and woolen clothes, knit goods, and soap, and are even shipping to Britain a great deal of tin plate. Lawn-mowers are going to New Zealand, laundry machinery to Tasmania and fire extinguishers to British India.

SAVING THE PRISONERS. John R. Mott has recently stated that the work of the Young Men's Christian Association among the three million prisoners of war in camp in Europe has done much to prevent a moral and physical deterioration of the men. The Asso-report of the Federal Commission will be laid before Congress when it meets in December.

ANOTHER PANAMA. As the result of the election in New York state on the proposed issue of bonds for the completion of a state barge canal, the state engineer declares that it will be possible to complete the canal within the next year. It is claimed that this canal is of as great importance to the commerce of the United States as is the Panama Canal, and that it will probably carry a larger tonnage for a good many years. The old Erie Canal saved millions of dollars to the shippers of the West and of the East, but the boats that could use the Erie Canal could not travel far beyond its western terminal. The new canal will accommodate steam barges capable of navigating the Great Lakes, and when completed there will be an all-water route between Atlantic seaports and all ports on the Great Lakes. The canal will have a capacity sufficient to accommodate almost all of the traffic in heavy goods and in goods which do not have to reach their destination at the earliest possible moment after shipment. Branches of the canal will connect with the St. Lawrence and with Lake Champlain.

A PROTEST AGAINST LAW. Chicago has lived so long in ignorance of the existence of the excise law of the state that it cannot immediately adjust itself to the action of Mayor Thompson in enforcing the law and closing saloons on Sunday. On Sunday, November 7, the various interests in Chicago affected by the closing order engineered a great parade as a protest against the enforcement of the law. It was announced that no organization directly representing the liquor business would be allowed in the line of march. Brewers, saloon keepers, distillers, bar tenders, were forced to march as individuals or as members of other organizations. The police department issued a permit for the parade, but the building inspector's department refused to permit the erection of a reviewing stand and the mayor declined to review the procession, sending a letter in which he denounced the demonstration as showing disrespect for law and as an attempt to intimidate officials sworn to enforce the statutes.

EDUCATIONAL FULMINATE. The Gary school system, by which optional religious instruction is given by the churches as a part of the regular school course, was under discussion at a popular gathering at a church in the Bronx on the evening of November 9. Everything went along smoothly until some one accused certain religious interests of encouraging the Gary plan in the ultimate interest of public support for parochial schools. The result was an explosion of conflicting statements which broke up the meeting.

RUSSIAN PROGRESSIVES GAIN. In elections, which have just been held for one-third of the membership of the Russian Imperial Council, the Progressive groups made notable gains. Sixty-three members were chosen, forty-three by the zemstvos, twelve by the nobility and the remainder by universities, clergy and various industries. The Conservatives elected only eleven members where they had previously elected twenty-nine. The Progressives gained fourteen members, the nobility chose four members of the Center Party, which is acting in sympathy with the Progressives. The Council of the Empire consists of an equal number of elected members and members named by the Czar, and the Council and the Duma have equal legislative powers.

CHINESE MONARCHY DELAYED. On November 9 the Chinese minister at Tokio assured the Japanese Government that there would be no change in the form of the Chinese Government this year, and at the same time the Associated Press was authorized by the Chinese Government to state that no change would be made this year. The election returns, as given out, showed that eighteen of the twenty-two provinces had already given solid support to the proposal to reestablish a monarchy. The election will be completed, but the restoration of a monarchy evidently will be delayed.

MEXICO CITY RELIEVED. The State Department at Washington has announced that advices from its agents in Mexico show that the famine which has threatened Mexico City more or less of the time during the past year has now been relieved, and that business is again being resumed in the city and in all of the territory under the control of the Carranza government.

HE SET THE CLOCKS OF THE WORLD. Mr. William F. Allen, of South Orange, N. J., died recently. He was for many years assistant editor and then editor of the Railway Guide. In 1881 he was appointed to devise some means of standardizing railroad time. The time zones into which the official reckoning of time is divided throughout the world are the result of Mr. Allen's work, time being standardized now throughout the world in accordance with the plans originally proposed by him for American railways.

WORLD'S LARGEST CONCRETE VIADUCT. The half-mile long Tunkhannock Viaduct, costing $12,000,000 and cutting 20 minutes off the running time on the Lackawanna Railroad between New York and Buffalo, was opened to traffic November 7. The great viaduct is 2,375 feet long, 240 feet high and is composed of ten 180-foot and two 100-foot spans. It is the last link in the forty-mile cutoff from Clark's Summit to Hallstead, Pa. Although the entire forty-mile cutoff saves only 3.6 miles in actual distance, it reduces a maximum grade of 1.23 per cent. to .68 per cent. and eliminates some difficult curves. This means that besides the twenty-minute gain for passenger trains, freight trains can save a whole hour, and trains which formerly required five engines can be manipulated by two.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is published weekly by The Christian Herald, at 100 E. 10th St., New York City. The officers are: Otto Kuusinen, President and Treasurer, Bible House, 8 N. 5th St., New York; H. J. Smith, Vice President, Bible House, 8 N. 5th St., New York; Theodore Wilson, Secretary, Bible House, 8 N. 5th St., New York.

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE: $10 a year in advance. Remittances should be made in the safest manner available. Make checks and money orders payable to the Christian Herald.

FOREIGN POSTAGE: Four copies mailed at the

the United States, Canada and Mexico, add one dollar a year to subscription price.

CHANGE OF DATE: It takes at least two weeks to change the date, after your subscription is renewed.

EXPIRATION OF SUBSCRIPTION.—The date on the wrapper indicates when your subscription ends.

CHANGE OF ADDRESS.—It requires three weeks time to make the change. Give both old and new address.

LETTERS should be addressed, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

Reviving Old Customs

A THANKSGIVING SERMON BY THE REV. J. WILBUR CHAPMAN, D.D.*

TEXT: Gen. 26:18. "And Isaac digged again the wells of water, which they had digged in the days of Abraham his father; and he called their names after the names by which his father had called them."

IN the Old Testament times a well of water was of the greatest possible value. It was the place of meeting for the travelers who crossed the plains. Forth from it went streams of water to enrich the near-by land and make the wilderness blossom as the rose. Near to it travelers pitched their tents and sometimes took up their permanent abode. It was strength for the weak; it was refreshment for the weary; and it was in every respect a place of supreme importance in the estimation of the people who lived in Old Testament times. A king who would dig a well was not infrequently made more famous than if he had constructed some great palace, or if he had had a share in the erection of a pyramid.

There are some famous wells mentioned in the Bible. In the Old Testament those digged by Abraham were of special importance. The lessons centering about a well were capable of spiritual interpretation. This is evident from what we read in Isa. 12:2, 3: "Behold, God is my salvation; I will trust, and not be afraid; for the Lord Jehovah is my strength and my song; he also is become my salvation. Therefore with joy shall ye draw water out of the wells of salvation." And the picture here given by the prophet is of the soul finding its rest and refreshment in God, and its highest expression of joy in fellowship with man. It is a sad thing that in these modern times men have all too frequently put God out of their lives. They are too busy amassing fortunes; they are pushing forward too zealously seeking fame; and because they have lost God, they have lost that which makes for character here and for eternal happiness as well. The soul separated from God is not only without salvation, but is without strength, without a song, and without joy.

IN the New Testament there are some wonderful wells, but the best of all is described in John 4:6: "Now Jacob's well was there. Jesus therefore, being wearied with his journey, sat thus on the well: and it was about the sixth hour."

There are some sad stories in connection with this well. One has to do with Jacob's journey on his way to Bethel, and at this well-curb we have the warning which comes to us in the story of Jacob's heartbreaking experience, and we are told in the story that when we start to walk with God, there must be no stopping at a half-way station, and no compromise with the world. But there is a beautiful picture associated with this well, too, because it was there in the New Testament times that Jesus sat when he was weary, and it was there that he forgave the woman her sin, and sent her on her way rejoicing, telling her the story of the man who had not only changed her life, but had told her of all the things which she had done. It is significant, I think, that Jacob's well had to do with the sad story of the failure of his daughter, and the same well had to do with the sin of another woman in New Testament times who was forgiven by the Master. How different is the law from the Gospel! The day the law was given three thousand were slain. (Ex. 32:28.) The day that grace began three thousand were saved. (Acts 2:41.) Under the law, the sheep died for the shepherd. Under grace, the Shepherd died for the sheep. Under law the covenant was between God and man. Under grace the covenant is between God the Father and God the Son, and we enter by faith into the finished work of Jesus which makes life worth while. Under the law a disobedient son was stoned with stones until he was dead. Under grace a disobedient son was mourned by his father, was loved in his wandering, and when the father knew that his boy was coming home he met him with a kiss and a robe, gave him a ring for his finger and shoes for his feet, and called in his friends and neighbors to rejoice with him because his boy had been dead but was alive again.

THANKSGIVING Day is a time for reunions, and in Old Testament times they gathered about a well and had fellowship together. Now we gather about a fireside and rejoice that, as friends and loved ones, we are separated no more. Would it not be well on this Thanksgiving Day to dig a well which might mean a closer approach to God, more intimate fellowship with those who are his children, and a more sincere desire to live so as to please him?

* Dr. Chapman is America's leading evangelist.

A well was a place of farewells when Joseph and Mary, with the young child Jesus, left Bethlehem at the conclusion of the Passover feast. They undoubtedly stopped at the well of Bethlehem, which was by the gate, and said good-by to their kindred and friends. This well of Bethlehem was always hallowed by sacred memories, and when David was in the cave he cried out, "Oh that one would give me to drink of the water of the well of Bethlehem, which is by the gate!"

Would it not be a good thing on this Thanksgiving Day to dig a well, gather about it, and record our vows that we will say good-by to selfishness, to thoughtlessness and to sin of every sort—good-by to all that has displeased God and ourselves, good-by to a life of failure, and set our faces toward a life of victory?

A well has always been a place of refreshment. Jesus spoke of a well in this way. He said: "He that drinketh of the water that I shall give him, it shall be in him a well of water." Would it not be a good thing on this Thanksgiving Day to make up our minds to lay hold upon those things which mean spiritual refreshment and spiritual conquest? Some of us have been drifting from our Bibles. Why not go back to them this day, of all the days?

NOT long ago in one of the great secular weekly papers appeared the following:

BACK TO THE BIBLE. Certain of our wise men of today have shaded away sin till it becomes an expression of temperament. They tell us we sin because our grandfather sinned, and because our home is situated in the wrong block. These are clever words of clever comforters, and surely they ought to wipe away forever the tears from our eyes. But they do not speak to human need. They leave the heart blighted and the heart ashamed. They leave the sinner one to continue in despair. He does not ask that his sin shall be explained away. He wishes forgiveness and a fresh start. In the Book, which is not read as once it was, there are no soft words about sin. But the way out is shown. And not only is forgiveness offered in this Book, but man's need of comfort is met. There is comfort in plenty. These writers knew the human heart. They saw man broken by his toil and his grief. And for this, too, they had the answer. They told of a Being of love, hidden just back of this rude and temporary universe. This love, they said, is conscious of how the littliest child and the old man are sick at heart for one to come close to their loneliness. When again will any company of writers say the things they know in such telling words, such pictures of humble life—the boy far away from the faces of his home and far gone in shame—such true stories of lowly devotion breaking through into beauty?

Let us go back to the old Book! It is water to a thirsty soul; it is food to the hungry; it is light to those in darkness; it is all that the spiritual nature demands, and without it life is hardly worth while.

In the olden times, when Abraham digged his wells, he gave two of them very special names. The first was "Lahairoi." (Gen. 25:11.) The name of this well signified "the well of him that liveth and seeth me." It is a very sad thing to know that in these latter days so many men have come to live as if it were not true that God could see them in all their sinful ways. I can think of no text of Scripture that would be more strikingly useful today than this: "Thou God seest me."

Professor James Orr once said: "God is shaking all things in heaven and earth, but the things that cannot be shaken remain. God remains; the Bible remains; Christ remains; the sin and need of the world remain; the Gospel as God's provision for that need remains." If it is true that God sees us, it would be well for us to have in mind two things concerning him. The first is that he is full of love. All the love of a mother's heart is a hint of his power to love; all the love of men for each other is an outgrowth of his love; the love that makes home like heaven; the love that makes life worth while, this comes as the result of his loving.

THE other thing to remember is his mercy. God's mercy is from everlasting to everlasting. It is boundless, and all of us may be the objects of it if we will. It is well that we should understand what mercy is; perhaps we shall love God better.

The second well that Abraham digged was named "Beersheba." (Gen. 22:19.) This signifies "the well of the oath," or the covenant. These wells after Abraham's death were filled in by his enemies. (Gen. 26:18.) So it is quite easy to understand how this action on the part of Isaac would suggest a practical message for the Thanksgiving time. Isaac's story is interesting. He is a child of promise, one of God's Old Testament miracles. He does not show off to very good advantage. He stands between Abraham and Jacob, and he does not appear well, first, because of what Abraham was, and second, because of what Jacob became. But it is a good thing to learn that we are not judged by individual things in our lives, but rather by the sum of life, and in the end he was right. I am glad I am not judged in God's sight by this little failure or that. He is my Father; he knows my heart, and loves me in spite of all that I have failed to do. When Jesus looked upon the sleeping disciples, he said, as he gave an explanation of their sleeping: "Their eyes are heavy"; and he has ever been disposed since to explain my failure and yours.

This digging of the wells on the part of Isaac suggests the reviving of old customs. The wells which Isaac tried to dig for himself were not a success. In Gen. 26:20 we note that one of his wells was named "Esek," and that means strife. In Gen. 26:21 another one was named "Sitnah," and that means hatred. We might just as well learn that we cannot make improvements on God's plan for the building up of life. We say in these times, "Let us give our children liberty; let us make the Lord's Day a time of merrymaking; let us take the Bible from its place of permanence and allow men to think as they please."

THIS Thanksgiving Day is the time for the reviving of old customs. Let us dig again the wells of our fathers, and let us have, first, better homes. Fathers are too busy and mothers often too weary, and the children suffer. When fathers are the priests of their household and when mothers are saints in their home is like heaven. Second, a better church attendance. It is absolutely impossible to get along in life without the church. To put it on the least possible ground, it is not respectable to stay away from church. One feels better satisfied with himself, more disposed to help his neighbor, more ready to be true, more worshipful in his attitude toward God, if he is faithful in his attendance at church. Third, better living in business. There is such a desire to be rich, such a desire to outclass another in the race, and before we know it we are gaining wealth with our ideals lowered, and our sense of honor stunned. It would be a great thing if today we could have more of the type of old-fashioned Christian business men. The world needs such, and without them the world suffers. Fourth, a better representation of Jesus Christ. It is true that we too frequently misrepresent him, not always intentionally, sometimes thoughtlessly, but it is quite true that the demand today for a faithful representation of Christ is stronger than it has ever been. Fifth, a better observance of the Lord's Day. The automobile carrying people away from home and from the house of God on the Lord's Day is working harm. The all-course absorbing men's time and energy on Sunday, which could be given to God, is also hurting many today. The Lord's Day must be carefully observed, or individual character, households, society, the state, will all suffer.

In the Old Testament times a well was often digged as an expression of gratitude to God for some great blessing which he had showered upon the people. I am sure that all will agree that at this Thanksgiving time we may in this country properly dig a well which will stand as an expression of our gratitude to God for the following blessings: First, abundant harvest, the like of which the land has not seen in years if indeed ever. Second, the fact that our country is at peace, when half the human race is engaged in bloody warfare.

These are blessings which should compel us to call upon all that is within us to praise and magnify the name of our God.

I CANNOT close without mentioning another well. It was digged by the light of a star. The prophets in the Old Testament made reference to it. (Isa. 54:1.) "Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters, and he that hath no money; come ye, buy, and ye shall have; yea, come, buy wine and milk without money and without price."

In our own country in old-fashioned days, the well-sweep was made with one long piece of wood and one short, and thus the cross was made, and because of this cross, the water of life is made possible for all of us who are athirst. Jesus himself said: "I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end. I will give unto him that is athirst of the fountain of the water of life freely."

Alas! the enemies of the Cross have tried to tell in this well, too! Would not this Thanksgiving Day be a fitting occasion for us to dig the old well once more, and say to men, "Seek ye the Lord while he may be found; today, if ye will hear his voice, harden not your heart."

Daily Meditation

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR. LED BY

J. H. JOWETT, D.D., F. B. MEYER, D.D., REV. E. WHITTIER CASWELL AND CLAYTON SEDGWICK COOPER

The Gift of Spiritual Discernment

SUNDAY, November 28. Heb. 5:14. "Those who have their senses exercised to discern both good and evil." There are grades of spiritual discernment. There are undisciplined senses which can detect only presumptuous sins and have no perception of secret faults. They can apprehend the sin which lodges in some glaring crime, but they cannot appreciate the sin which hides in the spirit of an age. At the Royal Society's meeting last year Mr. Astor exhibited a micro-balance, all built up of quartz fibers, each as fine as a spider's web, the purpose of which is to discern and weigh the faintest traces of gas.

And we are purposed by the Lord to have an analogous endowment in the soul. A comparatively coarse conscience can register the sin of drunkenness, but it requires more exquisite feelers to discern a fit but deadly gas, a corrupting spirit, the iniquity which can hide in an atmosphere. And yet it is in these aerial forms that sin is most commonly met. Days and weeks pass by and we may never meet in the shape of some fierce and distinctive passion, but every hour it rides upon the wings of the wind. (You now and again do we meet our enemy as a roaring lion, but we continually meet him as "the price of the power of the air.") We may escape the lion, but we cannot escape the atmosphere. To be able to discern the faintest trace of gas is one of the conditions of spiritual immunity.

Now we are never so much alert to bad air as when we have been breathing good air. If we come out of a crowded room, and fill our lungs with the fresh, clean air, and then return to the room, we are keenly sensitive to the poisoned atmosphere within. We must continually draw in breath in the fear of the Lord, and be filled with the Holy Ghost, if we would be able to discern the deadly gases of insidious worldliness. The soul must be constantly refreshed if it is to retain the freshness of her perceptions. It is only the soul that knows God which has an instant recognition of the ungodly. Atmospheres reveal their secrets, and the noxious breath is dispersed before it has begun its destructive work. J. H. J.

Strength Through Retrospect

MONDAY, November 29. Isa. 51:1-11. "Look unto the rock whence ye were hewn!" These paragraphs are very dramatic. We become conscious that we are approaching a revelation of unparalleled solemnity. As we consider the thrice Hearken of the first paragraph and the thrice Look of the second, we realize that the mind is being prepared for the presence-chamber of the profoundest mysteries of love and redemption. Presently with hushed and awful dread we shall pass in to worship before the living Man of Calvary.

Look back for two reasons.

(1) Ere we enter the holiest, let us, like Dante, glorify ourselves with the meek rushes, emblems of frailty, that grow around the lake. Let us remember our origin, and look to the rock whence we were hewn. What has brought us from such an origin to make us pillars in the temple of God? Let us not list ourselves. There is nothing in us to account for such a transformation. Let us render homage where it belongs, and reason that if God has done so much, we can easily perfect what he has begun.

(2) It was for her encouragement, also, that Israel was directed to this retrospect. The nation had become greatly reduced, and the godly were but a handful. The tree had been so mercilessly cut down that it seemed hopeless to expect it would recover its former spreading glory. But the divine voice says: "Do not despair! Look back! Consider Abraham at Sarah. Once they were the sole representatives of the Hebrew race, but of the one son of their old age sprang countless myriads. What I did once, I can do again." You, your family, and your church may be greatly reduced; but by God's grace the lonely one may yet become a thousand. F. B. M.

The Soul That Wins Must Hold Fast

TUESDAY, November 30. Mark 14:42. "Arise, let us be going; behold, he that betrayeth me is at hand." In spite of the fact that the disciples, comprising the inner circle of Jesus' friends, failed in their friendship and guardianship in the crisis of his life in Gethsemane; in spite of the fact that Jesus rebuked them with some of the most reproachful words he ever uttered, he nevertheless gave them another chance. He said in substance, "You have missed the opportunity of helping me and guarding me in my need; but there is still a chance for you to go with me to the cross and afterward to serve them whom I would serve, and, if need be, to die for their sakes." The disciples accepted this opportunity. The disciples of the Gospels became the apostles of the Acts; literally, like grains of wheat, they died away into the ground, and some of them at least drank the cup of sacrifice to the full.

The message to me today is a clear one. No matter what opportunities I have lost yesterday or last year, the door of the present and the future swings wide before me. God gives me a new chance with the new day. He bids me throw my broken past, with its discouragements and failures, to the four winds. He covers my sin and failure with the robe of his righteousness. Christ speaks to us as to his early disciples: "Rise up and go with me for sympathy and for service into the world of today!"

The apprentice of the great artist in Florence took the broken bits of glass that fell from his master's chisel and wrought them into a window of surpassing color and loveliness. The success of the Christian lies in gathering up the fragments of his past mistakes and defeats, and converting them, through the power and love of God, into a new and successful present. C. S. C.

The Finished Work of the Cross

WEDNESDAY, December 1. John 16:1-13. "The prince of this world is judged." The whole Gospel is a story of the duel in which our Lord worsted and mastered Satan. The conflict began in the lonely struggle of the Temptation, pervaded Christ's earthly career, and culminated at the cross. Its first note was, "If thou be the Son of God, command that these stones be made bread"; its last note was, "If thou be the Son of God, come down from the cross." But when our Lord cried, "It is finished!" with the shout of a conqueror he proclaimed to the universe that he had stood his ground, and that evil was not an eternal force, which could not be overcome. The cross was the crisis of human history, because the prince of this world measured himself in one final struggle with our Lord, and failing, he fell as lightning from heaven.

On this the Holy Spirit loves to dwell. "See," he says; "Christ has conquered for you and in your nature. You meet a foe who is not invincible. Christ conquered, not for himself, but for all who believe. The prince of this world stands condemned forever. Only abide in the last Adam, the Lord from heaven, and let him abide in you, and he will repeat through you his former victories." What helpfulness is here! When next the tempter comes, meet him as a discredited and fallen foe. He can have no power to force thee. The cross bruised his head. For thee, in Jesus Christ, victory is secured; for who is he that overcometh save he who believes that Jesus is the Son of God? He hath put all things under thy feet: thou shalt tread on the lion and adder, the young lion and the dragon thou shalt trample under foot. F. B. M.

Getting a Firm Hold on God

THURSDAY, December 2. Dan. 6:28. "So this Daniel prospered in the reign of Darius, and in the reign of Cyrus the Persian." The secret of the prosperity of Daniel lay not in the extent of his lands or in his power of armies; it resided in his religion, in his resistless confidence in God. This confidence gave him courage to abstain from yielding to the temptation to do things simply because they were "good form"; it sustained him in the den of lions and steadied his nerve in the trying ordeal of translating Nebuchadnezzar's dream, under the threat of death if he failed to interpret it correctly. Daniel had the kind of courage that is not flurried in the midst of excitement, and the daring that can "suffer and be strong" when there is nothing to do but sit still and wait.

Success is not always a matter of intellect; it is often a matter of nerve. Happiness is not purchased by a big estate, it is an inner possession and independent of the threat of kings. Ability to see things steadily and see them whole comes to us, as it came to Daniel, when our windows of prayer are open toward Jerusalem, through those exercises of thought and devotion by which the spirit gets prepared and nerved for exigencies. Lack of spiritual preparation is the cause of much of our fear and hesitation. Our lack of religion accounts for our lack of success. To succeed is to see God and his power greater and more potent than the things that threaten us in our daily lives.

The reason why our hurried life and exciting pleasures are fatal to our success is because they blur the sense of God. In our lives of stress and strain we lose the prizes of victory, not by reason of our deficiency, but because we lose our heads. We are always thinking of acting, we do not think enough of praying and getting our heads and hearts steadied and fixed on the thought of our true power and omnipotent reserves.

Today, I would stop and achieve that quietness and confidence of the Hebrew hero who was able to annihilate anxiety and fear by his firm hold on his God, gained by his thrice daily prayer. Let me try Daniel's secret for success. C. S. C.

Our Worldly Possessions a Stewardship

FRIDAY, December 3. I Tim. 6:1-10. "Supposing that godliness is a way of gain." These are two great words—godliness and gain. The main question for us all is their order. Men of the world put gain first, and as the result they finally find themselves struggling in a maelstrom of foolish and hurtful lusts, which have fed and multiplied in their haste to be rich, or they are pierced through with many sorrows, or they find that their uncertain riches take to themselves wings and fly away.

But if we put godliness first, we not only become godlike, but we make great gain. We gain or win ourselves: we acquire a knowledge of God; and we become inheritors of the boundless wealth of the heavenly kingdom. "Godliness with contentment is great gain." A man's life consisteth not in the abundance that he possesses, but in the gold, silver, and precious stones of Christian character. The true way of regarding wealth is that it is a stewardship. God guarantees us food and raiment, and bids us administer the money which we acquire as his, and to be accounted for to him. The gains of such faithful handling of wealth are the ten or five cities of the parable. What gain it is to be like God, who is ever giving of his bountiful stores to the needs of men! What gain it is to have the blessing of the poor, and the prayers of those who must have perished had we not interposed! What gain it is to be able to turn the perishing metals of the earth into spiritual qualities, such as praise and thanksgiving, peace and joy! What gain it is to know that you will be welcomed at last into the eternal habitations by those to whom you have been able to minister! What gain to hear God say, "Well done, good and faithful servant; enter into the joy of thy Lord." F. B. M.

Those Who Mock at the Gospel Message

SATURDAY, December 4. Matt. 22:5. "But they made light of it." Would a minister of the glorious Gospel make light of the atonement, of the blood of Christ, of his birth, death and deity? Then we would expect that his people would lightly consider the authority of Jesus, of the Bible and of the invitation which the divine Son extends to all people. "Like priest, like people!" Not to treat our Lord's message seriously, to be indifferent and neglectful, is as destructive to the soul as if we were one of his crucifiers. Christ offers a full, free and eternal salvation—the most tremendous presentation heaven has ever made to earth! How terrible for humanity to make light of it! God so loved, but men so hated. They would not have his rule, his riches, his pardon and peace. God, who is everything, was not wanted by men, who are nothing.

Sinful men are often so deceived as to be like an insane man who used to weave in his cell golden crowns out of straws. What better are we, who choose toys rather than treasures, sin than holiness, hell than heaven? Men do not make light of honor, wealth, pleasure, leisure or lust; they make light of him, who would save them from selling their souls for a bauble. If we ridicule and reject him, with no more feeling than a clod of clay, he will be compelled to make light of us when we desire to taste of his supper. E. W. C.

The Man Who Forgot

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

THE Man sat at his office desk a frown on his handsome, impatient face. His eyes, roving around the room, came back every few minutes to the small calendar pad on the desk in front of him. There was a note in red ink on the calendar—his secretary was given to small red-inked notes.

"Tomorrow," said the red-inked note brazenly, "is Thanksgiving, and Thanksgiving is a holiday."

Ruefully the Man surveyed the tiny red-inked note. And as he surveyed it he laughed—a curiously mirthless laugh. Perhaps he was thinking of the Big Order to be finished tomorrow—the Big Order that he had smothered his conscience to take. Perhaps he was thinking that clerks and office boys and secretaries take a holiday on Thanksgiving. Perhaps he was thinking that it was careless of him to forget the day when it meant so much to his business.

"Thanksgiving!" snarled the Man. "Bosh!"

The door opened softly, and his secretary, a slender wisp of a girl with round gray eyes that looked a trifle tired, came in quietly on her little square-toed, rubber-soled shoes. He turned toward her sharply, glad to have some one to hear his protest.

"Look here, Miss Whitney," he exploded—"look here. It's all wrong, Thanksgiving coming this week—it's all wrong. Why, we won't be able to finish the Big Order. Why, we won't be able to finish anything. Have they got to have a holiday?"

The Secretary sat down demurely at her typewriter with her back to him. "Why, yes, I'm afraid they've got to," she told him. "You see, Thanksgiving is a home day, and they've all got—families!"

"Hang families!" said the Man. "I haven't got a family. I don't see, either, why they should have one. I'll work tomorrow, holiday or no holiday. But—" he paused rather hopelessly "but I can't work alone."

The Secretary sat pounding busily on the typewriter, but her voice came softly back to the Man at the desk.

"I'd just as soon—work, too," she said.

The Man wheeled sharply in his chair. "I thought you said," he told her accusingly, "that Thanksgiving was a home day."

The Secretary turned in her chair, while the tears glistened bright on her lashes. "But," she told him, "I haven't got a home; and—I haven't got a family." Her voice broke, and she pounded blindly on her keys.

The Man took up his pen and began to write. "Why," he wondered fiercely, "should the women always try to put sentiment into business hours? Why should they cry at the wrong time—when folk are so busy?" He groaned. "The woman's place is the home," he thought. "Will you take a letter, Miss Whitney?" he asked gruffly in the same breath.

The day drew to its dusky, cold

November close, and the clerks in the other office began to put up their pens and close their ledgers. The Man noticed that some of them carried limp bundles that might have held turkeys. The oldest clerk dropped a bag on the floor and the paper burst. The Man found himself watching eagerly to see what the bag held. It held onions and the oldest clerk chuckled as he picked them up. Thanksgiving—a frosty, cold, home-like Thanksgiving—was in the air. The Man turned his back sharply on the outer office.

"You can go home now, Miss Whitney," he growled, "but come back tomorrow—we'll have to work while the rest are having a holiday—with their families!"

The Man turned his back again, and as he did he heard the door slam behind her.

It was very quiet in the office—so quiet that the Man threw down his pen. Somehow he couldn't seem to work; everything was so still. He even missed the bang-bang of his secretary's typewriter. After a moment he got up a bit stiffly and struggled into his own heavy coat. As he closed his desk the little red-inked message smiled up at him:

"Tomorrow," it said, "is Thanksgiving, and Thanksgiving is a holiday."

BACK in his own apartment the man threw off his coat and dropped wearily into a chair. He realized all at once that he was tired, dead tired, from the grind of Big Orders; tired from the routine of the office; tired from the loneliness of his home. He closed his eyes and tried to remember what kind of a holiday Thanksgiving had been, but somehow the memory refused to come back to him. It was peaceful to sit there with his eyes closed and the darkness creeping softly up about him.

PERHAPS it was an hour later—perhaps it was several hours later—that the Man heard the Voice.

"Billy-boy," it called softly, "Billy-boy, come here! There's the wood to chop."

The Man started guiltily. Twenty-five years ago folk had called him "Billy-boy." Stealthily his hands felt his knees. The softly calling voice sounded like grandmother's voice, and grandmother had always been troubled when there were holes in his stocking knees.

"Yes'm!" he responded. "An' after you chop the wood," continued the Voice—good naturedly scolding—"after you finish the wood you kin stone the raisins—there's a sight of 'em waitin'."

The Man felt a self-satisfied smile creep over his face; covertly he licked his lips. Twenty-five years ago there had been mighty few raisins left when he had finished stoning them. . . . But the soft voice interrupted.

"My, Billy-boy!" said the Voice. "You're all dressed up, ain't you? Don't look like you was comin' back to the farm. What was you plannin' to do?"

The Man came back to the realization of his years and experience. "Why," he answered, "I'm not going to celebrate Thanksgiving this year—I haven't for a good many years. I've a Big Order to get out of the way before I can take any holidays. I'm going to work tomorrow."

The soft Voice quivered—broke almost. "To think of it," mourned the Voice, "my grandson workin' on orders fer unfair money—on 'Thanksgivin' Day!'"

The Man had a strange desire to take the heartbreak out of the tremulous old voice. He felt willing to promise anything.

"Is there anything you'd like me to do?" he ventured.

A chuckle crept softly through the room and the Voice spoke happily:

"You're selfish, Billy-boy," said the Voice; "you always was ever sence you ate yer lil' brother's pie at dinner that last Thanksgiving Day. To think anybody'd have to ask what to do on Thanksgiving! Why, help some one! It ain't hard."

Quite suddenly the Man realized that he was wide awake, and that he was sitting bolt upright in his chair, and that the cold gray dawn of Thanksgiving Day was creeping through the window. He remembered that the grandmother had gone home many years ago with her jolly little voice and sweet little ways. And as he remembered the Thanksgivings when he had chopped wood for her, he smiled. It was all so long ago—and now . . .

Dimly, vaguely he looked through the gray mist of morning, and as he looked a picture swept radiantly into his mind. The picture of a long table with a white-haired old man at the end of it, a table with grandmother at the head and grandfather (that was the white-haired old man) carving. A table with father and mother and aunts and uncles smiling down along the side of it. At the picture the man caught his breath in something very like a sob.

"Help," he murmured to himself. "Help! O God, how can I help?" It was his first real prayer.

Answers to prayers sometimes come quickly, and God never lets real prayers go unanswered. As the Man stopped speaking a knock came at the door—a timid quivering knock. The Man rubbed his eyes and climbed sprawlingly to his feet.

As the door swung open a Little Girl stepped in—such a Little Girl that the gray light of the room almost swallowed her up. In her hand she held a slip of paper with a name scrawled on it.

"Is this you?" she asked.

The Man looked at the paper, and truly enough his name looked up at him from the dingy sheet.

"Yes, that's my name," he told the Little Girl kindly. "Did you want anything?"

The child looked at him with eyes that seemed unnaturally large in such a small, thin face. "My daddy," she told him, "said that maybe if you came with me you could help."

The Man started at the word, for it seemed like an echo of his own little prayer. Almost unconsciously he found himself reaching for his coat. "I'll come," he told the Little Girl as he closed the door carefully behind them. "Do you know your way?"

The Little Girl knew her way very well. Through narrow curving streets she led him, down alleyways and around sharp corners. She was not given to conversation, and after walking for a while in dull silence the man essayed a question.

"Have you lived here long?" he asked.

"Only since daddy stopped working," answered the child; "only since daddy hasn't had any money."

"Why," asked the Man uneasily after another period of silence, "why did your daddy stop working?"

The Little Girl drew herself up proudly. "My daddy," she told him, "had principles."

The remainder of the way they walked along soberly, speechlessly. The man was not used to talking with children, and the Little Girl did not try to talk to him. Only when she came to a dead stop in front of a dull tenement did she speak.

"Here's home," she told him.

With an unreal feeling the man walked up innumerable flights of stairs and through a narrow door that his small guide swung open. "Here's daddy," she announced.

Daddy was a tall, lean man, and looked taller and leaner because he was so very, very pale and sick. He was lying on a ragged couch, and his voice sounded feeble as he greeted them.

"Won't you come in?" he asked.

"There are no chairs, but—" the Man was standing in the doorway, his eyes on the emaciated face.

"Haven't I seen you somewhere?" he questioned.

"I used to work for you," answered the child's daddy, "before—"

"Before what?" questioned the Man.

"Before you began to take the Big Orders," murmured the man. "I couldn't do 'em—I wouldn't! An so you—fired me!"

The Little Girl turned toward the Man, and her round unchildlike eyes blazed with the unfairness of it all.

"You fired him!" she accused.

The Man stood in the doorway, a nameless feeling of guilt in his heart. The spirit of his grandfather who had carved at the long Thanksgiving table crept blindly over him. "What in I do?" he half groaned.

"We have nothing to eat!" the Little Girl told him—her accusing eyes all fixed on his face. But the man on the couch didn't speak. He had fainted.

ALL through the day they were by the Man, the Little Girl and a doctor who had been hurriedly sent for. All through the day they battled for a life—the Man in his shirtsleeves following the doctor's orders, the Little Girl running errands. All day long Death beat on the door of the tenement room with heavy fist, and all day long the three brave fighters slammed the door in his face. All day long during the intervals when the Man rested he found himself thinking: "I helped!" And when the first shadow of late afternoon crept over the city, the doctor packed up his medicine case, and the Little Girl slept an exhausted sleep, and the Man resigned his place to the bedside to a calm, blue-gowned trained nurse. And Death slunk away down the tenement hall, vanquished, with the coming of the Thanksgiving twilight.

Out on the street again the Man walked slowly, thoughtfully, with his head down. Perhaps in his mind he was forming the words of a message that was going to send to the sick man a message that would tell him and his principles to come back to work. In his reflective mood, the Man found himself in front of his office building. And then, suddenly, a maddening decree to destroy the Big Order came over him.

As he went through the door he heard a muffled sobbing, and there he saw the dim light, the Secretary with her head down on her desk.

"Why, Miss Whitney!" he exclaimed; "what are you doing here?"

The Secretary raised her tear-stained face to his gaze:

"Why," she choked, "why, you'd me to come—to work on the Big Order."

"There won't be any more Big Orders—like that," said the man gently. "Come, we'll celebrate Thanksgiving."

The Right Kind of Preparedness

By CHARLES EDWARD JEFFERSON, D.D., Pastor of Broadway Tabernacle, New York

JESUS CHRIST is the world's greatest teacher of preparedness. He knew that every today opens into a tomorrow, and he taught men the importance of being ready. Some of his most vivid parables have for their aim the writing of this great lesson on the heart. A vast amount of the tragedy of the world is due to the fact that men do not equip themselves to meet the things that are coming.

Nations, as well as individuals, must be vigilant and cultivate the forward look. They too must meet the demands of unknown tomorrows. They have their duties to perform. Woe to the nation which is not ready when the clock strikes. God has given to every nation a specific work to do. Crises come in the history of the world, and only the nation prepared, stands. Doors into new epochs open, and only the nations which are ready go in. Many a nation in the day of its visitation has not known the things which belonged to its peace. Nations have temptations and tribulations. They have rough roads to travel, and perils to face. Nations which do not watch, and which fail to do their appointed work, are broken to pieces like a potter's vessel.

The country is just now thinking and talking of national preparedness. But it is not spiritual preparedness which is in the popular mind. It is material—military, naval—bombs, swords, guns—submarine, dreadnought, aeroplane preparedness. It is assumed that security is obtained by preponderance in naval strength, that defenses, to be effective, must be made of concrete and steel, that a nation is safe if only its battleships are many, and its guns are long ranged and up to date.

It is well to remind ourselves that no nation is safe because of its military-naval equipment. That armor is insurance is an antiquated delusion. It is a superstition which it is hard to kill. The notion was popular in the pre-Christian world, and a Hebrew poet trapped on it in these words: "There is no king saved by the multitude of a host: a mighty man is not delivered by great strength. A horse is a vain thing for safety. The eye of the Lord is upon them that fear him upon them that hope in his mercy." Translated into the speech of our day, this means that nations are not saved by fleets and battalions. A battleship is a vain thing for safety. God Almighty is on the side of a nation which has a will obedient to his law, and a heart like his own. Today it is true as it was three thousand years ago, "Some trust in chariots and some in horses," and in a time like this we Christians should make frequent mention of the Lord our God, who has revealed his will and heart in Jesus Christ, and in his name assured us that it is his good pleasure that the gentes shall eventually possess the earth. Sometime, not today or tomorrow, but sometime, it will be universally conceded that the peace makers are the mighty men of history, and that they alone deserve to be called sons of God.

Europe is today weltering in a caldron of blood, because she was not prepared to keep the peace. She was prepared for war, and men perform the work for which they have been trained. For a generation, millions of young men of Europe have given some of the best years of their life to fighting sham battles on land and sea, and now they fight in earnest. The popular adage—in time of peace prepare for war—was accepted as a word of God, and now it turns out to be a word from hell. The war in Europe teaches many things, but nothing so vividly as the futility of armaments as a guarantee of peace. This lesson is written in the clouds across the sky, and in long lines of graves across the sands. All whom the god of this world has not blinded will see. The lesson comes to us in the cries of women, and in the sobs of little children. He that hath ears to hear will not fail to hear.

America, then, is to be the peacemaker of the world, she cannot afford to follow Europe's example. It has been demonstrated that the way of Europe leads to death. The way that leads to life is altogether different. No matter what the military preparedness may be, nations will fight so long as they load themselves with the weapons of battle. It was once supposed that war had been made impossible because of its cost, or because of its horrors. We now see that all such prophecies were mistaken. Out of the heart wars proceed, and not till the heart is changed will there be war no more. Military preparedness fills the heart with suspicions and hatreds and fears. Bombs and guns do not pre-empt the heart to love. The word for our days is not "To arms!" but "Repent!" Men must change their mind. They must change their attitude, their disposition, their program.

THIS is the one step for the Christian pulpit to insist on everywhere and always. The militarists are blind guides. Europe followed them and Europe is in a ditch. America will also be in a ditch if we listen to what the military and naval experts say. There is no safety for us, unless we have in us the mind that is in Christ Jesus, and that mind is a mind of sympathy and mercy and good will. Instead of adopting a program which will cause other nations to fear us, we ought to set ourselves to the Christian task of binding other nations to us. Friendship is the surest of all defenses. Nations which fear us will attack us when they can. Nations which love us will never lift a hand against us. If they are to love us, we must show ourselves lovable. We do not show ourselves lovable when we hammer our steel into instruments of blood, and by brandishing them say: "Come on if you dare!"

Our officials are all the time saying that we prepare only for defense, that we desire nothing but justice and peace. When, therefore, we proceed to increase our military and naval budgets, and to push our war preparations beyond anything known in our history, we clearly declare to all the world that some of our neighbors are unscrupulous and dangerous robbers who have neither conscience nor mercy, and that unless we arm to the teeth against them, they will, at the first opportunity, rob us of our possessions and stab us in the dark. Expressing so emphatically our suspicion of them, they become increasingly suspicious of us, and as they too desire nothing but justice and peace, they proceed to arm themselves still more completely for defense against us. The whole philosophy of militarism is false. The men who see everything through the bore of a gun and who assume, after the fashion of the cave-dweller, that a foreigner is an enemy, are the most dangerous men alive. The multitudes are caught by their sophistry and fallacies, but if the Christian religion is true, then He who sits in the heavens must laugh. He must hold them all in derision.

WHAT America most needs is that preparedness of spirit that will make it possible for her to do her duty at this crisis in the history of the world. It is for her to study the higher interests of nations, and to work out a plan of world organization which will render a recurrence of the present tragedy impossible. What has our government to present to the nations of Europe at the close of this war? What plan has she ready? What suggestion is she going to offer? What scheme of world organization has she formulated ready to present it, and back it up by her enormous influence before emperors and kings, councils and parliaments? The only thing done thus far is to appoint a committee of twenty-two experts to devise still deadlier instruments of slaughter. God forbid that our nation shall go into the council of nations after this war is over with nothing in her hands but a plan to increase the number of our ships and guns! Why not appoint a committee of twenty-two of our wisest and noblest to study ways of getting rid of the things which now make for war, and of devising machinery by which the spirit of good will may be generated and expressed and extended? Why not create a Secretary of Peace, and devote as many millions a year to the propaganda of peace as we now spend on our army and navy? Why do we not think of borrowing $500,000,000, not for the enrichment of the war traders, but for the solace and relief of bleeding and impoverished Europe? We do not think of these obvious and sensible things, because we have not the preparedness of heart which would render us sensitive to such high suggestions. We are yet carnal. Our lips mumble the phrases of Christ, but our hearts dwell in the camp of Caesar.

The only way, then, to create peace is to work on the temper of the heart. The old ideals must be cast down. A Christian is not a man who believes in folding his hands, trusting that somehow everything will turn out all right. Much less is he a man who lies down in the dust, allowing others to trample upon him. A peacemaker after the type of Jesus is the most aggressive and resolute and courageous of men. Non-resistance, in the Christian sense, does not mean non-resistance of evil men, and false ideas, and rotten institutions, and mischievous movements, for the Christian is baptized into the spirit which resists evil even unto death. Christ dared to die because he believed that love is mightier than hate, and that they who use the sword are doomed to perish by the sword. He struck men so hard with his tongue that their hands itched to crush him. He threw himself against their policies with such force that they had no rest until they crucified him. The church of God today is largely impotent in its war on militarism because it is not spiritually prepared. Christians, if they are to do the work of Christ, must put on the whole armor of God, and take their part in suffering hardship.

All informed Christian men believe in preparedness. Not one of them is skeptical in regard to the need of defense. They say in the present hour: "By all means let us prepare ourselves for tomorrow. Let us get ready to meet the dangers which lie ahead of us. They are real and they are many. Let us strengthen our defenses so that we shall not be overwhelmed. We know that a vast amount of hard work must be done, if the world is to be saved. We know that there are racial antipathies and national antagonisms and commercial rivalries, which will cause infinite mischief, unless we prepare ourselves to deal with them after the manner of Christ. We realize that human nature is inflammable, and that terrific explosions have occurred and may occur again, and for that reason we are eager that our government should throw itself into the work of preparing the world's mind and heart for the discarding of the old methods of bloodshed, and the adoption of a method which shall merit the approval of the Son of God."

THIS then is the supreme task of the church in the present world crisis, the cultivation of an international conscience and an international mind. We must form the habit of entertaining more kindly feelings toward all the nations of the earth, of thinking of all sorts and conditions and races of men as our brothers, of exercising greater restraint in our criticism of foreigners, of cultivating a wider sympathy, a more enduring patience, and a larger hope. We must cease to put America first. America is not first. Humanity is first. The things which we are to seek first of all are the things which promote the highest welfare of mankind. The interests which are most vital are not the interests of the United States, but the interests of the wide world. The honor which we must guard with greatest zeal is not the honor of our own country, but the honor of man. And the work to which we should bend all the energies of our souls is not the work of increasing our prestige as a naval power, or making nations afraid of us by the number of our guns, but the work of creating a friendlier feeling throughout the great family of nations, and building up in us a disposition like unto the disposition of Him who said: "I am among you as one who serves."

Our Editorial Forum

PRESIDENT
OTTO KOENIG

MANAGING EDITOR
GEO. H. SANDISON

SECRETARY
THEODORE WATERS

The President and the Bible

IT is on record that many of the world's leading statesmen have found their highest inspiration in the Bible. In times of great national crises, they have drawn upon God's Word for guidance and support. One of President Lincoln's biographers quotes the great President as searching at a trying moment for a dimly remembered Bible passage to express his thought, and crying out at last, "I have found it! 'A house divided against itself cannot stand.'"

Not every President has been so fortunate on Biblical research, however. Last August Colonel Roosevelt, in defending his attitude on preparedness, exhorted a passage in Ezekiel, which he quoted with the view of confounding the peace advocates. By a singular coincidence, President Wilson, in justifying his attitude on national defense, as expressed in his recent address before the Manhattan Club, wrote a letter to Seth Low of New York in which he quoted at length the identical portion from Ezekiel 33:2-6 which Roosevelt had used for a similar purpose. In the passages in question the President finds a situation described which, to his mind, fitly applies to our national situation at the present time. The nation's guardian is pictured as a watchman with a trumpet. When the sword is brought upon the land, the watchman blows his trumpet to warn the people of their danger. If they heed not the trumpet and fall by the sword, they themselves are to blame; but if they perish through the neglect of the watchman to blow the trumpet, their blood shall be required at the watchman's hand. "But he that taketh warning shall deliver his own soul." In the President's application of the passage, he is himself the watchman, and in blowing the trumpet (as he did in his recent speech in New York) he is arousing the people to a realization of their danger.

This is the President's answer to his critics, and in certain respects it is apt enough; yet on looking closely into the passages we fail to find the parallelism which he believes he has discovered. In the previous chapters the prophet has foreshadowed the fate of Ammon and Moab, of Philistia, Tyre, Sidon, Edom, Egypt and Assyria. They and their multitudes had "gone down to hell with their weapons of war" (chap. 32:27) because they had grasped at world power and dominion, and had forgotten God and mocked at his sanctuary. Now the prophet addresses his own countrymen, the Jews. Judgment has to come upon Israel for its sins. Ezekiel is himself the spiritual watchman (whose office he has described in chapter 3:17-21), and the warning he is divinely commissioned to give is that they must turn from their wickedness and thus deliver their soul; otherwise they will die in their sins.

If President Wilson had read a little further he would never have made the application of the Scriptures he did make, following the lead of Colonel Roosevelt, who likewise failed to comprehend it. Never a suggestion of arming for defense can be found in Ezekiel's language throughout this whole episode. It is preparedness against sin to which he urges the people. To forsake sin and turn to righteousness is the only way of safety.

In implying, as he does in his letter to Mr. Low, that the watchman in Ezekiel's description typifies the attitude of the nation's Executive today in regard to preparedness, the President may claim that the application of the spiritual illustration to material purposes is justifiable. This he would never have done had he read the rest of the chapter from which he quoted, which is wholly given up to an appeal to Israel to repent and turn to the Lord for forgiveness and safety. If they do this, the pledge is given that the people shall surely live and not die. It is emphasized three times. But all the watchman's entreaties failed. Sin and false security continued, and the climax is told in verse 21 in the words of the escaping messenger—"The city is smitten."

But neither in Ezekiel nor in any other book in the Bible can even the slenderest groundwork of defense for the militarist gospel of preparedness be found. Some may take the letter and ignore the spirit of the message, virtually distorting it to suit their argument, but the thing is too obvious to escape detection. We do not endorse the extreme view expressed a few days ago by an Episcopal pastor in the pulpit, that such a quotation, used with such intent, is almost sacrilege. We prefer to believe that it could only have been quoted in ignorance of the true purpose of the prophet, which was to urge Israel to follow the path of righteousness and peace.

A "Dark Age" is again overshadowing the world, an age in which the light of faith burns dimly. Force

A Personal Message

WHILE I have had the pleasure, during the year now closing, of writing many letters to individual readers of the Christian Herald, I always look forward with special interest to the time when I sit down to write to you, and to all the other members of our Family Circle, a personal message that applies equally to every one. On such occasions, I seem to see before me the kindly faces of a great gathering—all friends with whom I have held intimate relationship, and whose sympathy has meant more to me than I can ever hope to express.

We have had our share of troubles and worries; yet through the cloud, even in the darkest hour, there have been gleams of sunshine sticking through. Surely God has been good to us, and as we look backward over the year or more of this terrible world war, we must reverently acknowledge his providential care in keeping our own beloved land in peace. Let us confess his goodness, then, not only in keeping us out of the awful struggle, but in granting to us the grateful task of helping the distressed multitudes. I can think of nothing finer than the generous aid you are giving to the suffering people of all the nations. May the New Year bring back peace. And, please God, may the peace be a lasting one!

WE LOOK forward to the coming year in confidence and with pleasant anticipations. For months we have been planning many new and attractive features for our readers during 1916. And here let me say, by way of prelude, that our greatest desire is to have all of our old friends remain with us. We would not miss a single face from our Circle. There will be new-comers, of course; but we value our old friends, for their influence and companionship have been very dear to us.

You will be pleased to learn that our good friend, Dr. J. H. Jowett, who has won all hearts in a three years' acquaintanceship, recently sent us a letter in which he agrees not only to lead the "Meditations" in every issue during 1916, but also to write the first sermon of every month. Our staff of sermonic contributors for the coming year will include notable American Protestant divines of every denomination, a number of them new to you.

We are going to expand the work of the Prayer League. We are more firmly convinced than ever that the real place to find out how to help the world is the place of prayer, and we want to gather together a still greater company who will join us at the Master's feet, asking: "Lord, teach us to pray." We want to help preachers and church members to make the weekly prayer meetings a place of real power, where fogs are cleared up, burdens lifted, duties made clear and divine strength bestowed.

THE Christian Herald wants to help in three definite ways. It wants to help all its readers to come nearer to the personal Christ—to know him better, to love him more ardently, to be more fully surrendered to his direction, to share more richly in the soul-gladdening he has promised.

Next, the Christian Herald wants to state frankly and simply what it believes to be Christ's will for the world. It seeks to get the most spiritual, the most profound, the most inspired, the most humanly sympathetic preachers and teachers in the world all working together to lead people to the Truth.

Lastly, we want to help in definite, constructive ways in the upbuilding of the church and the Christianizing of the world. The Christian Herald desires not only to convey the bounty of its readers to the hungry and needy, but to promote positive, definite crusades for righteousness and brotherhood. We mean to be desperately in earnest; and we covet the help of every other earnest soul.

IN conclusion, let me say that we are depending upon having all of you with us during the coming year. We want your cooperation in making it the banner year for your favorite journal. You can help materially by sending in your renewal promptly, as soon as you read the announcements. We have a vision of a still vaster audience for the Christian Herald. Will you not help us to make it a glorious reality in the coming year?

Cordially your friend,

GEO. H. SANDISON.

rules the nations and the whole earth seems given over to destruction and slaughter. Civilization shakes to its foundations. In fifteen months fifteen millions of men have been slain or disabled. Twelve millions are in the field, killing and maiming, and all the powers of earth and air and sea are contributing to the general destruction. Temples, churches, cathedrals, libraries, the religious and artistic accumulations of many centuries, are in ruins. Science is degraded to serve the awful trade of universal slaughter. Serfdom is restored in the form of compulsory military service. Governments have become despotic in their waste of human life in the masses. Kill! Kill! Kill! It is the Dark Ages with us again.

This is the inevitable outcome of the great armaments and of the general conditions of preparation which have been going on increasingly for many years. This preparedness made of Europe a dolly magazine, which needed only the spark to set it aflame. Once kindled, the conflagration quickly enveloped Europe, Asia and Africa. Yet America, unprepared, has kept out of the destruction.

And now, the first step has been taken which may result in involving us in the world's strife. After successfully maintaining our attitude of "benevolent neutrality" for over a year, we have reached the point where, in the President's judgment, naval and military preparedness is desirable. There are others who take the same view. There are those who are interested in the trade of war, and to whom it will bring no pang or regret to see this republic embroiled in the strife.

Yet the overwhelming majority of our citizens, looking at the experience of armed Europe, cannot be convinced that arming against war is in reality arming against peace. They know that the heart of this nation desires peace, and to place the country on a war footing is to invite, not peace, but war.

"The first and paramount duty," writes a veteran observer, U. S. Senator Albert B. Cummings of Iowa, in a recent article in the Review of Reviews, "to make all things ready for an advance in the cause of International Peace. The instant the war in Europe ends, an opportunity will come to broaden the scope of arbitration, to increase the efficiency of mediation and to secure the high advantage of reflection and delay. . . . When the war closes, we shall have the best chance we ever had to civilize the law of the canon and to widen the rights of neutral nations in commerce. We ought to go forward upon the hypothesis that peace, not war, is the natural condition of mankind."

It is an excellent thing to know that those at the head of our government are given to searching the Scriptures. But such searching will be vain, unless guided by that wisdom which enlightens the seer and gives apprehension of the spiritual truths conveyed. Unless we have such enlightenment, we are warned that "the letter killeth but the spirit giveth life." In the case quoted, there was absolutely no justification for applying the language of Ezekiel in any sense other than that intended by the prophet.

The preparedness which Ezekiel urged was preparedness that is based not upon great armies but on divine peace and acceptance, granted through sincere repentance of sin and public recognition of the divine supreme sovereignty in national affairs. Such a public expression by our President and Senate took place in 1863—an eventful year in American history—when the President's proclamation invoked the gracious favor of Almighty God, and the consideration of judgment of mankind. We need today the same guidance and approval, but not for any scheme to militarize the nation, or to help us in organizing a one-billion dollar army and navy, fit to cope with the states that are bankrupting Europe.

But the President has said, "the country is threatened from any quarter," and "we have no army among us." What has influenced his sudden change to the side of the militarists and alarmists? He has repeatedly spoken on various occasions brave words concerning the high mission of our country among the nations. Have our national ideals, the love of humanity and the desire to lead in peace, been abandoned? Fleets and armies cannot be created and trained in a few months. When the war is over, the exhausted nations are looking forward hopefully to reduction of armaments and a long and lasting peace, it would afford us immeasurable but unavailing regret to find that we had embarked upon a course that was not only wholly unnecessary, but out of harmony with the newly awakened spirit of the age.

May divine wisdom guide our government to a right decision and a true appreciation of our duty and our opportunities.

The Bible and Newspaper

CONDUCTED BY
FERDINAND C. IGLEHART, D.D.

Business Increase in This Country

THE cause of general gratitude at the increase in business prosperity which is shown throughout the country. From reports received from the twelve Federal Reserve Districts given out in Washington in November, we get these facts. There is considerable advance in commercial activities in Boston. Reports from the different lines are not only cheerful, but optimistic. The cotton mills are busy, and the shoe industry shows marked improvement. New York industrial activities increased, wholesale and retail trade expanded, and collections improved. Philadelphia reports great improvement, increased sales by department stores, rail clothing, dry goods, grocery and other concerns dealing directly with the people. In Cleveland unprecedented conditions in the steel trade continue to be the big factors in influencing all business throughout that district. Richmond reports much improvement. Cotton has been moving freely, permitting general liquidation. The Atlanta district has improvement along the line. The farmers are selling their cotton and paying their debts. A banker of Chicago gives this description of the business situation there: "Affairs are seemingly gradually going in strength from day to day. There is giving some evidence of being on the increase, and a noticeable spirit of returning and increasing activity appears abroad." St. Louis reports continued improvement, especially in the jobbing trade, within the past thirty days. The rains for most of a month dispensed the ardor of the grain-moving business of Minneapolis, but the flour mills are furnishing an unusually large output. Kansas City reports no change in business conditions; Dallas shows an improvement. San Francisco reports large crops with little or no profit on some products, but a fair return all around to capital and labor. While not enthusiastic is not pessimistic as to the situation. The widespread prosperity of our land and the peace which it enjoys call to mind the words used by the Psalmist with reference to God's relation to his chosen people: "He hath not dealt so with any nation." (Ps. 147: 20.)

Devices for Fooling Fish

THE fishing season which is just over has been a good one, and the ministers, lawyers, doctors, teachers, business men, artisans and others are busy thinking and talking about the good catches and fine fun they have had. Art is very busy in making devices to fool the fish. Baits of wood, metal and rubber are used as a substitute for the original live creature. The flies used by the sportsmen have looked something like real flies. The trolling spoon looks something like the real thing it pretends to resemble. But the metal minnows, the rubber frogs, the grammites, mice, grasshoppers, crickets, grub-worms, etc., are such poor counterfeits that the fish are not fooled by them so often as the credulous anglers believe. The fact is, live bait is by far the best bait, and if the fishermen from the various parts of the country could send in their testimony, it would be that the largest catches in numbers, and the biggest in size, were those taken by the live thing on the end of the line. Honesty is the best policy with the angler. Let him offer the fish the real live bait that he likes best if it would get him. But the fish, if he could speak, might say: "If man could be entirely honest with me he would not under the pretense of offering me good fresh food conceal a metal barb to hook and hang me." Men are putting out every possible kind of artificial bait with which to catch the human fish in the river of life, and many stupid ones take the bait and are caught. A larger number of persons in angling for the most valued prizes use real live bait instead of artificial imitations, and most people are not deceived by devices, but are able to tell the coin from the counterfeit, the real bait from the imitation, the live from the dead thing in human plans and morals. There is nothing so disappointing or disastrous as the offering of the spurious instead of the gen-at the British, Russian and Japanese legations and informed the ministers that the Chinese officials would be able to maintain tranquillity in the event of the reestablishment of the monarchy. Tsao Lulin told them that the matter had been put in the hands of the people, and that it was too late to listen to a suggestion of a postponement. The Council of State has written some "suggestions" to President Yuan Shi Kai about the constitution that was to be adopted giving rights to all, about the importance of the form of government, and requesting him to accelerate the convocation of the National Convention within this year, or devise other means dollar bill. The woman said she picked up the bill in front of the Columbia University Library, that she saw a truck driver and a woman picking up bills just before she found the largest one. We see in this incident the value of judicious advertising, and the honesty of the finder of the bill. How a woman's money does get away from her! Fast enough for the actual necessities, faster, even like the wind, for the luxuries of life! Money gets away from the average person with the swiftness of the wind. "For riches certainly make themselves wings; they fly away as an eagle toward heaven." (Prov. 23: 5.)

Captain's 399th Sea Voyage

THE other day when Captain Anton G. Thomsen brought the Scandinavian-American line steamship Frederick III into New York harbor he completed his 399th trip across the North Atlantic. All of these trips have been made since 1881, when he was first made a master. Before that time he had served his apprenticeship, and had crossed many times. He has been decorated as a Knight of Danneborg and Knight of Dannerysmand by the king of Denmark, and also as a Knight of the Vasa, having been decorated by the king of Sweden for rescuing the crew and passengers of a Swedish steamship. What health of body, strength of intellect and integrity to make such a long record of sea service possible, and what worth and heroism to have merited his decorations! They voice this sentiment: "Well done, thou good and faithful servant." (Matt. 25: 21.)

Belts Help Save Boy

THREE men of Passaic, N. J., not one of whom could swim, rescued Abraham Pink, three years old, from drowning the other day. The boy fell into the Passaic River. The screams of the lad being swept by a swift current into midstream and those of his playmates brought several men and women to the scene. John Kanse removed his belt and bade two other men to do the same. The belts were used as connecting links in a human chain. Kanse waded out into the swift stream up to his neck, the others following, and grabbed the drowning lad, at the same time holding on to his belt. The rescuer forming the link nearest shore pulled all safely out of the water. How valuable is life! How beautiful to save one, and how wise to make a human chain to save this child! This is the type of the salvation of a soul, the greatest thing in the world. "Let him know, that he which converteth the sinner from the error of his way shall save a soul from death, and shall hide a multitude of sins." (James 5: 20.)

Automobiles in Yellowstone Park

ON August 1 Secretary of the Interior Lane opened the Yellowstone Park to automobiles for the first time. For seventeen years all other classes of tourists were admitted but not till a few months ago was a motor car permitted to enter. Since August 1, 958 cars carrying 3,513 persons toured the reservations. The total number of tourists who entered was about 28,500. The normal touring season for the Park is from June to September. They had no motor cars in olden times. The cart drawn by the ox or horse was the usual medium. Rich people and kings had chariots elaborately decorated and beautiful. There is this reference to a journey in a chariot: "And Joseph made ready his chariot and went up to meet Israel." (Gen. 46: 29.)

Petrified Tree Becomes Bridge

ONE of the principal points of interest in the petrified forest located a few miles from Flagstaff, Ariz., is the petrified tree which spans a wide ravine and which now serves as a regular crossing-place. During the course of a heavy storm the tree was blown across this ravine. Strange to say, the tree was not broken by the fall, and in order that its preservation in its present capacity of a bridge might be assured, the government has constructed beneath it two strong concrete piers, one on either side of it. The tree is said to be about three and a half feet in thickness and about one hundred and twenty-five feet long. It gives promise of doing service for years to come. It seems almost a miracle for wood to turn to stone by the action of the years. What a feeling of wonder comes over a child at being told that a strong object was once wood or flesh turned to stone! This wonder is not more strange than the miracle of the coal fields of the world today, which are vegetable growths turned to stone. Fossilized forests are uncovered near some coal mines, notably the Park Field Colliery near Wolverhampton, England, discovered in 1844. We have fossilized forests in this country which are examples of more recent geological periods. These are found in Yellowstone Park and in Arizona, to which belonged the tree that became a bridge. A heart of flesh turning to stone has been a symbol in all literature of soft, tender affections which by the chemistry of selfishness and sin had become hard as stone. Every nation has some expression for "hardheartedness." The prophet thus makes mention of this symbol: "Yea, they made their hearts as an adamant stone, lest they should hear the law, and the words which the Lord of hosts hath sent in his spirit by the former prophets." (Zech. 7: 12.)

mine in fishing for men. Only one of the twelve was a counterfeit, the rest were true coin. It is a fortunate thing for the church and the world that most believers are genuine Christians, and not hypocrites. The true children of nature, the genuine fishermen, were those whom Christ thus addressed: "Come ye after me, and I will make you to become fishers of men." (Mark 1: 17.)

Nations Advise China's Action

THERE is the strange spectacle of England, Russia, and Japan officially appealing to China asking her not to agitate the question of giving up the republican form of government and returning to a monarchy at this time. France a few days later joined in the same request. They are afraid that such a contest would be likely to cause a dangerous national unrest. The Chinese Government rejected the proposals of these nations to postpone the decision of the form of government to be adopted. The decision of the government was made known by Tsao Lulin, vice-minister of foreign affairs. He called of finding the will of the people and fundamentally solve the problem and settle the unrest. The monarchists claim there will be more trouble in retaining the present form of government. The republicans, on the other hand, charge treachery and usurpation on the part of the present administration, and that a return to a monarchy under the circumstances would strike a terrible blow at the life of the nation. They are of a temper to take up these words: "They have taken crafty counsel against thy people. They have said, Come, and let us cut them off from being a nation." (Ps. 83: 3, 4.)

Woman's Money Took Wings

AS a woman was walking up Riverside Drive in New York the fierce wind blowing swept her pocketbook from her hand and sent the seventy dollars in bills whirling through One Hundred and Sixteenth Street. Her search for the money was in vain. She put an advertisement in one of the dailies and to her surprise a woman seeing the notice in the paper returned her a twenty

The Coming Bible Picture Study Contest

The Pairing of Pleasure With Profit

BEGINNING early in December the Christian Herald will inaugurate a course of Bible study of an entirely unique order, which, we feel confident, will impel more people, young and old, willingly to devote concentrated study to the Bible for a given period of time, than any other plan yet introduced.

Our method will be welcomed not only by all who have the teaching of the Book of books at heart, but also by those persons who may never before have given its study serious thought. In fact, we venture to prophesy that before this course is over, a veritable legion of persons will find their minds stored with hundreds of verses of the Bible, which they had not before been able to remember.

The Plan Is Simple

THE working of the Bible Picture Study Competition is simplicity itself. As this is the age of pictures, the era of graphic representation, and recognizing that a photograph or a drawing or an illustration clings longer in the memory than a mere group of words, we have undertaken to print a series of 60 attractive pictures: portraying memorable characters, events and thoughts of Bible history and precept, and capable of being described by some verse from the Bible.

This week's picture is introductory. When we begin to publish the actual contest pictures, week by week, we shall ask our readers to describe each picture by means of a Bible verse, or to suggest more than one "answer" if such seem applicable.

At first, this might seem like a stupendous task, for the reason that there are over thirty thousand verses in the Bible and, if a picture were not immediately recognized as referring to some famous happening, it might take weeks of research for a person not intimately familiar with all of the Bible to determine upon a verse which would describe the particular picture. Therefore, to overcome this difficulty and give the mass of readers an equal opportunity, the Christian Herald has selected a list of verses from the Bible to be the standard and to represent a uniform limit of choice.

The selected list of verses (about two thousand) for your convenience, is the collection in the Christian Herald's book known as "Gems from the Bible." On the other hand, whoever wishes may find these verses in his or her own Bible.

YOU will probably not need to look very far. No doubt, an answer is right on the tip of your tongue. The picture recalls to your mind one of the first stories read to you from the Bible. You know what the subject is, and you believe that after a moment's turning of the leaves of your Bible, you will find a verse to describe the picture most fittingly.

Do not send in your answer for the picture shown above. The illustration is intended as a specimen of the series of 60 to come. Make yourself familiar with our plan. Test your Bible knowledge with the present picture. The practice will help you. Watch for next week's picture.

The Bible Picture Study consists of pictures for which you are to supply suitable Bible verses; and for the best answers we shall award four hundred and sixteen generous rewards—very generous rewards, well worth striving for, although we warrant that your

Wanted: The Best Texts for Pictures

INASMUCH as the Christian Herald will print 60 pictures in all, and you are to select fitting Bible verses for these pictures out of a total of approximately two thousand such verses—in accordance with the convenient list decided upon—it may be, with a great many people earnestly searching for appropriate texts to match the pictures, that two or more different verses will be found (even by the same person) which seem applicable to one picture.

Such a possibility is reasonable and is, in fact, a part of the plan. The editor may indeed have instructed the artist to draw the scene with more or less reference to a certain verse—but, once the drawing is done, there are innumerable ways in which different persons would describe this same picture, using different words to express the same thought.

A Fair Competition

THE whole question is left to the readers. Let them decide. The result will be manifested in the sets of answers which are submitted in the contest.

The Christian Herald will do its part by allowing every contestant to supply one or more different solutions (Bible verses), up to five, for each picture.

Furthermore, the final award of merit between the excellence of one participant's answers over those of another, will be eminently fair in accordance with the principle just explained. The Christian Herald will appoint a committee of judges, who will pass upon the different answers submitted for each picture and approve those which are most appropriate to the particular picture. The judges will be well-known men, and they will act impartially. They will have no knowledge of what the artist had in mind originally, but will pick out the best Bible verses for the pictures among the verses submitted. If two or more verses are found equally superior in applicability, each one of such verses will be recognized.

Then the committee will nominate the persons whose sets of answers achieved the highest standing, for the receipt of the rewards offered by the Christian Herald. There will be over four hundred such rewards, aggregating a total of two thousand five hundred dollars in gold, to be used by the recipient in any way each may wish.

Full details of this very attractive Bible Picture Study contest will be published in following issues.

Can You Find a Bible Verse to Describe this Picture?

participation in the fascinating and fruitful competition will of itself fill you with delight.

Whoever wishes, may at once reserve a copy of the book, "Gems from the Bible," to be delivered as soon as the first edition is off the press, and with it a convenient "Reply Book" into which the answers for the pictures may be entered conveniently, by sending in to a yearly subscription (may be renewal) to the Christian Herald for the sum of $2.00. Or "Gems from the Bible," with "Reply Book," will be given free in return for your sending in one yearly subscription (for some friend or neighbor) to the Christian Herald, for the sum of $2.00. The acceptance of this offer is not compulsory for participation in the study contest. "Gems from the Bible" contains all the verses applicable to the 60 pictures. Succeeding numbers of the Christian Herald will give further information.

Amarilly of Clothes-Line Alley

By BELLE K. MANIATES

Copyright, 1915, by Little, Brown & Co. All rights reserved.

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

AMARILLY made her bow to Christian Herald readers from the threshold of the Barlow "Theater," where she mopped floors and dreamed dreams. They saw her begin a struggle for the education necessary to the career of her dreams, and they went with her to St. Mark's, to the class whose teacher wore real hair and wasn't made up. Through this teacher, Colette King, Amarilly's mother became the laundress of St. Mark's and Amarilly met the rector, Rev. (St.) John Meredith, who invited her to attend morning service and who showed something more than a pastor's interest in Colette. Then scarlet fever quarantined the Jenkinsons and there came a morning when Amarilly had to forage for breakfast. The family fund once more got a modest start, which was accelerated by the mundane career of the minister's surplice, through which Amarilly and her thoroughness entered the world of art and the studio of Derry Phillips. Lunch with the artist preceded a permanent engagement as maid to begin in the fall. Meantime the boarder fell in love and the surplice continued its career through police court and pawnshop to the episcopal residence; but with the end of summer, and the return of Colette, it became evident that the garment had failed to perform a very important service.

CHAPTER XV

AS SOON as Amarilly had been deposited at her door, Colette tore a leaf from the tablet reposing in its silver case, hastily wrote a few lines, and then ran her brougham at full speed back to St. Mark's. A chorister was just coming out.

"Walter!" she called.

The lad came down to the curb.

"Will you please take this to Mr. Meredith? He is probably in the Sunday-school now."

"Sure. Will you wait for an answer, Miss King?"

"No, thank you, Walter."

She rode home and waited anxiously for the personal answer to her note, which came with most unclerical alacrity.

"Colette," he said, his voice tense, "if you knew what your little note meant! Did—"

"Wait until I explain, John. I must tell you about the surplice."

She repeated Amarilly's account of the peregrinations of the robe.

"Well?" he asked bewildered, "I don't see what that has to do with—"

"Everything. There was something of mine—" she turned a deep crimson—"in the pocket of that surplice."

"Yours! Why, how did it get there, Colette? Was it—"

"I am not going to tell you—not until I have it back. Oh, I could die of shame when I think who may have found it. You must get it."

"Colette," he answered gravely, "the surplice must have passed through many hands, but if it is possible to trace this—article, I will do so. Still, how can I make inquiries unless I know what it is?"

"You can ask them, each and all, if they found anything in the pocket," she replied. "And you must tell them you left it there."

"And you won't trust me, Colette? Not after my long unhappy summer?"

And won't you give me an answer now to the note I wrote you last spring?"

"No; I won't tell you anything! Not until you find that."

"Be reasonable, Colette."

His choice of an adjective was most unfortunate for his cause. It was the word of words that Colette detested; doubtless because she had been so often entreated to cultivate that quality.

"I will not," she answered, "if to tell you is being reasonable. I must have it back. I think no one will really know to whom it belongs, though they may guess. You must assume the ownership."

"I certainly shall, if it can be found," he assured her.

Seeing the utter futility of changing her mood, he took his departure; perhaps a little wiser if not quite so sad as he had been before he saw her. The next morning he called upon Amarilly, whom he found alone with Iry.

"I am very sorry to learn that you had such a hard summer," he said kindly, "and I regret that I didn't know more about your affairs before I left the city; but I was too absorbed, I fear, in my own troubles."

"How did you hear about us?" she asked curiously.

"From Miss King."

"Oh!" said Amarilly happily, imagining that their trouble must have been patched up. Then another thought occurred to her which gave her a little heart palpitation. With intense anxiety depicted on her lineaments she asked tremulously: "Did she tell you about the surplice?"

"Amarilly," and the tone was so assuring that the little wrinkles of anxiety vanished, "when I gave you a surprise, I gave it to you unconditionally, and I am very glad that you put it to profit. But you know, as Miss King told you, that there was something of value—of importance—in that pool; something that must be found. Your happiness depends entirely upon its recovery. Now, she tells me that I can give me the names and addresses of all the people through whose hands it passed."

"Sure thing!" she replied with businesslike alacrity. "You see the Boarder has been larnin' me bookkeepin', and I keep all our accounts now in a big book the grocer give me."

She produced a large, ledger-like book and laid it on the table for his inspection. He examined her system of bookkeeping with interest. Under the head of "Clothes" which she explained to him meant "brung in," was "Washins," "Boards," "Flamingus," "Milt," "Bobby," "Burt." Below each of these subheads were dates and accounts. The page opposite, headed "Dr.," she translated "means paid out."

She turned a few leaves, and in the letters he read the word "Surplus."

"This bein' a sort of extra account," the Boarder said to run it as a spec and keep it seprut. If you'll set down I'll read offen to you whar it has wen."

She began to read laboriously a slowly from the book, adding explanatory notes in glib tones.

Continued on page 1197

War's Magic in the Corn Fields

by
Margaret E. Sangster, Jr.

WAR'S magic in the corn field,
Amid the glowing grain;
War's magic where the pumpkins
Will never grow again.
For men have struggled, fighting,
Across the sunlit way;
Where blood was sown, and tear drops,
Grim harvests grow today.

DULL silence in the corn field,
Where gleaming gold and green
Give place to scarlet drippings,
And guns with steely sheen
For men have fought, and gasping,
Have tried, like beasts, to slay—
Where shrieks were sown, and moanings,
Grim harvests grow today.

A SIGHING in the corn field. . . .
Among the swaying stalks,
Among the guns and cannon,
Perhaps some spirit walks.
For men have gone, unburied,
To meet their Judgment day;
Where bones were left to whiten,
Grim harvests grow today.

BLACK magic in the corn field—
Each sheaf turned to a gun,
Each pumpkin to a missile,
Blue-gleaming in the sun.
For men, a million brothers,
Have, dying, tried to pray;
Where souls have passed, in anguish,
Grim harvests grow today.

Progressive Benevolence: By ISABEL GORDON CURTIS

*Text—There was a man, though some did count him mad,
The more he gave away, the more he had.—John Bunyan.*

RECENTLY a kinless man died in a little Western town, leaving a fortune and a strange will. He did not turn over his property to a hospital, church, school or any of the hundred and one charities which stand in line waiting for aid. His well-invested millions were provided merely to go on helping individuals generation after generation. To each trustee of the big fund was left the task of choosing as his successor a man or woman whom he considered capable of such confidence. It did not require wealth to be a trustee. Indeed, some of the people to whom he committed the trust were poor, several worked in factories, one was a farmer, another a country doctor, a large number were teachers in cities, towns and villages. Each one was brought close by his work to poverty-stricken, toiling, discouraged humanity. When one of these trustees found a man, woman or child who needed a boost over a bit of hard road, if sickness or death came into a household and there was nothing to meet it, if a boy or girl showed pluck and energy as well as talent, each case was turned over to "The Helping Hand." Afterward came aid, with no string attached to it, except that when times grew easier or the money began to produce an income, the loan should be paid back. No interest was required, and the return of the money depended wholly upon individual circumstances. The little town where the old man had lived listened in astonishment to the story of his wealth. It had dreamed of tens of thousands, of millions it had never reckoned. The confession of how his money had accumulated made them think that he—like the man in the Pilgrim's Progress—was mad.

"Being a single man," ran the naïve explanation, "and having no one dependent on me, I determined on reaching fifty to retire from business, leaving the niche I had occupied open for some younger man, then devote myself to a life of pleasure. First I calculated what amount of money I should require to live upon until I was eighty. This sum I set aside, the rest I put into a fund which I called 'The Helping Hand.' I did not invite men or women to seek charity, because that tends toward moral deterioration, so to fifty judicious, kindly friends, who are scattered about the continent, I unfolded my scheme. I asked them to tell me of any person who was bravely facing hardship, then I investigated each case. Generally I wrote to them, sometimes I had them come to see me.

"Any human being with keen vision can distinguish the man who is worthy and honest from a fraud. In some cases I gave only a few dollars, which was all that was needed, with it I sent a letter of good cheer and a pointing hand to the road which might lead to success. Weightier cases came before my consideration. There was a woman in one of the Washington departments who had worked for thirty years at a mere living salary. She grew ill and the doctors said nothing but an operation would put her on her feet. She could not afford it, her pride rebelled at the clinic. She worked on, suffering with the knowledge that unless she took a physician's advice, death stared her in the face not many years hence. Five hundred dollars gave her back health and courage. Today she has returned more than half the sum loaned to her. Sometimes a thousand dollars has been required in such a case.

"The fund grew so prosperous that I had to take more people into my confidence. When a panic came and business houses toppled to right and to left of us, the fund investments thrived excellently. I had many a day of pleasure over the letters I received and those I wrote, they won for me friendships all over the country, among men, women and children, who knew me merely as 'The Helping Hand.' Into many a human heart I have had a strange or a touching insight and the joy of it cannot be measured by words. When my fingers drop pulseless, I desire 'The Helping Hand' to go on, giving away what money is required, or writing words of cheer, or lifting the hopeless to their feet, because the world, alas, will never grow empty of sadness, sickness and discouragement."

Overland

TRADE MARK REG.

HERE is another Overland model. A brand new car at a brand new price. Many people prefer a car that is smaller, lighter and more economical to run but with the advantages of the larger and higher priced cars.

Model 75 is a comfortable, family car with virtually all the advantages of the very large cars at a price which is well within your reach.

The price is only $615!

It has a powerful motor; electric starting and lighting system; high tension magneto ignition; 104 inch wheel-base; cantilever springs; four-inch tires; demountable rims; streamline body design.

This season our factory capacity has been increased to 600 cars a day.

This, in itself, explains our ability to give so much car for so little money.

This newest Overland is a beauty.

The body is the latest full streamline design with a one-piece cowl.

It is handsomely finished in solid black with bright nickel and polished aluminum fittings.

Five adults can ride comfortably.

While the car is roomy, it is light in weight, 2160 pounds.

It has demountable rims with one extra.

The tires are four inch all around because we believe in the advantage of large tires.

They insure greater mileage and comfort than can be obtained from the smaller size used on other cars of similar specifications.

The motor is four-cylinder, long stroke bloc type, having a $3\frac{1}{8}$ inch bore and 5-inch stroke. Horsepower is 20-25. It is of the most modern design.

It has high tension magneto ignition. This is the kind used on the most expensive cars.

The electric starting and lighting system is one of the most efficient on the market. It is of the two-unit type.

$

6

Roals

With
and

Model 75 - f.o.b. Toledo

Overland

TRADE MARK REG.

75

Electric Starter
Electric Lights

The large electric headlights have dimmers.

This car is very easy to handle. It responds quickly. Anyone in the family can drive it.

The electric switches are conveniently located on the steering column. This is the same arrangement used on the highest priced cars.

It has the easy working Overland clutch which any women can operate. The pedals are adjustable for reach. The steering wheel is large and turns easily.

The brakes are large and powerful.

The rear springs are the famous cantilever type. These are probably the easiest riding and most shock absorbing springs ever designed. With these springs riding comfort is insured.

The seats are roomy and comfortable for the soft cushions are built over deep coiled springs.

It has a mohair one-man top.

In short, there is everything that makes this car up-to-date and comparable with many cars costing considerably more money.

You will be delighted when you see it. And when you ride in it you'll know instantly that this is your ideal of a modern automobile at your idea of a moderate price.

Other Overland models are—Model 83 five passenger touring car $750; the famous Overland Six seven passenger touring car $1145. All prices being f. o. b. Toledo.

See the Overland dealer in your town.

Specifications of Model 75

Pure streamline body five-passenger touring car.
Finished in black with nickel and polished aluminum fittings.
Wheelbase, 104 inches
High-tension magneto ignition 20-25 horsepower motor;
cylinders cast en bloc
Electric starting and lighting
Headlight dimmers
Electric switches on steering column

31 x 4 inch tires
Non-skids on rear
Left hand drive; center control
Floating type rear axle
Cantilever springs on rear
Built-in, rain-vision, ventilating type windshield
One-man top
Magnetic speedometer
Electric horn
Full set of tools

Catalogue on request. Please address Dept. 614.

The Willys-Overland Company
Toledo, Ohio

Canadian Price, Model 75, $850 f. o. b. Hamilton
The Willys-Overland of Canada, Limited, Hamilton, Ont.
Also Manufacturers of the Famous Willys-Knight Automobile
"Made in U. S. A."

For Christmas Give a Set of "Wear-Ever" Aluminum Utensils

Three times each day, year after year, "Wear-Ever" utensils make pleasant the work of the house-wife—they are so light to handle—so easy to keep clean.

Aluminum Utensils Are NOT
"All the Same"

"Wear-Ever" utensils are stamped from thick, hard, sheet aluminum. Again and again the sheet is passed through huge rolling mills and pounded by heavy stamping machines. This enormous pressure makes the metal in "Wear-Ever" utensils hard—dense—smooth. Their wonderful durability eliminates the necessity of constantly buying new cooking utensils.

Look for the "Wear-Ever" trade-mark on every utensil. If not there, it is not "Wear-Ever." Refuse substitutes.

Replace utensils that wear out with utensils that "Wear-Ever"

See for yourself why so many women prefer "Wear-Ever" utensils—send 25c (stamps or coin) and we'll send you post-paid a 1-qt. "Wear-Ever" Stewpan. (Offer good only until Dec. 20, 1916.) Ask your dealer to show you Sets of "Wear-Ever" utensils. If he cannot, write us.

The Aluminum Cooking Utensil Co.,
Dept. 34, New Kensington, Pa., or (if you live in Canada) Northern Aluminum Co., Ltd., Toronto, Ont.
Send prepaid, 1-qt. "Wear-Ever" Stewpan. Enclosed as 25c in stamps or in money refunded if not satisfied. Offer good only until December 20, 1916.
Name
Address

Paint is insurance against loss through deterioration or decay.

Zinc

lowers the cost of paint insurance by lengthening the life of the protection without increasing the cost.

"Your Move" is ours for the asking

The New Jersey Zinc Company
Room 404, 55 Wall Street, New York
For big contract jobs consult our Research Bureau

"War News"

By MARIETTA HOLLEY
(JOSIAH ALLEN'S WIFE)

EBen and Sally Slinker are good neighbors, though he is pretty high-headed, caused I think by his havin' to make up Sally's mind as well as his own. He has always made up her mind since they wuz married. It hain't a very hefty job, but it makes it onhandy: when he hain't there she wants to use her mind some.

I went over there to borry her sleeve pattern for the day, and Eben wuz readin' war news. He called it "glorious" and made me listen to some on it. It wuz how a party of soldiers surrounded the enemy, some men who had gone home to visit their wives and children, and put 'em all to death by the sword. It said the little rivulet that run through the village run red with their blood.

I couldn't feel as Eben did, I thought of that pretty little streamlet that these men and wimmen had most likely waded in as children, wandered by under the summer moon as lovers, led their children by its green banks, and now runnin' red with their blood, all cut down root and branch, for so the paper stated:

"They didn't leave any of the viper brood to hatch trouble for their gallant conquerors in the future. And in all this bloody affray not one of the victors wuz lost."

Sez Eben, "What courage, what bravery! noble warriors! how I would love to take 'em by the hand."

"Yes," sez Sally, "if I wuzn't a wife and mother how I would love to be a glorious soldier myself."

And Tommy, their only child, sez, "I hain't a wife and mother, am I, pa? I can be a brave soldier and fight, can't I?"

His pa and ma looked proudly upon him and patted his white head approvingly, and called him "their brave boy," but I sez:

"I think it is jest a hundred times as wicked to murder a hundred men out doors as it is to murder one man inside, and I think it is strange that the whole-sale murderers are rewarded with glory and the one-man killer dragged off and executed."

"But," sez Eben, "wars caused by national quarrels are fur different."

But I sez, "A man generally quarrels with his victim before he kills him."

"Tain't ofen done at love feasts and prayer meetin's."

Sez Eben, "A war agreed upon and planned hain't murder; it's warfare."

But I sez, "If the one-man killer plans a murder, the quicker he is condemned."

But Eben sez blandly, that my ideas wuz all wrong and his wuz all right, and Polly sez, "Yes, pa must be right, he always is."

And Tommy said with a whoop he knew it, and he wanted to be a Injun warrior.

And I took my pattern and went home.

AND about five P.M., my sleeves cut out and basted, I took home Sally's pattern, and I found the Slinker home in confusion and arnaky; Eben stood with a whip in his hand layin' it onto Tommy and yellin' at him:

"I'll teach you to fight Jimmy Henzy!"

"Yes," sez Sally, "your pa will tend to you! your face bruised up, your clothes all tore, and Sister Henzy so mad she won't speak to me!"

"I thought you'd be proud on me," screamed Tommy. "You said war wuz noble and you both on you wanted to go and fight, and I fit and I fit, and Pa's gin me the hardest liekin' I ever had, and ma won't give me any supper."

"I'll let you know," sez Eben. "I didn't mean children!"

"No," sez Sally, "your pa didn't mean children."

"No, Tommy," sez I, "your pa meant men that are noble and wise, they can cut and slash and stab and murder, and the more they massacre the more glorious they are."

Eben looked dubersome, but not havin' had a chance to make up Sally's mind, she jined in with me. "Yes, Tommy, that's what your pa meant."

And Eben sez hastily, "I've told Tommy how awful it looks to see two little Sabbath school boys set such a pattern before children that hain't had their advantages."

"That hain't had such a pa as Tommy has," sez Sally.

"Yes, Tommy," sez I, "it is dretful wrong for two little boys to fight, and set a bad example before a dozen boys and girls, but it is a grand glorious thing for great empires to have just made a call for Universal Peace to go to war and set an example of bloodshed and carnage and cruelty for millions and millions to foller ter example."

"Yes," sez Sally, "that is what your pa thinks."

EBen scratched his head and sez to Sally, "I'd set my sponge if I wuz in your place." And she went out and hearn her siftn' flour. And Tommy broke out agin, "They stole our p house, and driv us out, but we fit and beat 'em." The lurid light of battle shone in Tommy's eyes; one on his wuz black, and his nose wuz bloody, but that only made him look more like a victorious warrior. But he didn't git a laurel wreath. Fur frum it.

"I hev told you," sez Eben, "if you git into a quarrel with other children to go to the teacher and let her settle it peaceably."

"But they wouldn't give it up!" cried Tommy, "and it wuz ourn!"

"Hain't I told you, Tommy, if you had better give up a little of what you think is your right in order to get along peaceably?"

Sez I, "Eben, wouldn't that wuz well with men and nations that git into a quarrel?"

"I d'no as that would work well with nations," sez Eben.

"No," sez Sally, speakin' out of her buttery, "Eben don't know as it could be done."

Sez I, "Wouldn't it be better to try any and every means to avert the horrors of war? Wouldn't it be better for the men of the nation to use patience and self-control and wisdom, and let the youth to be taught by precept d example that war is brutal and peace is divine?"

Sez Eben, "Has brother Allen got his plantin' about done?" And bene I could answer him he sez to Sally, "Mebby you'd better give Tommy some supper."

And she sez with alacrity, "Do you hear, Tommy? Your pa sez you can have some supper; I've got some nice lamb steak and warm biscuits and honey."

Tommy wiped his bright'nin' eyes and follered his ma into the kitchen.

Faith Glorified

THE plainsman sat in the door of a miner's cabin, high up on the Continental Divide. In front of him the mountain side dropped in successive ledges and grass-grown mossy slopes to the bottom of the gulch. Hundreds of feet below him scrub pines and the stunted tops of the highest timber marked the timber line; and rivulets that crept away from snow-banks at his feet, tumbled over the ledges and rushed together to form the beginnings of a mountain torrent, which forced its way past ledge and boulder until it disappeared among the spruce and hemlock in the valley. The rugged arm of the range that formed the opposite side of the gulch did not lift its crest to the level of the plainsman's feet. Beyond it stretched the great Middle Park of Colorado. Here were fields of grain, and woods, and lakes; and on the sides of the enclosing mountains, and jutting out into the level basin of the park, forests of spruce and pine and hemlock. And beyond this, in the blue distance, the mighty snow-crowned summit of the peak pierced the light summer clouds and gleamed in the full light of the perfect summer day.

It was late afternoon, and already the western slopes were mottled with the shadows of the smaller peaks of the Divide. Slowly the shadows crept down the slopes; slowly and yet less slowly, then more swiftly, as the day approached the sunset time. Then it seemed as if the whole plain were suddenly to be engulfed in shade. Great trees, in full sunshine just now, trembled for an instant in the purple haze of twilight, then disappeared into the formless void of night. The shadow of the range reached the eastern slope of the park, and one by one the rugged features of the landscape softened, grew dimmer and disappeared into the purple pall through which the myriad lakes mirrored the still undimmed glory of the sky. At last darkness had claimed all but the peak itself. Its hoary head still stood bathed in sunshine, though its base was lost in the shadow that was creeping up and still farther up its rugged sides. The snow-cap grew golden as the sun reached nearer and nearer its far horizon; golden that deepened into orange, and then flamed out in fiery red that blazed but for an instant and then merged into softer shades, until the outlines on the peak barely showed against the dimming sky. Then all was dark save for the faint phosphorescence of the winding lakes and the fast-lighting stars. But in an instant the eastern slopes of the peak glistened with a silvery light, which crept farther and farther down, until the mountain stood against the summer sky, each ridge and snowbank and rugged slope clear and distinct, yet weird and ghostly. Then the moon rose above the eastern barrier of the park, and the shadows fled in purple ranks that were broken and dispersed and driven into canyons and gulches to hide under ledges and in the denser woods.

Once more the park lay spread out before the plainsman. Each lake and field and wood, each towering pine and shimmering river, held its former place; and over all the peak stood guard.

THUS may it be in your life and mine. Today we stand in the full glory of life's afternoon; but shadows come, and dark despair and darker doubt assail the summit of our faith, until at last the darkness is over all, and the light of hope is out. We see no more the Father's face, and to our stretched hand there comes no answering touch. Then comes the Son, and lightens again the landmarks of our faith; and we take courage and offer proffered hand, and look up to see our world restored. But more than restored. It is glorified by his Spirit, which he sends us ours always.

A Korean Sorceress Convert

"DURING this spring trip," writes Rev. A. A. Peters, of Chairyang, Korea, "my wife came across an interesting case of a sorceress. A Bible woman was waiting at the time in the neighborhood. She was told of a sorceress who was very sick, and she visited her several times, with the result that the sorceress became interested in Christianity. When my wife arrived there, she went to see the sick woman, and found that her disease was such that it could be relieved in the hospital. So she urged the woman to come to Chairyang. Some days later the sorceress and the Bible-woman arrived at our house, and with them a whole ox-load of the various paraphernalia that the sorceress had used in her black art. The woman had decided to become a Christian, and so brought her 'tools,' for which she had no more use, as a gift to my wife. It was certainly a curious collection—several dozen various garments, hats, fans, cymbals, iron swords, bells, a lot of ancient Buddhist and Shamanistic pictures, a huge drum, etc. Bringing all these things from away out in the country, and giving them away to a missionary, was pretty good proof that the woman had no more fear of the evil spirits whose she had been all her life, and that she was ready to worship the true God."

The paper is very dear to me and my family and we find great comfort in using the "Daily Meditations" in our morning devotion.

Mrs. H. C. Becke

Uzziah's Pride and Punishment

International Sunday School Lesson for December 5. II Chron. 26

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By REV. F. B. MEYER, D.D.

A man's pride shall bring him low; but he that is of a lowly spirit shall obtain honor. Prov. 29:23

To keep lowly and simple is not so difficult, if we take pains with ourselves. When tempted to pride, remember that the world did quite well without thee before thou camest into it, and will do equally well when thou art gone. The waves will lose over thee, and heaven will take thee at its own measurement. Do not dwell on what thou hast achieved, but on what thou mightest, and oughtest, and couldst have achieved. It is not for the man who has five talents to vaunt himself over him with two, because more will be expected and required of him. Compare thyself, not with the smaller men below thee, but with those that tower above thy stature toward heaven. The boy-artist of the village is proud of his poor daub till he visits the great picture-gallery where masterpieces line the walls. Besides, what hast thou that thou didst not first receive? and if thou didst receive it, why dost thou glory? The greatest things thou hast accomplished were not wrought by thee, but by the spirit of God in thee. Thou owest all to him, save thy sin, which has greatly marred and limited his designs. Shall the author's pen appropriate the praise due to the author himself? What is it? Probably only a goose-quill!

There Are No Dukes Here"

By Amos R. Wells

UZZIAH, king of Judah, was one of the strongest of Judah's kings; but the phrase is significant. "He strengthened himself exceedingly." It was not God who strengthened him. Dr. Cuyler once wrote: "I crossed the ocean in a powerful steamship, which weighed more than 2,000 tons, and pushed her way against wind and wave at the rate of over thirty knots an hour. I could not see the propelling force; that was hidden deep down in the glowing furnaces, heated constantly with fresh coal." It is with every really strong man: his sources of strength are hidden in the spiritual world. Uzziah was like a galley of the day, the massive oak and mighty rowers a visible token of power; but the galley moved only slowly compared with the steamboat, and carried only a slight weight.

Part of Uzziah's power was built on inability to make war. His engines of war, constructed to throw arrows and spears, would be laughed at today. Every increase of power in that direction is really an increase of weakness. A wise German proverb, now being fully verified, says, "A great war leaves the country with three armies—an army of cripples, an army of mourners and an army of thieves."

And all war is avoidable, if nations and men only take pains to understand one another. Once, says the story, a certain king sent to another king, saying: "Send me a blue pig with a black tail or else—". The other king replied, "I have not got one, and if I had—". They went to war, and many men were killed. At last they grew weary and arranged a peace. In the course of the negotiations the second king said the first, "What did you mean by this message of yours?"

"I meant a blue pig with a black tail or else—some other color. And what did you mean by your answer?" "I meant, if I had one—I should have sent it." That is a parable of all war.

The world has not yet learned, as a whole, that the greatest power of any king or subject is hinted at in this description of Uzziah. "He loved hoandry." Uzziah's farms did far more for him and for his nation than his forts. "Back to the farm," the present-day slogan, might better be, "Forward to the farm!" The country is the city, and with men as well as wheat. The return to the farm is still a dream of the wise men. Still the city magnets draw an ever-increasing number of our people, and we need a host of Uzziahs to stay the tide and reverse it.

It was the fort rather than the farm that had its way with the great king Uzziah. The fort makes for pride, the farm for humility, and Uzziah was a man of pride. He would be king in the house of God where no one was King. The incense he wished to burn there, in the stead of God's appointed priests, was incense to himself.

His is not necessarily the spirit of a great soldier, as Chinese Gordon bears witness, and George Washington, Cromwell, William of Orange, Stonewall Jackson, General Howard, and many another reverent hero of war. A famous story is told of the great Duke of Wellington, who was once kneeling at the communion rail receiving the sacrament of the Lord's supper when a poor man dressed in very shabby clothes came and knelt beside him. Immediately a church officer, startled and indignant, whispered to the intruder, "Move on farther; you're kneeling by the side of the Duke of Wellington." The poor man started to go, but the Duke had heard the whisper. Laying his hand on the poor man, he said, "Stay where you are, my brother. There are no dukes here." If that had been the spirit of that very much smaller warrior, King Uzziah, he would not have become a leper.

The Greeks had a fancy that when Apollo, the sun god, shot his bright arrows from his far-reaching bow, he slew all the creatures of the dark, all the ugly, crawling things that revel in slime and filth. Commenting on the great truth hidden in this myth, Dr. Alexander MacLaren wrote: "The light of God's face slays evil, of whatsoever kind it is; and just as the unlovely, loathsome creatures that live in the dark and find themselves at ease there writhe and wriggle in torment and die when their shelter is taken away and they are exposed to the sunshine beating on their soft bodies, so the light of God's face turned upon evil things smites them into nothingness."

In that light all Uzziah's power and splendor shrank to horrible leprosy.

A Defiant Will

By Arthur H. Howland

THOUSANDS of Sunday school workers are heartily and devoutly glad that we have, with this lesson, reached the end of our war stories. It has been bad enough to have to read war every week-day; but to be compelled to study war on Sunday, too, has been almost unbearable. Only two more lessons of the year remain, one telling of Jehovah's yearning, unfailing love for his people, the other the glad Christmas story. Then all next year we shall be studying happy, helpful lessons from the New Testament, the Acts and the writings of Jesus' friends after he disappeared from their sight.

But what about Uzziah—or Azariah, as he is called in the book of Kings? Another terrible story of bloodshed and conquest—the whole of it colored by the Jewish historian's belief, which reflected the general belief of those unenlightened times, that it was a divinely inspired and divinely conducted crusade.

Yet even in this savage story of conquest there are gleams of deep and holy truth. Whatever a man's work is—war, or plowing, or singing, or writing, or keeping a post office—it is spoiled when he becomes proud, self-centered, self-confident, defiant. A baseball player's wish to make spectacular plays must not make him forget the necessity for team work; he must be thinking not only of his own reputation and advancement, but of the whole team. In any business or organization there must be cooperation, and cooperation means that individual interests must

Oats Give Wings To Every Task

Let This Month Prove It

As an energy-food—as a vim-producer—oats have an age-old fame. To "feel one's oats" means the summit of vivacity.

Each dish is a battery of power. And each a mine of brain and nerve constituents.

The cost of oats, per energy unit, is not one-tenth so much as meat.

They are not for children only. All ages need their spirit-giving power.

If you'll try a big dish once a day this month you'll gain respect for oat food which you can't forget. And you'll gain new liking for it if the brand is Quaker Oats.

Quaker Oats

Extra-Luscious Vim-Food

There are all sorts of oats in a bushel. Some are starved and puny. Some are rich and plump. for flavor and aroma. In every land of oat lovers this is the favorite brand.

The wondrous flavor of the oat belongs mainly to the big grains.

So we pick those queen grains only. And a bushel of choice oats yields but ten pounds of Quaker.

That's why Quaker Oats are famed

Quaker Cooker

We have made to our order—from pure Aluminum—a perfect Double Boiler. It is extra large and heavy. We supply it to users of Quaker Oats, for cooking these flakes in the ideal way. It insures the fullness of food value and flavor. See our offer in each package. This present cooker offer applies to the United States only.

In some far-away parts it costs twice what you pay, yet connoisseurs must have it.

You can get these same flakes for 10c per package. Your grocer will supply them if you ask for Quaker Oats. Remember that.

Don't simply ask for oats.

10c and 25c per package
Except in Far West and South

(1057)

Try Seven Bran Days

Bran is not a cathartic. Its benefit comes from habitual use. A week of bran will win you to having every week like that.

Pettijohn's is a morning dainty made by flaking a special soft white wheat. Into the flakes we roll 25% of tender, unground bran. Thus we make an efficient, delicious bran food.

Next week serve it every morning. Then let its results decide the weeks to come. Just prove its goodness and its good effects.

Pettijohn's

Rolled Wheat With Bran Flakes

Most grocers have it. Any grocer will get it. Per package, 15c.

THE QUAKER OATS COMPANY
Chicago

Make Your Own CHRISTMAS PRESENTS

YOU can knit one of these beautiful scarfs, that are so popular this winter, on the Knic-Knac-Knitter. You can make mufflers, shawls, tassel caps, or even knit hats over chic wire frames, which, when trimmed with crocheted flowers, produce a novelty that would cost you ten dollars in any store.

Anyone can operate the Knitter; it is based on the old principle of the spool and nails. Use a No. 3 crochet hook and any good yarn; stripes and color combinations secured by merely tying on a different shade. A scarf costs about 50 cents to make, and takes not quite four hours; because you knit so much faster than by hand.

Here are a few articles that you can make for Christmas presents: Scarfs, shawls, caps, hats, party bags, baby bonnets, baby bands, ties, leggings, wristlets, slippers, etc.

Two rings, white enameled, securely packed with full instructions, sent post paid on receipt of $1.50 in stamps, money, check, or money order (we'll take all chances on receiving it). Order today and eliminate a large share of your Christmas shopping.

NATIONAL VENEER PRODUCTS CO.
245 Beiger Street
Mishawaka, Ind.

Descriptive Literature on Request

WANTED in every town in the United States, an intelligent man or woman, boy or girl to represent The Christian Herald. This is an opportunity to build up a business of your own, which should grow more and more profitable year after year. Address: Agency Dept., THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Bible House, New York City

PASTOR'S COMMUNION SERVICE

For Visiting the Sick
Every Pastor should have one. Leather Case, Silver-plated Epaulet and Water Flask, six crystal glasses. An ideal gift for the pastor. Special price, $6.50 postpaid, satisfaction guaranteed. THOMAS COMMUNION SERVICE CO. Box 611 LIMA, OHIO.

WANTED AN IDEA! THINK OF SOME SIMPLE THING TO PATENT. Protect your ideas. They may bring you wealth. Write for "Needle Inventions," and "How to Get Your Patent." RANDOLPH & CO., Dept. 96, Washington, D. C.

"Old Wine in New Bottles,"
By Samuel Tilden Larkin. Published by Monfort & Co., Cincinnati. Silk-cloth, $1.10 prepaid. Charming story, delightful characters, great moral theme. Religious papers and leaders endorse.

TABLE GRACES For DAILY USE SPECIAL DAYS and OCCASIONS. All Will Welcome This New Book of Graces. Postpaid. Paper, 25c. Cloth, 50c. M. E. MUNSON, 77 Bible House, New York, N.Y.

Patents Secured through credit system. Free search. Send sketch. How to Sell Your Patent. Free. WATERS & CO., 5100 Warder Bldg., WASHINGTON, D. C.

be lost sight of in the general effort. A singer who tries to make his voice heard above the rest may spoil the whole chorus. Particularly in religious work is there need of true humility, real meekness—real dependence upon God.

This is what Uzziah did not have. "His heart was lifted up to his destruction." He was as good as the priest; he had a right to go into the temple and burn incense; God must not be too particular. And that was the end of Uzziah. After that not a victorious king, but a lonely leper. We think of Uzziah in his lonely house and of Napoleon on his lonely island, both kings, both too sure of self, both dishonored.

THERE is another spot in the Bible where Uzziah means more than here. His early and continued piety, his fifty-two years of prosperous sovereignty, all are forgotten—but his name is linked with an event in another life that rises far above anything he himself ever did. Isaiah writes in his prophecy: "In the year that King Uzziah died saw I the Lord." There is an event that means something to the world. Isaiah went into the temple not to perform any ceremony, but as a humble worshiper. He felt his uncleanness and his need of blessing. Isaiah entered the temple unholy and came out cleansed by the fires of God to be an announcer of the riches of divine grace and to lead many to share with him the vision of God he had beheld. Uzziah went into the temple proud, satisfied, presumptuous—and came out a leper.

Echoes from the Holy Land

"AMMONITES." A people living east of the Jordan on the head waters of the Jabbok when the children of Israel entered Palestine. Their capital was Rabbah (Deut. 3:11), built on the Jabbok about fifty miles east of Jerusalem.

"Entering in of Egypt" was the extreme southern boundary of Uzziah's kingdom as "entering in of Hamath" the extreme northern boundary, corresponding to "from Dan to Beersheba" in other ages.

"Towers in Jerusalem" strengthened the walls, which were somewhat out of repair.

"Towers in the desert" and "wells." Two absolutely essential necessities in the East Jordan country in Uzziah's day and to the present hour. In 1901 I visited Shobek, a fortified town less than fifty miles south of Amman, and while standing on its huge fortifications was told that the limit of its cultivated lands was fixed by the distance a rifle would send a bullet. In the same castle was a well with 365 steps cut in the solid rock leading to the precious water supply. Wells were dug at great expense where water was known or supposed to exist, but for every one well there were thousands of cisterns and pools "hewed out" of the solid rock (the revised translation is literally correct). Both pools and cisterns were protected in many places by walls and towers of defense. In my journeys east of the Jordan I have no doubt passed many ruins and towers dating from Uzziah's time.

The "low country" is the shephelah or maritime plain along the Mediterranean Sea on the west of Palestine, while the desert all ways means the east.

"Engines to shoot great stones." No doubt the progenitor of the "catapult" of Greek and Roman times and the devices in use today for hurling "hand grenades." In a recent visit to the Island of Rhodes I was amazed at the great number of stone balls in the edge of the sea, among the ancient towers and battlements, and indeed all over the island. They ranged in size from five inches in diameter to more than two feet, and the largest must have weighed at least a ton. The smashing power of such a mass must have been very great. Such stones are found about the walls of Constantinople and other cities of the Orient.

"Uzziah was wroth." Leprous spots in persons unsuspected frequently show themselves when such persons indulge in great fits of anger.

Many sayings in the Arabic all center around the truth that there can be no greater sin in the eyes of God than human pride.

The How Column

Conducted by Frank L. Brown, Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association.

How to Prepare the Lesson

SEVERAL things are clearly demonstrated in the testimonies from teachers that have been appearing in the Christian Herald for several weeks, as to their plan of lesson preparation.

1. No successful teacher can afford to leave the lesson study to a few minutes before the Sunday school hour and then hastily read through the lesson and the printed questions to be asked the scholar. Practically every teacher states that the lesson preparation is begun a full week in advance, and pursued through the week.

2. The Bible has been first consulted for the lesson text and surrounding Scripture, and the lesson has been read and reread from the Book itself.

3. There has been prayer for the Holy Spirit's guidance, for the illumination of the truth. "We must talk with Jesus first, then to the child."

A great author has said: "Read yourself full, think yourself exact, write yourself empty." There is sound sense in this for the Sunday school teacher as applied to the lesson material, the lesson sequence, and the lesson outline. The question of the wisdom of talking yourself instead of getting the scholar to talk, will come up later as we shall consider the presentation of the lesson in the class.

We all know from experience that our best-laid plans, after careful preparation, "gang aft agley," when it comes to the use of the material in the class. Often our whole plan will work out beautifully. Then some question or discussion, or some class circumstance, will upset our calculations. But the preparation should be made just the same, and we should be guided by circumstances.

Dr. Schauffler suggests for the teacher's preparation points five W's:

Who? The persons of the lesson.
Where? The place of the lesson.
When? The time of the lesson.
What? The facts of the lesson.
What then? The application of the truth.

These words can be used by the superintendent as well in a swift review, where the plan of review is thought wiser.

May I suggest a simple plan for a little daily work that will cover the essential things in lesson preparation?

SUNDAY. Read the lesson through several times and note as you do with pencil and paper just what questions come to your own mind concerning it. These same questions and difficulties may come to your scholars' minds upon their reading of the lesson. Discover the lesson aim and the heart of the lesson.

MONDAY. Get the lesson setting, in relation to the previous and succeeding lessons. Get clearly in mind the lesson approach. Some one has termed this the lesson launching. The lesson is but a portion of a book. What is the title of that particular book, the purpose in its writing, its relation to the general plan of the Scriptures, sweeping on toward Christ, or away from him into the New Testament fields of training and service?

TUESDAY. Absorb the lesson title, the Golden Text, in which often the lesson aim is covered. And especially the lesson facts, persons and events, so that the story grips you and lives in your own thinking, for otherwise it can never be made graphic to the scholars. The persons of the lesson should be live persons, not dead kings or heroes, or prophets, or disciples. Make them walk.

WEDNESDAY. Study the side lights on the lesson from the lesson writers, from Peloubet's or Tarbell's Notes or other teaching guides, interesting facts about places or customs.

THURSDAY. Seek for good lesson illustrations, from Scripture, from newspapers, from persons you know, in some homely incident in your own life, or through some material object you can bring into the class. These are the windows of the lesson.

FRIDAY. Discover the point of contact for the lesson that shall secure attention at the very start. This may be some incident of the week known to the scholars, some object shown to get the eyes of all. Prepare also a very simple lesson outline around which the lesson can be grouped.

SATURDAY. Find what is the application of the lesson to life, the lives of your scholars at home, in school, on the playground, in the office or workshop. Where is Christ in the lesson for you and the individuals of the class? What outstanding teaching points have come out of the week's thinking?

SUNDAY. Pray for the illumination of the Spirit of God, that the lesson may be taught in confidence and love. Pray for the scholars individually. Pray until Christ lives in your own heart. We cannot hope to teach half of what we may prepare. So there should be no discouragement if much of our careful preparation seems to be wasted. The thing we think of smallest consequence may be remembered longest. In Patterson Du Bois' book, "Point of Contact in Teaching" and Marianna C. Brown's "How to Plan a Lesson," will be found helpful suggestions for the Sunday school teacher.

"We are advertised by our loving friends"

Henry C. Sorensen
Corning, N.Y.

A Mellin's Food Boy

When you use the Mellin's Food Method of Milk Modification you can give your baby a food exactly suited to his every requirement. Then he will grow strong and healthy, as have thousands of others.

Send for our book, "The Care and Feeding of Infants."

Mellin's Food Company
Boston, Mass.

"To the Jew First"

Have you grasped the Scriptural order of God's missionary campaign? If the Church does not follow this order, what will happen? Will there not be failure and disappointment?

Paul went first to the Jews. We have reversed the order, or forgotten the Jews altogether. Is it not time to send our ways? Believers who desire to follow God's order may learn how by subscribing to

"Prayer and Work for Israel," a monthly magazine of 16 pages and cover, the organ of the New York Jewish Evangelization Society

This magazine gives full reports of work among the 1,500,000 Jews of Greater New York, and follows with care the great Jewish movements of the day. Practical articles treat clearly the Biblical position of Israel.

Price, 50 cents a year. Sample copies free. Address the Editor, Rev. Thomas M. Chalmers, 2654 Marlon Ave., New York City.

LITTLE MISS PRISCILLA

wins a welcome everywhere. She is a cheerful little messenger of good will and she brings in handy for ten cents of lingerie ribbon—pink, blue, lavender or white, with a bodkin ready for running. This little useful gift for 30c is secured from 1,000 gift suggestions illustrated in our wonderful Year Book which will be mailed anywhere for 6c in stamps, the unique Christmas gift book of America.

Write for it POHLSON'S GIFT SHOP 96 Bank Bldg. Pawtucket, R.I.

ACORN UNILITE

Turns night into day. 300 candle power. Carry as a lantern; use anywhere as a lamp. Weat proof. For house, barn, garage, C.D. and around the farm. Write for big offer. Special opportunity to farmers, stockmen and motorists. Agents get big money. Write tonight. Acorn Brass Mfg. Co., 757 Acorn Bldg., Chicago

WAR Inspiring book, "OUR NEAR FUTURE." Intensely fascinating, convincing proof; creating great sensation. Silk-cloth, 216 pages. Postpaid, $1. MARIE ANTOINETTE KEHOE, Belair, Harford County, Maryland

Ice — Fire

One Minute The Next

These are the extremes which a spark plug must stand in winter. But you never give a thought to these things because your motor is equipped with Champions.

4 out of 5

American made gasoline motors are equipped with Champions. The men who build the big sellers — Fords, Overlands, Studebakers, Maxwells and 85 others specify

Champion Dependable Spark Plugs

"TOLEDO MADE FOR THE WHOLE WORLD'S TRADE"

Our tremendous output — doubled this year as compared with last — enables us to go to extremes of engineering which lesser production would not warrant.

All-in-One Champion $1.25

These extremes give you that dependable aid to ignition which Champions alone provide.

There is a Champion especially designed and constructed to meet the exact conditions imposed by your motor. Your dealer will tell you which one it is and supply your wants.

Be sure the name Champion is on the porcelain.

Champion Priming Plugs Make Winter Starting Easy

It is not enough simply to enrich your mixture with the dash adjustment, or even merely to prime your cylinders, if the day is really cold.

Prime your plugs.

Then you have your rich mixture right at the ignition point—right where your first spark can fire it.

All-in-One Champion is the pet-cock type.

It is made in various sizes to serve efficiently the various styles and types of motors.

The Champion Guarantee

Complete satisfaction to the user—free repair, replacement or money back.

Champion Spark Plug Company

301 Avondale Avenue

Toledo, Ohio

The Jeffery Four

"America's Standard Automobile at a $1000 Price"

People who formerly paid $2000 to $5000 for an automobile now find the very qualities they have always insisted upon—in the Jeffery Four, at $1000.

Body, standard seven-passenger Chestfield type • Front seats, divided • Driver's seat, adjustable • Upholstery, deep real leather • Shipping weight, 2760 pounds • Motor, Jeffery high-speed high efficiency • Ignition, Bosch magneto • Starting and lighting system, Byar electric • Equipment, complete • Entire car 95% Jeffery built.

STANDARD SEVEN-PASSENGER, $1035, without delivery, $1000 • THREE-PASSENGER ROADSTER, $1000 • SEDAN (Kenosha style), $1105 • JEFFERY SIX, $1550

Proves F.O.B. Kenosha, Wisconsin

The Thomas B. Jeffery Company
Main Office and Works Kenosha, Wisconsin

Illustrated prospect on request the kind of hat his mother wanted, and he had noted her quickly suppressed look of disappointment at the somber hat donated by Mrs. Hudgers on the day of the police-court attendance.

Upon receiving the five dollars he went directly to the Fashion Emporium, where the windows were filled with a heterogeneous assortment of gayly trimmed hats, marked enticingly with former and present prices.

"I want a hat kivered with flowers," he announced.

"Who for?" asked the young saleswoman.

"For my mother."

"How would you like a nice flower toque like this?" displaying a headgear of modest forget-me-nots.

"That's all faded. Ain't you got any red flowers? If you haven't, I know a store where they keep 'em."

The girl instantly sacrificed her ideas of what was fitting to the certainty of a sale, and quickly produced a hat of green foliage from which rose long-stemmed, nodding red poppies, "a creation marked down to three-ninety-eight," she informed him.

"That's the kind! I'll take it and a pair of white gloves, too, if you've got some big ones for a dollar."

Bud hastened home with his purchases. His mother was quite overcome by the sight of such finery.

"I never thought to be dressed up again," she exclaimed on the eventful night. "No one has bought me nuthin' to wear sence your pa died. I feel like I was some one outen a book."

The entire family, save Iry, who was put to bed at a neighbor's, went to the recital. The Boarder took Lily Rose, who was quite flustered at her first appearance with the family.

John and Colette occupied a pew directly opposite the family. Mr. Vedder and Pete were also in attendance.

When the bishop came from the vestry and walked down the aisle to his pew, his eyes fell upon the worn, seamed face of Bud's mother, the weary patient eyes in such odd contrast to the youthful turban with its smartly dancing flowers. Something stirred in his well-regulated heart, and he carefully wiped his glasses.

At the signal from the choirmaster for the solo of the oratorio, Bud arose. An atom of a boy he looked in the vast, vaulted chancel, and for the first time he knew fear at the thought of singing. It was a terrible thing, after all, to face this sea of staring, dancing people. As lightning reaches to steel, the gay poppies nodding so nervously above his mother's white, anxious face sought the courage place within, and urged him on. He felt himself back in Clothes-line Park, alone with his mother and the blue sky.

The little figure filled itself with a long, deep breath. The high, clear note merged into one with the notes of the chorus. It touched the tones of the accompaniment in harmony true, and swelled into grand, triumphant music.

"He looks like he did arter the fever," thought Amarilly anxiously.

When he came down the aisle with the choir, the ethereal look had left his face, and he was again a happy little boy. He gave his mother a gay nod, and bestowed a wink upon the Boarder. He waited outside and the family wended their way homeward.

There had not been time to bring in the clothes before leaving, but a willing neighborhood had guarded the premises for them, so Clothes-line Park was shrouded in a whiteness that looked ghostly in the moonlight.

They made quite an affair of the evening in honor of Bud's song, and their introduction to Lily Rose. There were fried sausages, coffee, sandwiches, and pork cake.

"The organist told me," announced Bud at supper, "that he was a-goin' to train my voice, and I could be soloist at Grace Church and git five dollars a Sunday, and after a while I could git ten."

"You'll be a millynaire," prophesied Bobby in awed tones.

"Guess we'll be on Easy Street now," shouted Cory.

"We won't be nuthin' of the kind," snapped Amarilly. "It's a-goin' to all be banked fer Bud."

"I guess," said Bud, in his quiet, old-man way, "I'm the one to hev say. I'm a-goin' to give ma two dollars a week and bank the rest."

Meanwhile John was having an comfortable time as he walked home with Colette. He had started on a trail of the surplice the day before. The "tenner" and the young ladies had given the tableaux had been viewed, but in neither case had the mysterious pocket been discovered. Today he had visited the Beehive, but no one in the store had paid any attention to the pocket, or knew of its existence. Colette remained obdurate to his pleadings. She assumed that he was entirely to blame for the loss, and seemed to take a gleeful delight in showing him how perverse and will she could be. Tonight he found himself less able than usual to cope with her caprices, so he began to talk of personal matters and dwelt upon the beauties of Bud's voice, and the astonishing way in which it had developed.

She admitted that Bud's voice was indeed wonderful, but maintained that Mrs. Jenkins's poppy hat and white gloves had been far surpassing in the way of surprises.

"Did you ever, John, see anyting more shoutingly funny?"

"It wasn't funny, Colette," he said wistfully, and he proceeded to relate the history of the hat as he had heard it from the bishop that day.

And though in the depths of her heart Colette was touched by the pathetic of the purchase, she must needs tread again the feminine labyrinth instead of following the more natural and open path.

"Who was the young girl with the Boarder?" John next vouchsafed.

"Why, Lily Rose, of course," he said. "Lily for whom he 'sot for his likene in the surplus.' That awful surplus she burst forth in irritation at the mention of the unfortunate widow. 'Some of these people must have it. John, you don't half try to find it.'"

"I am following out the list in order," he assured her. "I shall go to see Mrs. Hudgers to-morrow."

"And the next one to her," reminded Colette, "is Derry Phillips, Amarilly's new benefactor. She told me today that she had a note from him, asking her to begin work at the studio in a few days."

"I have a double duty in my life there," said John didactically. "If he is like some of the young artists I know, his studio will hardly be a proper place for Amarilly."

"As it happens," returned Colette coldly, "Derry Phillips, for all his sense, is reported to be a true gentleman; but it would make no difference with Amarilly if he were not. Her inherent goodness would counteract the evil of any atmosphere. She can take care of his rooms until she is a little older. Then she can become a model."

"Colette!" he exclaimed protesting. "Why not?" she returned. "My shouldn't Amarilly be a model, or go on the stage? Neither place would be below her station in life."

John sought refuge in utter silence which admonished and exasperated Colette far more than any reproof would have done.

"You might as well go, if you live nothing to say," she remarked slyly as he lingered in the portico, evidently expecting an invitation to enter.

"I have too much to say, Colette. Her sidelong glance noted his rejection, and her flagging spirits began again.

"Too much, indeed, when you are so critical of what I say!"

"Colette, hear me!"

"No, I won't listen—never will you preach!"

"I don't mean to preach, Colette, but don't you think—"

"Good night, John," she said, smiling.

"Good night!" he echoed dolefully, but making no move to leave.

"Lette, will you never tell me?"

"Yes," she replied unexpectedly, with a dancing light in her beautiful eyes.

"When?"

"When you restore to me what is in the pocket."

To be continued

You Can Weigh Exactly What You Should

You can be Strong, Vigorous—full of Life and Energy.

You can be free from Chronic Ailments—every organ of your body strong as nature intended.

You can have a Clear Skin.

You can have a Good Figure—as good as any woman.

You can increase or reduce your weight.

I no longer need to say what "I can do" but what "I HAVE DONE." I have helped 75,000 of the most cultured, intelligent women of America to arise to their very best—why not you?

No Drugs—No Medicines

My pupils simply comply with Nature's Laws.

What My Pupils Say:
"Everyone notices the change in my complexion; it has lost that yellow color."

"Just think what you have done for me. Last year I weighed 216 lbs., this year 146, and have not gained an ounce back. I am not wrinkled either. I feel so young and strong, no rheumatism, or sluggish liver. I can breathe now, too. It is surprising how easily I did it. I feel 15 years younger."

"Just think I have not had a pill or a cathartic since I began, and I used to take one every night."

"My weight has increased 30 lbs. I don't know what indigestion is any more, and my nerves are so rested! I sleep like a baby."

"I feel as if I could look every man, woman and child in the face with the feeling that I am growing—spiritually, physically and mentally. Really I am a stronger, better woman. I don't know how to tell you or to thank you."

Reports like these come to me every day. Do you wonder I want to help every woman to vibrant health and happiness? Write me your faults of health or figure. Your correspondence is held in strict confidence. If I cannot slip you, I will tell you what will.

My interesting book tells how to stand and walk correctly and contains other information of vital interest to women. You are welcome to it. Write for it. It is FREE. If you do not need me, you may be able to help a dear friend. I have had a wonderful experience and I'd like to tell you about it. I am at my desk daily from 8 until 5.

SUSANNA COCROFT,
apt. 18, 624 Michigan Ave., Chicago

DETROIT WEATHERPROOF BODIES

All the comfort and convenience of a $5000 limousine—
And at small cost.
A beautifully finished, detachable top that fits snugly over the touring body—no ugly joint or overhang.
Patent flexible doors that slide up and down absolutely prevent rattles.
Built for following models:

Ford '15 & '16	$ 72
Ford '14	87
Buick D-45	125
Overland 83	115
Maxwell 25	115

Ask your Dealer—or write
DETROIT WEATHERPROOF BODY CO.
496-502 Clay Ave. Detroit

THE WINTER PROBLEM SOLVED

The War in Europe

Continued from page 1182
by competent authorities and tribunals which are being set up to consider such cases."

It will be perhaps remembered that a census of the men of military age in Great Britain was taken some time ago, and that thereafter Lord Derby, who had been appointed director of recruiting, originated a scheme which he hoped would obviate the necessity of adopting conscription. This announcement indicates that this scheme has not met expectations and that, therefore, a limited form of conscription will have to be adopted in order to assure a sufficient supply of men to keep the armies in the field up to their present numbers. For this purpose something like 30,000 men a week will be necessary.

At first sight it would seem that it would throw many thousands of people out of work, though possibly their services could be employed in other directions. It would certainly suspend the circulation of money if the well-to-do classes were forbidden to spend their incomes, and it is difficult to see how this enforced saving would benefit the government as a government, unless that government, by some form of law, possessed itself of the unexpended portions of the incomes of these well-to-do people.

Lord Kitchener has left England for the Near East, though it remains uncertain whether his destination is Serbia or Egypt, though at one time his destination was reported to be India. For several months there has been known to be trouble in the north-western provinces of India, but this has been with non-residents. By reports during the last of the week, however, we were informed that India was, as a whole, in a dangerous condition of unrest, and that in certain of the native states rebellion, more or less serious, had broken out against the British rule. It was even suggested that Lord Kitchener was not going to Serbia at all, but to India; but at the same time another cable stated that Egypt was in a flame and was his real destination.

Kitchener's departure from England was taken by many to mean that he had resigned from the Cabinet; indeed this was stated openly by one newspaper, the London Globe. It was, however, later officially denied and the Globe was suppressed for publishing the report, on the ground that it was detrimental to public confidence.

The Greek situation cleared somewhat during the week, but still the Grecian sky is overcast. The new cabinet formed under the premiership of Mr. Skouloudis was presented to the chamber which has a majority of the friends of Mr. Venizelos, with the intimation that unless accepted by the chamber, the king would exercise his constitutional power and dissolve the chamber. Negotiations continued during the week and finally on Friday, the 12th of November, the chamber was dissolved and new elections ordered. These will take some time and it will probably be two months before the new chamber meets. In the meantime Greece is to continue her attitude of benevolent neutrality, if possible.

However, Bulgaria and Turkey have formally protested against the Grecian policy of allowing the Allies to land troops at Salonica, and the danger to Greece now seems to be that she may be forced to take an active part on the side of the Allies as a result of drastic action by the Teutons and their allies, the Bulgarians, which drastic action might take place under the following conditions:

Suppose that the Serbian army is completely disposed of and the victorious Teutons and Bulgars throw themselves on the troops of the Allies in southern Serbia and drive them back into Greek territory while reinforcements for them continue to be landed at Salonica. In all probability the Teutons and their allies would not hesitate to follow them into Greek territory, or at the very least call on Greece to disarm them and to prevent further reinforcements being landed on Greek territory, if her neutrality is a real one, or otherwise that they would consider her as an enemy.

A fresh spell of submarine activity has broken out, particularly in the Mediterranean, where the British and Italians have lost quite a number of merchant vessels. The Ancona, an Italian passenger steamer running to America, being torpedoed among others, with a considerable loss of life. An investigation is being made and our next week's story will give the particulars.

Among the vessels torpedoed elsewhere was the famous Dacia, serving as a French transport, the vessel which the French seized some months ago, in spite of the fact that she was at the time of the seizure of American registry, claiming that this registry was not in good faith. She had been renamed the Yser.

General Joffre has been placed at the head of the united staffs of the Allies. This is a step towards consolidation of their strategy.

THE Austro-Italian campaign was also dull. The Italians attacked the Isonzo river line, but do not seem to have made any gains of importance as a result. The Austrians are not strong enough numerically to attempt any offensive, and the Italians, in spite of many efforts, do not seem able to pierce the Austrian defenses at any vital point.

The campaign in the north on the so-called Eastern front has also languished, the only fighting of any moment being on the Riga-Dunaburg front. Elsewhere, though there have been skirmishes of more or less magnitude, they have been absolutely without importance. The Russians have been the aggressors in these attacks, whose only object has been to hamper the Germans as much as possible in their work of entrenching themselves for the winter.

South and southeast of Riga there has been continual fighting of the skirmish order all the week, and in this fighting the Germans have been decidedly worsted and compelled to retire their lines for an average distance of from eight to ten miles. West of Riga the German advance on the city has not been able to make any gain owing in large part to the activities of the Russian gunboats on the Gulf of Riga, which have shelled the shore effectively every time a German column attempted to advance thereon.

The Serbian campaign seems to be drawing to a close, as far as northern and central Serbia are concerned. The Austro-German and Bulgarian forces between them have now complete control of the entire country north of an east-and-west line drawn just north of Novi Bazar from the Montenegrin frontier, to the railroad running from Nish south to Salonica, and thence running from this point of contact of such line and the railroad southward along the railroad to Gradska, and thence along another line eastward to the Bulgarian frontier, this line passing a little north of Krivolah and reaching the frontier a little south of Strumitza.

The Bulgarians are also in possession of a salient south of a line running from the Montenegrin frontier to Nish, which has as its base Vranja and Uskub, and then juts out westerly to Prizreu and Kalkendeln. North of this salient is the Serbian main army, which, unless it either escapes into Montenegro or breaks through this salient, seems destined to be crushed and captured by the Austro-German line to the north of it moving south upon it.

In the south the Allies have made good their positions on the Prilip-Gradska-Krivolah line against several Bulgarian attacks, but have not been able as yet to make any decided advance, owing no doubt to the non-arrival of substantial reinforcements, and also probably to some degree to the unsettled attitude of Greece.

MAKE CHRIST KING, COMBINED

(Orchestrated)
Just Published
Edited by
Prof. E. O. Excell, Dr. W. E. Biederwolf, Dr. H. W. Stough, Dr. M. H. Lyon and 71 other leading evangelists.
The Latest, Best and Most Popular Hymn Book
Combines the best songs in "Make Christ King" and the "New Millennium Christ King," with the latest and best copyright hymns.
Regardless of expense, the best song book ever published. Send 15c for sample copy.
THE GLAD TIDINGS PUBLISHING CO.
Lakeside Bldg., CHICAGO, ILL.

E. O. EXCELL

W. E. BIEDERWOLF

H. W. STOUGH

M. H. LYON

IF your envelopes were poorly gummed, or inaccurately printed or did not arrive on time, last year, why don't you buy from us this time?
FREE—A Duplex Envelope Opener, for the name and address of your Treasurer and S. S. Supt. Saves time and trouble.
ADDRESS DESK—1
DUPLIX
RICHMOND, VA.
(ARCHER G. JONES)
UNLESS DUPLIX IS AN IMITATION

SENT FREE
All charges prepaid subject to examination.
HURLBUT'S Story of Jesus
FOR YOUNG AND OLD
A masterpiece! Fresh from the pen of the beloved Rev. Jesse Lyman Hurlbut, D. D., whose "Story of the Bible" is cherished in more than 500,000 homes. Written to fascinate both children and adults—and it does!
Published Just In Time For Christmas Giving
The NEWEST and MOST COMPLETE narrative of Our Saviour's life. A truly inspired book, written with all the lucid description, all the beautiful simplicity which Dr. Hurlbut's long life of reverent study and religious authorship make possible. Every page is an inspiration. Every chapter can be perfectly understood, even by children. A valuable aid to parents, teachers and ministers. It is difficult to conceive of a more appropriate gift for young people.
Illustrated by Wm. Hole, R. S. A., R. E.
Besides the glowing story in written word, this great book contains 200 vivid illustrations. Many are actual photographs. Eighty are full-page drawings by William Hole, R. S. A., R. E., sixteen of which are in color. All have been carefully selected for uniformity and in themselves graphically tell the Gospel story.
This wonderful book, with its 500 pages of large, clear type, 200 pictures, handsome cloth binding, embellished cover and chronological and topical index,
Sent Free for Examination We Pay Postage
Just fill in the coupon, mail to us, and we will AT ONCE send the book, all charges prepaid. If it pleases you, send us only $1.50. (The best written, best illustrated book ever published at the price.) If it does not please you, return it, at our expense, in 5 days. Fill in and mail coupon at once.
THE JOHN C. WINSTON CO.
Philadelphia
Publishers of 500 Styles of Bibles and 1,000 Standard Books
Please send me, all charges prepaid, Hurlbut's "Story of Jesus" I will remit $1.50, or return the book in 5 days at your expense.
Name _____
Address _____
THE JOHN C. WINSTON CO.
1006 Arch Street
Philadelphia

A SOUND INVESTMENT

Albert Dickinson Co.

Seed Merchants

Established 1855

CHICAGO FIRST MORTGAGE

6%

REAL ESTATE GOLD BONDS

$500 and $1000

SECURITY includes ownership of land, nearly 70 acres, and all new, fireproof buildings, valued at over double the amount of total loan.

GUARANTEE: The bonds are the direct obligation of the Albert Dickinson Co., seed merchants, the largest concern of its kind in the United States, with a successful record of 60 years.

This State Bank, founded 1855, highly recommends the investment. A large portion of the issue has already been purchased by the most conservative investors.

We advise prompt reservation. SEND FOR SPECIAL CIRCULAR No. 702 C.

GREENEBAUM SONS BANK AND TRUST COMPANY

S. E. Cor. La Salle & Madison Sts.
CHICAGO

A State Bank

Capital and Surplus, $1,850,000

6% North Dakota Farm Mortgages

35 years ago I settled in North Dakota, became interested in Farm Mortgages, and took up Farm Mortgage Banking as a business. I believe I am the oldest advertiser in this field and I still advertise.

"No losses to customers"

Any investment you purchase from me will be the best.

Walter L. Williamson
Lisbon North Dakota

FORMAN FARM MORTGAGES

6% Our booklet entitled, "American Farm Loans"—yours for the asking—contains some interesting letters from Scotch clients who at present hold over $8,000,000 of our mortgages. Our long experience without a loss entitles us to the consideration of all conservative investors.

George M. Forman & Company
(Established 1885) 11 South La Salle St., CHICAGO

Stocks and Bonds ON THE PARTIAL PAYMENT PLAN

Our convenient method enables you to buy dividend-paying Stocks and Bonds in any amount—one, five, ten, seventeen, forty—by making a small first payment and balance in monthly installments, depending upon what you can afford to pay. $5, $10, $25, $40, $75. You receive all dividends while completing payments and may sell securities at any time to take advantage of rise in market.

Free Booklet E-2 "The Partial Payment Plan" Gives full information of this method which appeals to thrifty men and women in all parts of the country.

Sheldon, Morgan & Co.

42 Broadway, New York City
Members New York Stock Exchange

Investment and Insurance Counsel

This department is maintained for the benefit of our regular readers; the service is offered entirely free of cost to them, and all correspondence is strictly personal and confidential, in so far as the identity of the inquirer is concerned. Always enclose letter postage and write name and address plainly, addressing your inquiry to Financial Editor, Christian Herald, Bible House, New York City.

Neither the Christian Herald nor any other publication can guarantee the value of investment securities. We do all we can, however, to make sure of the integrity of our advertisers before admitting them to our columns. Any advice given is an expression of our conclusions, based upon information we believe to be reliable, but we must not be held responsible, should any loss arise from its acceptance.

Answers to Financial Queries

R. H. F., ILLINOIS. The Equitable Life Assurance Society of New York is one of the three greatest life insurance companies in America. Its financial integrity seems to be beyond the possibility of any doubt.

MRS. T. P. O., ILLINOIS. We should accept the company's proffer. There is no form of investment safer for a woman than 6 per cent. first mortgages on Chicago real estate.

MISS M., NEW YORK. Don't sell your Atchison stock just because the price has advanced 10 points. Pay no attention to the quoted value and hold your shares for permanent investment.

D. T. C., INDIANA. (1) Under conditions you state we advise that approximately seventy-five per cent. of your $8,000 be invested in selected farm mortgages. The balance should go into public service bonds. (2) Consult our advertising columns.

MRS. D. D. J., FLORIDA. Niles-Bement-Pond has resumed dividends on the common stock by a declaration of a quarterly dividend of 1½ per cent. Dividends on this issue were passed May 7, 1913. This places the stock on a 6 per cent. dividend basis.

D. P. D., OHIO. The Gramm Motor Truck Company makes a good report. The 7 per cent. dividends on the cumulative preferred stock must be permanently protected by a surplus sufficient to pay them two years in advance before any dividend on the common stock may be paid.

A. C., IOWA. American Telephone & Telegraph stock pays 8 per cent. per annum. According to current belief the year 1915 will show greatly increased earnings. This is generally regarded as one of the soundest of all public service stocks. At 128 the stock yields about 6.35 per cent.

MISS F. E. W., DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA. Within five months you can own outright a good, sound public utility bond through the means of $10 and $20 Bond Certificates, which yield the same rate of interest—5 per cent. and 6 per cent.—as the bonds themselves. This is an excellent way to save and secure the maximum rate of interest.

M. S. T., COLORADO. (1) Southern California Edison Co. Convertible 6 per cent. Debentures, due March, 1920, at par may be favorably regarded. (2) California Electric Generating Co. first mortgage 5s, at 84, yield 6.15 per cent. (3) Did you ever know of Telepost stock selling in open market at 88? We never did. The best price we have seen bid is $1.50.

J. E. D., RHODE ISLAND. (1) Norfolk & Western Ry. stock pays 6 per cent., but at the present selling price around 122 will yield only 5 per cent. In 1897 the stock sold at $9. Dividends commenced in 1907. The present record high price for the stock is taken to indicate an increase in dividend rate in 1916. (2) The preferred stock pays 4 per cent. and at present price yields 4.7 per cent.

C. N. W., VIRGINIA. The following railroad bonds yield more than 5 per cent. and are considered sound investment. Your $3,600 will purchase one each: Chesapeake & Ohio Railway Convertible 4½s, at 88 to yield 5.65 per cent.; Michigan Central Railway Debenture 4s, at 86, to yield 5.50 per cent.; New York Central Railroad Ref. & Imp. 4½s, at 90, to yield 5.10 per cent.; Southern Pacific Company Convertible 4s, at 87, to yield 5.25 per cent.

J. L. M., MAINE. (1) No city in the United States is possessed of a finer credit than New York and its bonds are a legal investment for savings banks and trust companies in any State in the Union. (2) Canton-Akron Consolidated Railway General Gold 5s, due 1933, may be regarded as a reasonably secure investment which offers a liberal yield. (3) Canton-New Philadelphia Railway First Gold 5s, due 1923, are also regarded as a fairly secure investment. The bonds represent a first lien on property and equipment formerly owned by the Canton-New Philadelphia Railway including about 22 miles of track. The debt has been assumed by the Canton-Akron Consolidated Railway.

"PRUDENT," CONNECTICUT. One of the prominent odd-lot stock exchange firms suggests the following combination of miscellaneous stocks as suitable for a purchase through the means of the partial payment plan:

Stock	Price	Div.
Delaware & Hudson	154 9	per cent.
Balto. & Ohio, pfd.	76 4	per cent.
Bklyn. R. T.	91 6	per cent.
Nevada Cons.	16 1½	per cent.
U. S. Rubber, com.	58

"The total cost of one share of each is about $395. The total dividends, at present rates, are $20.50. A combination of one share of each can be bought on the partial payment plan for an initial deposit of $120 and monthly payments of $23," announces this firm.

W. W. A., PENNSYLVANIA. The bankrupt condition of Missouri Pacific, Wabash and Missouri, Kansas & Texas, and the big decline in the stocks and bonds of these companies has put the security-holders in a sad plight. But these are great properties and those who hold on to their stocks and bonds may eventually recoup part of their losses. It must be recalled that the now splendid Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe was a bankrupt property in 1894, when 40,000 miles of American railroad trackage was in receivers' hands. So also were the Union Pacific, the Northern Pacific, and the Norfolk & Western. Atchison was reorganized in 1895 and the others in 1896. Already a plan of reorganization for the Wabash has been adopted and the new securities have been underwritten.

G. M. D., DELAWARE. Why should you accept a paltry 2 per cent. from the bank for the use of your $3,000 when better opportunities abound? We have little patience for the man who is willing to accept such low rate of interest, wrongly thinking he is getting greater safety to principal. In a recent interview a prominent New York banker, without depreciating the value of thrift, showed that the rich men of today have made their wealth not by toilsome saving alone, but by having the judgment to discern an investment opportunity and the boldness to grasp it. Investment opportunities today are many and varied in character. Railway bonds and stocks, and securities of public utility corporations, municipal bonds, industrial corporation bonds, Western farm loans and real estate mortgages are indicated as possessing the qualities that offer safe and profitable employment of capital savings.

(This page went to press November 11)

HOW IS ONE to decide upon the right securities in which to invest his savings? It must be very confusing to one not accustomed to making such decisions to know how to act? Why not let us help you? We are specialists in this line.

There has not been for years such an opportunity as now exists to make safe investments to afford a large income.

If interested, write to department 748

Harvey Fisk & Sons

62 Cedar Street New York

L. R. LATROBE & Co.

STOCK EXCHANGE SECURITIES
STANDARD OIL STOCKS
ALL CURB SECURITIES

111 Broadway New York

Partial Payment Plan and Investor's Guide (270 pages), revised to date, also Market Letter mailed free on request.

6% FARM MORTGAGES

We offer our services in selecting Farm Mortgages for your investment. Write or call for December list showing loans in $300 to $5,000 amounts. Established in 1909.

SPOONER & ROBINSON
FARM MORTGAGES

10 So. La Salle St. Chicago, Ill.

Farm Land Bond

Netting 6%

Combining:

Abundant Security

Large Earnings

Strong Guarantee

Secured by first mortgage upon high-class farm land in an established district. Cost in 1912 three times present loan. Net earnings last year were over five times interest charges. Guaranteed by two responsible business men.

Ask for Circular No. 894C

Peabody, Houghteling & Co.

(Established 1865)

10 South La Salle Street Chicago

Real Diversity In One Investment

You can obtain real diversity in a single investment by buying the 6% Bonds of a successful Public Utility Company supplying the stable commodities of gas, electric light and power to 331 growing communities with a total population of over 900,000 in twelve States.

Send for Circular H.M. describing these bonds in denominations of $100, $500 and $1000

A. H. Bickmore & Co.
111 BROADWAY, N.Y.

Chas. S. KIDDER & Co.

INVESTMENT BANKERS Est. 1895

YOUR SAVINGS BANK

buys Municipal Bonds because they are one of the safest form of investment. They yield from 5% to 6%, are exempt from the Federal Income Tax and no certificate of ownership is required to collect the coupons. Why not invest your funds in sound Municipal Bonds and obtain the additional income over and above the 3% Savings Bank rate? Write for our latest list of attractive offerings in denominations of $100 and $500.

W.C.T.U. Bldg. Chicago.

OLDEST AND STILL THE BEST INVESTMENT

The most remunerative of sound, conservative investments are our

6% Farm Mortgages

Note margin of safety in this same offering: No. 4546—$2250—Due Dec. 1921. Security for this loan is 320 ac in a first-class farming community with 7 and 8 miles of two good towns. Eminent title; 200 acres under plow. Value, $6000. Write for Booklet "6% and current list."

E. J. LANDER & CO.

Grand Forks, N. D.

Est. 1883

Capital and Surplus, $400,000

"THE 6% INVESTOR"

Is the title of an interesting, instructive article for investment bondholders, savers of money and ALL interested in profitable investments.

It is published in "INVESTMENT FACTORS", and we send free to any reader of Christian Herald. Ask us to put your name on our mailing list—also to send you full details of our attractive offerings, either municipal corporation bonds—whichever you prefer. No charge obligation for doing this.

BOWMAN, COST & COMPANY, Investment Bankers
615 Third National Bank Building St. Louis.

For 36 years we have been paying our customers the highest returns consistent with conservative methods. First mortgage loans of $200 and up. We can recommend after the most thorough personal investigation. Please ask for Loan List No. 19. $25 Certificates of Deposit also for saving investors.

PERKINS & CO. Lawrence, Mo.

THE Young Women's Christian Association Building at the Panama Pacific International Exposition was erected by the National Board upon the request of the Exposition people. Here twenty-one women, chosen because of a special fitness for her work, have carried on many activities of social service.

The whole purpose of the project was twofold: first, to provide comfort and aid to the visitors at the Exposition; and, second, to afford protection, friendliness and a many-sided service for the thousands of girls employed on the Fair Grounds; above all, to give an opportunity to those girls to enter into the joy of Christ and his salvation. Each member of the staff was made responsible for establishing friendly relations with the women in each Palace. Home-like supper parties have been given, crowded by fun and frolic. Over half of the girls who attended these entertainments registered from states outside California, and many of them were completely alone in San Francisco. One evening when the roll call was made of the States of the Union, in response to the word "Massachusetts" nine girls rose in different parts of the room, each of whom worked in a different building, and no two of whom were aware of the other's existence. In less time than it takes to tell it those nine girls had picked up their chairs and carried them over to one corner of the room, where with heads close together they became acquainted.

On one evening there was a little girl from Belgium, two from Norway, one from Japan, one from Switzerland, five from Hawaii, two from Canada and one from Australia. One of these girls said afterward, "You can't possibly know how much that party meant to me. Why, it's the first party I've been to in five years!" She was a twenty-two year old girl who had been supporting herself since she was fourteen; she was working for one of the telegraph companies, and studying stenography and typewriting at night to make herself more proficient; but she was a girl, young and pretty and wholesome, with a perfectly natural love of fun, and she was fairly starving for lack of it.

There is a dividing line on the Exposition Grounds between that portion occupied by the Exposition Palaces and a long brightly-lighted street known as the Zone, where are many of the amusement concessions; the bright lights, the loud-voiced insistent spielmen and all the queer, weird and fascinating shows intended to make the world wander. On this Zone between two and three hundred girls are employed as waiters or cashiers. About half way down its length, between the firehouse and "Samoa," the Young Women's Christian Association built a little club house, and these girls promptly took possession of all its comforts. Many of the dancing girls live on the Zone, and one of their greatest needs is a hot tub and foot baths, and a comfortable, clean rest room where they can lie down and rest weary muscles. The little club house on the Zone has a homelike living room, with big rattan chairs and a piano. There are always flowers on the table. There is a little kitchen where a lunch room where appetizing breakfast or luncheon can be had for from five to eighteen cents. The girls do in to rest for a moment, or do a bit of sewing, and at such moments members of the staff have their chance to learn about the intimate things of their lives, and to help them solve their problems. Field workers go about all afternoon and all evening until the Zone closes, calling on the girls, mingling with them, and knowing them in a true big-sister fashion. It strikes one as a bit unusual, but thoroughly human, to see a group of girls in costume who have dropped in for a moment on Saturday afternoon, standing around the piano and asking for the hymns they knew when they were children. The Ding Girl, the Indian Princess, the women from the Streets of Cairo, and the little Samoan women, all find it a happy place—it's their club.

(Rev.) S. H. ROHOLD, F.R.G.S.

A Business Man's Fight Of Years To Break Into The Church

He wanted to give his ability, money and life to church work. Ministers preached, "God wants men's lives." This man said, "Here I am." Then the ministers said, "Don't take us literally." They didn't know what to do with him. The churches told him there was nothing for him to do—actually closed their doors to him. And clergymen and church workers back up this man and say the church is doing this all the time: they don't want men: they wouldn't know what to do with them if they came.

The most serious indictment of the churches ever printed.
It is in the December

LADIES' HOME JOURNAL

15 Cents—Everywhere

ALSO IN DECEMBER

THE WISE MEN

W. L. Taylor's wonderful painting reproduced in full color

SAXON "SIX"

With Detachable All-Season Top

$935

Now a Six-Cylinder Enclosed Car for $935

Here—in the New Series all-season Saxon "Six" is answered the insistent demand for six-cylinder enclosed car luxury at a moderate price. Here, for the first time—a "Six" of the all-season type is offered at the Saxon price, $935.

This New Series top quality Saxon "Six" now brings the all-season "Six" out of the high priced class.

Men have thought of the enclosed six-cylinder car as a luxury for the few. Men have wanted enclosed car quality at touring car cost. This Saxon "Six" gives it to them.

Here are other high-class features: 2-unit electric starting and lighting system; Timken axles and bearings; linoleum covered floor boards and running boards; silent helical bevel drive gears; high grade body finish; yacht-line body of greater roominess, and a score more of noteworthy features.

See this all-season Saxon at your dealer's and convince yourself of its exceptional value. For literature address Dept. K.

Saxon "Six" Touring $785
With Limousine top 935
Saxon "Six" Roadster 785

Saxon "Four" Roadster $395
With Coupe top 455
Electric starter and lights 50

Saxon Motor Company, Detroit

Young People's Topics for December

Golden Fruit from the Prayer Life.

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topic. Heb. 4:14-16; 11:6

NO CHRISTIAN need feel that his sphere of work is limited. He has all the world and all the heavens to work in when he begins to pray.

John R. Mott said some years ago that he believed the church had only begun to touch the fringes of the possibilities of intercessory prayer. Prayer is almost the greatest mystery in the world, but, as with a power like electricity, the fact of its being mysterious does not in the least lessen the fact that it is powerful. It only makes it the more necessary to master the science, to learn "how to pray."

Our Scripture references give three points in the science of prayer. We are to pray boldly; we are to pray in the name of Jesus; we are to pray in faith.

Begin with our own needs; that is right. But we should soon pass on from these, casting all our care upon him, and entering into Christ's loving ambition for all the world.

Every church, every young people's society, has right on its program the opportunity and the method that can fill it with resistless spiritual power; the weekly prayer meeting ought to be a power center. Right here in the devotional weekly meeting we should bring our personal needs, our society and church needs, our community needs, our hopes for spiritual world conquest. Here we should win victories of faith that will make their power felt far and wide.

My society? Yes. My church? Yes. My life? Yes. Where if not in you and your church and your society are the golden fruits of the prayer life to be reaped? God loves no one on earth better than he loves you. Begin now to be bold. Begin now to believe.

A Nameless Prophet Who Kept Fresh God's Name

Epworth League Topic. Mal. 3:13-18; 4:2

THERE is great mystery about the prophet Malachi. The name means "my messenger," and some scholars think that it was simply the title of one who wrote the book, not his actual name. But whether the prophet's name was Malachi or not, it is evident that he cared more about his message than about getting any personal credit for delivering it. He forgot himself in his message—and it is messages like these that last through the centuries.

Ezra had succeeded in getting the temple rebuilt. Nehemiah had been valiantly in promoting and continuing the resuscitated temple services, but the people, after the captivity as before, were lapsing back to their old faithlessness, when this fiery messenger of Jehovah recalled them to earnestness and fidelity.

People were thinking it did not pertain to serve Jehovah; he told them it did. He said that the prosperity of the good was not enduring. He helped the faithful ones to keep together and to keep the records of God's good dealings with them. Best of all he pointed (Mal. 4:2) to the Sun of righteousness, who was to arise "with healing in his wings."

These four hundred years between the prophesying of this messenger of God and the coming of Jesus were years of spiritual darkness. Four hundred years without a clear-voiced messenger of God! But Malachi had spoken faithfully, and some remembered God's name through the long, dark years. Then Jesus came, bringing heaven's own light; bringing heaven's healing for earth's woes; bringing his own self-knowledge of God to the world that had almost forgotten him.

Are we carrying messages for Christ? No matter whether many or few are the message; no matter whether the message bears our name or not; are we helping the world to remember God's gentle commands and his abundant blessings? We do not need to be fanatical, or queer; we do not need to do fantastic, impossible things. His way is easy and his burden light. We need only, in quiet, every-day ways, to seek and to tell that God is good; we need only to believe and to live so that others will see that we have been like Jesus.

Little Stories of Missionary Work

A MISSIONARY correspondent in Constantinople writes under date of August 17: "On our arrival, we found that the carriages were all commandeered or employed to carry the wounded, so we walked all the way to our embassy, where Mr. and Mrs. Morgenthau with kindness personified insisted on our remaining for a time. The city itself seems more crowded than ever. Soldiers are everywhere. All about the embassy are busy with Red Cross work, visiting hospitals, caring for the provisions, and burying the dead. All are hoping that something may end the war soon, but there are not many signs of anything ending as seen from inside the city. Certainly all classes of people are praying for it."

was satisfied. At the bottom of the leaflet it said: "If you want to know more about this, go to Chung Ju, see the missionaries, and buy some books." The next morning I said to my wife: "I'm going to Chung Ju." I came here, bought tracts, took them home, studied, thought and repented till I saw the light and found peace."

ANOTHER missionary, C. A. D. Las, writes interestingly of a Gospel tour in the Teheran Mountains. At the village of Khor," he says, "a fairly hospitably received us in a large, comfortable room and brought us a tray of welcome food. No one here seemed to read, and as in most villages, only the old men, women and children were about, the able-bodied men being absent in the fields. Another day's march farther down the steep mountain brought us to the town of Jurab (staying). A sandal-maker received us in his well-built house, but cautioned us at the outset, saying, 'I had better tell you plainly that we would prefer your staying none of our dishes.' He of course said this because of the fanatical opinion that Christians and all they touch are unclean. As we walked through the streets and lanes next day we sold a dozen Gospels, a third of all we had brought with us. At the pleasant town of Feshend, resting by the river side, noon arrived, we were surprised to hear a chorus of sweet voices come floating down from the hill on which the town built. It was a band of little schoolboys, up on the mosque roof, singing the praises to prayer. How we long to hear the name of Jesus receive the praise of young and old all over this land! In the whole two weeks' trip, we walked a great circle of 150 miles,

MISS ANNIE MONTGOMERY, missionary at Hamadan, Persia, writes: "The missionary's task in Persia and Syria is not made any the easier when questions like the following are asked: 'Lady, do you think the people of Urumia did not pray?' All I could answer was, 'I do not know what they did, but I do know that God is true.'"

A KOREAN theological student of much promise tells this story of his conversion: "I was a drunken gold miner in a market-place thirty miles from here, and saw a man distributing leaflets. I was ashamed to go up and ask for one, so I slipped in behind the crowd, stuck my hand out under another man's arm, and took one. It was on 'Judgment in This Life and to Come.' When I reached home, I read it to my wife, and she said: 'That's good; read it again.' I did so, and she said: 'Read it again.' I read it four times before she

10 Days Free Trial Charges Prepaid Send No Money

TWICE THE LIGHT HALF THE OIL

NEW KEROSENE LIGHT
Beats Electric or Gasoline

We don't ask you to pay us a cent until you have used this wonderful modern light in your own home ten days. We even prepay transportation charges. You may return it at our expense if not perfectly satisfied after putting it to every possible test for 10 nights. You can't possibly lose a cent. We want to prove to you that it makes an ordinary oil lamp look like a candle; beats electric, gasoline or acetylene. Lights and is put out like old oil lamp. Tests at 33 leading Universities and Government Bureau of Standards show it

Burns 50 Hours on One Gallon

Men Make $50 to $300.00 Per Month With Rigs or Autos

delivering the ALADDIN on our easy trial plan. No previous experience necessary. Practically every farm home and small town home will buy after trying. One farmer who had never sold anything in his life before writes: "I sold 51 lamps the first seven days." Another says: "I disposed of 37 lamps out of 31 calls." Thousands who are coining money endorse the Aladdin just as strongly.

NO MONEY Required We furnish capital to reliable men to get started. Ask for our distributor's plan, and learn how to make big money in unoccupied territory. Sample sent for 10 days FREE TRIAL.

Awarded GOLD MEDAL at World's Exposition San Francisco

common coal oil, and gives more than twice as much light as the best round wick open flame lamps. No odor, smoke or noise, simple, clean, no pressure, won't explode. Several million people already enjoying this powerful, white, steady light, nearest to sunlight. Guaranteed,

$1000 Will Be Given to the person who shows us an oil lamp equal to the new Aladdin (details of offer given in our circular.) Would we dare make such a challenge if there were the slightest doubt as to merits of the Aladdin? We want one user in each locality to whom we can refer customers. Be the first and get our special introductory offer under which you get your own lamp free for showing it to a few neighbors and sending in their orders. Write quick for 10-Day Absolutely Free Trial. Send coupon to nearest office.

MANTLE LAMP COMPANY, 117 Aladdin Bldg.
Largest Kerosene (Coal Oil) Mantle Lamp House in the World
Chicago, New York City, Portland, Ore., Montreal or Winnipeg, Can.

10-Day FREE TRIAL Coupon
I would like to know more about the Aladdin and your Easy Delivery Plan, under which inexperienced men with no money can make big money without capital. This in no way obligates me. 117
Name.....
P.O.
Address.....

The Real Gift

The Enduring Gift

Give Something That GOES

Every child's heart is just set on something that gives a ride. That's why the little folks in your home will be tickled pink with a "Fairy" Velocipede, Bicycle or Tricycle. See their eyes light up on Christmas morning when they see their favorite "Fairy" cycle waiting to take them riding.

Fairy Velocipede, Bicycle, or Tricycle

All "Fairy" cycles are made of highest grade steel—beautifully finished—full nickel-plated parts—ball bearing—scientifically designed—easy to ride. They develop young muscles without fatigue. Doctors endorse them.

Easy to Get

Every "Fairy" product is fully guaranteed. Sold by leading dealers everywhere. If not sold in your immediate locality send for free booklet which illustrates, describes, and gives prices. We will make it easy for you to buy, no matter where you live.

The Worthington Company
505 Cedar Street, Elyria, Ohio

Every Dish a Success

HOW often when you try the hardest, the result is not what should be and the dish, though edible, is a disappointment. But it's hard to happen if you depend upon Grape-Nuts in cooking. Why not store a supply of Grape-Nuts every time—even with things you've never used before?

Mrs. Kirk's Card Indexed Recipes

Don't let you go wrong. Plan and clear directions, accurate but simple measurements, exact cooking time. You can't fail, nothing is left to doubt or guess at. Every recipe the best you can find.

handsomely finished quartered oak cabinet with 250 printed recipes indexed for instant finding, postpaid for $3.00. Send today. Money back if you want it.

The Alice Gitchell Kirk Co.
1902 Euclid Avenue
Cleveland, O.

ited many remote villages, talked with many people and sold thirty-three Scripture portions—all we had. Surely some of this seed cast on the mountains will by and by be found springing up into blossom, and yielding handfuls of grain."

WRITING from Chile, Missionary W. E. Browning says: "The economic condition of the country has been deeply affected by the war. This is evidenced on every side. The laboring class in particular finds itself in a difficult situation and poverty stalks the streets. It is among the working class that the Protestant missions have their most important work. Wages have fallen, but the average workman is glad to get employment at any price. The government is reducing its expenditures in every line. Schools and colleges are being combined in such a way as to save the salaries and rents and foreign contracts are being canceled. It is probable that Chile will come out of this period of trial strengthened and bettered. New lines of national industries will have been developed. New markets will have been entered and drawn upon. New international friendships will have been established."

MISS ESTHER V. HESSEL, who went to India in 1913, sends the following account of a wedding festival changed from a heathen performance to a service of Christian praise: "One day I entered a home and found a wedding festival in full sway. The ladies' court was crowded with as gay a set of dresses as I have ever laid eyes upon. The women were seated about a drum, eating and singing songs too bad to mention. The bride was brought to me, a girl in pale green silk bordered with silver and heavy with jewelry. Then the women put down the drum and asked me to sing. I hesitated but a second, for I knew song had often displaced the devil, and I started a lively 'ghadgen.' There were about a dozen of my girls present, and they took up the hymns; then the mothers joined in and soon every woman in the room was singing. They soon caught the joy, for I saw their eyes sparkle as they smiled back into mine. We sang until after sundown and I went home happy, especially because of the testimony of an old woman whom I had taught as she explained the songs, and also because we had turned a heathen festival into a chorus of praise."

MISSIONARY C. A. CARRIEL, writing from Brazil, says: "One of the most hopeful signs of the times is the new spirit of brotherliness which is growing among the different denominations. On a return visit to Rio Negro in the State of Parana, I found that a theater had been engaged for a Gospel meeting. The attendance was not large—perhaps forty each night. However, on the last night seventy people listened to the 'Return of the Prodigal Son.' The silence in the audience was impressive, and the earnest faces said to the preacher, 'Sir, we would see Jesus.' After the benediction men lingered; there was no hurry to get out. I have not seen anything like it. It seemed as though they had received a new conception of human nature and life, a new conception which their consciences confirmed. The preacher shook hands with all as they went out. The first communion service of the Presbyterian congregation of Rio Negro was held Sunday morning, August 15. To avoid a possible disturbance it was held not in the theater, but in the home of Brother José, where the Gospel is preached every Sunday. Five professed their faith and are the first fruits of five months' work in Rio Negro. At Lapa I had an interesting experience. I was walking slowly through the streets, seeking opportunity to talk with some one, and as I passed a house I noticed a well-dressed man at his desk, and he came to the window. I went back to speak to him and was invited in. We were soon talking about religion. He was most cordial, and his wife brought us coffee. During the conversation he said that he had once owned the theater; that gave me an opportunity to say, 'I suppose it would be much better if we could have our services in the theater; the Igreja Protestante is small and far. I wanted to rent the theater, but a prohibitory price was asked.' To my astonishment (though I had given the opportunity) he said: 'I can get the theater for you for nothing. Will you speak there?' I agreed and he kept his word. Saturday night 200 people heard the Gospel. The little theater was filled. The common people were there, and so were some of the best families. The hymns went well and we all were surprised. After the sermon, one of the leading men of Lapa invited us to breakfast with him the next day, which was his birthday. He was a Roman Catholic, and when I asked if we Americans had a mission among his people, he replied, 'Yes, a twofold mission: to correct the abuses of the Roman Church and to give religious comfort to the people; that is, to give the masses the Gospel.' Some day some of these men and women I met will be the first members of the church of Lapa."

When the Baby's Sick

SAY! Y' know our baby? Well! he's sick t'day. An' yister-day the doctor Jes' couldn't stay away. He come three times a-runnin'. An' runnin' good an' quick, Fer Pa won't stand fer foolin' Wen the baby's sick!

MA she's jes' a-jumpin', Fixin' up the bed, An' tellin' all the neighbors What the doctor said; Pa can't read his paper, Ner go t' work, ner joke, Jes' waitin' on the baby, An' tryin' not t' choke.

SIS she does the cookin', An' bein' awful nice, An' she's been a-cryin', Fer I seen her twice! "Looks like I been cryin'?" Say! Y're not s' slick! You ain't got no baby, An' our baby's sick!

CHARLES IRVIN JUNKIN.

A Cry from China

LITTLE HAI IEH TSI (the "Abused Leaf"—a Story of Childhood and its Perils in Heathen China. All who are interested in sweet and innocent childhood will find this a fascinating story. A postal card addressed to "China Orphans, Christian Herald Bible House, New York" will bring you free copies of this illustrated booklet.

WISE WORDS

A Physician on Food.

A physician out in Oregon has views about food. He says:

"I have always believed that the duty of the physician does not cease with treating the sick, but that we owe it to humanity to teach them how to protect their health especially by hygienic and dietetic laws.

"With such a feeling as to my duty I take great pleasure in saying, that, in my own experience and also from personal observation, I have found no food to equal Grape-Nuts and that I find there is almost no limit to the great benefit this food will bring when used in all cases of sickness and convalescence.

"It is my experience that no physical condition forbids the use of Grape-Nuts. To persons in health there is nothing so nourishing and acceptable to the stomach especially at breakfast to start the machinery of the human system on the day's work.

"In cases of indigestion I know that a complete breakfast can be made of Grape-Nuts and cream; and I think it is necessary not to overload the stomach at the morning meal. I also know the great value of Grape-Nuts when the stomach is too weak to digest other food.

"This is written after an experience of more than 20 years treating all manner of chronic and acute diseases, and the letter is voluntary on my part without any request for it."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

Put this Long-Life Roofing on Your Home.

YOU save many a future repair bill when you use Asphalt Shingles. They last longer than most other roofings and do not crack, break or blow up. They are beautifully colored—and the color never fades.

Asphalt Shingles

"The Roof that Stays Young"

They are cold proof and keep the top story warmer in winter. And they will protect your home from burning sparks.

Use them when relaying your old roof. They are handsomer than other roofings, yet cost no more.

Write for Free Book, "The Roof Distinctive."

Asphalt Shingle Publicity Bureau
856 Marquette Bldg., Chicago

Get This Money-Saving Book

FREE All Charges Prepaid Subject to Examination

SEE SPECIAL OFFER BELOW

EASIEST READING BIBLE

The Bible has never been published in any form in which the reading of it has been made so attractive to both old and young as in the "International" CHRISTIAN WORKERS' BIBLE

By an entirely new plan, a thread of red ink, running from Genesis to Revelation, binds in one harmonious whole each leading topic. All the precious truths which lie hidden under the mass of unconnected matter and escape the mere reader are brought to light and tied together.

The Rev. Jesse Lyman Hurlbut, D.D., the popular authority in Bible themes, has arranged on this plan Three Thousand Selected Texts.

PROMINENT PEOPLE'S OPINIONS

John Wanamaker: International Christian Workers' Bible is an advance on anything hitherto attempted in making the Bible usable.

Lyman Abbott: Valuable to Christian Workers in their endeavor to get at the teaching of the Bible directly and immediately, and not through the medium of commentaries.

BOUND IN FINE MOROCCO divinity cream, with overlapping covers like illustration, round corners, gold edges, red underneath. Size of page 5 1/2 x 8 1/2 inches, beautifully printed in extra large clear type on extra fine paper, also contains Latest Teachers' Helps to Bible Study.

SPECIAL OFFER The Christian Workers' Bible will be SENT FREE for examination, ALL CHARGES PREPAID. If it does not please you, return it at our expense. If it does please you, remit special price. Published at $4.75, but for a limited time we offer this handsomest, most usable Bible at the Special Price of only $2.50. Send no money but fill in and mail coupon.

THE JOHN C. WINSTON CO.
PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Largest American Bible Publishers

SEND NO MONEY. Cut out coupon and mail today. THE JOHN C. WINSTON CO., 1000 Arch St., Philadelphia, Pa. Please send me a copy of the Christian Workers' Bible. I will pay for it when it comes in a day's time. $2.85 X1

Third Annual Christmas Sale at less than half price of this superb, self-pronouncing, India Paper

Bible

This is only the third time in the 49 years' history of the S. S. Scranton Co., known everywhere as the leader in reduced prices and phenomenal bargains in standard religious books, that we are able to present such extraordinary Bible value.

These Bibles are made in America which absolutely insures immediate or Christmas delivery.

This India Paper Bagster Bible is about half the weight, thickness, and bulk of the ordinary paper edition. The India paper used in these genuine Bagster Bibles is the costliest, thinnest, the whitest, the toughest, the most opaque that the world's best mills can produce. It has nearly 1,200 pages, including a complete Concordance, References, colored maps so indispensable to Teachers,

Pastors, Superintendents, Bible Students, Evangelists, and

This shows the beautiful clear type in exact size

191 K. 8. 15
20 De. 27. 15;
1 Co. 14. 16
21 Ch. 1. 3. 13
d in the morning and in the evening
22 Ex. 39. 38; Nu. 28. 3, 4

CHAPTER 17. 355

NOW¹ it came to pass, as Dā'vid sat in his house, that Dā'vid said to Nā'than the prophet, Lo, I dwell in an house of cedars, but the ark of the covenant of the LORD remaineth under curtains.
2 Then² Nā'than said unto Dā'vid, Do all that is in thine heart; for God is with thee.
3 And it came to pass the same night, that the word of God came Christian Workers generally, but is only seven-eighths of an inch thick and weighs only 19 ounces. Its superb silk sewn, leather lined GENUINE MOROCCO leather binding, and its luminous red under gold edges make it not only exquisitely beautiful, but it is protected by its because of which we can and do absolutely guarantee the binding not to break or crease, and to outwear any other.

PATENTED UNBREAKABLE BACK

A Royal Christmas Gift for Scholar, Teacher, Pastor, Superintendent or Friend that will not only delight the recipient, but will be a lifelong credit to the giver.

Of Supreme Importance This Genuine Bagster Bible must not be confounded with the cheap imitations claimed to be printed on "thin" paper or "Bible" paper and bound in so-called "leather." "Thin" paper and "Bible" paper are not the expensive INDIA paper on which this genuine Bagster Bible is printed. The edition is limited and only when orders are sent in promptly can we guarantee delivery before Christmas. Money cheerfully refunded and delivery charges paid both ways if you do not agree that this is the most extraordinary Bible value you ever saw.

NOTE—For 50 cents additional we will furnish our Thumb Index Edition and stamp name in pure gold on outside front or back cover.

THE S. S. SCRANTON CO., 103 Trumbull Street, Hartford, Conn.

Christian Herald Prayer League

MRS. J. A. HARDY, Mother of the Prayer League, writes to tell us of an answer to her prayers. She says: "I must tell you that the good Lord has answered my prayer recently for my husband, who was suffering with asthma. I asked the Lord to relieve him of his suffering and heal him if it was his will, and the answer came almost immediately, for in a short while he was easy and sleeping quietly and has had no symptom of a return since." Rev. S. S. H., Lititz, Pa., writes: "Last January I asked you to pray for a revival of religion in my church and that many souls might be saved. God answered your prayers and I received more than one hundred into the church." Mrs. F. C. writes from Vandalia, Ill.: "I write to acknowledge answered prayer in behalf of a young man. He has been converted and restored to health, for which I am so thankful." E. V., Hutchinson, Kan., writes: "I believe the prayers of the League were answered for the conversion of my husband, who was killed a few months ago, as he was a changed man for nearly a year before his death." A Subscriber, Baileyville, Kan., writes: "Over one year ago I sent a request to the Prayer League for prayer for the healing of a brother who had been sick for several months and was hardly able to walk from one room to another. In a few weeks after sending the request we had a letter from him and he had been down town and before a great while he went to work." Mrs. E. F. R., New York, writes to tell of an answered prayer for healing. She says: "Some months ago I wrote to the Prayer League asking prayer for healing from nervous melancholia. Last Sunday, through no apparent effort of my own, the cloud suddenly lifted, and I have been happy ever since." Mrs. J. S. writes from Norridgewock, Me.: "About nine months ago I wrote you asking you to pray God to give me back my health. At that time it looked to us all as though it was almost impossible, but today I am writing to tell you that I am so much improved as to be able to do quite a little work. A reader who signs herself "Faith" writes: "I wish to acknowledge answer to prayer in financial trouble, for which I thank God."

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS of answers to prayer have also been received from:

Mrs. J. G., Dustin, Okla.; Mrs. E. R. G., Indianapolis, Ind.; Mrs. S. F. McD., Lytton, Iowa; Mrs. R. P. B., Montgomery, Ala.; Mrs. M. V. M., Dodge City, Kan.; Miss H., Newport News, Va.; Mrs. M. M., Bertrand, Mo.; Mrs. F. P., Denton, Mont.; L. D. F., Mobile, Ala.; Reader, South Carolina; A Reader, Chino, Calif.; Mrs. E. O. C., Des Moines, Iowa; P. S., Mehawka, Neb.; A Friend, Glendale, Calif. (for financial aid); Mrs. M. H., Knoxville, Tenn.; E. J., Poynette, Wis.; Mrs. O., Round Lake, N. Y.; Mrs. L. T. D., Bellingham, Wash.; M. K., Youngstown, Ohio; Mrs. W. W. T., Ontario.

Prayers are asked for revivals of religion at Lititz, Pa.; Vandalia, Ill.; Protection, Kan.; Wilawana, Pa. (that saloons may be kept out of the county); Fort Wayne, Ind. (that pastor may be filled with the Holy Spirit); Lytton, Iowa; Sydney, N. D.; McFall, Mo. (for Gospel meetings now in progress); Lebanon, Ky.; Carterville, Mo.; Empire and Glen Arbor, Mich.; San Diego, Calif.; Allegan, Mich.; Quincy, Pa.; Baileyville, Kan.; Hazardville, Conn. Mrs. L. C. D., Chapman, Kan., asks prayer that twelve young men may accept Jesus as their Saviour; M. I. R., that the county of Beaver, Pa., may be voted dry; Mr. and Mrs. W. C. ask prayer for a revival in their town not named. Mrs. E. L., that an evangelist may be sent to Empire and Glen Arbor, Mich., a man filled with the Holy Spirit.

Mrs. S. S. B. asks prayer that her son's mind may be strengthened; Miss J. C. N., and Mrs. S. K. C. ask prayer that their sisters' minds may be restored; E. L., her brother's; Mrs. H. C. M. and A Reader, their husbands'; Mrs. E. E., a missionary's; Mrs. M. B. that husband's mind may be strengthened. Ten other friends ask prayer for mental restoration or strengthening for other friends or themselves.

Eighteen parents ask prayer for the conversion of their sons; nineteen wives, their husbands. Forty-nine other friends ask prayer for the conversion of friends or relatives.

Seventeen friends ask prayer for special spiritual blessing for relatives or friends.

Continued on page 1206

Fels-Naptha Days of the Week

1st

Washday. Of course you need Fels-Naptha Soap to-day to make your clothes clean, fresh and sweet smelling, and to get the washing done in the usual time without hard rubbing or standing over the tub.

Even if you use a washing machine you need Fels-Naptha because the naptha and other harmless cleaners in the soap make your clothes bold as though they had been carefully hand-washed.

2nd

Cleaning Day. For your painted wall and woodwork there is nothing better than Fels-Naptha. It takes marks off of paint like magic and does not dull the surface. Takes stains off of rugs, carpets or linings. Directions on the wrapper.

3rd

Every day you need Fels-Naptha for washing dishes, pots and pans and glassware. It keeps kitchen utensils bright and shining and makes china and glass glisten. No need for soda and other hardon-the-hands preparations. Fels-Naptha will dissolve grease because of the naptha in it.

4th

On bath-day Fels-Naptha will easily take off the greasy scum left in a tub around the tub. Makes porcelain bowls, stationary washstands, etc. shine with cleanliness. And all this with a cloth and Fels-Naptha instead of the scrubbing brush necessary with other cleaners. Fine for tiled floors, too.

There's a reason why Fels-Naptha does all kinds of work—the way it washes, cleans, everything—easier, better and in much less time. Fels-Naptha is a combination of good soap, naptha and other wonderful cleansers. And this combination does the hard part of your work for you. Use it every day in the year for all your soap-and-water work.

Fels & Co., Philadelphia

Famous Singers Praise

LUDEX'S MENTHOL CANDY COUGH DROPS

Let LUDEN'S guard your voice—keep nasal passages clear, and throat healthy. No narcotics; no coloring. Have many uses.

WM. H. LUDEN
Manufacturing Confectioner
READING, PA.

In the Yellow Box 5c

"DON'T SHOUT"

Anyone can adjust it. Over one hundred thousand sold. Write for booklet and testimonials.

THE MORLEY CO., Dept. 754, Perry Bldg., Phila.

PATENTABLE IDEAS WANTED. Manufacturers want Owen patents. Send for 3 free books; inventions wanted, etc. I get patent or no fee. Manufacturing facilities. RICHARD B. OWEN, 53 Owen Bldg., Washington, D. C.

DON'T Pay Two PRICES HOOSIER Stoves & Ranges FREE

Try in your own home for 30 days. Show your friends. Freight paid by us. Send it back at our expense if you do not want to keep it. You can buy the best at Actual Factory Prices. Our new improvements equal anything ever produced. Save enough on a single stove to buy your winter's fuel. ALL HOOSIER STOVES Guaranteed for Years. Send postal today for large FREE Catalogue, showing large assortment to select from.

No Obligations.

HOOSIER STOVE CO.
164 State St., MARION, IND.

CHRISTMAS SPENDING MONEY—26 Xmas greetings, Cards, Seals, Tags, all for ten cents. Send dime for full sized package and special prices to agents. Green-Whites, Elks Temple, Detroit, Michigan

It's just as easy to be a business farmer as it is to be just a farmer

—and you make more money at it

The business of The Country Gentleman is to help build up business farms. It doesn't stop with the growing of crops. It deals, too, with the selling of crops. The alert storekeeper does not dress his windows like the man across the street. He takes a good idea from a thousand miles away.

The COUNTRY GENTLEMAN

It is for the kind of farmer who is not content to do just as his neighbors are doing.

It gathers the best and newest farming ideas wherever they are in operation and brings them to your farm.

It tells the stories of how men have actually done things.

The United States Department of Agriculture works nationally. So does The Country Gentleman.

Practical farmers write for it from every farming state and section.

The Country Gentleman is a national farm paper—for the whole country.

It is a complete farm paper—for every kind of farming.

It is a business farm paper—for men who want to sell what they raise.

And it's a weekly—52 times a year for one dollar.

Regular departments are:

Round the Farm—A page of building plans and short-cuts.

Good Methods in the Field—A page of crops, tested seeds and fertilizers.

The Business of Dairying—A page on milking, bottling, sanitation, distribution and sale.

Live Items About Livestock—A page from stock barn, pasture, feed lot, farrowing pen.

National Farm Progress—A page of news from the Department of Agriculture in Washington.

The Market Garden—A page for the man who grows truck for market.

Commercial Fruit Growing—A page from the orchard and berry patch.

Everyman's Garden—A page for the home gardener, a year-round diary for the man with a small place.

The Child's Garden—A page of work with the youngsters in home and school gardens.

Women's Interests—Several pages for the farm wife and mother—her problems in home-making and housekeeping; her club interests; fashions, cooking, fancy work, helpful hints.

And every week from six to ten special articles of broad scope by special farm investigators.

The Country
Gentleman
Box 502

The Curtis
Publishing Company

Independence Square, Philadelphia

Enclosed please find $1.00. (Canadian price $1.75.) Please send The Country Gentleman for one year to the address below:

Name _____

Address _____

R. F. D. Route _____

Business is booming!

Dayton, Ohio.

Merchants everywhere tell our 800 salesmen that business is booming.

Farmers have had two record crops, at big prices, with big demand at home and abroad.

Stocks of manufactured material are short, and labor is in great demand.

Exports largely exceed imports.

Factories are busy, many working overtime.

More freight cars are needed, and steamers are taxed to capacity.

People are living better, and spending their money more freely.

This country has the best money in the world, and more of it than ever before.

Such a combination of favorable circumstances never has occurred before, and probably will never occur again.

Billions of dollars are passing over the merchants' counters.

The people who spend this money want the best service.

They demand it in all kinds of stores, from the smallest to the largest.

They get it in stores which use our up-to-date Cash Registers, which quicken service, stop mistakes, satisfy customers, and increase profits.

Over a million merchants have proved our Cash Registers to be a business necessity.

[Signed]

John H. Patterson

Write for booklet to
The National Cash Register Co.
Dayton, Ohio.

Crawford's ORANGE MARMALADE

Made from a good old Scotch Recipe

The rich flavor of fresh-picked California Oranges is wonderfully well preserved in Crawford's Orange Marmalade, by a process used in Scotland for over a hundred years. Contains nothing but oranges, lemons, sugar and water—no gelatine, preservatives or other adulteratives. It is Absolutely Pure.

Crawford's has all the fine qualities of imported Orange Marmalade without its bitterness. Once sample it and you will always prefer it. 25-cent sample packages sent postpaid for 10-cent stamps or coin, and your grocer's name and address. 10 oz. package 15 cents. One dozen 10 oz. packages express prepaid anywhere in the U. S. for $2.00. Put up in sanitary containers, will keep for many months, money returned if unsatisfactory not in good condition on arrival. Send orders to:

THOMAS CRAWFORD
312 Masonic Temple, Anaheim, Calif.

WHY OVERWORK

3 in One oil will save any housewife much hard work. Instead of spending part of every day cleaning and polishing furniture, woodwork, picture frames, bathroom fixtures, etc., use 3-in-One just once in a while. 3-in-One removes dust and grime, covers up scratches and scars, keeps everything clean and bright.

Every woman should learn "the new way" to polish furniture. It's worth dollars but costs nothing. FREE Send us your name and the name of your dealer. Get "the new way" to polish furniture and sample bottle of 3-in-One, both absolutely free.

3-IN-ONE OIL CO., 42 CS. Broadway, New York

MAGAZINES

J. M. Hanson-Bennett Magazine Agency is the largest in the world. You can save money on the magazine you want by writing for

This Catalog FREE

Our new Catalog lists more than 3000 Periodicals and Club Offers. IT'S A BIG MONEY SAVER. Send us your name and address on post card today and get this big free catalog. Don't now Agents Wanted. Write for full particulars.

J. M. HANSON-BENNETT Magazine Agency
222 Brooks Building Chicago, Illinois

Precious Promise Bible

Something Entirely New—Just Off the Press

ALL THE PROMISES IN RED

Most Comforting Bible Published

The famous, international clear type, self pronouncing edition with all the teacher's helps. Beautifully illustrated in colors. Leather, only $3.75. Descriptive Circular Free.

SEND FOR OUR FREE CATALOGS of Song Books, Bibles, Bible Motives, Christian Workers' Helps, Missionary Books, Temperance Books, Purity Books, Christian Evidence and Anti-Infidel Books, Peace Literature, etc. Agents Wanted. We have the Most Complete Catalogs Published. GLAD TIDINGS PUBLISHING CO. Lakeside Building CHICAGO, ILL.

Christian Herald Prayer League

Continued from page 1204

E. R. W. asks prayer that a sister's sight may be restored: Mrs. M. A. H., a brother's: N. M. Mc., a daughter's: Mrs. G., that husband's son's and own sight may be healed. Seven other friends ask prayer for the restoration or strengthening of sight for themselves or other friends.

Thirty friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing.

A Mother asks prayer that two sons may be saved from the liquor habit: Mrs. S. S. D., J. A., Mrs. H. N. R., A. C., and Mrs. T. W. B., their sons; four friends, their husbands. Eleven other readers ask prayer that friends or relatives may be delivered from the liquor habit.

Fifty-nine friends ask prayer for the healing of friends or relatives, including I. McC., who asks that a friend may regain the use of limbs; and Mrs. T. H. P., that niece may regain the power of speech. Forty-four ask prayer for healing for themselves.

Fifty-nine friends ask prayer for the granting of varied desires and needs, including Mrs. S. M., who asks that she may hear from a granddaughter; A Sorrowing Friend, "that God will deliver my innocent friends from the sorrow which threatens them"; Mrs. E. E. W., that sister and herself may overcome hard feelings for each other and that husband may forgive his brother. E. V. asks prayer for a lady who is passing through a very sore trial, that she may be drawn closer to God.

Had Never Heard of Jesus

"I ONCE was invited to an obscure village in the interior of Hainan," writes Rev. George D. Byers. "The people said that white men had never been there before, but some of them had been to the mission station and brought back a Chinese Bible and hymn book. In one home a father surprised me by calling his child, who repeated for me several Christian hymns and the Lord's Prayer. A crowd gathered, and after telling them the story of Jesus, I turned to an old man of eighty years, who had listened attentively, and asked if he had ever heard of Jesus before. He replied, 'No, I never did.' In another home the Bible was brought out and I was asked to read and tell them something of its message. I gladly did this, and before I was through and had prayed for them, the house was filled with eager hearers. Truly the Scripture is being fulfilled: 'The Isles shall wait for His Law.'"

Do You Know Your Bible?

New Questions

Half-Year Contest, List No. 4; Year's Contest, List No. 9

PHILIPPIANS

(Use Book of Acts as well as Epistle to Philippians in finding answers)

1. (a) What expressions show that Paul was in captivity at the time of writing this epistle? (b) What signs are there that it was written from Rome?

2. (a) Who carried the letter? (b) What had recently happened to this man? (c) What had caused this?

3. (a) What expression shows that this man had recently come as a messenger to Paul from the Philippian Christians? (b) What had he brought with him?

4. (a) On what other occasions had the Philippians manifested in this same way their friendship for Paul? (b) How many times had Paul visited Philippi? (c) In whose house had he resided there? (d) To what friends does he now send greetings?

5. (a) Does Paul feel that his imprisonment has retarded the gospel? (b) Why?

6. In what great verse does Paul sum up the purpose of his life? This expression appears as the epitaph on what is believed to be St. Paul's tomb in the Basilica of St. Paul, just outside Rome.

7. (a) What is Paul's great argument for humility? (b) How much had Paul given up for Christ's sake? (c) Upon what was he relying for salvation? (d) How was this to be attained?

8. (a) What standard does Paul appear both to claim and to disclaim? (The explanation is that in one use of the word he is speaking of his mental and physical attainments as well as his spiritual; in the other he is speaking merely of the consistent motive of his own life and that of his faithful fellow Christians.) (b) In what eloquent language does he express his determination for the future?

9. (a) Which of the Christian graces, or emotions, is most often mentioned and exhorted in this epistle? (b) How does Paul sum up his advice for the Christian's daily needs? (c) What will result? (d) Upon what sort of things must the Christian's mind be set?

10. (a) What was Paul's great boast as to his ability to do or bear? (b) In what beautiful words does he describe the Christian's abundant resources?

New Styles 1916 Prices Mail Post for Kalamazoo stove and range—get whole lot—30 days' trial—year's test. We freight and ship within 24 hours. Write today for Catalog No. 1

Kalamazoo Stove Co., Mfrs. Kalamazoo, Mich.

Stoves, ranges, gas stoves, furnaces, metal kitchen cabinets and tables. We have 400,000 in stock. Say which you want.

300,000 miles using Kalamazoo Stoves, Ranges, Gas Stove Furnaces, Metal Kitchen Cabinets and tables.

"A Kalamazoo" Direct to You

ADLER'S PLAN SAVES HALF

Before you decide on an organ for Church, Sunday School or Young Peoples' Society, you should get my big FREE ORGAN BOOK and details of my direct-from-factory selling plan. I will save you big money.

CHURCH ORGANS

Any size or style shipped freight prepaid for an absolutely free trial. Price so low and terms so easy that no Church, Sunday School or Young Peoples' Society need be without a sweet-toned, resonant, durable, highest grade organ. My organs won't last prize at St. Louis World's Fair and National Convention Exposition. Fifty year guarantee. Send for big, free book of all styles of organs for Churches, Sunday Schools, etc.

C. L. ADLER, Pres., ADLER ORGAN CO., 8009 W. Chestnut Street, Louisville, Ky.

Earn a Good Income in Your Own Home

Help to meet the huge demand for knitted goods created by the war. Industrious persons can secure profitable, year-round employment on Auto-Knitter. Experience is unnecessary, distance immaterial. Write for particulars, rates of pay. Send two cents in stamps.

AUTO KNITTER HOSIERY CO. of Leicester, England

147F Franklin Street, Buffalo, N. Y.

10c for a $1.00 88-note Music Roll

PERFECTION if accompanied by mes of 2 owners of 88-note player pianos. Hundreds to select from. Special time-limit offer. Say whether you want coin or stamps, and required names, we will send one "Perfection" hand played 88-note roll and outstanding log, which tells how and why we can make perfect rolls at our regular price, 25c instead of $1.00 roll only to a customer under this offer.

THE LISZT COMPANY, 1332 Broadway, New York City

Health is Yours

If you follow the teaching of Dr. Elna Lee, editor of the Health Culture Magazine. Every month it is brim full of hints and tips for cures without drugs, and right eating, breathing, exercising, etc. $1.00 a year; 15c a month. 6 months' "trial" for 25 cents. Send today for your first six months' add to your health. Money back if not satisfied.

HEALTH CULTURE, 513 ST. JAMES BLDG., N. YORN

Why Hens Stop Laying

E. J. REEFER, the poultry expert, is giving away, FREE, a valuable book explaining every farm and backyard hen can be made to produce 200 eggs per year. The book contains scientific facts of vital interest to every poultry raiser. Write for one of the valuable books—FREE.

Dept. 9498 Nelson Bldg. Kansas City, Mo.

"FANNY CROSBY" tells her Life Story in 100 Years. The Only Authorized Autobiography (Illustrated) With SUPPLEMENTARY CHAPTER, giving details of her last days. Postpaid, $1.25. AGENTS WANTED. JAMES H. EARLE CO., Pubs., 28 School St., Boston. "MY TRIP TO EUROPE." Gives the experiences of an American girl in her travels and adventures. A. VOEGELIN, 53 W. Seymour St., Germantown, Pa.

Our Mail-Bag

NOTICE

THE editors of the Christian Herald will be glad to answer any question addressed to the Mail-Bag provided it be of general interest and merely personal. Correspondents may use a de plume to identify the question, but all letters must contain name and address of the writer, in addition to the nom de plume. No attention will be paid to anonymous letters.

Questions and Answers

3. L. Iowa. I am in deep trouble about a thing I said to my dear husband just before he died. I can't tell you how bad I feel about it. How can I get relief? I can't go to him and get forgiveness. It is hard to bear.

It would be difficult to find any one mournful friend who does not feel to some extent this same regret you speak of. Every one can recall unused opportunities to make happy those who are gone, and far too often can also recall words and deeds positively kind. But we simply must not allow our minds to dwell on these past mistakes and regrets. What our dear ones wish for us most is that we may be happy and helpful now. We have many good reasons for believing that we know our present life and circumstances; they know that we regret these unkindnesses of the past. You say you cannot tell your husband you are sorry, but you are not positively sure of that. Perhaps you can tell him, perhaps he does hear you when you say so. These are among the things that we do not yet understand. But we do know that we must bravely face the tasks of the present and meet them with cheerfulness and faith. Lay aside the remorse and regret that unfits you for cheering and helping others. Ask God to give you freely; ask him to cleanse your heart from all its present unkindness and sinfulness; trust him completely to make all the wrongs of the past right and to help you to live a life of sweetness, thoughtfulness, kindness and cheer throughout the future.

N. Baldwin, Iowa. What does the author of the hymn "Just As I Am" mean by the expression "healing of the mind"? Have we reason for believing that the author wrote the hymn largely out of her own experience?

It is likely that the author was thinking solely of the mental relief and health that come from trusting Christ. The newer ideas about bodily healing through mental suggestion were not widely known then, so it is not likely she was thinking of that. But we recognize it as perfectly true that the grace of Christ brings mental health and rest and that this in turn up and strengthens the whole body. The following paragraph from Dr. Bank's book "Immortal Hymns and Their Story" gives some light on the last part of your question: "Casar Malan, of Geneva, Switzerland, was long entertained in the home of Miss Elliott. A young lady was then in failing health, and during an evening conversation that earnest missionary asked her if she thought herself to be an experimental Christian. She was at first inclined to resent so personal a conversation, but a reply that personal religion was a matter she did not wish to discuss. Dr. Malan answered with great gentleness that he would not pursue the matter if it displeased her, but he would pray that she might become a Christian. Some days afterward she apologized to the minister for her rude answer, and said: 'I do not know how to find Christ. I want you to help me.' Dr. Malan's reply was, 'Come to me just as you are.' Neither of them thought at the time that that simple reply would be caught up in song by the whole Christian world, and be repeated for many years to come. It was this reply of Dr. Malan to her personal question that first led to her conversion, which Miss Elliott's inspiration in writing her famous hymn."

Corried. 1. If I have tried and cannot become a Christian by attending church and Sunday school do you think it is right to continue being a hypocrite by pretending to be what I am not, thereby perhaps doing more harm than good? 2. Isn't it wrong to sing hymns when I do not mean what they say?

In the first place, you fall into the old error of thinking that we become Christians by trying. It is not by trying but by trusting, by making an effort, but by stopping our endeavors and looking to Christ alone. It is that which brings the new life, the new strength, the new hope, the new joy. But even though you have failed so far to trust Christ completely and joyously, that is no reason for your separating yourself from church and Sunday school. When John Wesley was founding his Methodist societies his only requirement for membership was "a desire to flee from the wrath to come." So long as you do not actually testify to experiences you do not possess you are not acting as a hypocrite. But why not begin just now to trust the Saviour, really believing that he does forgive your sins and cleanse your heart? 2. No. Join with others in the singing. But put your will to the task of making a complete consecration, and as you sing accept the rich grace of Christ to make you wholly his.

J. R. M., Phoenix, B. C. 1. Lord Kelvin was a Christian and a scientist. In that sense he was a Christian scientist. But we have not the slightest reason for believing that he was a Christian Scientist in the sense of belonging to the Christian Science sect. 2. We do not know of any eminent scientist who believes in Christian Science, and are strongly inclined to believe there are none.

S. U. E., East Schodack, N. Y. The passage in I Sam. 7:2 is better expressed in the translation which reads "and it came to pass, from the day that the ark abode in Kirjath-jearim,"

G. N. C., Manderson, Wyo. Your friend is misinformed. According to reports of the State medical authorities of New York, New Hampshire and Massachusetts, the chief contributing causes of insanity were these in order named: alcoholic indulgence, heredity and nervous strain.

C. L. H., Pooleville, Okla. Please through your question box of the Herald tell me how many subscribers you have to the Herald.

An average of 306,810 copies were mailed weekly during the past year.

G. B., Clinton, Iowa. The total number of Christians in the world at the present time is estimated at 564,510,000, or about one-third of the total population. It should be understood that this total represents nominal Christians, and includes Roman Catholics, the Oriental churches and all the Protestant churches. No reliable estimate can be made of the increase in the last fifty years, although in view of that period having been one of the greatest missionary activity, the increase must have

Her Thanksgiving Day Sermon

By EBEN E. REXFORD

NOW, Dan'el, this is Thanksgivin'—a day when the good Lord meant That we should set down an' think over the blessin's he has sent, An' give him the credit that's due him for the good things he bestows; But you've got into the habit, as every one round you knows, Of findin' fault with most things an' overlookin' the good, An' you don't thank the Giver for 'em as a decent Christian should.

NOW, Dan'el, I'm goin' to be honest an' tell you, plain an' square, What I think about your grumblin'—you don't use the good Lord fair. You fret 'cause the corn was a failure; you worry about the grass, But never a word, my husban', about the dear little lass That the Lord in his merciful kindness gave back when we thought she must die. What's all the corn in the country, an' everything else, say I. To the child that the Lord has spared us? So, if you are bound to complain, Act honest, an' give God the credit for your blessin's as well as your pain.

YOU know just as well as I do that the sun doesn't always shine, But all our frettin' an' worry won't clear your sky or mine. It's a good deal better, my husban', to take things as they be, When we can't make 'em any different, as sensible folks agree. If a thing can't be helped, don't worry, but make the best of it, dear, An' think about all life's good things till the cloudy sky gets clear. It's foolish an' wicked—yes, wicked—I say it out plain an' square— To look at the dark side always. 'Tain't usin' the good Lord fair.

WHAT if the corn was a failure? We'd a good big crop of wheat, An' with that, an' the meat, an' potatoes, we're sure of enough to eat. You don't expect everything, do you? Things might ha' been worse, my dear. Think how we'd feel, my husban', if our little girl wasn't here. Be honest an' give the Lord, then, the credit he ought to get. Just reckon up all your blessin's an' you'll find you're deep in his debt. You'll see you ain't actin' right, Dan'el, to look on the dark side so. Give him the credit that's due him an' you'll have a Thanksgivin', I know.

etc. The passage does not imply that twenty years was the entire duration of its stay there; simply that after it had been there twenty years, certain events occurred. As a matter of fact, it is shown by subsequent history that a much longer period elapsed before its final removal.

W. W. H., Ambler, Pa. Not in our collections.

L. A. L., Venice, Calif. The subject of restitution has come to the fore with us. In the case of a person who passed the Customs Commission a few years ago with more than the hundred dollars value in goods to which she was entitled, and who now wishes to make amends, would it be right for her to hand the money over to charity, giving government credit for the amount?

No; the money should go to the United States Treasury Department, where it belongs. It is only in cases where restitution to the proper quarter has become impossible that a gift to charity of a sum equal to the amount of the obligation is advisable. You can send it to the "Conscience Fund," U. S. Treasury, Washington, D. C.

C. M. R., Tabor, Iowa. "Mock weddings" are a caricature of a ceremony that should be regarded with reverence. We should distinguish, however, between a mock wedding, which is a mere spectacle to raise money, and a wedding rehearsal.

been very large. In the foreign field the Protestant missionary workers, white and native, two years ago reached the grand total of 110,000 trained and disciplined men and women. Doubtless, all of these figures might be subject to revision, but they are the best available, and revision would be more likely to increase than reduce them.

Mary McE. E., West Hoboken, N. J., sends a suggestion in the interest of sensitive childhood. She writes: "Many must have noticed the disfigurement of druggists' windows, elevated stations, the pages of magazines, etc., by pictures of the devil. However innocent the article advertised, however absurd or conventional the figure, the association is degrading. I am a Christian mother and would suggest to all other decent people, in the name of all the little impressionable children—nay, I would respectfully urge it: Refrain from purchasing any article or book advertised with this cheap and vulgar sensationalism. Do it for the children's sake. If we can't have 'the city beautiful' (or the village) let us at least have 'the city decent.'"

Mrs. A. H., Middletown, N. Y. The story about Abraham which was referred to was a legend, and not in any sense a portion of the Scripture. There are many legends concerning the patriarchs and other Bible personages preserved in ancient Arabic and Jewish writings.

NOTICE OF EXPIRATION

ONCE each month we attach, just under this notice, a subscription blank and notice of expiration for our subscribers whose Christian Herald subscriptions expired at any time during the past month. If your copy has this subscription blank attached, please use it to renew at once. IF YOU SENT YOUR RENEWAL WITHIN THE LAST TWO OR THREE WEEKS, PLEASE PAY NO ATTENTION TO THE BLANK.

When renewing, indicate on the blank with your remittance whether you are subscribing for any of our premium books, In Christ's Own Country, $2; The Fundamentals of the Faith, $2.20; Wonder Stories, $2; 555 Difficult Bible Questions Answered, $1.85; India Paper Red Letter Bible, $3, with your subscription, or a straight year's subscription at $1.50.

Do not forget you can have YOUR OWN RENEWAL AND ONE NEW SUBSCRIPTION FOR $2.25, or, YOUR OWN RENEWAL AND TWO NEW SUBSCRIPTIONS FOR $3. It is understood that the old subscriber must get the full subscription price of $1.50 from the new subscriber and must not in any way share the special price with the new subscriber.

Send money by postal or express money orders. Address, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

P. H. H., North Grafton, Mass. Jesus is believed to have cautioned those he healed to keep silence out of consideration for his followers, as he doubtless foresaw the danger to them, as well as to others, that might result from any popular outbreak. The Scribes and Pharisees were only too ready to foment disturbances. In John 6:15 it is stated that Jesus hid himself quietly in order to avert such a contingency. Few comprehended the spiritual nature of his kingdom; even his disciples did not fully realize it, and it was largely on account of this lack of understanding that he discouraged notoriety.

Mrs. W. C., Cavalier, N. D. The present war has given rise to much theological discussion and many have tried, in the course of their argument, to make it appear that God is responsible for the war, when it is really the outcome of man's own wickedness. It is supposable that in ancient times the historians tried to place the responsibility upon God, for equally wicked early wars. The real explanation of the matter is that God is the source of all things and "no evil dwells in him;" but when, to punish the continued wickedness of man, he withdraws his guiding and protecting Spirit, men are left to their own vices and evil is dominant, controlling them wholly and bringing war and all kinds of wickedness in its train.

H. S. W., Palm Beach, Fla. Write to the Secretary of the American Bible Society, New York, for all available information concerning the 500 languages and dialects into which the Scriptures have been translated.

Mrs. J. D. B., Seymour, Mo. "Puritan" was a name given to a large party in England during the reign of Queen Elizabeth, which favored the reform of many existing abuses in worship and discipline. They separated from the Church of England and effected an independent organization. They were subjected to much persecution, which continued even after Elizabeth's death. The party of Puritans who, to avoid persecution and to seek religious freedom, crossed the Atlantic, were the first colony of the Pilgrim fathers—a name given to the early settlers of New England. You will find the whole subject treated in any standard American history or encyclopedia. Your statements are right, in the main.

E. G., Oak Harbor, Ohio. The trouble lies in the fact that Christ is not "lifted up" in the sense of his Gospel being preached faithfully and fearlessly. Wherever it is so presented, it wins men; but where all sorts of man-made philosophies are preached, instead of a risen Saviour, the people are not satisfied, because their spiritual needs are not supplied.

E. P. M., Monroe, Mich. The question is hardly discussible. The Jews, who persistently rejected Christ, wilfully put away from themselves the means of conviction and shut the doors of their hearts on the Divine mercy.

A. J. C., Albany, Ore. According to the Cyclopedia of Temperance and Prohibition, the annual consumption of hops for beer-making in the United States was probably about 17,000,000 pounds. No official returns were available. At the present time, the consumption of hops (including both foreign and domestic) is probably much larger.

THIS REAL GOLD FILLED JEWELRY GIVEN TO YOU !

No. 244. Rogers Tea-spoon—Genuine Wm. A. Rogers Teaspoon, beautiful new pattern. Real German Silver throughout. No plating to wear off. Will last a lifetime. A set of six makes a wonderful gift. Offered in sets only. 33 signatures and 2 cent stamp, or 20 cents and 25 signatures.

No. 271. Ladies' Handkerchiefs—Everyone wants handkerchiefs for Christmas. Hemstitched with Swiss embroidered design in corner. Excellent quality. New style. In sets of four only. Decided bargain at 16 signatures and 2 cent stamp.

No. 294. Shear—A splendid pair made by the largest manufacturers of shears in America. Thoroughly satisfactory. Just a convenient size, in long. A thoughtful remembrance. 11 signatures and 2 cent stamp.

No. 291. Crib Blanket—Wool finished, very pretty, soft and warm. Size 30 x 40 inches, in Blue and Pink, with border of woven animal design. Just what every mother wants for baby's crib or carriage. 45 signatures and 2 cent stamp, or 41 cents and 10 signatures.

Cut out the special Christmas certificate below and mail today

This is our special Christmas offer. It closes December 31st, 1915. All you have to do is to send the Christmas certificate below, together with a signature from a one-pound package of Arbuckles' Coffee, either whole bean or ground, and the necessary amount in stamps or coin.

How to get the beautiful, double Heart Ring, S. No. 5.

You can get one of these beautiful initial double heart rings with any letter that you wish on it for the Christmas certificate, together with one signature and 12 cents in stamps or coin. This premium is not shown in our catalog, but is a special Christmas offer. Its value is remarkable. Absolutely real gold-filled ring (not washed or electroplated), guaranteed to give excellent wear. If not, it will be cheerfully exchanged without question. Offered in sizes from 1 to 10. Be sure to give the ring size and initial desired. (Only one letter on each ring.) For size, see directions given on the list enclosed with Arbuckles' Coffee.

How to get the Wave Spring Roll—Ed Gold Plate Bar Pin, S. No. 6.

has these important features. Hingeless flexible joint, giving more room for fabric. Pin tongue is always in tension. The stiff spring makes this solderless pin non-losable. No hinge to loosen or break. Flexible bridge holds pin in correct position. It makes a gift every woman would appreciate.

How to get the Adjustable, Gold-Filled Bracelet, S. No. 4.

It has just the flavor I have been looking for and with it I get so many lovely gifts that I have always wanted." So many say this that we make this special offer to have you get your first package now.

What women say about these gifts

When women have once started using Arbuckles' Coffee, they say, "Why didn't I start using it long ago! It has just the flavor I have been looking for and with it I get so many lovely gifts that I have always wanted." So many say this that we make this special offer to have you get your first package now.

Your grocer has Arbuckles' Coffee. Get a package today—get the coffee which you have been looking for and make it earn lovely gifts for you. Serve it for breakfast tomorrow. Learn why more Arbuckles' Coffee is sold than any other packaged coffee—why it is by far the most popular coffee in America.

Send the signature from the package, together with the Christmas certificate below, and the necessary amount in stamps or coin, and get your choice of this valuable gold-filled jewelry. This offer holds good only until December 31st. To be sure your jewelry arrives in time for Christmas, have your order reach us before December 15th.

More suggestions for gifts

The spoon, blanket, scissors and handkerchiefs shown here will make very popular Christmas gifts. Notice how few signatures you need—how quickly you can secure them. Send the number of signatures and stamps requested; for these gifts, the Christmas certificate is required.

This is the signature you save

SPECIAL CHRISTMAS CERTIFICATE

THIS IS THE SPECIAL CHRISTMAS CERTIFICATE YOU MAIL—CUT IT OUT NOW

Only one to a family

S. No. 4 () Gold-Filled Bracelet . . . 15 cents and 1 signature
 S. No. 5 () Gold-Filled Ring . . . 12 cents and 1 signature
 S. No. 6 () Gold-Filled Pin . . . 10 cents and 1 signature

This certificate is to be used only for the gold-filled jewelry and for one piece only. Mark a cross in the () opposite the article you want and enclose this certificate and the Arbuckle signature in your letter, together with the necessary stamps or cash. When ordering ring be sure to give the size and letter desired. Write your name and address plainly to avoid mistakes or delay. Address Arbuckle Brothers, 71-A9 Water Street, New York.

Christian Herald

DESCRIPTION, $1.50 PER ANNUM
PUBLISHED 52 TIMES A YEAR

COPYRIGHT, 1915, BY THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

NEW YORK, DECEMBER 1, 1915

VOL. 38—NO. 48. PRICE 5 CENTS
OFFICES: BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK

*The snow is cold, the clouds are cold, a freezing moon looks down,
The trees that once were green with leaves are naked now, and brown;
The brook is covered thick with ice, and yet the folk who roam,
May see a farm-house through the night calling to warmth and home.*

Photograph by John Kabe!

WITH youngsters growing bigger every minute and flannels shrinking smaller every washday, woolen under-garments soon feel anything but comfortable to the tender skins and active bodies. These garments, however, can be kept to their original size and shape if washed according to the following suggestions:

- 1st—Use warm water of the same temperature throughout the washing and rinsing.
- 2nd—Cleanse by drawing the garment through the hands and by working it up and down in the suds.
- 3rd—Make the suds with Ivory Soap paste. (See directions inside wrapper.)

This method avoids rubbing and extremes of temperature, both of which make woolens shrink. And, most important, the use of the mild, pure, neutral Ivory Soap keeps the suds free from alkali which not only shrinks woolens but makes them rough, stiff and uncomfortable.

IVORY SOAP  99 $\frac{44}{100}$ % PURE

IT FLOATS

Factories at Ivorydale, Ohio; Port Ivory, New York; Kansas City, Kansas; Hamilton, Canada.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

An Illustrated News Weekly for the Home

The Wonder City of the Euphrates

By MAYNARD OWEN WILLIAMS—Photographs by the Author

AR out across the fertile but unirrigated and untilled land of northern Syria, where the mighty Euphrates sweeps along in yellow swirls, two modern nations have touched the ancient land with their modern plans of conquest. England, which would gladly hold this civilization as a near route to India, was condemned to spend her energy in reconstructing the history of the mysterious Hittites, while from the lion-guarded royal gates of the Hittite capital, across fields where the ancient warriors fought their many enemies, the British scientist, sifting the soil of the Euphrates valley for tiny signs of a former greatness, could see the shining bands of steel which were destined to furnish Germany with a long-cherished connection between West and East. Germany, whose emperor has been an enthusiastic patron of scientific research, who would gladly have added Hittite treasures to those she already holds from the mighty ruins at Baalbek, has steadily pushed her plans for a rival world-empire to the very faces of the excavators from the British Museum.

Hittite inscription and modern railway, England and Germany, past and future, met at Jerablus, where the Bagdad railway rounds the ancient walls of Carchemish, and strikes boldly across the treacherous Euphrates.

It was at Carchemish on the day the greatest Hittite find ever unearthed was revealed to the eye of man for the first time in three thousand years. I never had a more exciting time in my life. When the enthusiastic laborers had carefully uncovered the precious dolerite slab, and the overseer, bending over it like some far-sighted Silas Marner caressing his gold, had discovered that it bore the longest Hittite inscription ever found, ten shots from a big Colt revolver, fired at backsheesh to the stone, echoed and reechoed across the Euphrates, and workmen and directors knew that a big find had been made. Pandemonium was let loose. Laborers came running from all directions to share in the joy of discovery. I also shared in that joy. I shouted congratulations to Halil, the giant pickman. "Praise be to God!" I cried. I grinned so I could see all my teeth, and answered, "God's blessing return to you."

The story of my two visits to the Euphrates at the famous Hittite capital of Carchemish is an unusual one. The excavations themselves are of surpassing interest. No such discoveries in Hittite art had ever been unearthed before. The photographs I took are authorized by archeologists Hogarth, Woolley, and Lawrence, three capable Britishers, whose first I was on two occasions. I have the highest admiration for them and their work, as for the German builders of the Bagdad Railway and others. I have tried to tell the simple truth about this interesting place and the work that has gone on there. So far as I know, the photographs here given are the only ones that have been authorized by the British Museum excavators, and they do not what is the finest Hittite sculpture that has been found.

Six months ago, German and Englishman were working there side by side, the German engineers helping the British excavators with heavy lumber, and the cool-headed excavators aiding the blond Teutons through their tactful control of the troublesome but efficient Kurdish laborers. The fact that away the second construction bridge, as they did the first, is due largely to the aid given to the German engineers by the two boyish archeologists, whose control over the Kurds gives them tremendous power in throwing workers into the task at the very time when they are most needed.

Now those two rival nations, representatives of which worked side by side on the banks of the sister of the Nile, are at war, and it remains to be seen whether the railway is won for the Island Empire, whose Indian possessions lie at the other end, or whether the museums of the scientific leader of Europe will be enriched by the sculptures and trophies which the English have so recently won back from the hand of Time.

THE Bagdad Railway is being rapidly rushed to completion. It taps one of the most fertile districts in the world. Mesopotamia alone has two-thirds the area of all Germany, including Alsace-Lorraine, and has less than ten inhabitants to the square mile to Germany's 310. Anatolia contains the richest copper deposits in the world, and copper is one of the greatest of German needs. What railroads will be built in Turkey, or have been built, no one in America can tell. The opening of the traffic between Berlin and Constantinople may mean much in the next few months.

How did Germany get the Bagdad Railway concession? England had befriended Turkey and restored Macedonia to the Sultan, and she had also guaranteed the integrity of the Turkish Empire. Within five years she was in Egypt, never to leave, in spite of her repeated promises. Russia had no money to develop outside enterprises. France was shy of speculation at that time. Germany needed the friendship of the Turk, and went out to get it. German foresight secured the Bagdad Railway concession and is building an honest system which is better than the French railways in Syria.

The question naturally arises what place these enterprises will have after the war is over. Will Germany, successful on the land, and failing on the sea, maintain her route to the East through Constantinople and Bagdad? If so, will the painstaking labors of the archeologists, Hogarth, Woolley and Lawrence, in their search for knowledge about the little-known Kheta, be all for naught, so far as the British Museum is concerned? Will the empire-builders complete their list of archeological attainments in the district which they have already so successfully explored? Or will England not only keep her ancient treasures but also gain the coveted route to the East? This route to the East was one of the minor causes of the war. With characteristic foresight and thoroughness, Germany has been slowly making her way from Asia Minor to the great Babylonian river, and England has had to be satisfied with the short strip from Bagdad to Busra, over which fairly large river steamers can run.

If Turkey is humbled as the leading Moslem power, and the center of Moham-

"The greatest Hittite find ever unearthed was here revealed to man for the first time in 3,000 years" the modern steam chariot does not course the very streets where the armored war chariots of the Hittites assembled after their victories, is largely due to the efforts of that martial patron of history and science, Emperor William II of Germany. The fact that the heavy spring floods of the great river did not carry medan affairs passes to India, where King George has at present nearly seventy million Moslem subjects belonging to the Sunni sect, this strip of iron from Europe to India may be necessary to keep order among the diverse races and sects of India. If the Sunnis, no longer acknowledging the spiritual headship of the Sultan of Turkey, make a split with the Senussi, India may well become the center of all Sunni sects, while Egypt will be the headquarters of the fanatic but numerous Senussi.

Aleppo, Populous Mediterranean Terminal of the Bagdad Railway

Two engineering problems confronted the German engineers in running their lines from Asia Minor to Bagdad; the tunneling of the Amanus and the bridging of the Euphrates. Although neither problem presented any particular difficulties, they prevented the finishing of the line before the outbreak of the present war. Just what the effect of the line would have been, if it had been completed, would be hard to say; but one of the things which were expected to result from this line was the facilitating of the pilgrimage to Mecca of Indian Moslems, who dread crossing "dark water" with an aversion which sometimes equals that felt by the Hindus.

The Bagdad-to-Aleppo line would have connected India almost to Mecca itself, by way of Damascus and the Hedjaz Railway. This unity of Moslems, if it had been consummated before the outbreak of the war, might have spelled great trouble for England in India, and possibly in Egypt as well.

Germany, since the visit of Emperor William to Syria and Palestine in 1898, has been continually gaining prestige with the Turk and the Moslem, and the completion of the railway might have made England's task much more difficult and danger of outbreak much more likely. A great step in the unification of the Moslem world will be completed when the Bagdad Railway is finished—a result which may prove far from desirable from the English standpoint. If, however, England had been able to seize the Bagdad Railway at the beginning of the trouble, there would probably have been more Indian troops in the Allies' firing line in Europe today.

Germany's plan for a through line from Bremen to Bagdad is so well known that it is unnecessary to describe her political reasons for the railway, but it is interesting to notice the care and thoroughness with which the railroad was being built. Although the line from Aleppo to the Euphrates had just been opened when I first visited Carchemish in April, 1913, the trains ran on schedule time, and there was an utter lack of confusion, which contrasted favorably with the methods on the French-controlled line from Aleppo to Damascus, Tripoli, and Beirut. By April, 1914, the organization and handling of the trains was well-nigh perfect, the Bagdad Railway, though still uncompleted, being already the best managed and equipped line of railroad in Syria or Palestine.

At Mouslimee, a few miles north of Aleppo, six heavy, well ballasted tracks were laid to handle the traffic in a country which, at that time, had scarcely a sign of human habitation. A camel or so was all that could be seen near the fine white stone buildings. At some of the stations, there are literally scores of buildings for offices and residences of the officials. It required a long look ahead to dot such a dreary landscape with such an orderly array of well-constructed buildings.

One of the most interesting sights on the railway was that of a dozen or so chicken-houses, neat, well-built affairs, which are said to have cost a hundred dollars each; all of them tenantless, and possibly doomed to be for years to come. Every detail was looked to, every needful thing provided. Thoroughness was the watchword from round-house and rolling stock to chicken-house and official's home. The district through which the railway runs is said to be fertile, but at present it only supports a handful of nomadic or semi-nomadic natives.

At Jerablus, with a station platform over five city blocks long, a few passengers and a tiny heap of bagging and valuable work. The first volumes of the work by the excavators were to have been printed last fall, but so far there has been no announcement of their publication.

On the walls of two of Egypt's greatest temples, that of Karnak and the Ramesseum at Thebes, carved in the everlasting stone of the dry land of Nile, is the oldest international treaty known to man. Rameses the Great, one of the signers, is the best known man of remote antiquity. Khetasar (Czar of the Kheta, or Hittites), the other party to the treaty, is unknown, except to a few, and his nation is little known, even to the scholars.

The Hittites were a mighty race, whose empire equal in rank with the mighty empires of Egypt and Babylonia, once extended over four hundred thousand square miles of territory in Asia Minor and Syria. Three years ago, practically nothing was known of the life and civilization of this mysterious people. They were mentioned in the Bible, and in the Egyptian and Assyrian records, but until very recently their own story had never been read by modern man. Today, thanks to the excavations that were carried on at the capital city of Carchemish, under the direction of Mr. C. Leonard Woolley and Mr. T. E. Lawrence of the British Museum, much has been learned about this great group of tribes, and orderly evidence about them is now available for the first time in two thousand years. The value of the excavations is well summed up by the eminent archeologist, Mr. D. G. Hogarth, in the following words:

"When it is said that the stratification of the city gives us orderly evidence from the neolithic age to the close of the bronze age; that the development of the Hittite plastic art can now be studied from its cradle to its grave; that the same is true of the hieroglyphic script, of which over a hundred new texts have come to light; that we have cuneiform inscriptions already and may at any moment get a bilingual key to the hieroglyphic puzzles—when so much can be said for three years' work on a part only of this great site it will be agreed that it is well worth digging completely."

I quote the above from Mr. Hogarth's article in the "Illustrated London News" from which the $75,000 resulted. When I talked with Mr. Hogarth at Carchemish last April, he was more enthusiastic than ever.

It is from this one city site alone that all this new light has come, and last spring was the bare season, for not only was a great deal learned from the necropolis, whose tombs yielded up thousands of seals, pieces of jewelry, and household and burial implements, but also there was unearthed a series of Hittite reliefs, whose style and execution, to quote Hogarth, "upset all our previous ideas about the quality of Hittite art."

Previous finds in Hittite sculpture have been crude and grotesque. Winged men, with animal heads; wooden-like kings, standing on the backs of crouching lions; square-bodied soldiers in short tunics, pointed caps and boots; all have been unnatural, unartistic and unfinished. The limestone, or other soft stone which they were carved, was of poor surface and has been much injured by dampness.

To be continued, with photographs of the Hittite Finds.

"Where the Bagdad Railway strikes boldly across the Euphrates" gage is all that gives promise of any future use for the fine group of buildings.

Work was going on at a good rate when war was declared, and the bridge across the Euphrates was nearly finished. From Jerablus to Bagdad the engineering problems presented are of very slight importance. The high steppe land of Mesopotamia is fairly level and the trip to Agade—where Sargon the First ruled twice as long before Christ as we are living after him—will take hours where, in the olden days, the slow moving caravans took weeks. Then come Nebuchadnezzar's magnificent royal city, only recently excavated by the Germans, and Nippur, before passing on to the city of Haroun el Raschid and the Arabian Nights. The heavy engines of modern commerce were to have run through a land with a mighty past; but it was toward the future, when Mesopotamia would again blossom forth in all its rich fertility, and when the distant East would be bound to Berlin with the steel bands of rapid transportation, that the directors of the railway looked.

Beside the railway and close to the spot where it crosses the river lie the ruins of the Hittite city of Carchemish, which were being excavated by British Museum authorities, and which have yielded a rich group of treasures during the last three years of work. In response to a call for funds, made last year by Mr. Hogarth, $75,000 was subscribed to make possible the complete excavation of the city. Never before had Hittite excavation promised so well. The funds would have made possible four or six more seasons

"The Spring floods did not carry away the second construction bridge"

The Mound of Carchemish, opposite Site of a New Euphrates Bridge

"Is America Prepared for War?"

In a Decorated Corner of an Exhibition Hall, War's Trinkets May Stir the Blood of Young Men

But on the Field of Conflict Such Trinkets as These 12,000 Shells Make Havoc With Young Lives

WHERE is this war breeding? What are the signs of its coming? Is there any other answer than the answer that St. James gave to his son similar question, "Whence come wars?" If there is any other answer given to the Administration at Washington, doubtless the forthcoming message of the President will disclose it. Lord Salisbury has said: "Defense is the people's business, not the government's." Congress is the people's legislative assembly, and to it belongs the determination of this question. "Is America Prepared for War?" Siding out on one of the covers of a special report of the National Security League, an organization devoted to the cause of Preparedness, is this statement: "Congress will act only if there is a positive demand from the people."

The country is slowly waking up to the fact that the entire policy and tradition of our republican institutions of the past century are to be abandoned, if the will of a few prevail, in place of the mission of peace which America by word and deed has heretofore performed in the world, there will be substituted a challenge to war. Only a few nights ago the governor of the state of Kansas, Hon. Arthur Capper, speaking before the Y. M. C. A. of Topeka, declared:

"The only unending misfortune in this step. Let the United States arm itself to the teeth and straightway the rapidly growing republics of South America with their enormous natural resources and teeming populations will take up arms in self-protection. . . . We shall be the means of turning these nations into armed camps, just as occurred in Europe. Then a collision against the dreaded and hated United States by the South American Latins will bring about the inevitable migration we now are seeing as a result of this policy in Europe."

That, in the view of one prominent American, will be the result of a challenge to war. And it means also, this challenge to war in place of peace, that the world will be increasingly militarized. Lord Rosebery, a recognized spokesman of British naval and military authorities, has just declared while presiding at a public lecture at London:

"Now nothing more disheartening than the announcement recently made, that the United States—the one great country left the world free from the hideous, bloody burden of war—is about to embark upon the building of a huge armada destined to be equal or second to our own. It means that the burden will continue upon the other nations and be increased in proportion to the fleet of the United States. I confess that it is a disheartening prospect that the United States, remote from the European conflict, should voluntarily in the days take up the burden which, after this war, will be left to have broken, or almost broken, our backs. All hope (said Lord Rosebery) is disappearing, never to return in present shape. At the conclusion of the war the form of our world will be unlike anything with which the world has ever been familiar."

That, in the opinion of a statesman of world-wide reputation, will be the result of the adoption by the

Afterwards, Those Who Escape With Their Lives May Laugh, But Never Again as They Laughed Before

United States Congress of a policy of preparedness on the scale which is advocated by "men who are purposely, deliberately, systematically, cruelly, wickedly promoting this war hysteria in the United States for the fat contracts it will bring them." This quotation is from the address of Governor Capper above referred to.

WHILE many eloquent voices are being raised in public halls, in the pulpit, in legislative halls, everywhere protesting against the clouding of the public mind by that portion of the press which is willing to give currency and editorial support to the propaganda for a huge war and naval budget, none have more vividly exposed the real purpose in this movement than did the governor of Kansas in his speech at Topeka. The press reports of that speech relate that when Governor Capper was speaking of what he described as "a wicked clamor of the Eastern jingoes for huge war appropriations," he mentioned the lack of the Star Spangled Banner in the association rooms and announced that he would supply the association with a flag; and at that moment a citizen on the platform began to unwrap a large flag and, as with one impulse, the audience of men arose and began singing "My Country, 'Tis of Thee."

The writer of this article has just come from a very much flag-bedecked exhibition hall. The walls, the pillars, and everything possible were draped with the Stars and Stripes. And all the floor space was occupied by a bristling exhibit of the paraphernalia of war. And every exhibit was provided with alluring invitations to men to join the armed forces of the United States. Those who entered this remarkable exhibition in a time of peace must have noticed that the very first placard that greeted their eyes bore this soothing legend: "Surgical Dressing Committee." And diagonally across the room in the opposite corner, alongside a gruesome display of all styles of bullets, was untactfully set up the field hospital exhibit. Yet despite these plain reminders of what war means to both sides in the fighting, the large-type invitations to join the army and the navy which were distributed pointed out all the "fascinating" features of the armed service and not once mentioned the likelihood of wounds and death.

But let us return to the speech by Governor Arthur Capper:

Appalling facts which teach a most terrible lesson to every American citizen are coming to us daily from Europe. These facts are so terrible that they should haunt every voter and every taxpayer in this, the most critical hour in American history.

In Holland they have no yellow newspapers. There they wait a long time to get the facts, in order to be sure they are facts.

The Dutch newspaper known as the Nieuw Courant, of Rotterdam, under date of October 26, reports German losses from October 11 to October 20—just nine days of the war—at 57,421 men.

It reports Prussia's losses for the entire war at more than two million men.

It reports the total losses of Germany, Austria, and Turkey to date at more than five million men.

I have no such definite figures for the Allies, but their combined losses, with more men in the field, can hardly be less than that of their enemies.

This means that ten million men have become cannon fodder in little more than one year—a greater number than one out of every five boys and men in the whole United States.

Suppose these were our sons—our fathers!

As a direct, inevitable result of less than fifteen years of "preparedness," which made of all Europe an armed camp, there has been one year of war.

In this one year of war we know that all Europe has been wrecked and laid waste.

We know that all Europe is bankrupt—utterly ruined financially.

We know that Europe is bleeding to death.

Yet in this country wild and frenzied appeals are now being made to us to arm against these war-exhausted, war-weary, war-ruined nations. Arm for what?

There again rings out that question which is being heard on all sides today, "Armed for what?" From whence cometh this war for which America is unprepared?

In this mad hysteria for preparedness the West is keeping its head, but the nation as a whole—it can not be denied—has lost its balance for the moment," declared the well-informed speaker.

The men who are purposely, deliberately, systematically, cruelly, and wickedly promoting this war hysteria in the United States for the fat contracts it will bring them, know they must strike now; they know if they give the American people time to think they will never commit themselves to the policy of militarism. So they are straining every nerve to compromise us while the war scare they have so adroitly worked up is at its height. If they succeed—if we let them hurry us into this death-trap—nothing is surer than that we shall be involved in a bloody war sooner or later.

Are you prepared to pay the price in blood and tears and peace and progress that Europe is paying for a cycle of preparedness and one brief year of war?

Continued on page 1226

A Week in the World's News

PROTECTING THE CHILDREN. During the year 1915 forty-five state and territorial legislatures and the Congress of the United States passed laws affecting children. Twenty-seven states have amended their provisions for dependent children; eighteen have improved their treatment of juvenile delinquents; sixteen have strengthened their child labor laws; fourteen have provided for better care for the mentally defective; three states and the District of Columbia passed laws permitting the use of school buildings as social centers, and nine passed or strengthened their playground laws. Four states passed the model vital statistics law in which the National Children's Bureau is particularly interested.

SIX HUNDRED YEARS OF LIBERTY. On November 15, 1315, Swiss revolutionists won the battle of Unterwalden, and with it liberty for their country, which has retained its autonomy ever since. At the anniversary celebration at Berne on November 15 of this year, President Motta declared that Switzerland must avoid doing anything which would tend to cause a division in the country, and must take every step possible to unify itself. He said that the time had come when the entire world would recognize the good will and reconciling influence of neutral countries.

FRANCE INCREASES RESTRICTIONS ON DRINK. The latest order of the French government in its efforts to restrict the use of liquor is, "no strong drinks for any one before noon and no strong drinks for women and young people of both sexes under eighteen years of age." By strong drinks are meant all beverages testing over eighteen degrees of alcohol.

THE WORLD'S GREATEST LENS. The largest reflection mirror ever made is now nearing completion in Pittsburg. The lens weighs two and one-quarter tons, the diameter is six feet, and the focal length is thirty feet. The mirror is part of a telescope which is to be erected on Saanich Hill in British Columbia, the whole weight being about 260 tons. The mirror will be accurate to one two hundred and fifty thousandths of an inch of a parabolic curve.

CUBA LIBRE. An American motion picture company which is reproducing scenes from the Spanish-American War recently petitioned the commander of Morro Castle at Havana to fly a Spanish flag from the castle while a film was taken. They were told that not even the president of the republic could order the Spanish flag to fly again over the fortress.

ARE OLIVES FOOD? The Board of General Appraisers in New York has recently listened to an argument in the interests of certain importers, in which an attempt was made to change the classification on stuffed olives. Under the old tariff, which was not changed, olives were taxed at five cents per gallon while in the new tariff the duty on prepared fruits was reduced from two cents to one cent a pound. The importers desired to have stuffed olives classified as prepared, edible fruits. The court heard the evidence and reserved decision, but the record does not state tisement of liquor in any manner and forbids the manufacture or sale of any drink containing more than one-half of one per cent. of alcohol. ("Near beer" contained as much as three per cent.) But a resident of the state may have shipped to himself, from outside, two quarts of liquor, one gallon of wine and forty-eight pints Taft and Mrs. Roosevelt were also Episcopalians, their husbands being members of denominations.

ARISTOCRACY OF LABOR DOOMED. F. R. Hamburger, Secretary of the National Association of Garment Workers, announced to the semi-annual session in Chicago on November 16 that the supply of blue vegetable dye is about exhausted, and that blue might soon be no more. It is hard to imagine the honest toil clothed in overalls of pink and gray, but we may come to that.

AMERICAN IMMORTALS. The American Academy, patterned after the Académie of France, started just eleven years ago, at its annual meeting was held in Boston November 17. Like the French Academy, the American Academy is self-perpetuating. The membership is limited to fifty. William Dean Howells, who is a graduate of a country printing office, is president of the academy. John Burroughs, graduate of the university of the world's a member. John Muir, whose only matriculation was in the college of the out of doors, Augustus Thomas, an ex-freight-handler, ten such as these have won fame, and membership in the academy.

IT IS doubtful whether any baby in the United States has been so widely discussed, or has stirred up so much sympathy among all classes as poor little John Bollinger, who was born in a Chicago hospital, November 12, and died five days later. John was a defective infant. Shortly before his birth his mother had an attack of typhoid. When he came into the world he was a tiny mite with his head sunk so deeply in his little chest as to make him apparently neckless; his arms were partially paralyzed and there were extensive malformations. Dr. Haiselder, the chief of the hospital staff, who was the attending physician, enumerated these and other defects in the child: cranial nerves absent or undeveloped; brain abnormally a single ear, which was malformed; chest and nose deformed; neck lacking and an internal tract closed. He saw that the child was so defective that, even if he lived, he would in all probability be a hopeless imbecile. But so frail was the baby's hold on life that it soon became evident that unless surgical science intervened, his days on earth would be very few. It was left to the poor mother to decide whether, in view of the sad condition of her infant, she wished to have his life prolonged by an operation, or mercifully to let him die. One can imagine the struggle that must have taken place in the mother's heart before she finally told the doctors that she would leave them to decide which course was the best. No operation was performed and the little unfortunate, who was brought into the world under such unhappy conditions and was not wanted there, was permitted to go out of the world again.

Continued on next page

Booker T. Washington and Family

Standing: Davidson Washington; Sitting: Mrs. Booker T. Washington, her husband, and their son, Booker T. Washington, Jr. (News of Mr. Washington's death, November 14, appeared in last week's Christian Herald.)

whether the evidence was submitted orally or edibly.

RELATIVE PROHIBITION IN GEORGIA. The Georgia legislature met in special session on November 3 for the purpose of making the prohibition laws rum-tight. Under the laws as they stood "near beer" saloons, which were permitted, made prohibition in Georgia a derision. The new law prohibits the adverof beer a month. Lockers in clubs, locker clubs, "near beer" saloons and breweries which were tolerated under the old statute must be closed. Railroads may not carry liquor for sale. The new law goes into effect May 1, 1916.

WILL REMAIN IN HER CHURCH. Mrs. Norman Galt, fiancée of President Wilson, is an Episcopalian, while the President is a member of the Presbyterian Church. Mrs.

Pressing Toward the High Mark

THE same spirit of aggressive endeavor for Christ that inspired the campaign of the Laymen's Missionary Movement, that vitalized that Biennial Council of Congregationalism, and that is energizing the Methodist Forward Movement, has moved mightily in the Baptist denomination and has taken tangible shape in the new "Five-Year Program," adopted by the Northern Baptist convention last May, and just now being presented to the church as a completed but progressive plan.

The Five-Year Program is the answer of the Baptists to the world-wide call to service, which is to all denominations and to all people. "This hour in human history is critical, challenging, decisive. No church or denomination can succeed, if its message and spirit are not positive, aggressive, courageous, heroic. We have a sufficient message in the Gospel of the Kingdom, a sufficient dynamic in the Spirit of God. We need spiritual vision, conquering intercession, evangelistic power and social passion. The call of the hour is for a constructive, cumulative program of advance, so large and so compelling as to arrest attention, unify our forces and activities, challenge our men of large resources and stir our whole people with a splendid enthusiasm for the Kingdom of God." This is the foreword of the committee in their presentation of this constructive, cumulative program:

1. A million additions to Baptist churches by baptism.
2. A missionary force of 5,000 men and women in America and the non-Christian world.
3. Two million dollars of endowment for the Ministers' and Missionaries' Benefit Board.
4. Six million dollars for additional educational endowment and equipment at home and abroad.
5. An annual income of six million dollars for missions and benevolence.

The program is being directed by a committee of which Dr. Shailer Mathews, president of the Northern Baptist Convention, is chairman and Dr. John M. Brown, secretary of the Department of Missionary Education, is secretary. The committee recommend, as methods for the accomplishment of the goal:

1. A persistent, pervasive evangelism personal, pastoral and vocational.

2. The systematic and proportionate giving of not less than one-tenth of the income, with larger giving by those of large resources.

3. The Annual Every-Member Canvass for weekly giving and spiritual efficiency.

4. An increasing emphasis on education—Biblical, missionary and scholastic.

5. The development of every church in social service.

6. Prevailing prayer—personal, public and social.

LARGE figures are often appalling in themselves, but when analyzed and explained they are frequently found to be more reasonable than they at first appeared. The Northern Baptist Convention represents a membership of 1,552,016, and these more than a million and a half of Baptists are asked to add to their number, in five years, a million converts to the faith of Christ, who will confess their faith in baptism. If each present member should bring one convert in the five years the goal would be exceeded by 50 per cent. On a five-year basis, the goal of the Methodist Forward Movement would add one-third to the membership of the church. The Baptists are seeking two-thirds. The Methodists expect to largely exceed their goal; why should not the Baptists expect to reach theirs? They mean to "put evangelism first, to magnify the gospel, to exalt the Christ, to first make men Christian, then efficiently Christian." They mean to insist "that every one of the million come as a sincere and genuine convert." Since the day of Adoniram Judson, and that mean in one hundred years, 317,790 converts have been baptized in non-Christian lands, and 282,151 in Europe. They whole villages in India are crying for a teacher, they are ready to accept the gospel. The educated classes in China are accepting Christ, and in Japan, where materialism and atheism seemed about to overwhelm the nation, remarkable results are attending a three-year evangelistic campaign now one year under way. The million is waiting on the foreign fields alone.

How shall these waiting thousands be evangelized? The second answer, 5,000 men and women as a total missionary force at home and abroad is the answer. The present force abroad is 559 under the American Baptist Foreign Mission Society, and 153 under the Woman's Society, out of a total at home and abroad of 3,612. To show this total to 5,000 in five years should not be hard, although it means more than 1,388 new home and foreign missionaries. Many of those now on the field need to be relieved, many of them

Continued on page 1224

When the decision of the doctors in the case became known, a storm of discussion arose throughout the nation. The question was everywhere asked: "Should the hopeless, ineffective be saved by science, or be permitted to die?" Doctors all over the country took part in the discussion. Some protested that it is a physician's paramount duty to save life, and that to withhold his skill in such a crisis would be both inhuman and criminal. No physician, they declared, had the right to decide, except in one way, where the life or death of a patient was concerned. They were called to decide whether a child would or would not continue to be hopelessly imbecile after an operation: their plain duty was to save the life, and to leave all ethical questions to a higher Power. Physicians and surgeons could assist nature and save life under all circumstances. To deliberately allow a patient to die would be to assume the duty of executioner. Some even went so far as to declare that it would be equivalent to murder. There were other physicians, however, who held strongly to the view that nothing should be left to the judgment of a doctor in such a case as that of little John Bollinger. The Medical-Legal Society of New York commended Dr. Haiselden's courage in declining to operate when he was convinced that prolonging the life would result in infinite suffering to the patient and sorrow to his relatives, who would have all the care of a helpless imbecile. The discussion spread to the churches, where similar differences of opinion were expressed. The newspapers were filled with interviews on the subject. Miss Jane Addams held that "the highest moral law requires the saving of every child that can possibly be saved." Others declared that no one had the power to decide whether or not a child had the right to live, or the authority to declare that nature, aided by science, might not overcome many obstacles as has happened in certain cases. John Kellar, deaf, dumb and blind, was cited as an instance where the beneficence of science has been demonstrated in saving a valuable life to the world. While the storm of controversy raged, Dr. Haiselden, who was both praised and blamed, stood by his act and said his conscience was clear of wrongdoing. The mother of the child pressed the conviction that her baby, had it died, would have been a burden to himself and sorrow to others, and she believed what had happened was "all for the best." The coroner's jury of six physicians vindicated Dr. Haiselden on moral and ethical grounds in refusing to operate when his conscience forbade, but gave the opinion that a prompt operation would have saved the child's life also that they had no evidence that the child necessarily would have been a mental or moral defective. They believed "the physician's highest duty is to relieve suffering and save or prolong as for bringing up the girls I am not anxious. You will manage as well as I could have done. Kiss them for me, and tell them that their this war, France should still be in need of officers. Tell him when he is old enough to understand, that his father gave his life that had time to think much about our love, great and strong though it be.

"Good-by, the long good-by. Be brave—Thy Jean."

Prayers in the Austro-Italian Battle Zone

father has gone on a long journey, and did not forget them.

"There will also be another baby whom I shall not know. If it is a boy I should like him to be a doctor, unless, of course, after his country might be greater and stronger. I think I have told you all the essential things. Promise not to bear any grudge to France if she takes me. I hope we shall meet again some day. My poor darling, I haven't even

Copyright, International Film Service, Inc.

Russian Czar and His Son at Religious Services at the Front

VAR'S GOOD-BYES. The dispatches tell the glory of war, such as it is, and some of horror, but not all. At rare intervals the train lifts a little and we see a strand of thread of personal tragedy of which the later tragedy is woven. Here is a letter from a French lieutenant to his wife: "I write this letter because one never knows at what may happen. If you get it, it will mean that France has wanted all I could give her. I don't mourn for me, for I shall have died bravely. The only thing I worry about is the position you will be in with the children. But

The War in Europe

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

European journalist of many years' standing; military critic; staff writer of the Paris Daily Mail and Le Temps; contributor to L'Indépendance Belge

THERE have been various rumors of movements towards peace during the week, but unfortunately we do not seem to have any really solid foundation, nor does it seem as though the psychological moment for peace has yet arrived. However, there seems to be a growing peace party in all belligerent countries, and when this growth reaches a sufficiently developed stage, its influence is bound to be felt. For the present it looks as though we must resign ourselves to a continuation of the conflict, and very possibly its extension to countries which have not been drawn into the vortex.

All of Germany's colonies, except German East Africa, have passed into the possession of the Allies, and during the last week the cable informed us that the last force, numbering about twenty thousand men, was being organized in German East Africa with the intention of running this colony and driving the German flag completely out of this continent.

German East Africa is, as its name indicates, situated on the east coast of Africa, with an area of about 348,000 square miles and a population of about 8,000,000, all of whom but some 5,000 are natives. This is generally considered the most promising of the German colonies in Africa, owing no doubt to its really great natural resources. Probably we shall hear of considerable fighting in this region in the comparatively near future, as the Germans will hardly surrender it without a struggle.

Serbia's situation has grown steadily worse during the week, a condition of affairs which the Allies have been absolutely powerless to alleviate. As the week closes the whole of old Serbia, that is, all the territory of Serbia as that country existed prior to the Balkan wars, is in the hands of her enemies, and her two armies, the Northern which opposed the Austro-German invasion from the north and that of the Bulgarians in the northeast and east, and the Southern, operating northeast of Monastir, have been cut off from each other and from the Allies in the south-east.

The Bulgarians completed the driving of their wedge from Nish-Salonica westward during the week, and are now solidly planted in a quadrangle extending from Stratz and Uskib on the railroad to Dobres and a point west of Kalkandelen, both on the Albanian frontier.

Between this wedge and the Austro-German army moving southward from the north, is the Serbian northern army, or what remains of that force, with no line of retreat open to it to the south. The Austro-Germans have made rather rapid progress to the south during the week, and their line now extends almost in a straight line westward from Leskovatz on the Nish-Salonica railroad through Kurshumlia, Novi-Bazar and Sienitz to the border of Montenegro.

That Serbian army caught between this line and the Bulgarian wedge, therefore, can only retreat to the east either into Montenegro or Albania. The line of retreat into Albania, however, is hardly practicable, both because of the extreme roughness and wildness of the mountainous country on the border, in which an army could neither move nor live, and the extreme hostility of the population of this country to the Serbians. The line of retreat into Montenegro has all the topographical characteristics of the Albanians, differing only in that the population is friendly.

At the present writing it seems that the fate of this northern Serbian army is to be forced to cross the Montenegrin border and then to be obliged to break up into small groups which will make their way as best they are able westward through the mountains toward the

Continued on page 1226

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is published weekly by The Christian Herald, at the Bible House, 120 North Ave., 12th and 13th Sts., New York City. The Editors are: George H. H. Smith, President and Treasurer, Bible House, N. Y. City; Geo. H. Smith, Vice President, Bible House, N. Y. City. The Editor, Walter, Secretary, Bible House, N. Y. City.

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE: $1.00 a year in advance. Remittance should be made in the most convenient manner available. Make checks and money orders payable to the Christian Herald.

FOREIGN POSTAGE.—For copies mailed outside

Entered as Second-class Matter at the Post Office Department, Ottawa

the United States, Canada and Mexico, add one dollar a year to subscription price.

CHANGE OF DATE.—It takes at least two weeks to change the date, after your subscription is renewed.

EXPIRATION OF SUBSCRIPTION.—The date on the wrapper indicates when your subscription ends.

CHANGE OF ADDRESS.—It requires three weeks time to make the change. Give both old and new address.

LETTERS should be addressed, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

The Consecration of Our Weakness

A SERMON BY REV. J. H. JOWETT, D.D.*

TEXT: Matt. 14: 15, 16. "Send the multitudes away." "Give ye them to eat."

IT is well to enter into the life of this incident with our eyes fixed upon the Lord. Just now he is peculiarly and specially "a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief." His friend and kinsman, John the Baptist, had been beheaded, and his body had just been laid to rest in the grave. "And the disciples came, and took the body and buried it, and came and told Jesus."

There is something solemnly fascinating about men and women whose way of life has suddenly turned into deep and unexpected gloom. Go amongst the crowded tenements of the working classes when there is a funeral in the street, and you will see a little group of spectators at the entrance to every court, and one and another standing at every door. And I think it is more than idle curiosity that prompts their gazing. Their faces tell a deeper story than that. It is the mesmeric fascination of death, and the awed attractiveness of men and women who have been in its presence. We think of those who have passed into sudden gloom and sorrow, and we say to one another, "What do they look like? How are they standing it? What face have they in front of the new foe?"

May we turn these reverent questionings upon the Master himself? How is it with the Lord? "They came and told Jesus." How did he take it? "He retired into a desert place apart." And there the curtain falls, and that is all we know. And yet we know something more about these desert exercises of the Lord, these seasons apart, when he has left the multitude and gone away into secret isolation. He retired into the untroubled presence of his father, and there he laid down his sorrow, and there he steadied his heart in the fruitful fellowship.

And how did he emerge again? How do many men emerge from the oppression of a sore affliction? When they are seen again among their fellows there are harder lines in their faces, drier tones in their voices, more bitter expressions upon their lips, a severer exclusiveness in their lives. Many men are narrowed by their sorrows; they are benumbed by them. How is it with the Master? "And coming forth he saw a great multitude, and had compassion on them." How beautiful and gracious the issue! A great sorrow fell upon him, and he had a season alone with the Father, and he emerged again with rivers of compassion. He trod the wine-press alone, and others drank the wondrous juice of the grapes. Sorrow had enriched his pity and had made his heart more sensitive to the needs of others.

"HE had compassion on the multitude." And the multitude consisted of men and women and children who had been out and about since the early morning, and the long fast had left them faint. The intense excitement had drained their nerves; and yet wonder had succeeded wonder, and the heightening moments had made fresh draughts upon their physical reserves. Among them were many who had been healed by the Lord, and around them were gathered their joyful and boisterous friends, laughing and weeping, and scarcely knowing whether they were in the body or out of it! And now it was eventide; the red light of the sunset was flushing the hills across the water; the cool night air was stirring; and the little ones were looking tired, and the older ones were getting faint. And the disciples came to him, saying, "This is a desert place and the hour is now past. Send the multitude away into the villages that they may buy themselves food."

Will you please mark that this counsel does not reflect a want of sympathy? On the contrary, I think it reflects the spirit of compassion. Why should the disciples have thought of the fainting multitude at all? They might have been so absorbed in the Master, so occupied with their peculiar dignity as his immediate followers, so concerned with their own interests, so lifted up with pride as to be utterly oblivious to the needs of the vast multitude about them.

There is not one of us who does not know that our self-centeredness can eclipse a crowd. Our self-seeking can make us unconscious of the multitude. We can be so selfish, so self-indulgent, that we have no perception of the multitude at all, and we can therefore never appreciate its need. Round about us there is a vast crowd of pain-stricken people, and of pilgrims who are fainting by the way, and a greater crowd still of folks who are spiritually desolate and destitute. It is something to be able to see the crowd, to mark its hunger, to recognize its needs. And, therefore, this much we can say about the disciples. They felt the night wind and knew its significance. They saw the tired faces of the women and children, and the pinched faces of the older folk, and they had a sensitive discernment of their urgent need. And so they said in kindly compassion, "Send the multitude away, that going into the villages they may buy themselves food."

"SEND the multitude away." Along with their sensitive discernment of the need they had a paralyzing conception of their poverty. They appeared to say to themselves, "The need is real, but the task is gigantic! Our resources are only a handful, and it cannot be done!" Did you ever read a more discouraging summary than that which they presented to the Lord? The place is barren, the time is late, the people are many, the need is great!

Have you ever met this type of men on committees? They are not obstinate men, not unsympathetic men, but they are the haunts of timidities and fears. They are forever drawing dark and melancholy pictures, and they add feature to feature in the gloomy scene. You remove one difficulty and they introduce another. "The need is great!" Yes, but perhaps we may find something. "But the people are many!" Still, a little to each may stop the pangs. "But one hour is past!" But the light may hold for out another hour. "But it is a desert place!" And so on, and so on, through all the scales of minor music to the last profound and dolorous tone. Yes, we know these men on committees; perhaps we have all played their gloomy and disheartening part.

Let us rank ourselves with the disciples. How often this has been our demeanor in the face of gigantic tasks! We are not hard, but we are limp. We are not insensitive, but we are hopeless; we are not unsympathetic, but we are not the children of firm and holy expectancy. We have only five loaves, and nothing can be done.

NOW, we are quite conscious of the mistake of our disciples. We are aware of the tremendousness in their reasoning; they have left out the Lord! They counted their five loaves, and there the reckoning ended. They counted their five loaves, and they left out the Lord of the harvest. It is always a good thing for us to recognize our weakness. All effective enterprise begins in the knowledge of our limitation. "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth." Yes, it is a good thing to recognize our weakness. It is a better thing to recognize the strength of the Lord. It is the best thing to lay our weakness to the Lord's strength. The Lord commands our weakness, and he will have it. Because he has only a little, he will not have us lie in hopeless indolence. "How many loaves have you?" "Five." "Bring them hither to me." He demands a perfect consecration of the little we have. He will not give us a pound if we withhold the penny. If the five loaves are kept back, the multitude will not be fed. Bring the little you have; surrender your weakness. We want more consecration services of our trifles, our half-pennies and pennies, of our five loaves.

The Master calls for our material possessions. "The rich may bring their wealth"; but he wants two mites. St. Theresa wanted to build an orphanage, and she had only three shillings in her possession. "Bring the three shillings!" Hear what she says: she brings the consecrated trifle. "With three shillings Theresa can do nothing, but with God and the shillings there is nothing which Theresa cannot do."

The Lord calls for our mental endowments. "My will is very weak!" "Bring it to me, and I will transform it into a pillar." "My conscience is very dim and dull, often flickering down like a smoldering candle!" "Bring it to me, and I will make it burn steadily as a star!" He calls for our spiritual properties, however slender it may be. He asks for our love, even though it be like a stream in time of drought. "The smallest genuine grace there is wrapped up boundless possibility." Yes, he will have the consecration of our weakness. "There is the multitude!" "Bring your five loaves to me."

AND so the Lord takes our littlenesses, and turns our poor equipment into an adequate supply for the multitude. The Lord of the harvest holds of the five loaves, and they are indefinitely multiplied. You take your little handful of seed to your Sunday school class, and, as you gaze upon it, it seems so impotent. But reckon the Lord of the harvest with you, and that addition makes you omnipotent. You speak a word of kindness and you think it almost worthless, but think that the Comforter is behind, and the range of your influence is infinite. This is the healthy way of reckoning; it is God plus our weakness! It is the sling and the stone, but, directed by omniscience, they become powerful to the bringing down of giants. It is the cup of cold water, but, given "in his name," it becomes linked to the Master and the race.

My brethren, if we have the Lord at our back, the vast multitude can be fed, the task can be executed, the problem can be solved. "They were all filled." Men, women, and children all served, and all ages received their sufficiency. Our sufficiency is of God.

VISION

Proverbs 29: 18

BEHOLD, thy people perish, Lord!
Thy lands are swept with fire and sword
Men slay till slain themselves they lie,
Nor know, nor care, nor question why.
Famine and fear and shame are borne,
While homes are wrecked and hearts are torn.
The weak are victims of the strong—
How long, O Lord? O Lord, how long?

THEN fell the answer, clear and low
"My nation knew, my nations know,
That where no vision is comes death!
For this, a people perisheth!
I breathed my spirit into men
To give them prophet-sight and ken.
Know ye, this great, unshriven host
Who dies, each soldier at his post,
Who pays its toll of bitter cost,
Is witness of the vision lost.
There must be famine, fire and sword
Until the vision is restored."

Mrs. Edna G. H. Ives

LOVE A LITTLE

LIVE a little, love a little, as you pass along;
Cheer the hopeless and the weary with a friendly word, a song;
Smile the more when clouds are lying low upon the misted hills;
Soothe the souls all sadly sighing; love will heal a whole world's ills.

LIVE a little, love a little, laugh at fancied pain,
Close your eyes and dream of flowers, sweet and fragrant after rain;
Ease the load of burdened shoulders, do the very best you can;
Sure, 'tis love that breaks the boulders, love of God, and love of man.

JOHN R. JARVIS.

ALWAYS NEAR

WE MAY not see the path ahead,
So thickly shadows gather here,
But we can trust the One who said—
"I love thee—there is naught to fear."
Can feel him near us day and night,
If we but stretch our hand and cry,
"O Father!" Faith becomes as sight,
And all our griefs and fears pass by.

ONCE, so near! We touch the hand
That bears the scar of Calvary,
And though I may not understand,
I know this Saviour died for me.
Oh, the great heart of God is warm—
Its love, its yearning who can tell?
So welcome sunshine, welcome storm—
God's love is round me—all is well!

IN STEADFAST trust I will abide,
Believing, come what may, that he,
Is ever near me—at my side—
And that is heaven itself to me.
What comfort in the thought that he—
We have no merit we can boast—
Is always near to you and me,
And nearest when we need him most.

EBEN E. RENFORD.

Daily Meditation

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR. LED BY

J. H. JOWETT, D.D., F. B. MEYER, D.D., REV. E. WHITTIER CASWELL AND CLAYTON SEDGWICK COOPER

Idolatry

SUNDAY, December 5. I John 5:26. "Little children, keep yourselves from idols." The essence of idolatry is the worship of appearances. The realm of idolatry is the world of the apparent. The modern idolater dwells in the showy things, and lives for the glitter of mere parade. He is concerned about the skin, and he busies himself with the ministry of cosmetics. He is more impressed by quantity than by quality, and he is taken with the sign more than with the significance. His soul is a vagrant; he shelters in passing whims; he does not make his home in abiding principles. He is the victim of the hour, not the child of the eternal. He is more particular about good manners than solid virtues. He is guided by conventionalities. His worship means. He follows the earthquake and the fire instead of the still small voice. He may even reverence the Bible and yet reject the Lord. "Ye search the Scriptures, and ye will not come unto me." Now the only way to conquer idolatry is to pass from the outer streets, the external courts and passages of life, into its secret central rooms. We must enter the kingdom of the Spirit, and have communion with the Lord. In his presence the seeming becomes transparent, and we are able to see through it. We can distinguish between the shadow and the substance, between the thing which is lighter than vanity and the thing which is more durable than the fashions. "In Thy light shall we see light." In that light the idol melts away like a wisp of mist in the sun. It is not only "our secret sins" which are seen "the light of his countenance"; every idol stands exposed and we can discriminate between the things which are shaking and the things which remain. Idols sink into vanity when they are set in the secret presence of the Lord.

If, therefore, we would keep ourselves from idols we must dwell in His holy hill. If we would see things as they are our eyes must be continually corrected by the light and truth of the Lord. J. H. J.

Beneath the Everlasting Arms

MONDAY, December 6. Isa. 51:12-23. "I, even I, am he that comforteth you." In the annals of a Bible Society, the following memorable incident is recorded. Two ladies and some little children were kept close prisoners at Sitapur, India. They expected to be murdered at any moment. One of the children fell seriously ill, and the guards allowed a native doctor to send in some medicine. It was wrapped up in a piece of printed paper, which, on examination, was found to contain this passage, including the words: "I, even I, am he that comforteth you." . . . From the moment they read that assurance a great trust drove out all fear of danger, and they were finally rescued.

Let us open our hearts to the divine comforter. He is near, and engaged on his blessed work, only we must look out for him, and welcome his approaches. We must turn from man, who is as the grass which withers in the morning and is cut down at noon, and fix all our thoughts and expectation on the Lord, who made us, who stretched forth the heavens and laid the foundations of the earth. Draw a thick curtain between yourself and the outward world, muzzling its loud and harsh clangings. Be deaf to the voices of ambition, desire, and eager impulse. Silence the quick suggestions of vanity, the oft-recurring whisper of the small and great ambitions that take up life. Be as indifferent to these things as a watcher by a deathbed is indifferent to the roar and murmur of the streets. Then, high and clear above all these distracting sounds, "like the deep ringing of a distant bell," a note shall call to you to the very heart of God. The Cross is the ever-present witness to God's nearness, his sympathy with us, his desire to bear our griefs and carry our sorrows, and to comfort as a mother her first-born. F. B. M.

As to Living Simply

TUESDAY, December 7. Prov. 17:1. "Better is a dry morsel, and quietness therewith, than a full house of feasting and strife." Our modern life is a constant struggle, a constant choice between things of the flesh and things of the spirit, between the pleasures of the body and the peace of the soul. Quietness of spirit and peace of mind are dependent upon getting a correct balance between these two, or in other words, securing a right perspective, a right emphasis.

Foreigners say that we Americans are people of the moment; that the dust of our active daily lives gets in our eyes and often blinds us to some of the greatest riches of the world of ideals and ideas. We are always restless, they say, always wanting more money, more success; and the price we pay for this ceaseless activity is a lack of restfulness, especially a hurried and disturbed home life. Is it true? Are the simple things of life, the real things, losing their charm for us?

There are some people of our acquaintance of whom this is not true. These are not, perhaps, the people whose names you know because you see them in your morning paper among the great leaders in these days of vast industrial and economic achievement. Their names, some of them at least, will never be found in "Who's Who," but somehow I like to be with these people; I like to visit them in their homes; I like to feel the brace of their faith in the things that I know are real and abiding. They are the people who seem to me to have come nearest to solving the problem of being happy and making others happy.

Dr. MacKenzie of Cambridge once told some students that each Saturday evening he used to go to a small, humble home in the outskirts of the city to talk with and to sit in the presence of an invalid lady, to prepare his spirit for his next Sunday's sermon. Such natures have arrived at the goal of quietness of which the wise man speaks; they have usually found it not in "feasting and strife," but in cultivating the power to live simply. C. S. C.

Taught by the Spirit

WEDNESDAY, December 8. John 16:14-22. "He shall take of mine, and shall declare it unto you." There are two methods of teaching children—by precept and by object. We go into the school-room one summer afternoon, and notice the hot cheeks and tired eyes of the little ones. Outside the window the bees are droning past, the butterflies flit from flower to flower, and mother Nature seems to cry in every tone to the children, "Come and play with me." Does the summer landscape ever look more enticing than when we are shut away from it? "What are you learning, children?" "Botany," is the sad answer; "we've got to learn all these hard names, and copy these diagrams." "Well," we say, "shut up your books and come." We make for the flowers, wild or cultivated, and in an hour they learn more botany than hours of poring over lesson books could have supplied. It is thus that the Spirit teaches. Is strength or purity, self-sacrifice or prayer, the lesson set us? There is no need for him to make a new revelation. It is enough if he bring us face to face with Jesus, and show those qualities shining through his words and deeds. We love him for them, and admire them in him, and thus step by step we are led to know and to become.

Be it ours to be patient and willing pupils in this heavenly school, in which the Holy Spirit is teacher, Jesus the text-book and obedience to the least holy impulse the essential condition of knowledge. In all other schools we learn in order to do; but in this, we become that we may know, we do in order to be sure. This is the true wisdom, which is not the product of the mind but of the heart; which does not argue its way to the truth, but recognizes it with the instant greeting that Nebuchadnezzar gave to his long-lost dream when Daniel narrated it. F. B. M.

The World's Hope for Peace

THURSDAY, December 9. Zech. 9:12. "Turn you to the stronghold, ye prisoners of hope." Through the vision of the ancient prophet a new light appears in the sky for the people of God. He has just been telling how the new King of their deliverance will come bringing with him rejoicing and setting free the prisoners from the pit and ushering in a day when Judah and Israel shall be as "the stones of a crown, lifted on high over his land." It is one of the reiterated promises in which the Bible abounds. Prisoners of hope! The prison doors thrown open by the deliverance of the Christ! This is the theme of which humanity never tires.

Sir James Stephen in addressing an audience of young men once said that he could put all his suggestions in one word—"Aspire." But aspiration and hope are dependent upon what we aspire to, what we hope for. Inordinate passion for selfish glory, or power, or simply material success, has been a bane more than a blessing. The hope that the prophet wrote across the sky of the struggling people was the promise of a new spiritual freedom, brought to them by one who should cut the battle bow, and who would speak peace unto the nations.

It is with such promise of God in view that we of today, amid the clash of arms, are still the prisoners of hope. It is the promise of personal freedom from our inner foes; the promise of a new day of peace among the nations. What are the conditions? The same now as then: "Turn you to the stronghold, ye prisoners of hope." "Hope thou in God," cries the psalmist. There are times in the lives of men, as in the life of nations, when hope is lodged in prayer; when it seems that only the mighty arm of an omnipotent God can break open our prison doors. Today is such a time. Let Christians pray for themselves and for the nations; let them turn to the stronghold of the God of hope—he can set the prisoners free. C. S. C.

The Time of His Appearing

FRIDAY, December 10. I Tim. 6:11-21. "Until the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ, which in its own time he shall show." From the contemplation of our Lord's good confession, to and through the death of the cross, the apostle passes to his kingdom of everlasting blessedness. For, as Tertullian says, "All things ripen, and righteousness also." The seed that fell into the ground to die shall not abide alone, but bring forth a vast harvest of peace and good will to our distracted race.

"In its own time" God will bring about the appearance of our Lord. But none, not even the angels in heaven, know the day or the hour. It cannot be hastened, or delayed, but it is sure. There is no doubt of the ultimate rending of the veil that hides our Lord, but it must be in its own time. Dora Greenwell compares it to the bursting of a delayed spring. Sometimes the tardy vegetation is delayed from day to day till suddenly, one mild morning, the vital forces of the earth rush forth in blade and bough, the buds burst their sheaths and the chrysalis its shell, the earth grows warm and sunny, as if a day had come for which it had waited long; so does the Church of God now wait for such a May-day among the nations, when a change shall be effected, no longer confined to individuals, to solitary and isolated hearts, but affecting whole peoples. The time may not be far distant when the hearts of Christendom, and of those outside its pale, shall with one accord return to the Father. F. B. M.

Sleep and the Awakening

SATURDAY, December 11. Matt. 9:24. "The maid is not dead, but sleepeth." Jesus seldom used the somber word "death." To him it was only a departure, a being lifted up, to draw all men to himself—an exodus he was to accomplish at Jerusalem; a going away from Olivet's summit, to prepare a place for all his redeemed ones. It was a bitter cup that he must drink, that our cups might run over with salvation. In his final prayer he said to the father, "Now I come to thee." Is this death? Just falling asleep and awaking "at home" in the morning. Will angels carry us on their snowy wings up to our mansion when we fall asleep in Jesus? Will we not know of the transition till we awake at home? Then come, beautiful death! Give thy beloved sleep; "for when I awake, I am still with thee."

Death is a returning to our Father's house, after our earthly visit. How sweet to hear the Master say, as we are starting homeward, "Today thou shalt be with me in Paradise." What a quick route, a safe journey, a heavenly Companion! E. W. C.

The good is the enemy of the best. We do so many good things that we feel good over that we do not feel the need of doing a few better things.

Our Editorial Forum

PRESIDENT
OTTO KOENIG

MANAGING EDITOR
GEO. H. SANDISON

SECRETARY
THEODORE WATERS

Get Closer to Your Congressman

AS THE time draws near for the reassembling of Congress, public expectation as to the course to be taken on the great questions that will come up for discussion is steadily increasing. It will be a history-making Congress, for it must deal with many problems of the highest importance, which are not confined to sectional issues, but affect the interests of the whole nation. Now is the opportune time for every American having his country's welfare at heart to satisfy himself how the Congressional representative from his own district stands on those great questions which involve war, peace, neutrality and preparedness. If, just before the legislative session opens, every member could learn from his constituents themselves just how the people of his district stand on these momentous issues, he would be enabled to speak and act with intelligence and decision. There is nothing else on this continent so powerful as public opinion, and the legislator who listens to its voice is wise.

Are you quite sure your congressman knows just how his constituency stands on these great issues, which so deeply affect the future of the nation? Do you know just how he stands? Do you not believe that he would be greatly helped by a word from his home people, telling what they know personally of the dominant feeling in all classes of their acquaintance, opposing any policy that would tend to involve us in the old-world strife, and opposing the militarizing of the country and its entrance into the crazy rivalry for big armaments which has resulted so disastrously in Europe? If we are peaceful and prosperous now, why fling all semblance of neutrality to the winds and convert the country into an armed camp? The President himself has admitted that we have no quarrel with any nation, and nothing to fear from any quarter of the globe. Why then should he or any of us yield to panic?

Think over the situation and write to your congressman. You will thus have discharged a conscientious duty, that may go farther toward assuring sane and sensible legislation than you can now foresee.

The Apostle of the Negro

IT IS seldom that the work accomplished by a man who possesses elements of true greatness is rightly estimated during his lifetime. Now that he has passed away, Booker T. Washington is beginning to be somewhat better understood; but the real romance of that wonderful life of the negro lad, born in slavery, and who rose step by step, through native ability and indomitable pluck and energy, to be the leader of his race, is even yet unrealized. His early struggles for an education, the hardships and disappointments he had to overcome, the plans he laid for the uplift of his race and to which he devoted his entire life, make him a figure in American history to which greatness of soul cannot be denied. His whole dream was to make the negro a capable and efficient worker, industrious and self-supporting; to educate him out of the slough of ignorance and poverty, and to win for him the confidence and tolerant appreciation of the white race. He was to the negro an apostle of enlightenment, and through his influence and the training afforded to thousands of the men and women of his race at the wonderful institute he founded and conducted at Tuskegee, is due a debt from all classes of Americans, regardless of color. He did more to do away with the ancient prejudice against his own people than any man who came before him. A natural orator, he was gifted with a quaint, persuasive address that won his audiences, while his wonderful humor and power of depicting negro life and character were widely appreciated. Douglass was brilliant, Fortune was able, and there were others of unusual talent; but Dr. Washington, who kept persistently plodding and persevering at his one idea, did more than all the rest combined to raise the negro out of the atmosphere of opprobrium by which he found him surrounded, and to help him outgrow the old faults, passions and prejudices and to qualify as a reliable citizen.

An Emperor, or a God?

OF all the spectacular events connected with the coronation of Yoshihito, none is so impressive as the incident of the young emperor bowing alone, unseen, unheard, in a humble hut, and receiving, as he and the people believed, the confirmation of his deity. That spectacle is more than novel, dramatic, impressive; it is pathetic. A man, on his knees, seeking proof that he is a god! The prevailing religion of Japan is based on the conviction that "the Mikado is the direct descendant and actual representative of the sun goddess." The most intelligent Japanese will confess humbly that he believes in the divinity of the Mikado, though he does not venture an explanation of this metaphysical mystery.

The Christian does not believe that a man ever becomes an actual god, but he does believe that a man may become "a partaker of the divine nature." He believes that every man may become in a spiritual sense a "son of God." Paul wrote to the Ephesian Christians that though they had once been "aliens" and "strangers," they had now been "made nigh by the blood of Christ," and spoke, a few sentences farther on, of "the whole family of God."

The high priest of the Jews was the only man on earth who could go into the Holy of Holies, and he only once a year. The Mikado believes, modestly and humbly, that he is the only man on earth who has the gift of deity and the opportunity of communing with heaven's highest god. Every believer in Jesus knows that he may venture into the most holy place, the place where the human soul meets Jehovah, and may commune with him "as a man talketh with his friend."

Christianity is gaining amazing headway in Japan. Some of the leading men of the empire are either Christians or have been educated in Christian schools. The Gospel is no longer prohibited. The time may yet come when this same devout young emperor, understanding that real Christianity seeks no temporal, material power, but only the spiritual redemption of mankind, will open his heart to the coming, not of a fairy goddess of the dream-world, but of the Holy Spirit, who dwelt "without measure" in Jesus, and who will enter the soul of every one who will name the Saviour's name.

The Dweller on the Heights

WE have always regretted that Bunyan, writing in the latter part of his "Pilgrim's Progress," did not tell us more about the land of Beulah, "where the sun always shineth," and whose happy dwellers are in clear sight of the Celestial City. On those sunny slopes, lifted far above the fogs and mists of depression and disappointment that cloud the valley below, the people are in closest spiritual touch with that blessed country whither they are bound.

Are you making your home on the sunny slopes of Beulah Land? Or are you spending the years wearily and joylessly, down in the Valley, amid its worldliness, sadness and gloom, and its lack of any clear vision of the Beyond? If you live on that beautiful height, we congratulate you. Well may you sing:

"Here I have pitched my tent, Way up in Beulah Land."

Life on the Beulah Heights may be simple, but it gives vigor to the body and strength to the spirit. Best of all, it gives us a nearer, clearer view of Heaven!

We are all pilgrims here. Our station in life, our wealth and our greatly prized worldly possessions count for little, since we must soon leave them all behind. Here we have "no abiding city." It is well, then, that we choose wisely, while we may, those surroundings and influences that make for our spiritual growth and development.

Be a dweller on the heights, my friends. None so poor that they cannot dwell there, if they will; for the Master himself has assured us that those who prepare for him and invite him can have him as a guest. And to each little company of faithful pilgrims he has said: "Where two or three are gathered together, I am in the midst of them." And wherever the Master is, that place is Beulah Land.

DEVOTION

AND does not God an answer give to prayer?
Shines not protecting Deity above?

Do skies whose very vapors oft are fair

Naught hold for man to worship or to love?

Yea, and we learn devotion from each dove,

Whose wings like snow are white; for all bright things

Likewise are sacred, and the heart hath strings

That stretch unto the stars. Kneel then once more,

O spirit that was doubtful, and adore!

NELSON GARDNER.

Henry Ford's Idea on War

HENRY FORD, millionaire manufacturer and a pretty large-sized type of the practical philanthropist in business, has lately given his views on preparedness. It will be remembered that Mr. Ford was one of the scientists selected by our government to consider steps toward national defense. Well, he has evidently considered, and as he is a somewhat outspoken citizen, he has freed his mind in the statement referred to. Several of his observations deserve to be circulated broadly. Here are a few of the more startling ones:

"Preparedness leads to war, causes it, dares us to seek it on. A nation fully prepared is a nation inviting, seeking war. It is a nation strutting with a club on its shoulder, doomed to the very thing it pretends to seek to avoid."

"This growing cry for preparedness is a snake that every clean, decent-thinking man should fight with every ounce of strength there is in him."

"I have offered $1,000,000 to fight it through education. I stand ready to give as much more shall be needed. War is waged by money; preparedness is fed by money, and it takes money to fight money."

"Do you want to know the cause of war in Europe that cause that will bring war to America if it ever comes? It is capitalism, greed, the dirty hunger for dollars! Take it away today and the war in Europe will stop tomorrow. Take it away and the world will have seen the end of barbarism."

"Mr. Edison's ideas—and I might say Mr. Bryan's also—have much in common with my own. Our goal is the same, our idealization of peace is the same, even our methods of attaining them approach the identical."

"America will not be involved in this war. The nation is too much of a melting-pot. It is only through misapprehension that men will fight each other—as there can be no misapprehension in men called up to fight men they understand, men of their own nationality, almost their own blood."

Contrast the views expressed by this hard-headed, clear-brained, common-sense American—one of the nation's largest employers of labor—and the frantic utterances of the advocates of a great army and the biggest navy in the world!

Mr. Ford is not carried away by militaristic clamor. He knows that the American people, the business interests, the legitimate manufacturers, the trade folk, the millions of workers, want peace. And he knows that nothing but war can come to a nation armed to the teeth, and ready for it, indeed looking for it. That is preparedness, and in opposing such policy of folly and madness he has the support of sane, right-thinking Americans.

Prosperity in the Land

PROSPERITY, like many other things in life, is contagious. Our economic interests are interwoven with social conditions, and the classes are so interdependent, that the momentum which affects one section of the community is felt throughout the whole. Given a phenomenal prosperous year for the farmers, a long chain of allied interests quickly feels the impulse of the agriculturalists' good fortune. Transportation companies, bank storekeepers, manufacturers, and a hundred other businesses are benefited in degree. Innumerable machines, silent in "hard times," resume their activity and all the mechanism of trade and manufacture is pushed to the limit to supply a market that has taken on new life and to meet demands that have been held in abeyance until "good times" made living worth while.

With no less than five leading crops in the billion bushel class this year, and with practically all the others far above the average, we have the best basis for prosperity and abundance that God gives to any land. Of wheat alone we harvest more than a fourth of the entire world crop. The total estimated value of our farm yield this year will be between eleven and twelve billions of dollars. We can not only feed our own hundred million population, but we can make up the food shortage of other lands, and have a good big surplus to carry over.

It is a time to look on the bright side of things. The American spirit should respond to the generosity of Providence by taking a new hold of affairs, having no fears for the future. Crops are crowding the barns; business is good and constantly growing better; prosperity is here! Let us greet it heartily, gratefully, joyously, and enter into our inheritance with gladness and confidence.

The Bible and Newspaper

CONDUCTED BY
FERDINAND C. IGLEHART, D.D.

Arizona Alien Law Invalid

THE Arizona Alien Labor law, which threatened for a time to be the cause of unpleasant relations between the United States and several powers, including Great Britain, Austria, Italy and Japan, was declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States, Associate Justice Charles E. Hughes delivering the opinion. The court was unanimous in its ruling with the exception of the dissent of Justice Brandeis. The Arizona law, which was adopted at a referendum election, provided that no employer might employ more than five persons unless of the total number of employees at least eighty per cent. were qualified electors or native born American citizens. The penalty for the violation of the law was a fine of not less than one hundred dollars or thirty days in jail. The law was designed to protect American labor in Arizona from foreign labor, especially Oriental. The court based its ruling on the Constitution, and not treaty, in the case of the question. Justice Hughes was very careful in his opinion to say that it had no relation to the subway alien cases in New York City. How strong the form of government is with its judicial as well as legislative and executive departments. John Marshall the judge was as necessary to the foundation of the new nation as was Washington the general, Jefferson the statesman, and Hamilton the financier. The judicial was an important feature among the Hebrew people. There is this divine charge to the judges: "And I charged your judges at that time, saying, Hear ye causes between your brethren, and judge righteously between every man and his brother, and the anger that is with him." (Deut. 1:17.)

Air, Sunshine and Sleep

AN EDITORIAL in a cosmopolitan daily the other evening in explaining why October is the most healthful month in the year, said: "Three things in this world are absolutely free, and the majority of human beings never have enough of them; they are fresh air, sunshine and sleep. Get the sleep, and get it with your windows open. Get the sunshine every time you can. Get the sleep every day. You are tired for your water, your bread, your sugar, your meat, your coal; but you can open the window without any charge and get the fresh air. Open your own window tonight; do not imagine you can get too much air. Give air, sunshine and sleep to your children; they must have them to live." Some schools and church officers ought to take notice. The atmosphere, the sunshine, the spiritual bread and water of life are free and for all, as implied in this invitation: "Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters, ye that have no money; come ye, and eat; ye, come, buy wine and milk without money and without price." (Isa. 55:1.)

Panama Fair Financial Success

MOST of the World's Fairs have been dismal financial failures. Those who have had the responsibility for them have felt discouraged and disgusted at the close with the awful deficiencies that have rendered the magnificent, resplendent concerns bankrupt, and have been compelled to put up and call upon friends to put up the money to make good the indebtedness. The Panama Fair is an exception, according to the financial statement just made public, the total income of the Exposition from the beginning to October 31 being $6,048,129, and the expense of Rolland, French; Hendrik Pontoppidan and Troelslund, Danes; and Verner von Heidenstam, a Swede; chemistry, Professor Theodor Svedberg. Few have genius to render such service to their fellows; but all, old and young, rich and poor, who will be faithful to God and their fellow men may have a reward greater than earth can bestow. It is thus promised: "Be thou faithful unto death, and I will give thee a crown of life." (Rev. 2:10.)

Unique Indian Wedding Party

FROM the beginning of the race, marriage has been the most important feature of social life. Among nations of today there are various methods of selecting the wife. Among the savage tribes of Africa, the young man hits the girl he loves on the head with his war club and drags her off unconscious to make her his bride. In China, Korea and Japan, there is an intermediary. Among Mohammedans that person is the crafty mother of the groom. In India the families of both sides do the choosing. In India, among other ceremonials, after rice or wheat has been poured over the pair, they eat from the same dish, and the bride's forehead is marked with vermilion as a token of blood-kinship, or, as in some tribes, their fingers are pricked with a thorn and each puts the mark of the other's blood upon the body, sealing the blood relationship. Among the one hundred thousand castes of India, there is every variety of wedding ceremony, from the lowest up to the one held recently, at which the chief of Alkalkote and wedding guests attended the party drawn in an omnibus by two elephants guarded by the chief's troops. One of the saddest features of the life of modern India is the continuation of the child-marriage curse. The British government has done something to abate the evil, and missionaries have stoutly opposed it, but it exists still to a lamentable degree. Babies are sometimes betrothed when they are born. In the province of Mysore alone, 11,157 girls had become wives at or before four years of age. Of the 17,000,000 girls between the ages of five and nine over 2,000,000 were married, and of the 12,000,000 girls between the ages of ten and fourteen over 6,000,000 were married. This child marriage, and the law "once a widow always a widow," has made 24,000,000 of widows in India, one-fourth as many as the total population of our country. This, with all the other social and moral evils of India, will be removed by the Gospel and the missionaries who are now in the midst of the great mass movement toward the Cross, in which hundreds of thousands of natives are knocking at the door of every mission for education and baptism. Did the world ever behold so magnificent a spiritual spectacle? The wedding ceremony among the Jews is thus referred to: "When thou art bidden of any man to a wedding, sit not down in the highest room, lest a more honorable man than thou be bidden of him." (Luke 14:8.)

Honest Newsboy Returns Money

A LOS ANGELES evening paper prints the account of the return to the owner of a five dollar piece paid by accident to a newsboy. It seemed to regard the incident as remarkable. Another California paper in commenting on the incident bore testimony to the honesty of the average boy. There are some very depraved boys who will pick a pocket, break into a house as a burglar, or, like a bell-boy in a New York hotel, kill a man, his benefactor; but the average boy is good and honest in his instincts. It is surprising how many of the little fellows who are thrust out upon the street to black the shoes or sell the newspapers to help support families, form and maintain the strictest habits of integrity. By their indomitable industry and honesty a goodly number rise to positions of usefulness, and some to high honor. As so many who have money returned to them are stingy, offering little or no reward, one of the California editors suggested the passage of a law allowing the finder ten per cent. of the amount returned as a reward. This would be a mistake, because real honesty is not looking for a reward. In one of the plays of Aeschylus the actor said: "My soul relies upon its better self, and asks no higher praise." That is the language of the truest honesty. The Scriptures require the most rigid morality, the most practical honesty. The apostle says: "Provide things honest in the sight of all men." (Rom. 12:17.)

Streams Run Railroad

IT looks as if the producing of electricity by water power would soon become general, as it is comparatively inexpensive. Public attention is called to this method of furnishing electrical power to some of the railroads, and to the large amount saved as compared with the cost of steam. The railroad locomotives in the whole country use steam equal to over 50,000,000 horsepower. In 1913 there were used in the United States 571,048,128 short tons of coal, twenty per cent. of which was consumed by the railroads, which amounted to 114,200,000 tons. On the Butte, Anaconda and Pacific Railroad in Montana a train of seventy-five heavily loaded cars is drawn by two electric locomotives whose power is supplied by hydro-electric plants. The water power running these plants would otherwise be lost. Previous to electrification, the road paid $22,500 a month for coal alone, plus the expense of transportation over its own line. Since electrification, it has cost the road only $8,000 a month for the delivered motive power. This is a saving of $174,000 a year. There is water power enough going to waste to furnish electricity as the motive power to the industries of the country. Until some man shall be smart enough to harness up the sea and make its tides run the wheels of industry, cheap electricity produced by water pushing its way to the ocean is likely to be the commonly adopted motor force to run our engines and do our work for generations to come. The tremendous subtle forces of nature challenging man's discovery and use, all lead us instinctively up to the Source of all power, and to his Son, who brought us the greatest dynamic force in the universe, and thus asserted his omnipotence. "All power is given to me in heaven and in earth." (Matt. 28:18.)

Episcopal Women to Vote

THE Episcopal Convention for the Diocese of New York recently granted the right of suffrage to women in parish elections whenever the men should grant them that right. It is expected that the men will vote that privilege. Woman's singular loyalty to Christ is seen in the photograph of the tomb on resurrection morn, and of the crucifixion: "There were also women looking on afar off." (Mark 16:7.)

Nobel Prize for Edison

THE Swedish Government recently distributed the Nobel prizes as follows: physics, Thomas A. Edison and Nikola Tesla; literature, Romain operating $4,736,256, leaving a net profit to that date of $1,410,872. The Panama Fair, with its superb exhibits, all of which had to go back to mother earth for their origin, and the wisdom and tireless industry of those having affairs in charge necessary to secure such material profit, call to mind these words: "Moreover, the profit of the earth is for all, the king himself is served by the field." (Eccles. 5:9.)

The Psalms in the Light of the War

By REV. JAMES M. GRAY, D.D., Dean of the Moody Bible Institute of Chicago

THE title of this article is suggested by another appearing in a Canadian journal last spring, dealing with the subject of the Psalms as war-time reading. The writer of that article remarked that readers of the book of Psalms were discovering a new sense of oneness with its spirit. "Only six months ago," said he, "many were discussing the 'imprecatory' or 'vindictive' Psalms and urging that they be omitted as unsuitable for Christian readers, but now such talk is little heard." The Fifty-fifth Psalm was cited as containing a strikingly exact representation of present-day facts. "Horror, impatience, the sense of a gross injustice, the aggravation of the situation by the fact of kinship with the enemy, the putting forth of the enemy's hand against such as were at peace with him, the profanation of a covenant, the heart set upon war—all these appear in this psalm with photographic exactitude," he went on to say, "and through it all is the assurance of the ultimate triumph of righteousness and the comfort of casting the burden upon the Lord. It is a psalm for daily reading in these times."

The editor of the journal in commenting on the article said: "When the war is over, we believe many an Old Testament passage will have had fresh light shed upon it, and perhaps we shall understand, as never before, the statement of the psalmist that 'the Lord is known by the judgment which he executeth.'" Perhaps, as a contemporary naively remarked, "we have in these words of the editor a hint at the kind of peace he would dictate at Berlin."

However that may be, the point is this: that just what Christians in Canada and Great Britain are saying about these Psalms, Christians in Germany and Austria are saying, and indeed in every other nation engaged in the terrific conflict across the sea. The comfort extracted by any one of them is the comfort extracted by all, which is one of the evidences of the divinity of the Psalms, and that which differentiates them from any other literature outside the Bible. They meet the sorest need of men, all men and everywhere.

But after saying this, it remains that the Psalms (and we are now thinking of the "imprecatory" or "vindictive" Psalms) were not written especially for the comfort of any of the nations now in the theater of war, though of course in a secondary sense they are at liberty to apply it; but for a people who long since ceased to be a nation, yet whose blood today is moistening every battlefield. Is this to say that these Psalms now rise up to curse that people? Has Israel—for of her we speak—forever lost her opportunity against her enemies, and shall these imprecations, uttered by the Spirit of God, never be realized upon them? Is there no hour of triumph for the Jew over the Gentile? If so, hope for the earth has fled, for the only guarantee of lasting peace among the nations is bound up with the fulfillment of these cursings upon the enemies of Israel.

But this is not to say that Israel is so good, or so deserving of all this. Indeed, when all her holy privileges are considered, no more rebellious or ungrateful nation than she ever existed. But God has a purpose of redemption for the earth, in which Israel has a leading part, and one event essential to its execution is her reestablishment in Palestine, and another the subjection of her Gentile enemies. The prophets in both the Old and New Testaments are a unit in their teaching as to this, though for our purpose we speak only of the imprecatory Psalms.

TAKE the Ninth Psalm in illustration: (a) it opens with thanksgiving and exultation over the marvelous works of God (verses 1, 2); (b) but these works are the discomfiture of Israel's enemies, brought about by the execution of God's righteous judgments upon them, which judgments are associated with his "presence" (3, 4); (c) the enemies are the Gentile nations which, as such, are blotted out, come to an end, the very names of their cities having perished (5, 6, R. V.); (d) but the psalmist is a prophet, and is speaking of a time far distant from his day, a fact we are assured of because by him the Lord is seen sitting as King, judging the world in righteousness, comforting Israel, who is now putting her trust in him because he has come to her deliverance (7-10); (e) a further evidence that such an age and such a condition are before us is in the eleventh verse, where the Lord is seen dwelling in Zion (Jerusalem) from which center his doings are being declared among the peoples, i. e., the other nations of the earth; (f) verses 13 and 14 are a plea on Israel's part for that day to come, because she is now in affliction, and at the very "gates of death." And the plea is accompanied by a pledge that in that day she will show forth his praise; (g) faith rises at the thought, and the prophet sees the Gentile nations "sunk down in the pit that they made"; i. e., the pit which they made for Israel is the one in which their own foot is taken, and as a result, God is made known by his judgments upon them (15, 16). The conclusion of the Psalm is in the same vein, and the nations are to be made to know that they are but men.

To those who have given little attention to the subject, such an interpretation may seem unusual and strange; and yet the longer it is studied in the light of other prophecies, the more evident it will become that the key to the understanding of these Psalms is the relation they bear to what the Bible calls "the day of the Lord," and which students of prophecy identify with a period known as the millennium.

TAKE the Second Psalm: (a) Jerusalem is in the foreground, and the Gentile nations are tumultuously assembling around her, but their plots will be in vain (verse 1); (b) that which they are plotting is the overthrow of the authority of God and his Son Jesus Christ, who is represented by Israel in Jerusalem; (c) but their plots and assembling will come to nought, and in spite of them God will set up his kingdom in the earth, and his Son upon his holy hill of Zion (4-6); (d) the Son himself speaks and declares the decree. God has promised him the Gentile nations for his inheritance and they shall be his (7, 8); (e) they shall be his to rule while as yet they are unconverted and rebellious, for it is not the gentle persuasion of the Gospel that is set before us as the method of his rule, but crushing judgments, "the rod of iron," and dashing "them in pieces like a potter's vessel" (9); (f) in view of such a crisis, their kings and judges are exhorted to hearken to the voice of God; to serve him, and to yield themselves to his Son, lest they "perish in the way, for his wrath will soon be kindled" (10-12). The first three verses of this Psalm found an approximate fulfillment in the first rejection of Jesus Christ and his crucifixion at the hand of the Roman government (Acts 4: 23-28), but that the Psalm as a whole awaits a complete fulfillment is scarcely admissible of a doubt.

The time of its complete fulfillment may be sooner than we think, but nevertheless it will eventuate in that experience of blessing for the whole earth for which creation groans. Take the Sixty-seventh Psalm as an evidence of this: "God be merciful unto us, and bless us, and cause his face to shine upon us," says Israel (verse 1); and then his way shall "be known upon earth, his saving health among all nations" (2); the nations will "be glad and sing for joy" in that day, because God will "judge the people righteously, and govern the nations upon earth" (4); yea, the earth shall then "yield her increase" as she will have never done before, because God, "even our own God shall bless us, (Israel), and all the ends of the earth shall fear him" (6-7).

The imprecatory Psalms were written for Israel's comfort, though the Gentile nations (and all of us individually) may draw such comfort from them as is possible, for in some degree they are applicable to all men when they turn first to God. Nevertheless, the imprecations are to fall upon the Gentile nations (some of these very nations now at war) in that day, when they shall be gathered against Israel once more returned to her own land. How soon that day will come we do not know; but this we know, that out of those judgments permanent blessing comes, for Israel's deliverance from the Gentile nations means the subjugation of those nations at last to Him who rules in equity and truth.

BEFORE concluding this article it may be well to enlarge somewhat on what was said about God's using Israel as an instrument of redemption. The failure to apprehend this not only denies us the key to the imprecatory Psalms, but to many other important parts of Scripture, to say nothing about an understanding of the awful times in which we are now living.

God's purpose in Israel is threefold: (1) that she might be a repository of his truth in the earth; (2) a channel for the incoming of the Redeemer; and (3) a national witness to him before all the other nations. She has fulfilled the first two of these purposes, but failed in the last. And her failure here counts for her own dispersion among those nations, and all the suffering she has endured and is still enduring at their hands. Moreover, so far as the nations are concerned, it is her failure as a witness to Jehovah that accounts for their disobedience to and separation from him today.

God's purposes, however, do not change; and if we understand the Word aright, Israel must be restored again to her own land, as we have seen, and take up that witness to him which she has hitherto refused. It is the case of Jonah and Nineveh over again on a larger scale. It is after she has returned, and before her witness is begun, that the nations once more shall seek to enrich themselves at her expense. Twice hitherto have they besieged her capital, under Nebuchadnezzar and under Titus, and each time to her discomfiture. However, the third time it shall not be so, for "so shall the Lord of hosts come down to fight for Mount Zion and for the hill thereof" (Isa. 31: 4).

It is at this crisis, if our interpretation be correct, that the imprecatory Psalms find their complete fulfillment, and that day the peace of the earth shall wait.

Amarilly of Clothes-Line Alley

By BELLE K. MANIATES

Copyright, 1915, by Little, Brown & Co. All rights reserved

SYNOPSIS OF PRECEDING CHAPTERS

AMARILLY made her bow to Christian Herald readers from the threshold of the Barlow "Theater," where she mopped floors and dreamed dreams. They saw her begin a struggle for the education necessary to the career of her dreams, and they went with her to St. Mark's, to the class whose teacher wore real hair and wasn't made up. Through this teacher, Colette King, Amarilly's mother became the laundress of St. Mark's and Amarilly met the rector, Rev. (St.) John Meredith, who invited her to attend morning service and who showed something more than a pastor's interest in Colette. Then scarlet fever quarantined the Jenkinses and there came a morning when Amarilly had to forage for breakfast. The family fund once more got a modest start, which was accelerated by the mundane career of the minister's surplice, through which Amarilly and her thoroughness entered the world of art and the studio of Derry Phillips. Lunch with the artist preceded a permanent engagement as maid to begin in the fall. Meantime the boarder fell in love and the surplice continued its career through police court and pawnshop to the episcopal residence; but with the end of summer, and the return of Colette, it became evident that the garment had failed to perform a very important service, a lapse which caused John Meredith to follow the trail of the surplice with great energy and some anxiety.

CHAPTER XVII

JASON never sought the Golden Fleece with more unwearying perseverance than John displayed in the pursuit of the lost article which Colette refused to describe. His calls of inquiry didn't mean merely putting the question politely and taking his departure after receiving an answer. It meant, in the case of Mrs. Hudgers, a martyr's test of patience in listening to the devious and manifold routes taken by her rheumatic pains; a rehearsal of the late lamented Hallie's idiosyncrasies; the details of his last illness; his death, and his wearing of the surplice at the obsequies.

"No," she assured him decisively, as in departing he reminded her of his original question, "I didn't go far to look in no pocket. I didn't suppose them things had pockets."

Then the scene shifted to Derry Phillips's studio, and this visit was fraught with more difficulties, for there was the case of Amarilly, which must be approached delicately and with subtlety.

After stating his errand concisely and receiving assurance that the pocket had not been examined, but that the model should be interviewed by him, John still lingered.

"It's very kind in you to give employment to Amarilly, Mr. Phillips."

Derry shook his head.

"I am the one to be congratulated, Mr. Meredith. I really feel apologetic to Amarilly for accepting her services. They are so conscientiously and faithfully rendered that I feel she should be given a higher scope of work than she can find here."

John's keen perception recognized the sincerity in the ring of the pleasant young voice, and he was quite won by the boyish directness. An instinctive confidence moved him to extend the right hand of trust and fellowship.

"You have been instructive as well as benevolent," he remarked smilingly. "Two of Amarilly's errors of speech have been eradicated."

The young artist flushed in slight confusion, and then with a half-embarrassed laugh, he replied lightly: "Amarilly gave full measure of correction in return."

Responding to the nameless something in John that so insistently and irresistibly invited confidence, he related the little incident of the luncheon and her request in regard to temperance orders in the future.

"And I don't mean to say," he replied with winning frankness, "that it is merely the request of a little scrub that has kept me temperate through two months of vacation and temptation; but the guileless suggestion was a spark that fired the flame of a dominant desire to change—certain conditions."

John again extended his hand.

Derry partially understood.

"Amarilly has ardently interested friends," he observed whimsically. "There was one Vedder, a solemn young German, here to-day in my little main interest."

John's call upon the negro preacher also demanded strategic approach. But his search was fruitless here as elsewhere, and he went away convinced that his colored brother had tampered with the pocket.

Continued on page 1229

"Lo, I am with you alway"

Beside the plow He walks with me,
And if my step be slow,
He pauses, waiting so that He May lead me where I go.
I feel His presence at my side,
His hand upon my hair;
His love sweeps boundless like the tide,
About me everywhere.

Beside the plow He walks with me,
I cut the furrows deep.
I know His gentle eyes will see
The harvest that I reap.
His guiding touch is on my arm,
And well I know the care
That keeps me safe from sin and harm
Is with me everywhere.

Beside the plow He walks with me,
And all my troubles sweep
Away, I know that there will be
No time to pine or weep:
My very oxen seem to feel
The rapture in the air;
The love that lives to bless and heal
Surrounds us everywhere.

Beside the plow He walks with me,
And lo, the sun shines down;
The same that smiled on Galilee,
And on a thorny crown.
God grant that when the shadows creep
Across the mountain fair
His love may still be wide and deep
About me everywhere.

MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR.

1916 JANUARY
Sun.	Mon.	Tue.	Wed.	Thu.	Fri.	Sat.
						1
2	3	4	5	6	7	8
9	10	11	12	13	14	15
16	17	18	19	20	21	22
23	24	25	26	27	28	29

FEBRUARY
Sun.	Mon.	Tue.	Wed.	Thu.	Fri.	Sat.
		1	2	3	4	5
6	7	8	9	10	11	12
13	14	15	16	17	18	19
20	21	22	23	24	25	26
27	28	29

MARCH
Sun.	Mon.	Tue.	Wed.	Thu.	Fri.	Sat.
			1	2	3	4
5	6	7	8	9	10	11
12	13	14	15	16	17	18
19	20	21	22	23	24	25
26	27	28	29	30	31

APRIL 1916
Sun.	Mon.	Tue.	Wed.	Thu.	Fri.	Sat.
						1
2	3	4	5	6	7	8
9	10	11	12	13	14	15
16	17	18	19	20	21	22
23	24	25	26	27	28	29

MAY
Sun.	Mon.	Tue.	Wed.	Thu.	Fri.	Sat.
	1	2	3	4	5	6
7	8	9	10	11	12	13
14	15	16	17	18	19	20
21	22	23	24	25	26	27
28	29	30	31

JUNE
Sun.	Mon.	Tue.	Wed.	Thu.	Fri.	Sat.
				1	2	3
4	5	6	7	8	9	10
11	12	13	14	15	16	17
18	19	20	21	22	23	24
25	26	27	28	29	30

JULY
Sun.	Mon.	Tue.	Wed.	Thu.	Fri.	Sat.
						1
2	3	4	5	6	7	8
9	10	11	12	13	14	15
16	17	18	19	20	21	22
23	24	25	26	27	28	29

AUGUST
Sun.	Mon.	Tue.	Wed.	Thu.	Fri.	Sat.
		1	2	3	4	5
6	7	8	9	10	11	12
13	14	15	16	17	18	19
20	21	22	23	24	25	26
27	28	29	30	31

1916 SEPTEMBER
Sun.	Mon.	Tue.	Wed.	Thu.	Fri.	Sat.
					1	2
3	4	5	6	7	8	9
10	11	12	13	14	15	16
17	18	19	20	21	22	23
24	25	26	27	28	29	30

OCTOBER
Sun.	Mon.	Tue.	Wed.	Thu.	Fri.	Sat.
1	2	3	4	5	6	7
8	9	10	11	12	13	14
15	16	17	18	19	20	21
22	23	24	25	26	27	28
29	30	31

NOVEMBER
Sun.	Mon.	Tue.	Wed.	Thu.	Fri.	Sat.
			1	2	3	4
5	6	7	8	9	10	11
12	13	14	15	16	17	18
19	20	21	22	23	24	25
26	27	28	29	30

DECEMBER 1916
Sun.	Mon.	Tue.	Wed.	Thu.	Fri.	Sat.
					1	2
3	4	5	6	7	8	9
10	11	12	13	14	15	16
17	18	19	20	21	22	23
24	25	26	27	28	29	30

The Christian Herald Art Calendar for 1916 will prove a source of spiritual help to any household. The illustration above is printed in but two colors, the calendar itself is printed in eight beautiful colors. The illustration above is 9x11 $\frac{1}{4}$ inches; the Calendar itself is 15x19 $\frac{1}{2}$ inches. It will make a handsome Christmas or New Year's present that will remind your friends of you every day in the year.

We will send this SUPERB Calendar, together with the Christian Herald for one WHOLE year, 52 issues, for $1.75 } OR { To old subscribers sending us their renewal and one new subscription to the Christian Herald we will send two copies of this Calendar (mailed to separate addresses if desired) FREE

Add ten cents to your subscription for the Christian Herald Almanac for 1916, containing 100 pages of interesting facts and figures

Margaret Sangster, Jr.'s, New Book

"Real People and Dreams"

MARGARET E. SANGSTER does not "make up" her stories and poems—they just form themselves on the background of her mind, as wintry sprites trace wonderful pictures on window panes; and then, simply because she cannot help herself, she sits down and describes these pictures.

This is the work of a genius. It may unintentionally be taking away some of the credit which should be accorded her for these delightful stories and poems to say this, but there is no other explanation. Miss Sangster describes with entire abandon the picture that has formed itself in the background of her mind, indifferent for the moment to her audience, intent only on the artist's work of truly reproducing a vision.

And lo! These visions become realities. The men and the women, the sea, the sky, street cars, store counters, hospitals and family circles, all move out of dreams into reality. And there they stand in her pages, grouped in unforgettable scenes.

There are in all in this new book, "Real People and Dreams," by Miss Sangster, about 80 poems and 32 short stories and sketches, some of the titles being given below:

POEMS

Jimmy Nealan's Sacrifice
The Madonna of the Street
Black—(Negro Dialect)
The Mother (Irish)
"If Music Be the Food of Love"
A Prayer
The Shame of It
The Right to Play
Down the Hudson in a Storm
The Night Ride
And some sixty others

STORIES AND SKETCHES

The Little Girl at Home
In the Apple Tree
A Mince Pie Thanksgiving
On Counting Chickens
The Story of a Smile
Count Your Blessings
The City Streets at Night
The Joy of Easter
The Girl Who Came Back
The Love of People
And some twenty-five others

If—as you will do if you are wise—you order this book to use as a Christmas gift, you should certainly order a second copy for yourself, for otherwise you will find yourself hard put to it to give away your only copy. But if you intend to get the book solely for yourself, then by all means secure a second copy, for you will be eager to send one to some friend as a Christmas gift.

"Real People and Dreams," handsomely bound, will be sent postpaid with the Christian Herald for one year for $1.85. Or we will send to old subscribers, FREE, as a reward, this volume for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $1.50.

Address THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, BIBLE HOUSE, New York

A Story for the Family Circle

Full of Fun, Frolic, and the Finer and Nobler Side of Human Nature

OUR age has been a fortunate one in its stories of youth. Looking back over the long and delightful procession, from "Little Lord Fauntleroy" down along the line of "Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm," "Pollyanna," and now "Amarilly," whose wondrously attractive story is running in the Christian Herald, we see that it has been an extraordinary time for stories that show the beautiful realism of youth. Now we have another, "Little Sir Galahad," by Phoebe Gray, which the Christian Herald is offering this season.

Little Sir Galahad is a boy every bit as wonderful and with as high ideals as those of the ancient Knights, but he is an up-to-date hero and a very real little personage, quick-witted, clever and amusing, and, together with his youthful friends who come under the magic spell of his influence, he goes through many exciting experiences and keeps the reader's interest absorbed right through the story.

"Little Sir Galahad" has quite a variety of friends, including stanch little Mary Alice, who grows up to a winsome womanhood, and poor Lem Brown, who had to be helped ever so often. Then there is a big background of old and young folks who must certainly have been drawn from actual life, as we have all known just such people. Besides, there is a big-hearted millionaire—but we must not anticipate, for to tell the story even in outline would rob you of the pleasure of reading the book for yourselves.

We don't know when we have had quite as much pleasure in reading any book this year as "Little Sir Galahad." There is so much that is charming and humorous and intensely human in the whole story, that it appeals to the reader probably with greater force than if the action were on a more dignified level; but though we may be men and women grown, we are all children at heart, and when the golden door of youth opens for a moment, we are glad to go back to those delightful days when "all the world was sunshine and all the geese were swans." "Little Sir Galahad" is really a story of the golden age in our own time, that beautiful season which makes life radiant while it lasts—the season of which an American poet wrote:

"When youth, the dream, departs
It takes something from our hearts
That never comes again."

"Little Sir Galahad," 376 pages, illustrated and handsomely bound in cloth, will be sent postpaid with one yearly subscription to the Christian Herald for $2.00. Or, we will send to old subscribers, FREE, as a reward, this volume for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $1.50.

Address THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, BIBLE HOUSE, New York

Add ten cents to your subscription for The Christian Herald Almanac for 1916, containing 100 pages of interesting facts and figures

Martin Luther Anniversary Book

"Luther in Light of Recent Research"

WHILE there are several lives of Luther, Professor Heinrich Boehmer's famous work, which has attracted universal attention in Europe, is one of the best that has ever appeared. It comes most opportunely in view of the approaching celebration of the Four Hundredth Anniversary of the nailing of Luther's famous theses on the gate of the old castle church at Wittenberg, which was the beginning of the Reformation.

The Christian Herald has secured the exclusive American rights of this book, and has had it translated by Professor Carl F. Huth, Jr., of the University of Chicago, who has succeeded in preserving the spirit and the expression of the original in a remarkable degree.

A distinguished American scholar, Professor W. H. T. Dau, to whom The Christian Herald submitted the translated work for final revision, writes:

"For ten days I have been engaged in examining Professor Huth's manuscript and comparing it with the original. I had someone read the German text to me, while I had the English translation before me. I have read every word of the translation. Professor Huth's translation has been made from the third, or last, edition of Boehmer's treatise, and is in this respect up-to-date.

Moreover, my appreciation of his work has only been rendered more intense and, as regards the details of his workmanship, more intelligent by my reading.

"Professor Huth has done three things which stamp him a translator of great value: 1. He has made the idiom of our English language, both as regards the choice of words, phrases and proverbial sayings and the construction of clauses, to be a paramount issue in his work. 2. He has favored that most masterful element in English diction, the short clause, and has for this reason often cut Boehmer's ponderous German clauses into three or more English clauses, in such a way, however, that the logical connection has not been broken. 3. He has, both for the sake of euphony and the harmonious construction of a thought with its ramifications in the mind of an English reader, telescoped whole clauses or sets in Boehmer's construction, and vice versa. The grand result of this method of translating has been to make Professor Huth's rendering read as if it were no translation at all, but thought cast originally into good idiomatic English diction."

THIS great book, which should be read by every Protestant in America, is supplemented by a series of eighty-one Luther pictures, all of them from the most authentic sources, and the whole forming a Luther Picture Gallery, which, in point of variety and historic value, has probably not been surpassed in this country. Each page of the Picture Collection carries its own printed explanation.

The "Foreword" to Boehmer's work, by Prof. J. H. Robinson of Columbia University, pays a high tribute both to biographer and translator.

Boehmer's "Life of Luther," including the Luther Picture Gallery, will be sent to any address with The Christian Herald for one year for $2.25, or we will send to old subscribers FREE, as a reward, this volume for sending us two new yearly subscriptions to The Christian Herald with $3.00.

Address THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, BIBLE HOUSE, New York

Two Books by a Famous Pastor

REV. J. H. JOWETT, D. D.

DOCTOR JOWETT has been aptly described as "the most spiritual preacher in America." He has written these two volumes, "Thirsting for the Springs" and "Brooks by the Traveler's Way," in his happiest vein and the gift of felicitous expression shines out on every page.

The reader is carried along through gardens and woodlands as on a pleasant journey. He is in a rarified atmosphere and is buoyed and uplifted unconsciously at every step. The varied experiences of life, its trials, allurements, disappointments and surprises, pass before him like a moving picture. He drinks deep draughts at the springs of faith, warms himself in the sunlight of hope, and finds cheer and comfort, consolation and strength to go forward.

Doctor Jowett is a deep student of human nature and has a faculty of kindling the finer emotions and awakening the noblest ambition. This was the impression on the minds of the editors of The Christian Herald, after reading these two companion volumes. The books will be welcomed by thousands, who will be glad of the inspiration they afford.

Some of the subjects he discusses in his own delightful fashion are:

The Degeneracy of a Soul	Spiritual Culture
The Passing of the Burden	The Secret of Hope
How to Know God Better	My Need of Christ, Christ's Need of Me
The Earthly and the Heavenly	Lightening the Burden
Loving the Enemy	No Failing! No Forsaking!
To Know Jesus	Perilous Sleep
What I Would if I Could	Beauty in the Heights
The Living Water	Desiring and Seeking
A Song in the Night	The Modesty of Love
The Roots of the Blessed Life	The Heavy Laden

The two volumes, handsomely bound and aggregating 530 pages, will be sent together with The Christian Herald for one year for $2.00. Or the two will be sent to old subscribers FREE, as a reward, for sending us one new yearly subscription to The Christian Herald with $1.50.

Address THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, BIBLE HOUSE, New York

Add ten cents to your subscription for The Christian Herald Almanac for 1916, containing 100 pages of interesting facts and figures

THE IDEAL FAMILY NEWSPAPER

A FRIEND wrote us, a few days ago, this definition of a Christian family newspaper: "It should contain all the news of the world that is worth printing, presented from a Christian view-point. Nothing that makes for real progress should be omitted. The wondrous story of the march of Christianity should be a prime objective in its program, and nothing that would stimulate and encourage Christian effort or that would elevate life to a higher level, making it nobler and more helpful and Christlike, should be passed by."

"Then the Family should not be forgotten, for the ideal Christian paper should contain something that would personally interest every member of the household. It should be a journal without prejudice or bias and always loyal to the truth. Its standard of principles should be high, its judgment sound, mingling generosity with justice, and through it all there should run a clear current of kindness, sympathy and practical helpfulness. And this, I submit," he wrote in conclusion, "is a very fair definition of your excellent paper, the Christian Herald."

We wish to express our lively appreciation of the foregoing outline of the aims and principles of a Christian newspaper, which comes from an old and discriminating reader, who has been a member of our Family Circle for many years. He has accurately indicated the standard toward which we have constantly striven, and while we note in his letter a spirit of kindly indulgence for his favorite journal, we are never unmindful of the fact that the Christian Herald is largely the result of the united efforts and influence of its readers. They have made it what it is, and it gives us pleasure to make the acknowledgment. They have made it the channel of world-wide benevolences, of great missionary

OUR SPECIAL FEATURES

Fifty-two Sermons by Famous Pastors

You hear a sermon by a noted preacher; it greatly impresses you. But afterward, how much of it can you remember? Each of the fifty-two sermons by famous pastors, which will appear in the Christian Herald in 1916, you can read at your leisure, and read and read again, and most of them you will read and read again. They will be meat and drink to your spiritual life. Among the many men who will speak from the Christian Herald pulpit are: Rev. J. H. Jowett, D. D., Dr. G. Campbell Morgan, Rev. Charles E. Jefferson, Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman, Pastor D. H. Steffens, Rev. C. H. Parkhurst, Bishop Luther B. Wilson, Pastor Charles Wagner, Dr. R. A. Torrey, Professor W. H. T. Dau, Rev. David J. Burrell. The famous Christian Herald pulpit is interdenominational and wholly evangelistic.

Daily Meditations by Dr. J. H. Jowett and Others

Thoughts that turn us away from sordid things; words that set us thinking better thoughts; impulses toward nobler living; heart's-ease and soul's-rest and hopes of heaven—such are the Meditations, one for each day in the year, prepared especially for the Christian Herald Family by four of the most spiritual-minded men in the ministry today: Dr. J. H. Jowett, F. B. Meyer, D. D., Clayton Sedgwick Cooper, and Rev. E. W. Caswell.

A War-Chastened Church

Christianity with Christ not left out. What a day for the world will that be in which Christianity, purged of the dross of ages, stands forth as the only hope of the world! "The dross of the ages"—of what does that consist? The Church, refined and purified by the fire of war, what would such a church be like? We think you will find the stimulating answer in a special article on "Christianity After the War," which will appear in the Christian Herald soon after the first of the year.

Shall Church or State Educate Your Child?

The question of giving religious instruction in the public schools has suddenly come to the front, and is arousing the keenest interest in all religious and educational circles. No one subject will be more discussed throughout the land in 1916 than this. We are glad to be able to announce papers from authorities treating this serious question from all points of view. This group of articles will be of the highest value to our readers.

A New Kind of Career

Ambition usually fixes upon a definite goal. For most, that goal has to do wholly with success in this world. A new movement is on foot to stir the ambition of young folks to set their goal beyond the confines of this world and within the portals of heaven itself. This is called the ambition of "the Unselfish Career." It is not general ambition, such as every Christian has, but a specific one. It means the selection of a life work which shall be for the uplift of others. It means putting aside all opportunities for worldly success, and adopting a career that continues on through eternity. Perhaps you will find something in this movement to change all the currents of your life.

The Real Secret of Health and Wealth

Scientists have been exploring anew the human mind, and have discovered amazing secrets concerning the sources of health, the laws of religion, and the problems of society. What they have to say is well worth your serious consideration, and we shall tell you these things in succeeding issues.

Professor James M. Gray on Prophecy

Professor James M. Gray, Dean of Chicago Bible Institute, will give Christian Herald readers the benefit of his scholarship in four special articles of the utmost interest to all Christians. The subjects of these articles are: "The Battle of Armageddon, Where it will be Fought, and What it Means"; "The Psalms in the Light of the War"; "The Angels at Mons, or Satan and Satanism at the End of the Age"; "The Second Coming of Christ—Is It to Be Visible or Spiritual?" It is unnecessary to more than name the subjects to arouse your interest in these forthcoming splendid articles.

A New Chapter to the Book of The Acts

This chapter will be written out of the real experiences of Christians of today. These Christians may be apostles in the quality of their services, or they may be hitherto unheard-of disciples. But in any case, the stories of how they have been transformed by the indwelling Spirit of Christ, and how they have been able to "overcome," and "stand fast," and win other souls to Christ, will constitute one of the most helpful of all the special features in the Christian Herald for 1916.

With Archeologists in Bible Lands

The war has greatly interrupted this ever interesting department of scientific research, and has postponed some important undertakings, but nevertheless enthusiasts have been able to continue their explorations in the ruins of ancient cities, and have made many finds that throw a helpful light upon the Scriptures. Prof. Edgar James Banks and Albert T. Clay, authorities whose writings are already popular with Christian Herald readers, will describe what has been done in this department of Bible knowledge during the year past.

Getting Results in Church Work

We hear a good deal about decline in church efficiency—why not take note of the other kind of church—there are a great many of them—the successful kind? How do churches situated exactly as yours is, achieve the success that your church, possibly, does not have? We shall tell you how small churches in isolated spots and big churches in crowded communities are making the most of their opportunities today.

In the Footsteps of Dr. Clark

Dr. Francis E. Clark, President of the Christian Endeavor Society, who has but recently recovered from a serious illness, will spend many months in a tour through strange places the world. Few travelers have powers of observation equal to Dr. Clark's, and still fewer can tell with his charm and clearness what they see. We are to be privileged to give our readers his own story of the scenes he will visit, in Hawaii and the Far East, well illustrated as always, and, as always, certain to instruct and delight the reader.

Shall the Church Enter Politics?

Just what part, if any, the Church should take in shaping the civic policies of the country, has never been definitely settled. It is what is called a moot question. But with the world at war with itself, the course of the one great neutral nation in its national politics becomes of extraordinary importance, and to many it seems that the time—or a time, at any rate—has arrived, when the Church must have something to say on national issues. We shall hope to throw some light on such an important subject, and shall also be glad to devote space to giving the views of our readers about it.

Send in Your Subscription AT ONCE—$1.50 a Year

Address: THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York

Add ten cents to your subscription for the Christian Herald Almanac for 1916, containing 100 pages of interesting facts and figures

FOR THE IDEAL CHRISTIAN HOME

enterprises, of movements that have awakened whole communities, of innumerable deeds of Christlike kindness and sympathy. With their warm cooperation it has gone on its way year after year, from triumph to triumph. Its weekly pulpit, through the leading preachers of two continents, sends out messages of spiritual invigoration and encouragement to an audience equal in point of numbers to those addressed by a thousand city pastors, speaking to crowded churches, simultaneously. In this and in all other activities, the conductors of this journal are sincerely thankful that it has been made the chosen channel through which so much good is being done throughout the world.

Looking forward now to another year, we believe we may say with confidence that we shall advance a little farther toward the high standard of purpose so well expressed above. You will gain some idea of what we have planned for the year in the brief mentions made below of the various features. We have been unusually fortunate in our arrangements for special articles and contributions to regular departments, and in every way that it is possible we shall make the Christian Herald a better, stronger, more desirable

Christian family newspaper than even our good friend has declared the paper to have been in the past. We hope to retain every one of the members of the great Christian Herald Family as friends and readers throughout the year, and with the aid of all who would see the influence of such a family paper extended we hope to greatly increase the number of our readers. To this end, in addition to the splendid program of contents, we have provided the very attractive book offers which are described in other pages, and we earnestly invite your cooperation for a new year of achievement for Christ and his Church.

FOR THE NEW YEAR

Helps from a Great Bible Authority

There is no more satisfying Bible authority on the two hemispheres than Professor David Smith, the famous author of "The Days of His Flesh," which has ranked him with Geikie, Stalker, Edersheim and other great writers on the life of our Saviour. Professor Smith, who occupies the chair of theology in Magee College, Londonderry, has consented to write for the Christian Herald during 1916 a department in which he will discuss fully and luminously a single Bible question every week. These weekly expositions will be found not only scholarly in the highest degree, but so simple and clear in statement that they will be a welcome spiritual help to thousands. They will begin with the first issue of the New Year.

Teaching War in the Sunday School

That is, does the Bible teach that war is right? Sunday School workers especially are agitated upon this question, because of a seeming conflict between Jewish history and New Testament theology, and it is certainly a subject well worth our readers' attention. So we shall give some contributions to it during the year.

A Century with the Bible

The 100th anniversary of the American Bible Society, which will be celebrated in 1916, furnishes an excellent opportunity for a review of the activities of the various agencies which have been so splendidly at work during that period translating the Bible into all languages and dialects, and distributing it over the face of the whole earth and wherever ships sail the seas. This story is a mighty romance, packed with human interest and spiritual uplift. You cannot afford to miss it.

What Is the Matter with the Panama Canal?

Some say that perpetual motion has been discovered in the slides of the canal. Some say there are not slides at all, but—well, right here comes the question: "What is the matter with the canal?" A truly astonishing revelation has been made to the Christian Herald, and the special articles dealing with this serious question are bound to cause a sensation. Whether they will also create a popular demand for congressional inquiry remains to be seen.

Tellers of Tales

The story of Amarilly, which is now running in serial form in the Christian Herald, will be followed before the year is through by one, and possibly two, other serials of high order. We are also selecting many short stories with the utmost care, and shall publish a liberal number of the choicest pieces of fiction that we can secure. In many cases these stories will be illustrated.

Will the Movies Invade the Church?

And if they do, will they be resisted, or welcomed? Is the Church overlooking a tremendous new force, which can be directed into evangelistic channels? Let us talk this over together during the year, and find out what others think, and what others are doing, and perhaps we shall discover that this is a very important subject to look into.

What Will Your Child Become?

There seems to be a startling number of misfits in the world. Too many, by far, if sociologists are to be believed. The explanation most generally given is that there is something wrong in the school system. The remedy that is being offered is vocational training. Vocational training is rapidly finding a place for itself. Do you think it will help your child? Perhaps our articles on this subject will help you decide.

Departments That Have Proven Popular

A canvass of Christian Herald readers year by year enables us to judge the relative value of the different departments of the magazine, and those which are in high favor will be continued throughout the year. Foremost among these is the Sermon page, to which reference has already been made. We are looking forward to an exceptional class of sermons in 1916.

The Meditations, also mentioned above, will be of a high order of helpfulness. Rev. F. C. Iglehart, D. D., has long since proved his mastership in linking up news with the Bible, and his always interesting Bible and Newspaper page will be continued.

We shall bring the teaching ability of selected leaders in Sunday School work to bear upon the weekly lessons, and many practical problems of the Sunday School will be answered through that department.

The topics for the Young People's Meetings, Christian Endeavor, Baptist Young People's, Epworth League, will be helpfully treated, and the Prayer League will continue to carry forward its great mission of encouragement and blessing.

We count the weekly contributions by Miss Margaret E. Sangster, Jr., as among our departments, although as a matter of fact these are really special articles in themselves upon a wide range of subjects, all of them reflecting her active imagination and delightful point of view. These articles are looked forward to by thousands of our readers.

You will have noticed of late that we have been devoting the best part of two pages to a condensed review of the News of the World for the Week. This illustrated department, including the story of the progress of the war by the military expert, Anthony Arnoux, will receive especial attention during the year, in order to make it a much more valuable summary of current events than ever before.

The popularity of our Mail Bag page continues unabated, and we hope that through that department innumerable points of contact will be established between the Christian Herald and its multitudes of readers.

The monthly hints to investors will be retained, and we are glad to note that this has proved of so much worth to a great many readers.

The whole policy of the Christian Herald will continue to be reflected through that foremost of its departments (excepting, possibly, the Sermon page) the Editorial Forum. Great questions of the day in Church and State will be treated here in the light of the teachings of Jesus Christ, fearlessly, kindly, helpfully.

What You Don't Know About Alaska

What you don't know about Alaska will simply astonish you, when you find it out. There is just one man in the world who can tell you about Alaska in a way that will make you wonder, if you know anything at all about any part of the world. That is Frank G. Carpenter, famous as a traveler and writer. He has spent a year in that great unknown region, and has come back with a wealth of pictures and a wonder book of facts. We have arranged to print his story from week to week, running through several months, just possibly through the year, of course with pictures, and you cannot fail to appreciate our thought for you when you begin to read these exceptional articles.

Art in the Christian Herald

We are bending every effort to making the appearance of the Christian Herald a delight to the eye. The pictorial work during the coming year will be in charge of experts, and we wish especially to mention that we have secured a large number of most beautiful colored photographs of Holy Land Scenes. The subjects of these photographs are in themselves both beautiful and instructive, and their color treatment makes them genuine works of art. These will be liberally interspersed with other subjects as front covers during the year, and every one of them will be a gem. We are exceedingly happy in being able to make this announcement, for we know that our readers will be charmed with these Holy Land pictures.

Send in Your Subscription AT ONCE—$1.50 a Year

Address: THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York

Add ten cents to your subscription for the Christian Herald Almanac for 1916, containing 100 pages of interesting facts and figures

Our 1916 Almanac Is Ready

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD ALMANAC is an especial favorite with our readers. It has come to be one of the family all the year round in thousands of households. This year it will be better than ever.

The department devoted to the religious bodies in the United States is an epitome of the comparative strength of the different denominations. All of the prominent ones are described. You will find interesting facts and figures of your own and other denominations. You will also find a number of Difficult Bible Questions Answered. These have never appeared before. The Christian Herald Prayer League and its wonderful expansion is also discussed at length.

1916 being a Presidential Election year, we have included necessary information for the use of the voter in the election next November.

The Almanac will contain a complete story of the European War up to date of going to press.

There will be a comprehensive description of the Lincoln Highway.

Many features of special interest to women; prose and poetry; wit and humor, sparkle in the pages of this wonderful Year-Book.

Add ten cents to your subscription to the Christian Herald and we will send you the Christian Herald Almanac for 1916, postpaid.

A New "Do Something" Book

DID you read "Janice Day," which we offered with the Christian Herald last year? You will remember it was the "Do Something" Book.

The success of the book was such that the author, Helen Beecher Long, wrote a sequel entitled, "The Testing of Janice Day." It is a vivid and delightful picture of typical New England life and character.

Janice Day, by her contagious example, awakens the slow village of Polk-town to wonderful possibilities. She finds the townsfolk lazy and shiftless. Her own ambition to do something impels her to do her utmost to improve her surroundings. And gradually her influence effects many reforms. One dramatic piece of self-sacrifice on her part wins the heart of all the villagers.

We shall not tell you the story here, but every reader of Janice Day will welcome the second "Do Something" book as it carries through the good work started in the first volume.

We will send "The Testing of Janice Day," 310 pages, with gold stamped cloth covers, together with the Christian Herald for one whole year for $2. Or, we will send to old subscribers, FREE, as a reward, "The Testing of Janice Day," for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $1.50.

40,000 Beautiful Quotations

SOME years ago the Christian Herald published a work entitled "Forty Thousand Sublime and Beautiful Thoughts." It was composed of a collection of the best sayings on every conceivable subject which the compiler could come upon. It was a remarkable compilation and it was used largely in public as well as private libraries throughout the United States.

In the course of time, the edition of this book became exhausted. Since then we have had so many inquiries for the work that we have felt constrained this year to republish it thoroughly revised.

The mission of this work is to supply a universal need which is felt by the multitude of busy men and women of today, who, while eager to be initiated into the society of the great masters of literature, find it impossible to devote the time necessary to accomplish that result.

We will send you this volume together with The Christian

Herald for one whole year for $3; or we will send to old subscribers FREE, as a reward, "Forty Thousand Sublime and Beautiful Thoughts" for sending us two new yearly subscriptions to The Christian Herald for $3.

A Companion to the Bible

HAVE you bought your copy of "555 Difficult Bible Questions Answered"? Here is another book which has had a wonderful success during the past year, and every lover of the Bible should possess a copy. Indeed, it is a wonderful help to Bible study.

This book is the result of research covering a period of 24 years. Its theology is thoroughly sound, being along the lines followed by the ablest living orthodox expositors. Such questions as the following are answered:

"Is trouble sent as a punishment?" "Can one be saved without knowing it?" "Is wealth an evil or a blessing?" "Does God send disease?" "Should a Christian marry a non-Christian?" "What is the unpardonable sin?" "Is sinlessness possible?" "Was the ascension in human form?"

There are 547 other equally important questions in this book.

We will send you, postpaid, a copy of "555 Difficult Bible Questions Answered," together with the Christian Herald, for one whole year for $1.85; or, we will send to old subscribers, FREE, as a reward, this volume for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $1.50.

Add ten cents to your subscription for the Christian Herald Almanac for 1916, containing 100 pages of interesting facts and figures

MONEY-SAVING COMBINATIONS

Save Money on Your Magazines

NOW is the time to order your magazines for the coming year. The Christian Herald has special facilities for the prompt handling of magazine orders. You may send us your orders for your entire magazine list. Send us your order now for what you want. Advise us which magazine subscriptions are new, and which are renewals. On all renewals we will see that your subscription is extended a full year from the date of expiration.

Class Number	Price Per Year
3—The Christian Herald —	$1.50
with any One of the following Class 8 Magazines
3—People's Home Journal —	.50	$1.55
3—Housewife —	.50
3—Today's —	.50
Any Two of the above Class 8 with
3—The Christian Herald —	1.50	$1.95
3—The Christian Herald —	1.50
1—McCall's —	.50	$1.65
3—The Christian Herald —	1.50
2—Home Needlework —	.75	$1.75
3—The Christian Herald —	1.50
5—Ladies' World —	1.00	$1.90
3—The Christian Herald —	1.50
with any One of the following Class 17 Magazines
7—Something to Do Magazine —	1.00	$2.00
7—Modern Priscilla —	1.00
7—Boy's Magazine —	1.00
7—American Boy —	1.00
Any Two of the above Class 17 Magazines with
3—The Christian Herald —	1.50	$2.85
3—The Christian Herald —	1.50
9—McClure's —	1.00	$2.15
3—The Christian Herald —	1.50
with either One of the following Class 23 Magazines
3—Metropolitan —	1.50	$2.30
3—Delineator —	1.50
Both of the above Class 23 Magazines with
3—The Christian Herald —	1.50	$3.45
3—The Christian Herald —	1.50
with any One of the following Class 25 Magazines
3—American —	1.50	$2.40
3—Woman's Home Companion —	1.50
3—Everybody's —	1.50
Any Two of the above Class 25 Magazines with
3—The Christian Herald —	1.50	$3.65
3—The Christian Herald —	1.50
3—Current Opinion —	3.00	$3.90

Class Number	Price Per Year
23—The Christian Herald —	$1.50
with any One of the following Class 40 Magazines
40—Youth's Companion —	2.00	$3.15
40—World's Work —	3.00
40—Review of Reviews —	3.00
Any Two of the above Class 40 Magazines with
23—The Christian Herald —	1.50	$5.15
The Christian Herald —	1.50
Little Folks —	1.00	$1.90
The Christian Herald —	1.50
Etude —	1.50	$2.00
The Christian Herald —	1.50
Garden Magazine —	1.50	$2.00
The Christian Herald —	1.50
Pictorial Review —	1.50	$2.00
The Christian Herald —	1.50
Mothers Magazine —	1.50	$2.00
The Christian Herald —	1.50
Home Needlework —	.75	$2.15
McCall's —	.50
The last two magazines must go to the same address
The Christian Herald —	1.50
Housewife —	.50	$2.15
Ladies' World —	1.00
The last two magazines must go to the same address
The Christian Herald —	1.50
Modern Priscilla —	1.00	$2.40
Home Needlework —	.75
The last two magazines must go to the same address
If you desire to make a combination other than those above you may do so in the following manner: Beside each magazine will be found a Class Number. Set down the class numbers of the magazines you want. Add up the class numbers and multiply by five. The result will be the right clubbing price.
NOTE: THE CHRISTIAN HERALD must be included in every club.
EXAMPLE
Christian Herald	Class No. 23
American Magazine	Class No. 25
Delineator	Class No. 23
		71 x 5
Total Clubbing Price.....		$3.55
Canadian and Foreign Postage extra

The Christian Herald —	$1.50
Mothers Magazine —	1.50	$2.65
Ladies' World —	1.00
McCall's —	.50
The last three magazines must go to the same address
The Christian Herald —	1.50
Woman's Home Companion —	1.50	$3.15
American —	1.50
The last two magazines must go to the same address
The Christian Herald —	1.50
Delineator —	1.50	$3.15
Everybody's —	1.50
The last two magazines must go to the same address

SPECIAL PRICES FOR RELIGIOUS PAPERS

We have succeeded in arranging to club THE CHRISTIAN HERALD with a number of religious publications at special prices, which should prove very attractive to our readers who desire to add to their quota of religious literature during the year.

The following are especially attractive:

	Price Per Year
Prophetic and Mission Record —	$3.35	$1.60
3 years. Amer. Advent Miss. Soc.]
The Christian Herald —	1.50
American Messenger —	.50	$1.65
The Christian Herald —	1.50
Daily Bible —	.60	$1.75
The Christian Herald —	1.50
The Protestant Magazine —	1.00	$1.95
The Christian Herald —	1.50
Record of Christian Work —	1.50	$2.00
The Christian Herald —	1.50
Christian Standard —	1.50	$2.30
The Christian Herald —	1.50
Christian Endeavor World —	1.50	$2.50
The Christian Herald —	1.50
The Presbyterian Banner —	2.00	$2.90
The Christian Herald —	1.50
The Standard (Baptist) —	2.00	$3.00
The Christian Herald —	1.50

Address All Orders to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York

CUT THROUGH HERE

USE THIS ORDER BLANK

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York City: — Enclosed find $..... forsubscriptions to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and the Magazines and Books as indicated below. Please send to the following addresses: State Number of subscriptions

NAME	STREET AND POST OFFICE	STATE
Send THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to Send to
Here give name of book desired
Send to
Here give name of magazine
Send to
Here give name of magazine
Send to
Here give name of magazine

Date..... 19..... Name and Address of Sender

Add ten cents to your subscription for The Christian Herald Almanac for 1916, containing 100 pages of interesting facts and figures

The Bible Picture Contest

Can You Describe This Picture
By Means of a Suitable Verse from the Bible?

AN EDUCATIONAL COMPETITION FOR REWARDS

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD believes that all who participate in its Bible Picture Contest (starting very soon) will find themselves immeasurably rewarded in educational exercise and training in observation, memory, discrimination, in enrichment of language, in increased Biblical knowledge and inspiration.

*I*N addition to these mental and spiritual benefits, the Christian Herald offers an exceedingly generous list of over 400 rewards of merit, to gladden the hearts of those contestants who will excel by submitting the best answers (suitable Bible verses) for the series of 60 pictures which constitute the Bible Picture Contest. And every person, able to read and write, will have an equal opportunity. Not special knowledge, but good sense will be the test. A standard list of eligible verses has been established; and all that the contestant needs to do is to choose the most fitting of these given verses.

The Contest is open to everybody without required expense. Men, women and children should all enjoy this splendid home recreation. You will undoubtedly find the Bible Picture Contest the best all-around enjoyment you have had in a long time.

The Bible Picture Contest may bring you the fulfilment of your fondest hope. Isn't there something you have always wished for—in behalf of loved ones, if not for yourself—but which only a large sum of money could buy? Education, travel, comforts, charity, business improvement, an automobile, a piano! compose your own thought on this subject. Well now, here is good news:

$1,000.00 IN GOLD IS THE FIRST REWARD. $500.00 IN GOLD IS THE SECOND REWARD. 414 ADDITIONAL COMMENSURATE REWARDS. YOU MAY DO WHAT YOU LIKE WITH THE MONEY WHEN YOU'VE EARNED IT.

See if you can pick out the most appropriate text from among the following:

AND the water was spent in the bottle, and she cast the child under one of the shrubs. Gen. 21 : 15.

And she went, and sat her down over against him a good way off, as it were a bowshot, for she said, Let me not see the death of the child. And she sat over against him, and lifted up her voice and wept. Gen. 21 : 16.

And the daughter of Pharaoh came down to wash herself at the river; and her maidens walked along by the river's side, and when she saw the ark among the flags, she sent her maid to fetch it. Ex. 2 : 5.

And when the queen of Sheba heard of the fame of Solomon concerning the name of the Lord, she came to prove him with hard questions. 1 Kings, 10 : 1.

This is a specimen illustration to introduce you to the 60 contest pictures.

Gems from the Bible

Containing Over 2,000 Selected Bible Verses

THE verses are given in regular sequence, from Genesis to Revelation; and each bears the notation of proper chapter and verse, facilitating reference to the full context.

Well printed, on excellent paper, in clear type, with strong and tasteful binding. (See cut at left).

The texts have been carefully compiled and edited from the Authorized or King James' Version.

This New Bible Help

Is Likely to Prove One of the Most Useful and Best Beloved Books You Ever Owned

and

May Mean $1,000 to You

YES, the book Gems from the Bible may actually bring you the concrete sum of one thousand dollars, if used in connection with the Christian Herald Bible Picture Contest now beginning. Sixty pictures will appear, for which suitable Bible verses are to be found by the public. For the best set of answers, according to the Rules, rewards are offered by the Christian Herald. Gems from the Bible has been chosen as the standard in the Bible Picture Contest and all the verses that are eligible to be submitted as titles for the pictures will be found in this book. Everybody, man, woman or child, may engage in this educational contest. What would you do with the first prize of $1,000?

Presuming that you may want to take part in the Bible Picture Contest, we shall include with the shipment of the book Gems from the Bible a very convenient booklet known as Reply Book in which you can write your answers to the pictures.

WE will send you, postpaid, the book "Gems from the Bible" and the Christian Herald for one full year (with the Bible Picture Study Reply Book added, free of charge), for only $2.00.

OR

As a reward to present subscribers who send in one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald at regular price of $1.50, we will send the books FREE.

Do not write now for particulars, but watch succeeding numbers of the Christian Herald for full information and first installment of the pictures.

Our Mail-Bag

NOTICE

THE editors of the Christian Herald will be glad to answer any question addressed to the Mail-Bag provided it be of general interest and not purely personal. Correspondents may use a nom de plume to identify the question, but all letters must contain name and address of the sender, in addition to the nom de plume. No attention will be paid to anonymous letters.

Questions and Answers

A. L., California. For a large part of my life I have been exercised and unsettled over the question of "giving up," till I feel hopelessly confused and entangled. To try to be willing to give up your dear ones, your living, everything, seems to me to be trying to achieve the impossible. At one time I had fallen into such a mental habit of thinking that everything I liked to do was necessarily wrong and that everything I did not like to do was arbitrarily demanded of me, that my mind became depressed and my life dreary and unhappy and no good seemed to come of it. Surely, the beautiful religion of Jesus is not so harsh and hard. Can you help us into the light?

Your question contains its own answer: surely the beautiful religion of Jesus is not harsh and hard. What idea of Christianity would a Buddhist or Mohammedan get from the gloomy picture you have drawn? Christianity is a story of grace; it is a story of giving things to use, not of our giving things to God. We must repeat Spurgeon's story of the old Scotch woman who, thinking of her landlord had come for the rent, hid away when he knocked at the door and learned that he had come not to get money from her, but to give her a gold sovereign. So God's wish is that we should let him bless us, and we should let him make us glad. It is strange how God's people have been inclined, every after century, to make his service instead of delightful. That was one of the things Jesus had to clear up: the scribes added countless petty, impossible requirements to the simple principles of the old law. The apostles and earliest Christians caught the idea of salvation by faith, but a great part of Paul's work was in insisting that the Jewish Christians should not go back and put themselves under the yoke from which they had been free. Read especially the third chapter of Galatians and the sixth and eighth of Romans. As the organization and ritual of the church were developed, other requirements were added, and a man like Luther needed to bring the church back to the apostle's simplicity. The present church era has been largely dominated by the Puritans: it is true that multitudes have gone too far in the other direction, that of too much license. Some souls, such as yours, need the other phase—the freedom and gladness of Christ's salvation. Remember that the great Christian word is love. Jesus says: "Henceforth I call you not servants, but I have called you friends."

Mrs. J. P. H., Jr., Newbern, Fla., and others. The war munitions question has already been fully discussed in the Christian Herald. The attitude a Christian should take is that it is wrong to supply war material to any nation. It is simply making merchandise of slaughter. The munitions trade, no matter how liberal apologists may regard it, nor how usefully the manufacturers and those who profit by it may defend it, is un-Christian, neutral, inhuman, and sordid in the last degree. Let any one who is searching for the right attitude on this subject ask himself: "What would Jesus do?" Would he have merely approved or mildly tolerated or only condemned it? We do not think any one of your mind, wishing of being and doing right, would hesitate a moment.

R. P., East Claridon, Ohio. 1. Why are there so many churches, with so many different names and forms of worship and government? 2. Was it the Roman Catholic Church that Christ founded upon a rock, and for which he gave Peter the keys? 3. Is not the "Church of God" the only Bible name given to the church, and is not the New Testament its only true book of form and doctrine?

The divisions in the church have come out through unfortunate differences of opinion, or of temperament, that have led one group of worshippers to separate themselves from others. It is unfortunate that so many of these individual branches have presumed to use the word "church," for there can be, of course, only one Church, that is the whole of believers throughout the world. The divisions recognized in the New Testament were geographical. The body of believers in a certain city were called the "church" of that city, but all together they composed the one and only Church. 2. We do not concede the right of the Roman Catholic Church to assume that she is the only true church and that this church only was founded on the rock of Christ's divinity. A number of centuries had passed before the Bishop of Rome assumed the primacy of the church, and Protestants do not accept the claim that the Pope, as the spiritual successor of Peter, is the ruler of the church. 3. Yes, the "Church of God" and "of Christ" are the only names given to the early church, except the geographical divisions referred to above. The New Testament must be the standard for every body of believers. Of course any group has the right to adopt any particular interpretation of New Testament doctrine, or any form of worship not conflicting with New Testament teaching, but they have no right to insist that others follow these same views and practices.

Mrs. E. J. D., Minneapolis, Minn. The passage in Matt. 17:19 refers to the healing of the demoniac boy. You probably meant to indicate verse 19 of the preceding chapter, which is the basis of a controversy concerning which volumes have been written. There is no evidence in the Gospels that the apostles recognized Peter as in any sense invested with special powers or as having a superior authority over them, and certainly he never asserted anything of the kind. In the Apostolic Council it was James who occupied the seat of authority (Acts 15: 13-19), although Peter was present. The language of Jesus in the passage in Matthew 16: 18, 19 is interpreted to mean that the divine truth that had been revealed to the apostle was the "rock" (and not Peter himself) upon which the church was to be founded. Professor David Smith, writing on this point, says: "Of all the sayings of Jesus this is the most sorely vexed, the most grievously abused. It is the Papacy's great proof text. Suffice it to observe that the Romanist interpretation is sanctioned by none of the great Fathers of the early church. Origen insists that the promise was not made to Peter alone, but to every disciple who joined in Peter's confession. Chrysostom holds that the 'rock' was not Peter but the faith of his confession. According to Jerome the rock was Jesus himself." Augustine in his later expositions held that the rock was Christ. Peter's language was the united confession of the entire band of apostles.

Worried, Columbus, O. The sermon you enclose is a fair example of the shallow reasoning of some preachers who gratify their love of sensation by attacks on the Bible, which result in unsettling the faith of simple believers who mistake such talk for learning. These men, by their display of vanity, are sowing the seeds of unbelief. The Bible has been assailed at intervals through all the centuries, but it still stands as the "eternal word of the truth." God's message to man and his guide for human conduct. It shows the progressive revelation of the divine truth from the world's beginning, finding its climax in the record of Jesus' life and the unfolding of the plan of salvation for this world. The Bible itself is better than all the sermons that ever were preached; wiser than all the sum of human wisdom, and it has shown the way to heaven to countless multitudes. Whenever we hear of a preacher who is making an exhibition of his learning by attacking the Bible, we are reminded of the incident related by Moody, who told of a man who brought to a minister of this class the covers of a Bible. "You attacked Genesis and Exodus, and then you went on through all the rest of the old Book, and so I tore them out, and now," he added, "there is nothing left but the boards! What shall I do? What can I believe?" The minister was thunderstruck and stood self-convicted. He had helped to destroy the belief of a sincere man and gave him nothing in its place.

Constant Reader, Medina, O. 1. You do your duty in presenting the Gospel, whether it is accepted or not. We are to do the sowing, but the harvest belongs to the Lord. 2. The passage in Luke 14: 26, 27 will be better understood by comparing the corresponding passage in Matt. 10: 37 which renders the real meaning more accurately. 3. We are to hate sin, in all its forms and manifestations, but it is Christlike to love the sinner, and to do all that lies in our power to win him over from his life of sin to that purity and uprightness which only come through divine grace in conversion and regeneration.

Mrs. S. M. J., Delanson, N. Y. The passage in I Cor. 12:10 relative to the "discerning of spirits" is interpreted as having no reference to occultism or what is known as "the black art," or divination, but means that they were men of pure, godly, prayerful life, much given to meditation and study in the desire to know the divine will, and that they were, as a result, specially qualified to advise others less experienced and to distinguish or "discern" between the operations of the Holy Spirit and the influences of selfish, human, worldly aims and desires. (See for illustrative passages Acts, 5: 1-11; I Tim. 4: 1; I John 4: 1.) In other words, they taught and helped others to seek and know the will of God in all the crises of life and to do it.

"Is it not true that many of our fashionable churches incline more to formalism, fashion and social standing than to sound principles?"

Is the power and spirit of Christianity too broad, too radical, too sweeping, too socialistic? After all, truth will triumph; but it remains a question as to whether the larger number of men will be found on the side of truth or error." F. V. does not seem to have quite apprehended the scope of the discussion, which was undertaken to find, if possible, the points of agreement and interest on which the church and the worker could unite forces. Our own impression was that the replies were, in the main, very generous and that the churches were ready to meet the workers more than half way. As the discussion was closed many months ago, we cannot reopen it now.

B. I. W., North Carolina. Do you think it is right for one in school to study on Sunday? I heard some one say, recently, that it would be better to study on Sunday than to be unprepared for the week's lessons.

The law of the Sabbath has its root in the deep needs of human nature. One cannot be at his best who works seven days a week. The Sabbath rest ought to provide a complete change of thought and conduct. The mind of the student needs the complete relaxation from study which the Sabbath affords, while the soul needs the spiritual refreshment provided by worship and religious work. A student will succeed better by determining to keep his Sabbath hours free from his school work; he will find his will strengthened and his mind clarified, so that he will do the work for the other days more earnestly and efficiently. This is the clear meaning of the Sabbath commandment—to lay aside completely the week's ordinary work, whatever it may be, except in so far as it is absolutely necessary for the preservation of life and health.

J. K., Salem, Miss. If you will read very carefully the remarks of Professor David Smith which we quoted in our article, "The Marrow of the Gospel," you will see that his meaning is that the atonement is a finished work; that "Jesus paid it all" and that we are to believe and accept him as our Saviour. When you ask God for Jesus' sake to forgive your sin, he is ready to forgive. Professor Smith has used the word "sin" in its broad, comprehensive sense, to signify a state or condition. Having once accepted Christ, you must ask to be kept from day to day, to be strengthened against temptation, and that your faith may be fortified and renewed.

J. L., The Nazarenes are now united with the bodies formerly called the Association of Pentecostal Churches and the Southern Holiness Church, in a new denomination called the Pentecostal Church of the Nazarene. The doctrines of the denomination are those held by the Methodist churches, with special emphasis upon the Wesleyan doctrine of entire sanctification, or Christian perfection. In its polity the denomination is largely congregational, though there are four general superintendents. The body just held its quadrennial assembly at Kansas City and reports 31,600 members.

G. B., Binghamton, N. Y. The story of the rich man and Lazarus is classed by all Bible authorities, by common consent, among the parables. It was told to illustrate great spiritual truths, so that they could be readily understood. There are, however, traditions which have been preserved that have led many to conclude that the characters were drawn from actual life. One of these traditions gives the name of the rich man as Dabru, and states that Lazarus was a well-known beggar who sat at the gates, asking alms. Another tradition gives the rich man's name as Nimeusis.

F. G. M., Corvallis, Oregon. There probably never was a more widespread interest in prophecy than at the present time, and there is great need of caution, in order that sincere searchers of the Word may not be deluded. We expect shortly to publish several notable articles on the subject by eminent Bible expositors, who have made it a special study. The right attitude is to avoid being led away by those who, assuming wisdom which they have not, jump at conclusions, and to await in faith and confidence the time when God himself will make the hidden things plain.

A. R. P., Norwich, Conn. The "Old Oaken Bucket" was written by Samuel Woodworth, an American poet and journalist born at Scituate, Mass., in 1785. He wrote many other poems, but the one mentioned, which is believed to have been a recollection of childhood days, is the one by which he is best known.

J. D. M., Philadelphia. It is not right for a man to rob his creditors of their just due, in order to give money to the church. "Owe no man anything but to love one another," says the Scripture. One can not consecrate to the Lord's work the money which he justly owes to others, because it is not his to give.

G. R., Summit, N. J. The Sunday observance laws differ in the various states. Consult the law of your own state on the subject. Any justice of the peace or police magistrate will inform you.

No Waste

You can fry fish, then onions, then potatoes, all in the same Crisco—and no taste or odor will be carried from one to the other. It is necessary merely to strain the Crisco through cheese cloth after each frying.

This prevents all waste, and makes it unnecessary to keep several crocks of cooking fat in your kitchen for different kinds of frying.

CRISCO
For Frying—For Shortening
For Cake Making

Crisco keeps fresh and sweet indefinitely. This also means prevention of waste.

Crisco is equal to the best of creamery butter for cooking—and costs less even than the better grades of lard.

Fried Chicken

Chicken Crisco

Select young tender chickens and disjoint. Wash carefully and let stand over night in refrigerator. Drain chicken but do not wipe dry. Season with salt and white pepper and dredge well with flour. Fry in deep Crisco hot enough to brown a crumb of bread in sixty seconds. It requires from ten to twelve minutes to fry chicken. Drain and place on a hot platter garnished with parsley and rice croquettes.

If you want to know more about Crisco, send for the "Calendar of Dinners". This cloth-bound, gold-stamped book contains, besides the story of Crisco, a different dinner menu for every day of the year and 615 recipes tested by the well-known cooking authority, Marion Harris Neill. Address your request to Dept. S-12, The Procter & Gamble Co., Cincinnati, O., enclosing five 2 cent stamps. A paper-bound edition, without the "Calendar of Dinners" but with 250 recipes, will be sent free on request.

Start Now to Avoid Pyorrhea

Unless you can be sure that you will be among the few and fortunate 20 who avoid Pyorrhea after passing 40 years of age, you would do well to take preventive measures. If used in time, Forhan's Pyorrhea Preparation will positively prevent Pyorrhea or Riggs' Disease loosening of the teeth, receding and inflamed gums. It gives prompt relief.

CONSULT YOUR DENTIST, and he will probably prescribe the Preparation with his treatment. Use daily like a dentifrice—pleasant to taste.

Large tube (as illustrated), 50c. If your druggist hasn't it, send his name (with price) to Forhan Company, 21-27 Elm St., New York, who will see that you are supplied.

Factory Prices Save $5 to $23

Freight Paid—A Year's Trial

Save from $5 to $23 by buying direct from factory. 55 years' reputation, back of every stove. Our long experience and big output gives you a better stove or range at less cost.

Gold Coin Stoves and Ranges

Use one for a year—money refunded if it doesn't prove absolutely satisfactory. We pay freight, guarantee safe delivery, and send every stove ready to set up. BIG FREE CATALOG—Send for it now. See why improved features of Gold Coin Stoves help you save fuel and bake better. Write today. GOLD COIN STOVE CO., 11 Oak St., Troy, N. Y.

Living Music Box

Reg. U. S. Pat. 20855

Our famous musically educated Canary, the most wonderful singer in existence. Sings in evenings as well as during day. Sent on 5 days' trial. Money back if not satisfied. $6.00

Mrs. R. L. Jolie, Jr., Savannah, Ga., writes: "My bird is worth his weight in gold. Illustrated Catalog and testimonials FREE."

Max Geisler's Roller-Seed and Bird-Biscuit is the only proper food for Canaries and positively MAKES your bird sing all year round. At all Druggists or by parcel post for 30c. Valuable Bird-Book free for dealer's name.

Max Geisler Bird Co., Dept. P, Omaha, Neb. Birds, Dogs and Pets. In business 27 years

BECOME A NURSE

WE have trained thousands of women in their own homes to earn $10 to $25 a week as nurses. Send for "How I Became a Nurse"—248 pages with actual experience—48 illustrated lesson pages free. Fourteenth Year.

The Chautauqua School of Nursing
341 Main St., Jamestown, N. Y.

The BEST LIGHT

Positively the cheapest and strongest light on earth. Used in every country on the globe. Makes and burns its own gas. Casts no shadows. Clean and odorless. Absolutely safe. Over 200 styles. 100 to 2000 Candle Power. Fully Guaranteed. Write for catalog. AGENTS WANTED EVERYWHERE.

THE BEST LIGHT CO.
470 E. 5th St., Canton, O.

Jehovah Yearns Over Backsliding Israel

International Sunday School Lesson for December 12.

Hosea 11: 1-11

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By REV. F. B. MEYER, B.A., D.D.

"I drew them with cords of a man, with bands of love." Hosea 11: 4.

The rest of this verse suggests a picture. A team of bullocks or horses have been dragging a lumbering wagon, or a load of heavy timber just out from the forest, up a steep and difficult ascent. They have at last reached the summit of the hill, and stand with panting sides. The wagoner takes the bit from the tired mouth, or loosens a strap, speaks kindly to his cattle, gives them food or water, pats and encourages them. He needs no other incentive than these cords of a man and bands of love. The grateful animals recognize and reciprocate the kindness of his treatment, and will serve him when he speaks as they would not serve for the cruel cutting whip. It is thus that our heavenly Father desires to deal with us, whenever we have been subjected to excessive strain. After Christian's fight with Apollyon in the immortal allegory, we are told that there came a band, with some of the leaves of the tree of life, which he applied to the wounds received in the battle, and he was healed immediately. Elijah also found, when he awoke under the juniper tree, a cake baked on the coals and a cruse of water, and he arose and did eat and drink, and went in the strength of it forty days and nights to Horeb, the mount of God. We do not realize how much we owe to the tender, thoughtful, ever-present love of God. Would that we yielded to the drawing influences of these bands and cords, instead of being indifferent or pulling against them!

"Come Home"

By Arthur H. Howland

THE story and message of Hosea make a strange, sad, weird bit of Bible literature. Much of it is not at all suited for discussion in Sunday school classes, but other passages possess rare beauty and profound spiritual and ethical value. There are flashing gleams of spiritual truth; indeed, spiritual gems of such rare brilliance are hardly to be found in any other book of the Old Testament.

It is unfortunate that so many Scripture words have been translated into English terms which have varying meanings. For instance, "charity." What English people of today mean by charity is not what Paul meant when he wrote that Greek word "agape." He meant first an emotion of the soul, a condition of heart in which God is dear, is beloved; he was thinking, too, of the kind of love for humans this experience would lead to, but this latter meaning has grown until his prime meaning has been lost sight of.

The discussion of this word is not irrelevant, because one of the two big words in Hosea is almost identical with it and has been obscured in much the same way. "I desired mercy and not sacrifice" (chapter 6: 6). Mercy there means love, the same sort of love that Paul wrote about in that thirteenth chapter of First Corinthians. God wants the love of human souls. This is the great message of Hosea, throbbing through and through the sad lines of the poet's story of his own heart-break.

There is a horrible word, the very opposite of this: "hatred." That is a strange and terrible verse, 9: 7: "The days of visitation are come, the days of recompense are come. The prophet is a fool; the spiritual man is mad, for the multitude of thine iniquity and the great hatred." What God wanted from his people was love; what he got was hatred. That is the tragedy of Hosea's book. That is the tragedy of today's world.

Of course, it is important that men love each other. But that matter will take care of itself when men really learn to love God. The fact has been emphasized that Jesus came to teach men to call God "Father" and to call one another "brother." But notice the pronouns of his teaching as well as the nouns. Our Father; My brother. That is Christianity. That is the message of Hosea. God is seen to be to all his people a loving Father; then each of his children can say and think of and to every other child, "My brother." This is love. This is the gospel.

We forget again and again what Jesus declared to be the first commandment of all, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart." Then the second, like unto it: "Thou shalt love thy neighbor." The fundamental wrong with human nature is that it does not love God. This is sin. Christ came to take away this sin and make us love God. That makes us love one another and all the world.

NOTICE now some of Hosea's graphic descriptions of Israel's sin. "They set their heart on their iniquity" (4: 8). Here is a picture of a will determined to do evil. Not merely a sudden overthrow by the power of a sudden and terrific temptation, but a settled, fixed, strong, habitual, determined premeditation of evil. That state is far down the road of sin, but every wrong indulgence, every wrong choice, leads straight toward it. "I have written to him the great things of the law, but they were counted to him as a strange thing" (8: 12). Here is the picture of a father, a friend, a husband, a lover, writing affectionate messages and finding his words considered those of a stranger. "Israel hath forgotten his Maker" (8: 14). "Ye have eaten the fruit of lies" (10: 13). Hatred of God and defiance of his laws led to grievous wrongs against others. "The balances of deceit are in his hand. He loveth to oppress" (12: 7). Luxury had led to and strengthened this attitude of oppression. "Ephraim said, Yet I am become rich. I have found me out substance." The results of his sin were grievous, yet even in the depths of his degradation there was hope: "O Israel, thou hast destroyed thyself, but in me is thy help" (13: 9).

Before taking up the detailed study of the verses assigned for today's lesson, notice one or two other great New Testament ideas in this prophecy. When Paul wrote his majestic words, "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?" he was really quoting from Hosea. The Revised Version shows the true rendering of that great verse, the 14th of the 13th chapter, in which the prophet's vision takes in the final victory, the victory over death. Paul quoted almost literally, from the Greek, or Septuagint, Version of this verse: "O death, where are thy plagues? O grave, where is thy sting?" Now the verses of our printed lesson, though the real lesson is the whole book—since this is the only glimpse of Hosea we get in this year's study.

Remember in the first place that the prophet speaks of the whole Northern Kingdom as "Ephraim," because Ephraim was the most influential tribe of that kingdom. So Israel and Ephraim are used interchangeably throughout the prophecy.

"When Israel was a child, I loved him." Glance through these eleven verses and see how many times the love idea is repeated. "I taught Ephraim to go, taking them by their arms" (verse 3). That is intimate, practical, helpful love. "I drew them with bands of love" (verse 4). "How shall I give thee up, Ephraim? My heart is turned within me, my compassions are kindled" (verse 8). Such love as makes the heart appear to turn itself, affection that burns—that is the way God loves.

Make your pupils see the picture of a boy's room, dimly lit, waiting for his return. There is the restful bed, there are all his little personal belongings, there is welcome, comfort, love. A mother is waiting, watching. She knows the boy is wandering somewhere, in

Make Cleaning Days Happy

With a Christmas BISSELL'S

Useful presents are the fashion now gifts like Bissell's Carpet Sweeper and Bissell's Vacuum Sweeper. Women have said for nearly 40 years that there is no keeping house without the Bissell. The modern "business managed" home should be equipped both with

BISSELL'S Carpet and Vacuum Sweeper and Vacuum Sweeper

With the carpet sweeper for daily sweeping and the vacuum machine for general cleaning you can banish the dust-raising, dangerous broom. These two Bissell's keep your house immaculately clean the sanitary, efficient, quick, easy way. As to mechanical superiority, the name Bissell's is your guarantee. The new vacuum machine has greater suction power than most electric cleaners; is light running and easy to operate; has a one-piece nozzle and dust-pan that empties from the rear—an exclusive convenience. As to prices: Bissell's Carpet Sweepers are $2.75 to $5.75; the Vacuum Cleaner (without brush) $7.50; the Vacuum Sweeper (with brush) $9.00. Slightly higher in the West, South and Canada. Sold by dealers everywhere. Booklet on request. (245) BISSELL CARPET SWEEPER CO. Largest Exclusive Manufacturers of Carpet Sweeping Devices in the World. Dept. 110, Grand Rapids, Mich. Made in Canada, too.

Any WING Upright or Grand On 4 Weeks' Trial

Yes, we will ship you a high-grade Wing—your choice of 33 new art styles—direct from our own factory all freight prepaid on four weeks' free trial right in your own home.

No Money Down Not a Cent of Freight

Use it 4 weeks. Then, if you wish, you may return it at our expense. No money down—nothing on arrival—no freight either way. You'll be amazed at our direct-from-factory price on the famous Wing, guarantee for 40 years. Easy monthly payments or cash if you prefer, but first 4 weeks absolutely free trial.

Valuable Book FREE The "Book of Complete Information About Pianos" sent free and prepaid. Tells how to judge piano quality at prices. We will also send our catalog of newest art styles Wing Pianos and details of our free trial offer. Write NOW. Wing & Son, (Est. 1868) 9th Ave. & 13th St., Dept. 2499, New York

MAGAZINES

J. M. Hanson-Bennett Magazine Agency is the largest in the world. You can save money the magazine you want by writing

This Catalog FREE

Our new Catalog lists more than 3000 Periodicals Club Offers. IT'S A BIG MONEY SAVER. Send your name and address on post card day and get this big free catalog. Agents Wanted. particula

J. M. HANSON-BENNETT Magazine Agency

222 Brooks Building Chicago, Ill.

POMPEIAN OLIVE OIL

ALWAYS FRESH

There is the same marked difference between fresh Olive Oil and Olive Oil packed months ago as there is between a newly-laid egg and an egg months old. Insist on POMPEIAN

THE STANDARD IMPORTED OLIVE OIL

LADIES! Ease your feet. Send free catalog telling about our Neat, Noiseless, Flexible, Comfortable, unlined Vic Kid O'Sullivanized PILL SHOE. New shoes easy as old ones. Breaking in required. Fit and feel like kid glove. O'Sullivan's Rubber Heels all styles.

PILLOW SHOE CO., Dept. 184 Summer Street, Boston, Mass.

The Wise Men and the Star

TIME is at once the least important and the most important thing in the universe. It is inexhaustible. Yet every second is the measure of so many pulse beats.

Have you ever thought of the complex calculations that keep our conception of time straight to the fraction of a second—this year, next year and always?

At Elgin, Illinois, the Elgin National Watch Company maintains an observatory where two astronomers of great ability verify the rating of the Master Elgin Clocks by which all Elgin Watches are regulated. Every clear night in the year they make eleven checks of the earth's rotation against twelve stars so remote that their gigantic orbits are imperceptible. From the average of these 132 observations true star time is calculated. In turn, this is translated into commercial time. This absolute precision has given the Elgin standard of accuracy its great fame.

The Christian world reckons the yearly cycle of time from the birth of Christ. His star, set in the East, guided the three wise men to witness and to worship Him, bearing gifts. From this, down the centuries, has come our great season of gift giving.

What gift more majestic in sentiment, what gift more typical of the great achievements of humans, than an excellent watch?

The Elgin Watch is a marvel of mechanical genius, a marvel of accuracy, a marvel of timekeeping, a most beautiful example of the jeweler's art.

Write for the Elgin book, "Time Taking—Time Keeping," a story of the wonders worked at the Elgin Observatory. Send stamped addressed envelope for set of Elgin Poster Stamps.

ELGIN

Watches

KEEP TIME

ELGIN NATIONAL WATCH CO.
Elgin, Illinois

Ask Your Engineer

He will show you Elgins exceedingly fine and richly jeweled, also Elgins of equal accuracy, but less elaborate, less expensive.

drunkenness and foulness, or perhaps in crime. Her heart throbs; her yearning grief seems really to overturn that aching heart; her ears strain to catch the sound of his returning feet; her eyes peer out of the window through the darkness. She goes back to her own room and falls upon her knees. She looks again into his room, so full of comfort, yet so desolate. The pent-up tears flow at last. She kneels at his bed. "Oh, my son, how shall I give thee up?" That is the picture of God, waiting for us, one by one, to come back to him.

"They knew not that I healed them" (verse 3). How many things God does for us that we do not know about; how ashamed, how grieved we are when we find them out! So you remember little or big kindnesses mother did for us that we failed to notice. How sorry we were when we found out—perhaps too late!

"Bent on backsliding" (verse 7). The fixed habit again. To offset this breathe the prayer, "Take away our bent to sinning." He will really do it if we are in earnest and will believe.

Admah and Zeboim (verse 8). These are two of the ancient cities destroyed because of their great sin. See Deut. 29:23.

The last verse gives us the picture of home again—this time home occupied, enjoyed, loved. So the Bible message is one yearning cry of God to all the world to come back to the love of his heart.

Notice particularly the fourteenth chapter, which is one of the most beautiful in all the Bible.

The How Column

Conducted by Frank L. Brown, Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

More about preparing the lesson

THE TEACHERS' MEETING

ONE of the very best plans for conducting the teachers' meeting is called the "Angle Method." It has been used many years in Marion Lawrence's school at Toledo and by large numbers of schools throughout the country. The plan provides that at each meeting a number of teachers shall demonstrate the skilful treatment of the lesson from various angles. These angles are:

1. Lesson Approach. This will include the subject of the last lesson and a brief statement of intervening events leading to the lesson.

2. Lesson Story. This should be told by some teacher in his or her own words and as graphically as possible.

3. Analysis. This will be a working outline of the lesson for purposes of studying and teaching.

4. References. This will consist of helpful references and parallel passages and their bearing on the lesson.

5. Biography. The persons, classes and nations referred to should be described.

6. Orientalisms. Customs peculiar to the Orient should be explained. Material is easily available for this in the Christian Herald, Bible Dictionary and Sunday School Helps.

7. Principal Teachings. This should include the lesson aim and be arranged with reference to the ages to which they will best apply.

8. First Step. Show a good way to secure attention to introduce the lesson, some good point of contact. If the front door steps are not in place we can't expect to get in the house.

9. Department Teaching. A model plan can be presented for the primary, junior, intermediate and adult department lesson.

10. Objects. Give list of objects that can be utilized to attract attention.

11. Illustrations. These can be presented from the Bible, nature, newspaper or lesson helps.

12. Practical Points. These should bring the lesson down to every-day life.

One pastor has a large number of these angle points printed for use during the season and fills in the name of the teacher to whom the angle is assigned and hands these out several weeks in advance of the meeting.

To make such a meeting effective there should be on hand a few maps, say of Palestine, Paul's journeys, the Bible world, and relief map of Palestine. A teachers' library will be valuable for service in this angle study.

Pads and pencils are most important to take down such points as may help in further personal study or be applicable to the class. In my own teachers' meeting for many years I mimeographed an outline of the lesson facts, points and illustrations for use by the teachers in their classes following the teachers' meeting. This was of a size that could be slipped into the Bible.

The three P's and three D's have been used in teachers' meetings. Parallel passages, persons, places, dates, doings, doctrines.

The lesson is sometimes taught completely to the teachers as if they were primary, junior, intermediate or adult scholars—or a ten or fifteen minute lesson is taught to the class in four successive groups, primary, junior, intermediate, and senior or adult. The needs of the scholars in all these plans should have first place. An adult lesson cannot be taught to young folks effectively.

The spirit of prayer should pervade the meeting.

A series of model questions to be asked the scholars or of discussion points will be of value in such a meeting.

Re-creating a Sunday School

THIS Sunday school had been struggling along in a downtown church. The superintendent had done his best, in fact he had done better than he knew.

Two things had not been done. No systematic plan had been developed by which the school could know its field or serve it; and no decision days had been observed. The monthly teachers' meetings had been rather more social gatherings than business conferences. We contrived to add a new spiritual note and to turn the trend of the business along lines of personal evangelism. The teachers began praying for their classes, and in their teaching added to instruction a steady influence toward definite faith and decision. The Sunday before Easter eleven young folks from the school met the Board of Deacons and simply and sweetly declared their faith in Christ and their purpose to serve him.

The teacher of the class of boys of high school age was having trouble to hold his boys. They stayed away. We studied the situation together. We found that the fathers of these boys were, many of them, leaving the church service for an hour of golf or auto-riding or were going home to spend the time before dinner reading and resting. They were not in the Sunday school. Neither were their boys. We decided to organize a business men's class. We sent letters to one hundred and twenty men. Forty responded. In three months the class had a membership of eighty-five, and every one of those high school boys was also in his place.

In the middle of the year a woman who had been singularly successful in the Junior graded work moved into the neighborhood and joined the church. My Junior superintendent came to me the next Sunday and offered to resign and to take a class in the department under this new worker.

Just about the same time a woman of considerable experience in institutional work became available and the business men's class employed her to do the work of a neighborhood visitor. The Junior superintendent worked in close harmony with the neighborhood visitor, and within a year the Junior Department had grown, until it was nearly as large as the Intermediate and Senior Departments combined. Children from the neighborhood, many of whom had been neglected physically and religiously, crowded all departments. Through the children the church was able to reach parents who had allowed the stress of struggle and disappointment and injustice and poverty to drive faith and hope out of their lives and to make them even suspicious of charity.

On our second decision day eight more young people took a definite stand for Christ. Our enrolment had then passed the two hundred mark and our attendance averaged between one hundred and fifty and one hundred and seventy-five. The school was vibrant with life and earnest purpose.

How Long It Does Last!

Women who try Dr. Price's Vanilla Extract wonder how it can last so long. First, it's pure. Second, it's the true extract of the genuine vanilla bean. Third, Prices have an old-time process of aging their vanilla extract in wood to insure great strength and richness of flavor—it goes a long way.

Look for Price's "Tropikid" on the Label

DR. PRICE'S

DELICIOUS

FLAVORING EXTRACT

VANILLA

is not an imitation compound, but a pure vanilla-bean extract. Does not bake out or freeze out. Is not reinforced with either artificial vanillin, coumarin or coal-tar preparations and does not contain any tonka (snuff) beans.

We Make All Popular Flavors

15¢ 25¢ 35¢ & up

PRICE FLAVORING
EXTRACT COMPANY
CHICAGO, ILL.

In Business 63 Years

Send Tropikid cut from Extract carton and 2c stamp for handsome book of new delicious recipes, "The Way to a Man's Heart," and information how to secure "Tropikid" suit for your boy.

Also Makers of Price's Jelly Dessert

Beautiful Neck and Arms

of fine skin texture, soft and smooth, need only the same intelligent care given the face and hands.

A little

Hinds Cream

HONEY AND ALMOND

used morning and evening as well as before and after exposure to the weather will keep the skin as you would like to have it and free from undue redness, roughness or chapping.

Selling everywhere, or postpaid by us on receipt of price. Hinds Cream in bottles, 50c. Hinds Cold Cream in tubes, 25c.

Samples sent for 2c stamp to pay postage

Do not take a substitute—Hinds Cream will improve the skin.

A. S. HINDS 291 West St., Portland, Maine

Try HINDS Honey and Almond Cream SOAP—Refined, fragrant, beneficial—25c. No Soap Samples.

If Your Children

are delicate or frail, if they catch cold easily or are backward in studies, give them the pure medicinal nourishment in Scott's Emulsion. It is rich, strength-making growing-food.

FREE FROM ALCOHOL
SCOTT & BOWNE, BLOOMFIELD, N. J.

A Merry Christmas for that Boy of Yours

Give him this splendid Electric Engine and a 15 months' subscription to THE BOYS' MAGAZINE. Over 100,000 boys take THE BOYS' MAGAZINE. It contains just the kind of reading you want your boy to have. Clean, inspiring stories. Practical and instructive articles. Beautifully illustrated throughout.

The Electric Engine runs either forward or backward from 150 to 3000 revolutions a minute. Safe; easy to operate. A toy any boy will go wild over.

Send only $1.50 and we'll enter your subscription for 15 months and will forward the Electric Engine by return mail. If you are not more than pleased with both the Magazine and Engine we'll refund your money immediately. As to our responsibility we refer you to any bank or publisher.

THE SCOTT F. REDFIELD CO.
740 Main Street, Smethport, Pa.

This Doll House Will Delight Your Child

Large size, 2 floors, 4 rooms, strong wood frame, removable panel. Beautiful in design and coloring. Shipped "flat" in strong box, by express or parcel post.

$5.00 F.O.B. Chicago. Circular on request.
PANEL TOY CO., Lock Box 108, CHICAGO, ILL.

Don't Throw It
MENDETS
Mend leaks instantly in all utensils, pressure, swimming, tin, brass, but water bags, etc. No solder, cement or rivet. Any one can use them. Send for sample box, 10c; large box, all sizes, 25c, postpaid. Agents Wanted. Collette Mfg. Co., Box 302 Amsterdam, N. Y.

Pressing Toward the High Mark

Continued from page 1214

will die, or be forced by ill-health to return to the home country; probably a net increase of 1,388 will mean a total of twice that number of newly consecrated lives. If the proportion between the home and foreign work is maintained, there would thus be a net gain of 225 in the number of missionaries abroad. The five-year program includes "the placing of fresh emphasis upon the divine call and the sacrificial consecration involved in a missionary career."

The third goal is an endowment of two million dollars for the Ministers' and Missionaries' Benefit Board. This is a new board, recently created, to supervise the aid which the church is giving to ministers and missionaries, who are broken down and in need. There is no church which gives these soldiers of the cross the assistance their heroic work has earned, though most of the churches are making some effort at relief. In 1915 the Baptist Foreign Board appropriated $17,525.67 out of current funds. This endowment fund will afford much more relief and will release the money now being appropriated from current funds for the regular work of the board to be used in advancing the Kingdom. This goal, as well as the fourth and fifth, will seem to have been set by men of little faith if the second "method," "the systematic and proportionate giving of at least a tenth," becomes the general practice throughout the denomination.

The fourth goal is six million dollars for educational endowment and equipment at home and abroad; and as a part of this goal is included the determination that, at the end of the five years, there shall be one thousand Baptist students in theological seminaries and fifteen thousand students in colleges and universities.

The fifth goal is an annual income of six million dollars for missions and benevolence, not an average for the five years, but a steady increase that will bring the annual income to the six million mark by the fifth year. When compared with the present contributions, which, although the total exceeds three and a half millions, yet represent an average annual gift per member of less than three dollars, this goal is seen to be reasonable, logical and more than possible.

The Baptist Church has always fostered education. It has ever been the home of the open book. With the inspired Word of God as its creed, discarding all other creeds, it has fought for its convictions, not with the implements of carnal warfare, although in its earlier history it suffered much thereby, but with the weapons of grace, of love, of service and of knowledge. Its colleges at home occupy strategic places in the life of the church and of the nation; and the victory on the foreign field depends no less, in fact it stands or falls, upon the foundation that is laid in schools and colleges, which shall send out into all lands a trained and consecrated native Christian ministry.

THE Five-Year Program is being given its first local impetus by Baptist rallies in the convention cities of the Laymen's Missionary Campaign. Every Baptist pastor and layman is being urged to attend one of these conventions, and to stay over for the denominational rally on the afternoon of the last convention day. The strongest men in the church are in the teams that are conducting these rallies, and they are meeting with very representative groups of Baptists at each convention. From these rallies the fire of resolve and the inspiration to achieve is spreading throughout the church. It will spread faster as pastors and laymen come to realize that their church is really moving forward to a great spiritual achievement in which they must have a part. Connectionalism is not as strong in the church as it might be. There is no authority to enforce adherence to any plan. But this plan is enforcing adherence by its manifest patency and its daring challenge.

Again, in this movement, as in the other outstanding movements of present-day Protestantism, we see evangelism in the pulpit matched and upheld by personal evangelism in the pew. Evangelism, personal and pastoral, is the key-note upon which the chord of achievement is to be built. No movement that would claim the world for Christ can be otherwise founded. The church that magnifies the gospel of her Lord, and that exalts her Christ, will be joined by those whom he drawing to himself out of the world. Here, too, the people are called to bring all the tithes into the storehouse and claim the promise. That the gift may be orderly and none be overlooked the already proven every-member canvass is urged, and churches are advised that there is ready an abundance of literature for the use of the canvasser. Education is to be kept to the fore. Bible schools are to be organized on a ten-point standard, missionary instruction is to be assured, and the young men and women are to be urged to go through the schools to the college and the university.

In urging their churches to do efficient social service, to become community centers and community forces for social righteousness, the Baptist committee has sounded a note that has not been struck, noticeably, in other campaigns. It is one that can not be overlooked. There is available to the church today no greater field than that of community and social service. The complete fruition of this movement of the plan alone lies the possibility of ultimate success, especially in the goal of increased membership.

The last method recommended, because it is greatest and must underlie all, is prayer, prevailing prayer, personal prayer, public prayer, social prayer groups, much prayer. In the words of the committee: "Prayer is the supreme essential of success." Social service, educational advance, evangelism, fun these all wait on prayer and prayer waits on God, and God is able to do more than we can ask or think.

LOUIS E. ORCUTT.

The Horse Is Not Forgotten

PROTESTING against the shipping of American horses for use on European battlefields, the American Humane Association met for its thirty-ninth annual convention at Jacksonville, Fla., November 8-11.

Not only as an embodied protest, but also as a leverage of amelioration, the Association has done what it could to mitigate the condition of war-horses. One of its leaflets, "How to Kill Horses Humanely," has found acceptance among English-speaking troopers in Canada and England, and has been specially endorsed by the Canadian premier, Sir Robert Borden. Hundreds of thousands of these instructions to soldiers for the proper care of army horses—and for their humane destruction should that become necessary—have been issued during the past year, and the distribution of even larger quantities is planned, as well as of veterinary supplies and necessities for the relief of war-horses in Europe. In other lines also there has been great activity among the 25,000 volunteer and 2,500 salaried agents in the 558 live anti-cruelty societies aligned in the American Humane Association for the protection of children and animals.

The work for children has been emphasized in the movement to secure suitable institutions for feeble-minded children, correspondence being carried on by the national humane leaders with the governors of nearly all of the states during the past year.

New societies for the prevention of cruelty to children have been organized, there being now forty-five societies devoted wholly to children and about 350 caring for both children and animals, in addition to nearly 200 for the protection of animals alone.

Improved methods in juvenile courts and child probation have been advocated during the year. Objectionable moving pictures have been denounced, and a concerted movement has been launched to reach twenty million school children in the United States with systematic instruction in kindness.

Bird-protection; reform in slaughterhouses where cruel conditions still exist; the better care of calves in transportation; the abuse of mail-carriers' horses; cruelties in hunting and trapping, are among the special objects of attention of the united humanitarians, the benefit of whose work is felt from ocean to ocean.

J. A. STEWART.

Anvil Sparks

God can use even a stick—especially if he is the kind of a man who will stick.

The man who himself travels in the way his child should go won't have half the trouble.

The man who won't keep his promises to you is just the sort of a man who will get mad if you don't keep yours to him.

The reason some folks who are bad won't think seriously of their sins is because they think themselves too good to think of anything bad.

Some folks want the faith to remove mountains when they ought to be content with the faith that would remove molehills, for that is about the size of their troubles.

My $3 Exerciser $1.00 Reduced to

A Chest Expander Also

with each outfit, I will give an extra handle, without charge, by which the Muscle Builder can instantly be converted into a most effective Chest Expander to be used for developing the chest and lungs. Take advantage of this opportunity while it lasts. Send your order today.

Prof. Anthony Barker
Studio 26, 110 West 42d Street, New York

ADLER'S PLAN SAVES HALF

Before you decide on an organ for Church, Sunday School or Young Peoples' Society, you should get my big FREE ORGAN BOOK and details of my direct-from-factory selling plan. I will save you big money.

CHURCH ORGAN

Any size or style shipped freight prepaid for $0.00 absolutely free trial. Price so low and terms so good that no Church, Sunday School or Young Peoples' Society need be without a sweet-toned, resonant, capable, highest grade organ. My organs won high prize at St. Louis World's Fair and National Convention Exposition. Fifty year guarantee. Send post for big, free book of all styles of organs for home churches, Sunday Schools, etc.

C. L. ADLER, Pres., ADLER ORGAN CO.
8009 W. Chestnut Street, Louisville, 2

AGENTS—Steady Income Large manufacturer of Handkerchiefs and D. Goods, etc., wishes representative in each locality. Factory consumer. Big profits, honest goods. Credit given. Send particulars. FREEPORT MFG. CO., 32 Main St., Brooklyn.

THE "intangible commodities" you buy along with your Church Envelopes—such as accuracy, promptness, reliability—are most appreciated when found wanting. But then it's usually too late. Write for our booklet, "Intangible Commodities."

FREE—A Duplex Envelope Opener, for the name and address of your Treasurer and S. S. Supt. Saves time and trouble.

ADDRESS DESK—1
DUPLEX
RICHMOND, VA.
(ARCHER G. JONES)

Special Offer $3.25

Christian Herald ($1.50 a Year) - -
Luther's Companion ($2.00 a Year) - -
Call's Magazine (50c a Year) - -
Save 90c
(including choice of a 15c pattern FREE)

ADDRESS
THE CHRISTIAN HERALD
BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK

LEARN AT HOME
SPARE TIME ONLY
Qualify correspondence students...
Address of nearest branch office.

DR XMAS-A TYPEWRITER!

Do these things! Typewriters Rebuilt...
Prices $20 to $55
Suits $18 to $40
Royals $25 to $45
Oliviers $20 to $35

AMERICAN WRITING MACHINE CO., Inc., 345 Broadway, N. Y.

INDIVIDUAL COMMUNION SERVICE
Does YOUR Church use this clean and sanitary method?
Send for catalog and special offer. Outfits on trial.
Thomas Communion Service Co., Box 150 Lima, Ohio

OLYMYER CHURCH BELLS
UNLIKE OTHER BELLS SWEETER, MORE DURABLE, LOWER PRICE. OUR FREE CATALOGUE TELLS WHY.
Write to Cincinnati Bell Foundry Co., Cincinnati, O.

YOU CAN AFFORD Familiar Songs of the Gospel (No. 1 or 2). Round or sharp notes. $3 hundred; samples, 5c each. Songs, words and music.
A. K. HACKETT, FORT WAYNE, INDIANA

Called Higher

Frederick Laver, New Haven, Ohio August 2, 1915; 82 years.
R. Harris, Panama City, Fla. August 2, 1915; 73 years.
William Culyer, Corona, L. I., N. Y. October 7, 1915; 86 years.
Dr. J. N. Brandenburg, Broken Bow, Neb. October 1, 1915; 81 years.
Mrs. Elizabeth C. Babbage, Newark, N. J. September 23, 1915; 88 years.
Edward D. Denison died at his home in Gene, N. Y., October 10, at the age of eighty-two. He was for many years publisher of the Chenango American. Quiet, devoted to church, home and family, courteous and above all upright in his dealing with his fellow men.

CONFERENCE of Bible students, called under the auspices of the Chicago Hebrew Union to set forth from a Biblical standpoint the teachings of the Word concerning Israel in the Present and Future in the hope of awakening an interest through the Christian Church on their behalf, met in the new Moody Tabernacle in Chicago, Ill. November 16.

SEVENTY-FOUR churches in Pawtucket, R. I., have completed a successful four-weeks' tabernacle campaign under evangelists Samuel Gray and W. C. Weedon. It is noted that this is the first tabernacle ever erected in Rhode Island for evangelistic purposes.

Broken Dreams

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

THIS morning a letter came to me—a letter that I will try to quote word for word:

"My dear friend," it began; "although I am not really one of 'your girls'—for I am seventy-four years young—I cannot resist writing to you after reading the letters from your correspondents in the 'After Vacation' article. I cannot help wondering whether many of their beautiful plans will come true. You see, so many people have beautiful plans that don't come true. I did.

"It was not until I was over twenty-three that I understood that my dreams were never going to be realized. There were several reasons—lack of funds, poor health, and so forth. And when I did see that my plans would never materialize I shivered as if I had a chill. I was spending the night with a girl friend, and it was my last night in my native state. I begged my friend to carry on my plans, and I will never forget her eager face as she cried: 'I will, Maisie, I will.' I will never forget her father's 'God Bless You!' as I left in the morning.

"As the years went on I thought at first of that last night with bitter thoughts. I could not help feeling that I had made a grave and buried my bruised hopes and my broken dreams in it; but finally I began to see things in a different light. I began to think that perhaps it was all for the best—that perhaps God had other plans for me.

"I hope that the girls who wrote to you will all realize their ambitions; but if any of them find their hopes shattered, I hope that they will be brave enough to see—sooner than I did—that it is all for the best, and that God has other plans for them."

The letter was signed "An Old Girl."

ONCE knew of a girl who wanted to do social service work. She took an extensive course in a wonderfully equipped school—she learned all that can be taught about philanthropy, and the needs of the people, and practical charity. And then, just before her course was completed, she caught a little cold that developed into pneumonia. When she was well—officially well—the doctor remarked in a friendly way that perhaps it would be a very nice plan to go away to the pine woods for—say a year or two. He suggested tactfully, that pine woods are very good for, well, lungs that are not strong. And the girl smiled bitterly, for her heart was in revolt against man, and the world, and God. And, as she smiled, she understood.

The girl crept away, broken in health more than broken in spirit. The particular pine wood that she chose was near a lonely, forsaken, little town that lacked interest in life almost as much as she lacked interest in life.

The town was overrun with children who spent their early years in the school house, where the numbers and the alphabet were drummed into their not very clever little heads. Up to the age of ten the children could be accounted for every day. The town also had quite a number of young men and young women, who were over nineteen, in it. The young men worked all day in the fields; the young women worked all day in the farm-house kitchens. The girl with the not very strong lungs sighed when she thought of their narrow lives.

As I said, the children under ten could be accounted for in the school-house every day, and the young men and young women could be accounted for in the farm kitchen or in the fields. But the children from the ages of ten to seventeen were a wild, trouble-making lot, who fought—if they were boys; and played rough games—if they were girls. They disobeyed their parents, and refused to go to Sunday school; they raided orchards and robbed gardens. They were the disturbing element of the uninteresting little town.

One day the minister's wife called on the girl. She was a frail woman, with eyes that still held the gleam of hope that usually dies after raising eight children and dressing them, as a minister's family should dress, on five hundred a year.

"You know," she told the girl, "the worst problem in our town is the problem of the half-grown-up children. They are simply incorrigible and no one seems able to manage them. What we need is some one who knows how to run things—how to make homes attractive and interesting. But—well, I suppose it isn't worth while to hope for somebody."

FOR the first time since she had come to the pine woods, the girl sat up straight in her chair and looked interested. She had been trained to do such work. She knew that she could do it. For the first time she realized that her broken dreams, though they might not be mended, might be patched up. For the first time she began to see light in the midst of a great darkness.

"Perhaps I can help!" she ventured. The worried little minister's wife looked at the girl dubiously. Those who had come in contact with the girl during her stay in the little town in the pine woods were inclined to look at her dubiously. Her manner had not been one to inspire confidence. But something of the dawning hope in the girl's soul must have shown in her eyes, for the minister's wife, after her moment of hesitation, stretched out a friendly hand.

"My dear," she cried—and there was real gladness in her tone—"my dear, perhaps the Lord sent you!"

Well, they began to talk. They talked over committees and ways and means, such as the social service workers in the city might have talked. They planned amusements and books and parties; and as they planned, the girl's face glowed with interest and health—almost.

Three months later, the tactful doctor who had sent the girl away from her life work gave her another examination. And his eyes brightened as he looked at her. "You're well now," he told her. "You're well! This place has done wonders for you."

The girl raised her big glowing eyes to his face.

"May I go back—to the city?" she asked.

The tactful doctor bit his lip—hard before he answered. When he did speak, he spoke frankly, not tactfully.

"You may go back," he said slowly, "and you will be all right. You may stay—all right. But I couldn't promise. Up here your lungs will be as strong as they ever were—as strong as mine are now. In the city they may be. But—but—you can't be sure. If you want to, dare to, take a chance—go back."

After the doctor left, the girl sat in her chair staring into the distance for a long while. And then, slowly, very slowly, a smile crept over her face.

"Thank you, God," said the girl.

She stayed in the pine woods. And the young people—the ones she had been able to help—thrived under her teaching. Their narrow little minds grew broader—they learned about life and the meanings of life.

The next time—not many years later—when the doctor saw the girl, he told her that she could go back without taking a chance. But she didn't go. For she had found her place.

THOUSANDS of years ago, when a desert pyramid, or palace, or tower would fall, the Egyptians would build a new one on the broken foundations. And the new one would be better, stronger, finer.

When our ambitions crumble, or our dreams are broken, we can oftentimes do the same thing, using the fragments of our beautiful plans for a foundation. And the new structure is apt to be better and stronger and finer than the old one.

HAVE YOU AMMUNITION?

The nations of Europe now at war are calling for more great guns and more destructive ammunition. A great gun is worth more than a regiment of men, and one high-explosive shell will put a company of men out of action.

Systematic Bible Study

By correspondence is the only way by which many Christians can get the great guns and the destructive shells for their warfare. The Moody Bible Institute of Chicago is now providing eight courses of study that have been tested and proven worth while. The majority of these courses is Bible Study, the remaining courses being on methods of Christian work and allied subjects.

The Scofield Bible Correspondence Course

Is now owned and controlled by the Moody Bible Institute, and is the most comprehensive course ever prepared for correspondence work.

If you are within reach of the mails these courses can be taken in your homes, more than 2,300 students now taking them. 1,368 new students enrolled in the last year.

Full information will be sent on application to the

Correspondence Department
The Moody Bible Institute
Dept. F-8, 153-163 Institute Place, Chicago, Ill.

SENT FREE

All charges prepaid subject to examination.

HURLBUT'S Story of Jesus

FOR YOUNG AND OLD

A masterpiece! Fresh from the pen of the beloved Rev. Jesse Lyman Hurlbut, D. D., whose "Story of the Bible" is cherished in more than 500,000 homes. Written to fascinate both children and adults—and it does!

Published Just In Time For Christmas Giving

The NEWEST and MOST COMPLETE narrative of Our Saviour's life. A truly inspired book, written with all the lucid description, all the beautiful simplicity which Dr. Hurlbut's long life of reverent study and religious authorship make possible. Every page is an inspiration. Every chapter can be perfectly understood, even by children. A valuable aid to parents, teachers and ministers. It is difficult to conceive of a more appropriate gift for young people.

Illustrated by Wm. Hole, R. S. A., R. E.

Besides the glowing story in written word, this great book contains 200 vivid illustrations. Many are actual photographs. Eighty are full-page drawings by William Hole, R. S. A., R. E., sixteen of which are in colors. All have been carefully selected for uniformity and in themselves graphically tell the Gospel Story.

This wonderful book, with its 500 pages of large, clear type, 200 pictures, handsome cloth binding, embellished cover and chronological and topical index,

Sent Free for Examination We Pay Postage

Just fill in the coupon, mail to us, and we will AT ONCE send the book, all charges prepaid. If it pleases you, send us only $7.50. (The best written, best illustrated book ever published at the price.) If it does not please you, return it, at our expense, in 5 days. Fill in and mail coupon at once.

THE JOHN C. WINSTON CO.

Philadelphia

Publishers of 600 Styles of Bibles and 1,000 Standard Books

THE JOHN C. WINSTON CO. 1006 Arch Street Philadelphia

Please send me, all charges prepaid, Hurlbut's "Story of Jesus" I will remit $1.50, or return the book in 5 days at your expense.

Name _____ Address _____

"I simply press the button and fill myself and drink like this."

I Solve The Problem Of What to Give

Thinking of me decides the question. What is there more appropriate for father, mother, sister, brother, sweetheart, uncle, aunt or cousin, than a genuine Lucky Curve Fountain Pen — branded with my maker's name — the hall-mark of quality.

PARKER
SAFETY, SELF-FILLING
FOUNTAIN PEN

I am popular because I am both a Self-Filler and a Safety Pen. In two seconds I drink up enough ink to write ten thousand words. You "press the button"—that's all. My safety cap keeps the ink locked up tight. My smooth barrel removes danger of accidental spills and increases comfort of writing.

You'll find me and my other Parker colleagues—Standard, Self-Filling, Safety, Transparent—on sale by 15,000 dealers.

Write for handsomely illustrated catalog—It's free

PARKER PEN CO.
152 Mill St., Janesville, Wis.; New York Retail Store, Woolworth Bldg

Parker Fountain Pen Ink for smooth writing—in patented bottles—25c

Put me at the top of your gift list. I'll be dressed in holiday attire—$2.50, $3.50, $4.00, $5.00, $6.00, $10, $12.50, according to size and ornamentation

Pensillus: Transparent, $3.50; Jack Knife Safety Self-Filler with ring, $3.75; Jack Knife Safety—Silver, $5; Gold pl'd, $6

Crawford's ORANGE MARMALADE

Made from a good old Scotch Recipe

The rich flavor of fresh-picked California Oranges is wonderfully well preserved in Crawford's Orange Marmalade, by a process used in Scotland for over a hundred years. Contains nothing but oranges, lemons, sugar and water—no gelatine, preservatives or other adulteratives.

It Is Absolutely Pure

Crawford's has all the fine qualities of imported Orange Marmalade without its bitterness. Once sample it and you will always prefer it. 2½ oz. sample package sent postpaid for 10 cents, stamps or coin, and your grocer's name and address. 10 oz. package 25 cents. One dozen 10-oz. packages express prepaid anywhere in the U. S. for $2.00. Put up in sanitary containers; will keep for many months; money returned if marmalade not in good condition on arrival. Send orders to

THOMAS CRAWFORD
312 Masonic Temple, Anaheim, Calif.

College Girls and Young Housewives

—and all students of modern domestic science—should write at once for a free copy of our beautiful new cook book.

A hundred special recipes for using evaporated milk in cooking, baking, etc. Many dishes illustrated in natural colors. Book shows economical way of preparing healthful, delicious food. Write today for it.

Pacific Coast Condensed Milk Co.
244 Stuart Bldg., SEATTLE, WASH., U. S. A.

Keeps Skin Smooth, Firm, Fresh — Youthful Looking

To dispel the tell-tale lines of age, illness or worry—to overcome flabbiness and improve facial contour—there is nothing quite so good as plain

Powdered SAXOLITE

Effective for wrinkles, crowfeet, enlarged pores, etc., because it "tightens" and tones the skin and underlying tissue. No harm to tenderest skin. Get an ounce package, follow the simple directions—see what just one application will do. Sold at all drug stores.

HAVE You a Camera? Write for samples of our magazines, American Photography and Popular Photography, which will tell you how to make better pictures and earn money. F. R. FRAPRIE, 862 Pope Building, Boston sea. This will, however, involve the loss of practically all of the artillery which it has still remaining, but this loss seems unavoidable.

The War in Europe

Continued from page 1215

The Serbian army fighting in southwest Serbia is in a situation but little better. Early in the week the Bulgarians overwhelmed it at Babuna pass, and captured this pass, the country beyond it to the west, and the town of Priliep, thereby driving a wedge between these Serbians and the Allies to the east of them, and most effectually eliminating the possibility of any juncture between them.

Since then, the Bulgarians have been driving steadily forward in the direction of Monastir and have reached the outskirts of that town, the Serbians continually giving ground and falling back. Late cables announce the occupation of Monastir. This southern Serbian army has also no choice but to retreat into foreign territory, either Albania or Greece. The same objections apply here to a retreat into Albania, as in the case of the northern Serbian army, while a retreat into Greece with the political situation in that country so upset and its relations with the Allies and with Serbia so involved as they are, would be a thing to be avoided if humanly possible.

In the southeast the Allies still occupy the line stretching eastward from Krivolak through Lipovik, to a point south of Strumintza. There has been heavy fighting on this line during the past week, but this has resulted in only very minor changes about equally divided. Both sides are rushing up fresh troops as fast as they can, and the indications are that a very important battle will shortly take place on this front, which may have a great influence on the future of this campaign.

IN spite of the fact that the Greek situation is very acute, the position in Rumania is even more interesting. Rumania has fully mobilized her army, which is now completely prepared for the fray, but has given absolutely no inkling of the side which she proposes to take, though it appears reasonably certain that her active participation in the war is a matter of days only.

As these lines are being written, we are told that a Cabinet consultation in which the military leaders and the King are participating, is being held in Bucharest, and we are informed that this consultation is expected to determine definitely the policy of Rumania. It is needless, perhaps, to say that there has been extreme diplomatic activity in Bucharest this last week, and both sides have been making the most earnest efforts to induce Rumania to throw her lot in with them. Apparently, from the fact that Austria and Russia have both concentrated troops on the Rumania border, neither side has any clear idea of what her course will be.

The Greek situation does not clear. That country refuses to make a definite answer to the demand of the Allies that in the event of their defeat in Serbia, she will allow them and the Serbians to seek refuge on Greek territory. France has sent that well known French statesman Denis Cochin, to Athens, to endeavor to influence the Greek government in favor of the Allies, and Great Britain had sent Lord Kitchener, who, however, has been detained at the Dardanelles, where he went in the first instance, though now on his way to the Greek capital.

It is hinted that in the event of mild measures being insufficient to induce Greece to cast in her lot with the Allies, drastic ones will be adopted. Indeed, late on Friday it was reported from Athens, which report was allowed to come through by the British censor, that an ultimatum had been presented to Greece. Previously it was also stated that Constantine had been threatened with dethronement. In the meantime, both Turkey and Bulgaria have made a formal protest against Greece permitting the Allies to land at Salonica and use her territory as a base for their military operations.

Venizelos seems to be rapidly losing his influence, judging from the Greek papers, which are now commencing to accuse him of not having been actuated by avowable motives for some time, and of having sacrificed Greece's interests.

The British suddenly took the offensive in the Dardanelles campaign about the middle of the week, and by a fierce drive captured some 280 yards of Turkish trenches on the Sid-el-Bahr front before Kriuthia. This activity coincided with Lord Kitchener's arrival at this front, and may have been ordered by him so that he could judge from actual fighting and its results the problems of this campaign. Outside of this sudden burst of activity nothing noteworthy took place here.

General Monro's report on the situation and possibilities of this campaign has arrived in England and, it is said, advises in favor of a withdrawal of the troops from Gallipoli peninsula. Probably, however, before taking any definite action in this direction the government will await advices from Lord Kitchener.

The British expedition against Baghdad continues to report progress and has now reached a point within a few miles of that important city, of whose capture we shall probably soon hear.

The Austro-Italian campaign was as usual featureless. The Italians are now said to be assembling half a million men to make a decisive attack on Gorizia, the key of Trieste, which town has been so often, as my readers will remember, reported on the verge of being taken in the past six months.

The Russian campaign has also been without any events of prominence or movements of importance, both sides having settled down on most of the long line to dig themselves in for the winter. Near Riga the Russians made some trifling advances, while on the Dubrug front skirmishing and artillery actions took place fitfully.

The campaign in the West languished even more than the Russian. During the whole week there was not a single infantry fight which rose above the dignity of a small skirmish, and even the artillery duels which took place at various points on the long line from time to time were nothing like as fierce or as long continued as usual. Probably, however, there will be a different story to tell soon.

As stated last week, on November 1 at 1 o'clock P. M., the Italian liner Ancona, westbound, Naples to New York, was pursued, torpedoed and sunk by an Austrian submarine in the Mediterranean Sea off the coast of Algeria, North Africa. She carried a crew of 60 and 422 passengers, of whom 139 are known to be lost, among them being nine American citizens. The first reports were that the liner had been stopped by shell fire after an attempted escape, and these reports were confirmed by the official Austrian report of the affair. The Italian report was a contradiction of the Austrian, and evidence has been submitted to support either contention, except the affidavit of Dr. Cecile L. Greil of New York, which in part supports the Italian position.

The captain of the Ancona was quoted as saying that the submarine gave him no signal to stop, but began shelling his vessel at a distance of five miles. He asserted that he stopped the ship once and that the submarine continued to shell the steamer, killing or wounding many passengers on the deck and in the boats as they were being launched.

The Reuter correspondent at Madrid reported that the submarine fired the first shot across the bow of the Ancona and then overhauled her after a long stern chase, giving the commander a brief respite for the removal of passengers. There was a panic among passengers and crew, and much confusion which was increased by continued firing by the submarine.

Washington at once cabled American Ambassador Page at Rome and Penfield at Vienna to secure all information possible and to report. At this writing Washington has received only the official Austrian and Italian reports and a cabled version of Dr. Greil's affidavit.

The Administration at Washington is still awaiting the establishment of facts before taking any action.

"Is America Prepared for War?"

Continued from page 1213

That is to say, are you and you and you "prepared" to pay?

"As sure as fate an immense military burden is to be fastened onto the backs of the American people, if the jingo-American interests can scare us into standing for it. The din of their noisy clamor for 'preparedness' is being heard in every part of the United States. They are even demanding bigger appropriations than the army and navy officers, themselves, are urging. In this respect they are trying to out-Herod Herod.

"We want, of course, a preparedness which will give us reasonable assurance that this country shall not be wantonly attacked by any nation, but we do not want a preparedness that will lead us to destruction, that will detract in any way from the strength of our position in support of the principles that war is supreme folly, supreme waste, and that the rights of peaceful industry are superior to alleged military necessity.

"In my judgment there was never less danger that any foreign nation will come over here to blow us up. This country is safer from attack than ever before. The nations of the world have all the war they want right now; they are getting weaker every day, and are not looking for more trouble. They have made a fearful mistake, for which they are paying an awful price, and they know it, and we know it. Shall we, with our eyes open to this great blunder, allow ourselves to be led to the slaughter as they were led?

"This is a question to which every voter in the land must answer yes or no. To keep silent, to make no protest, is to become an accomplice to the spoliation, if not the assassination, of this free-born American nation."

IT is appalling to have to believe that in this year and day of these United States of America, any group of men numerous and powerful enough to sway the press and possibly the Congress of the United States can be actuated by no other motive than that of personal financial gain. This charge, so openly and persistently made by men in high places, must be answered to the people themselves. Their program (wholly and completely un-Christian and un-American, unless imminent danger of war is proven) means a complete readjustment of all our ideas and ideals of national policy. Again and again, in the printed statements of organizations banded together to support the preparedness program, can be found the sinister purpose to enlist large employers of labor to give preference in employment to young men and old men whose attitude toward this question shall be agreeable to its sponsor. When men will attempt to enact national legislation undemanding by the free will of the people, the time has arrived in the history of the United States when all lovers of freedom should, without fail and without delay and without uncertainty, make their respective representatives in the national Congress know what the will of the people is. Those who advocate preparedness, even in its extreme form, are entitled to know you stand with them, even as the timid congressman (if there be indeed timid congressmen—which God forbid in this day!) is entitled to know if he can rely upon your support in opposition to his last breath this unholy program of war.

Christian Herald Prayer League

WE like to get letters telling of spiritual blessing. There is no reason why our weekly prayer meeting on this Christian Herald page should not be also a testimony meeting, testimonies to direct spiritual blessings. We should like to get and to print more letters like this, which comes from a reader in West Virginia: At one time, nearly three years ago, was in great distress of mind. I told the Lord Jesus he could take my all if he would only be with me, and I felt his divine presence and heard him say, "I love you and have died for you." I arose from prayer shouting his praises, and felt like one who had been blind but now could see the Light of the World. There is another jubilant testimony, comes from R. J. P., New Hartford, N. Y.: "God has answered my prayer and I am wonderfully happy. I did not deserve such mercy and I can never thank him enough."

This week's mail reminds us again how much of the world's grief is caused by unhappy homes. A Mother writes, after acknowledging answers to prayer: I ask for prayers that our home may become a happy home. My husband, while a good man in some ways, has a terrible disposition, continually fault-finding, swearing at myself and our dear children. I sometimes fear our home will be broken up. Please pray that God will soften his heart and comfort him. I have three very dear children. I thank God they are good children, but please pray that they will soon become Christians, also my father and brother, also that I may be a better Christian." Another mother, after writing, "One prayer has been answered, for which I am so thankful; all of my boys have joined the church," adds: Will you join with me in praying that my husband will stop taking God's name in vain, that he will consecrate his life to God, and set a Christian example before his boys; that ours may be a happy, Christian home; that I may live nearer to God and be given wisdom, patience and grace to live as should."

A Chillicothe, Mo., Subscriber writes: I want to acknowledge God's goodness in answering the prayers of the League, especially for a revival in this town, where five hundred, possibly more, were brought into the Kingdom." Mrs. H., Hoge's Store, Va., writes: "About six months ago I asked your prayers for a revival in our neighborhood and the conversion of my two married sons, who live in a distant town. I want to tell you that we have lately had one of the biggest revivals ever held in the community, which has been a great blessing to our people." I. E. B., Anks, Ore., writes: "Just a few days ago I wrote requesting your prayers that I might be helped spiritually, mentally, and physically, and I am happy to say God has heard and answered prayer. My mind is no longer confused when I pray, and I am much stronger." Mrs. L. L. C., Huntingdon, Pa., writes: "Some time ago I asked the prayers of the Prayer League that my son might be enabled to get his job back and that I could get some money to help me along and pay my rent. I thank God that the prayer has been answered and we have got what we needed."

E. M. P. writes from Kirkdale, Que.: I wish to acknowledge answer to prayer for recovery from spinal trouble. I am able to be up and around after lying ill for nine months." A reader from Calais, Me., writes: "Last spring I wrote the Prayer League, asking prayer for my restoration to health. Through the summer I slowly gained from nervous debility and I wish to express my thanks to the League, as I have to the Lord, that I am much better."

Acknowledgments of answered prayer were also been received from

Mrs. I. B. H., Lebanon, N. J., for financial help; A Reader, Eau Claire, Wis., E. M. Kirkdale, Que., for recovery from spinal trouble; L. F. McC., Charleston, W. Va.; G. M. H., Salem, Ore.; M. H. C., Ohio; Reader, Nashville, Tenn.; E. H., Lake Bluff, Ill.; O. M., Port Orange, Fla.; E. A. A., Brookline, Mo.; A Reader, Calais, Me. (for restoration to health); Mrs. E. H. T., Montrose, Pa.; M. R., New York City; Mrs. C. B., Detroit, Mich.; An Anxious Mother; J. R. B., Dunn, N. C.; Mrs. H. C. R., Wellsville, N. Y.; W. F. S. and wife, York, Pa.; Miss O. O. P., Charleston, W. Va.; Miss A. C., Mount Vernon, N. Y.; "Earnest"; T. H. B., Church Hill, Md.; Mrs. J. B. P., Albion, Mich.

Prayers are asked for revivals of religion at

Bogard, Mo. (that twenty-one men may be converted at the revival now in progress); Bonners Ferry, Idaho (in the M. E. Church); Pleasant Hill, Ore.; Milton, Iowa; Accord, N. Y.; Jacksonstown, Ohio (for a deeper work of grace in the hearts of Christian Endeavor and Sabbath school); Battlefield, Mo.; Rose-land, Neb.; South Plymouth, Mass.; Middlefield, Ohio; Narrows, Va.; Lancaster, Wis.; Clarence, Iowa; Wakeeney, Kan.; Geneva, Iowa; Hamilton, Mont.; Temple, Texas. A. H., Wadsworth, Miss., asks prayer that the young men of that community may break the cigarette habit and let whisky alone; E. B., that the worldly-minded people of Boston may turn to the Saviour; C. F. B. and Mrs. E. E. P., for a world-wide revival; and Miss F. T., Hartwell, Ga., asks prayer for a revival of religion all over this nation. Mrs. R. E., Ebensburg, Pa., asks prayer that a consecrated Christian minister may be sent to the church at Colver; Mrs. E. T. S., Cincinnati, Ohio, that a faithful minister may obtain a pastorate, as he is anxious to preach the Word of Life. S. R., State College, N. M., that their church may have a weekly prayer meeting. Mrs. M. S., Geddes, S. D., that a church problem may be settled; and Mrs. G. F. R., South Plymouth, Mass., that another pastor may soon be found to fill the pulpit of a church whose present pastor is leaving.

F. L. S. asks prayer that mother's sight may be restored; Mrs. L. A. B., her husband's; Mrs. R. E., her son's; Mrs. F. W., her daughter's. Fourteen other friends ask prayer for the restoration or strengthening of sight for themselves or other friends.

"Earnest" asks prayer that son's mind may be strengthened; A. E. R., that son's mind may be restored; A Wisconsin Reader, that daughter's mind may be strengthened; "One in Great Need," that daughter's mind may be restored. Mrs. D. B. H., her brother's; H. M. C., Mrs. A. W. P., Mrs. N. V., Mrs. M. B. H., Mrs. F. L. J., their sisters'; Mrs. J. C. P., her uncle's; J. D. W. and A Friend, their own and A Subscriber, that her mind may be strengthened.

Fifty-four friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace and assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing.

Mrs. L. S. G. asks prayer that her husband and son may be saved from the liquor habit; Mrs. N., that father and husband may be cured from this habit; A Heartbroken Wife, J. E. W., Mrs. J. M. H., Mrs. D. B. H., their husbands; Mrs. J. L. E., two brothers; Mrs. O. C. and G. M. F., their brothers; six other friends ask prayer that friends or relatives may be cured of the liquor habit.

R. and M. S. ask prayer that sister may be cured of the morphine habit; N. H., a lady, J. M. J., that son-in-law may be cured of the drug habit, and S. R., a cousin.

Mrs. S. H. and Mrs. G. M. H., each ask prayer that three sons may be saved, twenty-seven other parents ask prayer that their sons may be saved; twenty-one wives, their husbands. Sixty-six other friends ask prayer for the conversion of other relatives and friends.

D. C. D. asks prayer that a mother may be given grace and guidance. Seventeen other readers ask prayer for special spiritual blessing for relatives or friends.

One hundred and nine friends ask prayer that friends or relatives may be restored to health, including one who asks prayer that a member of her family may be relieved of a goitre. Eighty readers ask prayer for the healing of themselves, including E. O. W., T. W., A. A. P., Mrs. S. D., Mrs. T. M., and M. B. C., that use of limbs may be restored and Mrs. E. J. C., that spine may be straightened and voice restored.

Miss A. W. asks prayer that mother's hearing may be restored; M. A. M., A. E. R., and Mrs. N. B., their sons'; A Heartbroken Wife, Mrs. F. E. S., Mrs. E. H., and An Anxious Mother, their daughters'; M. E. W. and Mrs. L. A. B., their husbands'. Twenty-four other friends ask prayer for healing of hearing for themselves or other friends.

One hundred twenty-five friends ask prayer for help or guidance in financial affairs.

One hundred forty-seven ask prayer for granting of varied desires and needs, including one that an invalid girl may be allowed her dearly loved home; S. E. G. asks prayer that she may secure employment so she can be near home to take care of her invalid husband, and another that a mother's son may return home.

There are a lot of good people in this world who are not good to each other.

The Greatest Christmas Bargain for Your Family

The Most and Best for So Little Money, $2.10

64 Splendid Issues of high Fiction, Fashion, Fact and Fun—and a 15-cent McCall Dress Pattern.

THE YOUTH'S COMPANION—the 52 issues of 1916, Nine Great Serials, 250 Short Stories, Articles, Departments, etc.

McCALL'S MAGAZINE—Leading Fashion Authority—Twelve crowded issues of Fashion, Fiction, etc.

Every reading taste of the family is provided for by this Offer.

The Best Two for Christmas

New subscribers who cut out this slip and send it at once with $2.10 will receive

1. The Companion for 52 weeks of 1916 (Including Home Calendar) ALL FOR
2. The remaining issues for 1915, FREE
3. McCall's Magazine for one year (Leading Style Monthly) $2.10
4. One 15-cent McCall Pattern (Your choice for 2c. stamp upon receipt of magazine)

THE YOUTH'S COMPANION, BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS

DON'T PAY TWO PRICES HOOSIER Stoves Ranges Heaters FREE

To try in your own home for 30 days. Show your friends. Freight paid by us. Send it back at our expense if you do not want to keep it. You can buy the best at Actual Factory Prices. Are heavily made, of the highest grade selected material, beautifully finished, with improvements that equal anything ever produced. The Best in the World. Guaranteed for years by a Two Million Dollar Bond. No matter where you live, you can try a HOOSIER in your own home thirty days, without a penny's expense or obligation to you. You can save enough on a single HOOSIER STOVE to buy your winter's fuel. Write or send postal today for Large Free Catalog and prices showing large assortment to select from. No Obligations.

HOOSIER STOVE COMPANY,

164 State Street, - MARION, IND.

It is easy and simple to keep all furniture as clean, bright and sparkling as new. Simply use this way: Wet a cloth in water and wring it until it is almost dry, then pour on as much O-Cedar as the cloth contains water and go over the furniture. Polish with a dry cloth.

O-Cedar Polish

O-Cedar is sold by all dealers, druggists, hardware and department stores in convenient sizes—25c to $3.

Liberal Sample Sent FREE

Channell Chemical Co.

Chicago Toronto London Berlin

CHRIST IS COMING!

BUT Men are Divided

as to the time

Bible students are much interested in any phase of prophetic study which will help them to a better understanding of the coming of Christ. There are post-millennial and premillennial theories. In the December Christian Workers Magazine will be published quotations from many of the world's leading theologians without regard to their creeds, giving their beliefs concerning the second coming of Christ. Some are not premillennial, neither are they postmillennial. The article will be published under the title to the Second Coming of Christ Prior to a Millennium

CHALLENGED WITNESSES

Their testimony will be given chiefly in their own words, and include Luther, Melancthon, Calvin and others. In the Christian Workers Magazine also will be found many contributions helpful to Christian workers in general. Dr. James M. Gray writes the expositions of the Sunday-school lessons, and contributes a laymen's commentary, etc.

SEND 10 CENTS FOR A COPY TODAY
Regular price, Three months for 25 cents; $1.00 a year
The Christian Workers Magazine, 152 Institute Pl., Chicago

Vapo Cresolene

for Whooping Cough, Spasmodic Croup, Asthma, Sore Throat, Coughs, Bronchitis, Colds, Catarrh.

"USE WHILE YOU SLEEP"

Don't fail to use Cresolene for the distressing, and often fatal, affections for which it is recommended. It is a simple, safe, effective and drugless treatment. Vaporized Cresolene stops the paroxysms of Whooping Cough and relieves Spasmodic Croup at once. It is a boon to sufferers from asthma.

The air carrying the antiseptic vapor, inspired with every breath, makes breathing easy, soothes the sore throat, and stops the cough, assuring restful nights. Cresolene relieves the bronchial complications of Scarlet Fever and Measles and is a valuable aid in the treatment of Diphtheria.

Cresolene's best recommendation is its 36 years of successful use. Send us postal for Descriptive Booklet.

For Sale by Druggists

Try Cresolene Antiseptic Throat Tablets for the irritated throat, composed of slippery elm bark, licorice, sugar and Cresolene. They can't harm you. Of your druggist or from us 10c in stamps.

THE VAPO-CRESOLENE CO., 62 Cortlandt St., New York or Leeming-Miles Building, Montreal, Canada

WOULD YOU

show this standard high grade 42 key fully visible typewriter to your friends and let them see wherein it excels any other $100 typewriter, if by doing this and rendering other small assistance, you could easily have one

GIVEN YOU to keep as your own? Then by post card or letter to us simply say, "Mail Particulars."

WOODSTOCK TYPEWRITER CO., Dept. O 176, Chicago, Ill.

KIDDER'S PASTILLES For 50 yrs Standard Relief for Asthma (Inhalation) All Druggists, or by mail, 35c

STOWELL & CO., Manufacturers, Charlestown, Mass.

Young People's Topics for December 12

Song and Its Meanings

B. Y. P. U. Topic. Ps. 33:1-5 (Led by the Music Committee)

THIS meeting ought to be addressed by three experts—one, a music teacher, to point out the difference between good music and poor; one, perhaps the pastor or the public school principal, to show the difference between good poetry and poor; one, either the pastor or some person of unusual spiritual discernment, some layman who knows how to pray, some person who has unusual success in winning souls, to point out the difference between hymns that have great spiritual power and those that have little or none.

If possible get these three persons to confer before the meeting and select a number of hymns upon which they all agree—hymns of real gospel power, of correct, beautiful and forceful literary excellence, set to correct, serious and really beautiful music.

Some of the so-called hymns of the present are atrocious. Even if the spiritual message is good, it is spoiled by being linked either with a tune that is empty and meaningless or one that, having possibly a trace of something remotely resembling music, has the wretched power of capturing one's brain and beating its way through the hours of work, play and sleep. Some of these hymns that are shouted and drummed and trumpeted throughout the land are a reproach to the whole world of music and only live because of a rhythmic swing that adds to their deadly power.

The young people's societies can help tremendously in setting a higher standard. We must learn to discriminate. Even among the new marches and ballads, as among the new hymns, some are atrocious, some are passable, some are excellent. Our church and union music need not be slow and dismal. It can be bright, tuneful, everything that is attractive. But we ought to insist on its being real music. And the poems used as hymns and songs ought to be well written and full of spiritual power.

The Promise of Heaven

Epworth League Topic. John 14:1-3; Rev. 7:9-17

PEOPLE'S idea of heaven change. They find new meanings in the Scripture descriptions of heaven. A heaven that will satisfy one age of a life, a church, or a race, will hardly satisfy another.

What is the most wholesome, sanest view of heaven as Christian people think of it today?

Have some one read Kipling's "L'Envoi." It is not Scripture, but it will be found to harmonize with the Scripture teachings about heaven. This poet thinks of heaven as a place where a man can do precisely the work he wants to do, precisely as he believes it ought to be done to meet the approval of "The God of things as they are."

That view of heaven satisfies the deepest and most advanced modern thought.

We are not losing our hope that heaven will be a place of rest, but we are changing some of our ideas of rest. Rest does not necessarily imply lack of motion. You have seen pictures of a railroad wreck. Everything is very still, twisted rails, shattered stacks, splintered cars, sprawling brake-wheels. They are still, but they do not signify rest, rather restlessness. Look next at a picture of the Twentieth Century Limited in full flight. Intense motion—yet no note of restlessness. Perfect poise, perfect efficiency—that is the dream of earnest souls.

Just a word about the harassing limitations of the present. Forced to do uncongenial work, in circumstances often distressing, what should be our attitude and temperament? While dreaming of the smooth-running tasks of the heavenly existence, we must be patient with the jolts, the jars, even with the wrecks of the work of today.

One word must be spoken plainest of all in our dream of heaven, its rests and its tasks—that is, Love. Heaven is a place where all other motives are ruled out. Love for that "God of things as they are," love for all our brothers and sisters of this or any other world. Heaven is Love's Land.

And don't forget this: You are making now the clothes you will wear, the house you will live in, to some extent the tools you will use, the very heaven itself you will be an inhabitant of. Every good deed done in the Master's name, every bit of faithfulness, every bit of love will be found awaiting you in that Land of the Gladdest Service to help you start your career there that shall have no end.

The Reasonableness and the Value of the Christian Endeavor Pledge

Christian Endeavor Topic. Ps. 61:1-8

IT IS good to study the Christian Endeavor pledge, but it is also good to remember that we are saved and cleansed and guided and made efficient not by any pledge we may make to God, but by the promises he has made to us.

There are four forms of active member pledges, but the constitution provides that "if none of these meets the local needs, the pastor and society are at liberty to formulate a pledge of their own; but it is earnestly hoped that a pledge embracing the ideas of private devotion, loyalty to the church, and outspoken confession of Christ in the weekly meeting will be adopted."

To pray, to study the Bible, to tell of Jesus and his blessing in our lives—surely these are "reasonable" requirements. Take these pledges—even those making more specific promises, such as that of making Bible-reading a daily exercise, attending all the regular Sunday and midweek services—"unless prevented by some reason I can conscientiously give to my Saviour"—and meet them by a consecration that shall go far beyond the letter of these requirements. All the life surrendered to Jesus; then all the life filled and thrilled with his blessing, so that we shall delight in his Word, his house, his service, not asking how much we are required to do, but seeking new, still undiscovered ways of showing him our love and loyalty—this is his plan and his hope for every one of us.

A pledge is a stepping-stone to a free and victorious and efficient career. Make it mean love—love for our Christ and love for those for whom he died.

Among the Workers

UNTIL this year Caldwell County, North Carolina, had never had a fair. When it was decided to hold a fair and the arrangements were being made, one of the committee suggested that they put a ban on all fakirs, gambling devices and questionable shows. Then another suggested that they go further and ask the local ministers' union to take a hand. Both suggestions were adopted. Instead of catchpenny games and lurid "attractions," this county fair provided plenty of wholesome amusements and athletic competitions; and at noon each day the ministers held a thirty minute service. The people took great interest in these religious exercises. The ministers and the American Bible Society had an exhibit of Bibles, tracts and religious books, and this exhibit, a novel one for a county fair, attracted much favorable attention. The event was a great success and the idea is worthy of consideration by other fair associations.

THE Presbyterian Church of Tenafly, N. J., rounded out half a century of existence on November 25. To celebrate the event, a program was prepared covering a whole week from Sunday, November 21, to the Sunday following. Among the features of the seven-day celebration were the unveiling of an anniversary tablet of bronze in the church, containing the names of its successive pastors, addressed by Governor James F. Fielder of New Jersey and other notabilities, a "Camp Fire Night" with historic talks and reminiscences, musical and social gatherings and a "Church Night," with addresses by Rev. J. Ross Stevenson, Moderator of the General Assembly, and others. Rev. Dr. J. Calvin Mead, the present pastor of the old church, is making it more than ever a power for good in a very large parish.

Anything that will help to send a man from his sins to God is a godsend.

After A

Hard Day's Work

rub the tired muscles with a few drops of the soothing, refreshing, antiseptic liniment, Absorbine, Jr. You will find it pleasant and convenient to use and remarkably efficacious.

Absorbine, Jr., invigorates jaded muscle, limbers the joints and prevents second-day soreness and lameness after a strenuous, tireless day of sport or work.

Absorbine Jr.
THE ANTISEPTIC LINIMENT

combines efficiency with safety, being made of pure herbs, and is positively non-poisonous. Then, too, Absorbine, Jr., is a safe, powerful germicide which makes it especially valuable as an application for cuts, bruises and sores. No danger of infection if Absorbine, Jr., is applied promptly. A bottle of Absorbine, Jr., kept handy for emergencies is excellent health and accident insurance.

USE ABSORBINE, JR., whenever a high-grade liniment or positive germicide is indicated.

$1.00 a bottle at druggists or postpaid.

A LIBERAL TRIAL BOTTLE will be sent to you at once on receipt of 10c in stamps.

W. F. Young, P. D. F.
5 Temple St. Springfield, Mass.

Your Wife's Christmas

Torrington VACUUM SWEEPER

No dirt can go so deep into a carpet or rug that a Torrington cannot get it out. No electric or other power is used—the wheels on which easily runs operate three suction bellows that get all the dirt. These same wheels drive the brush which picks up all litter.

The Torrington scatters no dust—it leaves no dusting to do. Clean cut, simply built, it will last for years. It saves the drudgery of using broom and costs less per year.

CONSIDER THESE POINTS: Health, economy, convenience. Made in three grades. Prices $6 to $12.

Ask your dealer to show you. Write for Free Booklet National Sweeper Co., 12 Laurel St., Torrington, Conn. or 52 Bruce Ave., Westmount, Montreal, Canada

BUNIONS Grow Worse

Bunions can't get better unless you remove the pressure that makes them worse. Get immediate relief from bunions and enlarged joints by wearing a

FISCHER Bunion Protector

FOR MEN AND WOMEN

No Medicine—just a Protector that relieves and hides the deformity and keeps the shoe in shape. No larger size shoe required. Ask your Druggist or Shoe Dealer. Write today for 10 Days' Free Trial. State size of shoe and for which foot.

THE FISCHER MFG. CO.
Milwaukee, Wis.
Dept. M

Start a Friendship-Maid-Link-Bracelet

We start yours by giving you one Link absolutely engraved with 3 initials. Friends give or exchange others. Links only 12c each. Initials engraved FREE. Send to-day for one or more, stating whether Rolled Gold or Sterling Silver, headed or J design. Black Velvet Ribbon FREE so you can start wearing Link. Start with Link we give you FREE with first 12c order or more.

STERLING SILVER ROLLED GOLD
Friendship Jewelry Co., 83 Chambers St., Dept. 72, New York

Why Hens Stop Laying

E. J. REEFER, the poultry expert, is giving away, FREE, a valuable book explaining how every farm and backyard hen can be made to produce 200 eggs per year. The book contains scientific facts of vital interest to every poultry raiser. Write today for one of the valuable books—FREE.

E. J. Reifer Dept. 2499 Nelson Bldg. Kansas City, Mo.

500 TYPEWRITERS A

Typewriter prices smashed! Your choice of any factory rebuilt machine at a bargain. Every one perfect—guaranteed for 3 yrs., including repairs. My free circular tells how to save 40 percent—60 percent on each machine. Write for it! C. E. GARRETT, Free.

DEARBORN TYPEWRITER EXCHANGE, DEPT. 730, CHICAGO

TYPEWRITERS ALL MAKE PRICES $15.00 up. SOLD or RENTED anywhere at 10% MANUFACTURERS' PRICES, allowing RENTAL TO APPLY ON PRICE. Free Trial. Installment payments if desired. Write for catalog 71 TYPEWRITER EMPORIUM, 34-36 W. Lake St., CHICAGO

Amarilly of Clothes-Line Alley

Continued from page 1220

He went on to the house of the Rev. James Woodville, who had performed the marriage ceremony at the uptials of Mrs. Jimmels, née Hubeston. In this instance also no pocket had been discovered in the garment. John wended his discouraged way to the office of the Barlow Theater. Mr. Vedder was likewise surprised to learn that surplises possessed pockets. The young rector's face brightened at the next name on his list—Pete Oyes. Of course a boy and a pocket could not long remain unacquainted. Pete was doomed to disappointment. Pete's dismay when he learned at there had been an overstocked oket was convincingly genuine. "You see," he explained, "I wore it er my pants, of course, and I had the ekets in them, so I didn't look for more."

Pete escorted the rector to the awdyville," and by good fortune the rical impersonator in the sketch was ill on the board, though in a different . He instantly and decidedly dismissed all knowledge of a pocket.

"It's like that game," grinned Pete. "utton, button, who's got the button?" "Yes," agreed John, with a sigh, "ly in this case I fear I shall continue be it."

The brakeman, when he came in fm his run, was located and he joined the blockade that was conspiring against John's future happiness.

The clothes-line thief was very sensitive on the subject, and felt greatly aggrieved that he should be accused of rking his own pocket, for he protested that he had "found" the garment. The feied insinuation indeed was so singly resented that John wondered if ight not be a proverbial case of t birds flutter."

Neither police nor court of justice examined the pocket; nor had they bn aware of the existence of one. The bishop could throw no light on the missin article, and this call ended the sucless tour of investigation.

It was truly a profitable investment of the Jenkins family," thought John, "it a sorry one for me."

aving now wended his weary and uavailing way into all the places listed, n made his final report to Colette w remained adamant in her resolve. Of course some of those people did f it," she maintained. "It stands to on they must have done so, and it is to you now to find out which one of n is the guilty person."

How can I find that out, Colette?" How? Anyhow!" she replied, her ma betraying great triumph at her peers of logic.

It must be found!" she asserted w a distinct air of finality. "And d it is found—" he stopped abruptly. Was it of value? No, I am not rying to find out what it was since you ot wish me to know, but if I knew its ue, it might help me to decide who wd be the most likely to have a moti for taking it. But my belief is th the article slipped from the pocket aris lost."

It must be found then," she persid obstinately.

hn went home to ponder over his helless task. It remained for Amarilly w her optimistic spirit to cheer him. "I'll turn up some place whar you 'll look fer it and when you ain't n'er nuthin' about it," she asserted bevingly. "Lost things allers do."

spite her philosophy she was rly distressed over the disappearan of the mysterious article whose los was keeping John so unhappy. Sh ansacked the house from the cellar to ae Boarder's room, but found no tr of it.

wonder what it was," she mused. Abby Miss King dreamt she put othing in there, and when could she ha done it anyhow? Mebbly she giv em a present, and he slipped it in ere and fergot to take it out when he nt it to us. But then it would have on out in the wash. She don't seem to el so bad as he does—jest sorter shorn about it."

The members of the household were put through the third degree, but each declared his innocence in the matter.

"'Twas most likely Iry took it," said Cory, who found the baby a convenient loophole for any accusations, "and most likely he hez swallowed it."

Gus persisted in his oft-repeated statement, that there was nothing in the pocket when it was hung up during quarantine. This assurance was conveyed to Colette by John, who hoped she might find solace in the thought that none of the renters could have had it, if this were true, but to his chagrin she found in his information an implied reflection on her veracity.

"Colette," he said whimsically, "only three persons connected with this affair have taken my remarks as personal, you, Brother Washington, and the thief."

With this remark John, despairing of his ability to fathom the mystery of the article or to follow the caprices of Colette, dropped the matter completely.

CHAPTER XVIII

AT half past eight on the morning indicated, Amarilly's ring at the door of the studio was answered by Derry, whose face was covered with lather.

"Hello, Amarilly!" he exclaimed heartily, extending his hand in genial comradeship. "I am glad to see you again. Been pretty well through the summer? Well, come on into the butler's pantry, and see what you can do in a coffee way while I finish shaving."

Amarilly had been receiving instruction in domestic science, including table service, at the Guild school. Colette, interested in the studio work, had provided some minute muslin aprons and a little patch of linen for the head covering of the young waitress, advising her that she must wear them while serving breakfast. So when Derry emerged from his dressing-room, a trimly equipped little maid stood proudly and anxiously awaiting him.

"Well, bless your heart, Amarilly! I feel really domesticated. You look as natty as a new penny, and the little white cap is great on your hair. I see you have remembered how to fix it."

"Thank you, Mr. Derry, but please sit down while your coffee is hot."

"Deed I will, and if it tastes as good as it smells, I shall raise your remuneration."

He pronounced the coffee delicious, the grapefruit fixed to his liking, the toast crisp, and the eggs boiled just to the right consistency.

"And have you had breakfast, Amarilly?"

"Yes, Mr. Derry, at half past five."

"Whew! you should be ready for another. Now talk to me while I eat. Tell me about your reverend friend who was so daffy on the subject of pockets. Has he located any yet?"

Amarilly looked troubled.

"Miss King said I wan't to talk to you while I was serving."

"Tell Miss King with Mr. Phillips' compliments that artists are not conventional, and that you and I are not in the relation to each other of master and maid. We are good friends, and quite en famille. You are such a fine cook, I think I shall have you serve me luncheon at one o'clock. Can you?"

"Oh, yes; I should love to, Mr. Derry."

"I'll stock the larder, then. No; I can't be bothered, and I'd feel too much like a family man if I went about marketing. I'll give you carte blanche to order what you will."

"What's that, Mr. Derry?"

"Good! We mustn't neglect your education. I am glad you asked me. You might have always supposed it a breakfast-food."

He proceeded to explain elaborately what the words meant, and then asked her if she had remembered her previous lesson.

"Yes; ain't you—goin'—"

"Stop right there. Your next word to be eliminated is 'ain't.' You must say 'aren't' or 'isn't.' And you must remember to put 'g' on the end of

CHRISTMAS PRESENT

The many unsolicited letters of commendation which we have received from Teachers and Students who have ordered our Bibles for Christmas Presents, and the satisfaction generally expressed, assure us of the appreciation of our efforts to supply at so low a price this most suitable gift. It is our desire to announce that we have this year made an arrangement with the publishers to furnish the readers of this paper during the Holiday Season, a Bible of superior quality at a price heretofore, which is the famous

Size Open 8x10 1/2 inches

$4 International Self-Pronouncing Teacher's Bible at $1.50 Each

The regular list-price of this handsome Bible is $4.00. The above special price is slightly above cost of manufacture in large quantities and is offered as a special courtesy to Christian Herald readers, giving them the advantage of all middlemen's profits.

This Self-Pronouncing Teacher's Bible is printed on the best paper in hold black type, with morocco binding, divinity circuit (overlapping edges), extra grained lining, will not break or give way in the hinge, is very flexible, has round corners, with red under gold edges; contains all the helps and references, maps, concordances, etc.

In referring to this Bible, the Earnest Worker says: "A decided bargain. Those receiving it will be well pleased."

The Sunday School Times says: "The arrangement is simple and clear, the illustrations and maps new and admirable. It marks progress toward the true ideal."

Bishop W. X. Ninde says: "Its cheapness is such that every one can afford a Bible, durable and beautiful in form."

Cumberland Presbyterian says: "Before recommending this Bible to our church and friends, we submitted it to a committee composed of able and scholarly men. After a careful, painstaking, and unprejudiced examination, the Bible was recommended in the strongest words of praise."

A more appropriate and acceptable Holiday Gift could not be made to a relative or friend, to a minister, Sunday School Superintendent, Teacher or Scholar.

For $2 with All Charges Paid

We will send this same SELF-PRONOUNCING TEACHER'S BIBLE, with silk head band and silk marker, silk sewed with your name (or another name you prefer) engraved in pure gold on outside cover, with patent thumb index cut in edge and stamped in pure gold. If you prefer, we could enclose your card and send the Bible to any address, to arrive just in time for Christmas.

WHY THEY ARE BEST

They are Self-Pronouncing, have Large Type—restful to the eye, and superior Paper, Strong Flexible Binding, 60,000 selected marginal references. Complete Concordance. Latest Maps. Best Teacher's Helps, 4,500 questions and answers, etc. They have stood the test of time, criticism and competition, proving their adaptability for every need of the Bible student and reader, never failing to give complete satisfaction.

APPRECIATIVE EVIDENCE

Gentlemen:—Bibles have arrived. They give perfect satisfaction. I would not take four times the price I gave for them. Respectfully, NELL M. REYNOLDS, Loami, Ill.

Gentlemen:—I received the two Bibles I ordered of you in due time. To say that I am pleased with them, is putting it mildly. They are marvels of cheapness and beauty—two very commendable virtues. It's a rare chance to buy a serviceable Bible combined with beauty. REV. W. H. STEVENS, Kingsville, Ont.

Gentlemen:—Your handsome Bible was received today. I am highly elated at being the recipient of such a valuable book for the amount paid for it. It is as represented and well worth $4.00. Its clear type and beautiful finishings commend it to the public as a gem of much admiration. Its helps and aids are a feature of special delight to me. I was once a S. S. teacher and wish I could have had such a volume as this. I would commend it to every S. S. Teacher and Scholar. Yours truly,
C. T. GORDY, Mobile, Ala.

If the Bible is not perfectly satisfactory we will return your money promptly. Remit by express or postoffice money order or draft on New York Bank. It is unsafe to send cash, unless by registered mail. Be sure to write your name and address plainly. SEND ALL ORDERS DIRECT TO US AS FOLLOWS:

ECONOMY BIBLE CLUB, 1303 to 1310 American Tract Building, NEW YORK

"The Sanitary" Individual Communion Cups

Convenient, Noiseless and Sanitary

The individual communion service permits an impressive ceremony. We introduced individual cups (many state laws now demand them). We make the finest quality of beautiful polished trays and supply thousands of satisfied congregations. Send for list of these churches and FREE CATALOG with quotations. SANITARY COMMUNION OUTFIT CO., 67th St., Rochester, N. Y.

SENT FOR TRIAL

Public Speaking Taught at Home

Write for our special public speaking offer. 15 minutes a day, spare time, will make you a powerful, convincing speaker. You can be at ease before any audience—enrich your vocabulary—increase your earning power—become more popular. We have trained hundreds of successful speakers by mail at home. Write Now for Special Offer. Send quick for limited offer. No obligation. But you must hurry. Write now. Public Speaking Dept., American Correspondence School of Law, 949 Broadway Building, Chicago, Ill.

BOYS AND GIRLS Earn Christmas money. Set 14 for 25 XMAS PACK. 10¢. Each pack contains 15 sheets of Xmas cards. Write for it. When all sent us $1.00 and keep $1.00. We'll send you. CHRISTMAS CARD CO., Dept. F, Beverly Hills.

Am doing What Your Handwriting Reveals strong writing ability Don't Handwriting Reveals musical talent
How no half-dealing with Handwriting Reveals indolent

HERE'S a booklet of 32 pages which tells all about the traits of character and kinks of temperament indicated by handwriting. It is written by William Leslie French, the famous Graphologist, and it interprets fifty typical examples of penmanship. You will probably find your style among them. You can obtain a copy with 12 different patterns of Spencerian Steel Pens for 10 cents. Send at once—a new edition (limited) is just off the press.

SPENCERIAN PEN COMPANY
349 Broadway, New York

I enclose ten cents for samples of Spencerian Steel Pens and a copy of the book, "What Your Handwriting Reveals."

Name _____

Street No. _____

City _____

State _____

SPENCERIAN PEN COMPANY
349 Broadway, New York

The True Flavor of High-Grade
Cocoa Beans is Found in

BAKER'S BREAKFAST COCOA

Registered U. S. Patent Office

This is due to the perfection of the mechanical process by which it is manufactured, no chemicals being used, and to the care and skill used in the selection and blending of the beans. A high authority on cocoa has recently said: "A pure cocoa, unchanged by destructive chemicals, is the best cocoa. There is no more need for introducing alkalies into cocoa than there is into cracked wheat or oatmeal."

Baker's Cocoa is Delicious, Wholesome,
Pure and of Great Food Value

Booklet of Choice Recipes sent free

Walter Baker & Co. Ltd.

Established 1780

Dorchester, Mass.

Grand Prize, Panama-Pacific Exposition, 1915
Grand Prize, Panama-California Exposition, 1915

The Truth About Poultry

Get the Facts by Reading

The One- Man Poultry Plant

Successful Methods of Men on Farms or Small Acreage.
Complete in twelve parts; printed in one volume

By DR. N. W. SANBORN

REAL work, with real poultry, on a real New England Farm. This is a simple story of what has been done by a man, at forty-five years of age, town bred and city educated, getting out of practice of medicine, buying a small farm in the hill country, and making a success of the venture. Not only is the rearing of chicks and the management of adult fowl completely covered, but the interesting side issues of fruit growing, grain raising and the production of milk, that cannot be escaped on a real farm. You get rugged facts—rarely found in print. The truth about poultry as found in actual life on a one-man poultry farm.

You Can Do the Same, Book Tells How

OUR SPECIAL OFFER—The One-Man Poultry Plant, in twelve parts (book form), and the American Poultry Advocate, one year, for only 50 cts., book and Advocate, three years, for only $1.00, if order is sent at once.

Our paper is handsomely illustrated, practical, progressive and up-to-date on poultry matters. Established 1892. 44 to 132 pages monthly. 50 cents a year. 3 months' trial, 10 cents. Sample copy free. Catalogue of poultry literature free. Address

AMERICAN POULTRY ADVOCATE

580 Hodgkins Bldg. Syracuse, N. Y.

WANTED AN IDEA!

THINK OF SOME SIMPLE THING TO PATENT. Protect your ideas, they may bring you wealth. Write for "Needed Inventions," and "How to Get Your Patent."

RANDOLPH & CO., Dept. 96, Washington, D. C.

PATENTS That Protect and Pay

Advice and Books FREE. Rates Reasonable. Highest References. Best Services. WATSON E. COLEMAN, Patent Lawyer, Washington, D. C.

INVENTORS Do Not Sacrifice Your Inventions

Get full money. Use RELIABLE Book Free. Write R. S. & A. B. Lacey, 410 Barrister Bldg., Washington, D. C.

every word ending in 'ing.' Don't let me hear you say 'goin' again. I'll teach you one new word every day now. You see the measure of a maid is her pure English."

Amarilly looked distressed.

"What's the matter, Amarilly? Don't you want to learn to speak properly?"

"Yes, I do, Mr. Derry; but Miss King—she don't want me to speak diff'rent. She likes to hear me talk ignorant, and she said she was afeard you'd make me brom—"

"Brom?" he repeated.

"There was some more to it, but I fergit."

"Bromidic," he said triumphantly, after an instant's pondering. "You can never under any circumstances be that, and I shall develop your imagination and artistic temperament at the same time. I must get to work, now. Clear away the dishes. And finish the rest of this toast and coffee. It would be wicked to waste it."

Amarilly substituted a work apron for the little white covering, and was soon engaged in "redding."

At eleven o'clock the place was in perfect order, and she went into the studio where Derry was at work.

"Shall I get the things fer lunch?"

"Luncheon, if you please, Amarilly. I like that word better. It seems to mean daintier things. Here's a five-dollar bill. Get what you consider proper for a simple little home luncheon, you know. Nothing elaborate."

Amarilly, feeling but not betraying her utter inability to construct the menu for a "simple little home luncheon," walked despondently down the street. "The Boarder," she reflected, "takes bread and meat and hard biled eggs when they ain't—aren't too high, and pie when we hev it."

Some vague instinct of the fitness of things warned her that this would not be a suitable repast for Derry. Then a light shone through her darkness. "I'll telephone Miss Vail," she decided.

So she called up her teacher at the Guild, and explained the situation. She received full instructions, made her purchases, and went back to the studio.

At one o'clock she again garbed herself in cap and apron and called Derry to a luncheon which consisted of bouillon, chops, French peas, rolls, a salad, and black tea served with lemon.

"Amarilly," he announced solemnly, "you are surely the reincarnation of a chef. You are immediately promoted from housemaid to housekeeper with full charge over my cuisine, and your wages doubled."

"And that's going some for one day!" Amarilly gleefully announced to the family circle that night.

Her teacher, greatly interested and gratified at her pupil's ability to put her instruction to practical use and profit, made out on each Monday a menu for the entire week. She also gave her special coaching in setting table and serving, so Derry's domestic life became a thing of pride to himself and his coterie of artists. He gave little luncheons and studio teas in his apartments, Amarilly achieving great success in her double rôle of cook and waitress.

Her work was not only profitable financially, but it developed new tastes and tendencies. Every day there was the new word eagerly grasped and faithfully remembered. "Fer," "set," "spile," "orter," and the like were gradually entirely eliminated from her vocabulary. Unconsciously she acquired "atmosphere" from her environment.

"I want to use you for a model this afternoon," he remarked one day as she was about to depart. "Braid your hair just as tight as you can, the way you had it the first day you came. Put on your high-necked, long-sleeved apron, and get it wet and soapy as it was that first day, and then come back to the studio with your scrubbing brush and pail."

Amarilly did as she was bidden with a reluctance which the artist, absorbed in his preparations for work, did not notice.

"Yes; that's fine," he said, glancing up as she came to him. "Now get down here on your knees by the—"

what kind of boards did you call them, Amarilly? Mopboards? Yes, that was it. Now try and put your whole mind on the memory of the horror you felt at the accumulation of dirt on that first day, and begin to scrub. Turn your head slightly toward me, tilted just a little—so— There, that's fine! Keep that position just as long and just as well as you possibly can."

Derry began to paint, mechanically at first, and then as he warmed to his subject and became interested in his conception, with rapidity and absorption.

"There!" he finally exclaimed, "you can rest now! This may be my chef-d'œuvre, after all, Amarilly. Won't you be proud to be well hung in the Academy and have a group constantly before your picture? Why, what's the matter, child," springing to her side; "tears? I forgot it was your first experience in posing. Why didn't you tell me you were tired?"

"I wan't tired," she half sobbed.

"Well, what is it? Tell me."

"I'm afeerd you'll laugh at me."

"Not on your life! And your word for to-day, Amarilly, is afraid. Remember. Never afeerd."

"I'll remember," promised Amarilly meekly, as she wiped her dewy eyes.

"Now tell me directly, what is the matter?"

"It'll be such a humbly picture with my hair that way. I'd ought to look my best. I'd rather you'd paint me waiting on your table."

"But a waitress is such a trite subject. It would be what your friend, I mean, our friend, Miss King, calls bromidic. An artist, a real artist, with a soul, Amarilly, doesn't look for pretty subjects. It's the truth that he seeks. To paint things as they are is what he aims to do. A little scrub-girl appeals to the artistic temperament more than a little waitress, don't you think? But only you, Amarilly, could look the part of the Little Scrub-Girl as you did. And it would be incongruous—remember the word, please, Amarilly, in-con-gru-ous—to paint her with stylishly dressed hair. You posed so easily, so perfectly, and your expression was so precisely the one I wanted, and your patience in keeping the pose was so wonderful, that I thought you had really caught the spirit of the thing, and were anxious to help me achieve my really great picture."

"I have—I will pose for you as long as you wish," she cried penitently, "and I will braid my hair on wire, and then it will stand out better."

"Good! You are a dear, amenable little girl. To-morrow afternoon we will resume. Here, let me loosen your braids. Goodness, what thick strands!"

She stood by the open window, and the trembling, marginal lights of a setting sun sent gleams and glints of gold through her loosened hair, which fell like a flaming veil about her.

"Amarilly," exclaimed Derry rapturously, "I never saw anything quite so beautiful. Some day I'll paint you, not as a scrub-girl nor as a waitress, but as Sunset. I will get a filmy, white dress for you to pose in and present it to you afterward. And as you half turn your head toward the window, you must have a dreamy, reflective expression. You must think of something sad, something that might have been a tragedy but for some mitigating—but there, you don't know what I am talking about!"

"Yes, I do, Mr. Derry. I know what you mean, even if I didn't ketch—"

"Catch, Amarilly; not ketch."

"But my word for to-day is 'afraid,'" she said stubbornly. "I wasn't to have but one word a day. I'll say 'ketch' until tomorrow."

"Oh, Amarilly, such system as you have! You are right, though; but tell me what it was I meant."

"You mean I am to think of something awful that would have been more awful but for something nice that happened."

"Exactly. You have the temperament, Amarilly, but you should have written to your twin brother in such a dilemma. It's late now, or it will be when you get home. I am going to walk with you."

"No; I am not afraid."

"It makes no difference; I am going with you. To think that, intimate friends as we are, I have never seen you home, your numerous brothers, and the Boarder."

"Oh, no!" she protested, appalled at the prospect. "You mustn't."

"Why, Amarilly, how inhospitable you are! I thought you would be pleased."

"I guess you couldn't stand for it. Stand for what, Amarilly?"

"Why, you see, I am not ashamed it, but it's so diff'rent from what you used to, and you wouldn't like it, a I'd feel uncomfortable like with you there."

"Why, Amarilly!" A really painful look came into his boyish eyes. "I thought we were friends. And you Miss King and your minister come—"

"But you see," argued Amarilly, "it's diff'rent with them. A minister has to go everywhere, and he's used seeing all kinds of houses; and then Mr. King, she's a sort of a—settleme worker."

"I see," said Derry. "But, Amarilly, to be a true artist, or a writer, one must see all sorts and conditions of life. But I am not coming for that. I am coming because I like you and want to be your family."

"Well," agreed Amarilly, resigning but catching at her last straw, "you haven't had your dinner yet."

"We had a very late luncheon, if you remember, and I am invited to a supper after the theatre tonight, so I am not dining."

Amarilly did not respond to his lig flow of chatter on the way home. She halted on the threshold of her home, and looked at him with despair in her honest young eyes.

"Our house hasn't got any insides any stairs even. Just a ladder."

"Good! I knew you wouldn't that you couldn't have a house like anyone else's. It sounds interesting and artistic."

Slowly she opened the door, and drew a sigh of relief. The big room was "tidied" ("redded" having been resorted by Derry some time ago), and very peaceful, homelike atmosphere prevailed. The Boarder, being an amateur carpenter, had made a very lo table, about which were grouped the entire family. Her mother was darning socks; the Boarder, reading the paper preliminary to his evening call on Lily Rose; the boys, busy with books and games; Cory, rocking her doll sleep.

Their entrance made quite a little commotion. There was a scattering of boys from the table until Derry called "Halt" in stentorian tones. "If there's any gap in the circle, I shall go."

Then he joined the group, and described to the boys a prize-fight graphically that their eyes fastened on him with the gaze of one witnessing the event itself. He praised Amarilly to the mother, gave Cory a "tin penny" which she at once recognized as a silver quarter, and talked politics so eloquently with the Boarder that for once he was loath to leave when the hour seven-thirty arrived.

"You've gotter go now," reminded Cory sternly. "You see," turning to Derry, "he's gotter go and spend his ev'nin' with Lily Rose. She's his gal."

"Oh! Well, why not bring her here to spend the evening?" suggested Derry. "Then you'll have an excuse for your nice walks and an evening thrown in."

"That's a fine idee," acknowledged the Boarder with a sheepish grin.

He at once set out on his quest accompanied by Bobby, whom Derry had dispatched to the corner grocery for a supply of candy and peanuts.

The Boarder and Lily Rose came laden with refreshments.

When Mrs. Jenkins learned from Amarilly that Derry and she had had nothing to eat since half past one, she brought forth a pan of beans and pumpkin pie, and they had a genuine New England supper. Altogether they were a jolly little party.

"Amarilly," said Derry, as he was taking his leave, "I wouldn't have missed this evening for any other engagement I might have made."

"That's because it was something new to you," said Amarilly sagely. "You wouldn't like it for keeps."

To be continued

CHRISTMAS GIFT

Our many friends and customers among the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will be glad to learn that we have arranged another SPECIAL HOLIDAY BARGAIN FOR 1915, which totally eclipses all other Bible Bargains ever before made in the history of book-selling. So then, we now offer you and your friends a brand new edition of our famous Bourgeois-type

$5.00 Complete
Self-Pronouncing Teacher's Bible For Only $1 50 Each
Carefully Packed in individual boxes and sent by mail or express with Charges Prepaid (Offer No. 1)

THIS handsome and complete Teacher's Bible is printed from large, clear type, and ordinarily sells for $5.00. The Special Holiday Price given above is just about the cost of manufacturing in large quantities and is offered both as a special courtesy to our many friends and customers, and in order to add more names to our mailing list of book-buyers.

This beautiful Self-Pronouncing Teacher's Bible contains the complete text of the Old and New Testaments in the King James or Authorized Version, printed in a large, clear type on fine Bible paper. It has "References," "Concordance," "5000 Questions and Answers," "Biblical Atlas" and full "Teachers' Helps." It is handsomely and durably bound in French Morocco, Divinity Circuit (overlapping edges), has silk headband and marker, and red-under-gold edges.

It is the most appropriate and acceptable present you could possibly make to a Relative, Friend, Sunday-School Superintendent, Teacher or Scholar.

OFFER No. 2:

For $2 With All Charges Prepaid

WE will send this beautiful Self-Pronouncing Teacher's Bible, silk sewed, with silk headband and silk marker, with patent thumb index cut in edges, and with your name (or any name you prefer) engraved in gold on outside cover. We will also include beautiful "Christmas Card" and send the Bible to any Address you name so that it will arrive just in time for Christmas. Bible will be neatly wrapped and shipped under a handsome Christmas label.

WHAT OTHERS SAY ABOUT IT:

"The Bible arrived safely and we are simply delighted with it. It is indeed a wonderful bargain."—Mrs. Peter Lamy, Los Angeles, California.

"My Bible came in good condition and I am much pleased with it. The type is good and the teachers' helps are excellent."—Miss H. P. Axtell, Newark, N. J.

"The Bible received. Thanks. The print seems very clear and I am eighty-three years old."—Mrs. K. S. Doughty, Macon, Mo.

"The large-type Bible I ordered came today and I am much pleased with it."—W. W. Norwood, Lenoir, N. C.

Our Absolute Guarantee

We guarantee that every Bible will be perfectly satisfactory in every respect or money refunded. Remit by cash, express or post-office order, or draft on New York or St. Louis bank. If you send personal check, add 5c. exchange. Please write name and address plainly.

Do not delay. Mail coupon on the right at once. Be sure to tell us what name you wish engraved on cover of Bible. Mail your order at once direct to

THE BIBLE EDUCATIONAL SOCIETY
 1129 Pine Street, St. Louis, Mo.

FOLD, TEAR OFF, SIGN AND MAIL AT ONCE

THE BIBLE EDUCATIONAL SOCIETY
 1129 Pine Street
 ST. LOUIS, MO.

Send me by mail one Complete Self-Pronouncing Teacher's Bible, for which I enclose your Holiday Bargain Price of $1.50.
 Ship to

Name.....

Address.....

NOTE.—If you prefer Bible with THUMB INDEX and name engraved in gold on cover, scratch out $1.50 and write $2.00 in coupon.

Size When
 Open 8x11 Inches

Republic Pennsylvania Goodrich "Nobby" Tread "Chain" Tread Firestone Diamond Goodyear Fisk

Lee Keaton Kelly-Springfield

Empire Racine Prowodnik

Hardman Dreadnaught Dunlop Batavia Braender Marathon Portage "Daisy" Midgley Hood

All Cars are
"100% Skid Proof" only when equipped with

Weed Chains

on all four tires, regardless of the brand or type of tires used.

The proper sizes of Weed Chains to fit all sizes and styles of tires are carried in stock by dealers everywhere

Weed Chain Tire Grip Company

Bridgeport, Conn.

Nassau Gaulois Knight

Federal Ajax Miller

Christian Herald

SUBSCRIPTION, $1.50 PER ANNUM
PUBLISHED 52 TIMES A YEAR

COPYRIGHT, 1915, BY THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

NEW YORK, DECEMBER 8, 1915

VOL. 38—NO. 49. PRICE 5 CENTS
OFFICES: BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK

A JERUSALEM COURTYARD

Photograph by American Colony, Jerusalem

7-Passenger
FOUR $885 — with 40 horse power

DONALD GARDNER

with IMPROVEMENTS

In spite of the fact that the price has been reduced $100—from $985 to $885—this Studebaker 4-cylinder car has been greatly increased in power, size and quality, and exhibits many notable improvements, such, for example as:

- INCREASE to 112 inches in wheelbase (was 108 inches)
- INCREASE to $3\frac{7}{8}$ -in. bore x 5-in. stroke, FORTY Horse Power Motor (was $3\frac{1}{2}$ x 5 in.)
- INCREASE to SEVEN-passenger capacity (was Five-passenger)
- INCREASE to 34 x 4 Goodrich tires (was 33 x 4)
- INCREASE to 25 body-finishing operations (was 20 operations)
- INCREASE in size of cooling system, depth of upholstery and many other details; and
- use of the finest, hand-buffed, semi-glazed leather for the upholstery—and a BETTER grade of materials everywhere else in the car that a change was made.

*More than 200,000
 Studebaker Cars now in use*

Making it the BIGGEST 4-cylinder VALUE of the 1916 market!

—the ONLY 7-passenger, 4-cylinder car with a $3\frac{7}{8}$ -inch bore x 5-inch stroke, FORTY Horse Power motor that has ever been offered in America or Europe for less than \$1,000. In power, size and quality, this car has set a new standard for 4-cylinder cars. In power and flexibility it equals most of the Sixes now on the market.

And in VALUE, dollar for dollar, this Studebaker at $885 stands supreme among the Fours of the year as the ONLY car that has reduced its price $100, and yet accompanied the reduction with a GREAT and general INCREASE in quality. See the car at your dealer's—have a demonstration—and KNOW for yourself how much every dollar of the price can buy in a Studebaker car. Write at once for 1916 Catalog.

Four-Cylinder Models

Touring Car, 7-pass. . . $885
 Roadster, 3-pass. . . 850
 Landau-Roadster, 3-pass. 1185
 F. O. B. Detroit

Six-Cylinder Models

Touring Car, 7-pass. . . $1050
 Roadster, 3-pass. . . 1000
 Landau-Roadster, 3-pass. 1350
 Coupe, 4-pass. . . 1550
 Limousine, 7-pass. . . 2250
 F. O. B. Detroit

Canadian Prices

Touring Car, 7-pass. . . $1195
 Roadster, 3-passenger . . 1165
 Landau-Roadster, 3-pass. 1495
 F. O. B. Walkerville

Canadian Prices

Touring Car, 7-pass. . . $1395
 Roadster, 3-passenger . . 1350
 Landau-Roadster, 3-pass. 1695
 F. O. B. Walkerville

STUDEBAKER

South Bend, Ind.

Detroit, Mich.

Walkerville, Ont.

Address all Correspondence to Detroit

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

An Illustrated News Weekly for the Home

Christmas in a Moslem Sacred City

By A. TEGNIER

BAGDAD, the Asiatic objective of the rival forces in the great world-war, is reported in recent cable despatches as having been the scene of a temporary reverse for the Allies. A severe battle is said to have been fought some thirty miles west of the famous "City of the Caliphs," with the result indicated, although no details have yet been received.

While this most ancient city on the banks of the Tigris is not usually associated in Western minds with the annual celebration of the birth of Christ, it is nevertheless a fact that its people include many who rightfully claim descent from the oldest Christians in the world—pure Chaldeans of Bible Chaldea—who still honor Christmas Eve and Christmas Day, even the young Bagdadiji join in the festival, if not in the ceremonial rites.

The ancient town, which was founded in 763 on the site of a former city on the east bank of the Tigris, five hundred miles from the Persian Gulf, is still to the outward eye the wonderful city of eastern history, romance and legend. It is a city of the plains of Mesopotamia, and stretches out far on each side of the broad river. Orange and olive and date groves fringe its round where it stops at the edge of the great desert, high sweeps away for hundreds of miles in every direction. Its innumerable gardens make a fairland of order green. Its lofty minarets and beautifully shaped domes of glazed brickwork, in green, blue, black and white, and brown, reflect the rays of the sun with striking effect. Approached from the river by the plains, Bagdad, seen in the distance behind the groves of orange and date and olive trees, still stands in all her ancient glory. But inside the five miles of city wall, built high and thick with brick and mud, and flanked at intervals by towers many of which date from the twelfth century, a great deep ditch surrounding the city, Bagdad seems a tawdry place. There are few towns, even in Asia, the streets of which are so narrow and winding, and more so in the older part of the city on the east bank. And, perhaps, fewer streets which are so filthy and uneven, most of the scavenging being done by the hordes of unowned and half-savage dogs. In their way, there are no stranger streets in the world than those of this city of the Christian Chaldeans, who number some seven or eight thousand all told. Some of the streets of shops, rather of bazaars, are long, and fairly wide and straight, and vaulted with brickwork. But most are narrow, dark, and tunnel-like, covered with a roof of straw, dried leaves, branches of trees and mud, supported on flat beams laid across. In summer it is 125 degrees Fahrenheit.

Bagdad for nine or ten weeks, occasionally longer, and thus it is the streets are protected from the terrible heat.

The booths of the merchants, where the Christian Chaldeans spend much money to celebrate Christmas Eve and Day, are arranged along the sides of these alley-like bazaars, each shopkeeper squatted on a rug in front of his pile of goods. On Christmas Eve torches are put out, and fancy lamps and lanterns are lighted; and the Chaldeans spend much time haggling for their purchases. Camels and donkeys jostle and bray in the streets. The peddler of maccas cries up his wares; the water-vender passing along with his goatskin water-bags loudly clicks his ass bows; the seller of savory "kabobs" or bits of roast meat noisily proclaims the toothsome-ness of his viands; he with the basketful of hard-boiled eggs tries to shout down the shrill-voiced vender of sweetmeats; while farther along at the boiled sheepheads' stall a bold-faced Kurd is exerting his brazen voice to obtain custom.

Even as in Haroun-al-Raschid's time the row of old coffee shops stretches along the river front, where on either bank the water is confined by a high brick embankment, broken through at intervals by the paths leading down to the water's edge, where the "bheesties" or water-sellers replenish their skins, and the "dhobies" or washermen, standing ankle deep, are busy washing clothes. Here in the coffee shops crowds of young Chaldeans and their Muslim friends, after having paraded the streets and bazaars singing ballads as old as Bagdad, assemble on Christ-finely dressed stones. A fountain is usually in the middle of it, and palm, date, or orange trees for shade, together with many scented flowers. Stairs of stone lead up from the court to the gallery, into which all the chambers of the upper story open. The gallery with its boarded covering and carved screens is supported with pillars of wood frequently most elaborately carved and decorated. The lofty rooms with their vaulted ceilings are decorated with chequered work and moldings. Ample provided with windows of stained glass, they are furnished with divans, pictures, curious inlaid mirrors, and much gilding, all in good taste.

Here, usually in a room on the second story, the Christian Chaldeans partake of their Christmas dinner without turkey and mince pie and plum pudding, but with the inevitable and traditional roast lamb stuffed with plums, rice in many kinds of dishes, stacks of cakes of native bread, thin, unleavened, and fresh from the oven. There are many other dishes, including the inevitable one of dates, which are served in many ways, milk, cream, butter, or cheese being the usual accompaniment. Of course the meal is preceded and followed by coffee—real Arabian coffee, from the Yemen in South Arabia.

Then the tale-teller is introduced. He recounts many of the legends and traditions of Christmas Day and of the Chaldean race. But most of all does he relate the native fables which have grown up around the Birth in the Manger.

He does not forget to dwell on the days when Bagdad was the empire city of the Eastern world; when the kingdom of the Caliph with its wealth and population was chief of the realms in all West Asia, till, as he relates, the Mongols under Hulaku stormed the city for six days, and put 800,000 inhabitants to the sword, piling up the dead mountain-high. The palace of the Caliph built of marbles and black and white jades, and, above all, of most fragrant and precious woods, they set on fire; and, as he tells from the Arab historians, owing to the conflagration of it the air was impregnated with fragrance to a distance of sixty miles.

These and other tales the story-teller narrates to the family as they sit round the brasier with its glowing charcoal. And so the oldest Christians in the oldest city of Western Asia, perhaps in the old world, pass their Christmas Day.

THE operations of the British forces in the vicinity of Bagdad have been slowly succeeding, and according to despatches received late in November this army had reached the ruins of Ctesiphon, 18 miles southeast of the city. Although the odd name of this place in English might suggest the presence of a natural flow of water (the town, however, is named Solman Pah), the British were obliged to fall back some four miles down the Tigris in order to obtain a proper water supply. Should the city be taken before December 25, Christmas there will be fearfully marred by the sacrifice of life which is attending the advance, and yet made to seem more really Christmas by the presence of men who in large numbers are members of that body whose ancient representatives in this Moslem city have for so many centuries kept alive the faith of their Christian forefathers.

Custom House at Bagdad, and Curious Wicker and Skin-Covered Turkish Boats on the Tigris mas Eve to drink coffee, and smoke cigarettes, and watch the painted Arab girls dance.

But many, many others of the Christian Chaldeans do not spend the eve in gaiety of the coffee shops; for seven churches of the Christian faith hold special Christmas Eve services conducted by their priests, including that attended by the European colony. Again at dawn on Christmas Day the better part of the Chaldean Christians assemble. The chants, the sermon, and the prayers are in Arabic, and when they sing of Moses they call him "Musa," and Joseph "Yusuf," and so on. Little Chaldean boys make up the choir, and the venerable old priests are all gorgeous in fine linen and gold embroidery.

The service over the Chaldeans and their women folk return to their houses, which if they are disappointing to outside view astonish the Westerner when inside them.

Even as houses were built and arranged when Haroun-al-Raschid reigned in Bagdad, so they are today. Instead of a regular front with windows, there are high, thick walls pierced by narrow, low, heavy doors, and in some of the better streets the Turkish "kiosk" or large projecting window, or else a Persian lattice, occasionally is seen. The two-storied interiors present a most striking contrast to the dirty, unpaved streets. The usual Bagdad house is built round a square court, which is paved with

The Death Penalty for Selling Liquor

PEOPLE whose ideas of Mexico are gathered from works of fiction (including the average magazine article of the casual traveler, or the "feature story" of some "special representative" who has been as much as six weeks in the republic) regard this country as a lawless sort of place, drunkenness especially being singled out as a national vice, until one would fancy that practically the whole Mexican people were given over to the inordinate consumption of pulque, mescal, tequila, sotol or what not of the numerous alcoholic beverages of the country, not to mention those that are imported. It may be remarked in passing that there is not so much drunkenness in Mexico as in some other countries that claim a higher civilization, and that one will look in vain in the centers of population for any indications of overindulgence such as may be found in any American or English manufacturing center.

But what will the believers in Mexican total depravity think when they are told that in all this wide world Mexico—"barbarous Mexico" if you will—is the one place where selling liquor is prohibited under penalty of death?

Surely the heart of the most ardent prohibitionist should throb with pleasure at such a statement, and a true one too. Even the San Antonio minister who actually declared in a public sermon that all saloonkeepers should be burned at the stake must rejoice to know that just across the line a condition can be found that accords so fully with his own ideas.

IT is in the state of Sonora that this stringent repressive measure has for months been in operation. Sonora, one of the largest states of the Mexican republic, has for its northern boundary the American state of Arizona, admitted to the Union only a few years ago with all the latest ideas in government—the initiative, referendum and recall, and other democratic devices. In November, 1914, to the unutterable surprise of a great portion of the people of that state more or less familiar with conditions that had existed there from the old territorial days, Arizona adopted a law prohibiting absolutely the sale of liquor anywhere within the boundaries of the commonwealth.

It was difficult indeed to believe it. Those who had been familiar with Yuma in its wide-open days—more saloons and gambling houses than all other business houses combined—or with Tucson, or Nogales, or Douglas, or Bisbee, or any of the many other prosperous mining camps where saloons were considered fully as essential as grocery or dry goods stores, could scarcely credit the evidence of their senses when they learned that Arizona had chosen to "go dry" on the first day of January, 1915.

Naturally enough, as soon as the time drew near for the closing of the saloons (and they were closed tight as a drum), there was a movement, especially in the border towns, for means by which to evade the operation of the law. At Douglas, a large and prosperous mining town on the Mexican boundary line, were many saloons, and it was supposed that there would be little difficulty in moving enough of them just across the line into Agua Prieta, in Sonora, to supply the means for alleviating the alcoholic thirst of American citizens. It was supposed that the authorities of Agua Prieta would welcome such a source of revenue, as the American liquor sellers and gamblers as well were prepared to meet almost any financial demand that might be made upon them.

But a surprise awaited those who entertained this idea.

GENERAL PLUTARCO ELIAS CALLES, commander of the Constitutional or Carrancista forces in Sonora, whose headquarters were in Agua Prieta, not only positively refused to permit any saloons to be opened in the town, but he went even further. He issued a decree imposing the death penalty upon any one caught selling liquor! Nor could any amount of persuasion that was brought to bear move him one jot from his position.

No liquor could be sold in Agua Prieta!

Any one selling it would be shot!

Thirsty Americans would have to go elsewhere.

And that was all there was to it.

Under General Calles the sale of liquor in Naco had been prohibited, but as soon as Maytorena took possession all this was changed. A swarm of American liquor dealers descended with pockets full of money, which they found no difficulty in turning over to hands eager to receive it.

THEN followed a saturnalia. Regular automobile lines were established from Bisbee, Lowell, Douglas and elsewhere to Naco, and an immense traffic grew up in the briefest possible time. Every vacant building that could be obtained was fitted up as a saloon, gambling house or den of vice, and all the scenes of the old-time frontier mining camp were repeated.

But a few weeks ago there was a sudden change. General Calles, deeming

It was pointed out by the Constitutionalists that the violation had been committed by Maytorena months before, and that that violation had been tacitly approved by the United States, the practically abrogating the agreement. Nevertheless, in order to avoid a possible cause for complaint, the Constitutional troops were withdrawn.

Then the saloon men rejoiced. The efforts at Washington had proved successful. But they reckoned quickly. Before the troops left, a civil government was set up under the guidance of General Calles, which then proceeded to enforce the death penalty decree, and the banishment of the liquor sellers was made permanent and effective. All the efforts of the interventionists had gone for naught.

Maytorena has since then been unable to make headway against Calles, and has withdrawn to Nogales, the only point in the entire state of Sonora now in the control of the Villistas. Ever since the Arizona prohibition law went into effect on January first last, the place, under the direction and control of Maytorena, has been "wide open." Dozens of saloons and other places of resort for the vicious had been opened for the accommodation of the people of Tucson, Nogales, Phoenix and other places, who were obliged to make the long journey to a across the boundary in order to satisfy their thirst.

But General Calles is closing on the place, and when he captures it, as he surely will, there will be another dry town in Mexico, with capital punishment as the penalty for violating the law.

Of course, there will doubtless be a repetition of the National interventionists, and the public eye look for a repetition of the indignant "news" sent out regarding that affair.

But the wonder of it all! The death penalty for selling liquor in "barbarous Mexico" in all places! Prohibitionists, take notice! GEORGE F. WEEKS.

A Chance Seed

WHAT memories are sometimes awakened through the ministry of very humble things! I was walking along the Avenida Central (Central Avenue) in Panama City, and, glancing down at a tub containing a shrub in front of a store, I saw, not the shrub but a something growing beside it, and I stood transfixed before it. For the sight took me back to "the States," the homeland, and back forty years to boyhood days on the farm. I saw the old house with the cherry orchard near it.

I saw the apple orchard, the growing crops, the flowers, and all the beauties of the country. Quicker than I am in telling you, the joys and delights of those happy days passed before me for I stood no longer than a second before this reminder of home. True, I thought too of potato bugs, and tomato worms, for they have always been an inseparable part of those boyhood memories—but I thought also of the bank of wild strawberries; the daisies in the orchard; the glories of autumn; the fields of grain. . . .

I was looking at a plant of common yellow mustard. COLIN W. NOYBURN.

Small things come to him who wastes. The man who takes but doesn't give may stay poor, because what he keeps takes up so much room that there is no room for what he might get if he gave some away.

The FABLE of the THREE ELMS
By Margaret E. Sangster, Jr.

THE North Wind spoke to three sturdy elms, And, "Now you are dead!" said he; "I have blown a blast till the snow whirled past, And withered your leaves, and see: You are brown and old and your boughs are cold!" And he sneered at the elm trees three.

The first elm spoke in a hollow tone (For the snow lay deep and white); "You think we are dead, North Wind?" he said, "Why we sleep—as you sleep at night. Beneath the snow lie my sturdy roots, They grip on the friendly earth, And I rest—till another year!" said he, And he shook with a noisy mirth.

The second elm laughed a hearty laugh, And "North Wind," he cried in glee, "Beneath my bark glows a living spark, The sap of a healthy tree. My boughs are bare and my leaves are gone, But—what have I got to fear? For the winter time is my time of rest And I sleep till another year!"

The third elm spoke and his voice was sweet, And kind as the summer sea: "Oh, Wind," he said, "We are far from dead—The God in whose hand we be Looks down, with love, from the winter sky, And sends us his sun to cheer; If we had no snow there would be no spring—We rest till another year!"

The three elms rocked in the stinging blast, And under the heavy snow Their roots were warm from the raging storm, And safe from the winds that blow. They smiled in their hearts and their leafless boughs Spread over the frosty way; For they knew that the God of forest trees Would watch through each winter day.

The North Wind uttered a frosty sigh, As the snow blew far and free; And his weary eyes sought the winter skies, And "Mighty is God!" said he. "To die or live are His gifts to give!" And he smiled at the elm trees three.

But there was still one recourse. Twenty-five miles to the east is the town of Naco, Sonora, with but half the width of a street dividing it from the place of the same name in Arizona. Six or seven miles back from the border are the thriving mining towns of Bisbee and Lowell. Just a month after Arizona closed her saloons, Naco, Sonora, was occupied by Maytorena, the leader of the Villista forces in that portion of the republic.

This action was a breach of the neutrality agreement entered into some weeks previously, under which the Constitutional troops commanded by General Benjamin G. Hill evacuated the town after Maytorena had for months vainly sought to dislodge them by force. Before leaving, however, a civil government was established, both sides solemnly pledging themselves not to occupy the place again with a military force.

the neutrality agreement deliberately violated, marched his troops into the place, the Villistas fleeing in disorder.

One of the first things Calles did was to order every saloon, gambling house and brothel closed. At the same time he republished the decree in force in Agua Prieta: Death to any one selling liquor.

An angry crowd of saloon-keepers and their patrons made a protest that was heard clear to Washington. "Insults to the flag" were alleged, and all the other sensational stories made use of by the interventionists and their allies were again called into play, threadbare though they were. Officials took the matter up and a protest was made to Carranza against the "violation of the neutrality agreement." Maytorena's original violation of that pact had never received attention, although Washington had been notified of it at the time.

Her Way to Happiness

Alice Mary Kimball

LITTLE Rosa Labinski stood on the margin of a hurrying stream of shoppers and gazed at a doll which smiled in pink-cheeked, shimmery-haired splendor from the branches of a Christmas tree. The Christmas tree grew in a bespangled, festooned, glittering region which was no less a fairyland to Rosa for being also the holiday-decked window of a ten-cent store.

It happened that Rosa had just ten cents. It had been given her by her mother to buy bread. If she didn't spend it for bread her brothers and sisters would go supperless to bed.

Rosa clenched the dime hard—so hard that it hurt her tiny fist. She was afraid she would see herself walking into the store, putting the coin on the counter, and coming out with the longed-for treasure under her arm. It was such a cuddly doll—so different from the haughty French dolls with terrifying price-marks which she had seen in shop displays farther up the street! To have it—to dress and pet and play with—was easily worth the price of many suppers to a ten-year-old, joy-starved little mother who never had caressed a doll-child of her own.

Down the street came Marjorie Marron, smiling a little, as though she were turning over in her mind a jolly secret. People stopped to notice her. She was as radiant and youthful and Christmasy as any girl pictures on the covers of the holiday magazines. The keen air had brought a vivid color to her cheeks, and intensified the sparkle of her deep brown eyes. Her dark hair strayed from a becoming little hat, and a bunch of holly was pinned on her fur-trimmed coat. One would have known, from the twinkle which came and went at the corners of her mouth, that her big muff was full of mysterious Christmas packages.

Marjorie seldom walked. Her father was one of the wealthiest men in the city, and she always had a motor at her disposal. Tonight, returning from a friend's house, she had decided to mingle with the Christmas crowds, and enjoy the tingling air. She liked a winter night like this—the streets full of people, the windows gay with holly, rows of yellow lights, blossoming like golden flowers against an indigo blue sky, and myriads of kindly Christmas thoughts hovering in the air! She breathed deeply, and smiled up at the snow crystals which were falling softly and covering the earth with white.

She thought of the Christmas gift which was to be hers: a deed to the Randolph house—a beautiful, historic mansion worth, it must be, a fortune in itself. "I've always loved that place," she exulted. "It was so wonderful of Daddy to buy it for me. This is such a lovely old world, anyway! Such fine, nipping air! These flakes are like diamonds where the light touches them! I wonder if we'll have a white Christmas?"

Then she came upon little Rosa, whose round, black, fascinated eyes were still upon the doll. Her lips were purple, and flakes were falling upon the skinny shawl which protected her thin shoulders. Two ears were trickling down her face.

Marjorie hesitated a moment; then she touched the little shoulder. Rosa looked up, and Marjorie saw a face too old and care-lined for the slight young body. "What's the matter?" she asked.

The girl edged shyly away. Marjorie stopped a moment, irresolute. She was about to go on, when a mob stopped her.

"It's the d-d-doll," choked Rosa, with a queer little gesture toward the window. "It's—it's too-oo-ti-ful!"

Marjorie smiled. It was odd that anyone should be beauty in such a cheap, tawdry thing! And here was a droll little midget actually crying for it! Moved by a swift, warm impulse, she put her arm around Rosa's shoulder and drew her into the store.

THERE was a babel of voices inside. Marjorie saw tired salesgirls putting forth a last spurt of energy to tide themselves over to the closing hour. Masses of buyers surged and jostled about her. A floor director saw her—noticed that an expensively dressed customer was waiting.

"This is our rush hour," he explained. "The factories and shops have closed and these mostly are the working people doing their Christmas shopping."

The working people! Marjorie had always thought of them in a vague, abstract way. These people, so many of them, were poor. Frequently she contributed to funds. But this! Christmas shopping!

For a moment Marjorie forgot the doll; forgot even the cold little hand clinging to her gloved one. She watched the eddying stream of shoppers. Near her a mother, bent-shouldered and weary-eyed, hovered with tragic intensity over a counter, as though trying to stretch her tiny hoard over several purchases. Opposite her two tired factory girls fumbled over cheap collars and laces. Children were gazing wistfully at flimsy toys. An eager, elbowing crowd pressed around the counter where diamond rings and pearl necklaces might be had for a dime. It seemed to her a sad-looking sea of humanity that surged through the aisles. Face after face she searched for a gleam of that cheery happiness which, she supposed, was common to everyone at Christmas time.

Her thoughts were interrupted by a salesgirl. A moment later she placed the doll in Rosa's hand.

The child took it in silent wonderment. The doll was her own—and there would still be bread for supper! It was just as though a fairy-tale had popped through the covers of a book and come to life!

Marjorie led her, radiant-faced, through the throng. She was serious and thoughtful, for an idea was taking shape in her mind. On the pavement she asked Rosa a few questions. Then she said:

"Will you promise to be here—by this door—Wednesday afternoon, at three o'clock?"

Rosa nodded solemnly.

"I'll write it on a card. Good-bye—and don't forget!"

Rosa took the card, her eyes still on the doll. Hugging her precious possession underneath the shawl, her elf-like little figure flitted down the walk and disappeared in the crowd.

JOHAN MARRON'S face usually showed tired lines when he reached home at night to dine with Marjorie, but tonight he seemed almost youthful as he beamed across the table at his daughter.

She was telling him of Rosa, and she did not notice that he seemed impatient for her to finish.

"It doesn't seem right," she concluded, "that the child might not have had even a cheap doll. There's such a plenty in the world."

"You have plenty," he replied indulgently, "because your father has been working and planning and scheming all his life to give you the opportunities you ought to have. And you're going to have them, Marjorie—as big as they make them. You've been so busy with your Christmas things that you haven't seen the papers tonight. Look!"

He held up a newspaper. Across the top black headlines announced the merger of the United Iron works, her father's works, with the Southwestern Steel & Iron. Beneath was her father's picture. He was president of the consolidated concern, she read, and it was one of the largest corporations in the state.

"When I was young I didn't have many good things," he mused, as he noticed the brilliant joy kindling in his daughter's eyes. "There was a big family of us, and we were too busy scratching for a living to have the fun that ought to be coming to kids. Then, your mother and I were poor for a long time. I never was able to make things smooth and easy for her. . . . She died. . . . And all through these struggling years I've thought: 'There's Marjorie. All the happiness I couldn't give her mother, she shall have.' The world has thought me cold and grasping, I dare say. But it doesn't know of my dream for you."

In Marjorie's misty eyes the sparkle of china and silver, the gleam of flowers in the cut-glass bowl, the kindly light on her father's face, all swam together. She saw her life stretching ahead, its lines cast in pleasant places. Her father went on:

"I promised your mother you shouldn't be pushed into social life before you were twenty-one, however successful I might be. She wanted you to go to college, to church, to Sunday school. And you've done it. Now, after Christmas, we'll give up the church work. It takes your time, and . . ."

"Papa, dear," Marjorie interrupted. "I can't give up the Sunday school class. I've just been elected president."

"You can resign."

"But we're planning so many things. I've just now been telephoning some of the girls, and Wednesday we're going to meet that little girl—Rosa—at the ten-cent store and go home with her and get ready to give the Labinski family the Christmas of their lives!"

A shade of annoyance passed over Mr. Marron's face.

"I'd rather you wouldn't," he said. "I don't want you in those hovels in the East End. I'll report the case to young Brockway—he's a settlement worker down there. He'll look after it, and we'll let it go at that. You will be too busy preparing for your coming-out party at the new house."

The girl sat quietly in her chair, her food untasted. She was not accustomed to act contrary to her father's wishes, and all her joyous, girlish instincts welcomed his plans for her—a trip abroad, seasons in Washington and New York, days crowded with color and excitement.

But to give up her class! She never had realized before how much it meant to her, how earnestly she had set her heart on worth-while achievements during her term as president.

THE girl in the mirror seemed like a vision of springtime. A gown of misty pink, with here and there a bit of the filiciest of lace, fell in graceful lines to the floor and ended in a shimmering train, such as a princess might have worn. Encircling her soft brown hair was a wreath of dainty rosebuds which looked as fresh and real as though they were just from the florist's.

Aunt Catharine, who had come from New York to help launch Marjorie's craft on the social sea, gave an admiring exclamation. Marjorie was so sweet and sound and wholesome, so beautiful and charming. What a brilliant success would be hers!

"Who would ever recognize our little Sunday school miss?" laughed Cousin Edna, who had come with her mother for the party. "And—oh! I'd forgotten. There's a reminder of your philanthropies waiting for you down in the hall, dear—an impish, dirty-faced little urchin. He just won't go, though we've pleaded and threatened."

A flash of memory blotted from Marjorie's mind anticipation of the gaieties of the coming week. If so many things had not interfered she would have been at the ten-cent store this afternoon with the other girls of her class, to meet Rosa and accompany her to her home. But—life had been so full of congratulations and flowers and messages and gowns and plans that Rosa had been crowded from her thoughts. She bit her lip as she thought of the pinched, old little face with the tragedy of hunger of body and mind and soul written so plainly upon it.

"Have him wait," she said impulsively. "Aunt Catherine, you'll excuse me, please? I've an engagement this afternoon that I almost forgot."

A few moments later she was downstairs, dressed for the street.

"Rosa's sick," the boy explained, as he held out the card Marjorie had given his sister. "She's been calling for you. The doctor said to send for you."

Fifteen minutes later Marjorie's automobile was passing through a desolate section of the city. The streets were bleak and littered. The air seemed surcharged with dirt and smoke. Rows of tenements, all hideously alike, lined the streets and climbed helter-skelter over cindery embankments. Pitiful rag of washing flapped in the wind against a wintry sky.

"How ugly," Marjorie thought. "Why do they crowd people up so, I wonder? How can they breathe?"

Past more crowded dwellings, reeking saloons, and sullen streets, the motor moved. It stopped in front of a tenement. The boy led the way inside.

The smell was nauseating. It seemed solid and thick. Marjorie picked her way up two littered stairways and followed the boy into a room. It was small and dark and cold. The air was bad. On a table a kerosene lamp flickered and smoked, weirdly illuminating the dingy windowless room. Unwashed dishes were heaped upon a stove from which the fire had died. In an adjoining room a woman was weeping and talking with a man in a language Marjorie did not understand.

ON a cot, her face white and still, was little Rosa. She breathed fitfully. One arm, thin like the leg of a bird, clutched a doll in a tinselled red dress. It was the only touch of color in the room.

The voices in the other room ceased, and a man entered—a young man, with a kindly, boyish face. He spoke to Marjorie pleasantly.

"I'm—I'm from the young woman's Bible class of the Central Church," Marjorie faltered. "I came to see if we can do anything."

"I'm from the Hutchins Settlement," he said, as he held out his hand. "My name is Brockway. I—we need all the help we can get."

Marjorie's troubled glance swept the disordered room and rested on the cot.

"I'm afraid I'll be—useless," she said slowly, her tear-filled eyes still on the wasted, motionless figure on the cot.

"You're not used to this kind of thing, are you?" Brockway asked. "It gets one's nerve at first. When I first went into it the nightmares I couldn't sleep or eat. But I pulled myself together. One must, for there's no end to the work. That little girl on the cot, now—there are a score of cases as bad as that within a half-mile. All over this part of the city children are growing up without air or light or nourishment or play. They die—in swarms."

He spoke matter-of-factly. Marjorie's eyes widened with wonder and sorrow.

"You know about these things," she said. "Maybe
Continued on page 1260

A Week in the World's News

WHEN Henry Ford, millionaire manufacturer, philanthropist and peace-lover, announced on November 24 that he had chartered the entire first and second cabins of the Scandinavian-American liner Oscar II, and purposed sailing in her for Europe with a large party of influential advocates of the peace movement within two weeks, the news took the public completely by surprise. His further declaration that the object of the trip was "to stop the war" instantly let loose a flood of comment all over the country. But Mr. Ford is accustomed to doing surprising things. He is a man who, having once put his hand to the plow, does not turn back. "The time has come to say 'Cease firing,'" he explained. "We are going to try to get the boys out of the trenches and back to their homes by Christmas Day!"

For months before making public announcement of his novel peace plan, Mr. Ford had been giving the project serious consideration. He knew that many would regard him as a fanatic and stamp his plan as chimerical. But he had long ago determined to devote his life and fortune to the cause of world-peace, and if any practical opportunity presented itself—even though it involved great sacrifice—he was ready to grasp it. He believed that, at heart, the American people hated war and opposed militarism, and that he would have the enthusiastic moral support of peace-lovers everywhere. Further, he felt assured that Europe was sick of the terrible war and that the nations would welcome any plan that gave promise of bringing the slaughter to a close.

During the days that followed, Mr. Ford's project was gradually unfolded in many of its details. He now confidently expects to have with him on the Peace Ship a number of distinguished Americans of both sexes who have the world's welfare at heart and who believe that America, as the leading neutral power, should take the initiative. Among those invited to be Mr. Ford's guests and fellow passengers are Mr. John Wanamaker, the governors of the various states, Professor Roger W. Babson, economist and lecturer, Mrs. Rosika Schwimmer, a Hungarian peace delegate to The Hague (who is said to have first suggested the Peace Ship crusade to Mr. Ford), and many others, including several college professors who are known by their attitude and utterances to be opposed to war and militarism. Socialist leaders and members of the Women's Peace Party are among those invited. There are several editors on the list and a number of preachers, merchants and lawyers. In fact, Mr. Ford hopes that every profession will be represented by some name that is known to stand for peace and humanity. Not a single member of Congress has been invited, as Mr. Ford holds that they are all needed in Washington to fight against the effort now being made to mili-tarize the country under the plea of "preparedness." Mr. Ford spent the larger part of two weeks in personally bringing the project to the attention of many of the most influential men in American public life. Through Mrs. Snowden, the wife of the English parliamentary labor leader, the who have preceded them. Mrs. Snowden, who went on ahead to secure the participation of Mrs. George Bernard Shaw and other prominent English people, will also join the party on the Continent. The voyagers will then proceed to The Hague where they expect to meet strong peace delegations, who will gather there for the purpose of holding a conference.

In selecting those who are to go on the Peace Ship, the test of fitness approved by Mr. Ford has been a simple one. The person invited must be (1) neutral, (2) desirous of ending the war and averting further slaughter, and (3) favorable to and willing to cooperate with the expedition. Colleges and similar institutions were invited to select their best men for the great opportunity; but the simple test was applied to all, layman and professional alike.

It is not on the strength of American sympathy, however, that this greatest of all adventures in the history of the peace movement is being undertaken. Mr. Ford's resolution has been strengthened by indisputable evidence—which he declares is now in his possession and is in documentary form—that such a movement as he has planned will be both timely and welcome. This evidence, the precise nature of which he thinks it best to reveal at present, he deems strong enough to justify all he is now doing toward bringing matters to a focus.

The Oscar II, Selected as Peace Ship of the Ford Expedition

FIFTY MILLION FOR WORLD TRADE. Under the leadership of the National City Bank of New York City, a fifty million dollar corporation, the American International Corporation, has been created to engage in world-wide trade. The list of directors includes such names as J. O. Armour, William E. Corey, Robert Dollar, J. P. Morgan, J. Hill, Theodore N. Vail and Robert S. Lovett. Frank A. Vanderlip of the National City Bank will be chairman of the Board of Directors and Charles Stone of Stone & Webster, of Boston, will be president of the company. The plan has been approved by Secretary of Commerce Redfield. The firm of J. P. Morgan & Co. is also interested in the company. The new concern has been incorporated under the laws of New York with a charter permitting it to engage in almost any line of legitimate business. Its powers include the prospecting, exploring, or acquiring of agricultural, grazing, timber and mining properties, the ownership and operation of the companies which will develop these properties, the manufacture and sale and dealing in goods and merchandise of all kinds. It will have power to finance and operate telephone and telegraph, gas, electric lighting, and water-power systems, and to deal in securities of all kinds both foreign and domestic. Both South America and Russia are rich in undeveloped resources, and the plan of the company is to enter these fields. South America at once and Russia as soon as stable conditions permit.

Henry Ford, Who Heads New Peace Movement Among Neutrals

Mrs. Henry Ford, Who Helped Women Deluge President with Peace Telegrams

Peace Ship plan was laid before President Wilson. After the interview she said: "The President is in absolute sympathy with the peace idea, but he hesitates, lest he might be acting at the wrong time and place." The President himself was silent concerning the interview.

Ex-Secretary W. J. Bryan, who is declared by Mr. Ford and his intimate friends to be most favorably disposed toward the effort to "stop the war" is one of the first on the list of invited guests on the Peace Ship, and the promoters have strong hopes that he will accompany the expedition. Professor David Starr Jordan is also expected to be a member of the party. Acceptances have been received from so many well-known Americans that it is not unlikely that Mr. Ford, to convey the overflow of his guests properly, may charter the entire first and second cabin accommodations of another steamer to sail a week later. Among those who are said to have sent in acceptances of the invitation are such well-known peace advocates as ex-Congressman Richard Bartholdt, Senator Helen Ring Robinson of Denver, Col., the only woman senator; Mrs. Helen Loring Grenfell, ex-State Superintendent of Schools of Colorado; Mrs. Mary Wright Sewall, of the Women's Peace Conference; Rev. Charles F. Aked of San Francisco; Henry C. Morris of Chicago, who was secretary at the Hague Arbitration Conference; Mrs. Joseph Fels of Philadelphia, Miss Helen Keller, Frederick C. Howe, Immigration Commissioner, and Mrs. Howe Mrs. Anna Garland Spencer of Union Theological Seminary, Meadville, Pa., a leader in ethical culture work, Rev. Washington Gladden of Columbus, Ohio, Dean Samuel S. Marquis of St. Paul's Cathedral, Detroit, and Arthur L. Weatherby, Secretary of the Nebraskan Peace Society.

According to the program, the Peace Ship, after touching at some Danish or Norwegian port, will proceed to Stockholm, where the voyagers will be joined by a number of Americans will be chairman of the Board of Directors and Charles Stone of Stone & Webster, of Boston, will be president of the company. The plan has been approved by Secretary of Commerce Redfield. The firm of J. P. Morgan & Co. is also interested in the company. The new concern has been incorporated under the laws of New York with a charter permitting it to engage in almost any line of legitimate business. Its powers include the prospecting, exploring, or acquiring of agricultural, grazing, timber and mining properties, the ownership and operation of the companies which will develop these properties, the manufacture and sale and dealing in goods and merchandise of all kinds. It will have power to finance and operate telephone and telegraph, gas, electric lighting, and water-power systems, and to deal in securities of all kinds both foreign and domestic. Both South America and Russia are rich in undeveloped resources, and the plan of the company is to enter these fields. South America at once and Russia as soon as stable conditions permit.

The War in Europe

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

European journalist of many years' standing, military critic, staff writer of the Paris Daily Mail and Le Temps, contributor to L'Indépendance Belge

THE Greek situation is still giving trouble to both the Allies and the Teutons, and until the attitude of Greece is finally and definitely settled both sets of belligerents will be on the anxious seat.

The move being with the Allies, they sent Lord Kitchener and Denys Cochin, a member of the French cabinet, to Athens during the week to attempt to straighten out the matter. Both saw the King and the principal members of the government, and, it was announced a little later, had persuaded the Greek government to give guarantees to take no action in any sense hostile to the continued occupation of the Greek port of Salonica by the allied troops; to permit the use by such troops of the railroad running north from Salonica, and also the use of such other Greek ports and railroads as the Allies might find necessary. Further, the Greek government was to agree that, in the event the Allies were defeated in Serbian or Bulgarian territory to the north, it would permit these troops to take refuge in Greek territory, and would promise neither to disarm them nor to intern them. Also that these provisions and guarantees should apply to any Serbian troops which should take refuge in Greek territory.

The difficulty in granting these requests, from the Greek standpoint, was that the granting thereof would in principle make Greece an ally of the Allies and would, therefore, subject her to such reprisals and attacks as the victorious Teutonic and Bulgarian armies near her northern borders might choose to inflict, and thus she would not attain the end for which she has been continuously striving since the situation grew acute, namely, to preserve her neutrality and to escape from entering a conflict in which she would have comparatively little to win.

In the middle of the week London announced that the matter had been settled favorably to the Allies, and that certain special privileges of exportation from England which Greece had enjoyed and which had been temporarily withdrawn when the crisis grew acute, had been restored. Toward the end of the week, however, London again manifested uneasiness and apparent fear that after all the matter was not completely settled, or even in a fair way of so being. Rumor states that Greece at the last minute made a counter-demand on the Allies in the event of her acceding completely to their wishes. They must absolutely guarantee her against injury by the Teutonic Allies, and not make any demands on her for affirmative action of any kind until the troops of the Allies in the Salonica region number at least 600,000 men.

The Rumanian situation is also attracting great attention. This country has had its army completely mobilized for some time, and has been absolutely sphinx-like as regards its future action, and hence has been viewed with great suspicion by both sets of combatants. Russia, as the map will show, is cut off by Rumania from sending any force to the aid of the Allies and Serbia, in either Serbia and Bulgaria, and this is for the time being pocketed, as would be madness on Russia's part, attempt to force a way through Rumania, since it would be a very difficult thing to do in itself, owing to the topography of the country, and further would inevitably drive Rumania in the arms of the Central Powers.

Russia has, however, assembled, it is said, an army of about 250,000 on the northeast border of Rumania, and the Czar, according to reports, has sent a personal telegram to the king of Serbia promising him that this army would be on the march to relieve him within a week. If this is true, Russia must have made some arrangement with Rumania of which we know nothing as 250,000 is by far too small a number with which to attempt to hew a way by force. Berlin declares that precautions have been taken to deal with such an emergency.

It is very difficult to get any clear idea of the real situation in the Balkans outside of the military movement since all our news is subjected to severe

Continued on page 1259

THE "MIDWAY" A NEW "CHAMPS ELYSEES." After the Chicago Exposition of 1893 the celebrated Midway was added to the Chicago park system, and various schemes for its development have been proposed. Boulevards traverse each side. Between the boulevards there has been a mile-long depression, the old level of the Midway. This depression now is to be made a lagoon and will be spanned by three monumental bridges designed to interpret the sciences, the arts and religion. Beside the canal on each side will be placed statues of the world's greatest idealists. At the western end will be a fountain typifying time and at the eastern end one typifying the creation. The whole setting will be under the direction of Mr. Lorado Taft, the art mentor of Chicago.

MISSIONARY GIVING AS A STIMULUS. At the Pittsburgh convention of the Laymen's Missionary Movement, statistics from Allegheny County, Pennsylvania, were presented, which are an absolute answer to the criticism that foreign missions impoverish the home church. In the ten years since 1904 the churches of Allegheny County increased their contributions to foreign missions by $150,000 and to home missions by $300,000, while the increase in the current revenue of the local churches was $600,000.

HIGH FINANCE DISCOURAGED. On November 19, B. Munday, who with William Lorimer, ex-senator from Illinois, and others was charged with conspiracy in connection with the wrecking of the La Salle Street Trust and Savings Bank in Chicago, was found guilty by a jury and sentenced five years in Joliet prison. The trial of ex-Senator Lorimer will come next.

FOR A FEDERATED AMERICA. Speaking in Baltimore, Md., to the National Association of Creditors on November 23, Joseph W. Folk, chief counsel of the Interstate Commerce Commission and former governor of Missouri, suggested that world peace could follow a federation of the Americas and that after this would come a federation of European countries, and then a federation of the world. He predicted at the time would come when the world would be governed by right instead of by might, by humanity and justice instead of by force, and then the peace of the world would be kept by an international police force and an international navy under the direction of a world parliament.

THE FLAG OF THE F-4. In a locker where sea water and acid from the boat's batteries had faded all color was found the ensign of the lost submarine F-4. The tattered piece of cloth has now been placed under glass in the office of Secretary of the Navy Daniels.

ORPHANS FOR THE ARMY. Many people have wondered what becomes of the orphans who are never adopted and who finally grow to maturity in the various asylums. The report of the Children's Aid Society in New York shows that since the organization was founded in 1853 more than 7,000 orphans were placed in the army and navy of the United States. During the same length of time the society has rescued and placed homes 31,423 orphans and deserted children, has provided remunerative situations in the country for 29,000 older boys and girls, and has restored 12,196 runaways to parents.

PURIFYING THE ADS. A delegation of the Associated Advertising Clubs of the World on November 23 appeared before the Federal Trade Commission in support of the proposition that dishonest advertising is unfair competition and therefore is within the regulatory power of the Federal Trade Commission. The advertising clubs have succeeded very well in closing the columns of the newspapers and magazines to dishonest advertising questionable copy now finding itself barred in all reputable publications. The United States mails are still the vehicle for a great deal of fraudulent and misleading advertising which is sent direct to the people, much of it is not amenable to the postal regulations and cannot be stopped by that department. But if the Federal Trade Commission finds its authority sufficient, it may be able to protect the public from the misrepresentations to which it is now subject through the mails.

FAIR PLAY FOR THE INDIAN. In spite of the mistakes which mark the history of the relations of the white man with the Indian, the remnants of the original American stock are saving themselves capable of taking an honored place as citizens of the nation which has succeeded to their birthright. Oklahoma the Indian is now a citizen, and there is no activity in which white men excel that is not marked by a comparable success on the part of the Indian. It is now proposed to give all of the Indians in the United States full American citizenship, and as the first remedial step to place the administration of Indian affairs beyond the control of politics by establishing a Federal non-partisan commission. Oklahoma, thousands of full-blooded Cherokees, Chickasaws, Choctaws, Creeks and Seminoles are operating well-placed farms and supporting adequate and well-equipped schools. The Navajo Indian blanket industry last year reached a total of one-quarter of a million dollars, and sixty thousand Indian boys and girls were last year being educated in special schools conducted like our public schools. There are now 350,000 Indians in the United States and 25,000 in Alaska.

PARTLY CONSTITUTIONAL. In an action in the Federal District Court in New York, November 20, Judge Hough held that part of the new Seaman's Act which requires that steam vessels of United States registry of more than a hundred tons burden, and sailing on a voyage of more than a hundred miles, shall carry three licensed mates. Judge Hough said that it was no valid objection to the constitutionality of a congressional act to show that it was harsh or oppressive, for the power to regulate implied the power to destroy in part, and the power of Congress to regulate commerce was plenary.

FREEDOM OUR HIGHWAYS. One hundred years ago almost all good highways were toll roads. As the states have been building over the highways and maintaining them, the tollgate has become less and less a feature of our turnpikes. On November 1, the Board of Freeholders of Bergen County, N. J., took over the title to the Bergen turnpike, a toll road since 1802.

STATUS OF THE SMALL FARM. Independence on ten acres, or perhaps on forty, has been a dream of many Americans, city-bred and otherwise, who have longed for the freedom of the country. After an exhaustive investigation into present farm conditions, the Department of Agriculture at Washington is about to issue a bulletin which will show that the small farm is not an economic success. The department declares that "very small farms are difficult to make successful anywhere, and it is only the exceptional man who is equal to the task. They must always be devoted to the most intensive types of farming, and the products of most kinds of intensive farming fluctuate greatly in volume and price, so that the business is very insecure. The danger is greatly magnified if the small farm is situated a long distance from the market, for prices for their products do not have to fall very far until the transportation charges wipe out all profits. Even in the vicinity of the better markets these small farms succeed only in localities where they have distinct advantages for the particular type of farming which they follow."

NEW AERIAL FEAT. A Swedish aviator, Victor Carlstrom, the day after Thanksgiving landed in New York after a 600-mile flight from Toronto in six hours and forty minutes, an average rate of a mile and a half a minute. The machine reached an altitude of from 5,000 to 7,000 feet in the course of the journey, and carried almost a thousand pounds in addition to the aviator.

WOMEN PUSH THEIR SUFFRAGE CAMPAIGN. A petition signed by 500,000 women voters of the West is to be KILLING BIRDS IS COSTLY. According to Colonel G. C. Shields, president of the League of American Sportsmen, the destruction of birds costs the United States a billion dollars a year. He said that cotton-growers lost annually one hundred million dollars; wheat-growers, another hundred million by the chinch bug and two hundred millions by the Hessian fly. One quail killed in Ohio had 1,200 chinch bugs in its craw, and another killed in a Kansas wheat field had 2,000 Hessian flies. Colonel Shields said that potato-growers pay seventeen million dollars a year for Paris green, and that a quail slain in Pennsylvania had 127 potato bugs in its craw. He said the work of destroying birds in this country might be gauged by the fact that there are ten million shotguns in use, burning six hundred million cartridges a year.

REVENUE THE CHIEF ISSUE. President Wilson was reported on November 24 to have completed his message to be presented to Congress on December 7. The propositions which the President is reported to be ready to present are: the strengthening of the army in accordance with the plans outlined by Secretaries Garrison and Daniels; a merchant marine bill, rural credits legislation, ratification of the Haytian, Colombian, and Nicaraguan treaties; a greater measure of self-government to the Philippines; conservation measures which failed of final passage at the last session; amendment of the anti-trust law so as to allow the use of common selling agencies abroad by American exporters; legislation to protect the American market against the dumping of cheap foreign products following the European war; and the establishment of a budget system for co-ordinating expenditures and revenues.

Underneath and co-ordinated with each of these suggestions, however, is the question of revenues. The present revenues of the government are not sufficient. Increase in revenues must come through higher duties, additional taxes, or the issue of bonds. The President, it is stated, is making no recommendations and is leaving it to the Congress to provide the revenue for the program which he outlines.

ORDERS FOR MUNITIONS MAY STOP. On November 23 the New York Times published a special cable from London to the effect that the output of munitions in England and France had now reached a stage which makes the Allies independent of other supplies, and that it is unlikely that any further contracts will be placed in America. Some days ago the dispatches indicated that a great deal of the munitions manufactured in America had been found unfit for use and a great deal of difficulty has been experienced in transporting American materials to the foreign battlefields, American terminals now being jammed with freight for which there are no ships available. The British and French have been pushing the erection of new munitions factories with great vigor, and in a recent interview Lord Murray declared that more than one million men and women were at work in England producing guns, shells and other munitions.

A NEW MOWING MACHINE PLANNED. It was recently publicly declared that before the war ends science will have made war too terrible a thing to contemplate. Pretty soon we can be mowing down men by the thousands, or even millions, almost by pressing a button. And lest the war finds us unprepared we are advised to increase the capacity of our munitions plants to twice the output of all other countries combined. Interesting, isn't it? Besides which, one inventor on the new Naval Board has perfected a machine that digs a trench 225 feet long, three feet wide and six feet deep in an hour. That's the kind of plow you need for the crop that will be reaped by those new mowing machines.

BACK TO THE COUNTRY. In Columbus, Ohio, from December 8 to 10, the Commission on Church and Country Life of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America will discuss the problems of rural churches of all denominations, not the least of which appears to be the fixing of a minimum annual salary for country ministers; and a recommendation that this shall be one thousand dollars may be made. Questions of training for country pastors in practical agricultural subjects, utilization of churches as social centers, and practically every country church problem will be treated by experts from all over the country. President Wilson is scheduled to address the conference on the evening of December 10.

DISASTROUS TORNADO. The thickly settled farming section east of Hot Springs, Arkansas, felt the brunt of a tornado which on November 25 did considerable damage in various sections. In Arkansas twelve persons were killed and many more were injured by the force of the storm and in the ruins of their homes. Hot Springs itself escaped. Reports are incomplete at the time of going to press and additional fatalities may be discovered.

MAY HAVE TO ALTER FLAG. Congress is to be asked to apply for statehood for Alaska by Delegate James Wickersham, with special arrangements for Federal administration of government properties there; a naval base at some Alaskan port may also be proposed.

SECOND DEFECTIVE INFANT CASE. With the Bollinger incident still unsettled in the public mind, a somewhat similar case has occurred in New York. A child was born with a malformation of the spinal cord which produced complete paralysis of the lower half of the body. The child was taken to the Babies' Hospital for examination, and specialists declared that an operation might shorten the child's life, therefore none was performed. It is stated that this malformation is not uncommon and that few children so born live to maturity. It appears that the mind of this baby was normal and the case is not identical with the Bollinger case of Chicago.

THANKFUL FOR WHAT THEY LOST. Thanksgiving Day festivities in New York City included, besides their annual feast provided for hundreds of the poor by the Salvation Army, a "water-wagon parade" in which men who had been reclaimed from the power of drink marched as living epistles of thanksgiving. The enormous facsimile of a whiskey bottle shown in the illustration on this page marched in the parade dragging its ruined victims behind it, as a most impressive object lesson. The Life Saving Squad of the organization enlisted hundreds of redeemed drunkards for the exhibition.

Brand Whitlock, American Minister to Belgium, Who Has Returned with Mrs. Whitlock to America presented to Congress and the President by the Women Voters' Envoys of the Congressional Union for Woman Suffrage. The petition has to do with the Susan B. Anthony Federal suffrage amendment.

A Remarkable Ocular Demonstration of the Impudent Power of Drink

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is published weekly by The Christian Herald, at the Bible House, Fourth Avenue, 8th and 9th Sts., New York City. The Officers are: Otto Koehn, President and Treasurer, Bible House, N. Y. City; Geo. H. Sanborn, Vice President, Bible House, N. Y. City; Theodore Waters, Secretary, Bible House, N. Y. City.

FOREIGN POSTAGE.—For copies mailed outside

the United States, Canada and Mexico add one dollar a year to subscription price.

CHANGE OF DATE.—It takes at least two weeks to change the date, after your subscription is renewed.

EXPIRATION OF SUBSCRIPTION.—The date on the wrapper indicates when your subscription ends.

CHANGE OF ADDRESS.—It requires three weeks' time to make the change. Give both old and new address.

LETTERS should be addressed, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

Entered at Post Office, New York, as Second-class Matter Entered as Second-class Matter at the Post Office Department, Ottawa

The Word Made Flesh

A SERMON BY REV. RICHARD BRAUNSTEIN*

TEXT: Luke 2:52. "And Jesus increased in wisdom and stature and in favor with God and man."

THE twenty-fifth day of December is the red-letter day in our calendars and our lives. Christmas is a magic name to make glad the hearts of men. It is as if the golden age had come for a week at least. The multitudes are arrayed in holiday attire and busy with play. It is the season of good will unto all. As James Whitcomb Riley says, "There's a feel in the air." There is a tonic influence permeating the atmosphere and the world is stirred to deeds of kindness and benevolence. That mysterious, subtle, illusive yet ever present something called the Christmas spirit steals across the cold heart of man like the breath of an advancing summer, and warms it with the passion of a great love, which finds expression in ministering to the needs of others. That atmosphere, which is suggestive of

"Christmas bells, Christmas trees, Christmas odors on the breeze," stirs mankind to the depths and fosters a spirit of fellowship and brotherhood. The hearts of the young are made merry and old men and women become as little children. A new birth is given to the affections, and otherwise dormant faculties are aroused and splendid deeds are done in the name of Him who was born on Christmas Day. The poor are made happy, the hungry are fed, the sorrowing are comforted, and discouraged individuals are given a new strength. Love, that all-important factor in the energetics of the Kingdom, prevails because of the God incarnate whose other name is Love. There is joy in the world because the Lord has come.

Christ, the Lord, the King of Glory, has come down to earth. Let this be the theme of all our preaching and teaching. Let this be the theme of all our sacred song. Let all the people learn this great truth, that God has come down to the level of humanity so that humanity may be lifted up to God's level. That is the philosophy of Christianity. That is the central truth of the incarnation. Whatever else men may say about it, it is this, God has left his throne to come to earth, to dwell among men. We should never grow weary in telling this story, so that Jesus shall grow in favor with all mankind. And he is called "Emmanuel," which means "God with us." God with us here for a little while so that we may be with him in eternity. He came to save the world from its sin. He came to seek and to save the lost. The angels proclaimed his arrival to the shepherds and made known to them that the Supreme Shepherd had come to bring the lost sheep back into the fold.

God came as a Saviour. As soon as he arrived he began to knock at men's hearts. Great is this condescension of God, to stand at our hearts' doors seeking admission. Marvelous the infinite patience of God, that he still stands knocking. He can break down the doors if he so chooses, but that is not God's way. He will not come in unless we open. That is the patience of God. He is waiting for us. The latch is on the inside. Let it not be said that there is no room in the inn of our hearts. In the Kensington Museum, in England, there is a picture of the great Dr. Johnson sitting at the door of royalty waiting to gain admission to the presence of his king. But here is Jesus the King seeking admission to the throne-room of the subject. "The order is reversed," says a recent writer. "It is the prayer of Jesus that we open. We very often wonder whether our prayers shall be answered. Do we make any effort to answer this prayer of Jesus?"

THE finest gift we can give is the gift of ourselves. Christmas means that God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son. It was the gift of self. The Christmas spirit means that we give not alone the material gifts which we bestow upon our loved ones and the earth's poor and needy, but that we also give ourselves.

"Not what we give, but what we share,
For the gift without the giver is bare."

Our obligation to the other man is measured by the need of the other man. We are to love as Jesus loved. We must touch the world as Jesus touched the world. It was a personal touch. Organized Christianity we are told is losing the personal note.

The world is not so much in need of a delegation, or a committee, but a man; not so much an organized brotherhood, but a brother.

"You sing like a nightingale," someone said to a young woman on the eve of discouragement. The words of appreciation were what she needed. After that she attacked the intricacies of her art with a new vigor, and she succeeded beyond her expectations. Dedicating her voice to the Master's use, she is today singing the gospel story and wooing many into the Kingdom by her sacred melody. "A kiss from my mother made me a painter," said Benjamin West, the artist. When as a mere boy he brought to her his first crude conception of art, she rewarded his effort with the kiss that sent him forth on his great career. We are trying to bring heaven on earth. We are trying to make this Christmas spirit a matter of a lifetime. We are holding conventions, making and passing resolutions and discussing ways to make our ideal possible. Jesus said, "I am the way." We must learn his method. We must absorb his teaching. His word, his method, his art, must be incarnated in his followers and made flesh.

A Scotchman was once asked if he expected to get to heaven. "Why, man," said he, "I live there!" If we wish to live in a heavenly atmosphere we must do heavenly things. If we would teach the world about Jesus Christ, we must know more about Jesus Christ. If we would bring the Christmas spirit into the lives of others, we must have it in our own lives. "The kingdom of heaven is within you." Our own personal development is a by-product of service for the Kingdom.

TOLSTOY once said to a young man who was visiting him: "Young man, if you wish to make the world better you must be better." If we would make the world better we must know Jesus Christ better. Said a devoted layman to his pastor a short time ago: "What a wonderful thing it would be, if the multitudes who celebrate Christmas would only become true devoted followers of Jesus and adhere to his principles and teachings throughout the year." What a wonderful thing it would be for the world, if the multitudes could catch the contagion of the character of Jesus this Christmastide and forever after regard his birthday as their spiritual birthday! That was a turning-point in the life of Philip Embury, the father of American Methodism, when he wrote in his Bible: "On Christmas Day in the year 1752 the Lord shone into my soul by a glimpse of his redeeming love, being an earnest of my redemption in Christ Jesus, to whom be glory forever and ever. Amen." It would be a turning-point in the lives of many if they could discover Jesus this Christmas season, not as a mere sentiment, not as a passion for the hour, not as the dispenser of the loaves and fishes, but Jesus the Son of God, the Saviour of the world! Jesus, the same today as twenty centuries ago! Jesus, the great lover of men and friend of sinners!

The Gift of Gifts

THOU Blessed Son of God, once lowly lying.

A little Babe in human form.
Gird us weak-hearted with thy strength undying
With thy pure love our service warm.

May we to thee bring worship purer, sweeter.

Than did the shepherds, Lord, of old;
Make haste afar, with gladder steps and fleet,
Thy healing tidings to unfold.

Thou unto whom the Magi brought their treasure

The Child divine, our glorious king,
Grant us, in richer love, in fuller measure,
Our offerings to thy shrine to bring.

To thee, O Bethlehem's Babe, who never diest,

Sing we the angels song again:
"To God on high be glory in the highest:
On earth be peace, good will to men."

High glory be to God for love that sought us.

Low, selfish, all defiled by sin;
And gave the Gift that health and life hath brought us—
His blessed Son, our peace to win.

Let peace, on every troubled spirit resting,

In beauty bloom o'er all the earth;
With changeless strength the ransomed be investing.
Lord Christ, because of thy blessed birth.

RICHARD ARNOLD GREENE

Jesus, the comforter of the sorrowing! Jesus, the restorer of the soul! Jesus, the door to the kingdom of heaven, which is ever open to all believers! Jesus, the hope of all mankind!

Lord Kelvin, the famous scientist, was once asked by an interviewer to name his greatest discovery. He said: "My greatest discovery was Jesus." When men discover Jesus they discover themselves. They discover the value of their souls. They learn the value of other people's souls. Men are never the same after they discover Jesus. Their viewpoint is changed. A new star appears on their horizon. They steer by that star. They no longer ask the world what it can do for them, but they ask the world what they can do for it. They are no longer concerned with the question, "What would Jesus do?" They are endeavoring to learn, "What would Jesus have me do?"

When men discover Jesus they discover their duty toward their neighbor. Wonderful the spirit that sent David Livingstone to Africa, Morrison to China, Judson to Burma, and a host of others to the four points of the compass, in answer to the question, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" Because men and women are discovering Jesus every day, because they are learning the meaning of Jesus' birth, and what a great factor it is in God's plan for the world, they are discovering the poor, the needy, the erring, the lost sheep, and they are bringing them back to the fold. They are determined, with a zeal and enthusiasm and a consecration that will not down, to tell the world the story of redemption. They are putting themselves beneath the burdens of the world and are lifting them with the great lever of God's love. Because they are learning at the feet of the great Teacher sent from God, they are teaching the world how to live better.

A better world is the result of a better knowledge of God. They are interpreting the Christmas spirit to all men. They are making Christmas perpetual. Because they are laboring on, and are never daunted, they are saving the world. In the words of William Carey, they are "attempting great things for God and by their faith they are 'expecting great things from God,'" and as David Livingstone said concerning himself, so can it be said of all who are preaching the unsearchable riches, "their lives are charmed until they are done."

THE day will come when a saved world shall last, much spent in doing good, move toward the Father's house. Jubilant the warriors of the Cross, when, returning victorious from the sweet fight of faith, they shall gather around the table of God's abundance! It shall be the Christmas season on high, when those who have fought a good fight and kept the faith shall receive God's praise. They shall not see the evergreens, symbols of immortality and famed legendary lore and story, but they shall gather around the "tree of life." Not festive tapers but the "Light of the World." Not the Yule log, but the warm and cheer of a heavenly atmosphere. Not the choir of earth singing their hymns of nativity and joy, but the angelic hosts of heaven singing the anthems and doxologies of the redeemed.

We are looking forward to that great day on high with a great anticipation. There are countless multitudes whose hearts are sad at this season, for Christmas is not without its sighs and tears. The notes of sorrow blend with the notes of joy. Many loved ones and dear friends shall not gather with us as usual. Memory is busy. We walk through the dream-corners of our yesterdays and everywhere there are pictures. We can scarcely see them, for a mist before our eyes. In the sentiment of Charles Lamour, we are thinking of those who have gone out on the great adventure.

"All, all are gone, the old familiar faces."

But a short while ago they went across the threshold which is between life on earth and life in heaven. They left our presence to be in the presence of God. Tomorrow we too shall pass on and be with them in the other room. There is another world. Jesus, born on Christmas Day, came to earth to tell us of a place where joy and peace and rest may be had. "In my father's house are many mansions; if it were not so I would have told you. I go to prepare a place for you." He is preparing that place now. Heaven is a prepared place for a prepared people. The grave is not a terminus. It is a thoroughfare. With a loving hand, and with a great love, God still gives. His crowning gift is immortal life.

* Pastor M. E. Church, Olive Bridge, N. Y.

Daily Meditation

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR. LED BY

J. H. JOWETT, D.D., F. B. MEYER, D.D., REV. E. WHITTIER CASWELL AND CLAYTON SEDGWICK COOPER

The Things of Others

SUNDAY, December 12. Phil. 2:4. "Look not every man on his own things, but every man also on the things of others." It has been happily said of Henry Drummond that he was so deeply interested in you that you never learned anything about himself. He had the power of losing himself in the interest of others, and for the simple reason that he found other people more interesting than himself. But to really see other people requires a very fine sight. Indeed, it requires more an intuition than a perception; it is more an instinct than an inference. There is a rare power of apprehension which is known as "understanding." We say to some poor soul who has been pouring out before us some tale of sorrow, "Yes, I understand. I understand!" But the understanding does not mean a mental comprehension of her affairs; it means rather a fellow-feeling with her grief. We are sympathetically drinking of the cup that she drinks of, and she knows that we have tasted her bitterness. Now it is that exquisiteness of feeling, fine as a divining-rod in its discernment of the hidden pools, which is imperatively needed, if we are to look on the things of others.

It is, therefore, no wonder that this word is also spoken of Henry Drummond, that "in his dealings with a fellow man, no one had a more delicate realization of his confidant's personality." He knew what was in man. He could feel a young man's seriousness behind an assumed frivolity. He could discern the spiritual dryness behind the forced laughter. He knew when there was tragedy in the heart, even when there was comedy on the immediate stage.

And how can we get this divining-rod of spiritual intuition? First of all, it is a gift of grace. We can nourish it, we can not create it. It is like every other kind of lofty vision; it comes only with a pure heart. It is a sensitiveness which accompanies spiritual cleansing. And therefore we must do as Drummond did; we must turn to the Lord and ask and receive the cleansing of his grace. And having obtained the cleansing, our sight will not be limited to "that which is near"; we shall see God, and we shall have the talent of profound communion with our brother.

J. H. J.

When We See Him Face to Face

MONDAY, December 13. Isa. 52:1-15. "His visage was so marred more than any man." In the primitive church these words were interpreted literally, and it was supposed that our Lord had no attraction of personal beauty. Justin Martyr, quoted by Dr. Geikie, speaks of him as without beauty and attractiveness and of mean appearance. Tertullian says that he had not even earthly human beauty, or less heavenly. But later in church history those conceptions gave place to one which exalted his attractiveness to the utmost, as the natural expression of the divine purity and perfection of his inner being. The imagery of the Song of Solomon is applied to his person, no less than to his doctrine; and also the words of Psalm 45—"Thou art fairer than the children of men." Art has endeavored to delineate the features of our Lord, but one always feels that the highest conception is not sufficient, because no mortal could ever reproduce the fulness of grace and truth when the Word was made flesh and dwelt among men.

If his face became marred, it was because of the grief that mourned over the obstinacy and refusal of mankind; and the marring could only be like that which we have seen making havoc of the once beautiful faces of mothers or wives—the sign that their heart has become well-nigh broken. Some day, however, we shall see that face for ourselves, not veiled of dust, but of the ethereal texture of the resurrection body. We shall see him as he is. We shall see his face, and his name shall be on our foreheads. At that glad hour we shall behold the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ. Probably the first symptom that we have got through the act of dying will be to find ourselves gazing on the face of the Man Christ Jesus, radiant with deity.

F. B. M.

Time and Its Treasures

TUESDAY, December 14. Job 7:6. "My days are swifter than a weaver's shuttle." A young man who was speaking of being too busy to spend a half hour each day in reading something worth while was asked to make out a list of his regular duties with the time required for each. He found that he had at his disposal four hours and a half unaccounted for every day. Here was time for many a great man to have secured an education, utilizing the bits of wasted time to some definite purpose, "keeping his eye on the watch." If any one thinks that he does not have hours to spend each day on a purpose of heart or mind culture, let him make a system of his day's work. He will find that he has much time for the things that he really wants to do.

"Seize your opportunity!" was the advice of Pitacus, one of the seven wise men of Greece. To grasp the swiftly moving moment is the repeated injunction of the Bible. "Teach me to number my days," said Moses. "Make me to know mine end and the number of my days," said David; and Job, who had a peculiarly sane grasp on the things that make for success in all departments of life, is conscious that the days fly through his hands "swifter than the weaver's shuttle."

Lord Chesterfield said that the Duke of Newcastle lost an hour in the morning and spent the rest of the day looking for it. Benjamin Constant's cry of regret should be a warning to us who do not regard the systematizing of our day's task: "How I lose my time! what an unarrangeable life mine is!"

The uncertainty of life as well as its swift passage should incite us to live to the top of our ability today. We say, "Some day I hope to get time to read," "Some day I hope to get time to attend to cultivating religious habits." But "some day" is today—or probably never.

Now is the time to act,
Now is the time to fight,
Now is the time to make myself a better man.
If today you are not ready,
Will you be tomorrow?"

C. S. C.

The Way the Saints Must Pass

WEDNESDAY, December 15. John 16:23-33.

"Be of good cheer; I have overcome the world." "The world" is defined in I John 2:16. After enumerating her three daughters, the apostle goes on to say: "All that is in the world . . . is not of the Father," i. e., does not originate or proceed from him. We may surely reverse this sentence and say that all which does not emanate in or return to God is "the world." In this sense, it is not primarily a thing, nor a collection of people, but an influence, a spirit, a fashion that passes away, like the scenery of a theater. It is what we call society; the consensus of fashionable thinking and acting; the life that finds satisfaction in the seen and transient; the ambition which is encircled by the rim of an earthly horizon; the aims, plans, and activities which, as the Preacher says, are comprehended "under the sun." John Bunyan depicts the world as a woman. "She wears a great purse at her side, and her hand is constantly fingering her money. Yea, she has bought off many a man from a pilgrim's life, after he had fairly begun it. None can tell the mischief she does."

But our Lord stood steadfast against the spirit of his age. He contemned all that the world held dear, and extolled what she despised. Wherever he touched it, there was conflict and collision. So it will be with all who will live godly lives. "As the pilgrims entered Vanity Fair, all the people were moved, and the town was in a hubbub. They did not believe them to be other than bedlams and mad. Therefore they took them, and beat them, and besmeared them with dirt, and put them in a cage." Are you passing through a similar experience? Be of good cheer, and let your heart be at peace. This is the way the saints must pass to Paradise!

F. B. M.

What Kind of Possessions

THURSDAY, December 16. Isa. 55:2. "Wherefore do ye spend money for that which is not bread? and your labor for that which satisfieth not?" What kind of possessions are we working for? Are they those that lie below the level of our highest nature? If so, we are sure to meet with the dissatisfaction of which the prophet speaks.

A lady who possesses millions said in my hearing recently, "I have three homes and six automobiles and every physical comfort, yet I am wretchedly unhappy. It seems as though I would be willing to give them all for a friend who really cared for me, just for myself—a true friend."

A man of affairs, who has every mark of material success, told me, "I am the most lonely and friendless man in New York."

Why were these people dissatisfied? In both cases, I am quite certain, it was because they had spent their money for that which was not bread; they had lived for self; they had failed to show themselves friendly.

It is a sad thing to atrophy at the top of one's being. It is a sad thing to shut up one's nobler self in a room too small for the soul. It takes more than comfortable things to make comfort. The wings of the swiftest automobile cannot carry a man away from himself. Are we making new friends? Are we helping things along? What things have we done the past year that will live on in other lives made better by our presence? Are we like these two, this man and this woman, who could simply say,

"I lived for myself, I thought for myself,
For myself and none beside;
Just as if Jesus had never lived,
As if he had never died."

In ancient Athens there was a law that any man who had a lighted candle and refused to allow another to light his candle at it, should be put to death. A greater law exists in our souls, that quenches the happiness of him who fails to give.

C. S. C.

Keep the Inner Fires Burning Brightly

FRIDAY, December 17. II Tim. 1:1-10. "Stir up the gift of God which is in thee." Every believer has received the gift of the indwelling Spirit. This was directly promised by our Lord: "He dwelleth with you and shall be in you." "Know ye not," says the apostle, "that your body is the temple of the Holy Spirit which is in you?" He is in us as a fire, for such is the evident implication of the injunction to stir up, or, as the margin puts it, to stir into flame, this holy gift. In a fire, the coals cake together, and need to be broken up, so that the air may enter and ignite in a ruddy flame. Thus frequently in our experience, the presence and power of the divine Comforter seem almost dormant; and we need to apply ourselves to the exercises that will stir up the precious gift with vehement activity.

John the Baptist was a burning, as well as a shining light. Our Lord says that he prefers even coldness to lukewarmness—"I would, that thou wert hot." A convention on the deeper aspects of Christian living, a series of special prayer meetings, the call of some fervent evangelist, have often been blessed to the stirring of the languid soul-life of God's children. But we need not wait for these. If we were to set apart, now and again, whole days for God, as Henry Martyn used to do, or rise earlier in the mornings for the devotional study of Scripture, or accustom ourselves to a quicker response to the movings of God's Spirit, we should find the inner fire burning up hot and clear. Let us watch the morning-watch, and the fire would not suffer these occasional relapses.

F. B. M.

The Wonderful Gift

SATURDAY, December 18. John 1:14. "The Word was made flesh." God became man that man might become like God. God made man but a little lower than the angels; man made himself lower than the brutes. Jesus was born into manhood that man might be reborn into Godhood. Christ did not come to dwell a few years in humanity, but to unite the human with the divine in his own person forever. In him we see what man may become. He is our Brother as well as Saviour; our Fellow, Friend, Comrade and Redeemer.

Childhood delights to hover in thought over the manger cradle, remembering that the Babe of Bethlehem was a child with them. Giving Christmas presents commemorates Christ's giving himself as the unspeakable gift. The shepherds and wise men did not fully understand what the angels knew when they sang "Peace on earth and good will to men." At first he was only a beautiful, wonderful child! They could not see that he was to become the King of all kingdoms, full of grace and truth; that he came to dwell in a babe of human mold, so that he might dwell forever in human hearts; that his little hands were to wipe away all tears and sway a scepter over all realms.

E. W. C.

Our Editorial Forum

PRESIDENT
OTTO KOENIG

MANAGING EDITOR
GEO. H. SANDISON

SECRETARY
THEODORE WATERS

Taking the Tide

ONE of the most significant indications of the new era of prosperity upon which the nation has entered is the announcement of the organization of a company, with a capital of $50,000,000, for the development of the foreign trade of the United States. Simultaneously comes the news that the sale of the full amount of capital stock is already assured at par, with no promotion fees or underwriters' profits. Behind the movement are the leading banks and foremost business organizations. American capital will be employed to open the markets of the world to our business enterprise. Our mining and electrical machinery, harvesters, clothing and foodstuffs will be introduced in new fields, and American funds utilized in new developments. For a generation or more we have been behind in the race for the world's business. We shall be so no longer.

In this new age of phenomenal development, every individual citizen has a personal interest. We have seen the wondrous evolution from steam and gas to electricity, and still greater wonders await us. Electrical development is making history in the world's progress. Our entire system of mechanical and industrial methods is undergoing a transformation. New phases of life, new industrial possibilities, new occupations, comforts and conveniences are all foreshadowed, that will make the age seem more and more miraculous as it progresses. It is ours to lead the way in this world advance. We should take up the task in a generous and beneficent spirit, and not in the spirit of selfishness. With faith in God and in our nation's future, and with cordial friendship for every country under the sun, we can confidently sail out on the high tide of peaceful conquest.

Dr. Abbott and the Bible

IN these days, when statesmen are hurling Bible texts at one another for the purpose of proving or disproving the Christianity of military preparedness, one need not be surprised to find clergymen and leaders in theological seminaries taking part in the animated discussion. Human nature, cultured or otherwise, seems to be unable to resist the temptation to use the Bible as a mallet for driving home spiritual truths, if they can by any means be applied to the question of the hour. In the Outlook of November 10, Dr. Lyman Abbott lays down the principle that "it is sometimes Christian to fight; and it is sometimes un-Christian not to do so." It is true, there are plenty of passages in the Bible that recognize war as an existing fact, but it is doubtful if a single passage can be found commending or upholding it. When Jesus said to Pilate, "My kingdom is not of this world; if my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight," he taught non-resistance to evil not only in a spiritual sense but in a physical also. He taught his followers not only to love one another, but to love even their enemies and to forgive them. The great underlying principle of the Christian religion is that its triumph must come not by physical violence in any form, but by its appeal to the hearts and consciences of men, and through the awakening of that spirit of brotherly love and kindness which would subdue the natural passions and make love king over all.

Jesus taught the higher citizenship, which recognizes universal brotherhood and kinship. To say, as Dr. Abbott does, that the language of Christ, when he said "I come not to send peace but a sword," is to be accepted as implying that Jesus was the harbinger of war and strife, is only to half interpret the meaning. He foresaw that the introduction of the divine law of love and forgiveness would encounter antagonism; that it would be resisted by wars among the nations; that before it was accepted finally there must be many martyrs, and that all the worst passions of men would be aroused to oppose the Gospel.

It is a matter of record that the early Christians refused even to bear arms, and that not until 300 years had passed and Christianity was about to become a state religion, was the Christian doctrine perverted to accommodate the ambitions of the ruling powers, who desired to turn the population into a huge fighting machine. The "early fathers" were uniform in their denunciations of war. Origen, Ambrose, Chrysostom, Jerome, Cyril, all declared it to be unlawful for Christians to go to war. Justin Martyr (in the second century) wrote, "The devil is the author of all war," to which both Fabian and Clement gave assent in terms almost identical. Cyprian called it "a pagan custom, repugnant to the spirit of the Gospel." Tertullian wrote, "Our religion teaches that it is better to be killed than to kill," and Lactantius declared, "It can never be lawful for a righteous man to go to war, whose warfare is righteousness itself." For two whole centuries, Christians declined to serve in the army as being an unlawful profession, and Tertullian bears witness that from 170 to 200 A.D. there were no Christians in the Roman legions. They were called "the followers of peace, who used none of the instruments of war." Even as late as 280 A.D. many Roman soldiers, becoming converts to Christianity, left the army. Thus it is clearly shown that not until the Christian Church became an arm of the Roman state was it led to forsake God and the life of faith and become an instrument of deadly strife. Since that time "Christian war," under the church's sanction, has added to the world's disgrace. To this all history testifies in the Crusades, the inquisitions, the martyrdoms, and the massacres of past centuries, up to the present time of gigantic fleets and armies and bloodsoaked battlefields, with the millions who have perished by consent and approval of the Christianity of our day. The Church, commissioned to go into all the world and preach the Gospel, has preached it with shot and shell and bayonet, and with every available weapon in air, on land and on the sea. The law of Cain has usurped the law of Christ, and the Church has lost one of the greatest claims it had upon the hearts and consciences of men, by leading its followers into the acceptance of war as a glorified and sanctified thing, instead of being a sin against God and humanity.

Congressman Tavenner's Quest

THERE is now a strong probability that Congress will be asked to investigate the whole subject of the Navy League, its personnel, its purpose and its methods, early during the coming session. Congressman Clyde H. Tavenner of Illinois, in various articles and public addresses, has made the charge that behind the League is "a great aggregation of persons whose chief aim in advocating additional defense is to increase the work of munition plants." His statements having been challenged by Colonel Robert E. Thompson, president of the League, Mr. Tavenner now announces his purpose of introducing a resolution which will be accompanied by bills for the creation of government munitions plants, "so that the stimulus of huge profits would be withdrawn from the munition makers who are now advocating a program of preparedness." Such an inquiry as is proposed should be taken up and pushed vigorously, in order that the administration and the country may know the real facts in the case. Certainly, if it be true, as the congressman has repeatedly charged and as many people sincerely believe, that there is a combination of capitalists behind the munitions traffic who are more interested in profits than patriotism, the fact should be established beyond all question, and the legislative remedy applied by Congress without loss of time. The American nation is long-suffering, but it will not stand the exploitation of its resources by organized greed, which is precisely what the Illinois representative has declared is now being done. Let the whole truth come out, no matter who is hurt. Whether the result be vindication or condemnation, a full, unbiased inquiry will clear the atmosphere, and give the people the satisfaction for which they look to Congress and nowhere else.

California's Cheap-Food Law

FIRST among the sisterhood of states to recognize the importance of taking up the question of food prices, California has just framed a law, which has passed the legislature and received the governor's signature and which will go far toward settling the cheap-food problem. It provides for the creation of a State Commission Market, under a single commissioner, to receive the farm, dairy, fruit and fish products of the state and sell them on commission. It is a measure designed to protect the farmer, the orchardist, the poultry-raiser, the fisherman from the rapacity of the middleman, who, under the old system, kept up prices to the retailer and consumer, and robbed the producer of his legitimate profits. The commissioner is empowered to establish depots or stations at suitable points for the sale of products to retailers and consumers direct; to make rules for the running of such markets; to make reasonable charges for the state's services; to retain commissions on sales, and to provide all necessary conveniences for local transportation and handling of products. It is a radical measure, in the sense that it goes right to the heart of the trouble. Senator W. E. Brown, the author of the bill, has set a worthy precedent to other public-spirited legislators.

Many will watch with keen interest the operation of the new law, which in all likelihood will be the forerunner of similar measures in other states, where legislation of this sort is greatly needed.

John Bollinger vs. John Doe

LITTLE John Bollinger, of Chicago, is dead, and a whole nation is stirred up about it. His physician and his mother agreed that death for him would be better than life, because life would have meant both idiocy and pain. The doctor figured, too, that the little fellow dead would be a greater asset to society than the little fellow living, for defective children are both a burden and a danger. So little John Bollinger was allowed to slip quietly out of the world upon which he had just opened his baby eyes.

Death in the abstract can be considered calmly. Even the death of multitudes can be thought of calmly unless there is something shocking or terrible about the numbers themselves or the manner of death. But death to one single individual, whose name you know, is terrible. A man who is to be executed always arouses sympathy, no matter how grievous his crime, just because the human mind cannot view calmly the death of any individual. So the death of John Bollinger stirs up the emotions, while the death of hundreds of thousands of little babies from neglect simply wearies and bewilders us. Thousands upon thousands of little lives go out every year that might be spared if society were more thoughtful, more just, more kind. Every municipality can do specific things to lower the infant death rate. Dr. Melish, of Brooklyn, put the thing in concrete shape in a recent address by saying that he had far more baby funerals south of Fulton Street than north. That is due to conditions which Brooklyn might change, as Manhattan, or Paterson, or Pittsburgh or Chicago, or any city, might change corresponding conditions. The state can change these conditions; the nation can change them.

Some things are being done to help; some will hinder. The establishment of the Children's Bureau will help; the defeat of the bill forbidding interstate commerce in child labor products will hinder. Scores of other things are hindering. Pressure of low wages, pressure of no wages when parents' jobs are gone, pressure of industrial employment of mothers; pressure of the shameful traffic in child labor in many industries; pressure of high rents and high foodstuffs and poor air; pressure of crowding and disease and dirt—all these things roll up the sad, gigantic death-roll of America's babies. But just because there are so many we do not care. Just because we do not know their names we do not care. Can we not make the vision real—not a great multitude of John Does whom we cannot see nor count, but of little people with chances of happiness and usefulness such as this little creature at Chicago could never have had. Who shall measure the grief of these needlessly stricken homes? Who shall measure the guilt of the civilization that lets these babies die?

Stop—Think—Vote!

AS the interests of our readers are OUR interest, we take this opportunity of inviting them, as we have done on previous occasions at this season, to express their preferences as to those Departments of the paper which they find most attractive and serviceable. Below we have listed the different Departments. Cut out the list, note your preferences in the lined space opposite each Department, writing the numerals, 1, 2, 3, etc. in the order of your choice, adding your name and address. Then paste it on a postal, or enclose in an envelope, and mail to The Christian Herald, Bible House, New York City.

Prayer League	Editorial Forum	—
Serial Story	Financial Department	—
Miss Sangster's Page	Young People's Societies	—
Week in World's News	Bible and Newspaper	—
Our Mail Bag	Do You Know Your Bible?	—
Meditations	Sermonic Page	—
Sunday School Page	Anthony Arnoux's War Article	—
Name
Address

The Bible and Newspaper

CONDUCTED BY
FERDINAND C. IGLEHART, D.D.

Partnership Without a Contract

THE recent death of John S. Sills, one of the oldest New York wholesale grocers, called public attention to the strange partnership between him and his associate, J. Waldo Smith, under the firm name of Smith & Sills, which existed for thirty-eight years without a bit of paper as a contract to bind them. They never had any disagreements, they never drew any stated salaries, at the close of the year they divided the profits equally, charging up to each the amount he had taken out for living expenses. This is a sample of good old-fashioned homespun honesty, where a man's word is as good as his bond. There is no honesty that is worth much that needs a piece of paper to bind it. And yet the opportunities for misunderstanding are so many that ordinarily it is safest to put it down in black and white. Despite many sharpers and frauds, our American business life has as its basis sterling honesty, with a word as good as a bond. The singular honesty of the two partners and the other admirable qualities they possessed measure up somewhat to this requirement: "Look and among you seen men of honest report, full of the Holy Ghost and of wisdom, whom we may appoint over our business." Acts 6:3.

English Language in Japan

FIVE hundred teachers of English gathered in Tokyo for their second conference recently. Of the total about five per cent. were foreigners, English and American men and women. The entire ten days of the proceedings were conducted in English, so the proficiency of the participants will be understood. In the secondary schools alone in Japan there are upward of 100,000 boys and girls studying English as a part of their course. Boys in these schools must study English seven hours each week for five years and the girls at least all that time. There are at present studying English in Japan, schools of all grades up to the universities, 200,000 boys and girls. In a few generations the English language will be almost universally spoken in Japan. With our language will go the civilization and the religion of Christ in fulfillment of the truth:

That at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, and every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father. Phil. 2:10, 11.

Hereditary Tendency to Crime

FIFTY-EIGHT blood relatives confined in penitentiaries, jails, infirmaries, institutions for feeble-minded, and industrial schools is the record of an extensive family traced out in the last year by the Ohio Juvenile Research Bureau. This family of degenerates lives in Southwestern Ohio and the lower Ohio River counties of West Virginia. Five generations of the family have been charted, including 174 individuals. Data from 261 of these show the following conditions: sixty members of the family have court records, fifteen have been in jail, fourteen in the penitentiary, nine in the infirmary, nine in children's homes, six in the workhouse, two in the Girls' Industrial Home, two in the institution for the feeble-minded, and one in the Boys' Industrial Home. Seventy-seven are immoral, seventy-four criminal in varying degrees, fifty-five feeble-minded, twenty-three alcoholic victims, twelve public women, seven with tubercular deposits, three insane, and three tramps. The crimes are all the way from murder down to the lightest misdemeanor. Most members of the family are living at large, marrying and producing large families. One of the most fearful parts of life is that parents not only compel of righteousness and love, such as the church was organized to provide, ought to take the weakest and worst sinner Christ has saved and train him into a life of usefulness and piety. The human heart with the best of lineage and most friendly environment by nature is so prone to evil that Christ and his atonement are necessary to save it from ruin. The whole system of redemption is based on the fact thus stated by the prophet: "The heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked." Jer. 17:9.)

The Holy Carpet of Islam

THE war has not interfered with the Mohammedans of Egypt in the performance of their religious rites. Every Mohammedan is compelled to pray five times in every twenty-four hours. The time for these prayers is announced by muzzins from the minarets of the mosques. There are also required fasting, abstinence from strong drink and the most generous gifts to the poor. These ceremonies would not be disturbed by the war. But the fourth paramount duty of the followers of Islam is a pilgrimage to Mecca in Arabia. This pilgrimage was made despite the difficulty. The great mosque of Mecca consists of a large quadrangle capable of holding 35,000 persons, entered by nineteen gates surrounded by seven minarets. The pilgrims paraded through the streets of Cairo with a new silk carpet decorated with gold and silver, such as is furnished each year, which is called the Mahmal or Holy Carpet, the symbol of prayer. This holy carpet was borne by the pilgrims to Mecca as an important part of their religious ritual. Afterward it was sold to the highest bidder and the money was put into the collection for the poor. Australian troops took part in keeping order, in holding the crowds in the procession and in conducting the pilgrims back to Egypt. The cardinal teachings of Mohammedanism are: "There is no God but God, and Mohammed is God's Apostle"; that there must be the completest acquiescence in God's will, which is the meaning of the word "Islam"; and a preparation for the terrific realities of the Judgment Day. At first, Mohammedanism pretended to accept the Bible and the doctrines of Christianity, including Christ as a prophet, but put Mohammed as an apostle in advance of them all. The Bible was replaced by the Koran and Christ by Mohammed, and their corrupted religion bade them put to the sword all who would not accept their faith, especially Christians, as the most exalted duty, making sure a title to heaven. The surprise is that there are two hundred and twenty million who profess Islam, 160,000,000 in Asia, 59,000,000 in Africa and 3,500,000 in Europe. Islam is not an original religion, but a corruption of Christianity. It is the theism in it that gives it its tremendous power. As error has always had to give way to the truth, the Crescent will fade before the brightness of the Cross. God's word in speaking of Christ says: "Neither is there salvation in any other: for there is none other name whereby we must be saved." Acts 4:12.)

Girl Shoots White Deer

A WHITE deer was shot in the Adirondacks the other day by Miss Marion Beatrice Fuller of DeKalb, Ill. The young lady sent the body of the deer to a taxidermist, and will probably present it to the Museum of Natural History in New York City. Professor Crane, head of the department of mammals of the museum, said to Miss Fuller: "A white deer is very rare. The museum was presented with one some twenty years ago, but it was a poor specimen." The white deer is an albino, the white pelt taking in the usual color proportions. Deer ranged the mountains of Palestine in olden times, and the hunters prized their flesh as a choice article of food. The Jewish law included venison in the food allowed: "These are the beasts that ye shall eat: the hart, and the roebuck, and the fallow deer, and the wild goat, and the pygarg, and the wild ox, and the chamois." Deut. 14:4, 5.

Nathan Hale Tablet Unveiled

TO mark the spot where Nathan Hale was executed, a bronze tablet was unveiled the other day. The spot is in the Sulzberger building at Forty-fifth Street and First Avenue. The tablet is the gift of the Mary Washington Colonial Chapter of the Daughters of the Revolution. Eulogies of the patriot were pronounced by M. J. Sulzberger, Captain W. B. Tufts, Miss Kathlyne K. Viole and others. William Lamar Washington, descendant of a relative of George Washington, was present. Of Nathan Hale, the patriot, could have been said that which was spoken to the credit of another: "For he loveth our nation." Luke 1:5.)

Betting on Football Game

NEWSPAPERS make mention of the crowds of young students and others in hotel lobbies the Friday night and Saturday morning of the Yale-Princeton football game, of the two-to-one and then four-to-one odds in favor of Princeton, and of the vast amount of money the Yale men won. The game is all right, the betting is all wrong. It is gambling of a very dangerous sort, on the same immoral plane as that of the horse races. Professionalism, perhaps necessary to the highest skill in American sport, has introduced into it all of the commercialism that it will stand. The gambling feature will have to be cut out or it will kill the games. Clean sport is good for the body, mind and soul. We will trust the integrity of the splendid college men to frown upon and stamp out all gambling at their games, and to pay attention to this injunction: "Whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report; if there be any virtue, think on these things." Phil. 4:8.)

Gives to Public $8,599,991

MRS. MARIA DEWITT JESUP, widow of Morris K. Jesup, left a net estate of $12,672,796.82. A little over four million dollars were given to relatives and eight and a half millions were bequeathed to religious, charitable, scientific and art institutions. The largest gift was one of over five million dollars to the American Museum of Natural History, of which her husband had been president and to which he gave large amounts while living. The Metropolitan Museum of Art received $150,000 in money and $175,000 worth of fine paintings.

Morris K. Jesup was one of the best men and most consecrated Christians any city ever had, and Mrs. Jesup was a worthy helpmeet and companion in benevolent service. They paid careful attention to this charge of the apostle to the rich: "That they do good, that they be rich in good works, ready to distribute, willing to communicate; laying up in store for themselves a good foundation against the time to come." (I Tim. 6:18, 19.)

The Wonder City of the Euphrates

By MAYNARD OWEN WILLIAMS—Photographs by the Author

SECOND PAPER

SOMETHING of the different types of Hittite sculpture can be seen from the photographs I am sending to accompany my second article on the great archeological discoveries at Carhemish.

One view very clearly shows the poor quality of the stone and the stiffness of the carving. Two bearded kings, or a king and a deity, dressed in narrow skirts and wearing shoes turned up at the toes, stand on the back of a lion which not only is accommodating enough to keep a stiff back for them, so that they will not lose their footing, but also, in spite of its snarling jaws, is kind enough to curl up its tail, so that it can all be carved on one slab. Other photographs show typical battle scenes, with the method of fighting from chariots. The horses, whose necks are as broad as their bodies, stride over the prostrate figure of a bearded enemy, whose side is pierced with an arrow. Possibly one of Joshua's brave followers is here represented, or some Uriah who left his own people to fight for pay in the armies of David. The reins hang in graceful curves, and the bowman has bent his weapon, before discharging his arrow between the plumed crests of his horses. In spite of the stiffness of the carving, there is considerable life and spirit shown in the scenes.

Other forms of the cruder carving are seen in the dado of mythologic scenes which faces the grand staircase to the acropolis above, where a Roman temple—a miniature edition of the famous temples at Baalbek—was built later on the original brick foundations laid by the Hittites. The god of the hunt is shown, grasping the hind leg of a wild animal. A reindeer-like animal and three others appear on the same slab. Farther on, two men try to kill a lion by picking him up by the tail and stabbing him from above. The tail, though it bears his weight, is bent into a curve. On two slabs farther down the row are two of the curious winged and animal-headed figures which so often appear in the carvings of Mesopotamian peoples of different periods. They seem to be executing some sort of an Oriental dance. The last slab of the series is that of a winged sphinx with a lion's head, a man's head, and even a bird's head, which last is situated on the end of his tail. Imagination was needed for a study of zoology in those days.

The "grand stairway" facing this mythologic group is seen in another view. Some of the sculptures which bordered the stairway were sent to the British Museum when they were first discovered in 1879. Under Turkish present-day régime, nothing can be taken out of the country, and the excavators have spent a large part of the last season in restoring the sculptures to their former positions. This may give the occasional traveler a chance to see the ruins in their own incomparable setting; but now that the site is deserted, the ruins will probably suffer from the destructive tendencies of the wandering Moslems, many of whom even today regard a carving as something to be destroyed. If Turkey, suffering defeat in the present war, loses control of this ancient site, it is by no means inconceivable that another addition may have to be built to the British Museum, and that this fine group of Hittite sculpture will some day rank with the Elgin Room in interest and completeness.

A view from the acropolis shows, on the landward side, the size and general appearance of the excavated area, and on the river side the big railway bridge, which looks ahead into the centuries instead of backward. Within the royal city no buildings are seen, for the walls above the foundation slabs were of sun-dried brick and cedar, which have perished in the burning and razing of the city.

As Mouslimee, a Railway Station in the Desert

Battle Scene. One of the Enemy Prostrate Under Chariot Horses. This Is One of the Older Pieces

Musicians and Dancers. Note Double Flute (Heads Cut Down for Later Building of Wall)

Royal Family, with Children at Play, and Nurse with Baby and Pet Animal

A SCULPTURE of extraordinary interest is that of some musicians and dancers. This carving the art of which seems to show Egyptian influence is undoubtedly one of the earliest sculptures, for later king, in building these ancient merry-makers in his wall at a place where they could not be seen, has cut off their heads. The dancer, accompanied by a boy with castanets ("bones." The flute-player has a double instrument, and the fourth player performs on an instrument almost exact like that which I saw used by Kurdish musicians at the excavators' camp. The small bowl or body of the stringed instrument is held under the right arm.

Contrast with these stiff sculptures the royal group seen in another view. Two men, evidently kings—or possibly a king and an ally—are followed by three boys with whip-tops, and four girls playing with knuckle bones, still a favorite game in Syria. A small boy, just learning to walk, leans on a staff, and a woman—possibly the queen, or perhaps a nurse—follows, carrying a baby in her arms and leading a pet animal. The veins of the arms can be seen and the carefully curled hair, like a judge's wig, is well shown, even in the flinty stone. The faces have individuality and life, though the earlier conventions were followed. The superiority of this group lies more in the skilful execution and finished carving than in marked individuality of design.

The story of the group is shown on the slabs of dolerite which bear the figure and when the hieroglyphics are translated these slabs may give an interesting insight into the daily life of the king's family. It is a long cry from the stiff kings on the lion's back to the familiar family life of the later king. The ruler no longer posed as a god, holding the beasts of the jungle beneath his feet, but pictured himself before his subjects as a husband and a father. The material out of which these figures are carved is so hard that modern tools make almost no impression on it, unless used with sufficient force to destroy the slabs. Age have scarcely dimmed the work of the royal artist, though the damp valley of the Euphrates has not the preservative qualities of the dry land of the Nile.

How many years it took the artists to produce such a work cannot be computed. Possibly several lives were sacrificed to this single group. Neither the mighty pylons of Egypt nor the marble cornices of the Acropolis were composed of such flinty rock as these Hittite carvings. The sculptor probably worked with a large number of bronze tools, picking up a newly sharpened one after each stroke, and handing the discarded tool to servants, who sometimes sharpened them on the sides of the same slab on which he was working. The web belt on the leading figure is exactly like those that are used today throughout northern Syria. In fact, the digger who unearthed the slab was wearing just such a belt when his pick uncovered this carving over two thousand years old, possibly three thousand.

THE Hittites were skilled in metal working early in their history, for their treaty with Rameses written in the thirteenth century B. C., was inscribed on a silver tablet. In their stone carving they evilently copied the method used in metal working. This probably explains why the inscriptions are in relief instead of incised, which would have been a much more simple method. The metal was worked from the back and the figures and writing were beaten out so that they appeared on the front as reliefs. The same result was accomplished on stone, only with infinite pains.

That the Hittites compared favorably with the Egyptians in intricate carving is shown by some of the beautiful seals found in the tombs. Side by side with Egyptian scarabs and cylinder seals were found Hittite seals of equal perfection. As the impression of the seal was to show in relief, the cylinders were incised with the name or sign of the owner. Three years ago no one suspected such a degree of artistic perfection in this mysterious nation, whose language no one can read.

A remarkable feature of the Hittite writing is that alternate lines read in opposite directions. Usually the first line reads from left to right, as is shown by the direction of the faces and other distinctive signs in the pictographic writing. The second line reads towards the left, the third towards the right, and so on to the bottom of the stone.

Although the first inscriptions were discovered near Hamath in 1870, by Consul A. Jackson and the Rev. Samuel Jessup, both Americans, no one has yet succeeded in solving the puzzle of the Hittite hieroglyph. Dr. Sayce has been most industrious in his attempts to decipher the language, but though he has changed his theories several times and has seemed to be near solution, success has not yet crowned his efforts. The last year, however, has doubled the number of inscriptions, and we may still see the problem solved.

AN especially fine group is that of the ministers and soldiers, marching to meet the royal group, which is just around the corner from them, and separated from them by the longest Hittite inscription ever discovered. The figures, though conventional, are of superior workmanship, the more remarkable account of the hardness of the basaltic rock. The first minister carries a spear in his left hand and an olive branch in his right. The second and third ministers carry maces and scepters. The fourth, bearing a shield and a spear, is probably a captain of the heavy infantry. This is the finest proportioned figure of any that has been found. The round shield is shown as a background for a thoroughly individual and spirited figure, though it is here shown in solemn procession and not in the heat of battle. One of the figures has a bow guard on his wrist and was evidently a chief of archers.

The Mound of Charchemish Seen from the East

Of these two groups, Mr. T. E. Lawrence, one of the two excavators, wrote to me: "These slabs are all in basalt and most beautifully wrought, with a naturalness and liveliness which is unequaled anywhere in Hittite art."

Following these ministers and commanders of troops comes a bodyguard of heavy infantry, all alike and all in the same stiff attitude. The figures are carved in poorer stone. A spear, carried in the right hand, rests obliquely across the body of each soldier and a small shield is hung behind the shoulder. The men wear high-crested helmets, such as the Greeks copied from the people of Asia Minor, possibly from the Hittites themselves. A knee-length tunic is gathered at the waist by a plain belt, and the arms are bare from near the shoulder. These soldiers probably belong to a period about eight or nine hundred years before Christ. In the corner, between the soldiers and the ministers, is a pedestal for a statue of some god. The lion heads have been broken off, and one of them was found nearly an eighth of a mile away. An animal-headed figure is crouching between the two lions, holding onto their collars.

Beyond the royal family there is the figure of a goddess, seated on a chair which is supported by a crouching lion. Following her is a procession of priestesses bearing small sheaves of grain, and acolytes carrying gazelles or other animals on their shoulders. At the rear end of this procession is the so-called "Kings' Gate," evidently of a later period. The builder of this gate threw down two magnificent inscriptions, and, cutting ridges in their backs, used them as door-sills for the gate, which was closed with cedar doors and flanked on either side by fine inscriptions, which, however, were inferior to those overthrown by the builder.

Beside this gate there is a square-bodied, bestial figure of a deity. It bears an inscription which probably tells his name. The excavators, with a facetiousness which one might not expect in enthusiastic archeologists, call him "Mr. Pot-Head Effendi."

Concluded next week with additional photographs

The Grand Stairway at Charchemish as It Appeared During the Restoration

THE Moody Bible Institute of Chicago has reached its thirtieth birthday. At its annual meeting, just held, reports showed a total enrolment of 4,536 students, 3,063 being in the Correspondence School, and 1,468 in the regular day and evening classes. Of the latter 808 were men. They represent thirty-one denominations, forty-one States and thirty-five foreign countries. Many were preparing for Sunday school and foreign missionary work, but it is noted that the greater number were preparing to become evangelists. With Chicago and vicinity as a field for practice, the students conducted or assisted at 40,895 meetings for men, women and children in churches, missions, factories, industrial clubs and in the open air. They taught 16,838 Sunday school and mission-study classes, made 20,404 personal calls in homes, lodging houses and hospitals, talked about religion with 63,552 individuals and reported 9,638 conversions. They distributed 70,770 tracts and 3,332 copies of the Gospels. The Extension Department supplied 492 evangelists, pastors and other workers to churches, and its own men held 1,500 meetings attended by about 175,000 persons. Sermons and lesson studies were syndicated to a combined circulation of 5,000,000 readers per week.

THE Clark evangelistic party of Des Moines, Iowa, are closing a very successful meeting at Athol, Kan. resulting in nearly one hundred conversions, mostly young men. Evangelist Clark has held twenty-five meetings in twenty-five months, with over thousand confessions of faith in Christ to Saviour.

MR. E. TENNYSON SMITH, of Birmingham, England, a well-known temperance evangelist and prohibition campaigner, arrived in New York on October 31 for another extended American tour. He had most successful tour here in 1904-05, when he was officially appointed from Great Britain to investigate the working of prohibition and local option in this country. He has had a wide experience in prohibition and local option campaigns, having made extended tours in Canada, Australia, two visits to South Africa, and New Zealand. He recently completed ten months' work among the troops in camps throughout England during which time, the press reports, he induced over 18,000 soldiers and sailors to sign the pledge. He may be addressed care of the International Committee of the Young Men's Christian Association, 124 East Twenty-eighth Street, New York City, by any church or organization looking forward to a winter or spring campaign.

AFTER eight years of excellent service to the little Gospel motor boat, El Heraldo Cristiano, which the readers of this journal gave to the American mission workers at Cebu, P. I., has been mustered out of service. Missionary Fred Jansen writes that with the money procured from the sale of the boat an automobile was purchased for missionary work on Bohol Island. Roads throughout the island and especially along the coast have been greatly improved of late, and tedious journeys, which formerly required two days' hard traveling can now be made in three hours.

ONE thousand men sat down on Wednesday, November 10, at the banquet which opened the Milwaukee Convention in the National Missionary Campaign. Explorer W. E. Geil, one of the speakers, told of the convictions that came to him as he met barbarous peoples who had come under the influence of missions. On the Sunday following the Convention closed with an afternoon gathering of 700 men, addressed by Dr. Harry Ward, of Boston, the prophet of "community service." The speakers, under the leadership of Dr. W. E. Doughty, thrilled Milwaukee with stories of the victories of the Cross in other lands. Milwaukee laymen attended the day sessions of the convention in large numbers. The delegates of all denominations pledged themselves to go back to their own and neighboring churches and tell the story of the convention, its inspiration and the methods it recommended. The various communions agreed to make an organized canvass for finance, for fellowship and for evangelism.

AT the end of Billy Sunday's Omaha campaign, 13,009 people had hit the sawdust trail, of whom 8,845 were adults and 4,164 juveniles. The total attendance was 750,000, and 10,000 people crowded the viaduct at the Union Station and sang "God Bless You, Brother Sunday," as the train bearing the evangelist and his party to Syracuse pulled out of the station. In the churches, on the Sundays following the campaign, many hundreds more hit the "Brussels carpet" trail to acknowledge their faith. The influence of the meetings extended to towns and cities a hundred miles from Omaha.

WILLIAM SHANNON, a retired police officer of Spokane, Wash., who died recently at his home in a suburb, did a great deal of good in his long term of service. He turned many young men and young women away from paths of vice and of danger who were thoughtless in the pursuit of pleasure. To the criminal classes he was severe. "Look out for Shannon!" was carved on rocks and trees in many places. "Ain't your name Shannon?" asked a man of him years ago. "I've seen it printed in all sorts of places and as far east as Montreal." "Keep out of these gambling houses, else I will arrest you for vagrancy," he would say to the sons of the rich, as sternly as to those of poor parents. Yet officer Shannon was kind to the unfortunate, to the sick, to children and to animals. After the death of his wife, nine years ago, he kept the horse that they had driven during her long illness, and their dog until both died of old age. Mr. Shannon's father, Samuel Shannon, of southern Indiana, was for several years sheriff of Gibson County.

UNITED STATES Consul-General Philip C. Hanna writes from Monterey, Mexico, to the Christian Herald acknowledging receipt of a remittance of $28 for the relief of suffering Mexicans. His letter, which is dated October 27, adds: "The money will be exceedingly useful, as I have a lot of very needy families who greatly need help. Thank the Christian Herald Family for remembering us."

REV. EDOUARD H. JONES, of Holy College, Port-au-Prince, Haiti, writes: "Whenever the steamer comes from New York, all the boys and girls who are learning English anxiously await the last numbers of the Christian Herald, and we have been inspired by it to start a home for destitute children. We are giving them milk and bread three times a day. We rented a small building, and go begging every day to buy the milk. Perhaps some friends might send us some candies and playthings for those little ones for Christmas."

THE Quinton Heights Baptist Church of Topeka is a little struggling mission church. A mortgage of $500 and other liabilities made the total debt between $700 and $800. Plans were made for an every-member canvass the Sunday following the Laymen's Missionary Movement Convention at Topeka. The canvassers started out to get $800 and got $875. One of the officials said undoubtedly the convention contributed largely to the success of the canvass.

Sofa Philosophy—V

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

Human Robins

THE north wind doth blow and we shall have snow, and what will the robin do then, poor thing?" hummed the Girl.

"The north wind doth blow," mimicked the Boy, "and we shall have snow." He laughed and pulled his chair closer to the fire. "If this weather keeps up," he shivered, "you—just—bet we'll have snow! And," he laughed again, "and what will the robin do then?" he chuckled. "Why, child" (the Boy likes to appear old and superior), "why, child, the robins will all go south where it's warm and happy and bright. Where the sun shines all day and there isn't any north wind."

The Girl settled herself more comfortably on the hearthrug, and cupped her chin in the palm of her hands. The Boy, looking down on her bowed head, thought that he had never seen anything quite so pretty and cheerful—and—home-like—as the firelight on her hair.

"It's all very well to say that the robins will go south," said the Girl—she sighed. "It's all very well. Robins go south by instinct. But somehow I was thinking of human robins."

The Boy was wondering how so much gold could be poured onto ordinarily plain brown hair. His voice spoke a trifle absently.

"Human robins?" he murmured. "What are human robins?"

The Girl glanced swiftly back over her shoulder and a blush flickered rosily into her face. She swung around until she could look straight up at him.

"If by any chance," she said in a tone that she made sarcastic to cover the thrill in her voice, "if by any chance you would rather stare at nothing—than pay attention to what I'm talking about, why, do it! I don't care."

The Boy looked at her ruefully. Then he chuckled. Perhaps under the sarcasm he had caught a bit of the thrill.

"I'll listen to anything you want to speak about," he told her. "It was about—about human robins, wasn't it? And I still want to know what a human robin is."

"A human robin," said the Girl soberly, carefully, "a human robin is a man or a girl (most often it's a girl) who lives on the fat of the land—"

"Worms?" murmured the boy.

The Girl silenced him with a scathing look before she again turned her head and rested her chin in the palm of her hands. "Worms—figuratively," she told him in a rebuking tone. "A human robin sings through the summer time and lives in a comfortable nest in a treetop, and swings on a bough covered with soft green leaves. A human robin never thinks of the winter time or of the north winds. A human robin just takes the summer time for granted." The Girl gazed meditatively into the fire for a moment, where a hundred fingers of living gold reached out as if to catch at the softness of her dress, the brightness of the hearth rug. All at once she spoke again.

"A human robin," she said, "a human robin doesn't know what to think when the leaves begin to flutter down from the trees. A human robin doesn't know what to make of the north wind. A human robin is bewildered by the snow. For a human robin hasn't the ability or the instinct—usually—to fly south."

"Again figuratively speaking!" ventured the Boy, "I mean the south—"

"You don't understand what I'm talking about," cried the Girl despairingly. "You don't even try to know. Of course, when I speak of the south, I'm speaking figuratively. Of course, when I speak of the winter I'm speaking figuratively—" She paused for breath.

"WHAT I want to know is," said the Boy, his gaze quizzically on the top of her head, "what I want to really know is what this figuratively speaking means. I'm not clever at parables, or allegories, or similes, or metaphors. I admit it. I wish you'd have just a little bit of sympathy for my decidedly stupid, slowly working mind"—he in turn was a bit sarcastic—"and explain what a human robin is." He, too, paused for breath.

The Girl smiled brightly. She rather likes to make the Boy angry, she rather enjoys shaking him out of his too calm existence.

"Why," she explained sweetly, "why, by a human robin I mean a boy or girl who has never been prepared to do anything—a boy or girl who has never looked ahead to the wintertime."

"There are," agreed the Boy. He almost overdid his eagerness. "There certainly are!" His hand was very near a little wisp of curl that the Girl had not pinned down tight enough. "You're exactly right!" said the Boy.

"I knew a girl once—used to play dolls with her," she went on, "a girl who had always had everything in a world. We grew up from the day playing stage together and she still had everything. You see, the family was worth—well, millions. I was always envious of her clothes and her parties and her motors.

"Finally the girl's father died, and when he died they found that his estate was practically swallowed up by the bills that he owed. They sold the cars, and the beautiful home, and some of the clothes, even. And finally there wasn't any money for any beautiful things, either.

"The girl tried to get work, but she didn't know anything. She couldn't even spell or add a column of figures correctly. It took her three months to get a five-dollar-a-week position. That was three years ago, and she is only making five dollars a week now. She didn't know what to do when the winter came."

THE Boy, with thoughtful eyes on the fire, nodded his head, and the Girl followed his gaze until she, too, was looking into the bed of flaming embers. It was several minutes before she spoke. "It's a little hobby of mine," she said softly, "that every girl should be able to support herself. I'm a 'girl' because the majority of men grow up with the idea of supporting themselves. You never can tell just what is going to happen—just when you'll need some sort of ability that you can capitalize. Anybody is likely at any time to be thrown out on their own resources when the north wind is blowing and the snow is beating down on the world. Why," the Girl laughed softly, to herself almost, "why, I wouldn't dare be absolutely helpless. I wouldn't dare be without a profession. I intend to be able to support myself always. I intend—"

The Boy jerked his eyes away from the glowing fire. Quite fiercely he looked down into her eyes and his voice was angry when he spoke. "It's very well," he told her, "to talk about human robins figuratively, but you're no human robin. What do you want to support yourself for? What do you mean that you may have to support time? What do you mean by 'always'?"

The Girl apparently did not hear him, and after a moment he leaned forward until his face was very near her own, the glowing light of the fire. All the room was still, with a breathless, warm, throbbing sort of stillness.

"Girl," he said hoarsely, "I'm getting a good start now. Don't you think, soon—"

The Girl rose hurriedly to her feet. Two steps took her to the window and she jerked the curtain aside. The air was filled with the first round white flakes of a winter snowstorm.

"The north wind doth blow," she hummed, half to herself, and then abruptly she faced the Boy. "It'll be a long cold walk going home, won't it?" she asked him.

An Artificial Niagara

THE great Arrowrock Dam across the Boise River, Idaho, has now been completed by the United States Reclamation Service as a part of the great irrigation project for that region, at less than the cost of a dreadnought. This remarkable structure is the highest of its kind in the world, rising 351 feet and having a crest of 1,060 feet. Its foundations cover an acre of bed rock. This feat of engineering was begun in November, 1912. The power for the work was obtained by diverting the waters of the Boise eight miles above the dam, where 2,000 horsepower was generated and transmitted electrically to the site of the dam. The enormous curving wall reaches up to join the hills between which the Boise has for ages wended its quiet way, till the waters have been backed up in an enormous lake that will pour over the dam an artificial Niagara more than twice the height of nature's masterpiece, and with a crest measuring practically the same as that of the American side of the huge cataract of the Niagara River. The water made available for irrigation purposes by the Arrowrock Dam will be distributed by canals to about 243,000 acres of land in the fertile valleys of the Boise and Snake Rivers in Southwestern Idaho. This section of land, which needs only water in season to make it blossom in crops of alfalfa and cereals and potatoes and fruits, lies about twenty-five hundred feet above sea level, and the temperature ranges from 28 degrees below to 107 degrees above zero, though rarely going below. A number of towns are established there, connected by trolley lines with the principal local markets of the newly created agricultural lands, Portland and Oregon. The small picture in this group, showing the lesser cataract created by the release of the impounded waters through some of the regulation gates, gives a vivid idea of the tremendous force stored up behind this artificial wall of stone and cement.

Amarilly of Clothes-Line Alley

By BELLE K. MANIATES

Copyright, 1915, by Little, Brown & Co. All rights reserved

CHAPTER XIX

WHEN Cory secured a place as dish-wiper at a new boarding-house near, and Gus realized that he and Iry alone were dependent upon the others for their keep, shame seared his young soul. He had vainly tried to secure steady employment, but had succeeded only in getting occasional odd jobs. He had a distinct leaning towards an agricultural life and coveted the care of cows.

"The grocer has sold his'n," he lugubriously lamented; "thar ain't no one else as wants a caretaker for their critters around here."

After a long rumination on the discouraging problem of his future, he sought his confessor, the corner grocer.

"I'm too big to peddle papers or be runnin' about with telergrafs," he declared. "I'd orter be goin' into business on my own account. I ain't goin' ter be allers workin' fer other folks."

"Well, you'll have to wait a while before you can work for yourself," counseled his confidant. "You are young yet."

"This is a hurry-up age," was the sagacious assertion, "and ef you air a-goin' to git anywhar, you've got ter go by wire instead of by mail, and you can't start too soon."

"You can't start nothing without capital," argued the grocer conservatively.

"Oh," admitted the young financier, "a little capital mebby. I've got a dollar I've saved up from odd jobs."

"What line was you thinking of taking up?"

"I'm going into the dairy business. Thar's money in milk and butter, and t's nice, clean work."

"The dairy business on one dollar! How many cows and wagons and horses was you figuring on buying with your dollar?"

"Don't git funny," warned Gus impatiently. "Some day I'll hev a farm of my own and a city office, but I'll begin on one cow in our back lot and peddle milk to the neighbors."

"That wouldn't be a bad beginning, but I reckon you'll find the start will cost you more than a dollar. You can't get a cow at that figure."

"Then I'll start with a calf."

"Well, I guess calves cost more than dollar."

"Say, you've got that dollar on the rain, I guess," retorted the lad with no easy familiarity that betokened long acquaintance with the lounging barrels and boxes of the corner grocery. "I et I'll build a shed in our back yard. Thar's the lumber out of our shed that lowed down, and the Boarder can build urty near anything."

"But how are you going to buy a cow?" persisted his inquisitor.

"I ain't got that fer yet," admitted the young dairyman.

"Your dollar'll buy more than the ails for your cow-house. You can ut the balance into feed," said the rocer, with an eye to his own trade.

He wanted to add that it wouldn't cost much to feed an imaginary critter, ut he was a little fearful of the temper ack of the lad's hair, which was the une hue as Amarilly's.

"That's a good idea. Well, the shed arts tomorrow, and of course you on't say nothin' about it."

"Trust me for not talking in this ighborhood. It ain't safe even to ink. First you know your thoughts e being megaphoned down the street."

Gus consulted the Boarder, who instantly and obligingly began the erection of a building in the farthest corner 'the Jenkinses' domain. This structure as a source of mystery and excitement o the neighbors.

"What on airth do you suppose them Jenkinses air a-puttin' up now? Mebby's a wash-house for the surpluses," speculated Mrs. Huce.

"It can't be they air a-goin' to keep boss!" ejaculated Mrs. Wint.

"You never kin tell nuthin' about em Jenkinses. They're so sort of eretin' like," lamented Mrs. Hudgers. The Jenkins family were fully as ignorant as were their neighbors of the nature of the contemplated occupant of the new edifice commonly referred to as the "cow-house." The Boarder put up a very substantial shed with a four-paned window and a door that locked though not very securely. The grocer had on hand a small quantity of green paint which he donated to the cause of the coming cow.

"Thar ain't enough to more'n paint two sides of it," criticized Gus, "so I'll paint the front and west sides."

"Thar's a can of yaller paint out in the woodshed," informed Mrs. Jenkins. "You can paint the other two sides with that."

Then the Boarder made a suggestion: "If I was you, I'd paint a strip of yaller and then one of green. That'll even it up and make it fancy-like."

Amarilly protested against this combination of colors so repellent to artistic eyes, but the family all agreed that it "would be perfectly swell," so she withdrew her opposition and confided her grievance to Derry's sympathizing, shuddering ears.

Gus proceeded to bicolor the shed in stripes which gave the new building a bedizened and bilious effect that delighted Colette, who revelled in the annals of her protégés.

Each member of the Jenkins family had a plan for utilizing this fine domicile, as there seemed to be a general feeling of skepticism regarding the ability of Gus to produce a cow in the flesh. This sentiment, however, was not openly expressed, as the lad was found to be decidedly sensitive and touchy on the subject.

"Mebby a cow'll jest walk right into the back yard and make herself to hum in the new shed," prognosticated Mrs. Jenkins optimistically. "It's such a beautiful place. I'll bet there is cows as would ef they knowed about it."

"I perpose," suggested Flamingus patronizingly, "that we start a cow fund and all chip in and help Gus out."

"Sure thing!" declared the generous Amarilly. "He can have all my savings. We ought to all help Gus get a start."

"I'm in," cried Bobby.

"You kin hev all you want from me, Gus," offered Bud.

Firmly and disdainfully Gus rejected all these offers and suggestions.

"Thar ain't a-goin' to be no pardner business about this," he announced. "The cow won't come till she's mine—all mine—and when she does, I'm a-goin' to pay the Boarder for his work."

"If he wants to be so all-fired smart, we won't help him git no cow," declared Flamingus, "and the shed kin be used for a summer kitchen arter all."

This use of the new building had been the fondest dream of Mrs. Jenkins, who deemed it an ideal place in which to keep her tubs, mops, boiler, and wringer. Milt had designs upon it for a boy's reading-room and club; Flamingus coveted a gymnasium. Bobby, Bud, Cory, and Iry had already appropriated it as a playhouse.

Amarilly openly and ably defended Gus and his cherished, illusory plan. Of all her brothers, he was the one to whom her heart most inclined. For Bud she possibly had a more tender, maternal feeling on account of his being so delicate. She paid homage to the good points of Flamingus, but he was too cut and dried, "bromidic," she classified him, for Derry had carefully explained the etymology of the word. Milt was honest, but selfish and "near." Bobby was disposed to be fresh, but Gus was just such a boy as Amarilly herself would have been, reincarnated. He was practical, industrious, thrifty, and shrewd, and yet possessed of the imagination and optimism of his sister. She called him aside one day for a private consultation.

"Say, Gus, your scheme's all right. Go ahead and get your cow. I'll let you have my savings, and the other boys needn't know. You can pay me when you get ready to."

"That's bully in you, Amarilly, but I'm a-goin' to see this thing through alone and start in without no help from no one," firmly refused Gus, and his

Continued on page 1250

"I'll give them the best!"

"I'll be Santa Claus tonight,
And everywhere I go
I'll leave this nourishing delight—
The finest gift I know!"

And he comes every day.

This merry little Santa Claus is always ready to bring you

Campbell's Tomato Soup

He carries on his capable shoulders all the burden and bother of soup-making, while you get only the enjoyment and satisfaction.

Why not have the full benefit of all this? Why not order this wholesome soup by the dozen at least, and have it always at hand?

You can't have it too often. It will do your family good every time they eat it. It improves their digestion, adds to their pleasure, promotes their health and vitality.

Why not phone or send to your grocer for a dozen right now?

21 kinds 10c a can

Campbell's SOUPS

LOOK FOR THE RED-AND-WHITE LABEL

REO

THE FIFTH

Salient Features

Chassis—Remains practically the same as 1915. This great chassis has been recognized for the past five years as the standard American automobile chassis. It is unquestionably the most accessible automobile in the world—the simplest, therefore the cheapest, in which to make any repair or adjustment or replacement. Very small changes have been made in different parts of the mechanism. They are such as only an engineer would understand, and their purpose was to eliminate the slightest little sound, and to make this the most silent as well as the most accessible automobile in the world and to further enhance facility of driving.

New Body Design—Lines have been changed slightly to conform with the latest fashions and to improve its already graceful appearance.

Hood Fastenings—New design—pull up and out. Facilitates lifting of hood without the usual inconvenience—just a little detail but of sufficient importance to merit our engineers' attention when it meant greater convenience for the Reo owner. Adjustable buffers prevent rattling of hood-sides.

Fenders—Re-designed. Of the modified "Crown" type, formed under our own big presses and so rigid it will be impossible for them ever to shake loose or develop a rattle.

Running Board—New design, wide at front to protect apron from toe scratches.

Instruments—Now located on steering post instead of on the cowl board. Facilitates adjustment of carburetor, and operation of light switches without necessity of the driver taking his eyes from the road or leaning forward from the natural driving position.

Cowl Board—Now covered with metal instead of leather, greatly improving its appearance.

Speedometer and Ammeter—Located in center where they can be seen by all occupants of the car—rear as well as front.

Starting Device—The same wonderfully reliable starter but with a new and improved "hook-up." The former famous Reo worm gear device has been replaced by chain drive. Worm was ideal but required lubrication occasionally to get best efficiency. Some drivers neglected it. Chain is "neglect-proof" and a trifle more efficient.

Spark and Throttle—Control levers now located on top of steering wheel. No better, but buyers seem to prefer it.

Doors—New locking device—unlocks and locks more readily and certainly.

Thief-Proof locking device. A feature that is made possible by the unique Reo design and which we think others will find it difficult to copy. This enables the driver to lock simultaneously the starting device, the transmission and the floor boards. Starting device is made inoperative, at the same time that the transmission gears are locked in neutral position. And to make assurance trebly sure, floor boards are locked down so it is impossible to get at the parts. It would take a volume to describe it—but you will see and appreciate it at a glance.

WONDERFUL CAR

—this New Reo

WE REO FOLK FEEL that if we had accomplished only this, the perfection of the great Reo The Fifth model to the high degree it has attained, our contribution to the progress of the world would have been well worth while.

TO HAVE ACHIEVED through years of endeavor a motor car of such mechanical excellence—such absolute reliability—dependability, and of such low maintenance cost—is a record of which any corps of engineers might well be proud.

WHEN YOU CONSIDER that the average cost of maintenance for cars of this model has proven to be less than six dollars per car per year (and thousands of owners tell us they have never spent a dollar for replacements or repairs) you will appreciate that the quality of materials in this product must be not only the best the science of metallurgy can produce, but that that quality must be wonderfully uniform throughout.

AND THAT IS THE FACT. A marvelous degree of precision—of absolute accuracy and uniformity—has been reached and is applied to the composition and treatment of metals that go into Reo cars.

THAT IS WHERE REO QUALITY is obtained—that and the equally accurate workmanship for which the Reo factories and organization is famous among automobile manufacturers.

THIS REO THE FIFTH represents more years of concentrated effort on the part of Reo engineers—has been more consistently refined and improved—and over a longer period—than any other automobile in America so far as we can recall.

IT IS THE RIPEST PRODUCT of Reo experience and engineering acumen. All that there was of Reo Good Intent—Reo integrity—Reo aspiration—went into the original designing and, year after year since then into the refining, of this process until the result is this newest Reo the Fifth, a motor car that very nearly approximates perfection—as nearly as is humanly possible, we verily believe.

REO MOTOR CAR COMPANY

"The Incomparable Four"

$875

F.O.B. LANSING

Specifications

Wheel Base—115 inches.

Springs—Front—Semi-elliptic—38" x 2" with 7 leaves. Rear—three-quarter elliptic. Lower section—44 $\frac{3}{8}$ " x 2" with 7 leaves; upper section 22 13-16"x2" with 7 leaves.

Front Axle—I-beam, drop forged. with Timken roller bearing spindles.

Rear Axle—Tubular—semi-floating. Timken roller bearings at differential—Hyatt High Duty roller bearings at wheels, pinion integral with stub shaft—two universal joints in propeller shaft—torque taken by separate torque arms—gear ratio 4 to 1.

Tires—34" x 4" front and rear. Non-skid on rear.

Motor—Vertical, four-cylinder, cast in pairs, modified L type with integral head, with inlet valve in head. Valves mechanically operated and protected. Exhaust valve seated directly in the cylinder. Barrel type crank case with three crank shaft bearings. Helical timing gears running in oil.

Cylinder Dimensions—4 $\frac{1}{8}$ " x 4 $\frac{1}{2}$ ".

Horsepower—35.

Cooling System—Water jackets and tubular radiator, cellular pattern. Water circulation by centrifugal pump direct to exhaust valves.

Lubrication—Automatic force feed by plunger pump with return system.

Carburetor—Automatic, heated by hot air and hot water.

Ignition—Combined generator and magneto driven through timing gears; 100 ampere hour storage battery.

Starter—Electric, separate unit, six volts, connected to transmission.

Transmission—Selective swinging type with single rod, center control.

Clutch—Multiple dry disc, faced with asbestos, with positive and instant release.

Brakes—Two on each rear wheel, one internal, one external, 14" diameter drums—service brake interconnected with clutch pedal.

Steering—Gear and sector with 18" steering wheel.

Control—Left-hand drive, center control—spark and throttle on steering wheel with foot accelerator. Positive—thief-proof locking device.

Fenders—Drawn sheet steel of latest oval type—shield between running boards and body—close fitting, quick detachable under pan—aluminum bound, linoleum covered running boards.

Gasoline Capacity—16 gallons.

Body—Five-passenger—streamline touring car type with extra wide full "U" doors, front and rear. Genuine leather upholstery. Deep cushions and backs.

Finish—Body, Golden Olive, running gear, black; equipment nickel trimmed.

Equipment—Fully electric lighted throughout, improved 5-bow, one-man mohair top with full side curtains, mohair slip cover; clear-vision, rain-vision, ventilating windshield; speedometer, electric horn; extra rim with improved tire brackets; pump; jack; complete tool and tire outfit; foot and robe rails.

Price—$875, f. o. b., Lansing, Mich.

WATCHLESS VALUE

Reo the Fifth at Its New Price

LET IF THAT IS an engineering achievement of the first magnitude—and we submit that the extremely low up-keep cost combined with the consistency of performance of Reo the Fifth proves it to be all that—still we believe our greatest achievement has been the placing of this great car—this big, roomy, powerful car—within your reach at its present price—$875 F. O. B. Lansing, Michigan.

FIVE YEARS AGO it was not possible to procure a car of this quality—performance, beauty, finish, reliability and low operation cost—anywhere in the world at $5,000.

THE FACT IT WAS NOT POSSIBLE to obtain a car of such mechanical excellence at any price—simply because science had not up to that time, developed an automobile to that point of perfection.

SOMETIMES WONDER if the average buyer appreciates what a marvelous piece of mechanism he is now able to own for so small an amount.

WHY, IT WAS UNDREAMED OF a few years ago—most prospective buyers cannot grasp it even yet.

STUDY THE SPECIFICATIONS—your local Reo representative will supply you with a copy. Consider the power; the wheel base; the bigness of the car in every way. Then look at the finish; inspect the workmanship—the fineness, the accuracy:—

GO IN IT—DRIVE IT YOURSELF—for you can easily drive Reo the Fifth if you have ever handled any automobile—and learn at first hand how silent and sweet-running it is,—

TEN REMEMBER that back of all we say and your local Reo dealer says about this car is the Reo guarantee backed in turn by Reo financial stability and Reo integrity. And say then if anywhere else in all the world you can find such value is represented in this latest edition of Reo the Fifth at its price—$875.

Lansing, Michigan, U.S.A.

For Christmas

Start him to Shave and Save

GILLETTE—there's the answer! A woman is quick to see that an investment of $5 will save him from Forty to Sixty Dollars every year in shaves and tips. No Stropping—No Honing.

He can shave at home in less time, with more comfort, and he will always be clean faced and presentable.

Here is the Gillette "Bulldog"—a new model, with the stocky "Bulldog" handle. Many prefer it for its generous grip and better balance. $5 With Gold Plated Razor, $6.

GRAND PRIZE—HIGHEST AWARD
Panama-Pacific Exposition

GILLETTE SAFETY RAZOR COMPANY
BOSTON

DON'T PAY TWO PRICES
HOOSIER Stoves Ranges Heaters FREE

To try in your own home for 30 days. Show your friends. Freight paid by us. Send it back at our expense if you do not want to keep it. You can buy the best at Actual Factory Prices. Are heavily made, of the highest grade selected material, beautifully finished, with improvements that equal anything ever produced. The Best in the World. Guaranteed for years by a Two Million Dollar Bond. No matter where you live, you can try a HOOSIER in your own home thirty days, without a penny's expense or obligation to you. You can save enough on a single HOOSIER STOVE to buy your winter's fuel. Write or send postal today for Large Free Catalog and prices" showing large assortment to select from. No Obligations.

HOOSIER STOVE COMPANY,
164 State Street, - MARION, IND.

Be Healthwise—Guard Yourself
Against Coughs and Colds With

LUDEN'S MENTHOL CANDY
COUGH DROPS

Give quick relief and aid the voice. LUDEN'S have many uses. Recognized for purity.

Wm. H. Luden, Manufacturing Confectioner Reading, Pa.

Continued from page 1247
sturdy little sister could but admire him for his independence.

He locked up his new possession very carefully, putting the key in his pocket every morning before going to the business precincts to pick up a job. The children, however, were not dispossessed by this precaution, finding ingress and egress through the window. Gus most opportunely secured a week's job driving a delivery-wagon, and he instantly invested his wages in the provisioning of the cow quarters.

"The feed'll git stale by the time the cow comes," objected Milt.

"Mebbe it's fer bait to ketch a critter with," offered Bobby.

After all, it was the miracle predicted by Mrs. Jenkins that came to pass and delivered the cow. Early one morning, when Gus went as usual with fond pride to view his sole asset, he found installed therein a young, corpulent cow, bland and Texas-horned, busily engaged in partaking of the proceeds of Gus's last week's wages. She turned inquiring, meditative eyes toward the delighted lad, who promptly locked the door and rushed into the house to inform the family of the new arrival.

"She's lost or strayed, but not stolen," said Amarilly.

"Bobby, you put an ad in that paper you deliver at once," commanded Mrs. Jenkins. "Some poor people air feelin' bad over the loss of their cow."

It was considered only fair that the cow should pay for her meal. She was overstocked with milk and graciously and gratefully yielded to Gus's efforts to relieve her of her load. The children were each given a taste of the warm milk, and then the little dairyman started right in for business. The milkman had not yet made his morning rounds, and the neighbors were so anxious to cross-examine Gus that they were more than willing to patronize him. Excitement prevailed when it was learned that the Jenkins family had a cow, and the lad's ingenuity in dodging questions was severely taxed. He avoided direct replies, but finally admitted that it was "one they was keepin' fer some folks."

A week went by, with no claim filed for the animal that had come so mysteriously and seemed so perfectly at home. Gus established a permanent milk route in the immediate neighborhood, and with his ability once more to "bring in" came the restoration of his self-respect.

"It's funny we don't git no answer to that ad," mused Mrs. Jenkins perplexedly. "How many times did you run it, Bobby?"

For a moment silence, deep, profound, and charged with expectancy prevailed. Then like a bomb came Bobby's reply: "I ain't put it in at all."

Everybody was vociferous in condemnation, but Bobby, unabashed, held his ground, and logically defended his action.

"I got the news-agent to look in the 'lost' every night, and thar want nothin' about no cow. 'Twas up to them as lost it to advertise instead of us. If they didn't want her bad enough to run an ad, they couldn't hev missed her very much."

"That's so," agreed the Boarder, convinced by Bobby's able argument.

"Most likely she doesn't belong to any one," was Amarilly's theory. "She just came to stay a while, and then she'll go away again."

"She won't git no chanst to 'scape, unless she kin go out the way the children does," laughed Mrs. Jenkins.

One day the Boarder brought home some information that seemed to throw light on the subject.

"One of the railroad hands told me that a big train of cattle was sidetracked on this way somewhar the same night the cow come here. The whole keel-load got loose, but they ketched them all, or thought they did. Mebbey they didn't miss this ere one, or else they couldn't wait to look her up. Their train pulled out as soon as they rounded up the bunch."

"I guess the cow-house looked to her like it was a freight car," observed Milt,

"and she thought she hed got back where she belonged."

The cow, meanwhile, quietly chewed her cud, and continued to endear herself to the hearts of all the Jenkins family save Cory. Every time Bobby spoke her name he called to her, "Co, boss Co, boss," just as Gus did when he greeted the cow.

As for the little dairyman himself he gave his charge the best of care. He took her for a little outing every day to a near-by lot where she could graze being careful to keep a stout rope attached to her, although they walked to and from the recreation ground side by side. Derry painted a little picture of the pair as he saw them returning from a jaunt. Gus's arm was lovingly thrown around the neck of the gentle creature, and her Texas horns were adorned with a wreath of brown-eyed Susans woven by Cory.

It remained for Mrs. Jenkins to christen the creature.

"Cowslip," she declared triumphantly, "cause she just slipped in."

CHAPTER XX

AMARILLY'S pace in learning English from Derry during the following winter was only excelled by her proficiency in mathematics. "Figgerin'" the Boarder declared to be his long suit, and his young pupil worked every example in Flamingus's arithmetic, and employed her leisure moments in solving imaginary problems. Then came an evening when she put her knowledge to practical use and application. She had been working absordedly with pencil and paper for some time when she looked up from her sheet of figures with a flushed face and a Q. E. D. written in each shining eye.

"Say!" she announced to the family who were gathered about the long table.

Instantly they were all attention, for they always looked to Amarilly for something startling in the way of bulletins.

"I've been setting down and adding up what we all bring in each week. Ma's washings, the Boarder's board, my studio work, Flamingus' and Milt's wages, Gus's cow, Bud's singing, Co's dish-washing, and Bobby's papers. What do you suppose it all amounts to?"

She allowed a few seconds of tragic silence to ensue before she gave the electrifying total.

"Land sakes! Who'd 'a thought it!" exclaimed Mrs. Jenkins.

"We'd orter hev ice-cream and pie every day," reproached Cory.

"It would be reckoned a purty big salary if one man got it all," speculated the Boarder.

"We are rich!" exclaimed Bobby decisively.

"I'll tell you what we'll do," pursued Amarilly. "We must start a syndicate."

"What's that, a show?" demanded Flamingus.

"No; I heard the artists down to the studio talking about it, and Mr. Derry explained it. He said when a lot of folks put their cash on hand together in one pile, they can buy something big and do more than as if they spent it separate."

"Well, I ain't agoin' to put my money in with Co's," said Milt sarcastically. "Wouldn't be much profit for me in that."

"You don't catch on," replied Amarilly. "If you should put in one dollar, and Co should put in ten cents, at the end of a certain time, you'd draw out ten dollars and Co would only draw out one. See?"

"I do," said the practical Gus.

"Well, now let's put our money into something and all own it together, each one's share according to what we put in. Let's buy this house!"

They all stared in amazement.

"Buy a house! You are sure crazy, Amarilly!" exclaimed Milt.

"We could buy it cheap," continued Amarilly unabashed. "I heard the grocer saying yesterday that property around here was at a low figure now. We could put our savings together and make a payment down, and instead of aying rent let it go on the balance each month. Before we knew it we'd own the house, and the deed could be made out to show how much of it each one owned."

"That's a splendid idee, Amarilly!" declared the Boarder enthusiastically. I don't know what better investment you could make."

"It would be fine," sighed Mrs. Jenkins, "to own your own place and feel that no one could turn you out." "You've got a great head, Amarilly," complimented Gus.

"Well," proposed Amarilly, the ever-ready, "let's get right at it. I'll set down our names, and when I call the roll, tell me how much you've saved."

There was a general rush for bank-books, for ever since the preceding fall, the six oldest children had paid their board, clothed themselves, and saved the balance of their earnings.

From her washings, the revenue from the board of the children and Boarder, Mrs. Jenkins had paid the rent and the household expenses. By thrifty management she had also acquired a bank account herself.

"Ma!" called Amarilly expectantly. There had been much urging on the part of Derry in his zeal for language form to induce his young pupil to say "mother," but in this sole instance Amarilly had refused to take his will for law.

"She's always been 'ma' to me, and she always will be," declared Amarilly emphatically. "If I were to call her anything else I'd feel as if I had lost her—as if she didn't belong to me." Ma triumphantly announced: "Forty-seven dollars and fifty-one cents."

"A fine starter," commended Amarilly. "Flamingus?"

"Forty dollars," he announced with pride.

"Milt?" Amarilly called his name in faint voice. He was the only tight-lipped member of the household, and she feared he might decline to go. But Milt was envious and reluctant.

"Forty-two dollars and sixty-nine cents," he declared.

Amarilly drew a sigh of relief.

"It's going to add up fine, now. Next I'll take my own account next. Haven't got as much as you boys, though."

"Shouldn't think you would have," said Gus sympathizingly. "You don't run so much, and yet you pay ma as much, and don't take out nuthin' for your noon meal. And you give Co things."

"I've earned quite a bit," replied Amarilly cheerfully. "I've got thirty dollars to put in. Gus?"

"Thirty-five dollars," he replied in pleased tone.

"Bud?"

They all looked expectantly. Bud received ten dollars each Sunday now, and he had been singing at concerts, organ recitals, and entertainments all winter. On account of these latter engagements, he had been obliged to spend a considerable amount in clothes suitable to the occasion.

"One hundred and twenty-five dollars," Bud now replied modestly.

"My! you take the cake!" said Bobby.

Amarilly was sorry that she had to list Bobby's name next. But Bobby had a surprise in store for them all. "Forty-eight dollars!" he cried gleefully, giving Flam, Milt, and Gus exultant glances. "Beat the hull of ye, 'cept Bud!"

"How in the world did you ever do it, paper routes?" asked Amarilly wonderingly.

Bobby winked at his mother.

"Shall we tell our secret?" he asked. "You tell, Ma."

"You see," she explained, "when the 'es are bilin' arter you hev all gone work and to school, I've made twenty-five pies and when Bobby got out of school, he'd come hum and git 'em and set 'em up to the High School. The 'es bought 'em at five cents apiece. 'e stuff to make 'em cost about two cents a pie."

"And Bobby got all the profit—" postulated Milt indignantly.

"Bobby paid me by taking the clo'es on the line and bringin' them in every day, and fetchin' the water," she replied chidingly. "We was goin' to keep it a secret till he got enough to buy a pony."

"But I'd ruther buy a house," said Bobby.

"I ain't got enough to come in," sobbed Co. "I ain't saved much."

"That's because you spend all you earn on candy," rebuked Milt.

"I ain't nuther. I bought me some rubbers and Iry some playthings."

"How much have you got, Co?" asked Amarilly gently.

"Two dollars and ninety-seven cents," she said, weeping profusely.

"I think that's pretty good for a little girl," said Amarilly. "All you strapping boys ought to chip in out of your cash on hand what isn't in the bank and give her some so she could be in on it. Here is fifty cents from me, Co."

"I'll give you fifty, Co," said her mother.

"Me too," said Flamingus.

The other boys followed with equal contributions, Bud generously donating a five-dollar bill.

"Here's fifty cents from me," said the Boarder.

"Eleven dollars and forty-seven cents for Co," announced Amarilly.

"Seems too bad that Iry is the only one left out," said Mrs. Jenkins.

"When he gits old enough to work, he can come in," said Milt. "Add her up, Amarilly."

"Three hundred and sixty-nine dollars and sixty-seven cents!" almost screamed Amarilly.

"Whee!" chorused the boys.

"Purty near buy the old shack," said Flamingus.

"Our landlord," said Amarilly sagaciously, "is a shark, and he'll try to get the best of us. I am going to get Mr. Vedder to do the business for us, and he'll get the deed in all our names."

"Put in Iry's too," pleaded Mrs. Jenkins, solicitous for her Benjamin.

"I'll put it to vote," said parliamentary Amarilly. "Who's for Iry?"

"Me, me, me," came from all, though Milt's response was reluctant.

"I will see Mr. Vedder tomorrow, so we can begin to let the rent apply right off," said Amarilly.

"We'll take more pride in keeping it fixed up now," remarked Flamingus. "I'll mend the window-panes and the door hinges."

"And I'll build some stairs and put up a partition or two," promised the Boarder.

"I'll paint it," said Gus, proud of his former work in this direction.

"And I'll buy some cheers and a hangin' lamp," said Mrs. Jenkins. "Don't all this talk make you want to housekeep?" she asked with a knowing glance in the Boarder's direction.

He shook his head thoughtfully, but when the boys and Cory had gone to bed, he unfolded a proposition that he had been evolving during their financial discussion, and which now found overwhelming favor.

The next day Amarilly called upon Mr. Vedder at the theater.

"He's got more solid business to him than Mr. Derry or Mr. St. John," she shrewdly decided.

"The house, of course, isn't worth anything," he said, "but land down that way is a good investment. Who is your landlord?"

She gave him the name and address.

"I am glad you came to me, Amarilly, instead of to your newer friends."

"Oh, you know more about it than they do," she replied, "and besides, some way I wouldn't feel as if I were bothering you."

"Not a bit of bother, Amarilly."

The ticket-seller was prompt, thorough, and shrewd in the matter. He had a friend in the real estate business, who appraised the property for him, and he proved most diplomatic in his dealing with the surprised landlord, who fortunately chanced to be in dire need of some ready cash.

The Jenkins family including the Boarder and Iry left the house one noon, each bearing a red bank-book.

"Looks like a run on the bank," said the Boarder facetiously.

The payment was made, and the deeds drawn in the names of all the family, but to the list was also added the name of the Boarder.

To be continued

ROOK, the Greatest Home Game in the World

Played by Father and Mother by Boys and Girls
by Man and Wife
by Preacher and Teacher
by all who like a clean, wholesome game, full of fun, and skill, and unexpected situations.

50 Cents

AT ALL DEALERS or by mail from us

POLLYANNA

The GLAD GAME

A new delight for winter evenings. The best New Board Game in the last quarter century. Absorbingly fascinating, easily learned in a few minutes. Pollyanna is a perfect game for two, three or four players. Partnership games of Pollyanna are great fun. For young or old.

Price 75c, of all dealers. By mail 10c extra.

PARKER BROTHERS, Inc.

PARKER SQUARE, SALEM, MASSACHUSETTS

Makers of many famous Home Games.

We do NOT make Playing Cards

A Great Song Book

Sparkling, snappy, invigorating, energizing, appealing, effective and useful, this latest and greatest of Rodeheaver productions has set a new high-water mark in gospel songbook making. Hundreds of churches, Sunday schools and other religious societies are already using it and are expressing unbounded approval and delight. The first to introduce it into your church community will have exercised "winning strategy."

Songs for Service

has 288 pages, is printed from new plates on better-than-usual paper and is finely bound. Orchestrated for 15 instruments. Printed in both round and shaped notes. It is the book used exclusively in the "Billy" Sunday campaigns. EXAMINE A COPY FREE—Simply state that you will either return it in good condition within 15 days or will remit the retail price State binding desired.

PRICES—Cloth 35c, limp 25c, manila 20c per copy, postpaid. Cloth $25, limp $18, manila $15 per 100, not prepaid.

THE RODEHEAVER CO.

1083 MONON BLDG., CHICAGO, 633 LIPPINCOTT BLDG., PHILADELPHIA

YOU may get your envelopes O. K. and on time if you order elsewhere. Why not order from us and be sure?

FREE—A Duplex Envelope Opener, for the name and address of your Treasurer and S. S. Supt. Saves time and trouble.

ADDRESS DESK—
DUPLEX
RICHMOND, VA.
(ARCHER G. JONES)

MAKE CHRIST KING, COMBINED

(Orchestrated)
Just Published
Edited by

Prof. E. O. Excell, Dr. W. E. Biederwolf, Dr. H. W. Stough, Dr. M. H. Lyon and 70 other leading evangelists.

The Latest, Best and Most Popular Hymn Book

Combines the best songs in "Make Christ King" and the "New Make Christ King" with the latest and best copyright hymns.

Regardless of expense, the best song book ever published. Send 15c for sample copy.

THE GLAD TONES PUB. CO.
Lakeside Bldg., CHICAGO, ILL.

BIEDERWOLF

STOUGH

EXCELL

LYON

"When brush meets Brush, it's the Whiting-Adams Vulcan Rubber Cemented that wins"

All Brush Users Find WHITING-ADAMS

Trade VULCAN Mark
Rubber Cemented

BRUSHES Perfect in Construction, Superior in Quality, Everlasting in wear. Always Suit—Never Fail

Send for illustrated literature telling about Whiting-Adams Brushes

Manufactured by

JOHN L. WHITING-J. J. ADAMS CO.

BOSTON, U. S. A.

Brush Manufacturers for Over One Hundred Years

Whiting-Adams Brushes Awarded Gold Medal, the highest award at Panama-Pacific Exposition, 1915

A Fountain Pen
The Sensible Xmas Present

Every one has a use for a fountain pen—especially so if it is a Moore's Non-Leakable. The pen that will not leak, always ready to write and easy to fill.

Buy a Moore's Xmas Certificate at your druggist, stationer or jeweler or, send us $2.50 and we will mail an Xmas Certificate filled in with your name and the name of the recipient to any address in the U. S. A. This certificate will contain the names of Moore's dealers who will redeem it. (Where we have no dealer, pen will be mailed in Xmas Box.)

The Xmas certificate enables the recipient to select the pen and pen point to suit his or her special requirement.

Say Moore's Non-Leakable fountain pen to your dealer—accept no other AMERICAN FOUNTAIN PEN CO.

ADAMS, CUSHING & FOSTER, Inc.
168 DEVONSHIRE ST.
BOSTON, MASS.

Moore's won't leak

PIANO TUNING AT HOME

A LUCRATIVE PROFESSION easily acquired. Anyone can learn. Our PATENTED TUNE-A-PHONE METHOD makes success more certain than best oral instruction. Guaranteed. Write for FREE BOOKLET, telling how our STUDENTS MAKE BIG MONEY.

Niles Bryant School of Tuning, 22 Inst. Bld., Battle Creek, Mich.

CHURCH FURNITURE

Pews, Pulpits, Chairs, Altars, Book Racks, Tables, Desks—EVERYTHING. The finest furniture made. Direct from our factory to your church. Catalog free.

DeMoulin Bros. & Co. Dept. 54, Greenville, Ill.

STRANGEST WOMAN IN HISTORY

HAVE you read about CATHERINE THE GREAT of Russia—the queen of romance? Was she the great queen—ardent lover—faithless wife—rumor has told? Was she twenty women in one—more beautiful than Helen of Troy—more brilliant than Cleopatra—more ruthless than Catherine de Medici—greater than Queen Elizabeth of England—this woman who came from a German duchy to rule over a wild Russian land? What is the truth? The story of her life and all the great characters in history is to be found in the world-famous publication

Ridpath's History OF THE World

More than a quarter million sets of this great history have been sold, and every purchaser is more than satisfied. Never before has any set of books had so great a sale. It is complete and graphic, absorbing and authoritative, and holds you spell-bound with the rapt interest of a stirring tale.

Free

We will mail free a beautiful 46-page booklet of sample pages to all who mail coupon.

4000 Pages
2000 Pictures

Wonderful Bargain

We will name our special low price and easy terms only in direct letters to those mailing us the Coupon below. Tear off Coupon, write name and address plainly, and mail now before you forget it. The 46 Free Sample Pages will give you some idea of the splendid illustrations and wonderfully beautiful style in which the work is written. Mail Coupon now.

FREE COUPON

WESTERN NEWSPAPER ASSOCIATION (12-8)
140 So. Dearborn St., Chicago, Ill. (15)

Please mail your 46-page free sample booklet of Ridpath's History of the World, containing photographs of Napoleon, Socrates, Caesar, and other great characters in history, and write me full particulars of your special offer to The Christian Herald readers.

NAME _____
ADDRESS _____

Christmas Lesson. The Song of the Angels

International Sunday School Lesson for December 19
Luke 2:1-20

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By REV. F. B. MEYER, D.D.

"The angel said unto them, Fear not." Luke 2:10.

Heaven is always assuring us that we need not fear. It is very necessary. It seems as though the path to the back door of the house of our heart is constantly trodden by the darkly robed figure of Fear, who steals up in the shadow and enters with stealthy step. When once she is seated, she begins to pour out her tale of ill-suggestion. She tells us all the rumors that are agitating the air, every lying tale, each depressing bit of news, and we sit listening until the blood leaves our heart. Heaven never wearies in its advice that we should brick up the doorway, so that Fear cannot obtain an entrance, or even whisper through the keyhole. Heaven is full of song. Joy-bells ring in all the belfries. Christ's Incarnation has put a new complexion on everything. God incarnate is the end of Fear, because it is evident that he has identified himself with human interests. He has brought in his unsearchable riches to meet our poverty, his strong help to reinforce our weakness, his prescience to remedy our shortsightedness. Why should we fear when in Jesus Christ we have been taken out of the world and made the sons and daughters of the Eternal? We are joint-heirs with Christ. If the back door is for ever closed to Fear, keep the front, which faces the south, always open to the entrance of God's herald-angel.

When Jesus Came

By Arthur H. Howland

THERE is a great deal of misapprehension and misinterpretation of the historical settings of the coming of Jesus. The age is described as an age of peace, peace throughout the world under the imperial sway of Rome. There was peace in the sense that all kingdoms had been subdued by Rome and attached to her empire. This was the wonderful "Pax Romana." But among the millions of souls who made up that empire there was anything but peace. Cruelty and oppression reigned. Half the population of the empire were slaves. Gibbon estimates the number of slaves at sixty million. Of the remaining millions nearly all lived in poverty. Rome took as her symbol the wolf. She was a wolf indeed, reaching out greedy paws to snatch the livelihood from her distant peoples, bringing the mites of their poverty into her insatiable stomach, which was the great, sensual, vicious, bloody city of Rome itself, where lived the few thousand families to whose degrading excesses the wealth of the conquered world was made to contribute.

Scholars point out the fact that Rome had extended her empire, not by destroying the nations, but by linking their wealthy families to the wealthy families of Rome, thus establishing a community of interest against the poor people and the slaves, whose toil enriched this aristocratic, plutocratic minority. It was a league of all the rich people in the world against all the poor people in the world. The poor lived in constant fear of the rich, and the rich lived in constant fear of the poor. Insurrections were taking place in all parts of the empire. But the masters had the Roman legions at their disposal, and by the power of arms kept the poor and the slaves in their place.

One sinister, elaborate, exact institution was the life blood of the whole organization—tax. Taxes for the central government, taxes for the personal fortunes of individual governors—taxes of all sorts on all occasions. That was the method by which the fruits of the people's toil poured into the treasuries of Rome.

And it was at the time of the levying of such a tax that the life of Jesus began. "There went out a decree from Caesar Augustus that all the world should be taxed." His mother and Joseph lived in Galilee—Galilee the "home of insurrection." Judas, Theudas, and many others (these two are specially referred to by Gamaliel in Acts 5:36, 37) stirred up the people to rebel, and there were constant massacres. There is a ghastly reference in Luke 13:1 to those Galileans "whose blood Pilate had mingled with their sacrifices," indicating that one of these massacres had overtaken the people while they were at worship.

Debt, bondage, fear—that was what life meant in the world when the new Leader came to live at Nazareth. With these scenes in mind it is easier to understand the words in which he announced to his fellow townsmen the beginning of his ministry: "The Spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor; he hath sent me to heal the broken-hearted, to preach deliverance to the slaves, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised."

Fear, debt, bondage—that was the world to which the shepherds belonged who heard the angels' message—"Peace! Fear Not!" Indeed this was "good tidings of great joy."

And now—after two thousand years? We try to shut our eyes from the hideous spectacle of a world drenched in blood.

It is a blessing incalculable that after this year and a half of war the thought of Christendom is forced back to that Bethlehem stable where Mary's baby lay. There is a hungry feeling that we should like to begin all over again. And we know that when civilization does begin again after this holocaust it will begin back there—at the feet of Jesus.

Tears were on many faces last year as the accounts were read of German and British soldiers playing and singing together between the trenches on Christmas day. Those trenches in Europe are gashes in the heart of Christ.

But the angels' song is sounding yet. "Peace on earth; good will to men." That is God's will. That is God's plan. That's God's promise. And it will yet come true.

The principles that Jesus taught have met with furious resistance, century after century. But the tides of time and battle beat against them in vain. They are eternal. And when the human race settles down at last to its real career of fruitful achievement it will be upon the basis, not of Rome's deadly peace of bondage nor Europe's ghastly theories of war, but upon the truths of Jesus—the truth that every human soul is free; that every human life must be kind; that every human life needs and may share the boundless grace and love of God.

Can we hear them singing yet—above the battle's roar—"Fear not! Glory! Good will! Peace!" The promise of the song may come true in your heart—and in mine—and in our neighbor's; and as sure as God is in his heaven it will some day come true over all the world.

Seven Christmas Lessons

By Amos R. Wells

GEORGE MACDONALD, in one of his poems, pictures the interior of a vast and beautiful cathedral, with its crowd of worshipers, its solemn priests, and its splendid ceremonial. In the midst of it all a poor woman is humbly sweeping the floor. Then the poet saw a wonderful Figure pass through all the throng and come straight

HARD TO DROP

But Many Drop It.

A young Calif. wife talks about coffee: "It was hard to drop Mocha and Java and give Postum a trial, but my nerves were so shattered that I was a nervous wreck and of course that means all kinds of ails."

"I did not want to acknowledge coffee caused the trouble for I was very fond of it. At that time a friend came to live with us, and I noticed that after he had been with us a week he would not drink his coffee any more. I asked him the reason. He replied: 'I have not had a headache since I left off drinking coffee, some months ago, till last week, when I began again here at your table. I don't see how anyone can like coffee anyway, after drinking Postum!'"

"I said nothing, but at once ordered a package of Postum. That was some months ago, and we have drank no coffee since, except on two occasions when we had company, and the result each time was that my husband could not sleep, lay awake and tossed and talked half the night. We were convinced that coffee caused his suffering, so he returned to Postum, convinced that coffee was his enemy, instead of a friend, and he has troubled no more by insomnia."

"I have gained 8 pounds in weight, and my nerves have ceased to quiver. It seems so easy now to quit coffee that I caused our aches and ails and take Postum." Name given by Postum (Battle Creek, Mich.)

Postum comes in two forms: Postum Cereal—the original form—must be well boiled. 15c and 25c packages.

Instant Postum—a soluble powder—dissolves quickly in a cup of hot water, and, with cream and sugar, makes a delicious beverage instantly. 30c and 40c tins.

Both kinds are equally delicious and cost about the same per cup.

"There's a Reason" for Postum. Sold by Grocers.

Talk of Books —

NEW SUCCESSES

—Think of it—

THE APOSTLES' CREED
by David James Burrell
Part by part, little by little, the Apostles' Creed analyzed and clearly and unflinchingly presented. Dr. Burrell alone has shown how far-reaching and important is this basic formula of the Christian faith. 12mo. 240 pp. Attractive cloth. $1.00 net.

EVERY DAY by Edgar Whitaker W.
A delightfully unusual adaptation, for the lay person, of the Scriptures in their bearing upon daily life. A marvel of truth and concentration veiled with delicacy. Designed especially for a gift. 12mo. 366 pp. Silk cloth. $1.25 net.

THE JUNIOR PARISH
by Herbert W. Laidlaw
Not the how but the what of successful, heart-healthy talks by a well-known, progressive pastor to junior members of his congregation. It drives home for the pastor the viewpoint of his junior parish. Also well adapted for juvenile reading. 12mo. pp. Cloth. $1.00 net.

OBSCURE PEOPLE
by Edgar Whitaker W.
With a revealing pen the author has here woven around five characters hitherto hardly known a story which pronounces them real, vital, personal and intimate. 12mo. 80 pp. Stiff boards, paper label. cents net, postage 6 cents.

AMERICAN TRACT SOCIETY
Park Avenue and 40th Street
New York
Catalog on request

Cornish Profit Sharing Plan

Plan Helps You Pay for any beautiful Cornish Piano or Organ. Send today for the New Cornish Profit-Sharing Plan, which enables Cornish buyers to actually pay for their instrument of their choice, in whole or in part, out of the bonus accruing from participation in the plan.

Buy from Factory. A Year's Free Trial. All Credit You Need. Life Time Guarantee.

All of these features of the world famous Cornish Plan, and now in addition we let our profits help you pay. Send today for the beautiful new Cornish Book, which explains how over 250,000 purchasers have saved one-third to one-half, tells how we do without dealers, and why only Cornish Instruments are good enough for you.

Cornish Co. Washington, D.C.

the toiling woman. "Daughter," said the Lord, "thou sweetest well mayst thou be!" That is the first of the Christmas lessons, the lesson of glorified labor. It is to workingmen that the Adventings came, not to glittering courtiers, wise teachers or even the Sanhedrin; it is to humble shepherds, out doors, engaged in their monotonous and arduous task. And it is to such, even now, that the Christmas greeting comes.

The second Christmas lesson is one of confidence. The shepherds were aided of the angel. "Fear not," said the heavenly messenger, and the same word comes to us. There is a right fear of God and a wrong fear. On the monument to Lord Lawrence in Westminster Abbey are simply his name and the date of his death and the words: "He feared man so little because he loved God so much." That is the right fear, and the exercise of it removes all fear as the shepherds showed.

The third Christmas lesson is joy. "Many," said John Wesley, "think of being happy with God in heaven, but not of being happy with God on earth. He enters their thoughts." To make them enter their thoughts was one reason why Christ came to earth, God with us. He came, he said, that his joy might be in us, and what is that but the angel's good tidings of great joy?

The fourth Christmas lesson is humility. The Lord of heaven and earth came to us as a simple babe, a poor babe, in a simple manger. How much is missed in any pride in the disciple who called a Master! Morrison, the pioneer missionary in China, wrote home for an assistant. A young man came before the committee, but they all said, "He will never do"; but they thought he might answer for a servant, and asked him if he were willing. His ready smiling answer was, "Yes, most certainly." To be a "hewer of wood and drawer of water" is too great an honor for me, when the Lord's house is building. Thereby he proved himself to be a genuine missionary.

The fifth Christmas lesson is the joy of glorifying God: "Glory to God in the highest." A traveler in Devonshire once found a tree in the bark of which some one had cut the words, "Deum laudamus," "We praise thee, O God." The devout Christian writes that motto on all he has and as he sees in this wonderful world, "Peace is the sixth Christmas lesson, 'peace on earth,' as there is already peace in heaven. This is the Christmas gift the world most needs this year, a Christ alone can give it. 'Are your high standards sometimes a strain?' a Christian was once asked. 'No, indeed,' he answered promptly; 'it is low standards that make the strain.' It is low standards, worldly standards, un-Christian living, that make the strain, the quarrels, the wars. Only Christ in the hearts and lives of men can bring a perpetual peace on earth.

And the seventh Christmas lesson is brotherhood, "Good will toward men." We take the other translation, "To men of God's good will," or "To men in whom God is well pleased," it amounts to the same thing, since he is pleased only with men of love, the brotherly men. "We are right with God," wrote F.B. Meyer, "in the exact proportion that we are right with the men and women around us. Let us test ourselves, not by what we are on Sundays at church, but by what we are to the man whom we like least."

When the shepherds had received the Christmas message, they told it to others. They told it eagerly. They read it far. They glorified and praised God in telling it. And all that heard it wondered, and all will wonder who hear the Christmas story told in the Christ-spirit.

For Christmas day is no less a day of angelism than Easter. "Unto you is born a Saviour" — the words are for the sad and toiling and sinful son or daughter of men. Easter concluded the Christmas began. Doubly precious will this glad anniversary be to us if we are doing what we can, as the shepherds did, to spread its joy over the whole world.

The How Column

Conducted by Frank L. Brown, Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association.

How to Secure the Pupil's Home Study of the Lesson

WE have considered how the teacher may prepare the lesson. Now a still harder question: "How may we get the boys and girls to study the lesson at home?"

The number of scholars who make any home preparation of the lesson varies according to age, the home cooperation, the character of the lesson and the plans of the teacher to interest them. The percentages are higher with the younger children. With high school scholars and adults busy in the home or in business, the proportion studying at home is less. Taking the average of a large number of replies the proportion of those preparing at home is close to sixty per cent. There are many good teachers who fail to secure any cooperation, while others get perfect support. As to the proportion, some of the answers are of interest.

"Precious few."

"Almost nil."

"In a class composed, as this is, largely of working women, it depends upon whether the week has been a full one or not. Usually a small number are well prepared."

"None, not even the fairly active and earnest church members."

"With our new Senior lessons on Christian Service I find a more general interest and fully three-fourths are giving preparation." This last from the teacher of a class of sixteen girls, averaging seventeen years of age.

A teacher of a class of young men, averaging twenty-three years, with an attendance of twenty, says: "About six to eight a Sunday prepare, which is not enough by any means. Seems a hard task to get young men this age to study their Bibles or lessons. They seem not to figure God should claim any of their time."

From a teacher of fourteen Junior girls comes this word: "I find about just half of my scholars prepared. And quite a few have no Christian homes."

Quite frankly a teacher of a class of young women, average twenty-one states: "None. All are business women, teachers, students or in offices."

Another teacher of a similar class says: "None. They are all in business and are too busy with work and pleasure to study a lesson."

One teacher of five young women says wisely: "About ten to twenty per cent. So much depends on the previous training, habits, depth of character and mental caliber."

A Junior Department teacher replies: "I should say that eighty per cent. learn the golden texts and complete the manual work allotted. About sixty per cent. keep home work books."

A teacher of ten boys, average sixteen years, who use the Graded Lessons, reports: "They are all prepared to a fair understanding of the lesson, but only one-half are fully prepared, while all do home work and keep their books neat."

Let us turn to the plans of securing cooperation in home study as tested by many teachers the country over.

A New York City teacher of nine eleven to fifteen year old boys writes: "I find that few scholars know how to study a lesson. Few are studious enough to try. I have found this plan to work well. Each boy has two blank books, small enough for the pocket. In one I write questions on the lesson I am going to teach, questions which, outside of the title text, place in the Bible, will require some thought, and which will also enable me to know what each one has understood and applied. I give these books at the close and receive those of the preceding Sunday, which I take home, look over and sometimes write note of comment to enclose when the book is given again. The questions are numbered and brief and answered on the opposite page."

From a Denver, Colo., teacher of seventeen fourteen-year-old girls: "Each Sunday during the last quarter I appointed one of the girls to teach the lesson the next Sunday. They were all enthusiastic over it; the lessons were nicely prepared by all the class. Fifteen out of the seventeen girls prepare their lessons."

A rather drastic method is used by a Columbus, Ohio, teacher of eleven to twelve year old boys: "I only tell the youngsters that if they do not get their lessons they will have to get out of my class to let in some who are waiting to get in." And ninety-five per cent. of the boys respond to that treatment. But that teacher does a big lot of work for the boys in the recreational life, and they love him.

Another Denver teacher writes concerning her class of thirty members, a mixed class averaging twenty-one years: "I give out work to be done and then am sure to call for it."

More of these replies next week.

can be made by yourself into scores of useful and uniquely beautiful things for Christmas. Giving at the mere cost of a few thin boards of Cypress, "the wood eternal," and "a little pleasant labor lovingly done."

This box was made by a society girl of New Orleans.

WHY NOT MAKE HIM A "SUGI" CYPRESS BOX?

—to keep his cigars in (let him call it a humidor if he wants to.) Or, on the other hand, why should not YOU put in a little time and a little easy and interesting work and make HER a royal serving tray of Sugi Cypress—that will add real distinction to your dining-room and delight her more than any conventional gift of greater cost. Anyhow, the first thing to do is to Get the NEW CYPRESS "SUGI" BOOK:

"THE MOST USABLE FREE BOOK EVER PRINTED FOR FOLKS LIKE YOU AND US."

It tells not only how you can reproduce perfectly the rare and coveted Antique Japanese Driftwood effects by scorching and brushing off a piece of "just ordinary lumber" (working in your own kitchen or cellar) but also why Cypress, owing to its peculiar properties is the only wood the Sugi treatment will work on—aside from the fact that no other American wood offers similarly ornate natural grain.

The SUGI process is NOT "PYROGRAPHY" nor anything like it. You do no designing or tracing or coloring—simply bring out the natural beauty and distinction of the wood. The book also lists numberless suggestions as to What to Make—from a glove box to paneling for the library.

DON'T MISS IT—AND DON'T DELAY. WRITE FOR VOL. 26. SENT FREE.

When planning a Manicure, Fingering, Farm a Sleeping-Por, or just a Fence, remember—"With Cypress You Build But Once!"

Let our "ALL-ROUND HELPS DEPARTMENT" help YOU. Our entire resources are at your service with Reliable Counsel.

SOUTHERN CYPRESS MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION

1226 Hibernia Bank Bldg., New Orleans, La. :: 1226 Heard National Bank Bldg., Jacksonville, Fla.

INSIST ON CYPRESS AT YOUR LOCAL DEALER'S. IF HE HASN'T IT, LET US KNOW IMMEDIATELY

WRITE today for this big, finely illustrated Shopping Guide and do your Christmas buying comfortably at home. Thousands of practical suggestions for the best kind of gifts—useful, beautiful—articles you can be sure are right in quality and price because they come from Peacock's, the store whose word is backed by more than three-quarters of a century of scrupulously honorable dealing.

Peacock—Elgin

Solid Gold Cuff Buttons, plain, Roman finish, monogram engraved free, $3.00.

A Watch Bracelet has practical, permanent value as well as artistic beauty when it bears the name Peacock-Elgin—a twofold guarantee of perfect satisfaction. $15 to $70. Lady Elgin, 14 k. gold, 15 jewels, $40. Men's Peacock Special Elgin, 14 k. gold, thin model, $20. Others to $700.

C.D. PEACOCK ESTABLISHED 1837
State & Adams Sts. CHICAGO

Children's Christmas Delight

Their healthful, happy pastime can best be made bright with a Pony Buggy—Surely every child longs for

A Beautiful Pony Buggy

Parents write for Colored Booklet No. 55, telling of Pony Vehicles and Harness, also of Pony Farms.

HOME PONY VEHICLE CO. CINCINNATI, O.

NO MONEY

Just ask for a generous trial bottle; 3-In-One cleans and polishes all veneered and varnished surfaces; saves old furniture. Write 3-IN-1 OIL CO., 42 CH. Broadway, New York

Precious Promise Bible

Something Entirely New—Just Off the Press

ALL THE PROMISES IN RED

Most Comforting Bible Published

The famous, international clear type, self-pronouncing edition, with all the teachers' helps. Beautifully illustrated in colors. Leather, only $3.75. Descriptive Circular Free.

SEND FOR OUR FREE CATALOGS

of Song Books, Bibles, Bible Mottoes, Christian Workers' Helps, Missionary Books, Temperance Books, Purity Books, Christian Evidence and Anti-Infernal Books, Peace Literature, etc. Agents Wanted.

We Have the Most Complete Catalogs Published

GLAD TIDINGS PUBLISHING CO. Lakeside Building CHICAGO, ILL.

All the Way By FANNY EDNA STAFFORD

At the day's unknown beginning,
Ere the hours so full of care,
When we ask Him for His guidance,
As we come to Him in prayer;
While we wait His loving whisper
Just for us,—He, passing by,
Lingers there to walk beside us,
If we ask Him—you and I.

He can straighten all the tangles—
All the puzzling knots untie—
If we only bring them to Him,
And just leave them—you and I.

All the days we'll leave with Jesus
What He bade us do or bear;
All He taught or wrought or brought us,
In the work He let us share.
How He chose our pathway for us;
How He guided with His eye,
We'll remember in the Homeland,
Where we'll see Him—you and I.

All the way we'll go with Jesus,
No one else so understands
How our service, tho' most faithful,
Needs His loving, patient hands.

Make Your Battery Shift The Gears

IN this black box, with which every gasoline car is equipped, there is sufficient power to shift your gears 100,000 times without recharging. Electricity, which cranks your engine, can be made to shift the gears. The same simple method of operation can be employed—a push-button. Every automobile owner, and everyone contemplating the purchase of an automobile will be vitally interested in "The Next Big Improvement In Automobiles", a booklet (just issued) describing magnetic gear shifting. Copy of booklet on request. Also, if you desire it, name of dealer in your town who can furnish car equipped with Magnetic Gear Shift.

THE CUTLER-HAMMER MFG. CO.
1206 St. Paul Avenue, Milwaukee, Wis.
Look for the Magnetic Gear Shift at the New York and Chicago Shows

Great Xmas Gift

The Xmas gift problem solved—a sensible, useful gift for every man, woman and boy—a new kind of gift that will really please. A wireless Electric Hand Lamp that overcomes usual lamp and lantern nuisances—that gives you all the piercing, brilliant light you need when you need it.

New Features

Powerful, concentrating and magnifying lens—pure-silver-coated Reflector—genuine tungsten bulb—massive nickel-plated steel hood to protect bulb. Lens and Reflector—thumb pressure switch, heavy enameled steel battery container—11 1/2 in. high. Uses No. 6 dry cell.

Price Reduced

For the first time—a big powerful lantern lamp at a small price—a genuine $2.00 lamp reduced to $1.50.

Now Sent On Approval

Try the Federal before you keep it! That's our big offer. Simply send us $1.00 now for Federal, postpaid. If it isn't the greatest $1.00 value you've ever seen, return it and your money will be refunded. You risk absolutely nothing. Send NOW.

Federal Sign System (Electric)
643 W. Lake St., Chicago

MAGAZINES

J. M. Hanson-Bennett Magazine Agency is the largest in the world. You can save money on the magazine you want by writing for

This Catalog FREE

Our new Catalog lists more than 3000 Periodicals and Club Offers. IT'S A BIG MONEY SAVER. Send us your name and address on post card today and get this big free catalog. Don't miss it! Agents Wanted. Write for full particulars.

J. M. HANSON-BENNETT Magazine Agency
222 Brooks Building Chicago, Illinois

Tyco's THERMOMETERS Keep a Tyco's Fever Thermometer in your home. Unnecessary illness may be avoided by observing body temperature. ASK YOUR DEALER

Taylor Instrument Companies, Rochester, N. Y.

Young People's Topics for December 19

How the Prophecy of the Angels' Christmas Song May Come True

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topic. Luke 2:8-20

The Christmas Song of Peace

Epworth League Topic. Luke 2:8-20

THE two topics assigned for study by the three young people's societies this week are so nearly alike that they can be studied together. The most helpful interpretation of the Epworth League subject of world peace will be a study of the particular question asked in the other topic: "How may the prophecy of the angels' Christmas song come true?"

One method of righting a wrong is to discover the evil and remove it; the other is to overlook the evil and try to develop the good. Two recent allegories, "The Servant in the House" and "The Passing of the Third Floor Back," illustrate these different methods. The Oriental butler, the "servant in the house," who was a modernization of the Christ, pointed out the precise evils of each individual life connected with the household and brought about the eradication of those evils—in every case but that of the bishop, who had to be eradicated bodily from the whole situation. The second allegory portrayed the other plan: the strange boarder found something good and pure in each of the lives gathered under that London roof and developed the good until the character was redeemed.

The new school of healing known as "psychotherapy" is using the first method. Some inspirational writers and representatives of various healing and uplift cults take the position of the little boy's mother: "Forget it." Forget the past; forget self; ignore inward conditions—look forward and outward. The other school says: "This philosophy is all right, but it comes after something else has been done. The past has left 'splinters' in the mind, roots of poison, fountains of disorder, which must be removed before the individual can do good, normal work."

As we study the words and methods of Christ, we find that he used both methods but emphasized the first. "The Servant in the House" is a truer portrayal of his methods than the "Passing of the Third Floor Back." He located the evil, showed how it could be removed, then told the souls which had been healed how to use the health they had found for the healing of others.

This long introduction is to lead up to the exhortation that our young people's societies make it a big and serious part of their work to find out and locate the specific things that are keeping souls, communities, denominations, nations back from reaching our Lord's ideals. Now on today's particular question, what has hindered and what is hindering the coming of universal peace which the angels promised and of which every Christmas season reminds us?

Viewing the world situation today, it appears that the first great wrong that must be eradicated is "nationalism." Nationalism is another word for civic selfishness. And civic selfishness is just as bad as individual selfishness. A nation does not exist for itself, but for all the world. We must train people to think in international rather than national terms. Great international brotherhoods or organizations like the Jewish race, or the Y. M. C. A., or the international Socialist organization, or Freemasonry, or the organized Church of Christ—which ought to be the strongest international force of all—have the germ idea of universal peace. The passion for peace and brotherhood must be so strong that national boundaries will be forgotten.

It is a time when something positive ought to be said about our own nation and its plan during the present war. In all this discussion about preparedness and unpreparedness we must keep insisting that the real duty of this nation is not to keep itself great and strong, nor to grow greater and stronger, but to be of service to all the other nations of the world.

The second world sore is capitalism. The real king of the world is Gold. There have been no more sickening revelations in history than those which have shown how "patriots" of various nations have been united in the business of manufacturing and selling instruments and means of destruction. The darkest blot on American history is this new era of prosperity caused by consent to continue Europe's war making and selling ammunition arms to the fighting nations. Again again throughout this war the sin of power of money has been felt. G international issues have been set in Wall Street. The power of money must be broken. Jesus revealed his own convictions about wealth and deadly power as an obstacle to progress of his plans when he dealt with emphasis and finality: "Ye cannot serve God and Mammon."

Reviewing the centuries of Christian history we note how certain other great evils have been eradicated from human society or at least from the nation of more advanced civilization. Chastity, slavery was a great world sore. This was making universal brotherhood possible, and it had to be eradicated. Feudalism was another such evil, and this, too, came to an end.

While there are other great world sores which are acting as present hindrances to world peace, these that have been mentioned, nationalism and capitalism, are the most deadly and no study of the Christmas message could be more fruitful than that which seeks to understand these two great evils and seeks to find a way for their removal from the world.

Of course we must not forget the spiritual side of the kingdom of Jesus. If all men had the international viewpoint and if society were really freed from the rule of gold, this would not be enough. We would still need to lead to the life of communion with God, a life controlled by his Spirit. But the two arch-foes are blocking the good message and deadening the spiritual ears of the nations that need Christ's great salvation. We can hardly expect the heathen to accept the message of our Bible while they are listening to the roar of the guns of Christian armies and feeling the pressure of the greed of the commercial leaders of Christian nations. And the roar of the guns will cease when the dream of world peace comes to pass when men shall really come to believe that "the life is more than meat" and when they shall understand that "Christ hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on the face of the earth."

The Federal Reserve Act

By E. C. ROWE

ONE year ago, or, to be exact, on November 16, 1914, the Federal Reserve Act became operative, and more than seven thousand National Banks in the United States went under the provisions of the new law. It was a momentous epoch in American financial history. It marked the ending of a fifty-year period of archaic and wholly indefensible banking procedure, and inaugurated a currency and banking statute, the intent of which is to make forever impotent the former power of a few individuals to control the money supply of the country through processes of periodical drainage of the country's currency and credit into the vaults of Wall Street banks. This potential concentration of the people's money has produced two evils of far-reaching and sinister import. It has periodically caused a famine in currency throughout the land; it has recurrently given birth to speculative mania which found expression in unrestricted stock gambling, inflation of speculative credit, and, eventually, in widespread commercial prostration and not infrequently acute financial disaster.

The panic of 1907, usually referred to nowadays as The Panic, is now recognized to have been due mainly to the defects of our former banking system. Since Alexander Hamilton in 1791 established our first national bank, there has been no parallel to the paralyzing effect of the 1907 panic—to the extent to which it brought about the withdrawal of money from circulation; just when the nation's reserve wealth and credit were most urgently needed, they were unattainable by the ones to whom they rightfully belonged. The Federal Reserve Act seeks to make forever impossible panics due to the periodic assembling of the nation's reserve wealth in speculative centers. It seeks to effect in times of need the speedy mobilization of currency and credit to any part of the country. The new law's provisions aim to benefit every man, woman and child in the United States; every business, large or small; and there is no bank so small nor none so large that the Federal Reserve Act will not benefit it if the bank will but put itself in line with its provisions.

HOW well the framers of the Federal Reserve Act performed their task will be measured only by the yardstick of time. The most enthusiastic friends of the Owens-Glass Bill have never claimed it could be a panacea for all the ills brought on by bad currency laws, nor will its avowed enemies—and there are some—make it bear the onus of whatever ills still remain unhealed; for they acknowledge the defects of the new statute can be remedied by the enactment of future legislation. The new law's efficiency has not yet been put to an emergency test, but as it may be judged by its probable strength in future times of stress, it is said by authorities to be about seventy per cent. perfect.

Now, just what are the principal elements constituting the Federal Reserve Act? We shall let Hon. Charles F.

Hamlin, governor of the Federal Reserve Board, say. In a recent address before a convention of New England bankers, the governor covered the phases of the Act, from its most elemental application to its most academic principles. From lack of space we quote only excerpts from the governor's remarks:

We had under the old system 7,500 independent banks and 7,500 independent reserves. There was no co-operation between banks. Under the old system they were like an army going into action, an army of individuals, without a single company, battalion or regiment. But all that has been done away with by the Federal Reserve System. Under the old law, in times of stress, the reserves were hermetically sealed up to the business men, who could only look on the reserves in the banks—the national banks—of the United States, but could not secure any benefit from their use. They were almost in the position of a man dying from starvation looking through a plate glass window at a very delicacy in the way of food, on which he reads an announcement: "This food is for your express benefit. You may look at it, you may enjoy the delicious fragrance, but under no circumstance can you eat a particle of it!"

Now, that was the condition of the reserves before the enactment of the Federal Reserve Act. In the panic of 1907, in one of the worst stages of that panic, there was over $200,000,000 of excess reserves in banks throughout the United States. If these reserves had been co-ordinated we should have had no panic at all. The banks having to take care of themselves, they had to fight for their lives and the devil take the hindmost, the hindmost generally being their poor customers. And piling up their reserves, they had to call loans and refuse to make new loans; and the moment that the banks began to hoard money

For Your Home Made Xmas Candy

French Dainties, Marshmallows, Turkish Delight—these and many other wholesome candies make delightful Christmas gifts.

This recipe is for
KNOX YULETIDE DAINTIES

Soak 2 envelopes Knox Acidulated Gelatine in 1 cup cold water 3 minutes. Add 1½ cups boiling water. When dissolved, add 4 cups granulated sugar and boil gently for 10 minutes. Divide into 2 equal parts. When somewhat cooled, add to 1 part ½ teaspoonful of the Lemon Flavouring found in separate envelopes, dissolved in 1 table-spoonful water, and 1 teaspoonful lemon extract. To the other part add ½ teaspoonful extract of cloves, and color with the pink color. Pour into shallow tins that have been dipped in cold water. Let stand over night; turn out and cut into squares. Roll in fine granulated or powdered sugar and let stand to crystallize. Vary by using different flavors and colors, and adding chopped nuts, dates or figs.

KNOX SPARKLING GELATINE (Granulated)

Send for 1916 Edition of the Knox Recipe Book
—FREE for your grocer's name. Print sample for 2c stamp and your grocer's name.

CHAS. B. KNOX CO., Inc.
455 Knox Ave.
Johnstown, New York

Carl Borlen
EAGLE BRAND
CONDENSED MILK
THE ORIGINAL

Your baby will thrive and grow plump and rosy if you give him rich, nourishing "Eagle Brand."

Pure cows' milk so prepared that it comes to your baby a safe, easily digested food—that is "Eagle Brand." Just dissolve in freshly boiled water and it's ready.

POMPEIAN
OLIVE OIL
ALWAYS FRESH

There is the same marked difference between fresh Olive Oil and Olive Oil packed months ago as there is between a newly-laid egg and an egg months old. Insist on POMPEIAN that was the signal for hoarding by the individual.

THE STANDARD IMPORTED OLIVE OIL

The Federal Reserve Act has made dead commercial paper fairly quiver with life. The bank can now have its cake and eat it too. It can loan its funds and take commercial paper, and yet that commercial paper is gold in that the bank has merely to step across the street to the Federal Reserve bank and there it will be turned into gold or cash credits on demand. . . . Furthermore, when you take into consideration the power over discount rates, you will see what tremendous power the Federal Reserve banks and the Federal Reserve Board have in regulating the flow in and out of the United States of the precious metals. It has also provided a system of elastic currency. We have power to issue, to-day, practically 400, or 500 millions of Federal reserve notes if there were any possible necessity therefor. . . .

The Federal Reserve Act is a very long and somewhat detailed document, and it is not easy to extract all the essentials from it from a casual reading, but the underlying principles of that Act are simplicity itself. The country is divided into twelve districts, and each district contains from 500 to 700 national banks. The national banks in each district form a new bank, called the Federal Reserve bank. The capital of these Federal Reserve banks varies from $5,000,000 to $20,000,000. So you have these twelve Federal Reserve banks supported by the national banks and the state banks.

THE first question that naturally arises in the reader's mind is how Wall Street panics can affect his concerns, and how the Federal Reserve Act can be of any benefit to a private citizen. No popular error is more unfounded than the impression that laws governing currency issuance and banking affect only those fortunate individuals who are possessed of large wealth. Like all popular errors, this one proceeds from a lack of knowledge, and vanishes the moment we face the facts. No field of human energy is exempt from the influences of wrong banking laws; no avenue of human industry is free from the blighting effects of Wall Street panics. Let us see what the panic of 1907 wrought for the American people, and recount, briefly, the most immediate banking causes for this visitation of hysteria and the attending results.

We must remember that money is essentially migratory. It restlessly seeks the places where the most remunerative employment offers. When, as often occurs, the South, or the North, or the West has completed the movement of crops, and trade and industry in any given section of the country have slackened their normal pace, the banks cannot find profitable loans for their increasing reserves among their own people, and they cast about for an advantageous market for money in the larger centers of population where industry remains more constant than in the smaller communities. So off to the city bank goes the reserve accumulations of the country bank. But the time arrives seasonally when the city banks find their funds in lessened demand, and interest rates decline. Forthwith the city bank bundles off its unemployed currency to the New York money market, for here cheap money finds a welcome always. These transferred funds are then loaned out on call, that is, on "liquid collateral," securities that can be readily converted into cash. The greater the volume of money seeking employment in New York the cheaper it becomes, and cheap money in Wall Street almost invariably begets a general speculative movement on the stock exchange, which all too frequently ends in dangerous inflation of credit and, as in 1907, in disaster.

But, to be fair with Wall Street, we must observe that panics do not always follow speculative inflation, nor inflation follow as a result of cheap money and speculation. The industries of the country could not exist were it not for the stock exchanges and legitimate speculation in stocks and bonds, and when everything in Wall Street is normal and serene the bank in Atlanta, or in Minneapolis, or in Fresno can requisition its funds from the New York bank, and the money, or its equivalent, will be quickly forthcoming. The tradesman, or the manufacturer, or the farmer, will go to his bank and the bank will give him the accommodation that he is entitled to receive. Local money has once more come home again, through many ramifying byways, from its gay life in the cities.

BUT things are not always well in Wall Street. Country funds do not always return home when bidden. Such was the case during the fateful panic in 1907, which inaugurated a reign of financial terror without parallel in American history. At a time when the nation's reserve wealth was most needed, it was locked up securely in the strong boxes of Wall Street banks. Currency sold at a stiff premium. The entire machinery of interstate banking was disorganized. The Western bank demanded funds from New York but New York would pay out no money. The country bank wanted its funds from the city bank, but got little if any. The tradesman, the manufacturer, the farmer, all wanted accommodation from their banks, but their banks would not, and in many cases could not, meet the most pressing legitimate demands. Money had as by magic disappeared from off the face of the earth. There was no wage-earner, no small business, no manufacturer, no merchant prince, no farmer in the length and breadth of the land who was exempt from the influences of that memorable orgy of senseless fear and disarrangement of our intricate banking machinery.

It is to make forever impossible a recurrence of conditions which were responsible for the 1907 panic that the Federal Reserve Act is framed and put into practice. No part of the country now is subject to factors which heretofore conspired to impair its reserve resources; no section of the United States, not immediately associated with speculation on the stock exchanges, is now vulnerable to serious disturbance from future breaks in the prices of securities. The Federal Reserve system marshals the nation's reserve wealth in twelve battalions to twelve prominent points of vantage. These points of vantage are the Central reserve cities, which are: Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Atlanta, Minneapolis, Chicago, San Francisco, St. Louis, Cleveland, Kansas City, Richmond, and Denver.

From these central reservoirs of currency and credit, which represent, approximately, the wealth reserves in these localities, the adjacent communities only, through their banks, known as member banks, may draw financial sustenance. Moreover, credit in these localities may be expanded to the limit of the industrial prosperity in these specified sections. And that such credit expansion may be without detriment to any other portion of the United States, the Federal Reserve Act has completely inverted the old method of issuing currency. Whereas formerly the currency for circulation was coincident to and based upon government loans in the form of national bonds, thus making money represent a national debt, the Federal Reserve Act says that money shall represent the results of industry and credit. Under the old régime the more the government got into debt the greater became the volume of money in circulation. The more money in circulation, just that poorer was the government's credit, for the more the government borrowed the less it could borrow. When the government's notes became due and were paid, the amount of the payment represented the sum which was withdrawn from the amount of currency in circulation.

Our new currency is predicated not upon government debt, but upon commercial credit, familiarly known as commercial paper, and upon agricultural credit, which is based upon the land itself. The more prosperous the people become, the more credit and money there will be available for the daily use and benefit of business and for personal concerns. Under the Federal Reserve Act money will always be available for all legitimate expansion, and the expansion of credit and currency will be coincident with prevailing demands. Such, in brief, are the intent and the provisions of the new currency law.

The truth about some folks is that there is little that is true about them.

$2.50 to $150.00 In Gift Boxes

Waterman's Ideal
Fountain Pen

The Handiest Thing in the World.

The Family Gift

For Schoolchild
Student
Business Man
Professional Man
Doctor and Teacher
Office Woman
Housewife

There are small Waterman's Ideals for vest pocket and purse, and larger for desk and general use. Gold pens to suit every hand and exchangeable until fitted. Plain or handsomely mounted with gold or silver. A wide range of prices but only one standard quality. Be sure you give the genuine Waterman's Ideal.

Ask to see the new Self Filler
Also Safety and Regular Types

Best Stores Most Everywhere
Illustrated Gift Folder on Request

L. E. Waterman Company
173 Broadway, New York

Boston Montreal Chicago London San Francisco Buenos Ayres

Our Mail-Bag

NOTICE

THE editors of the Christian Herald will be glad to answer any question addressed to the Mail-Bag provided it be of general interest and not merely personal. Correspondents may use a nom de plume to identify the question, but all letters must contain name and address of the sender, in addition to the nom de plume. No attention will be paid to anonymous letters.

Questions and Answers

MISS H. S., St. Louis, Mo. How do you reconcile the act of Jesus in forcibly driving the money-changers out of the temple with his teaching that evil should not be resisted?

When Jesus said "Resist not evil," he was quite evidently referring to personal grievances. We cannot imagine Christ striking a man for any insult or wrong inflicted upon him personally. In fact, when he was most cruelly and shamefully treated during the last hours of his life he not only made no effort to defend himself, but showed by his prayer on the cross that there was nothing but forgiveness in his heart. In the temple scene, on the other hand, he was not defending himself, but his great life principles of piety, purity, justice, love. He had come into the world to establish a kingdom of love and justice, and those who stood in the way of that kingdom he attacked, not only with his tongue, but in this case with his hands. Yet the narrative does not state that he actually struck any one; the scourge is a sign of his anger against the wrongs perpetrated and his determination to cleanse his Father's house. It is likely that in the present world conflict some people attempt to use this incident from Christ's life as a justification of armed force when employed on the side of righteousness. But it is not capable of such an application. It is impossible to think of Christ as killing any one. And we may be sure that of all the griefs that have torn his heart since it was pierced on Calvary, grief at seeing his followers so frequently engaged in slaughter is one of the deepest and sharpest.

Reader, Scranton, Pa. There are no indications among our missionaries in China of any cause for apprehending undue interference with religious freedom as the outcome of the elections there. The religious situation is very different from that which prevailed prior to the republic. President Yuan has been liberal in his attitude towards missions, and if he should be chosen as sole ruler, this attitude will probably be continued. He has even contributed toward the founding of the Union University of West China, which was organized by Methodists, Baptists and other Protestant denominations. Besides, it is stated on reliable authority that more than seven thousand of China's officials and literati are now on the side of Christianity and attend Bible classes, while two of President Yuan's sons are students in a Christian university.

N. C. C., Eufula, Okla. The appellation "Jew" is one which has changed its distinctive meaning. Originally, it was a name based upon that of the patriarch Judah, the fourth son of Jacob, and was applied to any one belonging to the tribe or country of Judah, or to any subject of the separate kingdom of Judah. When the captivity took place, the term "Jew" began to be applied to all of the Hebrew language and race, without distinction. This continued even after the return from the exile, and it has ever since remained the universal recognized term to be used in referring to them. In Paul's time it would seem that all three appellations were used as occasion served. See Phil. 3:15; II Cor. 11:22. It is possible, however, that he had in mind the Hebrew-speaking Jews, in contrast with those that spoke Greek. 2. The history of the Hebrew language cannot be traced back further than Abraham's day. On his entrance into Canaan he is believed to have found a language in use which had dialectic affinity with his own, but it cannot now be decided whether the Hebrew, in the oldest form in which we know it, was a common dialect that Abraham found existing in Canaan, or whether he brought it with him. Isa. 19:18 intimates that Hebrew was actually the language of Canaan. There are some who even contend that Hebrew was the original language of the human race; but this is hardly discussible, although it is generally conceded by philologists that the antiquity of Hebrew seems to extend beyond the historic period.

R. F. Did David sin when he killed Goliath?

In labeling an act of the past sinful or righteous, it is necessary to consider the standards of the time and the amount of revelation that had been received up to that period. For instance, slavery and polygamy were not recognized as wrong in Old Testament times, but in the further revelation of the New Testament, and of the Holy Spirit since Bible times, we have come to see that they are wrong. There are acts in David's life that seem far more shocking from spiritual standards of today than his attack on Goliath. The conflict between the Philistines and the Israelites was unavoidable. The Philistines had come up to attack and the Israelites felt that they must not surrender. Since the conflict was bound to occur, it might better be between two men than between two groups of several hundred thousand each. In fact, some humorous people, with perhaps deeper wisdom than they themselves realize, have suggested that a good way to have settled the present mysterious controversies of Europe would have been for the dozen or twenty men most interested to fight it out rather than to involve millions in the bloody slaughter. But after all, all bloodshed seems hideous and needless in the light of Christ's gospel.

V. B., Bay City, Mich. Pride of ancestry is with many persons a dominant passion. It is good for one to be well-born; but it is better still to have one's life so ordered and one's abilities and character so developed as to be able to render the best service to the age we live in. Ancestral virtues stand as a rebuke to us if we ourselves be weak and worthless, and our thoughts and actions puerile or mean. Many of the finest characters in our nation's history came of very humble stock. Tennyson expressed the right idea when he wrote:

"Tis only noble to be good;
Kind hearts are more than coronets
And simple faith than Norman blood!"

J. M., Ashtabula, Ohio. From what country do the Basques come, and can you tell me something of their history?

The Basques occupy a mountainous territory in the north of Spain and the south of France. They speak a language which has no relation to any other in Europe, but resembles the languages spoken by the North American Indians more nearly than any others. This does not mean that they had a common origin, but that when these languages took their present shape the peoples who spoke them were in a similar stage of development. The Basque language is entirely deficient in abstract terms, all such words being borrowed from other languages. It is spoken by about 600,000 Spaniards and Frenchmen, and was probably at one time spoken over a large part of Western Europe. The Basques are very proud and tenacious of their ancient customs and rights, and have given to Spain some of her most illustrious men.

J. S., Jameson, Mo. "Mr." and "Mrs." were not in common use before the sixteenth century. Up to that time, it was customary in England to call unmarried ladies "mistress," and "Mr." as a title of address was applied to the middle class, with the exception of those having official titles. It was synonymous with "master" and is a term of respect now generally applied, except to those who have some professional designation or title. It has its equivalent in "Herr," "Monsieur," and "Signor."

Friend in Maine. The passage in Matt. 22:30 is parallel with Mark 12:25, and is not meant to imply that "all ties are to be broken when we pass from this world." Jesus had been questioned concerning marriage, which he explained was ordained to perpetuate the human race; but as there would be no more death in the future state, there will be no breaches in the family, and consequently the ordinance of marriage will not exist there.

C. M., Dixon, N. B. "The seal of God," on which is supposed to be engraved the name of "Jehovah," which was impressed upon the foreheads of the faithful, is interpreted as symbolizing the indwelling of the Holy Spirit. II Tim. 2:19 refers to it as a token of assurance. Alford writes: "The seal has this meaning with the legend on one side of its round surface: 'The Lord Knoweth.'" See also Rev. 7:2 and 9:4, and related passages.

Reader, Urbana, Ohio. It is not an unusual thing for churches in our large cities to engage professionals to sing in the choir. There are many good people who take exception to this, however, holding that it is wrong to employ in the service of God's house those who are connected with theaters, etc. We have never heard of professionals being engaged to lead the Sunday school singing.

Mrs. J. M. R., Cumberland, Md. The Queen of Sheba is supposed to have come from Yemen in Arabia Felix. Matt. 12:42 calls her "the Queen of the South." She may have been a descendant of Sheba, Abraham's grandson by Keturah. Arabian legends give her the name of Bilkis or Yelkama, queen of the Himyarites.

Tarheel, Port Vincent, La. John the Baptist was of the priestly race by both parents, his father Zacharias being himself a priest of the course of Abias, while his mother was of the daughters of Aaron. The Bible itself gives no positive statements concerning your other question.

M. T., Jacksonville, Texas. The name of Samson's mother, the wife of Manoah, is nowhere given in the Scriptures.

Mrs. L. L., Poughkeepsie, N. Y. Not in our collections.

Crooked Spine Made Straight

by the Sheldon Method

Thousands of Remarkable Cases
An old lady, 72 years of age who suffered for many years and was absolutely helpless, found relief thru the Sheldon Method. A man who was helpless, unable to rise from his chair, was riding horseback and playing tennis within a year. A little child paralyzed, was playing about the house after wearing the Sheldon Appliance 3 weeks. We have successfully treated more than 20,000 cases in the past 14 years.

30 Days' Trial

At Our Risk

We will prove its value in your own case. There is no reason why you should not accept our offer. The photographs show how light, cool, elastic and easily adjustable the Sheldon Appliance is—how different from the old torturous plaster, leather or steel jackets.

Every sufferer with a weakened or deformed spine owes it to himself to investigate thoroughly. Price within reach of all.

Send for Our Free Book
If you will describe the case it will aid us in giving you definite information at once.

PHILO BURT MFG. CO.
207 12th Street, Jamestown, N. Y.

FOUR DESIGNS IN COLORS

HOLIDAY BOXES

Boston Garter

Velvet Slip

Sensible Gifts

that husband, father, son and brother will appreciate. They will enjoy year-round comfort by wearing the "Boston"—the only garter for men that has the

Velvet Slip QUALITY RUBBER BUTTON CLASP

At your dealer's or by mail.
Lisle, 25c., Silk, 50c.
George Frost Co., Boston.

WORN BY MEN THE WORLD OVER

Sunshine Lamp

300 Candle Power FREE

To Try In Your Own Home

Turns night into day. Gives better light than gas, electricity or 18 ordinary lamps at one-tenth the cost. For Homes, Stores, Halls, Churches. A child can carry it. Makes its light from common gasoline. No wick. No chimney. Absolutely SAFE.

COSTS 1 CENT A NIGHT

We want one person in each locality to whom we can refer new customers. Take advantage of our SPECIAL FREE TRIAL OFFER. Write today. AGENTS WANTED.

SUNSHINE SAFETY LAMP CO.
695 Factory Bldg., Kansas City, Mo.

BARGAINS IN GOOD BOOKS

THE HOME LIFE SERIES, Published by Macmillan Co.
CHINA, TURKEY, SPAIN AND RUSSIA

Published Price, $1.75 per volume. Our Special Price 75c each. Postage, 10c.

THE H. R. HUNTING COMPANY
Springfield, Massachusetts

SEND FOR OUR BARGAIN CATALOG

PASTOR'S COMMUNION SERVICE

For Visiting the Sick

Every Pastor should have one. Leather Case. Silver-plated Flagon and Wafer Box, six crystal glasses. An ideal gift for the pastor. Special price, $5.50 postpaid, satisfaction guaranteed.

THOMAS COMMUNION SERVICE CO.
Box 611, Lima, Ohio

6% NET

For 36 years we have been paying our customers the highest returns consistent with conservative methods. First mortgage loans of $200 and up to $25,000. We can recommend after the most thorough personal investigation. Please ask for Loan List No. 7.

$25 Certificates of Deposit also for saving investment.

PERKINS & CO. Lawrence, Kan.

TABLE GRACES

For DAILY USE
SPECIAL DAY AND OCCASION

All Will Welcome This New Book of Graces. Postpaid. Paper, 25c. Cloth, 50c. M. E. MUNSON, 77 Bible House, New York, N. Y.

TIEMANN'S AID FOR THE DEAD

Sent on two weeks' trial—
Address: D., G. Tiemann & Co., 107 Park Row, New York

XMAS HANDKERCHIEFS.

Write for Catalog
Send Ninety Cents for Six Pure Linen, plain or initial.
Flax Products Co., 603 Fifth Avenue, New York

Her Christmas Morning

KODAK

The gift that provides the means for keeping a happy picture story of the day.

Kodaks, $6.00 up. Brownies, $1.00 to $12.00.

All Kodak dealers.

EASTMAN KODAK COMPANY,
ROCHESTER, N. Y., The Kodak City.

TANGO

Angora Vests for Misses & Women

In wintry weather, nothing approaches the comfort and warmth of this TANGO ANGORA. Notice the beautiful, well-fitting lines and stylish appearance. Made of fine quality wool, full of warmth yet light in weight. Has a knitted border all around. Sizes range from 34 to 46 bust. Comes in Old Rose, Copenhagen, Cardinal and Oxford. In ordering, give size and color. Tested. Sent parcel post paid $1.50.

There's a thought here for GIFTS

MEN'S ANGORA VEST

of Fine Quality Wool

Latest style, adapted for coldest weather wear. Vest border and pockets have knitted edges. Sizes 36 to 46 in Oxford and Heather. (Oxford shows no weave.) Give size and color wanted when ordering. Sent parcel post paid $2.50.

These prices for U. S. and Possessions Only

THE ADASON CO.
1031 Chestnut St., Philadelphia, Pa.

AGENTS WANTED

for our independent hollow-wire lighting systems for homes, stores, public buildings, etc. Use common gasoline. Best and cheapest illumination known.

AKRON LIGHTING SYSTEMS

are most improved, simplest and safest of all. Shed a clear, soft, bright light of high candle power. Also complete line of portable and street lamps, and lanterns. Fully guaranteed. Our Agency Proposition cannot be beat. Exclusive territory. Send quick for catalog and terms.

Agents' Outfit
Akron Gas Lamp Co., 627 So. Main St., Akron, Ohio

OYSTERS

Shucked daily as they come from our oyster beds in the Chesapeake Bay with their natural salt water flavor.

SINGLE GALLON, $1.25
THREE GALLONS, $3.00

BODKIN FARMS CO., Carroll Bldg., Baltimore, Md.

Christian Herald Prayer League

MRS. J. R. B. writes to tell of a glorious revival in Asheville, N. C., in answer to prayer. She says: "I want to acknowledge God's love for us here in Asheville in such a glorious revival under the direction of the Chapman-Alexander campaign. It being felt for hundreds of miles. My husband and boy, for whom I asked prayer, have been saved. Praise God from whom all blessings flow!" M. E. Reed City, Mich., writes: "I am writing to acknowledge answer to prayer for our pastor's wife. We are rejoicing over the fact that her mind is restored and she is home from the state hospital and able to care for her child and husband. They are a happy family, being united after so long a separation. Thanks be to God and also the Prayer League members." M. M. H., Brookhaven, Miss., writes: "I wish to thank you and to acknowledge answer to prayer recently requested. I have absolutely no doubt now of my spiritual redemption—of salvation." "Over a year ago," writes G. E. P. Atchison, Kan., "I wrote to you asking that prayers be offered for my sister, who is sick with tuberculosis in New Mexico. I wish to acknowledge that God has been very gracious and spared her to the doctors think she is a living wonder and miracle." Mrs. C. M. McCrites from Cranston, R. I., "I wrote to you asking you to pray for my mind to be healed and to get relief from terrible headaches. God heard the prayer and blessed me. I am feeling so much better and have not had a headache since." Mrs. M. B. S., York, Pa., writes: "Some time ago I asked your prayers at my son would be able to get work and that he might be kept from drinking. Thanks to God's goodness, he is now right after that and is making gentleman of himself." E. F. Crothens, Pa., who sends what she terms a little thank offering "to the Children's Home," writes: "I have been very sick and prayed God to let me live to raise my little children. He has helped me much I am now able to sit up, so I have saved this little to help some child at has no mother." She then adds request that she may fully recover her health. Mrs. F. E. C., Dos Palos, Calif., writes: "I wrote for my prayers about a month ago for my own health and financial help. About four days after sent the letter I began to gain and have it better than for years. Also God has helped me in every way." Acknowledgments of answered prayer have also been received from

M. S. F., Tennessee, Ill. (for help in a sickness matter); Mrs. C. E., Ontario, Calif.; H. Kitt, Pa. for the recovery to health a sister; Mrs. C. H. W., Garrett, Ind.; W. H. K., Tuskegee, Ala.; Mrs. C. R. H., E. S., Indiana, Pa.; S. A. D., Augusta, O.; C. S., Magnolia, Iowa; H. A., Bellevue, Ill.; Mrs. A., Sedansville, Ohio; M. S., Mount Pleasant, Pa.; A. C., Sebago Lake, Me. (for the recovery to health of a nephew who suffered from epilepsy); Miss I. M. N., any, N. Y.

Prayers are asked for revivals of religion at

Perry, Ill.; Shepherdstown, Ohio (at the M. church); Kosciusko, Miss. (that back-slidden church members may be brought to God); West Branch, N. Y.; Ostrander, Wash.; Len, Mich.; Dunkerton, Iowa (that a Baptist church in West Virginia may be revived); Mesach, Neb.; Cucamonga, Calif.; Wharton, Texas (that our church may do everything the glory of God); Magnolia, Iowa; Reed City, Mich.; Centralia, Wash.; Princeton, W. V. (that each pastor may be filled with God's Spirit and all Christians work in perfect harmony one with the other); Leeds, N. Y.; Central City, Neb.; Portage, Wis.; Imlay, Mich.; Emporium, Pa.; Modesto, Calif.; Hopkinsville, Ky.; Meshoppen, Pa.; Mrs. A. G. asks prayer that the members of her church may be awakened to a sense of duty, that they may have a revival and souls may be saved. Mrs. C. N. asks prayer that the people of Dunkerton, Iowa, may become so awakened over the lost and different men, women and children that God's Spirit may come upon them in such power as to cause them to exercise saving faith bringing sinners into the Kingdom; Mrs. G. K., that members of a Sunday school class Norton, Va., may be saved and new interest be taken in the class. A Mother requests

GREAT SPECIAL OFFER

The announcement herein, whereby Christian Herald readers are given the first opportunity to secure our introductory edition of WEBSTER'S MODERN ENGLISH DICTIONARY (UNABRIDGED) on special bargain terms, will be enthusiastically welcomed by those who read this liberal offer. This offer comes at a most opportune time for scores who realize what AN IDEAL CHRISTMAS GIFT this sumptuous book will make.

WEBSTER'S MODERN ENGLISH DICTIONARY

is the latest; unabridged dictionary of our language. It contains over 2,300 thumb-indexed pages, 8½ x 11 inches, is printed on thin American India featherweight paper, reducing bulk and weight to less than half of the usual size; bound in antique South American Jade flexible leather, especially selected, strong, durable, and destined to last a lifetime; contains the most complete appendix, including special features and exclusive glossaries of sports—thousands of text illustrations; many full page color plates from costly paintings, and statistical charts of the greatest importance.

EDITORSHIP

This book, comprising the authoritative unabridged dictionary by Noah Webster, LL.D., has been prepared under the editorial supervision of Thomas H. Russell, LL.D., LL.B., A.M., who was assisted in his labors by hundreds of eminent contributors from all parts of the world, including specialists, scholars, presidents and professors from the leading universities of Europe and America. Among these special contributors are the following:

Julian Chase, Ph.B., automobilism.
Walter Camp, football.
John B. Foster, baseball.
Walter J. Travis, golf.
Peter Spanjaard, lacrosse and ice hockey.
S. W. Merriam, laws terms.
James Chalmers, soccer.
Alfred W. Lawson, aviation.

This Dictionary is NOT published by the original publishers of Webster's Dictionary or by their successors.

ILLUSTRATIONS IN COLOR

In addition to the thousands of text illustrations, there has been inaugurated a unique departure by the use of many full-page color plates, covering hundreds of educational subjects. There are also a valuable series of statistical charts in sepia, prepared from government reports.

This illustration shows comparative sizes of our American India paper edition and same book printed on paper ordinarily used. There are over 2,300 pages, 8½ x 11 inches in size. Made only in thin paper, flexible leather style, reducing weight and bulk more than one-half.

General Features—Plan and Scope

The uppermost aim has been to make this dictionary absolutely complete to the present time, including all the thousands of new words recently added to the English language, and which are not to be found in the books published but a comparatively few years ago. The new words consist largely of terms belonging to the newer sciences, technology and the arts.

In making up the vocabulary the object has been not merely to make a word list greater than any other dictionary, but to make a better word list.

The definitions consist of direct statements, followed by synonyms, the form preferred by the best authorities.

The most approved methods have been employed in marks of pronunciation, type treatment, the use of obsolete and rare words, and illustrative quotations.

Exhaustive Appendix Features

Among the many subjects in the Appendix are: Glossaries of Sports. One Thousand Questions and Answers. Pronouncing Dictionary of Biography. Faulty Diction or Errors in Speech—how to correct them. List of Amended Spellings. Marks Used in Proofreading. Latest Census. Writing and Printing Symbols. Dictionary of Abbreviations. Pronouncing Dictionary of Greek and Latin Proper Names. Pronouncing Dictionary Scripture Proper Names. Foreign Words. Dictionary Foreign Words, Phrases, Noteworthy Sayings and Allegorical Expressions of Latin and Greek. Values of Standard Foreign Coins in United States Money. Pronouncing Gazetteer of the World.

INTRODUCTORY BARGAIN TERMS

Readers of the Christian Herald are to be congratulated on being able to secure this up-to-date full size, featherweight paper dictionary on special introductory terms. WEBSTER'S MODERN ENGLISH DICTIONARY, Unabridged, has been Published to Sell for $20

But under this Bargain Offer you can have it on $9 monthly payments for a total of..... $9

Other dictionaries of similar style sell for $22 upward. In order to quickly distribute the first limited allotment of this latest edition, we will ship the book anywhere charges prepaid, for inspection for an

INITIAL PAYMENT OF $1

Examine the book carefully and if it is not up to your expectations you may, within 5 days, return it at our expense, and your first payment will be returned to you.

YOU RISK NOTHING

If the book is satisfactory, remit us in addition $1 per month for 8 months as complete payment. This offer is limited, so act quick if you wish to be supplied at this special price.

If you do not wish the book on partial payments it will be shipped you, charges prepaid on receipt of $8. In full payment—the book to be returnable in five days for full refund, if you are dissatisfied.

SYNDICATE PUBLISHING CO., 9 and 11 EAST 37th STREET NEW YORK, N. Y.

FILL IN AND MAIL THE ORDER BLANK BELOW

BARGAIN PRICE ORDER

Syndicate Publishing Co., 9 East 37th St., N. Y.

Gentlemen:

Enclosed is $1, first payment, for which send me, charges prepaid, Webster's Modern English Dictionary, Unabridged, bound in full flexible leather, featherweight paper edition.

In addition I agree to send you $1 per month for eight months as complete payment for the book.

It is understood that if the book is not satisfactory I am privileged to return it to you within five days of its receipt by me, and you are to refund amount enclosed.

NAME.....

STREET.....

CITY..... STATE.....

prayer for a son who is an ordained Baptist minister, that God will open a door for him to preach.

An Anxious Mother asks prayer that her daughter's mind may be restored. Mrs. A. K., that daughter's mind may be strengthened; P. E. K., that wife's mind may be restored; Mrs. W. H. R., her husband's. A Sad Sister, her brother's; Rev. J. W. R., that wife's mind may be strengthened; Mrs. F. R. C., her husband's; N. W., her father's. Fifteen other friends ask prayer for mental restoration or strengthening for themselves or other friends and relatives.

Mrs. J. L. K. and M. B. W. ask prayer that their daughters' sight may be restored; Mrs. R. E. L., her brother's; E. H. A., an aunt's; M. J. S., asks prayer that the health of a mother whose baby has been stricken with blindness may not be undermined by this sorrow. Eight other friends ask prayer for the restoration or strengthening of sight for themselves or other friends.

Thirty-nine friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing.

E. H. A. asks prayer that three sons may be saved from the liquor habit; Mrs. M. C. B., two sons and a brother. Twelve other parents ask prayer that sons may be delivered from this habit; four wives, their husbands. Fourteen other friends ask prayer that friends or relatives may be saved from the liquor habit.

M. E. M. asks prayer that three sons may be saved. Thirty-nine other parents ask prayer for the conversion of sons; twenty-nine wives, their husbands. Fifty-one other friends ask prayer for the conversion of relatives or friends.

Eleven readers ask prayer for special spiritual blessing for relatives or friends.

Sixty-six friends ask prayer for the healing of relatives or friends, including Mrs. W. H. P., who asks that niece may regain use of limbs. Sixty friends ask prayer for restoration to health, including three who ask prayer that use of their limbs may be restored, one that voice may be restored, and

A Young Mother, who asks that she may be cured of a fatal disease for the sake of her four little children.

M. H. asks prayer that her mother's hearing may be restored; Mrs. B. F. B., her husband's; Rev. J. W. R., his wife's. Ten other friends ask prayer for restoration of hearing for relatives or for themselves.

Forty-four readers ask prayer for help or guidance in financial affairs.

Forty-eight readers ask prayer for the granting of varied desires and needs, including M. D., who asks that she may see or hear from son soon; and An Aged Mother, that peace may be restored between two sons.

NEXT TO THE BIBLE

I am reading the book you so kindly sent me, viz., "555 Difficult Bible Questions Answered." I thank you for sending it. It is truly a delight to me. I love to study the Bible, and this is next to it, it seems to me. Huntington, W. Va. M. L. W.

The Tale of Two Wives

Mrs. Oldwife

Yes, I use a washing machine. It's certainly a labor saver, but do you think the clothes come out as absolutely clean as if washed by hand?

Mrs. Neuwife

I used to be doubtful about that myself when I first bought one. But I use Fels-Naptha soap and am so pleased with the snowy whiteness of the clothes. You see, it dissolves the grease and loosens the dirt so that they can't stay in the clothes when the machine starts working. Saves so much time, too.

Mrs. Oldwife

Do you use it the same as any other soap?

Mrs. Neuwife

You can use it the Fels-Naptha way which I like best, or go by the directions that come with every washing machine, whether you buy hand or power. It does splendid work either way. I use Fels-Naptha for all my soap-and-water housework, too. It's just as wonderful for all household cleaning as it is for washing clothes.

There is a reason why Fels-Naptha does your work better, quicker and easier than any other soap. Fels-Naptha is a perfect combination of naptha and other wonderful cleansers in a soap made of pure materials. Fels-Naptha will not harm anything it touches—and perfectly cleans everything that pure water will not harm.

Fels & Co., Philadelphia

The Early Christian Church and Peace

By Reuben Hazen Smith

THE fidelity and loyalty of the Christian Herald in advocating peace has ample justification in the Master's precept and example. Refused shelter in a Samaritan village, as Jesus and the apostolic band are en route for Jerusalem, John and James, the "sons of thunder," are for calling down fire from heaven to avenge the insult. "Ye know not," calmly expostulates the Master, "what manner of spirit ye are of. The Son of man is not come to destroy men's lives, but to save them." Impulsive Peter has smitten off the ear of Malchus in Gethsemane. "Then said Jesus unto him: Put up again thy sword into his place, for all they that take the sword shall perish with the sword." This immutable law but echoes God's words to Noah: "Whose sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed." The deeper spiritual reason for Christian rejection of the militant spirit, and of the plea of the politician and of the maker of munitions for preparedness, are found in Christ's words to Pilate, ere he has been condemned to the cross: "If my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight." And Paul repeats the eternal truth: "We wrestle not against flesh and blood, . . . wherefore take unto you the whole armor of God." We do not need man's defenses, for God has provided better. Ever since Abel's blood cried unto God from the ground, erring man has followed Cain "out from the presence of the Lord," as Genesis puts it, and the wasting of human life by individual and national slaughter has cried unto God for justice. Why cannot humanity have learned better from the Lamb of God, the Prince of Peace?

For three centuries and more, the Christianity founded at Pentecost rejoiced to follow its unresisting Master to sacrifice, and the blood of the martyrs became the seed of the church. Then the great Constantine, born at Nish in Servia, of a Christian mother and a tolerant pagan father, turned the Christian policy and practices from that of the Christ, and to this reversal to human methods is most largely due the Dark Ages, and the present drowning of Europe in blood and Satanic horror. Elevated by his soldiers to imperial honors in Britain, where his father died fighting Picts and Scots, Constantine finally had the Roman empire in his grasp and its capital removed to the Greek Byzantium, still called Constantinople in his honor.

In spite of Constantine's vision of a cross in the sky, the truth remains that he was one who tried to ride two horses at once, a pagan and Christian span, as is shown at his dedication of Constantinople by a ceremony half pagan and half Christian, as well as by many similar facts. He was an enlightened despot, who made use of religion to advance his own interests, the early Christians gratefully recalling that the toleration which he gave them was so much more endurable than the terrible persecutions through which they had been kept free from hypocrisy and debauchery. That Constantine killed his father-in-law Maximian, strangled his brother-in-law Lucinius, made way with his eldest son Crispus, smothered his second wife Fausta in a hot bath, flogged his nephew Licinius, eleven years of age, to death, reveals the man, and it is small wonder that he did not receive Christian baptism until death was knocking at his door, in 337. Enough that he crushed out the last remnants of republicanism from the empire and left an absolute rule, with his own sons in the saddle; yet his greatest curse was the reign of bloodshed to which, from his day, Christianity has given license, to the great joy of Satan and the grief of the Man of Sorrows.

All honor to the Christian Herald for daring to face a popular fallacy and proclaim the truth as it is in Jesus. It has fairly earned the right to emblazon on its escutcheon the immortal words of Lactantius: "In order to defend religion, man must be willing to die, but not to kill."

MAGAZINES FOR CHRISTMAS GIFTS

NO OTHER gift will give greater or more genuine satisfaction to a relative or friend than a year's subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD or to one of the popular magazines. It is the logical solution of the gift problem. Renew your subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and add other magazines as Christmas gifts.

Below is a condensed list of periodicals from which selection can be made of one or more magazines at a price in some cases almost one-half of the regular price. Readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are thus enabled to order all magazines desired in a single order with the assurance that it will be attended to promptly, accurately and at the lowest prices. Subscriptions are for one year and can be new or renewal, and can go to different addresses, except in a few cases noted otherwise. Canadian and foreign postage additional.

An appropriate Christmas card announcing the gift subscription will be sent to reach the recipient on Christmas morning.

To determine the price of two or more magazines given in the list below: Add the class prices and multiply by five. The result will be the club price.

EXAMPLE
Christian Herald Class 23
Pictorial Review Class 25
McCall's Class 10
Total class numbers 58
Multiply by 5
Price of club			$2.90

	Pubs. Price	Our Price		Pubs. Price	Our Price
30 ADVENTURE with CHRISTIAN HERALD	$3.00	$2.65	45 McBRIDE'S with CHRISTIAN HERALD	$4.50	$3.40
17 AMERICAN BOY with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.50	2.00	with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Woman's Home Companion	6.00	4.65
With CHRISTIAN HERALD and Pictorial Review (or Woman's Home Companion)	4.00	3.25	10 McCALL'S with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.00	1.65
With CHRISTIAN HERALD, *Delineator and *Everybody's	5.50	4.00	with CHRISTIAN HERALD, To-Day's and Housewife	3.00	1.90
25 AMERICAN MAGAZINE with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	2.40	with CHRISTIAN HERALD, Mother's and Ladies' World (to one address except CHRISTIAN HERALD)	4.50	2.65
With CHRISTIAN HERALD and Woman's Home Companion (to same address)	4.50	3.15	20 McCLURE'S with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.50	2.15
With CHRISTIAN HERALD and Pictorial Review	4.50	3.65	25 METROPOLITAN with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	2.40
17 BOYS' LIFE with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.50	2.00	17 MODERN PRISCILLA with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.50	2.00
With CHRISTIAN HERALD and Pictorial Review	4.00	3.25	with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Home Needlework	3.25	2.40
17 BOYS' MAGAZINE with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.50	2.00	with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Pictorial Review	4.00	3.25
With CHRISTIAN HERALD, McCall's, Housewife and To-Day's	4.00	2.75	23 MOTHER'S MAGAZINE with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	2.00
With CHRISTIAN HERALD and Woman's Home Companion	4.00	3.25	with CHRISTIAN HERALD, McCall's and Ladies' World (to one address except CHRISTIAN HERALD)	4.50	2.65
50 THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 3 years	1.50	1.50	60 OUTLOOK with CHRISTIAN HERALD	4.50	4.15
35 COLLIER'S WEEKLY with CHRISTIAN HERALD	4.00	3.00	8 PEOPLE'S HOME JOURNAL with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.00	1.55
With CHRISTIAN HERALD and Pictorial Review (or Woman's Home Companion)	5.50	4.15	25 PICTORIAL REVIEW with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	2.40
With CHRISTIAN HERALD, *Delineator and *Everybody's	7.00	4.90	with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Modern Priscilla	4.00	3.25
16 COOKING CLUB MAGAZINE with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.50	1.95	with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Metropolitan	4.50	3.55
COUNTRY GENTLEMAN with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.50	2.50	with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Woman's Home Companion	4.50	3.65
70 COUNTRY LIFE IN AMERICA with CHRISTIAN HERALD	5.50	4.65	40 REVIEW OF REVIEWS with CHRISTIAN HERALD	4.50	3.15
55 CURRENT OPINION with CHRISTIAN HERALD	4.50	3.90	with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Pictorial Review (or Woman's Home Companion)	6.00	4.40
With CHRISTIAN HERALD and Pictorial Review (or Woman's Home Companion)	6.00	5.15	SATURDAY EVENING POST with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	3.00
23 DELINEATOR with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	2.30	50 SCRIBNER'S with CHRISTIAN HERALD	4.50	3.65
With CHRISTIAN HERALD and *Everybody's (to one address)	4.50	3.15	17 SOMETHING-TO-DO with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.50	2.00
With CHRISTIAN HERALD and Pictorial Review (or American)	4.50	3.55	50 ST. NICHOLAS with CHRISTIAN HERALD	4.50	3.65
With CHRISTIAN HERALD and Review of Reviews	6.00	4.30	8 TO-DAY'S with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.00	1.55
12 DESIGNER with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.25	1.75	with CHRISTIAN HERALD, Housewife and McCall's	3.00	1.90
25 ETUDE (for music lovers) with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	2.00	55 TRAVEL with CHRISTIAN HERALD	4.50	3.90
25 EVERYBODY'S with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	2.40	25 WOMAN'S HOME COMPANION with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	2.40
With CHRISTIAN HERALD and Delineator (to same address)	4.50	3.15	with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Little Folks (new)	4.00	3.15
With CHRISTIAN HERALD and Pictorial Review (or Woman's Home Companion)	4.50	3.65	with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Delineator	4.50	3.55
23 GARDEN MAGAZINE with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	2.00	with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Pictorial Review	4.50	3.65
GOOD HOUSEKEEPING with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	2.65	with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Review of Reviews	6.00	4.40
HARPER'S BAZAR with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.50	3.15	12 WOMAN'S MAGAZINE with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.25	1.75
70 HARPER'S MAGAZINE with CHRISTIAN HERALD	5.50	4.65	5 WOMAN'S WORLD with CHRISTIAN HERALD	1.85	1.55
70 HARPER'S WEEKLY with CHRISTIAN HERALD	6.50	4.65	40 WORLD'S WORK with CHRISTIAN HERALD	4.50	3.15
With CHRISTIAN HERALD and Pictorial Review	4.50	3.65	with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Woman's Home Companion	6.00	4.40
12 HOME NEEDLEWORK with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.25	1.75	40 YOUTH'S COMPANION with CHRISTIAN HERALD	4.00	3.25
With CHRISTIAN HERALD and Woman's Home Companion	3.75	3.00	with CHRISTIAN HERALD and McCall's	5.00	4.40
8 HOUSEWIFE with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.00	1.55	with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Pictorial Review	5.00	4.40
With CHRISTIAN HERALD, McCall's and To-Day's	3.50	1.90	Special Combinations. With Religious Papers
25 ILLUSTRATED WORLD with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	2.40	PROPHETIC AND MISSION RECORD, 3 yrs. Amer. Advent Miss. Soc. with CHRISTIAN HERALD	1.85	1.60
With CHRISTIAN HERALD and Pictorial Review	4.50	3.65	AMERICAN MESSENGER with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.00	1.65
55 INDEPENDENT with CHRISTIAN HERALD	4.50	3.90	DAILY BIBLE with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.10	1.75
50 JOHN MARTIN'S BOOK (Children) with CHRISTIAN HERALD	4.50	3.65	THE PROTESTANT MAGAZINE with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.50	1.95
LADIES' HOME JOURNAL with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	3.00	RECORD OF CHRISTIAN WORK with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	2.00
15 LADIES' WORLD with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.50	1.90	CHRISTIAN STANDARD with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	2.30
17 LITTLE FOLKS (new sub.) with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.50	1.90	CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	2.50
With CHRISTIAN HERALD, and Pictorial Review (or Woman's Home Companion) (Add 15c if Little Folks is a renewal)	4.00	3.15	PRESBYTERIAN BANNER with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.50	2.90
			THE STANDARD (Baptist) with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.50	3.00

(*Must go to same address)

SEND ALL ORDERS TO

(*Must go to same address)

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, NEW YORK, N. Y.

BREAKFAST TASTES BETTER IN A WARM ROOM

The PERFECTION SMOKELESS OIL HEATER makes breakfast a comfortable satisfying meal these cold mornings. It lights instantly, radiates a surprising amount of clear, odorless heat, and is so light you can carry it easily wherever extra heat is needed.

The Perfection is inexpensive to buy and gives 10 hours' glowing warmth from a gallon of kerosene. Why be cold when comfort costs so little?

Chases chill from cold corners.

In many styles and sizes at hardware, furniture, general and department stores—look for the Perfection Cozy Cat Poster. You'll know the heater by the Triangle Trademark. Send to Dept. E for free illustrated booklet.

THE CLEVELAND FOUNDRY CO.

Makers of New Perfection Oil Cook Stoves

7613 Platt Avenue, Cleveland, Ohio

Also Made in Canada by the Perfection Stove Co., Ltd., Sarnia, Ontario

Highest Award at Panama-Pacific Exposition

PERFECTION SMOKELESS OIL HEATERS

Burns
Kerosene
(Coal Oil)

Won GOLD MEDAL at World's Exposition
San Francisco

LIGHTS WHOLE ROOM

BEATS ELECTRIC OR GASOLINE

10 DAYS FREE Charges Prepaid
Send No Money

We don't ask you to pay a cent until you have used this wonderful modern light in your own home ten days—we even pay transportation charges. You may return it at our expense if not perfectly satisfied after putting it to every possible test for 10 nights. You can't possibly lose a cent. We want to prove to you that it makes an ordinary oil lamp look like a candle; beats electric, gasoline or acetylene. Lights and is put out like old oil lamp. Tests by Government and 33 leading Universities show it Burns 50 Hours on One Gallon common coal oil, and gives more than twice as much light as the best round wick open flame lamps. No odor, smoke or noise; simple, clean, no pressure, won't explode. Several million people already enjoying this powerful, steady light, nearest to sunlight. Guaranteed.

Men with Rigs or Autos make big money delivering the ALADDIN on our easy plan. No previous experience necessary. Practically every farm home and small town home will buy after trying. Conrad, a farmer near Basil, O., and subscriber to Christian Herald, used an Aladdin one year in his own home, then started distributing among his neighbors and has disposed of several hundred lamps in his County the past three winters, making splendid money. Thousands who are coining money endorse the Aladdin just as strongly. No Money Required. We furnish capital to reliable men to get started. Ask for our distributor's plan and learn how to make big money in unoccupied territory. Sample sent for 10 Days' Free Trial. We want one user in each locality to whom we can refer customers. Be the first and get our special introductory offer under which you get your own lamp free for showing it to a few neighbors and sending in their orders. Write quick for 10 DAY ABSOLUTELY FREE TRIAL. Address nearest office.

MANTLE LAMP COMPANY, 339 Aladdin Building

Largest Kerosene (Coal Oil) Mantle Lamp House in the World
CHICAGO NEW YORK CITY PORTLAND, ORE. MONTREAL or WINNIPEG, CANADA

Feed For Eggs!

Now is the time to make your hens produce while the price of eggs is so low.

Free Book

By Experts
Just out—Tells how to feed 4 for eggs—how to develop poultry for market and
how. Your home
ought to have it.
Get it today.
Also for 10¢ 100 copies.
Ask for 10¢ 100 copies.
Machines for sale at 10¢.

Edwards & Loomis Co., 343P No. Elizabeth St., Chicago, Ill.
Also Manufacturers of the Famous Red Horn Dairy Feeds

"DON'T SHOUT"

Anyone can adjust it. Over one hundred thousand sold. Write for booklet and testimonials.

THE MORLEY CO., Dept. 754, Perry Bldg., Phila.
PEACE CALENDARS; war; artistic, useful desk-memoranda. Postpaid, $1.00 Mullowney, Paxtang, Pa.

Her Way to Happiness

Continued from page 1237

you can tell me why there are so very many like this—so much suffering?

Brockway smiled, somewhat wanly. "You've asked me a big question," he replied. "Lots of wise people are still debating it. In this case, right here," he nodded toward Rosa, "the father was an employee in the iron mills. After that big merger last week a lot of workmen were let out. It affected hundreds of families in this section. Her father was one of them. . . . The food stopped. Her little body was just an invitation to pneumonia."

Marjorie's voice trembled a little as she asked:

"Is—is it too late to help?"

He shook his head.

"I think not," he said. "We need money for medicine and a trained nurse. If the young women of your class are in earnest, they can help."

MARJORIE found her father sitting in the living room before the open fire. A tinkle of glass and silver came from the dining room as a maid laid the table for dinner. There was only the light from the blazing log in the grate.

"Daddy," said Marjorie in a low voice, as she found a seat by his chair. "You know—I asked you last week why I am to have the Randolph house as a Christmas gift, and that little girl—Rosa—only a ten-cent doll?"

The man looked down fondly at her earnest upturned face.

"Daddy, dear," she continued gently. "I've found out. If girls like me have trips to Europe, and motors and costly gowns and fine houses, girls like Rosa will sometimes starve."

"Nonsense."

"It's true."

She told him then what she had seen and heard that afternoon. When she had finished he said:

"You mustn't worry about things you can't help. I give a good deal to charity, and we'll have to let that suffice. You're not going to trouble yourself—not while you are young and beautiful. I won't allow it. Aunt Catherine says you're a wonder in your new gowns. I want you—"

"Father," she interrupted, "you said you have been living and working to give me happiness. May I tell you how you can give me the most?"

"But—" he hesitated. Then, finally:

"Tell me."

She moved closer to him.

"When I was leaving Rosa tonight, she opened her eyes—and she knew me. She smiled, and curled her hand—a ridiculous wee mite of a hand—around my finger and held on tight, like a scared little wood animal that has found a friend. And as I watched her there—such a helpless, innocent baby—and felt the squeeze of her little hand, something awakened in me, all at once. I can't explain—not exactly. It was a sort of mother-feeling for all the Rosas there are. It surged over me big and warm and rushy."

I wanted to gather the sick, starved, shivering kiddies into my arms, feed them, and tuck warm things around them, and fight everything that makes life cruel to them. I felt that way. I do now. It's the real, truest part of me. If I stamp it out just to be smart and fashionable—I'll—I'll—"

Her voice broke. She saw her father's face. In the firelight it was pale and grave. His lips were drawn into a firm line, and his eyes stared into open fire. Did it mean that he disapproved—he, who had never refused her anything? She moved still nearer and laid a pleading hand on his arm.

"I like pretty frocks, and parties, and—and—all the rest," she went on bravely. "Indeed I do. But, if I live for things like that the best part of me will be spoiled. I'll grow a facial and thoughtless and glittering and—and hard. That isn't the kind of daughter you want—is it, Daddy?"

The room was still. From a spar of sleet on the window came tiny hurrying jets of sound. The fire flared up. A shower of dancing sparks flew up the chimney. Marjorie sat motionless. Her father's face was turned away.

"And so if you want to make a happy—very, very happy—help me give happiness to others!"

Still no answer. Had she hurt his kind, generous father? Had she in this one thing that really mattered failed to make him understand?

And then, just as she was finding a handkerchief to fight the gathering tears, something big and warm reached out of the firelit darkness and drew her into an impulsive, bearlike embrace.

"It's your mother!" her father was saying. "You're the living image of her. She used to look at me so—in the firelight on her hair. And she—she—had the 'mother feeling.' It gave me courage to go on when things were dark—and it gave me you—after—"

—was gone.

Marjorie had never heard his voice unsteady before. She patted his cheek softly, the tears streaming down his face. He went on:

"All the time we've been sitting here I haven't dared to move or speak. It has seemed as though I were listening to your mother's voice—that she had come back—to—make—me—understand."

"Then," Marjorie found a smothered gaspy voice. "You aren't—disappointed?"

"Disappointed? I never was proud in my life! Here's where a blundering Daddy stops—for good a while—trying to make a butterfly out of a girl with a regular grown-up mind and a full-blown woman's understanding heart! You're going to have your own way about this Rosa business, dear. I give you my word."

Marjorie put out her hands and drew her father's face close to her tear-filled eyes and smiling lips.

Broadway Tabernacle Diamond Jubilee

FOUNDED by the great evangelist Charles G. Finney, and identified with the national struggles of Civil War times, the Broadway Tabernacle, New York, attracted wide attention during the recent celebration of its Diamond Jubilee. Evangelist Finney, who stirred America during the middle of the nineteenth century by the Pentecostal power of his preaching, designed the original Broadway Tabernacle on Broadway, near Worth Street, in 1840 and was its first pastor. That first tabernacle had a seating capacity of 3,000, and was frequently used as a public forum where the Abolitionists, among them such national figures as Wendell Phillips, Henry Ward Beecher, Freeborn Garrettson Smith and William Lloyd Garrison spoke against slavery. Lucretia Mott, John B. Gough and many other notables have also occupied the Tabernacle platform. In 1857 the Tabernacle congregation moved to Broadway and Thirty-fourth Street. At this location during Civil War days stirring scenes took place. When President Lincoln first called for volunteers for the war, the pastor, Rev. Joseph Thompson, called for subscriptions to equip a regiment. Thirty thousand dollars was placed on the communion table for this purpose. This incident greatly encouraged President Lincoln and was one of the first great dramatic events of the war. In 1902 the present grand edifice at Broadway and Fifty-six Street was built, one of the most modern church establishments in the country. The present pastor, came to the Tabernacle eighteen years ago.

The exercises of the diamond jubilee continued an entire week. The pastorate of the church have been Dr. Charles G. Finney, Dr. Joseph P. Thompson, Dr. William M. Taylor, Rev. W. E. Andrews, Dr. Henry Stimson, and Dr. Charles E. Jefferson.

A MAN went into the suspender business. He built a factory, bought machinery and materials, hired workers, got up steam and began to turn out suspenders.

"How will you sell your output?" someone asked.

"By George! I never thought of that!" he replied.

The story is impossible—of course.

But it seems as if a whole lot of farmers, all over the country, were doing business a good deal that way.

Owning valuable land and expensive equipment, they spend so much time and energy in the production of crops that they have little opportunity to think of the selling end.

So they take whatever the market offers, without considering how or where they might find better markets—and larger profits.

The COUNTRY GENTLEMAN

The great national farm weekly has been doing some thinking about these things for you!

At the same time it is urging better farm methods for field and orchard, for feed lot and poultry yard, for garden and home, it is constantly telling how to reach the markets.

It is talking coöperation and selling methods.

Consider the crops on your farm!

What is the best market for your hay or grain or fruit or truck or cattle or sheep or hogs or poultry!

When do prices go up? When down?

What rotations fit your farm?

What fertilizers?

What feeds produce the cheapest meat and milk and work and wool!

Every week, in special articles and in regular departments, we answer questions like these.

And if you have a special question about any farm work, our staff of more than a hundred experts will answer it by mail.

The new price of THE COUNTRY GENTLEMAN is $1.00 a year. And it comes 52 times a year—every week.

THE CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY
INDEPENDENCE SQUARE
PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA

a year, fifty-two issues—

CUT OUT — MAIL TODAY

THE COUNTRY GENTLEMAN
Box 535
The Curtis Publishing Company
Independence Square
Philadelphia

Enclosed please find $1.00 (Canadian price $1.75). Please send THE COUNTRY GENTLEMAN for one year to the address below:

NAME

ADDRESS

R. F. D. ROUTE

Can You Describe a Picture?

The Specimen Picture

Below is an object lesson picture, presented here to teach you the plan of the Bible Picture Contest. Below the picture we show you several Bible verses. Can you find one that describes the picture—that is a good answer?

See if you can pick out the most appropriate text from among the following:

AND the water was spent in the bottle, and she cast the child under one of the shrubs. Gen. 21: 15

And she went, and sat her down over against him a good way off, as it were a bowshot, for she said, Let me not see the death of the child. And she sat over against him, and lifted up her voice and wept. Gen. 21: 16

And the daughter of Pharaoh came down to wash herself at the river, and her maidens walked along by the river's side; and when she saw the ark among the flags, she sent her maid to fetch it. Ex. 2: 5

And when the queen of Sheba heard of the fame of Solomon concerning the name of the Lord, she came to prove him with hard questions. 1 Kings, 10: 1

This is a specimen illustration to introduce you to the 60 contest pictures.

Our Proposal Is That You Search the Scriptures Anew

WE do not intend to conduct in these columns an examination for testing minute Biblical knowledge. Our new feature is designed to interest and benefit everybody, by requiring the simple, pleasant task of employing common sense in the solution of given problems, which any intelligent person can solve by a little application.

THE problem in the Bible Picture Contest will be to look at a picture and then, by comparison and discrimination, select the one or more supremely suitable Bible texts that can be found by the individual contestant among a certain, specified number of such texts made available; and the same process to be gone through for each picture in the series. There will be sixty pictures in all.

THEREFORE, no matter how erudite a theological scholar a particular reader may be, that person will still find the Contest worthy of his mettle, as it is sturdy mother-wit upon which the competition rests; and, on the other hand, the great mass of us who have not been very faithful students in the past and can therefore lay no claim to knowing the Bible from cover to cover, can nevertheless feel perfectly at home in this Contest wherein good sense is all that is needed. The end will be that during participation much new knowledge will be gained. Yet at the start, as far as the Contest is concerned, all are on an equal footing to enjoy this novel, worthwhile recreation and to excel in the answers submitted.

Picture No. 1

Below is Picture No. 1 in the Bible Picture Contest, presented here, in advance of the actual beginning of the Contest, to let you see the nature of the real pictures. Do not send this in—simply look at it, and think it over. Read what is said below the picture.

You can test your good judgment at once by referring to your Bible

THE standard list of 2,000 selected Bible verses, "Gems From the Bible," will contain the eligible list of verses from which to select those that fit the pictures in the Contest. But here is Picture No. 1—let us make a test of it. Does it call to your mind any verse in the Bible, or suggest any scene or situation familiar to you?

There is a way to find out—look in your Bible, and search until you find an appropriate verse, one that describes the picture. Of course the convenient list of verses, "Gems From the Bible," would offer you quicker access to the best answer. The verses are arranged in order, grouped as from the different books of the Bible. In this collection are all the verses which may be submitted as fitting the pictures. You may conveniently choose your verses from "Gems From the Bible" for submission, and then write them in the handy Reply Book. Those submitting the verses that best fit the pictures will be rewarded. Read everything on this page.

Don't send in this picture—it is presented only for your preliminary scrutiny.

The Christian Herald Bible Picture Contest

Devotion Rather Than Scholarship

As in the case of the specimen illustration at the top of the page, so in the Contest itself you will find yourself confronted with pictures and texts; and your part will be to match up the corresponding ones. There is Picture No. 1 above also—prove to yourself that you can find a verse to describe or fit it. But it isn't necessary to search through the Bible itself to find the verse.

No; for, to establish a reasonable, uniform list of selection, the Rules of the Bible Picture Contest—strictly impartial for all contestants—provide a set standard of 2,000 Bible verses eligible as texts (or answers, we may call them) for the pictures. That being the case, participants may rest easy in the assurance that a fair test of merit is at issue.

From the standpoint of our earnest educational aim, the whole scope of the popular study thus takes on a feasible character. The 2,000 verses will prove an opening wedge to a stimulating contact with the entire Scriptures.

A Standard List of 2,000 Bible Verses

For those who wish it, then, arrangements are being made to supply copies of the handsome volume, known as "Gems From the Bible," containing this very list of 2,000 selected verses, conveniently arranged. There is nothing to prevent your consulting your own Bible after obtaining from us the references representing the select list. There is no required expense in the Bible Picture Contest.

Effort Rewarded — 416 Cash Awards

Certain difficulties presented themselves for solution. What could we offer that would be of equal value to every recipient? Why spoil the good grace of a reward by the possibility of its being a white elephant on someone's hands? Then, also, many contestants would undoubtedly wish to devote part or all, of means gained thus unexpectedly, to various private or public purposes. Only one answer suggested itself. We must stick to the common medium of exchange. We determined to set aside certain amounts of money, to be turned over to the persons who excel in the Contest—and let them do what they like with the money, for it will be theirs.

$1,000 and $500 Cash, 1st and 2nd Gifts

Whatever is worth doing, is worth doing well. We want the persons who send in the best answers in the Bible Picture Contest to know they have accomplished something. We want the doors of opportunity to be opened wide to them. We are therefore offering generous rewards. The first reward will be $1,000 in cash. The second reward will be $500 in cash. In all, there will be 416 rewards, and each one of them will be in cash. And, indeed, more than 416 persons may win a cash reward in the Contest, for in the event of ultimate ties each person concerned in the tie will receive the full reward tied for.

Watch for further information in coming issues. If you have not already done so, this is a good time to renew your subscription; and at the same time, you may, by adding on fifty cents, obtain a Reply Book (into which you can conveniently write your answers in the Contest), and the valuable "Gems from the Bible" which contains all the Bible verses eligible as answers. There is nothing like being prepared. The total is, then, $2.00 for yearly subscription to The Christian Herald, and "Gems from the Bible," and Reply Book. Or the two books will be given free to any present subscriber who sends in his renewal together with a new yearly subscription (total $3.00) to The Christian Herald.

Overland
TRADE MARK

MODEL 83
$750
F. O. B. TOLEDO

Fine For the Boys and Girls

Young bodies are strengthened—young minds are stimulated—none take keener enjoyment—none are more genuinely benefited by an Overland in the family than are the youngsters.

They love to spin along the country roads in their Overland.

An Overland in the family gives them many a comfortable trip to the busy parts of town, which they would otherwise miss.

This Overland is the world's record car.

No one has ever before built so many big cars as we are building of this model.

The car is the ideal family size—it carries five passengers in roomy comfort.

It has a powerful, economical motor;—the same horsepower (35) as last season's largest Overland Four.

But as this is a lighter car, there is even more reserve power.

It has that certainty of ignition provided only by high tension magneto.

It has the comfort provided by long underslung rear springs and four inch tires.

It has convenience of electrical control—switches are on the steering column. This arrangement is found only on the Overland and a few very much higher priced cars.

It has a full streamline body and a beautiful finish.

Sales have forced a production even larger than originally planned.

Production is increasing steadily.

And the price is only $750 for the touring car, $725 for the roadster.

The famous Overland Six—seven passenger touring car—is $1145.

Prices are f. o. b. Toledo.

See the Overland dealer now.

Catalogues on request. Please address Dept. 369

The Willys-Overland Company, Toledo, Ohio

Also manufacturers of Willys-Knight Automobiles
"Made in U. S. A."

Hello Boys!

Make Lots of Toys

Talk about your good times! Nothing was ever invented which has given so much fun to so many thousands of boys as Erector. The boy who receives a set of Erector for Christmas will surely have the "time of his life"! And he will also learn the practical principles of engineering and construction.

Just imagine, boys, how you will enjoy building bridges, skyscrapers, incline railroads, machine shops, aeroplanes and other splendid steel models—thousands of 'em! 500 are actually pictured in three big manuals.

Erector is the only construction toy with girders that build square columns like real structural steel. That's why it builds the largest, strongest and most realistic models. And it gives twice as many parts for your money as any other.

Erector builds small intricate models of machinery just as readily as it builds the large skyscrapers and bridges. Every mechanical detail of an Erector model is true to life. The models are practical, too—you can run machine shops with miniature machinery of all kinds, sawmills, oil well derricks, circular saws, presses, etc.

ERECTOR

The Toy Like Structural Steel

Four of Last Year's Prize Winners

Don't forget the electric motor which comes free with most sets and makes the models whiz! It is the most powerful toy motor made, lifts 100 pounds. Just hitch it to the battery and watch things hum!

Of course, you'll want to enter my big prize contest. I am giving $3,000 in prizes to boys who build the best models. A regular man's size automobile is the first prize; motorcycles, bicycles, camping outfits, canoes, skates, magic tricks are among the other valuable prizes. It's all explained in my free boys' magazine, Tips. You have a chance to win.

Be sure to get Erector for Christmas. Dealers everywhere sell it, $1 to $25 per set. Ask to see the popular No. 4 set for $5, contains 571 parts and motor, builds thousands of models and comes in handsome oak cabinet.

A. C. GILBERT, President
The Mysto Mfg. Co. 151 Fox St., New Haven, Conn.

Erector was awarded Gold Medal at the Panama-Pacific Exposition—the highest award ever conferred upon an American toy

Free Boys' Magazine and Book—I want to give every boy, absolutely free, a three months' subscription to my boys' magazine, Tips, including the holiday issue in colors, brimful of stories and photographs.

Read the absorbing story, "How I Invented Erector," and the special articles telling my experiences as a world's champion athlete. These issues of Tips also explain how to do magic tricks; show photographs of the winners in last year's prize contest; contain illustrations and descriptions of this year's prizes, etc.

Send today for the three months' subscription—also a free copy of my new 24-page illustrated Book telling all about construction toys. Don't send any money or stamps. I want to present all this to you absolutely free!

ERECTOR TIPS

Vol. No. 1915

Big Prize Contest

307 valuable prizes will be given to the boys who build the best models.

Mr. A. C. Gilbert, The Mysto Mfg. Co., 151 Fox St., New Haven, Conn.

Please send me at once a copy of your Free Book and three months' free subscription to your boys' magazine, Erector Tips, which tells all about your big prize contest.

Coupon

Name

Address

My toy dealer is

This Auto FREE

Christian Herald

SUBSCRIPTION, $1.50 PER ANNUM
PUBLISHED 52 TIMES A YEAR

COPYRIGHT, 1915, BY THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

NEW YORK, DECEMBER 15, 1915

VOL. 38—NO. 50. PRICE 5 CENTS
OFFICES: BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK

© Underwood & Underwood, All rights reserved

AMONG THE GRAPE VINES ON THE SUN-SWEPT SLOPES OF PALESTINE

Our Mail-Bag

NOTICE

THE editors of the Christian Herald will be glad to answer any question addressed to the Mail-Bag provided it be of general interest and not merely personal. Correspondents may use a nom de plume to identify the question, but all letters must contain name and address of the sender, in addition to the nom de plume. No attention will be paid to anonymous letters.

Questions and Answers

WA. M., Match, Tenn. Is the cross of Christ the center of this world? It is no exaggeration to say that the cross of Christ is the center of the world. No event in history has produced such tremendous moral and spiritual results as the death of Jesus on the cross. Not only does the cross of Christ exercise a power over individuals that cannot be compared with anything else, but it is the embodiment of the only true philosophy of life—self-sacrifice. To accept the cross of Christ means that we trust the love of God as revealed in the death of Jesus to forgive and remit all the sins of the past; that we allow the influence of that death to change utterly, as it will, our attitude toward God and toward mankind; that we recognize the cross as the call and symbol of the life we must live—the life of loving, self-forgetful service. Yet the cross of Christ must no longer be thought of as a symbol of sorrow. It was sorrowful for him to bear it, but his sorrow leads to our joy, and the sacrifices to which it calls us are sacrifices which cannot touch that Joy's deep springs. By the preaching of the cross the joy and love of God are to fill the world.

White Lily, Pocahtontas, Tenn. You ask, "How deep can a person sink in sin, wilfully, before it would be necessary for people as Christians to pray to God to remove that person by death—if it is not his will to convert. Should this ever be done?" Never. The mere suggestion would be barbarous and un-Christian. He who "saves to the uttermost" is still able to save even the vilest and most abandoned. Some of the grandest Christians have been men and women who were snatched like brands from the burning. Saul, the persecutor of the followers of Christ, who helped to bring sorrow to many and whose evil fame was widely known, became Paul the great apostle. Men guilty of almost every conceivable form of sin have been transformed by divine grace. Weaver was a drunken pitman, Jerry McAuley a convict, Hadley a besotted drunkard; yet God had a work for all three to do and equipped them for it marvelously. We have no right to pray that a soul may be cut off in the midst of its sin; but rather to plead with a merciful God to strike the sinner with conviction, and that he may be led to Christ as Saviour. It is not ours to assume that any one is beyond the reach of redemption.

"There's a wideness in God's mercy,
Like the wideness of the sea."

A. O. B., Freeport, Ill., writes: "I note in a recent issue of the Christian Herald an article about the value of the potato, and that it is a native of this country. I have also somewhere seen a reference to the dahlia bulb as an article for food. It occurs to me, if this is reliable about the dahlia, it might be a valuable discovery that could be turned to rich account, since it is so beautiful as a plant for decoration and has an abundance of tubers, if properly cultivated. I am anxious to know whether any of your readers have ever known of the use of the roots for food—even as an experiment, proving that they would not be unsafe as a food?" We have read, not long ago, a statement that tulip bulbs were being used for food in some part of Europe. Perhaps some of our readers may know personally about the practical food values of dahlias and tulips. If so, we would be glad to hear from them.

E. W., New York. Confessing Christ openly is a privilege as well as a duty which every believer should embrace as opportunity offers. Not only by uniting with the church and by our presence at our Lord's table, but in our daily lives and conversation, should we be glad to confess him. And when more public opportunities arise we should not shrink. We know there are many timid souls who hesitate to do this; but having once done it, they experience a joy and an inward peace that in most cases banish timidity. It undoubtedly requires courage for such people to stand up in church or prayer meeting and confess Christ. But the barrier once crossed, the halting syllables soon give way to a firm note of confidence. Thereafter to acknowledge Jesus as King and Saviour will always be a glad service. It is fitting that we should keep in memory Christ's own words: "And I say unto you, every one who shall confess me before men, him shall the Son of man also confess before the angels of God; but he that denieth me in the presence of men shall be denied in the presence of the angels of God" (Luke 12:8, 9). The gladdest moment of Jesus' earthly ministry was when his disciples voluntarily acclaimed him as the Messiah. We are told that there is joy in heaven "over one sinner that repenteth," and we do right to believe that every confession of Christ as Saviour brings added gladness. We must never be ashamed of him, but should be ready to own him at all times, even before the whole world.

Mrs. C. E. N., Weston's Mills, N. Y. The authorship of Jonah is not definitely ascertained. That Jonah was the first of the prophets is the opinion of several commentators, while others believe him to have been a contemporary of Jeremiah, and still others place him after Hosea and Amos. Two have suggested, judging from internal evidence, that the same author wrote both Jonah and Obadiah. Assuming that Jonah was a real person (as are justified in doing, in view of 11 Kings 14 and Luke 11: 29-32), it has been argued that there is nothing in the literary structure of the book by which to decide that it may have been either the work of the prophet himself or of some one to whom all the occurrences and reflections it contains had been communicated. Another theory is that it belongs to the category of symbolical narrative, and that at the time the book was written Nineveh was no longer in existence (chap. 3:3).

S. G. B., Germantown, Pa., sends the rules, which a thoughtful Christian father wrote for the guidance of his son, who is leaving home to begin the battle of life. They are worth remembering:

"Fear God and keep his commandments. If you attend to this, whatever state you are in, you will have inward satisfaction and happiness. Read daily some portion of the Holy Scriptures. Keep the Sabbath day holy and do not absent yourself from divine worship. Shun vice in every shape and every station. Guard against the first false step. Avoid the company of every kind. Connect your company with creditable and good company. Attend to your education so as to be master of every branch of learning to which you have access. Take plenty of moderate exercise. Discharge faithfully any trust committed to your charge. Be kind and affectionate to your relatives, grateful and thankful to all your benefactors. Be civil, discreet and obliging to every one, and benevolent and generous to the poor according to your ability. Speak ill of no body and if you hear any one run down, or spoken of, if you can with truth say anything good of him, do it. If not, be silent. Tell as few secrets as possible; but if you are master of a secret do not divulge it. Avoid pride, arrogance and meanness. Avoid giving offense to any one, and equally avoid being easy to offend. Be neither pert nor forward, nor slow and backward. Be fair and just in all your dealings. Live within your income. If you go beyond it, you will render yourself immediately dependent."

The following interesting letter relating to the National Laymen's Missionary campaign, news of which is appearing from time to time in the columns of the Christian Herald, has been received from Mr. Arthur Meachen, Norwich, England: "The National Laymen's Missionary Movement Campaign will (through God's grace) bring joy and hope of the world over. And as the sixteen hundred million people on the globe must mainly be reached by the printed page, I sincerely hope that those who attend the various conventions will encourage and sustain the efforts that may be made towards the evangelization of the world by the world-wide systematic distribution of tracts, booklets, text cards and the Gospel. St. John to passers-by and from house to house. Also that printing presses will be established at all the strategic points in the world for producing Gospel literature."

H. D. J., Allenton, Mo. The materials you mention are all excellent conductors of sound; no one of them is a non-conductor. The intensity of sound depends not so much on the substance through which it passes as on the uniformity of the substance. Therefore the best way to deaden sound is to fill the hollow of the wall with a non-uniform, finely divided substance. The best material for this purpose are a mixture of sawdust shavings, chopped straw, feathers, or other finely divided material. Hollow bricks have a like effect for the same reason; also alternate layers of wood, plaster and pasteboard.

B. C. W., Philadelphia. 1. The first question is controversial and cannot be disposed of by discussion in the Mail-Bag. 2. No denomination has a monopoly of the truth, and practically all hold similar views with regard to essentials. 3. You will find a reliable history of the different denominations in any good religious encyclopedia.

Mrs. E. C. W., Middletown, Ohio. "The Angels at Mons" will be discussed soon in an article by Professor Gray of Chicago, which will appear in the Christian Herald.

GENERAL CHARITIES FUND

Of The Christian Herald for Year Ending May 31, 1915

	Balance June 1, 1914	Receipts	Disbursements	Balance May 31, 1915
African Inland Mission		$12.00	$12.00
African Child Redemption Pledges		160.00	160.00
Albanian Hospital and Relief Work	$1.00	15.00	15.00
Albania Sufferers		94.66	94.66
American Bible Society		10.00	10.00
American National Red Cross		471.28	471.28
Andri, Rev. E. L. (Hankow, China)		40.00	40.00
Bach, Rev. T. J. (Maracaibo, Venezuela)		155.00	155.00
Balkan Relief Fund	194.40	181.35	375.75
Bender, Rev. R. H. (San Salvador, C. A.)		11.00	11.00
Bethesda Leper Home		102.75	102.75
Bowery Mission
Contributions	858.22	28,627.28	29,485.50
Legacy	522.02	2,211.41	2,733.43
Supplies		243.76	243.76
Transportation		132.60	132.60
Bulgarian Orphan Relief Fund	10.00
Burns, J. A. (Oneida Institute, Ky.)		100.02	100.02
Charity Organization Society		6.00	6.00
"Chicken Brigade"		1.50	1.50
China Baptist Publication Society (Canton, China)		12.50	12.50
China Famine Fund		1,049.18	1,049.18
China Orphans	8,172.88	17,974.76	23,320.79	$2,826.85
Christian Farm Colonies		5.00	5.00
Christian Herald Children's Home—
Contributions	654.57	29,485.28	30,139.85
Legacy		8,795.06	8,795.06
Endowment Legacy (Mont Lawn)		54.70	54.70
Christian Herald Relief Fund for the Widows and Orphans of the War in Europe
Scriptures for Distribution by Committee in War Zone		157,333.79	154,616.73	2,717.06
Dollar Christmas Fund for Homeless Belgians		36.40	36.40	5.00
Door of Hope Mission (Shanghai, China)		4.65	4.65
Dora Refund Account	250.00			250.00
Evening Mail "Save a Home Fund"		1.00	1.00
Ezra's Mite Box		51.17		51.17
Fennick, Malcolm C.		10.00	10.00
Five Points Mission		25.00	25.00
Florence Crittenton League		5.00	5.00
Foreign Mission	100.00	100.92	200.92
German Red Cross		6.50	6.50
Grenfell, Dr. Wilfred (Labrador)		174.00	174.00
Grinnell, Dr. & Mrs. A. L. (Honan, China)		15.00	15.00
Harrow, Rev. J. M. L.		45.00	45.00
Hartzell, Bishop J. C. (Inhabane E. Africa)		164.43	164.43
Home Missions		59.62	59.62
Hoskins, Rev. Franklin (Beirut, Syria)		3.00	3.00
India Famine		5.00	5.00
India Orphans	1,741.61	1,931.55	1,825.06	*1,847.56
International Sunshine Society		1.00	1.00
Italian Earthquake Sufferers		24.21	24.21
Jansen, Rev. F. (Cebu, P. I.)		15.00	15.00
Japan Orphans	1,066.03	1,316.67	1,475.34	907.36
Japan Sufferers		34.00	34.00
Jenkins Colored Orphanage (Charleston, S. C.)		1.00	1.00
Jerusalem Leper Mission		31.00	31.00
Johnson, Rev. Emil		20.00	20.00
Kiswick Colony of Mercy		19.00	19.00
Lenz, Rev. B. (Labrador)		165.00	165.00
Lincoln Memorial		11.00	11.00
Livermore, Mary H. (Red Springs, N. Car.)		3.00	3.00
Long, Dr. John J. (Limerick, Ireland)		20.00	20.00
McAuley Cremorne Mission		5.00	5.00
McAuley Water Street Mission		130.25	130.25
Mayesville Institute		102.00	102.00
Mexican Bible Fund		10.00	10.00
Mexican Mission		1.00	1.00
Missionary Substitutes
General	19.87		3.00	16.87
Bender, Rev. C. J.		12.50	12.50
Curtis, Rev. J. A.		18.50	18.50
Brewster, W. N.		110.00	110.00
Donohugh, Rev. Thomas		37.50	37.50
Ewing, (Mrs.) E. O.		40.00	40.00
Hagqvist, W.		125.00	125.00
Hartwell, Miss Emily S.		15.00	15.00
Jansen, Rev. F.		50.00	50.00
Holderforth, Mrs. & Mr. J. G.		84.00	84.00
Lucas, J. J.		65.00	30.00	†35.00
Thomssen, Rev. G. W.		25.00	25.00
Woodberry, Rev. & Mrs. J.		75.00	75.00
Mission, Malanje Angola, (W. Africa)		30.00	30.00
Mission to Lepers		80.00	80.00
Monterey, Mexican Sufferers		28.00	28.00
Morris, W. H.	74.00		13.00	61.00
Naon, Rev. Isaac Vega		25.00		25.00
National Temperance Society		.50	.50
N. Y. Association for the Blind		1.00	1.00
"Old Minister"	252.77	517.73	483.00	†286.50
Olsson, Emilie, (Buenos Ayres)		5.00
Pacific Garden Mission		100.00	100.00
Paton, Rev. Frank H. L. (Melbourne, Australia)		150.00	150.00
Pet, Rev. W. W. (Constantinople, Turkey)		25.00	25.00
Persian Refugees		34.35	34.35
Pressing Need Fund	504.71	334.03	354.10	486.64
Pineys of N. J.		23.00	23.00
Ramatal, Pundita (Sharada, Poona, India)		166.00	166.00
Reed Lepers, Mary		23.16	23.16
Riis, Jacob A. Settlement		2.00	2.00
Salem Relief Fund		2.00	2.00
Salmas, Dr. Levi B.		100.00	100.00
Salvation Army		12.14	12.14
Scott, Bishop Isiah		110.00	110.00
Society of Inner Mission and Rescue Work Com.		14.00	14.00
Society of Soul Winners		315.00	315.00
South United Presby. Church		2.00	2.00
Stark, A. R.		123.00	123.00
Sunday Breakfast Association		100.00	100.00
Taylor University, Upland, Ind.		4.80	4.80
Testaments for Soldiers		167.28	167.28
Tourinho, J. M. (Santo Antao, Cape Verde Islands)		160.00	30.00	130.00
Turkey Earthquake Sufferers		2.50
Tuskegee Normal & Industrial Institute		100.00	100.00
Weber, Miss Lena		10.00	10.00
White Door Gospel Settlement		60.50	60.50
Williamsburg Mission to the Jews		8.00	8.00
Winson, Mrs. Mary		5.00	5.00
Work for Prisoners		1.00	1.00
Work in Japan		3.00	3.00
Zamora, Nicholas		5.00	5.00
Zwemer, Rev. S. M.		35.00	35.00
Interest	$14,422.08	$255,479.74	$260,257.81	$9,644.01
	394.61	593.57	540.38	447.80
	$14,816.69	$256,073.31	$260,798.19	$10,091.81

†All balances thus marked paid in June

‡Payable $40 monthly

After a careful examination we hereby certify that in our opinion all cash receipts have been properly accounted for and the disbursements have been made for the purpose intended by the donors.

(Signed) PATTERSON & RIDGWAY,

Certified Public Accountants.

New York, October 27, 1915.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

An Illustrated News Weekly for the Home

The Gary Schools as I Saw Them

By O. H. PANNKOKE

GARY has a school plant covering some forty square miles, valued at twenty million dollars. To see this educational plant for themselves, between forty and fifty thousand visitors have come from every quarter of the globe. There are only five thousand children enrolled in school. The average cost of instruction is less than in other parts of the country, but the system is radically different from any other. That is the reason why Gary has become the Mecca of educators, who come to see the school system in operation. The interest has become so great that it has been found necessary to set aside special weeks for visitors. During these weeks they come in at the rate of two hundred and more a day.

But what about that tremendous plant? That's simple. The whole community is utilized to educate the children. The school routine takes them into the library, the Y. M. C. A., the steel plant, the power station, the shop of the cobbler, the studio of the photographer. Every bit of community life, every thread of community interest, contributes to the mind and mold the character of Gary's future men and women. Goethe somewhere contrasts the city of the future with the fresh green of life's vital instincts. It takes some men a lifetime of self-purging to get rid of the solemn authority and traditional stories of eight short school years. By the time they are ready to face and cope with things as they are, old age cuts them off. Gary believes in making education real and the preparation for real living.

What is life? In Boston it is culture. In Washington, diplomacy and politics. In the South, it is social amenities. But isn't life, for ninety-nine hundredths today, the problem of earning a livelihood honestly and successfully? And are not industry and business the obvious channels through which to do this? Then education, as the preparation for modern life, ought to familiarize the children with the business of modern living, along the forensic Roman rhetorics useful. The age of the troubadours needed filting rhymes and melody-twanging guitars. The age of the machine, of scientific expansion, needs men and women trained from birth to carry out its tasks.

GARY was brought face to face with this truth more directly than any other American city. Gary did not grow. Modern industry created it out of a sandy waste on the northern shore of Lake Michigan. The Steel Trust chose the spot on account of its water and rail facilities, and decided to erect there one of its great plants. With the opportunity work came the workers, seventy per cent. foreigners, the rest professional and business men who saw their opportunity in the new community and staked all on success. They were young. They discounted the past and looked toward the future. They were gifted with that supreme philosophy, common sense. When they laid out the policy of the community, they set out "to do the obvious thing," as Mr. Holmes, president of one of the banks, put it. In an industrial community what is more obvious than to make children acquainted with modern industry?

But why speak about the Gary schools? The best witnesses are the schools themselves. There are three at present: the Jefferson and Emerson Schools on the north side, the Froebel School on the south side. The Jefferson is the original school. It was erected by the United States Steel Company along the old lines. They didn't believe in the present system when Mr. Wirt first came from Bluffton, Ind., to be superintendent of the Gary schools. He was met with the traditional argument, "What's good enough for Evanston is good enough for Gary." But the Jefferson School has since been adapted to the present system. While formerly it could accommodate 360, today it houses 800 and can take care of 900. So from the financial standpoint alone, the change is a 250 per cent. gain.

The Froebel School is the most modern and pretentious of the three. It was erected in 1913 at a cost of $350,000 on a ten-acre tract of land and can accommodate 2,800 pupils. It is claimed that its equipment is the most perfect in the world. From the outside it looks like an up-to-date school building, although the outdoor gymnasiums, sand-pits, wading-pool and gardens lead one to suspect something more than a routine school.

How different, though, the inside! It seems like a city under a single roof, with all the interests and organizations of a modern city. Here is a cobbler's shop. An Austrian workman is surrounded by an interested group of boys, to whom he is imparting the knacks of the trade. On the floor, in picturesque disorder, are boys' shoes in every stage of dilapidation, as mothers know so well. Farther on is a cabinet shop in which busy little workmen are planing and sawing and gluing and hammering. Ever and anon they strike a knotty problem in the specifications. They are real "blue prints." And a hurried consultation with the instructor for the time interrupts their work. What are they making? Imagine, if you can, useless models of ill-assorted furniture and chests that one might suppose would occasion a home riot when the youthful artists demand for them a place in the parlor. Not at all. They are part of the school organization. They make desks and cabinets for the schools, according to the most up-to-date specifications. At the front of the building the plumbers are housed and the painters both trades very necessary for the health and appearance of the School City. On the side the busy sons of Hephaistos are hammering and forging and drilling and planing the tough iron, with an enthusiasm that would have delighted the old limping Greek god. Nor are they turning out weapons for the wars of the gods. Their energies are bent on turning out the ironwork of which so much is needed in the repairs of the schools.

But this is a modern city, so it could not exist without a printer. He is in a large, well-lighted room, filled with high type-cases and presses. On the walls are specimens of his work: report blanks with intricate lines and cross spacing, pamphlets describing the work of the school, requisition formulas, posters embodying the principles of good order.

We can't stop at the store, nor at the pottery works, where they are turning out vases and urns varying from the old Etruscan designs to twentieth century wares. It is dinner time. Let us go to the school restaurant and make the best of it. Why, those girls can't cook regular dinners! They look very dainty, in their white caps and white aprons, and the girl cashier looks perfectly competent as she surveys your purchases and crisply announces the price. But our appetite isn't make-believe nor our stomachs fool-proof. We'll take some of that scalloped salmon. Yes, two portions, one for my wife and one for myself, and some potato salad and some cocoa and some pie. That's all. "Thirty-six cents, please." Why, that's outrageous. Seventy-two cents for this bit of food? "No, thirty-six cents for both, eighteen cents each. Next?" Was the dinner good? It was excellent. The restaurant is up to date and is busy with the many teachers, children and visitors who eat there regularly.

We go upstairs to the back of the building. On one side, the girls have their gymnasium; below it is their swimming-pool and shower-baths. In the center is the auditorium. We step out from the back of the stage to see what is going on. Little Mildred Mone is playing. She is only about ten or eleven, but she plays well and enjoys it, and her classmates evidently enjoy it, too, as is shown by their hearty clapping when she is through. The whole school force, from the principal down, is pressed into harness to make this auditorium period interesting and profitable for the classes.

On the other side is the boys' gymnasium, with their swimming-pool underneath. By the time they graduate nearly all of the boys can swim. And the boys we saw certainly are a healthy, vigorous, buoyant lot, healthy not so much by the accident of inheritance as because their whole school life aims to show them the value and the way of getting a healthy body to house a vigorous mind. Outside we see children busy in the school gardens, laying out plots and preparing the ground for the coming spring. Others are making use of the outdoor gymnasiums or engaging in supervised play.

It is certainly a busy city, this Froebel School, "a child's world within the adult world of the city," as it has been put. There is nothing interesting to a healthy child which is not found here. How different the whole atmosphere and idea from the primitive, meager drilling still going on in many of the newer sections of the country! One wonders how it is possible to order and administer all the units in their many activities. The surprising fact is that the children are extensively used in the government of the school. The commercial department does all the bookkeeping. The boys and girls are under the supervision of Mr. Lester, the head of the department; but the real detail work is done by the children, and it is done well. So throughout the other departments, real responsibility rests on the children. One continually sees older children assisting younger children in a spirit of friendly helpfulness. They feel it to be part of their duty and do it gladly.

THIS meager picture of the Gary schools will sufficiently prove that they are interesting. But some will ask: "Do they really educate?" A trip through the ethnological section of the Smithsonian Institution would be enjoyed by any child, though as routine education its advantage would not be so obvious. The first task of education is to teach the child reading, writing, arithmetic and related subjects, in order to unlock for its mind the intelligent universe in which it lives. The so-called academic training is fundamental in primary education. But the Gary schools teach that. They teach it as thoroughly, at least, as do the other Indiana schools. Their curriculum in these branches is fixed by the state. But Gary does not stop here. It immediately makes the theoretical subjects real by applying them to the tasks of life. The theoretical subjects at any time are only a means to an end, viz., to open the channels of life. Familiarity with and grasp of life are the important goal. To lose sight of that makes academic training a dead mind torture, without motive and interest.

Throughout the Gary schools, one everywhere finds this close union of theory and practice. The boys in the print-shop learn spelling and reading with double zest because they want to turn out good work. The cabinet and machine shops promote arithmetic and drawing. The gardening lends interest to nature study. To stand well in the commercial department brings out spelling and reading and penmanship. The application of sanitation and hygiene makes physiology real. In fact, the teachers get together and plan such cooperation.

Miss Martin, principal of the Jefferson School, took me into the drawing-room. It was anything but conventional. On the left of the door were figures cut out by little children to illustrate their story hour. All the friends of my youth were there and some that I had not met—"Tom, Tom, the Piper's Son," "The Three Bears," "The Old Woman that Lived in a Shoe," etc. Next to it stood a pretentious cardboard model of a medieval castle, made by older children for the history lesson. Toward the window, with the light falling through its panels and delicate edgings, was the beginning of a stained glass window made for the arts and crafts department. On the other side were designs for vases. It takes little imagination to see how frequent are the opportunities for this application and correlation of studies among a group of teachers that work together.

Gary has such teachers. It pays its teachers ten dollars a month more on the average than they could get otherwise. It aims to have specialists. The so-called departmental system is in operation, in which the division is according to subjects and not according to classes. No teacher in Gary is called upon to teach a segment of reading, spelling, arithmetic, geography, history, year after year until the brain refuses to respond to the dead routine any longer. The Gary teachers are far above the average. Many of them are known professionally far beyond their city or state. Miss Elsie Uhland of the Emerson School is creditably known in child welfare circles. Miss Klingensmith, one of the primary teachers, is author of primers and readers that are used throughout Indiana. Mr. Nesbit, one of the medical advisers, gave up a promising practice at Valparaiso to work in this new field. Miss Lawrence, another medical adviser, had been in charge of hospitals and social settlements before she took charge of the medical supervision and instruction in the Froebel School. Mr. Lester, at the head of the Froebel commercial department, seems more like a successful business man than a dry pedagogue.

THESE are not exceptions but illustrations. The Gary teachers give that impression of self-reliance and self-control which comes with advanced and matured training. The opportunity to advance in and teach their special subjects gives them in a high degree that peculiar quality of the true teacher: enthusiasm. That was humorously emphasized in the Froebel School. I first met Mr. Lester and for a time I gained the impression that the Gary system is essentially commercial. I tore myself loose and got into the medical office and there I found that the Gary system was essentially health, from "fresh air and clean food for baby," to "swat the fly" and "clean up your backyard." The same spirit of interest and importance met me in every part of the school.

This is the attitude which goes right to the heart of successful teaching. The children imbibe and reflect the enthusiasm of their teachers, to say nothing of the greater ability of those teachers that love their subjects and are proficient in them. While chatting with Miss Lawrence, little ten-year-old Elsie Huberth came in. Miss Lawrence had shown me an essay written by her on health, which was better than many written in colleges. I asked her: "What are you going to be, Elsie?" "A doctor. I'm saving for it now." Shortly after, a woe-begone little Hungarian strolled in, the very picture of suffering. Without a word from Miss Lawrence, Elsie told him to sit down, picked up a thermometer, wiped it, stuck it into his mouth, told him to close his lips, and stood over him with an air of solemn professional compassion which no metropolitan specialist could have carried off better. I chatted with many others at random in the various schools and all gave the impression of being at home and interested in their work.

Of course, only part of this interest falls to the personal credit of the teachers. The schools themselves interest the children because they are real and because they touch life at every point. Modern education lays greatest stress on the doctrine of interest. Common sense tells us that it depends on motivation. Show a child graphically why certain knowledge is of advantage and it will seek it. Gary, bent on "doing the obvious thing," went straight for the heart of the matter and coupled up education with the business of life, thus gaining a twofold goal: vital interest and an efficient preparation for life. A passing glance shows that the children are interested. They are so interested that the long school day is not long enough. They come early and stay late. They come on Saturday of their own free will. The Gary schools are open forty-eight weeks a year and the children attend for that length of time. They carry their school ideas into their homes and apply them there. School life really draws out and engrosses their faculties in a degree seldom seen in such young children.

It has a vast influence, too, on their character. They are kept off the streets. Gary practically has no boy problem. The chief of police, Mr. Martin, claims that no city in the union has a lower percentage of youthful delinquency. The system makes the children themselves responsible. They are little men and women, doing real work, and they are treated as such.

While interviewing Miss Martin, principal of the Jefferson School, a little girl came up and asked her: "Miss Martin, how can I get this paint off?" The incident expresses in a flash the spirit of cooperation which exists.

Approaching the schools at first one sees groups of children everywhere about. Entering the halls at seeing children going about freely with smiles on their faces, the thought may come that there is no order nor discipline. Observation shows rather the opposite, however. The children are orderly, in fact, intent on order, without the fear of a watchful nemesis overtaking them in an infraction of school rules. Most of the bad behavior in the average school is due to curbing the animal spirits of youth beyond endurance. The explosion comes in due time inevitably, and ends with a tearful procession to the principal's office. How vivid and unreasonable the process is a grain of common sense shows. At Gary the children have a chance to work off the animal spirits naturally and they are therefore vastly more tractable.

Miss Martin incidentally called attention to an interesting result of the system. In the drawing-room was a picture of an Egyptian mummy, done in colors. It was excellently done. When she saw that I was interested she told me the story. It was done by a boy who was thought hopelessly dumb—a problem for the specialist, an unsolvable riddle for the average school. He loved to draw. He was reached through it. He is staying over for the sake of the drawing. The Froebel School has a similar case. Leslie Rogers, a negro comic artist whose cartoons might easily pass muster in a metropolitan funny section. This is a natural result of the all-around practical training.

The whole system at Gary is flexible that it readily adapts itself to the needs of the different pupils. The children promote themselves, not by class but by subject. They can arrange their time to do double work in branches in which they are deficient. As they grow older and begin to have a definite goal in life, they concentrate.

Dean Burris of the Teachers' College of Cincinnati University said of the Gary system: "They are utilizing all of the educational opportunities of the city, all the time for all of the people, and in a way which reveals to young and old that what they are doing is worth while." It would be impossible to sum the situation up more simply and forcibly. The schools are never idle. The school day lasts practically from eight to five, seven hours for the younger, seven and a quarter for the older children. In the evening, the buildings are used for continuation classes and for recreation. There are over 6,000 enrolled in evening instruction, 20 per cent. more than the day enrolment. In New York the ratio is less than five to one in favor of the day enrolment.

With all their splendid equipment and many uses the Gary schools are cheaper per student, in the original investment as well as in the maintenance. Mainly two reasons bring this about. The Gary schools double their capacity by accommodating two distinct schools, which alternate in the use of the classrooms and special rooms. To have departmental teaching obviates the need of supervisors at high salaries. A comparison of the Jefferson and Emerson schools is illuminating. The former was originally erected along the old lines at a cost of $90,000 with a capacity of 360. The Emerson building, with a large playground and a wealth of facilities, cost $225,000. It can accommodate 1,800 pupils. The construction cost of the Jefferson building per pupil is therefore $225, and that of the Emerson building $125. The cost of operation and maintenance per pupil is $29 and $11 and the cost of instruction $32 and $23 respectively.

Some years ago, I passed Gary on the Baltimore and Ohio. It was evening and the setting sun was playing its many colors on the long, hazy clouds of smoke arising from the open-hearth furnaces of Gary's steel plant. Against the distant sky arose the gaunt stacks, the high furnaces, the long lines of shops ever and anon lit up by a tongue of fire that colored the enveloping night blood red. I felt the romance of modern industry, the romance of steel, of honest effort and useful labor that has gone out and conquered the earth in a short century of gigantic progress. Is it not natural that this community, born and suckled on the bosom of modern industry, should rear its children to fit into modern life? The Gary schools are modern. They are built for the children of today to train the honest workers of tomorrow. They have cleared away the cobwebs of tradition and outlived custom, to do their business in a way that will demonstrate its value in the successful, well-equipped lives of their graduates.

[A second paper by Mr. Pannkoek, on the religious side of the Gary schools, will follow.—Editor.]

Washington on the Eve of Congress

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

The Capital City Seen from the Top of the Washington Monument. Capitol and Congressional Library Outstanding

AN air of mystery, of vague excitement, of unrest, almost, is over Washington. By day and night lines of smart electric runabouts, groups of distinguished limousines, a maze of carriages blazoned with shields, stand impatiently in front of the stations, haughtily in front of the hotels. Men with broad-brimmed, black felt hats and broad, flowing, black neckties slam clumsy grips into waiting taxis and give drivers imposing addresses in loud-enough-to-carry voices. Occasionally some one in a vivid uniform, brass buttons gleaming, stalks resplendently across the foreground; sometimes a wonderfully well-gowned woman leans from the window of her car and nods a charmingly poised head. Darkies, sitting in victorias along the curb, white teeth glowing from the midst of broad smiles, signal briskly to possible customers. Children—a very few children—mingle, round-eyed, with the crowd.

Bagdad is the mystery city of the Near East. Its marble turrets, its barred windows, its gardens hidden fragrantly from the prying world, breathe the spirit of adventure through fiction. And Washington—the great throbbing, human heart of our nation—is our mystery city, our city of adventure, our fragrant garden of romance.

Washington, at times, is quiet. During the humid summer months the city throws itself down like a drowsy child, and sleeps. It is a restless, dream-filled slumber. During the spring Washington blooms fragrantly like a shy hyacinth or a golden crocus, but during late autumn and early winter Washington is electric with an undercurrent of excitement. For it is then that Congress returns, and the city that has slept as a drowsy child wakes up and smiles and dresses itself in its gayest colors.

The streets of Washington are thronged with crowds. Seventh Street, the section of cheap shops (though no shops are very cheap in Washington), has its commonplace, gesticulating foreigners, and shabby women, and fat colored mammys. Pennsylvania Avenue, not far distant, has its own class of people—silk-hatted, frock-coated men talking perfunctorily to elaborately gowned, almost ultra-smart women. New Hampshire Avenue (Mrs. Galt, the President's fiancée, lives on New Hampshire Avenue) rolls out smoothly, like a bolt of white ribbon, from its quiet start to its quiet finish. The fashionable shopping district, which seems almost provincial to a New Yorker, is deluged with a laughing crowd of shoppers—men buying odds and ends, women matching gay chiffons and delicate crêpes and shimmering satins and fine laces. The wife of the Socially, the winter season in Washington is going to be a unique one. The President's wedding, which will probably take place between Christmas and New Year's, puts all other things—even the War Congress—in the background for the moment. Folk throng the streets when the President takes his fiancée for a ride; curious sightseers troop to the market when Mrs. Galt goes to do her ordering for over Sunday.

Mrs. Galt is going to enter into the official life of our country at a rather difficult time. Because of the war the foreign diplomats at Washington do not meet or speak to each other socially. The Austrian and the English ministers, who were the warmest of friends before their countries became estranged, pass on the street without seeing each other. Because of this strained feeling, the new first lady of the land will have to preside at two diplomatic dinners—one for the Allies, the other for the Central Powers and their sympathizers. For the same reason the time-honored diplomatic reception must also be given up, as will many smaller events. Innovations in the official circle at Washington are apt to be difficult, red-taped affairs. But Mrs. Galt is assuming her place as the first lady of the land bravely, confidently. She is entering it with a smile.

On the street the wife of one prominent man sees the wife of another and hails her girlishly. All over the city people are greeting each other happily after several months' separation. All over the city strangers are saying "Mighty glad to know you"—and meaning it. All over the city one-time antagonists are finding out that they like each other after all, and that it was all a mistake—a slight difference of opinion. Not many people frown—many people smile. Washington is like that when Congress is coming back and the town is waking up after its summer nap.

A CASUAL tourist feels just a bit—well, not blue, just perhaps lonely. Washington isn't a big city, but there are so many people in it—people who don't know you and don't care for you. People who are too busy caring for some one else. But one need not remain lonely for long, there is too much to see.

The Washington Monument stands alone on a gently rising hill in Potomac Park. It looks softly cream-colored where the sun strikes it, vividly white where it rests in the shadow. It looks lonely, too, up there so high against the blueness of the sky; and yet—it doesn't look quite lonely, either.

(Continued on page 128)

Principal Entrance to the White House

Chinese ambassador steps from her electric runabout, a tiny, slant-eyed child clinging to her hand, and one glimpses the startling contrast of the Old World and the New so often seen in Washington.

The women who stand laughingly by the counters wear flowers, most of them gardenias and valley lilies, and roses and orchids bloom from nests of velvety fur. This fall most often the flowers worn are orchids, for Mrs. Galt, the President's fiancée, wears orchids—the President sends them to her every morning. . . . One feels that the women of Washington are looking forward to something—selecting dresses for something—waiting for something.

THIS winter's season at Washington is going to be one of the busiest, socially and otherwise, that our capital has ever known. This is due to the importance of the present session of Congress: the "War Congress." Yet it is a misnomer, for nobody wants war.

The Washington Monument and the New Federal Printing and Engraving Building

ALLY comes of almost hysterical enthusiasm the Scandinavian-American liner Oscar II sailed from New York for Copenhagen at 3:15 o'clock Saturday afternoon, December 4, carrying the company of peace advocates who, with Henry Ford as their leader, hope to accomplish some definite thing toward the ending of the European war. Undeterred by a belittling attitude of the press in general, Mr. Ford has set aside every other interest and concentrated his personality and his fortune upon one object—peace. Both his purpose and his plans received such encouragement from men and women of standing that the enterprise must be regarded as a sincere attempt properly to influence the belligerents, and the assurances given in neutral countries of Europe that the Ford party will receive warm cooperation there, tend to strengthen the character of the undertaking. Just exactly how the American representatives will go about their work in Europe has not been explained, excepting that they will take part in the great peace conference which is to assemble at The Hague. The high purpose, the high enthusiasm, and the great faith in their mission which possess this company on the Oscar II are in themselves potent factors for good in any good cause, and all right-minded people cannot but hope and pray that this unique expedition will not be without its influence for peace.

An Adventure for Peace

The steamship pier at Hoboken was packed with people long before noon. Mr. Ford reached the ship at one o'clock and found most of the Peace Party aboard. Thomas A. Edison and Mr.

Bryan were on hand to wish the expedition good success. The ship left her pier with bands playing, the members of the party lining the rails, and the three thousand people on the pier wildly cheering and singing. The scene was almost without precedent as a farewell to outward-bound voyagers. The passport bureau at Washington worked overtime to provide the members of the Ford party with the necessary credentials. The party numbered 148 and includes such men as Jud Ben Lindsey of Denver, Rev. Charles Aked of San Francisco, Rev. Jenk Lloyd Jones of Chicago, Dr. Wilfr. Grenfell, Governor Hanna of North Dakota, and S. S. McClure of New York. Two men of the party are to report the expedition's work for the Christian Herald.

The Group About Henry Ford as the Ship Left the Pier

Just before sailing, Mr. Ford gave a statement which is, in part, as follows: "I am sailing with the firm belief that great good will come of this mission. The delegates to the peace conference have indicated that there in them the spirit that appreciates the uselessness and waste of war. There is some sentiment behind the project but there is also a feeling that the business world wants the thing stopped, that the world may go on in its construction."

"Little harm can come of the venture and great good may result. It will keep alive the thought that peace is possible as well as desirable. And as long as that is done, hope of peace exists. If this conference succeeds only in bringing about a beginning of negotiations for peace, it will have accomplished a good work."

The War in Europe

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

European journalist of many years' standing; military critic; staff writer of the Paris Daily Mail and Le Temps; contributor to L'Indépendance Belge

AS a result of the joint operations of the Austro-Germans and Bulgarians in Serbia during the past week, the Serbian army has practically been driven out of that country. Indeed at this writing it may be doubted whether more than 3,000 square miles, of a total of approximately 34,000 of the kingdom of Serbia, are now in Serbian hands, and their hold on this small strip along the Montenegrin and Albanian border is extremely precarious.

Every town of any importance is now in the possession of Serbia's enemies. About 130,000 of the Serbian army have been captured, besides practically all the artillery thereof, excepting a few mountain batteries. The occupation of Monastir late in the week under consideration (Nov. 27 to Dec. 4) by a joint force of Austro-Hungarians and Bulgarians may be considered as marking the end, for the present at least, of the campaign against the Serbians on Serbia's soil.

Some portion of the northern Serbian army succeeded in making its escape into eastern Montenegro, a portion of which force is reported to have succeeded in making its way through the wilderness of mountains on that border, and in effecting a junction with the Montenegrins. Part of the southern army also escaped the Teutonic net and made its way westward, crossing into Albania, but even here its misfortunes continued, as it was immediately attacked by the Albanians, and irregular warfare is now reported to be going on with great violence between these opponents in the Albanian Alps.

The Serbians for various reasons have always been on more or less bad terms with their neighbors on all points of the compass, and in this their hour of adversity only the Greeks to the south seem to show them the slightest compassion.

Some of the defenders of Monastir succeeded in retreating south and in reaching and crossing the Greek border. This will make the question of Greek neutrality reach a critical stage, as under the rules of international law Greece, as a neutral, is obligated to disarm and intern these troops. What her action has been in the matter we do not at present know.

The relations between Greece and the Allies remain in much the same condition as they were the previous week. No definite agreement has been reached, but Greece apparently is determined not to be drawn in on either side, if it be possible for her to avoid it. Her situation, however, is anything but a bed of roses. Her hope lies in the extraordinary political and diplomatic skill and acumen being displayed by those who are directing her course. A word of praise should also be spoken for the Greek people, who are displaying remarkable self-control and patriotism in a very difficult and dangerous situation.

The forces of the Allies in southeastern Serbia have been comparatively inactive, and practically no fighting has taken place between them and their opponents. Many additional troops are reported as being landed at Salonica, and apparently the Allies are making every effort to strengthen their forces on this front. The strategic objective of these forces, owing to the fact that it is too late to render aid to the Serbian armies, will probably now be changed to an attempt to cut the line of communication between Turkey and the Central Empires.

Rumania's position has not grown any more defined. Russia is said to be exerting pressure on her to allow Russian troops to cross her territory to attack Bulgaria, to which, of course, Bulgaria and her allies are opposing counter-pressure, but up to the present writing Rumania has given no indication to which pressure she will yield. It seems, however, almost impossible in the present military and political situation for her to escape being drawn into the conflict on one side or the other at a not very remote date, though probably if she could avoid participating in the war she would.

There seems to be some doubt as to whether or not the railroad south from Belgrade to Nish and thence to Constantinople can be opened to traffic very soon, as on their retreat the Serbians are said to have so thoroughly destroyed this line as to make its repair a question of weeks, if not months. As this railroad was one of the great prizes to be won by the Austro-German drive, its condition is a matter of importance.

On the Dardanelles front the Turks have been rather active most of the week, and have abandoned the defensive attitude they maintained for months and passed to the offensive. This may be taken as a reasonably sure indication that the withdrawal of their troops by the Allies from this front has taken on reasonably large proportions. The result of this activity has up to the present been rather insignificant. Probably the offensive was taken more with the object of making the withdrawal difficult and costly than with the expectation of making any very important advances. Indeed, the Turks could not push an advance very far without coming under the fire of the guns of the allied fleet, which would be disastrous in the extreme.

The Austrian offensive on the northern and northeastern frontiers of Montenegro, begun some time ago, has now carried their troops some little distance into Montenegrin territory, though both sides are considerably hindered by the deep snow in the semi-mountainous district in which the fighting is taking place. Perhaps there will be more or less fighting here for some months, and though the ultimate end does not seem doubtful the Montenegrins will certainly put up a good defense, fighting as they are for their national independence.

Italy has, it was officially announced by the Minister of Foreign Affairs in the middle of the week, participated recently in a new conference at London and signed, with England, France, Russia and Japan, a fresh engagement not to conclude a separate peace. This action does not seem to indicate that peace is a possibility in the near future in spite of the many well-meaning efforts which are at present being made to bring peace about. Possibly the most serious effort in this direction is that being made by the Pope to bring about a suspension of hostilities on Christmas Day. If the point is once reached of suspending hostilities even for a single day, much might follow. This effort was made last year, but failed, and the chances this year for its success do not at present appear particularly good.

The Italian attack on the River Isonzo line continued severe all the past week, and centered in the assault on the defenses of Gorizia. The reports of the results of these very severe attacks are extremely contradictory, the Italians alleging progress, the Austrians claiming no gains by the foe of any moment; so it is impossible to say more than that the Austrian line of defense does not seem to have been decisively pierced, though the fighting here for several weeks is entitled to rank among the fiercest of the whole war.

On the rest of this Austro-Italian front, deep snow in the mountains which line the whole front has prevented much action.

The very peculiar fact that Italy and Germany are not officially at war still continues true; and also inexplicable.

The British victory over the Turks at Ctesiphon, near Bagdad, week before last, has not had the result anticipated, the capture of Bagdad. On the contrary, latest advices indicate that this important movement is already regarded in London as a failure.

In their editorials the London morning papers express great disappointment over the severe check of the Mesopotamia campaign, which they admit precludes any prospect of an early renewal of the advance on Bagdad. The Times says:

"Although British reinforcements are believed to be at hand, we think the public must make up its mind to wait for a considerable time before the minarets of Bagdad are sighted by the British troops."

The campaign in the west has been for the past week utterly devoid of any striking or even locally important events. Very few artillery duels ever have been reported, and the relative calm of a winter campaign seems to have settled on the whole front. This, however, does not mean that thousands of men are not dying daily on this front. Trench fighting is particularly deadly, but the men are killed in small numbers and at many points, and hence the attention is not attracted to any one skirmish.

The week on the Russian front was totally without incident, and the calm was almost absolutely undisturbed even by minor skirmishes.

THE LATEST PEACE RUMORS

THE NEW YORK TRIBUNE in a Washington dispatch, dated December 5, gives the following as Germany's peace terms (according to an outline given by a German in intimate touch with Berlin's policies):

"Germany to have full power over the Balkans, insuring her a road to Constantinople and Asia Minor, thus giving her a 'place in the sun' independent of British sea power. Buffer states to be maintained between Germany and Russia, including the proposed new kingdom of Poland, and the strengthening of Rumania. Restoration of the old boundaries in the west, with complete freedom for Belgium, and even possibly, a slight concession to France of the French-speaking parts of Alsace."

A Rome cablegram, dated December 5, to the New York Times says: "At the Consistory which will be held tomorrow the Pope will deliver an allocution, again deploring the horrors of the war and commiserating the Armenians. The Pontiff will urge the quick conclusion of peace, which should be just and durable, favoring neither of the belligerents."

A Week in the World's News

SANTA CLAUS'S PACK FULL. There is no danger that America's Christmas stocking will fail to be stuffed with toys as usual this season. Import figures show that a great many German toys have been received in this country, though less than usual here has been a large increase in toys imported from Japan and American toy factories have been running overtime to fill the ask. The majority of the toys have been planned with a juvenile toy of destruction in mind; there is a large increase in electrically operated toys, and unfortunately there are a great many more toy soldiers, toy battleships and other toys that mimic warfare than ever before. There are also a great many practical toys which enable a child to engage in play and instruction.

Hon. Clyde H. Tavenner

Who demands that Congress accept a bill of impeachment of the President.

THE PROBLEM OF THE COUNTRY CHURCH. The Commission on Church and Country has just announced the results of a very extensive survey of the state of Ohio. According to the report, one out of every nine country churches has been abandoned in recent years. Of those that are left only one-third are increasing in membership. 84 per cent have fewer than one hundred members; 21 per cent, fewer than twenty-five. Only 6 per cent have individual preachers; 26 per cent share ministers with another church; 23 per cent, have one-third of the time of a minister; 1 per cent, one-fourth the time; 14 per cent, one-fifth and 5 per cent, one-sixth. The large proportion of these churches receive about the same pay as a day laborer. Less than 40 per cent of the rural population are church members. The survey is to be made the basis of the working out of reforms which will make the churches community centers, as well as houses of worship.

TRIED IN THE CRUCIBLE. A clay has recently been discovered in this country which is better than any of the imported clays for crucibles and pots used in glass-making. The United States Bureau of Standards has just completed a series of tests by which the proper mixtures for different uses were determined. Glass manufacturers of the Netherlands are now importing soda from the United States instead of from Great Britain. American manufacturers recently shipped a large amount of furniture to South Africa and America is now more exporting cheese, butter and condensed milk both to the European market and to South America, Australia and the East and West Indies.

STAMPING OUT THE DRUG EVIL. Reports of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue indicate that the Harrison Act is proving successful in checking the drug habit in this country. The report states that the percentage of the government with druggists is being uniformly satisfactory. A report to the Secretary of the Treasury from one of the largest wholesale drug firms in the country states that their sales of these drugs in the last year were seventy-five per cent less than they were before the law went into effect.

ONLY MODERATELY POOR. On his thirtieth birthday, Andrew Carnegie was reported to be a comparatively poor man. While Mr. Carnegie has given away approximately three hundred and fifty millions of dollars, he still has at least twenty million dollars, and one financier estimated the sum still in Mr. Carnegie's hands as not less than fifty million.

NEW WIRELESS RECORD. On November 29 an operator for the Federal Wireless Telegraph Company at Honolulu was able to catch perfectly a message being transmitted from Nauen, Prussia to Tuckerton, N. J. The distance from Nauen to Honolulu is about nine thousand miles more than one-third of the great circle of the earth. The last previous record had been a transmission of seven thousand miles between Germany and its South African station.

THE DESERT TRAIL. In the days of '49, what is now the Lincoln Highway across the vast desert was marked by the bleaching bones of cattle, horses and men, the desert's toll for passage. The Highway is now to be marked by a double copper telephone circuit from Salt Lake City to Reno. Cut-in stations will be established one mile apart and the traveler on the Highway, on payment of small deposit, will be provided with instruments which will give him telephone connection at these stations. Thus solitude, the worst terror of the desert, will be banished by the telephone.

WHAT LABOR WANTS. At its recent convention the American Federation of Labor went on record as follows upon important questions of the day: They favored an American merchant marine and refused to endorse the proposed naval increases. Military preparedness was debated at length and a resolution protesting against military propaganda in public schools was voted down. A resolution was adopted opposing a large standing army but favoring a small one to be supplemented by a citizen soldiery. "democratically organized and controlled." They were opposed to any weakening of the Semmes Act. Industrial unionism as opposed to existing craft unionism was rejected. An eight-hour day for all government employees and better pay for post office clerks were endorsed. Establishment of a government bureau of safety was urged. Government ownership of telegraph lines and a permanent non-partisan tariff commission were favored. "Stop-watch speeding" in government departments was opposed. Every union wage-earner was asked to contribute one day's pay for relief of the Danbury hatters. A bill prohibiting enlisted army and navy musicians from entering into competition with civilian musicians was favored. President Compers and all other officers of the federation were reelected.

WAR SPIRIT DESTROYS DISCIPLINE.

According to the Berlin correspondence of the New York Evening Post, a report was recently published by the Association of Catholic School Teachers for the province of Silesia. This body expresses deep regrets at the persistent use of the argument that war is a purifier of the nation and an ennobler of its conscience. As far as the children are concerned, the Association says that the war has had altogether different results. Playing truant has become a habit in places where it was once rare. Home preparation is neglected. On the streets both boys and girls have grown impudent to passers-by and rude and rough in their behavior toward the old and toward children younger than themselves. Police charges against children are growing to startling dimensions. The teachers give the absence of the father as one of the principal reasons for this state of affairs, another being the circulation of so-called "patriotic" books by unscrupulous publishers, books which are hardly written for young readers.

EATING UP THE SLIDE

The dredges are chewing away at the big slide in the Gaillard Cut of the Panama Canal. In the week ending November 16, 239,400 cubic yards of excavation was accomplished. Three new fifteen-yard dipper dredges, each one with three times the capacity of the dredges formerly in use are now at work in the cut. There are also three ladder dredges and two suction dredges on the job. When the canal was closed by this slide, one of the vessels held up at the Pacific end of the canal was on its way from Manila to New York having chosen the route via Panama in preference to the route via Suez. The distances are 11,585 or 11,675 miles via Panama, depending on the route chosen, or 11,601 miles via Suez. The vessel in question was forced to proceed around South America and through the Strait of Magellan, adding about 11,130 miles more to her trip.

APPROACHING PROHIBITION BY EASY STAGES.

The new restrictions for the sale of liquor in London became effective November 29. Excepting in the districts about the arsenals and wharves, where no liquor can be sold, it is made an offense punishable by a fine of five hundred dollars or imprisonment for six months to sell or supply intoxicating liquors for consumption on the premises except as follows: Week-days, noon to 2.30 P.M.; 6.30 to 9.30 P.M. Sundays, 1 to 3 P.M. 6 to 9 P.M. The order permits an extension of half an hour for the consumption of liquor ordered during the period in which the sale is permitted. Spirits for home drinking cannot be purchased on Saturday or Sunday nor on other days except between noon and 2.30 P.M.

Baron Ei-ichi Shibusawa
Japan's foremost business man in this country.

RAISING NATIONAL REVENUES. On November 25 Secretary of the Treasury McAdoo stated the sources from which he proposes to increase the income of the government, viz.: Re-enactment of the emergency revenue taxation law repealed of the tariff law putting sugar on the free list, increased taxation on individual and corporate incomes, the reduction by one thousand dollars of the income tax exemption, the surtax on incomes to begin at

Dr. V. K. Wellington Koo, New Chinese Minister to the United States, and His Wife

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is published weekly by The Christian Herald Co., 100 Long House, Avenue, 34th and 35th Sts., New York City. The owners are: Yung Kung, President and Treasurer; Ross H. House, N. Y. City; Lewis H. Simpson, Vice-President; Ross H. House, N. Y. City; Theodore W. Wines, Secretary; Ross H. House, N. Y. City.

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE: $1.00 a year in advance. Remittances should be made in the United States by check, money order or registered mail. Make checks and money orders payable to The Christian Herald.

FOREIGN POSTAGE: For copies sent abroad to the United States, Canada and Mexico, add one dollar a year to the subscription price.

CHANGE OF DATE: If it takes at least two weeks to change the date after the date of the issue.

EXPIRATION OF SUBSCRIPTION: The date on the wrapper indicates when your subscription expires.

CHANGE OF ADDRESS: Please send three weeks' notice to make the change. Give both old and new address.

LETTERS should be addressed, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Blue House, New York.

Entered at Post Office, New York, as Second-Class Matter.
Entered as Second-Class Matter at the Post Office Department, Boston.

$10,000 or $15,000, instead of $20,000 incomes, a tax on gasoline and crude and refined oils, and a horse power tax on automobiles and other internal combustion engines.

Frank A. Vanderlip

Chairman of the new American International Corporation, who believes that no government should.

MISSIONARY MOMENTUM. Registration at the conventions of the Laymen's Missionary Movement has in all cases exceeded the registration that was expected. The preparation at each center has been very thorough. Nineteen teams of two men each went out the Sunday before the Toledo Convention to set "centers" in the churches of the near-by towns. Some churches sent more than ten per cent of their entire membership in men to the Pittsburgh Convention. The North Side Baptist Church of Chicago, which has 225 members, sent 110 men and two boys to the Chicago Convention.

CONVICTED OF DEFRAUDING THE GOVERNMENT

The first prominent case of illegal activity in this country by citizens of any of the belligerent nations to be tried in a United States court resulted in a verdict of guilty against Dr. Carl Buentz, head of the Hamburg-American Line, and three associates on the two charges of issuing manifests that were intended to deceive as to the nature and destination of the cargo, and causing collectors of ports to make and transmit to the Department of Foreign and Domestic Commerce false records. The trial showed that the enterprise had been prompted by the German Admiralty and consisted in a plan to deliver provisions and coal to German warships and commerce raiders at sea. Twelve ships altogether were sent out at a cost of about one and a half million dollars, only one of which succeeded in delivering its cargo to a German vessel of war. The government at first undertook to show that there had been a conspiracy to violate the neutrality laws of this country, but the case narrowed down to one of false manifests, and on the two counts all four defendants were found guilty on the first vote of the jury, which spent seven hours in deliberation. The case was tried in the United States District Court, New York. The defense announces that it will appeal. Assistant United States District Attorney Rodger Wood, the prosecutor, said of the verdict that it "means that the laws of the United States must be observed by the citizens of all the belligerent powers."

EXPLOSION AT THE DU PONT PLANT. On November 30 the packing plant of the Du Pont Powder Company at Wilmington, Del., was destroyed by the explosion of eight thousand pounds of black powder, thirty-one workmen being killed and a number of others being injured. The explosion left a huge crater where the building had been and set fire to a number of other buildings in the plant, but as all of the employees in a position to know the cause are among the killed, it has not been possible at this writing to ascertain the cause.

DIPLOMATS DISCREDITED. Our government has requested the recall of Captain Boy-Ed and Captain von Papen, naval and military attachés, respectively, of the German Embassy, because of "improper activities in military and naval matters." The case of officials of the Hamburg-American Line is understood to have supplied the chief ground for this action. Alexander von Nuber, Consul General in New York of Austria-Hungary, may also be declared no longer acceptable to the American government. Press dispatches of December 4 state that Brand Whitlock, American Minister to Belgium now in this country because of ill health, will not be permitted by the German governor of Belgium to return to Brussels. Consequently he may take up his official residence at Havre, France, the war capital of Belgium.

REFORMER WARDEN UPHOLD. The experiment of Warden Osborne in prison reform government at the New York State Prison, Sing Sing, has been threatened from its inception by various interests and persons. Regardless of disagreements, the experiment is proving illuminating along many lines of prison government. It has been watched with great interest by prison reformers and prison administrators throughout the country. The County Grand Jury and a member of the Prison Commission of New York State have both investigated the prison within the last two months. The Grand Jury have found indictments against some of the prison inmates for various assaults and breaches of the laws. The commissioner recommended a change of wardens, but was overruled by the other members of the commission.

Comfort in Time of Trouble

A SERMON BY REV. DAVID JAMES BURRELL, D.D., LL.D.*

TEXT: Isa. 26: 1-3. "We have a strong city; salvation will God appoint for walls and bulwarks. Open up the gates, that the righteous nation which keepeth the truth may enter in. Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace, whose mind is stayed on thee."

SO runs the song of a tranquil mind in time of trouble. It voices the thanksgiving of a people who dwell in Salem, the City of Peace.

The song is written in four stanzas. In the first is heard an exultant boast: "We have a strong city." And the reason is given: "God hath appointed salvation to be its walls and bulwarks."

Rise, crowned with light, imperial Salem, rise;
Exalt thy towering light and lift thine eyes;
The seas shall waste, the skies to smoke decay,
Rocks fall to dust, and mountains waste away;
But, fixed his word, his saving power remains:
Thy realm shall last, thine own Messiah reigns!

In the second stanza we have an invitation: "Open ye the gates." The Gospel is free. Welcome is the shibboleth that shall win all people to the saving knowledge of Christ. All people? Yes, ultimately; but not yet. There is a countersign at the open gates. "Let the righteous nations that keep the truth enter in." All are loyal to the great verities and principles that center in the written and incarnate Word of God.

In the third stanza there is a promise, a wonderful promise: "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed on thee." And again the reason is given: "Because he trusteth in thee." Thus it is written: "Trust in the Lord and do good: so shalt thou dwell in the land; and verily, thou shalt be fed." In the fourth stanza we have an exhortation: "Trust ye in the Lord forever." And why? Because "the Lord is the Rock of Ages."

It is a great psalm! So full of faith, of implicit confidence in God's wisdom to regulate and power to control in human affairs, and of loyal devotion to him.

Observe, in the first place, that its keynote is confidence in the living God. The psalmist is not thinking of the insignificant sort of god conjured up by so-called "freethinkers," who resents no sacrilege nor cares what liberties are taken with his holy law; but of the great God who sits upon the circle of the universe, with his watch-care over the rolling stars and his eye upon the sparrow when it falls.

The God of Salem is the God of the three O's. His Omnipresence is a fact so literal that though a man were to take the wings of the morning and fly to the uttermost parts of the sea he could not escape it. His Omniscience is that of all-seeing eyes, running to and fro through all the earth to behold the evil and the good, so that the most secret imaginations of the heart are not hid from him. His Omnipotence is such that, when the Great Powers set themselves against him and take counsel together, saying, "Let us break his bands asunder and cast away his cords from us," he meets their challenge with a burst of derisive laughter.

This is the God whom the Salemites believe in: not an impersonal First Cause, not insensate Law, not an all-pervading Force; but an Omnipresent, Omniscient, Omnipotent God; with eyes to see, a heart to pity and hands of power to deliver those who call upon him.

WE are living in times that put our theology to a severe test. The creed of many a shallow thinker has been dissolved into the thinnest of thin air by the mere headlines in the newspapers. No wonder that, when half the world is on the firing-line and the other half is breathing the fumes of gunpowder, the voice of the scoffer is heard: "Where now is thy God?" A fair question: where is he?

Our answer is, Come with us: let us follow the Star until it rests over Bethlehem: and, behold, here is our God! Here is the God of Salem, whose name is Wonderful, Counselor, Mighty God, Everlasting Father, and Prince of Peace. Here is one who dwelt in ineffable glory before the world was; who heard the cry of a perishing race and bowed the heavens to come down in this guise to answer it. Here is the God who assumed humanity that he might bear our sins in his own body on the tree, and still kept his divinity so that his suffering might be vast enough to expiate the guilt of all who should believe in him. Here is the God who, having finished his atoning work and triumphed over death, passed into the heavens, where he ever liveth to make intercession for us.

Here is the God who veiled and unveiled all Godhood in flesh, saying, "I and my Father are One"—the God of salvation, able to save unto the uttermost all who will come unto him: and—blessed be his name!—He is our God forever and ever!

The song of Salem is only for those who stay their hearts on the living God. The voice of the singer is attuned by faith, the faith that antidotes all spiritual maladies. One of these maladies is doubt; and doubt can never be expelled until one's soul is hid in the round-tower of infinite love, that is, "hid with Christ in God." For those who in the trenches of the Holy War are ever exposed to the corrosive gases of doubt there is no protecting mask but faith. It is the "stayed" heart that says, "I know whom I have believed, and am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him against that day."

Another of our prevalent maladies is fear: fear of calling her wares to men sheltered behind the eart works, and, as the narrator says, "never turned hair." Is it not written, "Out of the mouth of babes and sucklings thou hast ordained praise?" One who heart is stayed on God, being in the path of duty should be—must be—immune to fear; for here is the promise: "A thousand shall fall at thy side and a thousand at thy right hand, but it shall not conquer thee." A man is immortal till his work is done that is, when he is at work for God.

The third of our maladies is Worry, which is the antithesis of faith. One who truly believes in the divine watch-care is proof against "anxious thought." He can neither own trouble nor borrow it, because he is assured that "all things work together for good to them that love God."

Doubt, Fear and Worry—these are the three diseases of the soul; and the greatest of these is worry. On a winter's day at Erfurt, when to the anxious mind of Luther the Reformation was reduced to forlorn hope, he heard a robin redbreast chirping under his window; and straightway his Mast seemed to be saying, "If your Father careth for these, shall he not much more care for you, O ye little faith?" Seeing his friend, Melancthon, near by in an attitude of like despondency, he called, "Come, Philip, let us sing 'Ein feste Burg';" whereupon two hearts, never stayed on God, gave praise in the Fort-sixth Psalm: "God is our refuge and strength, very present help in trouble. Therefore will we not fear, though the earth be removed and though the mountains be cast into the midst of the sea!"

These are sifting times; when men's hearts are likely to misgive them and their religion is weighed in the balance. It is no uncommon thing to hear professing Christian say, in view of passing event, "My faith trembles," or "My faith fails me." This means simply that it was a paltry faith, an easy-going faith for summer days, a faith that never was securely stayed on God.

IT all comes to this: Do I really believe in God? In December, 1862, just before the Emancipation Proclamation, a great meeting was held by the colored people to hear Frederick Douglass, their most distinguished advocate. His subject was "The Sorrows of Slavery;" and it was not strange, under the circumstances, that he struck a minor note. He drew picture as dark as midnight, without a gleam of hope. "My soul," he cried, "is cast down within me!" A voice in the audience was heard calling, "Frederick! Frederick! Is God dead?" It was the voice of Sojourner Truth, a worn-out slave woman, whose faith in the ultimate dawn of freedom had never failed her.

This is the answer of all true believers not only to the challenge from without but to the inward moan of despondency: "Why art thou cast down, O my soul, and why art thou disquieted within me? Hope thou in God! For I shall yet praise him who is the health of my countenance and my God."

Oh that our minds were more and more stayed on the living God! The trouble is that we do not believe in him. We are not at all sure that he can manage the affairs of the world without us. It is the part of wisdom for people like us whose breath is in their nostrils to refrain from criticising the divine administration. I imagine that if the ears of our understanding were opened we should hear the Almighty saying, "Be still, and know that I am God."

There is a voice, loving but loud enough to be heard above the confused sounds of battle, "Come, my people, enter into my chamber and hide yourselves for a little moment, until the indignation be overpast." That is the divine call for these troubled days: Come my people; hide yourselves in the round tower shut to your doors not only against the conflict of arms, but against the clamor of the censorious against the logomachy of worldly wisdom, against the impious challenge of unbelief; hide yourselves for a season, for a little moment, until the indignation be overpast!

So comes, at length, the great bequest: "Peace I leave with you." In his Last Will and Testament our Saviour left us this, beyond all earthly wealth: "Peace I leave with you; my peace I give unto you: not as the world giveth give I unto you. Let not your heart be troubled; neither let it be afraid."

What shall we render unto him for his loving kindness? The least and utmost that we can do is to take of the cup of his salvation, to lift our hearts like sacramental chalices and be quiet while he fills them with the peace that passeth all understanding; and ever thenceforth to live as becometh those whose minds are stayed on God.

When Christmas Comes

By Eben E. Rexford

When Christmas comes,
And from the steeples far and near
We hear the bells ring, sweet and clear,
To welcome in the birthday morn
Of One in lowliest manger born
Who died for men and reigns a King.
All hearts take up the theme and sing
As angels sang o'er Bethlehem's hill,
Be peace on earth—to men good will,
When Christmas comes.

When Christmas comes
And holly hangs upon the wall
Of lowly home and stately hall,
Then men put by, for one brief day,
The cares that frighten peace away,—
All thoughts that vex—and festal cheer
Comes in, this best day of the year,
To gladden hearts and homes and make Man kinder for his brother's sake
When Christmas comes.

When Christmas comes
We some way feel the whole world kin,
And friendship's fires are kindled in Cold hearts, whose doors have long been shut.
"Come in!" rings out from hall and hut,—
"Come in, come in, this Christmas Day."
Put all old differences away.
Join hands and hearts, as all men should,
In universal brotherhood,
When Christmas comes.

When Christmas comes
Let us remember generously
The poor of earth, where'er they be,
And share with them our Christmas cheer.
As Christ would do if he were here.
And what we do for his dear sake
Be sure will fitting tribute make
To him who came to earth in love.
So may each heart its fealty prove
When Christmas comes.

tomorrow; fear of the arrow that flieth at noonday and of the pestilence that walketh in darkness; fear of death and judgment. But if the living God be for us, who shall be against us? "The Lord is my light and my salvation; whom shall I fear? The Lord is the strength of my life; of whom shall I be afraid?" What time I am afraid I will trust in thee!

IN a story of the Peninsular War, the writer says that the most surprising act of courage which he witnessed during the long campaign was that of a little country girl who every morning drove down the mountain road in a donkey-cart laden with commodities for the soldiers. Out in the open, along the firing-line, heedless of the roar of cannon and whistle of musketry, day by day she drove through the camp

Daily Meditation

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR. LED BY

J. H. JOWETT, D.D., F. B. MEYER, D.D., REV. E. WHITTIER CASWELL AND CLAYTON SEDGWICK COOPER

At Home in the Lord

SUNDAY, December 19. John 15:4. "Abide in me." We are called by the Lord into an inconceivable intimacy. We are not to be as vagrants who sleep upon a new doorstep every night, and who only occasionally return to an old resting-place. We are not even to be visitors upon the Lord, turning aside now and again for a brief sojourn, and then away into forgetfulness again. "She had the Lord on her visiting list!" No, not that! We are to settle down with the Lord, to rest in him, to abide in him, to make him our eternal dwelling-place. We are to be at home in the Lord.

It was said by one of the friends of James Hinton that under the influence of the strong religious devotion which made it his habit for thirty years regularly to retire three times a day for prayer and communion with God, his character gradually melted and softened into a marvelous realization of the Lord's presence. It was a touching word of Hinton's, "We are near home: may we be home-like!" So many of us, in our religious life, have the conventional air of visitors, not the natural homelikeness of the children of the house. We don't look as if we lived here. There is a certain awkwardness, an uneasy restraint, a suggestion that we do not know the ways and speech of the house. We have not "the glorious liberty of the children of God." We are not as the sheep which, under the perfect defense of the shepherd, "go in and out and find pasture." And yet this gracious intimacy, this ample freedom, are our bounding privilege in grace. We are not to remain on the frontiers of bondage, part friends and part bond-slaves, half free and half bound, living in a sort of twilight of the Kingdom. We are called right into the house of light, into the Lord's immediate presence, to be guests, nay, members of the family, at his bountiful table, and to enjoy unfettered intercourse with our Head. We are invited to abide in him.

"May we be home-like." Liberty with reverence! A full intimacy, and yet inspired with the spirit of holy worship! Bringing everything to the Lord, and consulting him about everything, so that everything may shine with the light of sanctification! To know that, wherever we are, at work or at play, in the crowded street or on the trackless moor, to know that we are never away from home, and that we never stray outside God's gracious roof! This is to be at home in the Lord. J. H. J.

The Shearing Time

MONDAY, December 20. Isa. 53:1-12. "As a sheep before her shearers is dumb." Pastor J. H. Spurgeon used to bring out the significance of his text by comparing it with the preceding verse, where we are all described as sheep astray! And here our Lord is also compared to a sheep. We "like sheep" and he as a sheep; we like sheep in our wanderings, he like a sheep in his patience; we like sheep in foolishness, but he only like a sheep for the sweet submissiveness of his spirit. When he was slandered, he replied not; when false witnesses arose, he answered them not. He kept back the natural indignation which must have come over his spirit against the injustice, the falsehood, the shameful malice of his foes. He spoke only when put on his oath, whether he was the Son of God. They sheared away everything that was dear to him, stripping him even of the tunic his mother had woven for him, but he uttered no word of complaint, no cry for vengeance.

We too have sometimes to pass through the shearer's hands. Sometimes God permits his children to be shorn of their good name, of their homes, of their property, till, like Job, they confess that as they have come naked into this world so they shall depart. It is in such a shearing-time that we may glorify our Lord by our meek endurance and patience. When the scold is left too long on a sheep, it spoils. It catches in every bush, and every briar tears off a shred. If it remains till the summer arrives, it becomes oppressive and harmful. Shearing is therefore not to be dreaded. If we become partakers of his holiness, our gains will outweigh our losses. F. B. M.

Large-heartedness a Christian Virtue

TUESDAY, December 21. Gen. 13:11. "Then Lot chose him all the plain of Jordan; and Lot journeyed east; and they separated themselves the one from the other." The characters of Lot and Abraham furnish in contrast suggestive thoughts for our hours of meditation. After the quarrel between the herdsmen of Abraham and Lot, Abraham generously gave his kinsman the first choice of country and Lot chose the well-watered lands of the plain, which for fertility was as "the garden of the Lord." He had a right to take the best land, but the acceptance of his right revealed Lot's character as a man of avarice rather than of generosity. From this time Lot fell behind the advancing success of Abraham, not because he was unjust, but because that justness which thinks only of self is always a source of stagnation, at least in the moral realm of a man's life.

Avarice, the coveting of the best for one's self without the accompanying impulse of generous outgo to others, has spelled failure for nations and for individuals. Personal monopoly, even though it does not transcend the law, is not the road to growth. Justice that never descends to fraud, but yet never rises into generosity of self-sacrificing love, may be good as far as it goes; but it is not the highest reach of the soul and it may easily lapse into avarice, which is the rust of the soul. It may be possible to give a man a square deal and still not show to him the spirit Abraham showed to Lot, the spirit of bigness and love that does not stop to measure its gifts.

George Matheson has pointed out that in the Epistle to the Hebrews the upper sanctuary is set apart for "the spirits of just men made perfect," which may also be rendered "the spirits of just men made generous." It is good to be just; it is even better to go on past justice to its excess, which is love. The Pharisees pointed to their legal righteousness, but Jesus condemned them for their lack of humanity; the former they were right in doing, but the latter would have given them a place in the kingdom of Christ, where there is a larger and a more spacious life than that of merely obeying rules.

Am I just but not generous? Does my daily life lean toward avarice or toward love? Am I like Lot, or like Abraham? C. S. C.

Fidelity in Christian Service

WEDNESDAY, December 22. John 17:1-13. "I have glorified thee on the earth; having accomplished the work which thou hast given me to do." Only the Lord himself could say this in perfect sincerity, and with no fear of his utterance being challenged; but we should consider these great words as giving us all our life-purpose. In these days, the world is full of mighty deeds. Are we acting as strongly, as bravely, as self-denyingly for Christ our Lord? These men are doing what their countries have asked of them; are we doing all that our Saviour has assigned and expects? Shall we, at the end of life, be able to say that the assigned work has been discovered and done, and the appointed errand accomplished?

But remember that the work sometimes means passively waiting, or suffering, or enduring the cross with its shame. To a large extent this was the work appointed for our Lord. "It takes all sorts to make a world." In war some are soldiers, some sailors, some airmen; but the doctors and nurses, the commissariat and intelligence departments, are quite as necessary; and so it is in the great warfare of the Church. All service is not active or conspicuous. The sappers and miners in the trenches are preparing the way to victory. "They also serve who only stand and wait." Every prayer is a deed. Every virtue that we possess tells in the great sum. "The song that nerves a nation's heart is in itself a deed." Let us find our work and carry it through to a noble finish, that at the close of life we may hear the "well-done" which is spoken to the faithful servant. F. B. M.

The Visions of the World of Faith

THURSDAY, December 23. II Kings 2:12. "My father, my father, the chariots of Israel and the horsemen thereof." Ruskin once said that the greatest thing any human being can do is to see something and then go and tell what he has seen in a plain way. The Bible is full of the visions of men, the tellings of what they have seen. Many of the Old Testament heroes and prophets received their chief right to instruct the people through the things they had revealed to them. Elisha was one of these.

Visions and clear views of God and his dealings with us are not for prophets alone. They are for us, and they often mark the way of our spiritual progress. We may not see chariots and horsemen; but we can see the things that belong to the world of faith, if our eyes are pure enough.

A man took his son to the city to be operated upon for a severe eye trouble. The physician and the city specialist said that the operation must be accomplished at once, or the boy would be blind. The father, who was a devoted believer in prayer, went to his room and in his extreme need laid the matter before his God. It was not long, he testified, before he seemed to see his boy playing about with perfect sight. The man rose from his knees and went to the office of the specialist and said, "We shall not need the operation." He took his boy home and that very day his complete recovery began. This was a modern spiritual vision in the realm of prayer. The writer can vouch for the veracity of the incident, for he was the boy.

These visions and assurances of the reality of God keep men alive. They restrain us when we would sin. Did not Paul say in a moment of need, "Have I not seen Jesus Christ?" Moses was never the same man after he saw God "face to face." The clear vision of divine purpose is needed not only in the great decisions of life, but also for the every-day task.

C. S. C.

Safe Traveling with Christ as Comrade

FRIDAY, December 24. II Tim. 1:11-18. "He is able to keep." "That good thing which was committed to thee, keep." There is a double deposit here. The same Greek word is used in each case. First, we make a deposit of ourselves to Christ. We entrust him with all we are and have. In this world, where so many pitfalls and snares lie in the path, and so many enemies lie in wait, it is a wise and comfortable policy to commit the keeping of our souls to the custodianship of our Lord; and the longer we trust him the more we become confident of his infinite trustworthiness. We come to know him whom we have trusted. It is as when a traveler leaves his hotel in the morning with an untried guide to make some difficult mountain-climb. The longer they travel together the more sure he becomes that he has not made a mistake in his selection. So the longer we travel under Christ's convoy, the happier we become, and the more confident.

But if we trust Christ, he also will trust us. As Ezra, by the river Ahava, entrusted to his followers the sacred vessels which had been restored to the Jews from the treasure-house of the Babylonian deities, so our Lord entrusts to us treasures of immeasurable value. And adapting the ancient words of the great statesman and leader we may hear Christ say, as he hands us the Scriptures, the Lord's Day, the Holy Supper, the doctrines of the Evangel: "Ye are holy unto the Lord, these vessels are holy also. Watch ye, and keep them, until ye weigh them at Jerusalem, in the chambers of the house of the Lord." F. B. M.

He Knoweth and Careth for His Own

SATURDAY, December 25. II Tim. 2:19. "The foundation of God standeth sure, having this seal, The Lord knoweth them that are his." The all-wise Architect of man's life, death and everlasting future never changes his plans or materials for the edifice. The original design will be carried forward; the foundation standeth sure and when the capstone is placed the universe will shout, "Victory unto him who loved us and who knoweth them that are his." Christ is the chief cornerstone and the prophets and apostles are in the foundation. All men are invited to build upon this rock foundation instead of the shifting sands of time. Wars, floods, famine, earthquakes and the burning of cities make no changes in the divine plan. When a million perish on the battlefields of Europe, or a hundred thousand in the floods of China, or in an entire city, like St. Pierre, licked up by a volcano, death is the same to each one as though only one person had passed on. Human destiny is not affected by numbers.

Death is not what Charles Frohman said it was, "a great or beautiful adventure." The Christian knows that death will usher him into the many-mansioned home. It is not an adventure, but a certainty. God's laws and government are the same forever, and his words of revelation are the only sufficient guide. E. W. C.

The Wonder City of the Euphrates

By MAYNARD OWEN WILLIAMS—Photographs by the Author

CONCLUDED

SOME of the restoration work accomplished by the archeologists at Carchemish is little short of marvelous. For those who like picture puzzles, excavation and restoration ought to be an interesting diversion. Mix ten puzzles together, throw in some extra pieces to add to the excitement, and then lose half of the entire mass, and you have a simplified parlor variety of restoration. Mr. C. Leonard Woolley, after years of work in Egypt and Nubia, does some restoration work that is wonderful to witness. Some of the restored statues are made up of two hundred fragments, which were found within a hundred yards or so of the main part, and after lying in the store-room until enough pieces are found, are put together in their original form. There are in the store-room now a score of statues in hundreds of pieces, waiting for enough more pieces to be discovered to enable a faithful restoration to be made. As the Romans and Greeks may have used these pieces to scare away jackals, or to "skip" on the waters of the Euphrates, there is a fair chance that some of these statues will never be perfectly restored until the Venus di Milo finds her arms, and the Victory of Samothrace her head. The fact that war has come at this time may not only stop the work of science, but bring about the destruction of this incomparable collection of Hittite relics as well.

As but a small portion of the "royal city" has been excavated so far, there is every possibility that Carchemish will prove to be to Hittite excavation what Knossos was to Cretan archeology—a treasurehouse of the best in the art and sculpture of the period. Warring empires will scarcely take the trouble to destroy ruins which have already survived twenty-five centuries of war, so long as those ruins lie beneath the ground.

With four more years' funds assured them, the excavators had every reason to congratulate themselves, not only on what they have discovered, but also on what they could reasonably expect those four years to produce. Carchemish had already gained a reputation as a new center of interest, and kodak-carrying, antique-buying, hotel-haunting tourists were already disturbing the excavators at their work. With the opening of the Bagdad Railway (which should have come in a year) Mesopotamia could rank with those other lands that have been reclaimed from Father Time by patient study and hard work.

THE excavation of the necropolis brought forth many interesting finds. Mr. Lawrence, in a letter to me, describes them in the following way:

"We dug out a cemetery of about two hundred tombs, with very wonderful beads, cylinder seals, scarabs, ivories, gold and silver work, bronze bowls, terra cottas, and painted pottery. We also dug out the only known pottery kiln of painted neolithic wares."

Although the tombs of the necropolis had been rifled at an early date, a great deal that is new was learned about the burial customs of the Hittites. Graceful vases, simple in design and undecorated, held the ashes of the cremated body, together with any trinkets the person was wearing at the time of death. A small vase, about a foot high, was enclosed in a footed vessel of cylindrical shape, which was beautifully decorated in patterns like those of Crete and Cyprus. Around the middle vessel were grouped various dishes containing burial gifts or oil, most of a safety pin, three thousand years old, that would still work. Some stone age pottery, with the very ancient emblem of thunder or of the weather god, was found in its original kiln.

ONE of the stone scarabs is of such exquisite design and finish that it seems to have been made of gun metal. There is not a flaw in it, and the seal, which shows a griffin, a lion, and a bull, is among the most perfect ever found. No one can tell what tools were used in doing such wonderful work. The excavator told me it could probably not be duplicated by any living lapidary. I was surprised by the statement that possibly several skilled slaves gave their whole lives to the making of the one scarab seal.

One of the earliest Hittite finds was the most interesting as well as the most promising. It is the so-called "Inscription of Tarkudimme." So perfect is this knob for the handle of a sword or dagger—which was made of silver, and inscribed with the figure of Tarkudimme and a bilingual inscription in cuneiform and Hittite characters—that for a long time it was considered spurious. After thirty years, it is still the most perfect and longest bilingual ever found, containing six Hittite characters, which have never been deciphered.

So far, over three hundred characters have come to light, so that even if the sign on the inscription of Tarkudimme could be determined, they might not give much advantage in solution. The earlier the inscriptions are the more perfectly they are carved. As time went on, the cursive form of writing was practiced, and later inscriptions even show the sign turned the wrong way, which leads one to think that simpler alphabetic system, possibly the Aramaic, was taking the place of the older pictographic hieroglyph. There have been found two possible clues to the language since the dagger handle was discovered. One is a brief bilingual poorly preserved. The other is a trilingual in cuneiform, Egyptian and Hittite, but only one cuneiform character is found upon it, and the Hittite characters are badly damaged.

HITTITE inscriptions have been found at Babylon and at Nineveh, so that it is quite possible that a useful bilingual—a sort of Hittite Rosetta stone—may be found at any time. Apropos of this reasoning, it is interesting to note that in Jerusalem today the fifth chapter of St. John can be seen translated into sixty-five different languages and posted up at the entrance to the Pool of Bethesda. In America, only patent medicine firms print bilinguals. In Syria, today as in the past, a man must know several languages if he is to understand and be understood. Hence there is every reason for bilinguals, and this condition has probably always existed in this bridge land between Europe, Asia, and Africa.

Continued on page 1285

Excavators Uncovering the Hittite Finds in the Mound of Carchemish

them plain, but some of beautiful shape and as thin as modern china, though unglazed. It can well be seen that these two vessels would protect the ashes from dampness from below; but as both were open at the top, there was a large cover, like an enormous bowl, inverted over the other two vessels.

An interesting feature of the burials was that, in the case of children, little pottery toys were buried with them—grotesque little figures of rough clay, evidently the dolls of three to five thousand years ago. For the boys there were horses, with funny little riders astride the front shoulders, and their legs merging into the bodies of their spirited mounts. For the girls there were figures of women, whose heads were well finished, with the regulation eyes, ears and nose, but whose bodies became less and less distinctive toward the bottom, till at the feet they were mere cylinders.

That the Hittites were in constant communication with other nations is shown by the fact that Egyptian scarabs and amulets, Phoenician pottery, and Greek terra cotta figures are found in the tombs of different periods. Bronze daggers and jewelry are fairly common, and Woolley proudly showed me

Excellent Specimens of the Figure Work. Also Longest Hieroglyphic Inscription Found

A Group That Pictures Some Mythologic Tale of This Ancient People

Rhoda's Wedding Present

By IDA ALEXANDER

WHENEVER things were at their worst—as they quite often were in the Norwood family—some one was certain to remark, cheerfully, "Oh, well, never mind! Perhaps Uncle John'll send something. I shouldn't wonder a bit!"

Uncle John was the one really wealthy relative on either side, a bachelor, reported to be eccentric. As Roland remarked, there was no telling what he would do. And the comforting thought of what he could, and might, always helped them over hard places.

It carried them through the season when the twins had scarlet fever. It was a hard enough time, too. They were under quarantine, and there was never an abundance of money. But the thought of Uncle John just about to give largess, as it were, lent a dashing rainbow to their clouded sky. In due time the twins recovered, and the old routine went on as if there never had been a break. There were, as Roland said, "a raft of bills." But, as he hastened to add, "We'll get them paid somehow." And so they did.

Half a dozen times more, in the memory of the youngest Norwoods, Uncle John was put forth, a bolster for their slipping faith. Not that they ever appealed to him; they never did; and not that he came without appeal; he had never done so. In one fashion or another, the Norwoods always managed to help themselves. But the hand ever about to help them seemed just the thing the happy-go-lucky family needed.

Roland worked his way through college, feeling that mighty hand about ready to assist him when difficulties mounted up. Sickness, poverty, various ills, the old man's name had been called upon to cure. Now it was to be conjured up for a pleasant happening.

For Rhoda was engaged to be married—to a poor man, too—that is, in money, in youth, strength, hope, faith and goodness he was opulent indeed. But he hadn't much money. They sighed a little the first time that thought was voiced. The pleasant smile of the mother fell on the little group immediately.

"No," she echoed, "no, Will hasn't much money. But—neither have we! We've always been short of it—and happy! Haven't we, children?"

The Norwood who had failed to join in the enthusiastic cry of assent that answered her would have been a changing indeed.

"I think Rhoda'll be just as happy," went on the mother, "as if they had a lot of money. And perhaps more so."

"But wouldn't you," began Betsy, looking up with serious, questioning eyes from the long piece of hemming, "like them to start in with a home of their own, mother? Just so they wouldn't be bothered with rent?"

The mother considered a moment before she replied. Rent time had arrived with unflinching regularity, through good times and bad. But

"No, I don't think I'd want Will and Rhoda to wait until they had a home of their own," she decided, finally. "If they had it now, I'd be glad enough. But I wouldn't deprive them of the happy, pleasant years they'll have winning it together."

She paused and gazed reflectively out of the window. What she saw deepened the smile that seldom left her pleasant face for any length of time.

"Still," Betsy confided to the twins after their mother left the room, "I'd like it better if they were going to a home of their own."

"Well," cried the twins in one breath, "maybe Uncle John'll send us something!"

"No," said Betsy. "He doesn't even know about it."

"How do you know he doesn't know?"

"I heard mother and father talking it over. And they decided not to mention it—said it looked too much like hinting."

"O-h-h!" comprehended the twins at once.

"And so," said Betsy, "you see there's no hope from Uncle John."

No hope from Uncle John! The twins worried that thought under their breath. It was enough to take the courage of any Norwood away. Their faces took on one of the gloom of the despondent Betsy.

"That's why I spoke of the home," Betsy went on.

"I thought maybe mother'd change her mind and write to him, or let Rhoda. Uncle John could give them a little home—just as easy!"

"Just as easy!" echoed the twins. "Betsy, why don't you write to him?"

"Mother might not like it."

"But if he gave Rhoda a home," argued the twins, "she'd like that."

It is a simple matter to persuade any one to follow his own inclination. The scruples of Betsy were silenced and the letter written.

The time between its writing and the reply was a nervous one to the three conspirators. They often talked over what fruit their venture might bring forth.

"Maybe it'll be diamonds!" rejoiced the twins. "Heirlooms!"

Their news brought forth as much surprise as they had hoped—joy, too.

"Money's a great blessing, wisely used," said the father.

The mother read the letter slowly and carefully. When she had finished, she looked up and dashed their hopes, to a certain extent.

"Cousin Martha doesn't say positively that ten thousand dollars is to be sent to Rhoda," she said. "She merely says that he gave that much to Etta when she was married, and that she thinks he'll send a like sum to Rhoda."

"Feel certain he'll send that much to dear Rhoda," corrected Mr. Norwood, scanning the letter.

"Well, 'certain' is pretty sure," said Betsy.

"How did you come to think of writing to Uncle John?" queried the mother. "Father and I had not intended to tell him until after the wedding. But, of course, you didn't know."

"I did know," said Betsy, and forthwith confessed and was forgiven.

When Rhoda came home, there was further and greater rejoicing, and the glad news was telephoned at once to Will.

"I can hardly wait for Will to come tonight," said the mother. "Poor boy! it will be a weight off of his shoulders. Ten thousand dollars is a good start for a young couple."

The father smiled. "About nine thousand nine hundred more than we had, mother," he said.

"And we managed all right," she answered. "I pray they'll be as happy as we've been."

That night they held a family conference, with the new member of the family added, and only one away—Roland, who was practicing law in an adjoining county. But the news had been sent to him.

"It's a little fortune," said Will. "Perhaps the heiress will want to call off the engagement!"

"Then she wouldn't get the money!" cried Betsy, at which they all laughed.

"But it is a whole lot of money," Will went on. "Think of how long it would take me to save that. Why, it would take me almost ten years to earn it, at my present pay!"

"Yes, it's a nice little sum," said the father. "How do you children intend to use it?"

"That's for Rhoda to say," answered Will, when she did not speak.

Rhoda gazed off into distance and it was some time before she replied.

"I met Myrtle King today, and told her about it. I suppose I shouldn't have done it—it just slipped out."

A little silence greeted her words. Myrtle King, with her fashionable apparel and aspirations, had never been a favorite in the little house, though she had called occasionally, and "set them all by their ears," as Roland said.

"And what did Miss King advise?" asked the father, dryly.

A glance—an amused glance of understanding flashed from face to face. Rhoda caught it. Seldom was she precluded from such things. Her face flushed and she spoke petulantly.

"She said she'd buy the old Crocker place and entertain and have some good times."

Again a disapproving silence fell, like a period to her words.

Betsy spoke first.

"You couldn't entertain much on a hundred dollars a month!" she said, bluntly.

"The house is only six thousand dollars—a great bargain. She says it cost over twelve. But when—"

"When the Crockers took to squabbling," finished the father, "when Alton Crocker found he had no home life, he decided to let the old home go, too. I don't know that I blame him. But—it's a pity."

"It's a pity I'll profit by," reasoned Rhoda. "Myrtle says I'm a fool, if I don't. And, putting two thousand by, that leaves two thousand dollars for the entertaining that all of you think so foolish."

"Nobody said so, my dear," said the father. "And indeed we would be wrong to say one word. The money is your own. You must do as you think best."

But the tone was not cordial.

"Well, I'd like to have some good times and give parties and everything," went on Rhoda, "even if

(Continued on page 128)

If I could take you far away, dear;
Across the milk-white desert sands,
Where earth and sky seem nearer, closer,
Than they can seem in other lands,
If we could mount some lazy camel,
With rolling gait and steady feet,
God's solitudes would hold us, fold us,
And life would seem at last complete.

If we could wander far away, dear;
Where desert breezes whisper low,
Where every path breathes trackless magic,
That one may guess and never know,
If we could greet the fearless sunrise,
That meets the brave who wander free;
The desert would caress us, bless us,
God's solitudes, and you - and me!

"I hope it'll be a check," said Betsy; "a nice big check."

At last a letter arrived, stamped from Uncle John's home town. But it was not in his cramped, old-fashioned hand. They looked at it wide-eyed, and something like fear settled on their faces.

"Suppose—suppose Uncle John should be dead!" Betsy gasped.

She seized the letter and tore it open. They devoured it with their eyes. Then they flew up to the house together, Betsy waving the letter like a flag of victory.

Their mother and father looked up, mildly surprised, from their letters, as the girls rushed in.

"Mother! Father!" they cried together. "Rhoda's going to get ten thousand dollars from Uncle John for a wedding present! Ten thousand dollars! Think of that!"

The President's Message

[The Christian Herald surrenders the space in this issue, usually occupied by the Editorial Forum, to the President's Message.]

AT the opening of the Sixty-fourth Congress on Tuesday, December 7, for the second day of the session, President Wilson read his message on preparedness to a joint session of both bodies in the Hall of the House of Representatives. The message which is one of the most memorable in the country's history, opens with a reference to the wide extent of "the war of nations on the other side of the sea," which has altered the whole face of international affairs, "and now presents a prospect of reorganization and reconstruction such as statesmen and peoples have never been called upon to attempt before." Neutrality, the message explains, was our manifest duty. We had no part or interest in the policies that precipitated the conflict, and if a universal catastrophe was to be avoided it was necessary that the area of destructive war should be limited, "and that some part of the great family of nations should keep the processes of peace alive, if only to prevent collective economic ruin and the breakdown throughout the world of the industries by which its populations are fed and sustained." In this neutrality the states of America have become conscious of a new and more vital community of interest and moral partnership in affairs, and also more clearly conscious of the many common sympathies and interests and duties which bind them stand together.

Regarding the present attitude of the United States towards the American republics south of us, the message has a significant paragraph:

"There was a time in the early days of our own great nation and of the republics fighting their way to independence in Central and South America when the government of the United States looked upon itself as in some sort the guardian of the republics to the south of her as against any encroachments or efforts at political control from the other side of the water; felt it its duty to play the part even without invitation from them. . . . But it was always difficult to maintain such a role without offense to the pride of the peoples whose freedom of action we sought to protect, and without provoking serious misconceptions of our motives, and every thoughtful man of affairs must welcome the altered circumstances of the new day in whose light we now stand, when there is no claim of guardianship or thought of wards, but, instead, a full and honorable association as of partners between ourselves and our neighbors, in the interest of all America, north and south. Our concern for the independence and prosperity of the states of Central and South America is not altered. We retain unabated the spirit that has inspired us throughout the whole life of our government and which was so frankly put into words by President Monroe. We still mean always to make a common cause of national independence and of political liberty in America. But that purpose is now better understood so far as it concerns ourselves. It is known not to be a selfish purpose. . . . All the governments of America stand, so far as we are concerned, upon a footing of genuine equality and unquestioned independence."

After a reference to the recent meeting in Washington of the representatives of the western republics, the message passes to the great question of national defense, which the President says, "lies at the very front of my whole thought as I address you today." Continuing (the italics are ours), he says:

"No one who really comprehends the spirit of the great people for whom we are appointed to speak can fail to perceive that their passion is for peace: their genius best displayed in the practice of the arts of peace. Great democracies are not belligerent. They do not seek or desire war. Their thought is of individual liberty and of the free labor that supports life and the uncensored thought that quickens it. Conquest and dominion are not in our reckoning, or agreeable to our principles. But just because we demand unmolested development and the undisturbed government of our own lives upon our own principles of right and liberty, we resent, from whatever quarter it may come, the aggression we ourselves will not practice. We insist upon security in prosecuting our self-chosen lines of national development. We do more than that. We demand it also for others. We do not confine our enthusiasm for individual liberty and free national development to the incidents and movements of affairs which affect only ourselves. We feel it wherever there is a people that tries to walk in these difficult paths of independence and right."

"Out of such thoughts grow all our policies. We regard war merely as a means of asserting the rights of a people against aggression. And we are as ready to defend our rights as to defend power within our own nation as of aggression from without. We will not maintain a standing army, except for uses which are as necessary in times of peace as in times of war, and we shall always see to it that our military power establishment is no larger than is actually and continuously needed for the uses of days in which no enemies move against us. But we do believe in a body of free citizens ready and gathered to take care of themselves and of the governments which they have set up to serve them. In our constitutions themselves we have commanded that 'the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed' and our confidence has been that our safety at times of danger would lie in the rising of the nation to take care of itself, as the farmers rose at Lexington."

"But war has never been a mere matter of men and guns. It is a thing of disciplined might. If our citizens are ever to fight effectively upon a sudden summons, they must know how modern fighting is done, and what to do when the summons comes to render themselves immediately available and immediately effective. And the government must be their servant in this matter, must supply them with the training they need to take care of themselves and of it. The military arm of their government, which they will not allow to direct them, they may properly use to serve them and make their independence secure,—and not their own independence merely but the rights also of those with whom they have made common cause, should they also be put in jeopardy. They must be fitted to play the great role in the world, and particularly in this hemisphere, for which they are qualified by principle and by chastened ambition to play."

"It is with these ideals in mind that the plans of the Department of War for more adequate national defense were conceived, which will be laid before you, and which I urge you to sanction and put into effect as soon as they can be properly scrutinized and discussed. They seem to me the essential first steps, and they seem to me for the present sufficient."

"They contemplate an increase of the standing force of the regular army from its present strength of five thousand and twenty-three officers and one hundred and two thousand nine hundred and eighty-five enlisted men of all services to a strength of seven thousand one hundred and thirty-six officers and one hundred and thirty-four thousand seven hundred and seven enlisted men, or 141,843, all told, all services, rank and file, by the addition of fifty-two companies of coast artillery, fifteen companies of engineers, ten regiments of infantry, four regiments of field artillery, and four aero squadrons, besides seven hundred and fifty officers required for a great variety of extra service, especially the all important duty of training the citizen force of which I shall presently speak, seven hundred and ninety-two non-commissioned officers for service in drill, recruiting and the like, and the necessary quota of enlisted men for the Quartermaster Corps, the Hospital Corps, the Ordnance Department, and similar auxiliary services. . . .

"By way of making the country ready to assert some part of its real power promptly and upon a larger scale, should occasion arise, the plan also contemplates supplementing the army by a force of four hundred thousand disciplined citizens, raised in increments of one hundred and thirty-three thousand a year throughout a period of three years. This it is proposed to do by a process of enlistment under which the serviceable men of the country would be asked to bind themselves to serve with the colors for purposes of training for short periods throughout three years, and to come to the colors at call at any time throughout an additional furlough period of three years. This force of four hundred thousand men would be provided with personal accoutrements as fast as enlisted and their equipment for the field made ready to be supplied at any time. They would be assembled for training at stated intervals at convenient places in association with suitable units of the regular army. Their period of annual training would not necessarily exceed two months in the year. . . . I, for one, do not doubt the patriotic devotion either of our young men or of those who give them employment,—those for whose benefit and protection they would in fact enlist. I would look forward to the success of such an experiment with entire confidence."

"At least so much by way of preparation for defense seems to me to be absolutely imperative now. We cannot do less."

The message then refers to the program of the Secretary of the Navy which the President submits simultaneously. Concerning it the President says:

"It seems to me very clear that it will be to the advantage of the country for Congress to adopt a comprehensive plan for putting the navy upon a final footing of strength and efficiency and to press that plan to completion within the next five years. . . . The program we lay before you contemplates the construction within five years of 10 battleships, 6 battle cruisers, 10 scout cruisers, 50 destroyers, 15 fleet submarines, 85 coast submarines, 4 gunboats, 1 hospital ship, 2 ammunition ships, 2 fuel oil ships, and 1 repair ship. It is proposed that of this number we shall the first year provide for the construction of 2 battle ships, 2 battle cruisers, 3 scout cruisers, 15 destroyers, 5 fleet submarines, 25 coast submarines, 2 gunboats, and 1 hospital ship; the second year, 2 battleships, 1 scout cruiser, 10 destroyers, 4 fleet submarines, 15 coast submarines, 1 gunboat, and 1 fuel oil ship; the third year, 2 battle ships, 1 battle cruiser, 2 scout cruisers, 5 destroyers, 2 fleet submarines and 15 coast submarines; the fourth year, 2 battle ships, 2 battle cruisers, 2 scout cruisers, 10 destroyers, 2 fleet submarines, 15 coast submarines, 1 ammunition ship, and 1 fuel oil ship; and the fifth year, 2 battle ships, 1 battle cruiser, 2 scout cruisers, 10 destroyers, 2 fleet submarines, 15 coast submarines, 1 gunboat, 1 ammunition ship, and 1 repair ship. The Secretary of the Navy is asking also for the immediate addition to the personnel of the navy of seven thousand five hundred sailors, twenty-five hundred apprentice seamen, and fifteen hundred marines."

ON this subject the President adds, "If this full program should be carried out we should have built or building in 1921, according to the estimates . . . an effective navy consisting of 27 battleships of the first line, 6 battle cruisers, 25 battle ships of the second line, 10 armored cruisers, 13 scout cruisers, 5 first-class cruisers, 3 second-class cruisers, 10 third-class cruisers, 108 destroyers, 18 fleet submarines, 157 coast submarines, 6 monitors, 20 gunboats, 4 supply ships, 15 fuel ships, 3 tenders to torpedo vessels, 4 transports, 8 vessels of special types and 2 ammunition ships. This would be a navy fitted to our needs and worthy of our traditions."

The message then urges the necessity for the development of a great merchant marine. "It is high time we repaired our mistake and resumed our commercial independence on the sea." We must now use the ships of other nations, as we have not enough ships of our own to handle our own commerce. We are not likely to be permitted to use even the ships of other nations in rivalry of their own trade, and are without means to extend our commerce even where the doors are wide open and our goods desired. Such a situation is not to be endured. We must be our own carrier on the seas. We can develop no true or effective American policy without ships of our own—not ships of war, but ships of peace, carrying goods and carrying much more; creating friendships and rendering indispensable services to all interests on this side of the water." Proposals will be made to Congress for the purchase or construction of ships to be owned and directed by the government.

THE President explains that plans for army and navy increase will involve expenditures that will considerably extend the estimated revenues of the government. The additional revenues required for the fiscal year of 1917 are estimated at $93,800,000. The obvious moral of the situation he considers, "that it is a plain counsel of prudence to continue a of the present taxes or their equivalents, and confine ourselves to the problem of providing $112,000,000 of new revenue, rather than $297,000,000"—which would represent the financial deficit in the event of the emergency revenue act and the present duty of sugar being discontinued. The President believes that instead of issuing bonds for the new revenue, we should "pay as we go" and raise by internal taxation, the greater part or even the whole from the income tax. This could be accomplished by "somewhat lowering the present limits of exemption and the figure at which the surtax shall begin to be imposed, and by increasing, step by step, throughout the present graduation the surtax itself." Additional sources of revenue are suggested, including a 1c per gallon tax on naphth and gasoline, a tax of 50c per horse-power on automobiles and internal explosion engines, a stamp tax on bank checks, a tax of 25c per ton on pig iron and tax of 50c per ton on fabricated iron and steel.

Reverting to the question of national defense and preparedness the message says:

"I have had in my mind no thought of any immediate particular danger arising out of our relations with other nations. We are at peace with all the nations of the world, and there is reason to hope that no question in controversy between this and other Governments will lead to any serious breach of amicable relations, grave as some differences of attitude and policy have been and may yet turn out to be. I am sorry to say that the gravest threats against our national peace and safety have been uttered within our own borders. There are citizens of the United States, I blush to admit, born under other flags, but welcomed under our generous naturalization laws to the full freedom and opportunity of America, who have poured the poison of disloyalty into the very arteries of our national life who have sought to bring the authority and good name of our Government into contempt, to destroy our industries wherever they thought it effective for their vindictive purposes to strike at them, and to debase our politics to the uses of foreign intrigue. Their number is not great as compared with the whole number of those sturdy hosts by which our nation has been enriched in recent generations out of virile foreign stocks; but it is great enough to have brought deep disgrace upon us, and to have made it necessary that we should promptly make use of processes of law by which we may be purged of their corrupt distempers. America never witnessed anything like this before. . . . But the ugly and incredible thing has actually come about and we are without adequate federal laws to deal with it. I urge you to enact such laws at the earliest possible moment and feel that in doing so I am urging you to do nothing less than save the honor and self-respect of the nation."

Continuing, the President refers to another phase of this subject, and says:

"There are some men among us, and many resident abroad who, though born and bred in the United States and calling themselves Americans, have so forgotten themselves and their honor as citizens as to put their passionate sympathy with one or the other side in the great European conflict above their regard for the peace and dignity of the United States. They also preach and practice disloyalty. No laws, I suppose, can reach corruptions of the mind and heart; but I should not speak of others without also speaking of these and expressing the even deeper humiliation and scorn which every self-possessed and thoughtfully patriotic American must feel, when he thinks of them and of the discredit they are daily bringing upon us."

A prime necessity at present, the President considers to be the mobilization of our economic resources. In view of the important changes that may be expected in the near future, "when peace has returned to the world and the nations of Europe once more take up their task of commerce and industry," the President asks the privilege of addressing Congress later in the session, when he will discuss the new problems as they arise. Meanwhile, he suggests that the transportation problem should be given serious and immediate consideration, and that a commission of inquiry should be appointed to canvass the whole question, as it is one which "lies at the very foundation of national efficiency."

The closing paragraph of the message sounds a note, not of aggressiveness, but of peace.

"For what we are seeking now, what in my mind is the single thought of this message, is national efficiency and security. We serve a great nation. We should serve it in the spirit of its peculiar genius. It is the genius of common men for self-government, industry, justice, liberty and peace. We should see to it that it lacks no instrument, no facility or vigor of law, to make it sufficient to play its part with energy, safety, and assured success. In this we are no partisans but heralds and prophets of a new age."

The Bible and Newspaper

CONDUCTED BY
FERDINAND C. IGLEHART, D.D.

Plant Grows Like Cross

IN the public library in Marquette, Mich., there is a plant which is growing in the shape of a cross. Three years ago Peter Dolf, the stodian, had a clover patch. Out of sprang the stalk of a strange plant which grew upright until this last summer, when two shoots branched out at the top at right angles with the stalk and formed a cross. A number of amateur botanists from the Northern Normal School examined the plant, but nobody seems to know what it is. Mr. Dolf does not remember planting anything but clover seed in his plot. All plants reflect the beauty of God's nature. The flowers are the exquisite specimens of his handiwork, and expressions of his love. "He himself in Christ is the Rose of Sharon, and the Lily of the valley." He is one of whom the prophet Isaiah spoke: "I will raise up for them a plant of renown, and their lives, like the plant in the library, should grow after the similitude of the cross, the symbol of Christ's sacrificial love, and we should share this spirit of the apostle: 'God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of the Lord Jesus Christ, by whom the world is crucified unto me, and I unto the world.'" (Gal. 6: 14.)

Noted Explorer Dead

SIR ALLEN WILLIAM YOUNG, one of the last survivors of the Franklin March Expedition, died in London recently at the ripe age of fourscore years. He entered the merchant marine in 1846, commanded three poopships in the Crimean war, rendered important service to the British crown, and received many honors and decorations from his own and foreign governments. The service for which he will be long remembered is that of an avigating officer of the good ship Fox in the historic search for the records of Sir John Franklin, who had perished in an Arctic expedition. On May 19, 1845, Sir John Franklin started on England to penetrate the Bering Strait from Lancaster Sound. On the west side of King William's Land the ships were beset, and Franklin died in 1847. The survivors abandoned the ship and all perished. At the dead end of the Franklin expedition the whole world became alarmed, and many search expeditions were sent out. One of these under Collinson and McClure sailed from Plymouth to Bering Strait in 1850. Fastened in the ice on its eastern drifts this expedition had to be rescued by Sir Edward Belcher the following season. After waiting and grieving for ten years, Lady Franklin sent the Fox to make a last effort to find traces of her husband. Sure enough in their search from 1857 to 1859 they found many relics among the eskimos of Boothia, and in a cairn in North Victory found the record which told the story of the lost explorers. Sir Allen William Young was the navigating officer of the Fox on this voyage. In 1879-80 one of the United States search expeditions under Lieutenant Schwatka found evidence that Franklin had really completed the discovery of the Northwest Passage. The veteran seaman and Arctic navigator was of the same age when he died as Moses when he spoke to Pharaoh: "And Moses was fourscore years old, and Aaron fourscore and three years old, when they spake unto Pharaoh." (Ex. 7: 7.)

Fraudulent Wolf-Scalp Bounties

IT is reported that the state of Wisconsin has been swindled out of $500,000 in the past few years in giving bounties to hunters for wolf scalps never taken. Two former presidents of villages were fined recently, one $240 and the other $120, for issuing false certificates to men who had not killed any wolves. The investigation revealed the fact that they themselves got five dollars of the bounty for every bogus scalp. There were wolves in Palestine that, like those in Wisconsin, killed and ate when he heard cries. The waves were twenty feet high and he could see nothing, but steered his boat in the direction of the sound of the cries. It took Captain Bush a good while to get near enough to throw the men a line. It was his anchor line. A terrible wave snapped it and swung the Elk so that a monster roller took it broadside and capsized it. All the men could swim, and they made their way to the boat. Another wave struck the craft and sent it to the bottom. Meanwhile Captain Bush came to the place where the boat went down and found the men had been thrown like corks far apart. The waves laughed at the fine swimmers and sent them one after another to the bottom. Two had on life-preservers, and the captain saved them. They told 000 gallons of water a day, and which cost about a million and a quarter dollars. The building is a low concrete structure 750 feet long on the banks of the Mississippi River. It has extensive settling basins around it, with a number of buildings which house the apparatus for receiving the yellow fluid and washing it clear of the mud, bacteria, color, and salts that injure it. When the water enters the two big tunnels from the intake towers it is thick with silt, and thickly inhabited by germs. Before the water passes through the sand and gravel filtration beds it is conducted into a large well and there lifted into settling chambers where the heavy mud and silt sink to the bottom. Then it is raced through four long pipes charged with lime, and sulphate of iron is added.

Sulphate of ammonia is used to take out the color, and then the stream is run through the sand and rock filters and comes out ready for use chemically pure and colorless.

Who can keep up with the wonders of modern science? Most people today would prefer to have their drinking-water drawn from Lake Tahoe in the Sierra Nevada Mountains, or from the Catskills, or from under the great lake far out from shore, than from muddy rivers into which so much sewage is allowed to flow, and yet science has so mastered the deadly microbes and provided against them that the waters from the rivers are rendered pure and healthful. There is a long distance between the custom of Bible times of coming to the village well with vessels for water and the water supply of a city like St. Louis. Water, so necessary to physical life, has ever been used as the symbol of God, so necessary to the life of the soul. Christ thus refers to himself as the fountain of spiritual life in his conversation with the woman of Samaria, who had come to the town well for water: "Whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst; but the water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water springing up into everlasting life." (John 4: 14.)

Million Dollars for Hospital

MRS. ISAAC L. RICE and her children will give $1,000,000 for the establishment of a hospital for convalescents in New York as a memorial to the late Mr. Rice. The hospital will be known as the Isaac L. Rice Hospital for Convalescents. While the new institution will have the services of Beth Israel Hospital's physicians and nurses, it will be an independent entity, receiving patients from other hospitals as well. They will round out here the cures begun in hospitals which can treat only acute cases. The object will be to restore patients to society not only on the road to health, but actually well and able to take up their work. Mrs. Rice is the founder of the Society for the Suppression of Unnecessary Noises. The Hebrews of New York are many of them rich and very liberal to their own race and to the public. The Jewish law required brotherly love, and the most generous care of the poor and suffering. "If ye fulfil the royal law according to the Scripture, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself, ye do well." (James 2: 8.)

Mother Attends School with Her Infant

BECAUSE she had no place to leave her baby when she attended night school, the school authorities of Cincinnati granted Mrs. George Ceka a special permit to take her six-months-old baby to school with her. Among the five thousand night students in Cincinnati, and perhaps in the nation, she is probably the only mother who attends public school with her baby nestled by her side while she studies her lessons. The baby is a good little boy and gives no one any trouble. Mrs. Ceka is a widow, and had to have a better knowledge of English to fit her for her work, and had no one with whom to leave the child. This is a beautiful example of a determined search for truth. Mrs. Ceka realizes the importance of the statement that "wisdom is better than rubies, and all things that may be desired are not to be compared to her." (Prov. 8:11.)

the sheep. The faithless ones charged with guarding the sheep from the wolves, and the words of the Great Shepherd about them, typify the betrayal of trust of the officers of the law in Wisconsin, whose business it was to protect the sheep from the wolves, but who let the wolves take the sheep, and sold their honor for a wicked bribe. "But he that is an hireling and not the shepherd, whose own the sheep are not, seeth the wolf coming, and leaveth the sheep, and fleeth; and the wolf catcheth them, and scattereth the sheep. The hireling fleeth, because he is an hireling, and careth not for the sheep." (John 10: 12, 13.)

Angry Storm Drowns Five

SEVEN men went out of Jamaica Bay, New York, into the big ocean in the nineteen-foot dory Elk on a fishing trip the other day. The wind blew fiercely, and there was an angry sea. The electric engine stopped; they threw out the anchor and the rope broke; the men took off their coats and shirts and held them up on the ends of the oars as flags of distress and the wind blew them away. Captain Emil Bush of Broad Channel, Long Island, in his thirty-three-foot dory Tillie B. was racing for the shore of Rockaway Point him of the superb heroism of George Hoffman. He was the finest swimmer of them all. Entirely forgetful of self he got to and held up for a long time two men whose strength had given out. At last all three went down. Hoffman arose and swam to one of the men having on a life-preserver and held to him a little time, but his fingers were numb with the cold, and his strength was spent in trying to save his comrades, and the hero who gave his life for others was flung away down and out into immortality. It was the two who had on life-preservers who were saved. In the angry sea of life there is a life-preserver for the soul which never fails. It is faith in the Lord Jesus. Christ himself thus declares its efficiency: "For God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting life." (John 3: 16.)

Muddy Water Purified

THAT the great city of St. Louis should take the yellow muddy waters of the Mississippi River as a supply for its people would seem incredible, and yet it is a fact. The other day the new city water works were dedicated which are to furnish 160,000,-

Fifty Years of the Thirteenth Amendment

N EITHER slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist in the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction." Thus reads Section One of the Thirteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, adopted December 18, 1865, fifty years ago this coming Saturday. Fifty years! In the forward march of a race fifty years is scarce half a league onward, yet for the Negro in the Union this short span of years has brought a measure of progress never before meted out to any race in many times fifty years. The Thirteenth Amendment wrote into the fundamental law the liberty which had come to the Negro, as a war measure, on January 1, 1863, in the Emancipation Proclamation. The amendment guaranteed to him for all time civil liberty, but that alone. The Negro was still a bondman, bound to his drudgery by the heavy chains of ignorance and self-depreciation, which had been burned into his inmost consciousness by more than two hundred years of slavery. The shackles that had bound him steadily while they restrained him. Robbed of his shackles the Negro was even more a problem than he had been when enslaved. In 1863 a missionary of the Northern Baptist Convention, who was sent to investigate the needs of the freedmen, declared: "I found them helpless, hopeless, friendless. Not a teacher to instruct them, even in the lowest branches of learning. Difficult indeed is the problem."

During the days of slavery it had been a felony in slave states to teach a black man to read or to figure. The black man had, however, gained something from his long night of injustice. He had learned to do the work of the plantation; he had mastered many of the common trades; he had learned to speak the language of his master, and learning to speak a language is a long stride in the direction of learning its structure; and he had learned something, much more than he could then appreciate or put into practice, of the white man's culture and civilization. When the disability of slavery was removed he had a foundation upon which to build a structure of self-respect and self-support and honorable citizenship. Many of the old masters had been kind men, many had been otherwise; all of them needed the labor of the Negro even more after emancipation than they had needed it before, for the four years of civil war had shattered the whole fabric of Southern institutions. The Negro turned, therefore, from unrequited labor to labor for a consideration, albeit the remuneration was at first extremely meager; but there was no need for any large migration of the Negro people from the regions in which the end of the war found them. There was, however, a great need for education and for wise direction of the Negro. In 1863, and the situation was not greatly changed in 1865, Negroes in the United States owned 9,000 homes, operated 15,000 farms, conducted 2,000 businesses and had accumulated property to the value of $20,000. Only five per cent. were literate, and there were but four colleges admitting Negroes. For many years prior to the Civil War, the Society of Friends had been very active in affording educational opportunities to Negroes in the North; and much of the literacy of 1865 may be placed to their credit.

Classroom in Tuskegee, the Leading Negro College

Oberlin College, also, early opened its doors to the black man.

THE years immediately following the war were bitter years for both races in the South. The carpet-bagger and the state governments he engineered, with plastic, flattered, unlearned Negroes as his tools, showed to both whites and blacks the hopelessness of Negro ignorance. The Negro learned that it took something more than politics, a frock coat and a stove pipe hat to make a legislator or even a citizen; and a great hunger for education grew out of the knowledge of the limitations of ignorance, which the Negro acquired in those attempts at government in which he took such a sorry part. The reascendancy of the whites and the so-called "Black Laws" made necessary the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments to the Constitution, which finally conferred upon the Negro all the fundamental rights of white men and made race discriminations illegal.

The white men of the North were the first to appreciate the necessity for Negro education. There was, at first, considerable opposition to it among the Southern white people, who feared the power of the educated Negro, and for many years the public schools for Negroes were hopelessly inadequate and inferior throughout the South, a condition that has been rapidly remedied as the South has gained in prosperity and the good results of Negro education have become apparent. The first Northern schools for Southern Negroes were under the direction of the American Missionary Association of the Congregational Church, which began its work with a day school at Fortress Monroe in 1861. The American Baptist Home Missionary Society began its work for the Negro immediately after the close of the war. The Freedmen's Aid Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church was organized in 1866 and began its work at once. The Freedmen's Aid Society of the Presbyterian Church, the Free-Will Baptists, the Episcopalians and the Friends were also early on the field. In 1865 Congress created the Freedmen's Bureau, which in five years established 4,239 schools; employed 9,307 teachers, instructed 247,333 pupils and expended for education $3,521,936. The denominational societies in the field cooperated with the Bureau and expended in the same time $1,572,287, and the Negroes themselves raised $785,700 for their own education. The Freedmen's Bureau was discontinued in 1870 and the churches then continued the work. The Bureau assisted in establishing thirteen colleges and universities, which are now among the leaders in the work of fitting the Negro for citizenship.

In 1865 there were about 4,500,000 Negroes in the United States, in 1910 there were nearly 10,000,000, and there are probably more than 10,000,000

now. In 1865 five per cent. could read and write, in 1915 more than seventy per cent. are classed literate. Today Negroes own 559,000 homes, operate 937,000 farms, 220,000 owning their farms, and conduct 40,000 businesses. The total property Negroes is estimated at $700,000,000. Instead of four colleges the Negro now finds a welcome 500, and there are in the public schools 1,750,000 Negro students, taught by 35,000 teachers. The school property of these 500 colleges worth more than $20,000,000 and the annual expenditures for the conduct of the schools total $13,600,000, of which the Negroes raise $1,500,000. These schools have trained men to be lawyers, teachers, doctors and ministers and their graduates have made good in all these professions, serving largely their own race but not being confined to their own race. Exceptional ability has gained for many of the men equal recognition from both races. The schools have provided leaders for the Negro in the only way that safe leadership could have been provided; by developing the natural leadership of his race. Leadership, to be effective, must come from within a people; cannot be grafted on from outside. Leadership was essential, and in supplying the right kind of leadership these Christian colleges in the South have gone far toward the solution of the race problem; but the education of some hundreds of leaders, if it had been the only work of the schools, would have left the problem scarcely touched. The rank and file also need instruction suited to their needs. In Brazil the problem of race distinctions has been, is being, solved by the process of indiscriminate mixing, by which in time all distinctions will have been leveled. This process is probably impossible in the United States; the laws of most of our states forbid the marriage of white and blacks, and we must arrange our mutual affairs so that the two races can live side by side, and be of mutual service to each other without friction. This can come about only through Christian education and mutual understanding of the necessities of the case.

IT was early recognized, by those responsible for the education of the Negro, that an education which would fit him to associate with the whites on equal terms was an education which would only disappoint him and which would leave him unfitted for anything. The main effort, therefore, was put upon the development of schools that should give to the Negro an education that would fit him for the occupation and manner of living which he could expect to follow. This meant vocational training. The Negro, even when ignorant, was able to succeed after a fashion as a farmer. The schools enable the Negro to learn how to farm scientifically, how to be self-supporting and independent. In 1910 there were 2,893,677 Negro farmers, which includes farm owners, renters and employees. There is a wide opportunity for Negro artisans of all trades and the schools teach carpentry, bricklaying, ironworking, bridge-building and allied trades. The Negro is a natural mechanic

The Automobile May Yet Displace This Method of Going to Church

The New Generation Is Learning to Tackle Real Problems of Industry

a good artisan, and has shown some inventive skill. In 1910 there were 704,174 Negroes in manufacturing and mechanical pursuits. Due to the training gained in slavery, the Negro is a most excellent servant, and the schools teach the girls household science and domestic service. In 1910 there were 1,099,715 in domestic and personal service, a decrease of about 225,000 since 1900. This decrease is significant as showing the trend of the race toward employment of a higher grade. The Negro is intensely religious, and the schools guide and stabilize his religious impulses and teach him to make his religion a real vital force in his life. Careful statistics kept by the various colleges show that less than five per cent. of their graduates fail in morals after graduation. Some of the schools have not had to record a single moral failure, and none of them have exceeded the five per cent., a remarkable record when it is considered that the whole tenor of slavery was toward the utter destruction of all moral standards among the slaves. Some of the moral stability of the Negro college folk may be due to the difficulties which a large number of them have to overcome to secure an education. The great majority have to work their way through; and those who finally win the coveted parchment have already shown a sticking power that leaves little doubt as to their future dependability. There are now about 50,000 Negro young men and women attending the schools supported by the churches.

In 1863 there were 550 Negro churches, with 550,000 communicants, and church property to the value of about $1,000,000. In 1913 there were 40,000 churches with 4,300,000 communicants and 2,200,000 pupils in the Sunday schools and with church property valued at $70,000,000. These churches are largely self-supporting and in addition are raising more than $200,000 for home mission work and more than $100,000 for foreign mission work each year. The foreign mission work of the Negro churches is all in Liberia, Sierra Leone and among the tribes of the west coast of Africa. The preaching of Negro pastors of the early days of freedom was marked by more fervor than learning. As the Negro has advanced in learning his ministers have kept just a little ahead of him, and there are now among the Negro clergy more than 2,000 graduates of seminaries who have won their degrees. The Negro churches are revival churches. It is their custom to conduct protracted meetings for a month or two each winter, and their preaching is with power and conviction. If any white Christians feel the lack of a realistic hell in the offerings of their own ministers, they have but to go to a Negro revival to see it portrayed in all its lurid and terrifying details, against which are contrasted the love and saving grace of the Christ who died for black and white alike. The Negro churches have produced some notable preachers, men who take rank alongside of the most famous ministers of the white race.

The Negro has given the world masters in music and in literature. The poetry of Paul Lawrence Dunbar and the weird and unforgettable harmonies of Coleridge Taylor will live as long as our civilization persists. The Negro plantation melodies are as yet the only truly American contribution to the music of the world.

FIFTY years ago the Negro was ignorant, without leaders and with little property. Today the Negro owns $700,000,000 worth of real and personal property, is succeeding in every branch of merchandising, in banking, in the field of insurance and in all the professions, and has gained self-respect and the respect of his fellow man. In Nashville, Tenn., there is an insurance company with a capital of $100,000, owned and conducted successfully by Negroes. The one-room cabin with its dirt floor and no privacy has yielded to the haven of education and culture. First the room was divided by curtains, then another room was added; and now, on thousands of farms and in hundreds of towns, neat homes shelter happy families and contribute to a growing culture that even now compares favorably with the standards of culture of those whites whom we call "the middle class." The Negro is proving himself capable of managing his own affairs and his own organizations and his own government. Throughout the black belt of the South there are many villages and small towns which are solidly black and in which the black man conducts all the business, including the business of government. They are, as a rule, orderly towns. The irresponsible darkey of yesterday who didn't care whose chicken he had is giving place to the purposeful young Negro of today who means to win a place for himself and to fit himself to fill it. The Negro asks of the whites nothing more than a fair chance to prove his case, and an honest recognition of his merits when the case is proven. A leading Negro minister, who had recently made an extended trip through the South, told the writer that he noticed a marked change in twenty-five years in the worship of the Negroes and in the conduct of their children; their worship was less emotional and more dignified, and their children were becomingly dressed, polite and ambitious; there was a new element of restraint in their family life, the element which we are wont to call "good breeding."

Marvelous as has been the progress of these fifty years, the work of solving the Negro problem is not finished. There is still the illiterate thirty per cent., and the literacy of many of the seventy per cent. is little more than the learning of the first primer. The Negro is not yet freed from all injustice; he does not yet, everywhere, have an equal chance with his white brother. He is still the victim of oppressive laws, of unequal taxation, of inadequate schools and of a subtle feeling of antagonism. He complains little, he works hard, and he strives manfully for the far goal of complete independence and full citizenship for which he seeks to fit himself. One by one he surmounts each limitation of law and circumstances; step by step he mounts toward heights seen dimly from afar. Who shall say what will be the record of the next fifty years? LOUIS E. ORCUTT.

Opening the Doors to the Bread Line

THE two events of Thanksgiving and the Anniversary of the birth of the Mission came so closely together that it was decided this year to combine them in one celebration. The results justified this decision, for seldom has a more eventful day passed than Thanksgiving day of 1915.

It commenced as usual at 1 A. M. by the opening of the Bread Line, and while the crowd was, happily, not so large as in former years, there were several hundreds of homeless men who availed themselves of this old established benefaction, and came in from wandering up and down the streets to partake of the hot rolls and coffee.

The next item on the program was the distribution of dinner baskets to poor families, and the auditorium was filled at an early hour by an eager crowd of women and children. The distribution was undertaken by the bright, cheerful converts of the Mission.

In the evening the annual dinner was given to 1,200 men in the Mission breakfast room, and while this was being done, the Thanksgiving anniversary meeting was being held in the main auditorium. Mrs. Klopsch and her laughter and several friends were on the platform and in the body of the hall. It was a real enthusiastic, family Thanksgiving time.

Reports were handed in from the various departments. Mr. Balevre, representing the Brotherhood, reported 26,086 names now on the Brotherhood Roll, and made one most interesting statement: that over 80 per cent. of the members had been able to secure positions from the Labor Bureau. Mr. Baker spoke for the Free Labor Bureau and the Winners' Club, and reported that since the inception of the Bureau 28,101 jobs have been secured for men; from January 1 to November 24 of this year, 2,633 jobs. As to the Winners' Club, a family of some thirty men living in the Mission, he spoke in glowing terms of the spirit of unity that exists here, and the beneficial effect the associations of the Mission had upon the lives of its members. Mr. J. Fred Tooper, manager of the Labor Settlement at Tuckahoe, gave an interesting report of the work being done there, stating that twenty-six men were living under his roof at the present time, and that they had raised enough vegetables on the one and one-half acres of ground attached to the Settlement to last them throughout the year. From May 1 to the present time, 409 jobs had been filled from the Settlement. Mr. James T. Hunt, business manager of the Mission, gave a most interesting account of the Sarah J. Bird Memorial Farm and the operations that had been carried on there during the past ten months. This farm has already been described in the Christian Herald, and every day that hear, from the following letter, the splendid results that had followed in his life. Considerable emotion was evoked by the reading of the letter in the meeting.

"Hotel LaSalle, Chicago, November 22, 1915

"To my dear loyal friends, Dr. Hallimond, Mr. Hunt, Mr. Baker, and every member of the Brotherhood of the Bowery Mission:

"Though a thousand miles from New miserable, wretched, sinful drunkard. It's a long story of sin and transgression against the laws of God and man—transgressions that brought me down, down and over to Blackwell's Island to serve a ten months' sentence in the penitentiary. Tonight, I cannot fully realize—at times it does not seem real—that God, through the redeeming blood of his Son, could lift a hopeless drunkard that was down so low, up so high.

"I cannot thank God enough. On July 20 of this year I left the prison at Blackwell's Island pardoned by President Wilson—a pardon I hardly deserved. Today I am editor and publisher of a magazine that is fast gaining popularity throughout the country, all to the glory of God. I was a failure. It's the power of God in my life that is responsible for the success. I left New York the 4th of September to accept a responsible position in one of the largest publishing houses in the country, but God instead raised up friends here in the West to finance for me this publication: but not for the Hicks that was, but for the power of God in the life of the Hicks that is—to God and to God only all the glory.

"I am so thankful that God has put in the lives of the workers of the Bowery Mission a desire to follow the command of the Master, 'Love one another as I have loved you,' and I am thankful that God is anxious to do for every hopeless, helpless man attending the anniversary and Thanksgiving services as much or more than he has done for me, if they will only accept that loving invitation and promise, 'Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest.'

"ROBERT E. HICKS."

Bad weather can make bad men; hence the Bread Line passes proves what a splendid boon it is to the Mission to have such an adjunct.

One of the events of the evening was a letter received from Mr. Robert E. Hicks, a man who, because of the influences of the Mission meetings, in June last confessed to a crime against the Federal authorities, and went back to the penitentiary to serve an unexpired sentence. President Wilson heard of the circumstances and granted him a pardon. The friends who were interested in his case were delighted to York. I want a part in your anniversary and Thanksgiving services.

"Alone in my room in this wonderful hotel of luxury, my mind goes back to the day less than three years ago when I accepted our Master's promise, 'Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest.' Oh, such a wonderful promise, and so graciously fulfilled!

"Just about three years ago tonight I slept on sacks of waste paper at 160 William Street, New York—homeless, friendless, penniless—without hope, a

THE greater portion of the time of the meeting was taken up by the testimonies of over fifty men. They were of the usual stirring type—men who had reached the very lowest depths of degradation, reached and helped by the hands and hearts of love they found in the Mission, now on their feet again and rejoicing in a life of freedom from the dominion of sin and filled with the sunshine of divine favor.

Rev. E. Tennyson Smith of London was present, and at the close of the meeting delivered a most forcible and eloquent address.

Jehovah's Gracious Promises to Israel

International Sunday School Lesson for December 26. (Review.) Read Hosea 14

Eight Lessons from Eight Lives

By Amos R. Wells

OUR quarter's lessons have dealt with eight striking personalities, each noted for a different quality. Seven of them were noble men and one was ignoble. Each of them teaches us much.

Elijah stands for heroic strength. When we know of such a strong man, we no longer doubt that strength is possible for ourselves. To be sure, he led a life of hardship, but, as Madame Swetchine wrote, "Strength alone knows conflict. Weakness is below even defeat, and is born vanquished." In his life, as well as conspicuously in his departure from earth, Elijah verified Isaiah's prophecy, "They shall mount up with wings as eagles." That means, said Andrew Murray, "believers are to live where God lives; they need God's strength to rise there. To them that wait on him it shall be given."

Elisha stands to us for faith. At Elijah's ascent into heaven he had a glimpse of the unseen world which he never forgot. Thenceforth the mountains around him were full of horsemen and chariots of fire. "When I was a boy," said Moody, "in the spring of the year, when the snow had melted away on the New England hills where I lived, I used to take a certain kind of glass and hold it up to the warm rays of the sun. These would strike on it and I would set the woods on fire. Faith is the glass that brings the fire of God out of heaven." Both Elijah and Elisha had that faith, and we may be men of God's fire as well as they.

The lesson of Joash is that of worship. Others might neglect the house of God, but to him it was the very gate of heaven. It is said that when Henry IV asked the Duke of Alva if he observed the eclipses of the year, the Duke replied that he had so much business on earth that he had no leisure even to look up to heaven. The really busy men, the men whose lives really count on earth, look oftenest to heaven, and are found oftenest in the gate of heaven.

Daniel's word is purity. He would not defile his body with evil food nor his soul with idolatry. Sir Thomas Lipton, the famous merchant and yachtsman, once gave some advice "to the young men who are filled with aspirations toward success: Always beware of strong drink. Remember, corkscrews have sunk more people than cork jackets will ever save." If we have Daniel's purity we shall have Daniel's power.

From Jonah we learn obedience. It is said that travelers in the Alps come to have a peculiar feeling for their guide, a feeling of companionship, fellowship, and friendship combined. They say that this feeling is born of obedience to the guide's commands, so that the guide always seems to them different from other men. This is the feeling that will grow in our hearts toward God as we allow him to guide our way. Jonah was a long time in learning it, but he received the truth at last.

AMOS teaches us courage. When he was on God's errand he had no fear. He was like Robert Moffat, the great pioneer missionary in South Africa, whom an angry chief once ordered to leave Bechuanaland. Twelve attendants, at the chief's command, threatened him with lifted spears. Moffat threw open his coat. "My heart is with you," he said. "I do not leave. If you will, drive your spears to my heart." The astonished men so admired Moffat's courage that they allowed him to stay, and ceased their persecutions. Thus it is with all who, like Amos, have the true missionary spirit.

We learn from Uziah, by contrast, a lesson in humility. "Self-conceit," says Dr. Jowett, "is like some noisy little river craft puffing across its tiny waters. Self-esteem is like some mighty liner moving majestically across the great deep." Amos had confidence, but

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By REV. F. B. MEYER, D.D.

"The Lord is full of compassion and gracious, slow to anger, and plenteous in mercy." Ps. 103:8.

God's mercy wells up from an inexhaustible fountain. It is like the hot springs of Iceland, which defy the winter's grip. It is not God's will that the fathomless depths of his love should yield only a trickling stream to water a scanty patch of the desert within. Nay, he pours floods on the dry ground. Our sins may be, and are, as countless as the leaves of the forest that scatter to the ground in the damp autumn morning, but when once we turn to God for mercy, they are abundantly pardoned. Sins against light and knowledge, the repeated sins of his children, sins of presumptuous pride and sins of passion and suddenness, sins that we overtake and by which we are overtaken, sins of thought and speech and act—when we take with us words and return to the Lord, the place that knew them knows them no more for ever. In Jesus we have redemption through his blood, the forgiveness of sins according to the riches of his grace, in which he abounds toward us. We are not only forgiven, but restored to our old seat in the family, and crowned with the old love. We are accepted in the Beloved. We stand before God clothed in his righteousness. We are fair in the comeliness which he puts on us.

Uzziah had pride; the difference was just that between glorious success and tragic failure.

Hosea's teaching is the greatest of all, that of God's forgiving love. Henry Van Dyke tells us that "There are many kinds of love, as many kinds of light,

And every kind of love makes a glory in the night.
There is love that stirs the heart, and love that gives it rest,
But the love that leads life upward is the noblest and the best."

This is the forgiving love of God, which Hosea pictures to us in his immortal allegory (or was it a true story?) of the terribly tried but wonderfully forgiving husband. But no analogy can equal the wrongs we do to God, and no human love can equal the depth of the divine mercy and the divine affection.

Names and Deeds

By Arthur H. Howland

AS we put down the names of this quarter's Old Testament characters, one name stands out from all the rest. Yet you might read the list of names all through and not see it. It is not the name of Elijah, nor Elisha, nor Joash, nor Daniel, nor Jonah, nor Amos, nor Uziah, nor Hosea. It is the name of God. You will say that God's name appears in only one lesson title. No, it appears in every lesson title but two. In one name it appears twice. Elijah, "My God is Jehovah." Elisha, "God is Saviour." Joash, "Jehovah supports." Daniel, "God is Judge." Uziah, "Jehovah is strong" (this king's other name is Azariah, "Jehovah is Keeper"). Hosea, according to some scholars, "Jehovah is Help"; according to others, merely "Salvation." You see it is the "El" and the "Jo" or "Jah" or "Iah" that mean God.

God is Saviour, Judge, Keeper; God is strong; God is help; God supports. So our quarter-yearly lesson is the lesson of God.

See what God did for the Jews and for the world through the men whose lives we have been studying for these three months. The period studied covered from two to four hundred years; but the deeds done and the words uttered under the inspiration of Jehovah will live forever.

One of the miracles of the ages is the thoroughness with which the Jews have been cured of idolatry. For centuries it seemed that their tendency to idolatry was incurable; again and again they slipped back into it after apparent effort to put it away. But they have been thoroughly and permanently cured. They know that Jehovah is the only true God. And when we begin to trace that cure back to its beginnings, we see that splendid, rough figure of Elijah—he whose name was "Jehovah is God." Ahab thought he was troubling Israel. Instead he was trying to get Israel out of its trouble. And though the northern kingdom itself fell into decay, the influence of Elijah worked into the life of the southern kingdom of Judah and lived on through and after the captivity.

But in our day we face another form of idolatry, not the worship of images, nor imaginary deities, but the worship of great, wrong, false, vicious principles. The struggle in Elijah's day was between God and Baal. That struggle was won for God. The struggle in our day, as in the day of Jesus, is between God and Mammon. The power of money to bow and bend the heart of mankind is measureless. A world overrun with war; our own country not only helping the devastations of Europe, but guilty of neglect and injustice that make us face this Christmas season again with the knowledge that hundreds of thousands in our rich land are suffering cruel and needless want. All because those who ought to be worshiping Elijah's God are worshiping Mammon instead.

Something more must be said about Mammon before the lesson closes, but to go on: Elisha, "God is Saviour." Elisha is the man with keen eyesight, the man who could see God, the man who would let God save him in time of danger. "This God is our God." No matter what our tasks or our difficulties are, God is sufficient.

Joash—the young king who carried on in the Southern Kingdom the work Elijah began in the north. Don't think you are too young to do something to help people away from the worship of Mammon and lead them to the worship of God. You can live the unselfish life; you can be square and straight and just. Your eye and your hand and your tongue can be a protest against the selfishness and greed that threaten our age.

Daniel—another young man who believed in God and was brave. "God is Judge." He let God decide his problems for him and followed God even when that seemed dangerous.

Uzziah—the one distressing story of this list. The man who took God's help at first, then thought he could help himself, and so went down.

Amos, the fearless prophet, who felt the power of this newer god Mammon and warned the people to turn from his worship. Remember that to worship Mammon means to hurt somebody else. These luxurious Israelites whom Amos chided had won their wealth by injustice; others were deprived of what they needed in order that the rich might have what they did not need. Amos would have a busy time if he lived today. We have been thinking that God is not in the name of Amos. He is not there in letters, but he is there in thought, for Amos means "Burden-bearer."

Hosea—Salvation—coming back to God—finding out that God is love.

Two more names. Jonah—it is hard to get a lesson out of his name, for it means "Dove." Perhaps he was sent like Noah's dove to find a place where the seed of God's Word might find soil and grow. He had a stormy time, but delivered his message at last, and God had a chance to bless even a heathen city.

SO here are the men with whose lives we have been getting familiar. Is our life to be linked with theirs, even in humble, unknown ways, in helping people to be good and kind and to find immortal life? If it is, we must get God identified with our lives as he was with theirs. What they did was to help the world understand God and to see how reasonable, how delightful, his service is. He blessed their lives. They offered his blessing to their nation. He is the hero of the story we have been reading.

And one new name creeps into our lesson titles. Last Sunday we studied the Christmas lesson. The incident of the Saviour's birth does not belong to these Old Testament studies. But the Christ Spirit was in these men whom God was blessing. He began the new era in which the movement for brotherhood was to take on world-wide proportions. The good prophets and kings of the old dispensation felt that only the Jewish ideas of God were true; some of them did not realize that all the world could share the blessing of knowing and loving the God they had found. Jesus caught their bright views of Israel's God—and announced that he is to bless every nation. He offers to lead all those who will set their lives against the world-god of Mammon, the spirit of self, and will try to bring in the reign of Love on earth. He will take our lives and make them count in that splendid crusade.

The How Column

Conducted by Frank L. Brown, Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

How to Secure the Scholars' Home Study

WE are continuing this week the plans used by teachers in many states to promote the scholars' home preparation of the lesson.

From an Iliou, N. Y., teacher of a class of ten boys, fourteen to seventeen years old, using Graded Lessons: "The boys meet in a suitable room at the church on Monday and prepare their lesson for the following Sunday." A Greensburg, Pa., teacher of a young ladies' class of fifteen active members: "Our school has a system of marking on recitations, using almost the same system as the public school." And three-fourths of this class are regularly prepared. The Uniform Lessons are used. From a Mayville, N. Y., teacher of an Adult class: "Sometimes I secure home cooperation by an inkling of next Sunday's lesson to catch their interest. Sometimes by a set of carefully prepared questions mimeographed. Sometimes by asking an amusing question in advance." From a Columbia, Ohio, teacher of a class of men: "I sometimes give out a mimeographed list of questions the Sunday previous, but usually send out a postal card during the week."

A teacher of a women's class in Brooklyn, N. Y.: "I designate one to give lesson story, several to give relation of home readings to lesson, and ask every member of the class to note applications to present-day living." A Bridgeport, Conn., teacher of a class of twenty girls averaging twenty-two years: "I simply ask different members, sometimes one or two only, to be prepared on certain questions."

A Tyrone, Pa., teacher of a mixed class of eighteen young people: "I often select questions on the next lesson to give to pupils to look up. Suggest reading of passages of Scripture." Sixty per cent. of this class prepare. A Brooklyn, N. Y., teacher of young ladies: "I have tried to have them read the home reading, but at this age find I'm not so successful as when they were younger; I often give them questions to look up; this is more of a success. When I give them questions about ninety per cent. prepare. Otherwise about forty per cent."

A teacher of a Chester, N. J., class of ten teen-age girls believes in the power of example: "I simply ask them to do the work and have it ready as I have done. I keep my work-book made up a week in advance." Four-fifths of this class prepare the lesson. From an Atchison, Kan., teacher of a class of 125 young ladies: "I give out questions, references, map study, blackboard work." A Middletown, Conn., teacher of a young ladies' class: "I try to excite their curiosity as to what is coming, give little hints as to the interest of the characters." Sometimes have a heart-to-heart talk about the comparative value of feeding body, mind and soul. Make them feel it is for their own welfare they work." Another Chester, N. J., teacher of a mixed class: "In addition to written assignments, I often give special topics to various members, or special portions for their study, for which the class holds them responsible. They all prepare well the special portion when assigned."

Shall These Have No Christmas?

AMERICA'S heart is being newly harrowed by tales of suffering from Poland. Accounts which have reached this country in these last days of fall, tell of hundreds of thousands of refugees staring into the face of winter, homeless and hopeless. Starvation and exposure are slaying women and children by the multitudes. The shocking condition in which war has left this people is moving the hearts of Christian people to the same great outburst of material sympathy as that which sent millions of American dollars into Belgium and northern France in the earlier period of the war. As generous remittances as have been possible have previously been sent to the relief of Polish refugees from the Christian Herald Fund for the Relief of Widows and Orphans of the War, and from the unappropriated balance in hand one thousand dollars has just been forwarded through the American Polish Relief Committee, Madame Marcella Sembrich, president, and we hope to make a much larger remittance in the near future.

There is no such thing as competition in need. The many and pressing claims for help which are heard on every side in our own country are not to be neglected in order to lessen the misery in other lands. Fortunately a great many of our readers and their friends are able to remember the needy in all lands, and there are still others who do not have present charities near at hand, and to all these and all others who feel that they can remember the poor beyond our borders at this Christmas season, we make a plea in behalf of the widows and orphans in Poland who have been robbed of all save life itself.

But more than this we ask and urge: do not stop at one gift, but plan to give as you are able regularly throughout the winter. You may not feel able to give all you would wish at once, but by weekly remittances of even a little you can accomplish a great deal of good. Let us hear from all who can help, at once.

BELOW we give a message from other sections of Europe in which portions of the fund are being distributed. These letters give some indication of what your gifts mean to all these people whose Christmas this year knows nothing but the uttermost sorrow.

Bulgaria's Gratitude

MANY readers of this paper will recall the visit of a bright-faced, eloquent little Bulgarian woman to the United States a year ago. Mrs. Zoritsa D. Furnajieff, the lady in question, is back again in Sofia, busied with her spiritual and benevolent work. She is one of the founders of the Com-

Back to the Home Site to Start Life Anew passion Orphanage at Sofia, which grew out of the last relief work in Bulgaria, toward which the readers of the Christian Herald gave generous aid.

Mrs. Furnajieff writes:

This afternoon I found out that I have an opportunity to send a few letters to America, may be for the first time for months to come. I long to send the Christian Herald this message from us, that your kindness and Christian sympathy in the cause of suffering humanity all over the world is the best of proof that there is yet truth and light on the earth and that light comes only from Him who bore on the cross the sins of the world.

We are deeply grateful for all the helpfulness you have expressed toward Bulgaria. The gladdened hearts, the quieted sighs, the wiped-off tears, the thanksgiving prayers that have been raised up in consequence of your help—the very orphanages that are sheltering the little orphans—all these are your true reward here and hereafter.

Plead before the mercy-seat for peace on the continent of Europe, and pray for the "little ones" who have been sheltered by the love and kindness of your readers. They need now, they will need for the future, that same love that planted the orphanages to help keep for them, and a provision depot where we give out rations for over five hundred families. We are living in tents, six of us. We are three days' ox-cart trip away from the railroad in an almost inaccessible part of the mountains. The people are so exhausted by the war and epidemics, they are in a pathetic condition. There is a great lack of administrative capability. I know you will be pleased with the work when you hear what has been done. We want more money if you can send it. I feel very greatly the responsibility you laid on me and am so anxious to please you all with results.

The camp here is at Dobrun in Bosnia. The name of the camp is "The Christian Herald Camp." The tents are lent to me by Sir Ralph Paget. We are fed by the army, and some of our medical supplies have been given by my own personal friends. It is all essentially American. With the rest of the money we plan to do the same thing in Monastir, if we have enough. The mails are impossible. You cannot get a letter from one place to the other here with any hope of its safe arrival. The orphanage scheme we must give up as part of our work. God grant the poor kiddies don't die. I am taking care of over two hundred myself. I rode up into several Serbian villages to see the starvation reported. It is there, all right. Most of the people are living on three meals a week and those only bread. I have a number of photos but must have them developed in the United States as there are no chemicals to be had here.

It is strange to do without so much and miss it so little. There is so much to do for these fine, brave people. They are well worth while in spite of a corrupt government.

Yours very sincerely,

(Signed) SYRIL EDEN.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS of additional contributions to the Christian Herald Fund for the Relief of Widows and Orphans of the War in Europe appear below. Up to the time of going to press the total of this fund amounted to $174,601.72, and these gifts are being administered with the utmost possible expedition and care. Please address your contributions to the Widows and Orphans Fund, Christian Herald, Bible House, New York.

New Acknowledgments

Miscellaneous Amounts

Geo. P. Hunter, $10.00; "Friends," Holley, N. Y., $4.00; W. C. Dickson, $10.00; John Sterry, $50.15; Mrs. Caroline Jones & Miss Amelia Kautz, $4.00; Friends, Savanna-la-Mar, Jamaica, B. W. I., $7.18; Mr. & Mrs. O. S. Yoder, $8.00; Mrs. J. Becker, $12.80; Cora A. Tonzalin, $3.50; Mrs. R. J. Byers, $13.50; Mrs. G. W. Eustice, $35.00; "Box 1," $3.50; Mrs. Ada Pilker, $75.00; Miss Maude A. Smith, $8.00; Mrs. Wm. Bird, $1.43;

Continued on page 1284

Amarilly of Clothes-Line Alley

CHAPTER XXI

"I DON'T see," observed Colette, on learning of the existence and development of the syndicate, "why the Boarder is in on it. I thought he was going to have a Lily Rose garden all his own."

"We thought so too," replied Amarilly. "He's been saving up to get married, and he's got a raise now, so the day is set for some time in June; but he told us the night we were first planning to buy the house that he wanted to be one of the syndicate. You see Lily Rose works—I mean she overworks—in a factory, and so the Boarder—you know he is awful gentle-like to her—says that she mustn't keep house or do anything but real light work after this. He has an interest in the house now, and he is going to build on a sort of an annex with a sitting-room and a bedroom and furnish it up fine, and when they are married, they are going to live there and take their meals with us. And they want Mr. St. John to marry them, and they want you to come. And Mr. Derry is coming. He asked to be invited."

For once Colette did not laugh at the chronicles of the Jenkins family. A very tender look came into her flashing eyes.

"That is very sweet in him—in the Boarder—to feel that way and to be so tender with Lily Rose. She ought to be very happy with a love and protection like that awaiting her."

"Yes," assented Amarilly; "it must be very nice to feel like that, and Mr. Derry says he really believes that it is only with poor folks like us and the Boarder and Lily Rose that love runs smooth."

"Then," said Colette musingly, "I wish I were poor like you and the Boarder and Lily Rose!"

Amarilly secretly divined that this was merely a thought spoken aloud, so she made no comment. She had pondered a great deal over the attitude of her two friends toward each other. The only place she ever encountered them together was at church and to her observing eyes it was quite apparent that there was a restraint in their bearing. Amarilly remained so preoccupied with her thoughts that Colette, looking at her searchingly, became curious as to the cause.

"Amarilly," she commanded, "tell me what you were thinking of just now—I mean since I spoke last. I shall know by your eyes if you don't tell me exactly."

"Mr. Derry says my eyes will always give me away," evaded Amarilly.

"Of course they will. You can never be a flirt, Amarilly."

"I don't want to," she replied indignantly.

Colette laughed.

"Well, tell me what you were thinking about?"

"I was wondering if Mr. St. John wasn't trying any more to find that thing you lost in the surplice pocket."

"Oh, Amarilly," has Mr. Phillips censored that word, too? I was in hopes he would never hear you say 'surplus,' so he could not correct you."

"I told him you didn't want me to speak correctly," said Amarilly a little resentfully.

"You did!" cried Colette, looking rather abashed. "And what did he say?"

"He said it was selfish in you to think more of your amusement than of my improvement."

Colette colored and was silent a moment.

"He's right, Amarilly," she said impulsively. "I am selfish to everyone. All I have ever cared for is to be entertained and made to laugh. I have been as selfish to St. John as I have to you and I'll tell you a secret, Amarilly, because I know that I can trust you. I've gone just a little bit too far with St. John. I told him he needn't ever come to see me again until he found what was in the pocket of the surplice, and he took me at my word."

"He did all he could to find it," said Amarilly, immediately on the defense for the rector.

"I know he did, but you see before this I've always had everything I've asked for, even impossible things, and I didn't want to have him fail me. I have been selfish and exacting with him, and I think he realizes it now."

"Well, when you're in the wrong, all you've got to do is to say so."

"That isn't easy, Amarilly."

By BELLE K. MANIATES

Copyright, 1915, by Little, Brown & Co. All rights reserved.

"But it's right."

"Oh, Amarilly, you're like a man with your right and your wrong!"

"But you would make yourself happy, too, if you told him you knew it wasn't up to him any more to find that."

"I'd rather be unhappy and stick to what I said. I must have my own way, Amarilly."

"Well," said Amarilly, abandoning an apparently hopeless subject, "I came to ask you to do me—us—the Boarder and Lily Rose, I mean, a favor."

"What is it, Amarilly?"

"Why, as I said, they want Mr. St. John to marry them, and they're afraid he won't want to because he—well—because he isn't their kind, you know, and he has such a fashionable church."

"And you don't know St. John better than that?"

"Why, yes; of course I do, but they don't know him at all, you know. And the Boarder is real shy, anyhow. And so I told him I'd ask you to ask him."

"Why don't you ask him?"

"I think it would please him so to have you ask. He likes to have you take interest in others."

"Amarilly, you are a regular little Sherlock! Well, yes, I will," promised Colette, secretly glad of this opportunity for friendly converse with John once more, "but if the Annex has to be built first, there's no hurry."

"Yes, there is. The Boarder wants everything settled now, so they can be looking forward to it."

The Extra
Thin Watch

$17.50
to $100.00

Look for the Watch with the Purple Ribbon

This Purple Ribbon Makes You Doubly Certain of the Quality of Your Christmas Gift.

The unerring time-telling qualities of this watch, its slender, shapely symmetry, its perfect and elegant finish, will arouse your pride every time you consult it. And you can get a "Chesterfield" for as little as $17.50

THE South Bend
Chesterfield

A Christmas Gift that will give a real thrill of pride and show true friendship. All movements and cases fully guaranteed.

See Your Jeweler — he has or can get South Bend Watches.

Send for 68-Page Catalog. It is printed in color, showing all the "Chesterfield" series, and also the Studebaker, Buick and Granger, the famous Dandy models and many others.

South Bend Watch Co.
212 Studebaker St.
South Bend, Ind.

FROZEN IN ICE KEEPS PERFECT TIME

REVERSIBLE
"Linene"
COLLARS

TRADE MARK

Send 2 Cents
in U. S. Stamps to pay postage and we will send you free a starch finished

SAMPLE COLLAR

State size and which style wanted

REVERSIBLE COLLAR CO., Dept. T, Boston, Mass.

Snug Comfort for Tired Feet

Parker's Arctic Socks

Reg. in U. S. Pat. Off.

Warm, healthful, for bed-chamber, bath, sickroom. Easier than stiff-soled slippers. Worn in rubber boots absorb perspiration. Made of knitted fabric lined with soft white wool fleece. Washable, unshrinkable. Parker's name in every pair. In all sizes at dealers or sent postpaid for 25c a pair.

J. H. PARKER CO., DEPT. C, 25 JAMES ST., MALDEN, MASS.

Children's Christmas Delight

Their healthful, happy pastime can best be made bright with a Pony Buggy. Surely every child longs for

A Beautiful Pony Buggy

Parents write for Colored Booklet No. 55, telling of Pony Vehicles and Harness, also list of Pony Buggy

HOME PONY VEHICLE CO. CINCINNATI, O.

INVENTORS Do Not Sacrifice Your Inventions

Get full money value. RELIABLE Book Free. Write R. S. & A. B. Lacey, 610 Barrister Bldg., Washington, D. C.

"Very well, Amarilly. I'll see him tomorrow night. Will that do?"

"Oh, yes; thank you, Miss King."

"Tell me more about the wedding plans. Are you to be bridesmaid?"

"She isn't going to have one. It won't be a stylish wedding, you know. Just quiet—like one of our neighborhood evenings. Only when I told Mr. Derry about it, he said he should come up that afternoon and trim the house up with greens, and that he should come to see them married."

"And I shall furnish the flowers and the bride's bouquet. Let me see, I think lilies of the valley and pink roses would suit Lily Rose, don't you?"

"They will be beautiful," said Amarilly, beaming. "And we are going to have a real swell meal. I have learned to make salads and ices, and then we'll have coffee and sandwiches and bride's cake besides."

"Some one has to give the bride away, you know, Amarilly, in Episcopal weddings."

"I know it. But poor Lily Rose has no one that belongs to her. Her relations are all dead. That's another reason why the Boarder is so nice to her. So ma is going to give her away. We're going to ask the neighbors and you and Mr. Derry and Mr. Cotter, of course. He's the brakeman friend of the Boarder."

"And are the Boarder and Lily Rose going away?"

"Yes; the Boarder can get a pass to Niagara Falls. They are going to stay there a week. Lily Rose has never been on the cars. And they are going to ride to the train in a hack."

"Why, it's going to be quite an affair," said Colette enthusiastically. "We'll throw an old shoe and some rice after them. And will she be married in white?"

Amarilly's face fell.

"I am afraid she can't afford a wedding dress. She's got to get a traveling suit and hat and gloves and shoes, and with other things it will take all she has saved. She'd like a white dress and a veil and get her picture taken in it to hang up by the side of the Boarder's in the surplice. And that makes me think, we want you to ask Mr. St. John if he will wear our surplice instead of bringing one of his. We'll do it up nice before the wedding."

"Oh, that prophetic surplice!" groaned Colette. "It's yesterday, today and forever; I wish something would happen to it, Amarilly. I hate that surplice!"

"I'm sorry, Miss King, but we all love it. And you see it means a good deal to Lily Rose, because she has looked at its photograph so long."

"Very well, Amarilly. I yield. St. John shall wear his surplice once more, and when he does—"

A sudden thought illumined her face.

"I believe I will tell him—"

Amarilly deemed it a fitting time to depart, and she hastened to assure Lily Rose that it was "all right."

"Miss King will speak to Mr. St. John about marrying you, and she will ask him to wear our surplice. She's going to send you flowers—lilies of the valley and roses. It all would be perfect, Lily Rose, if only you had a white dress!"

Lily Rose smiled sweetly, and told Amarilly she was glad to be married in any dress, and that she should not miss the "reg'ler weddin' fixin'" nearly as much as Amarilly would mind her not having them. When Amarilly set her head and heart on anything, however, it was sure to be accomplished. It was a puzzling problem to equip Lily Rose in the conventional bridal white vestments, for the bride-to-be was very proud and independent and wouldn't hearken to Amarilly's pleas to be allowed to contribute toward a new dress.

"We're under obligations to him, you know," argued Amarilly, "and I'd like to help him by helping you."

Lily Rose was strong of will despite her sweet smile.

Deep down in her heart Amarilly, throughout all her scheming, knew there was a way, but she chose to ignore it until the insistent small voice spoke louder and louder. With a sigh of renunciation she yielded to the inevitable and again sought Lily Rose.

"I've thought out a way to the white dress," she announced.

Lily Rose's eyes sparkled for a moment, and their light died out.

"Yes, there's really a way," persisted Amarilly, answering the unspoken denial. "You said you could squeeze out slippers and stockings, didn't you?"

"Yes," she admitted.

"Well, there's your new white dress skirt, and for a waist there is my lovely lace waist that I told you about—the one Miss King gave me."

"Your weddin' waist! No, Amarilly. It's like you to offer, but I couldn't take it from you."

"No, I'm not giving it to you. Just lending it to you for your wedding. You couldn't hurt it any wearing it two hours. Then I'll lay it by again till I'm married. And I'll like wearing it all the more because you wore it to your wedding. Come over some day and we'll try it on. Then Miss King is going to give you the bouquet, and for a veil—"

"Oh, the veil! Amarilly, I would love a veil!" Lily Rose cried wistfully.

"Well, I've got one spoken for. You see, Mrs. Jimmels has been married so many different ways, I felt sure she must have worn a veil at one of her weddings, and seeing she had been married so many times, I thought she couldn't have any special feeling about any one of them, so I asked her if she wouldn't lend hers to you, and she's glad to have it put to use again. You'll look just perfectly swell, Lily Rose. And she's going to give you a pair of white gloves that she had when she was slim-like."

The little renunciator went home feeling amply rewarded by the look of shining content in the blue eyes of Lily Rose.

The next night Colette in accordance with her promise to Amarilly summoned John to council. It was not easy to bridge the distance which had been steadily increasing with the months that had rolled by since the surplice's disavowment, and Colette, formerly supreme in her sway, was perceptibly timid in making the advance. After writing and tearing up several notes she called him up by telephone and asked him in a consciously casual tone if he could find it convenient to call that evening with reference to a little matter pertaining to their mutual charge, the Jenkinsons.

The grave voice in which he accepted the invitation was tinged with pleasure.

When he came Colette, fearful lest he should misinterpret her action in making this overture, plunged at once into the subject.

"I promised Amarilly I would see you and ask you for something in her friends' behalf."

"Then it is to Amarilly I am indebted for this call," he remarked whimsically.

"It's about the Boarder," she continued, gaining ease at the softening of his brown eyes. "You know he is to be married to Lily Rose, the girl we saw at the organ recital where Bud made his debut."

"I inferred as much at the time. When are they to be married?"

"In June. Just as soon as the Annex can be added to the Jenkinsons' upright. They are to build on two new rooms, or rather the Boarder will do so, and he will furnish them for his new abiding-place. But because she is 'delicate like' and overworked she is to become a Boarderess instead of a housekeeper, and they will 'eat' with the Jenkins family, thus increasing the prosperity of the latter. Amarilly says the Boarder is 'awful gentle of Lily Rose and wants to take good care of her.'"

The expression that moved the frostiest of his flock came into the still depths of his eyes and brought the wild rose to Colette's cheeks.

"They are going to make quite an affair of the wedding," she continued, speaking hurriedly and a little breathlessly. "You and I and Mr. Phillips are to be guests. There is to be a hack to take the bride and groom to the train and a trip to Niagara Falls, because Lily Rose has never been on the cars. They are to have salad and ice-cream and sandwiches and coffee. Mr. Phillips is to act as florist, and I shall furnish the decorations and the bride's bouquet. I'd love to throw in a bridal gown and veil, but Lily Rose, it seems is proud and won't accept them."

"I can find it quite in my heart to admire the reluctance of Lily Rose to accept them."

"And so can I," replied Colette, the rare sweetness coming into her eyes. "Underneath all my jests about this wedding, it is all very sweet and touching to me—the Boarder's consideration for her, the preparations for the wedding which appear so elaborate to them. And then the wedding itself seems to mean so much to them. It's so different from the weddings in our class, which often mean so little."

"Colette, I know—I have always known in spite of your endeavor to have me believe otherwise—anything really true and genuine appeals to you."

"But I haven't told you yet," she said, seized with an unaccountable shyness, "what your part is to be. The Boarder, Lily Rose, and naturally all the Jenkinsons, want you to perform the ceremony. The Boarder, being shy and retiring, forebore to ask you, and Amarilly for some reason desired me to ask you if you would officiate, and I assured her you would gladly do so."

"I should have felt hurt," replied John with a happy smile, "if they had asked anyone else to marry them. And you will be there, Colette?"

"Certainly," she declared. "I wouldn't miss it for anything."

"And—you will go with me, Colette?"

She colored, and her eyes drooped beneath his fixed gaze.

"Yes," she said, "I will go with you."

"Thank you, Colette," he answered gently, realizing what a surrender this was, and deeming it wise not to follow up his victory immediately.

And at his reticence Colette was conscious of a shade of disappointment. She began to feel an uncomfortable atmosphere in the silence that ensued, so she broke it, speaking hastily and confusedly.

"Oh, John, there is something else they want of you. The request is made by unanimous desire that you wear their surplice—that awful surplice!"

A shadow not unlike a frown fell athwart John's brow, and he made no immediate reply.

The introduction of the unfortunate topic made them both self-conscious, and for the first time Colette acknowledged to herself that she had been in the wrong in the matter of the surplice. John, misinterpreting her constraint, and fearing that the reference to the garment had revived all her old resentment, arose to depart.

"I will wear it if they wish," he said stiffly.

"I, too, wish you would wear it," she said in a voice scarcely audible.

He looked at her in surprise, hope returning.

"To please them," she added, coloring.

"Colette!" There was a pleading in his voice that told her all she longed to know. "Colette, don't you think I have been patient? Won't you be friends again?"

"I will," she said, "after—the Boarder's and Lily Rose's wedding!"

To be continued

A Thought for Today

"Who hath believed our report? And to whom hath the arm of Jehovah been revealed?"—Isaiah.

THE form of the Hebrew participle indicates not a report that was made but a rumor that was heard. Many hear—but who believes? . . . A few fishermen and common people among the millions of Palestine. One woman in the streets of Capernaum. One Thomas à Kempis in a world of monks. It is always "Few be they that find."

In the great Church this Sunday morning, how many really found the divine help? Did you?

The full sleeves of the eastern dress made it necessary for a man to roll up his sleeves, reveal his arm, when about to really do something. The figure at the beginning of this Messianic chapter is worthy of thought.

WARREN ROCHELLE.

The Christian Herald Prayer League

ALL Christians are urged to unite with the members of the Prayer League in daily prayer at the noon hour. Also anyone is at liberty to send a request for prayer or an acknowledgment of answered prayer, thereby becoming enrolled as a member of the Prayer League.

THIRTY-FIVE thousand requests for prayer have been sent to the Christian Herald Prayer League. We knew the membership of the League was more than seven thousand, that is, the secretary of the Prayer League has the names and addresses of seven thousand persons who have sent to the League requests for prayer or acknowledgment of answered prayer. But to find that the number of requests equaled the total of thirty-five thousand was beyond our expectation. This accounting was made at the Bowery Mission, where is sent every week a list of the requests presented to be made there the special subjects of prayer. Some readers neglect to send their names and addresses, and therefore cannot be recorded; others send a number of requests in one communication; others, of course, who are already recorded send in later requests. All these causes have contributed to swell the total number of requests so far beyond the actual enrollment.

Yet think not of the surprise, but of the beauty and the power of these thirty-five thousand prayers. When we remember again that each of these requests has been echoed in many hearts, we get a further idea of the volume of prayer that has risen to heaven from this group of believing souls. Surely God has been well pleased to hear these petitions; and in many cases has answered abundantly.

LAST year I asked for the League's prayers for the restoration to health and the conversion of my dear son," writes J. C. B., Iowa. "Both were answered; he was converted, and together with his wife has joined the church. His health was also in a great measure restored, for which I am very thankful." A Reader, Jermy, Pa., writes: "I want to acknowledge an answer to your prayers. My son and his family are reunited." Mrs. G. C. O., Alabama, writes: "I wish to send my grateful thanks for the prayers offered for freedom from a great financial trouble which threatened to keep us in practical slavery for years to come. I prayed God to help us in just the best way, and it came out in just that way, for which I thank and praise his holy name." "I wrote you some time ago," Mrs. G. M. A. writes from Brooklyn, N. Y., "for my son, who had left his home, wife and child. He, through bad associates, became addicted to drink, and went down. Prayer has been answered through the Mission, and I feel he is thoroughly converted." F. A. G. writes from Bailey, Mich.: "A two-week series of meetings has just closed at this place, resulting in the conversion of ten persons and the reclaiming of others." L. G. H., Springfield, Mass., writes: "A great joy has come into our home by my husband's conversion a year ago." C. R. writes from Empora, Miss.: "The Lord has answered many prayers for me, among them the healing of my body of an incurable disease."

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS of answered prayer have also been received from: Mrs. G. H. A., Kan. (for restoration of son's health); C. S., Green Ridge, Mo.; Young Believer, St. Matthews, Ky.; Mrs. H. C., Grand Rapids, Mich.; Mrs. H. P. W., Choires, Fla.; N. V. O. W., Cairo, Mo.; Mrs. C. W. D., Clarksburg, W. Va.; Mrs. N. C. M., South Euclid, Ohio; A Reader, North Brookfield, Mass.; Constant Reader, Lowryville, S. C.; J. R. B., Dunn, N. C.; A Subscriber, A Reader, Green Castle, Ind.; A Reader, Oregon, Mrs. C. B., Los Angeles, Calif.; D. W. DeL., Wheaton Ill.; E. N. G., Hot Springs, S. D. (for restoration of mother's health); Mrs. E. F. M. K., Ohio (for removal of a heavy burden).

An Oregon reader, after asking prayer that each member of her household of five may find work at reasonable wages and that they may be freed from debt, adds the request "that God will bring me much happiness, as my life has been so dark and unhappy." She asks also for the conversion of her three boys; that she may have success with her work in the Junior Endeavor Society; that God may give strength and courage for her work and give her special courage to pray in public. Mrs. A. L. C. writes from Lexington, N. C.: "I've often received direct answers to prayer, and I want to ask the League to pray for my sister, who has been seriously ill with tuberculosis for three years. She is prepared to meet God, but prays continually to be spared to raise her two children aright." L. F. G., of Muskegon, Mich., asks prayers that his dear wife be healed of lameness. He writes: "Would you please ask the Christian Herald Prayer League to pray for her that she may feel the healing power of God, and to help me in my prayers for my wife. I ask you to do this, believing that God will answer prayer asked by one so much in earnest."

L. G. H. asks prayer for an ingathering of souls at Springfield, Mass. in a church whose pastor is striving earnestly to win souls at the regular Sunday evening service. Prayers are also asked for revivals of religion at Powell, Wyo. at the Baptist Church. Dunkerton, Iowa; Wise, Va. (the M. E. Church); Hugo, Colo.; Santa Ana, Colo.; Garrison, Kan.; Milton, Iowa; Mazomanie, Wis.; Crosby, Pa.; Kansas City, Mo.; Baunton Church; Mayfield, Ohio (that bitterness which parents hold against the church at Wilson Mills, Ohio, may be removed); Hood View, Ore.; Dunkerton, Iowa; Grant, Mich.; Leslie, Mo.; Vernonia, Ore.; Potsdam, Ohio; Abilene, Kan.; South Centerville, N. Y.; Stuttgart, Ark.; Green Ridge, Mo.; Hoyt, Kan.; Framington, Ark. (that a little country church may become a praying church and a power for good in its field. Gridley, Ill. that members may be filled with the Holy Spirit). K. M. asks prayer that a minister filled with the Holy Ghost be sent to Bramwell, W. Va., and gather in the scattered flock of the Baptist Church. K. E. M. asks prayer that a larger field may be opened for a minister.

V. O. W. asks prayer that mother's sight may be restored; Mrs. M. A. L. and A Mother, their daughters; Miss A. E. A., her brother's; Mrs. F. E. S., her husband's. Nine other friends ask prayer for the restoration or strengthening of sight for other relatives, friends or for themselves.

C. M. G. asks prayer that daughter's mind may be restored; S. B., a son's; Mrs. C. B., her brother's; E. W., father's. Ten other friends ask prayer for mental restoration or strengthening for other friends or for themselves.

Twenty-four friends ask prayer for a deeper work of grace, assurance of sins forgiven, or express in other ways their desire for personal spiritual blessing.

Mrs. H. C. and Mrs. P. A. H. each ask that two sons may be delivered from the liquor habit; six other parents ask prayers that sons may be delivered from this habit; three wives, their husbands. Eight other friends ask prayer that friends or relatives may be delivered from the liquor habit. J. E. H. asks prayer that son may be cured of the drug habit. Mrs. G. H. A. that a young lady may be saved from the morphine habit.

Mrs. S. K. asks prayer that four sons may be saved. Sixteen other parents ask prayer that sons may be saved; twenty-six wives, their husbands; fifty-one other friends ask prayer for the conversion of relatives or friends.

Five friends ask prayer for special spiritual blessing for relatives or friends.

Sixty-six friends ask prayer for the healing of friends and relatives, including one who asks that a cousin's speech may be restored. Forty-four readers ask prayer for the healing of self, including Mrs. J. E. A. and Mrs. J. D. W., who ask that use of limbs may be restored; and Earnest Sister, who asks that she may be cured of stammering.

V. O. W. asks prayer that son's and mother's hearing may be restored; Mrs. D. A. D., her brother-in-law's. Six other friends ask prayer that their hearing may be restored.

Mrs. E. P. asks prayer that husband's hearing may be restored; N. M. Mc., a daughter's; A. S., a brother's; M. J. H., that brother's and sister's and his own hearing may be restored. Seven other readers ask prayer for healing of hearing for themselves or friends.

Fifty-two friends ask prayer for help or guidance in financial affairs.

Thirty-five readers ask prayer for help or guidance in financial affairs.

Forty-four friends ask prayer for the granting of varied desires and needs, including E. J. G., who asks prayer for the return of a son and daughter to their old father; and R. L. T., that son may be restored.

Beech-Nut Tomato Catsup

YOU know—one of the rarest things in the world about a tomato catsup is the real tomato flavor.

But here is Beech-Nut Tomato Catsup, the natural tomato catsup, with all the full rich flavor of the tomato retained from the vines for your table.

Tomatoes famous for flavor, ripened on the vines near Rochester plant no shipping, no waiting, no re-cooking, no loss of flavor—two hours to make, bottle and sterilize.

Yet Beech-Nut Tomato Catsup costs no more than other catsups, 15c and 25c (in some places of the extreme West, a little more).

Makers of America's Most Famous Bacon
Beech-Nut Bacon

BEECH-NUT PACKING CO.
Canajoharie, N. Y.
Catsup Plant at Rochester, N. Y.

Send 10 cents in stamps for the newest, most fascinating game "Going to Market"—amusing and instructive and sure to interest the whole family.

Church Envelopes

Shipped in 3 Days

Churches placing their initial order in response to this advertisement will not have to pay for their envelopes unless we make shipment within three working days (24 working hours) after the order is received.

Duplex—Richmond, Va.
Box 1656 (Archer G. Jones)

MAGAZINES

J. M. Hanson-Bennett Magazine Agency is the largest in the world. You can save money on the magazine you want by writing for This Catalog FREE. Our new Catalog lists more than 3000 Periodicals and Club Offers. IT'S A BIG MONEY SAVER. Send us your name and address on post card today and get this big free catalog. On new Agents Wanted. Write for full particulars.

J. M. HANSON-BENNETT Magazine Agency
222 Brooks Building Chicago, Illinois

BLMYER CHURCH BELLS
UNLIKE OTHER BELLS SWEETER, MORE DURABLE, LOWER PRICE. OUR FREE CATALOG TELLS WHY. Write to Cincinnati Bell Foundry Co., Cincinnati, O.

The Key To Success

Increase Your Efficiency

The secret of business and social success is the ability to remember. I can make your mind an infallible classified index from which you can instantly select thoughts, facts, figures, names, faces. Enables you to concentrate, develop self-control, overcome bashfulness, think on your feet, address an audience. Easy. Simple. The result of 20 years' experience in developing memories of thousands of students. Write today for copy of my book "How to Remember" and Copyrighted Intensely Interesting Memory Test Free, also how to obtain FREE copy of my book "How to Speak in Public."

Prof. Henry Dickson, Principal

Dickson School of Memory, 701 Hearst Bldg., Chicago, Ill.

The BEST LIGHT

Positively the cheapest and strongest light on earth. Used in every country on the globe. Makes and burns its own gas. Casts no shadows. Clean and odorless. Absolutely safe. Over 200 styles. 100 to 2000 Candle Power. Fully Guaranteed. Write for catalog. AGENTS WANTED EVERYWHERE. THE BEST LIGHT CO. 470 E. 5th St., Canton, O.

PATENTS That Protect and Pay. Advice and Books FREE. Rates Reasonable. Highest References. Best Services. WATSON E. COLEMAN, Patent Lawyer, Washington, D. C.

POULTRY PAPER 44-124 PAGE periodical, up-to-date; tells all you want to know about care and management of poultry for pleasure or profit. Four months for 10 cents. POULTRY ADVOCATE, Dept. 20, Syracuse, N. Y.

Try this easy way to clear your skin with Resinol Soap

Bathe your face for several minutes with Resinol Soap and warm water, working the creamy lather into the skin gently with the finger-tips. Then wash off with more Resinol Soap and warm water, finishing with a dash of clear, cold water to close the pores.

Do this once or twice a day, and you will be astonished how quickly the healing, antiseptic Resinol medication soothes and cleanses the pores, removes pimples and blackheads, and leaves the complexion clear, fresh and velvety.

If the skin is in bad condition through neglect or an unwise use of cosmetics, apply a little Resinol Ointment* and let it remain on ten minutes before the final washing with Resinol Soap.

Resinol Soap is not artificially colored, its rich brown being entirely due to the Resinol balsam it contains. Sold by all druggists and dealers in toilet goods. For a guestroom size trial cake and miniature box of Resinol Ointment, write Dept. 12-G, Resinol, Baltimore, Md.

*Physicians have prescribed Resinol Ointment for over twenty years in the treatment of skin and scalp affections.

Rhoda's Wedding Present

Continued from page 1275

none of you can understand how I feel. Myrtle says I'll get to know all the best people that way. And you know, mother, we never have known the best people."

Her eyes appealed to her father and it was he who answered.

"That is an open question, Rhoda," he said. "If the friends we've known and loved all our lives, aren't the 'best' people, they're good enough for me."

Again that quick glance between the others, shutting her out as effectually as if they had closed a door. It hardened the heart of Rhoda to still further assertion.

"So that's what I'm going to do with the ten thousand, everybody," she declared.

For a moment no one spoke. And then the mother said gently, "I wish that your wedding present may bring you happiness, my dear."

Rhoda noticed the "wish," substituted for the usual "hope." But she said no word.

She did not go to the gate as usual with Will that night. The mother went instead. The fragrance of the lilacs came to them both as they stood there.

"It isn't Rhoda, Will," she said, resting her hand on his arm. "It isn't our Rhoda talking at all. It's the King girl, speaking through her."

"I know, I know," he answered.

"And Rhoda's so young and pretty," she went on. "that—perhaps it's natural. But it will pass. She'll think better of it. She's so young—almost too young to marry. I wouldn't have been willing to trust her to any one but you."

"And I can't make her happy!" he groaned. "When her money's gone, she'll be miserable with me—a poor man, on a poor salary, in her fine house."

She talked longer than Rhoda was accustomed to do. But in the end, he went away only half comforted.

The next day, Miss King, having procured the key, came in her machine to take Rhoda to inspect the house. They were away almost all day. And there came many days like that. The little house where they had all been so happy together seemed a different place. The evenings were silent ones—not the silence that they had sometimes known, of perfect understanding; but the silence of hearts divided and ill at ease. Always before they had rallied together to meet trouble. This one, with one shut out, was the hardest to bear of any they had known.

For days and days Rhoda and Miss King went out together. Then, as suddenly as it had begun, it ceased. A day another—ten days went by without the sight of the familiar machine at the door. The family breathed easier.

Rhoda, saying no word, once more took her place in the sewing-room. And things again took on a semblance of the old content. Rhoda was quiet and thoughtful. But she watched as eagerly for the postman as ever Betsy and the twins had done.

And one day the expected letter, whatever it was, arrived. They knew that by the way she clutched it and hastened into the summerhouse by the gate.

"I—I guess it's the money," said Betsy, miserably.

Presently they saw Rhoda, looking very like the old Rhoda, flying up the path. She came in much as the others had once come.

"Oh," she cried, "it's off, the load is off! and it was never really on!"

"What load?" asked her mother.

"That old money that made me cry so often."

"Why, Rhoda!" said her mother. "I never knew you felt that way about it, my child!"

"I've been miserable—ever since the very first," she confessed. "At first I really felt kind of hungry for the fine house and things."

She paused, and searched her mother's face.

"I know, dear," her mother said.

"Afterward—well, every one seemed against me, and I couldn't bear to give in. So I just went on."

"And then?" questioned her mother.

"Oh, then—one day Myrtle said that I was—was too pretty to throw myself away on Will. And I woke up. That's all."

"But what's the letter?" asked Betsy.

"Why—why"—Rhoda's eyes still dwelt on her mother's face—"I just sat right down and wrote to Uncle John and told him I didn't want, wouldn't have, the old money."

"That's as foolish as the other," said Betsy. "It would have given Will a good start."

"I don't think Will would have wanted it, after all the trouble it had caused. I didn't. And, anyway, the choice didn't rest with us. Read Uncle John's letter, mother. It's a dear letter. But you will see he repudiated what Cousin Martha had promised for him. He said he never would give a present of money again. That what he gave to Etta brought only misery—her husband speculated with it and then with some that didn't belong to him, I think, by the way he speaks. So you see, all the trouble was for nothing. We never had a chance of getting the money. Now I'm going to settle down and do the best I can. I'm going to be satisfied with a little house and not let people make me wish for a bigger one. I would like to own our home—so that Will wouldn't have to worry. But, of course, that's out of the question, for the present."

"Maybe Uncle John'll give you one!" cried the twins, from force of habit.

And the mother, reading between the lines of the letter, added: "I shouldn't wonder a bit!"

New Contributions to the Widows and Orphans' Relief Fund

Continued from page 1281

Gift of $300

Warren, Ohio.

Gift of $50

Mrs. Emma Riddle.

Gifts of $25 Each

A Friend, Rushville, Nebr.; Miss Margaret Rife; Welland, Ontario, Canada; John Eger; Ina M. Slusser.

Gifts of $20 Each

A Friend, Syracuse, N. Y.; E. A. Cary; A Friend, Lock Haven, Pa.; L. A. M., Montgomery, Ohio.

Gifts of $15 Each

E. Becker, Friend, Jenison, Mich.; South West Dist. S. S. Association, Lushton, Nebr.

Gifts of $10 Each

Mrs. O. F. Spencer; Miss Bertha Clough; C. M. P., Worcester, Mass.; Mrs. M. Moon; Florence M. Reed; Miss Elizabeth M. Garfield; Miss Esther Peterson.

Gifts of $5 Each

A Friend, Springfield, Ill.; Franklin J. Morton; Lottie Miller; Huntington, W. Va.; Mary Prentice; A. M. Paterson, N. J.; Lucy H. Hosmer; Chas. Flint; Miss

E. A. Evans; Mrs. J. N. Goozen; C. A. Hagaman; Mrs. F. C. Elias; Mrs. A. M. B., Ashland, Ohio; Jeanie Brown; Jessie F. White; Mrs. Helen Suger; J. E. Raizer; Miss M. Gulbrandsen; Mrs. A. M. Wilson; Thomas S. McCaw; Richard Glover; N. C. Pitcher; A Friend, Brooklyn, N. Y.; O. C. Dickerson; E. B. Van Arsdale; Mr. & Mrs. C. L. Kitchel; Maggie Yule; Eugene M. Pinney; S. W. Hamblen; Eagleville, Mo.; Friend, Elizabeth, N. J.; Mrs. W. J. Robinson; H. M. Sanders; Augusta, Ga.

Gifts of $3 Each

Mrs. Max Vander Stucken; Children's Meeting, Stough Campaign, Lebanon, Pa.; Mrs. E. D. Bramley.

Gift of $2.50

Fiat Christian Endeavor Society, Stone Creek, Ohio.

Gifts of $2 Each

Joseph Lee, Jr.; S. V. W.; Mrs. A. Wilks; Sunshine Rescue Mission S. S., Denver, Colo.; William E. Beel; Walter C. Bennett; Mrs. Anna Widmeyer; South Lyon, Mich.; Collection & Birthday Offering of S. S. Juanita, Wash.; C. E. Stirling; Mrs. H. H. Kirkpatrick; "In Jesus' Name," La Otto, Ind.; Mrs. J. B. Harris; Edward Kemp.

Additional acknowledgments to be announced later

Vapo-Cresolene

for Whooping Cough, Spasmodic Croup, Asthma, Sore Throat, Coughs, Bronchitis, Colds, Catarrh.

Don't fail to use Cresolene for the distressing, and often fatal, affections for which it is recommended. It is a simple, safe, effective and drugless treatment. Vaporized Cresolene stops the paroxysms of Whooping Cough and relieves Spasmodic Croup at once. It is a boon to sufferers from asthma. The air carrying the antiseptic vapor, inspired with every breath, makes breathing easy, soothes the sore throat, and stops the cough, assuring restful nights. Cresolene relieves the bronchial complications of Scarlet Fever and Measles and is a valuable aid in the treatment of Diphtheria. Cresolene's best recommendation is its 36 years of successful use. Send us postal for Descriptive Booklet. For Sale by Druggists. Try Cresolene Antiseptic Throat Tablets for the irritated throat, composed of slippery elm bark, licorice, sugar and Cresolene. They can't harm you. Of your druggist or from us 10c in stamps.

THE VAPO-CRESOLENE CO., 62 Cortlandt St., New York or Leeming-Miles Building, Montreal, Canada

WOULD YOU show this standard high grade 42 key fully visible typewriter to your friends and let them see wherein it excels any other $100 typewriter, if by doing this and rendering other small assistance, you could easily have one to keep as your own? Then by post card or letter to us simply say, "Mail Particulars."

WOODSTOCK TYPEWRITER CO., Dept. D176, Chicago, Ill.

Why Hens Stop Laying

E. J. REEFER, the poultry expert, is giving away, FREE, a valuable book explaining how every farm and backyard hen can be made to produce 200 eggs per year. The book contains scientific facts of vital interest to every poultry raiser. Write today for one of the valuable books—FREE.

E. J. Reffer, Dept. 2499 Nelson Bldg., Kansas City, Mo.

TYPEWRITERS ALL TYPES. Prices $15.00 up. SOLD or RENTED anywhere at 1 to 1/2 MANUFACTURER'S PRICES, allowing RENTAL TO APPLY ON PRICE. Free Trial. Installment payments accepted. Write for catalog.

TYPEWRITER EMPORIUM, 34-36 W. Lake St., Chicago 10

YOU CAN AFFORD Familiar Songs of the Gospel (No. 1 or 2). Round or shape notes. $3 per hundred; samples, 5c each. 33 songs, words and music.

E. A. K. HACKETT, FORT WAYNE, INDIANA

FOR CHAPPED HANDS AND LIPS

Vaseline

Reg. U. S. Pat. Off.

Camphor Ice

keeps the skin soft and smooth all through rough winter weather. Sold at drug and department stores everywhere in metal boxes and tin tubes. Insist on VASELINE Camphor Ice. Write for illustrated booklet and set of "Vaseline" poster stamps. Free on request.

CHESEBROUGH MFG. CO. (Consolidated)

13 State Street New York City

ADLER'S PLAN SAVES HALF

Before you decide on an organ for Church, Sunday School or Young Peoples' Society, you should get my big FREE ORGAN BOOK and details of my direct-from-factory selling plan. I will save you big money.

CHURCH ORGANS

Any size or style shipped freight prepaid for 30 days absolutely free trial. Price so low and terms so easy that no Church, Sunday School or Young Peoples' Society need be without a sweet-toned, resonant, durable, highest grade organ. My organs won highest prize at St. Louis World's Fair and National Conservation Exposition. Fifty year guarantee. Send postal for big, free book of all styles of organs for homes, Churches, Sunday Schools, etc.

C. C. ADLER, Pres., ADLER ORGAN CO., 8009 W. Chestnut Street, Louisville, Ky.

FOR XMAS-A TYPEWRITER!

Look at these bargains! Typewriters & Remingtons $20 to $55 Smiths $18 to $40 Underwoods $25 to $60 Royals $25 to $45 L. C. Smiths $30 to $50 Oliviers $20 to $35

We have all makes. Send for catalog and address of nearest branch office.

AMERICAN WRITING MACHINE CO., Inc., 345 Broadway, N. Y.

The Wonder City of the Euphrates

Continued from page 1274

The college paper of the Syrian Protestant College at Beirut is printed in two languages, English and Arabic, and, as Arabic reads from right to left and from the back of the book to the front, according to our ideas, the "Al Kulliyeh" has two fronts, while its backs are both in the middle. All of which has nothing to do with the Hittites or their royal city of Carchemish, but it nevertheless explains why there is still hope of finding a bilingual tablet that will solve the problem of Hittite hieroglyphics.

The most ancient nations are one by one opening their histories, and the different cross references are throwing much light upon the lives of those who lived thousands of years ago. If the present war had not intervened, Carchemish should soon have revealed many secrets of the past. Coupled with the arduous effort and painstaking scholarship of the archeologist is the ever-present joy of discovery, and it may be only a short time before the hitherto unknown history and language of the Hittites will be an open book, intelligible to the world.

War, with its insistent appeal, has stopped the work at the Euphrates. Painstaking Kurds no longer sift the dust of the great river valley for tokens of a mysterious past. The construction work on the great bridge across the shifting Euphrates has ceased, and Germany's plans of a quick route to the East have been given up in repelling the encircling armies of the Allies. But the land between the great Babylonian rivers has been abandoned before. Its history is too old, and its past too grand, to allow it to regret a temporary eclipse caused by war. The rich land which nourished one of the earliest civilizations only lacks the hand of the engineer to transform it into a paradise, to change the entire steppe land to a great hanging garden such as Nebuchadnezzar never dreamed of. The great plateau between the Tigris and the Euphrates, once the trade route between the West and the East, still invites the busy Westerner afield to link his life and commerce with that of the expectant East.

England and Germany are battling today for Nebuchadnezzar's kingdom, and having seen waves of successive conquerors pass over her without changing her natural character, the broad land calmly awaits the peace which brings development instead of destruction. What matter whether the Hittite sculptures finally rest in London, Berlin, or Constantinople? Learning will seek out these monuments wherever they are placed, and their secret will some day become the common property of the world.

Showing Detail of the Hittite Hieroglyphics

The Correspondence of Professor David Smith, D.D.

I THOUGHT I would ask you if you could conveniently, within the narrow limits of your column, make any allusion to the value, temperamental or otherwise, of crucifixes as aids to devotion. The soldiers are seeing much of this kind of appeal in France. (Admiral) A. J. H.

TO my mind, the use of crucifixes is essentially un-Christian; it is no help, but rather a hindrance to fellowship with the Saviour. And the reason is that it diverts the soul from the true object of faith. This will appear if you consider that saying of St. Paul (II Cor. 5:16): "We henceforth know no man after the flesh; even though we have known Christ after the flesh, yet now we know him so no more." The Saviour with whom we have to do is not the Incarnate but the Risen and Glorified Lord, living and reigning at God's right hand and, by the ministry of his Holy Spirit, manifesting his eternal grace to the souls of men. A crucifix displays the dying, not the living, Christ; the Saviour, not as he is now and evermore, but as he was long ago in the hour of his mortal weakness. His own word to his disciples on the night of his betrayal was (John 16:7): "It is expedient for you that I go away; for if I go not away, the Comforter will not come unto you." And the contemplation of a crucifix is nothing else than an attempt to undo his departure by perpetuating his bodily presence. It ignores the ministry of the Holy Spirit.

And in this connection it is significant that the Holy Spirit is practically eliminated in Roman Catholic theology, which puts the infallible church in his place as the guide and teacher, and the sacraments in the room of his offices of grace. The proposal that our soldiers should "wear a crucifix round their neck so that in the hour of danger or mortal agony they can take it out and kiss it" seems to me a ghastly stupidity.

Even if it were not a misdirection of faith, the kissing of a crucifix would be needless. The yearning of soul which prompts such an act of devotion is itself faith, and is welcomed and recognized by the living and ever-present Saviour. In the moment of danger it is his weapon that the soldier grasps, and fumbling with a crucifix would be a dereliction of duty.

It is urged on behalf of the use of the crucifix that it rescues the soul from the "vagueness" of its religious apprehension by giving "concreteness" to its spiritual exercises; and, little as I approve of the proposed remedy, I recognize the reality of the evil. It seems to me largely due to the pietistic divorce of religion from common life. An instance will define my meaning. I heard recently of a lady who conceived herself called of God to the work of evangelism; and, while prosecuting a distant mission, she received a message that one of her children was sick, and if she would see him alive she must immediately return. She remained and continued her mission, alleging that "the work of God" was paramount. "The work of God!" What is it but the work, whatever it may be, which he has given us to do? For a mother it is the nurture of her children; and the devotion which draws her thence is a cruel and selfish fanaticism. DAVID SMITH, 4, The College, Londonderry.

There are a few women so foolish that they would rather have a beautiful complexion than a beautiful character.

"A GREAT BOOK"

The book "555 Difficult Bible Questions Answered" was received some time ago. It is indeed a great book. May God continue to bless you in the work. ELAIN, Ill. ANEL SIEGREN

Dad's Present

Hamilton Watch

"The Watch of Railroad Accuracy"

DURING your Christmas shopping you are sure to visit your jeweler's.

Take advantage of the first occasion of this sort, and ask to be shown the Hamilton Watch in models for both ladies and gentlemen. They are interesting examples of beauty and art applied to watch construction. The thinness of the gentlemen's watches and the delicate, graceful lines of the ladies' watches have been secured without sacrifice of that enduring accuracy which has so long been associated with the name of Hamilton.

Hamilton Watch Company, Dept. T, Lancaster, Pennsylvania sent on request, shows the entire line of Hamilton Watches, with prices and descriptions. One of our most popular watches, a gentleman's thin model, 12-size, 17-jewel timekeeper, sells for $28.00. Other thin models up to $150.00. Movements alone $12.25 ($13.00 in Canada) to $60.00. Hamilton Ladies' Bracelet Watches, $30.00 and $45.00.

Our Booklet, "The Timekeeper"

PATENTABLE IDEAS WANTED. Manufacturers want ideas. Send for 3 free books: Inventions wanted, etc. I get patent or no fee. Manufacturing facilities. RICHARD B. OWEN, 53 Owen Bldg., Washington, D. C.

THE VERY TIME

When Powerful Food Is Most Needed

The need of delicate yet nutritious food is never felt so keenly as when a convalescent gets a set back on account of weak stomach. Then is when Grape-Nuts shows its power for it is a most scientific and easily digested food.

"About a year ago," writes a Kansas woman, "my little six-year-old niece left the invigorating and buoyant air of Kansas, where all her life she had enjoyed fairly good health, to live in Ohio. She naturally had a change of diet and of course a change of water, and somehow she contracted typhoid fever.

"After a long siege her case seemed hopeless, doctors gave her up, and she was nothing but skin and bones, couldn't eat anything and for weeks did not know even her father or mother. Her parents, in trying to get something delicate and nourishing that she could eat, finally hit upon Grape-Nuts food and it turned out to be just the thing.

"She seemed to relish it, was soon conscious of her surroundings and began to gain strength so rapidly that in a short time she was as well, playful and robust as if she had never been ill.

"We all feel that Grape-Nuts was the predominating factor in saving the sweet little girl's life."

Name given by Postum Co., Battle Creek, Mich.

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

KIDDER'S PASTILLES For 50 yrs. Standard Relief for Asthma (Inhalation) STOWELL & CO., Manufacturers, Charlestown, Mass.

WANTED AN IDEA! THINK OF SOME SIMPLE THING TO PATENT. Protect your ideas, they may bring you wealth. Write for "Needed Inventions" and "How to Get Your Patent" RANDOLPH & CO., Dept. 96, Washington, D. C.

This Book Helps Home Builders

You will want to choose wisely every building material you use. This book will settle your roofing question. It tells about a roofing that is very handsome, yet economical, and that lasts long without repairs—

Asphalt Shingles

"The Roof That Stays Young"

They have a fadeless color, never crack or blow up, and protect your home against fires.

Send for this book today and learn about this wonderful roofing that is "Destined to Roof the Nation's Homes."

It will help you toward home building efficiency.

Ask your Architect, Contractor, Lumber Dealer or Builders Supply Man.

Asphalt Shingle Publicity Bureau 856 Marquette Bldg. Chicago

Asphalt Shingle Publicity Bureau 856 Marquette Bldg. Chicago

Gentlemen: Send me your free and interesting booklet, "The Roof That Stays Young."

Name _____ Street _____ Town _____ State _____

CHRISTIAN HERALD BOOKS

Two Books by a Famous Pastor

REV. J. H. JOWETT, D. D., has been aptly described as the most spiritual preacher in America. He has written two volumes, "Thirsting for the Springs" and "Brooks by the Traveler's Way." These delightful books are written in this great preacher's happiest vein and the gift of felicitous expression shines out on every page.

Dr. Jowett is a deep student of human nature. He has a faculty of kindling the finer emotions and awakening the noblest ambition. This was the impression on the minds of the editors of the Christian Herald after reading these two companion volumes. The books will be welcomed by thousands who will be glad of the inspiration they afford.

These two volumes, aggregating 530 pages, handsomely bound in cloth, will be sent together with the Christian Herald for one whole year, postpaid, for $2. Or, we will send to old subscribers, FREE, as a reward, these two volumes for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $1.50.

Margaret E. Sangster's New Book

MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR., does not make up her stories and poems—they just form themselves on the background of her mind as winter sprites trace wonderful pictures on windowpanes, and then simply because she cannot help herself, she sets down a description of these pictures. There are, in all, in her new book, "Real People and Dreams," about eighty poems and thirty-two short stories and sketches. This is the work of a genius.

We will send this new volume by Margaret E. Sangster, Jr., handsomely bound in cloth, with a new photographic frontispiece of Margaret E. Sangster herself, and with illustrations for a number of the poems, together with the Christian Herald for one whole year, postpaid, for $1.85. Or, we will send to old subscribers, FREE, as a reward, this volume for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $1.50.

"Forty Thousand Beautiful Quotations"

SOME years ago the Christian Herald published a work entitled "Forty Thousand Sublime and Beautiful Thoughts." It was composed of a collection of the best sayings on every conceivable subject which the compiler could come upon. In the course of time the edition of this book was exhausted. We have had so many inquiries for it that we have decided to republish it this year thoroughly revised. There are actually forty thousand quotations in this book. It will make a very valuable addition to your library.

We will send you this volume, together with the Christian Herald for one whole year, for $3.00, or we will send to old subscribers, FREE, as a reward, "Forty Thousand Sublime and Beautiful Thoughts" for sending us two new yearly subscriptions to the Christian Herald with $3.00.

Luther in Light of Recent Research

WHILE there are several lives of Luther, Professor Heinrich Boehmer's famous work, which has attracted universal attention in Europe, is one of the best that has ever appeared. It comes most opportunely in view of the approaching celebration of the four hundredth anniversary of the nailing of Luther's famous Thesis on the gate of the old castle church at Wittenberg, which was the beginning of the Reformation. The Christian Herald has had the good fortune to secure the exclusive American rights of this book and has had it translated by Professor Carl F. Huth, Jr., of the University of Chicago, who has succeeded in preserving the spirit and expression of the original in a remarkable degree.

The Foreword to Boehmer's work by Professor J. H. Robinson of Columbia University pays a high tribute both to biographer and to the translator who has made this book so readable to the average American.

The Life of Luther, handsomely bound in cloth, will be sent together with the Christian Herald for one whole year, postpaid, for $2.25, or we will send to old subscribers, FREE, as a reward, this volume for sending us two new yearly subscriptions to the Christian Herald with $3.00.

A New "Do Something" Book

DID you read "Janice Day," which was offered with the Christian Herald last year? You will remember it was the "Do Something" book. The success of the book was such that the author, Helen Beecher Long, wrote a sequel entitled "The Testing of Janice Day." It is a vivid and delightful picture of typical New England life and character.

We will send "The Testing of Janice Day," 310 pages, attractive cloth covers, together with the Christian Herald for one whole year for $2.00, or we will send to old subscribers, FREE, as a reward, "The Testing of Janice Day," for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $1.50.

Our Art Calendar for 1916

THIS beautiful calendar is composed of a reproduction of that remarkable picture of Christ walking beside the plowman in the field, which was published under the title of "Lo, I Am With You Always." The picture is described in verses by Margaret E. Sangster, Jr. This calendar is printed in eight colors, achieving a most beautiful effect. It will make a Christmas or New Year's present. It will remind your friends of you every day in the year.

We will send this superb calendar together with the Christian Herald for one whole year for $1.75, or to old subscribers sending us their renewal and one new subscription to the Christian Herald, we will send two copies of this calendar mailed to separate addresses if desired, FREE.

A Companion to the Bible

HAVE you bought your copy of "555 Difficult Bible Questions Answered?" Here is another book which has had a wonderful success during the past year and every lover of the Bible should possess a copy. Indeed it is a wonderful help to Bible study. This book is the result of research covering a period of twenty-seven years. Its theology is thoroughly sound.

The beauty of this book is that it answers those very questions which you are always on the point of asking but for some reason don't. These half thousand and more questions have been asked in one form or another by thousands and thousands of human beings like yourself and have been answered through the Christian Herald Mail-Bag by experts. The result is a book that is a "very present help in time of trouble" to the Bible reader.

We will send "555 Difficult Bible Questions Answered" together with the Christian Herald for one whole year for $1.85. Or, we will send to old subscribers, FREE, as a reward, this volume for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $1.50.

A Story for the Family Circle

WE do not know when we have had quite as much pleasure in reading any book this year as "Little Sir Galahad." There is so much that is charming and humorous and intensely human in the whole story that it appeals to the reader probably with greater force than if the action were on a more dignified level.

"Little Sir Galahad" is really a story of the golden age in our own time. That beautiful season that makes life radiant while it lasts.

It is as good a story as we have encountered in many a day, and that's saying a good deal.

"Little Sir Galahad," 376 pages, illustrated and handsomely bound in cloth, will be sent postpaid with one yearly subscription to the Christian Herald for $2.00. Or, we will send to old subscribers, FREE, as a reward, this volume for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $1.50.

Our 1916 Almanac

DON'T forget the Almanac. This year it will be better than ever. In addition to its permanent features, its prose and poetry, its wit and humor, it will contain new departments such as the story of the European War up to date of going to press; it will contain political information which should be at the disposal of every voter in the Presidential Election of 1916. There will be a comprehensive description of the Lincoln Highway. There will be difficult Bible questions answered. There will be a department devoted to Common Law, and there will be many features of especial interest to women, and things here and there for many an hour's interested perusal.

Add ten cents to your subscription to the Christian Herald and we will send you the Christian Herald Almanac for 1916 postpaid.

Address, The Christian Herald, Bible House, New York

Washington on the Eve of Congress

Continued from page 1287

The walk to the Washington Monument—say, from the White House—is longer than it looks, for it seems to be only a block or so. The wind blows wildly around the monument's broad base, although scarcely a breeze of air may be stirring through the streets of the city. Hats rush madly down the gentle little hill—people rush madly after them.

There is usually a crowd waiting for the elevator to come down from the top of the tower, a patiently waiting crowd. There are usually several pairs of bridal couples—Washington swarms with bridal couples. A dark young man looks into a blond girl's eyes with a smile—their hands touch and cling—they forget that they are part of a crowd. . . . One turns one's eyes and follows the line of the setting sun that droops over the white buildings.

There are, of course, stairs running up the inside of the Washington Monument, but few people walk up the stairs. Of course, there are stones set in the wall by different states that are well worth the climb, but at sunset time the majority of folk think that it is better to ride. There is so much to see in our capital and feet are only—set. As the elevator crawls up, one sees the New York stone, the Ohio stone, the Kansas stone, and many others. One sees a blurred stone labeled "The Cherokee Nation." Somehow that stone depresses a few people, for the white man has done little for his Indian brother in return for his land, is game, his dying race—his memorial stone.

From the top of the Monument the view is magnificent. Dying sunset colors, pale gold, deep rose, and flaming range fall like a caress over the houses, over the Capitol, the Library, the White House—everything. The Lincoln Monument, nearly completed, stands out in its radiance of white marble against the blue of the Potomac as Lincoln's life, nearly completed, stood out radiantly against God's sky. It is quiet in the tower. The bride and groom, hands clasped, draw nearer together, a chattering schoolgirl is suddenly silenced, two dapper Englishmen with canes, waxed mustaches and careful accents forget to be artificial. One drops his cane. . . . Far off below swarms of little black ants—that are people an hour, no, a hundred ears ago, rush madly, ineffectually back and forth. There are friends, enemies, political adversaries, diplomats down there. Perhaps some of them hold the lives of many people in the hollow of their hands. Perhaps one or two hold the lives of kingdoms, empires, republics in their fingers. Up in the air five hundred feet between God's green earth and his blue sky, one realizes that they are pitifully small, these people who are called powerful. One realizes that loneliness and sorrow, and tears, and envy and hate are small indeed. One realizes only that God is good and that there is love in the world. Far off, the sunset clouds are flecked with crimson droppings. They might have been dipped in blood.

Everyone is quiet coming down from the monument. No one is thinking about Congress, or the President, or war, or fighting. The schoolgirl's face is uplifted, radiant with purpose. The bride gazes into the future with wide, only eyes. The Englishmen stand in the glow of the sun—and forget to talk.

It is colder, now, back on the city streets. Government employees are on their way to supper—congressmen and senators and high officials are at home dressing for dinner. Hotels send out yellow lights that gleam queerly in the last of the daylight, fading into night. The town is not so friendly as evening time as it is in the afternoon, either it is too lonely—for a stranger, a girl in white furs smiles into the face of a shabby woman and the shabby woman smiles back. It's a rather odd old world.

NIGHT comes on swiftly when it gets really started. Night in Washington is a beautiful girl drawing black velvet, jewel-spangled cloak over white shoulders. The streets are lighted with dull-bronze, rather low, lamps; artistically perfect lamps, that hold dull-white, glowing globes. The lamps are very close together. They are the pearls that the girl winds about her throat and in her dusky hair.

The White House stands out, glimmering boldly, against the black of the foliage, its lighted windows dimmed with tightly drawn curtains. What of national portent may not have happened behind those same curtained windows! Perhaps fear has grappled with bravery behind the shelter of the friendly walls; perhaps hatred and love have clashed. Perhaps cowards have become strong, and surely strong men have wept. Characters and homes and nations have been molded behind those friendly blinds.

The streets on the way to the library are gayly lighted streets, dizzy with masses of humanity. Thousands seem to pass and repass, and faces are bright as smiling eyes glance in one's direction. Finally, the Library looms up—a mighty pile of glorious architecture.

But at first one doesn't notice the library, for the dome of the Capitol reaches up against the sky and the light far up in its tower looks—just a bit like the star of Bethlehem. Traitors and folk with no pride in their country first seem myths when one gets that first glimpse of the Capitol against the sky.

After one long self-satisfying glance, folk usually remember that it is the Library they have come to see. They turn away from the Capitol—but they look back.

The Library of Congress is a huge building that cost over six million dollars to build. Every detail is perfect, from its high arched ceilings, decorated with medallions and paintings, to its gorgeous mosaic floors.

There is a special reading room for the congressmen, a special reading room for senators, and a huge one for the general public.

One must go through the library thoroughly to see its efficiency as well as its very great beauty. One must go behind the scenes to see the seventy-six miles of book shelves, the wonderful basket carriers that transport books to any place without handling. One must see the huge fire-proof doors and the enormous number of pneumatic tubes, to realize the working of the mind—or minds—that planned all this.

OUT on the street again with the cold night air beating against the face of the crowd. Past the lighted theaters and the hotels—past halls that are softly shaded and music-filled. The town is gay and mysterious and filled with romance—the story city of the west. It always is so when Congress is in session.

Pausing on the steps before going in out of the night, one looks for a moment quietly over the city. There, directly in the foreground, flows the Potomac, a gorgeous thread of silver, dividing two brave states. There are the state buildings—far to one side, the White House. There is the Washington Monument. The moonlight touches it softly with gleaming fingers, and a searchlight from somewhere in the distance picks it out brilliantly from the darkness of the night. It stands there white, chaste, beautiful—a perfect tribute to a great life.

And, lingering there, one breathes a prayer to God—a prayer that our nation's life may always be brave and pure and fearless—outstanding in the clear lights of heaven for all the world to see!

The New Peace Calendar

THE latest novelty is a new Peace Calendar and Diary, dedicated "to our Mothers and all Peacemakers" compiled by Dr. John Mullooney. It is mounted on a desk stand so built as to enable one to preserve memorandums on it for the whole year. For each day in the year there is a message of peace from wise men past and present, such as Ben Franklin, Henry Ford, William Jennings Bryan, Grover Cleveland, James Madison, Napoleon, Goethe, Ruskin, Luther Burbank, Washington, Lincoln, etc. It is beautifully decorated by Audley B. Wells; published by Paul Elder & Co., of San Francisco, Calif. The price is 75 cents.

One drop of gasoline right at the spark is worth twenty drops anywhere else in your cylinders.

In a really cold cylinder, gasoline simply will not vaporize rapidly enough for the gas to travel to the spark.

So priming through the priming cup, or by taking the spark plugs out, is not effective.

All-in-One

Champion

Priming Plugs

have a priming cup right on the plug. The gasoline trickles right down the core and drips from the electrode—right where the spark jumps.

Spark and gasoline at one and the same point at the same time means an explosion—that's all there is to it.

You may not need them often but when you do need them, Priming Plugs are worth many, many times the few cents additional cost.

Your dealer will tell you which one is made to serve your motor.

Get a set today and be sure that there will be no starting delays this winter, no matter how low the mercury drops.

The price is $1.25 each.

Like all Champion Spark Plugs, Champion Priming Plugs are uniformly dependable.

Be sure the name "Champion" is on the porcelain,—not merely on the box.

Champion Spark Plug Co.

302 Avondale Avenue,
Toledo, Ohio

The Jeffery Four

"America's
Standard Automobile" at a $1000 Price

You can invest your money in a Jeffery Four with the certainty of very small depreciation. The engineering, materials and workmanship are of that high-grade character which gives the average owner four or five seasons of perfect service—and the price is standard.

Body, standard seven-passenger Chesterfield type • Front seats, divided • Driver's seat, adjustable • Upholstery, deep red leather • Shipping weight, 2750 pounds • Motor, Jeffery high-speed high compression • 12.5 hp. Bosch magneto • Starting and lighting system, Buir electric • Equipment, complete • Lure car, 13" Jeffery built.

STANDARD SEVEN-PASSENGER, 1915, with Jeffery motor $1000 • TRAILER, SEVEN-PASSENGER, 1915, with Jeffery motor $1000 • JEFFERY SIX, 1915, with Jeffery motor $1200

Patented U.S. Patent Office

The Thomas B. Jeffery Company
Main Office and Works • Kenosha, Wisconsin

The True Flavor of High-Grade
Cocoa Beans is Found in

BAKER'S BREAKFAST COCOA

Registered U. S. Patent Office

This is due to the perfection of the mechanical process by which it is manufactured, no chemicals being used, and to the care and skill used in the selection and blending of the beans.

A high authority on cocoa has recently said: "A pure cocoa, unchanged by destructive chemicals, is the best cocoa. There is no more need for introducing alkalies into cocoa than there is into cracked wheat or oatmeal."

Baker's Cocoa is Delicious, Wholesome,
Pure and of Great Food Value

Booklet of Choice Recipes sent free

Walter Baker & Co. Ltd.
Established 1780
Dorchester, Mass.

Grand Prize, Panama-Pacific Exposition, 1915
Grand Prize, Panama-California Exposition, 1915

Delicate Girls and Women are too often dosed with drugs when their blood is really starved. They need that blood-strength which comes from medicinal nourishment.

No drugs can make blood.

SCOTT'S EMULSION is a highly concentrated blood-food and every drop yields returns in strengthening both body and brain.

If you are frail, languid, delicate or nervous, take Scott's Emulsion after meals for one month. No Alcohol.

SCOTT & BOWNE, BLOOMFIELD, N. J. 14-62

POMPEIAN OLIVE OIL

ALWAYS FRESH
There is the same marked difference between fresh Olive Oil and Olive Oil packed months ago as there is between a newly-laid egg and an egg months old. Insist on POMPEIAN
THE STANDARD IMPORTED OLIVE OIL

Young People's Topics for December 26

Looking Forward to the God of All the Years

Epworth League Topic. Heb. 12:1, 2, 12-14

How to Keep on the Up Grade

Christian Endeavor Topic. Phil. 3:12-16
(New Year's Meeting)

A GAIN the Christian Endeavor and Epworth League topics are so closely allied that they can be studied together more advantageously than separately. Onward—Upward—Looking—God. There is our schedule for the New Year.

The two passages studied are the two great onward and upward challenges of the New Testament. "This one thing I do: Forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth unto those things which are before, I press toward the mark." "Wherefore, seeing we are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses, let us lay aside every weight, and the sin which doth so easily beset us, and let us run with patience the race that is set before us, looking unto Jesus."

I heard an enthusiastic woman say the other day, talking about the advice she gives to multitudes of other women who look to her for counsel and inspiration, that we should "walk out of our past." What a figure of speech that is! As if the past were a shell, a burden, a prison, anything oppressive and entangling. How beautiful to find ourselves free—able to walk out! We may do that every fresh day, every new hour—walk out of the past, out of ourselves, into God's bright future of opportunity.

Just a word of warning. Sometimes there are things in the past that need fixing. Don't bring over into the old year those bad accounts. Straighten them up. Confess, where confessing is needed. Make restitution where restitution is possible. Atone so far as you can. Trust God for all the rest, and begin the year with a clean slate.

Oh, to catch a New Year vision of the things waiting to be done, out there in the waiting months! Yet some people see too much, and grow bewildered and disheartened. Others do not see enough—have no comprehension of the great work waiting to be done, no realization of the things they themselves can do to help.

Onward. New achievements in character building; new victories over self; new discoveries of ways in which we can help others; new glimpses of truth to be spread; ever-widening circles of people we can help. Read the notes on the Baptist Union lessons and urge the young people of your own society to join their souls and prayers to the great world movements toward brother-

A Warning from History

A POSTHUMOUS work, entitled "Cassock and Sword," contains the mature thoughts of a mind rich in gifts and experience, and trained to searching inquiry and independent judgment. It is a scholarly, instructive and interesting study of the history and growth of our great American democracy, which no American should fail to read. All the forces, religious, political, economic, educational and social, which have conspired to make our country and people what they have been and now are, are thoroughly examined and their respective influence weighed and balanced. Above all, the mighty conflict between the political principles of Romanism and those which are the outgrowth of the Reformation, as it has been waged in our country, is here strikingly presented. The author was not a religious man and no one will accuse him of religious bigotry; yet was he thoroughly imbued with and convinced of the correctness and vitality of the principles of the Reformation and Democracy.

The purpose of the book is stated by the author in these words: "Foreseeing the coming of a possibly fateful crisis, this book has been written to remind the American people of the lessons of his-hood in which America must have a noble, forceful part.

Upward. Nearer God. Nearer holiness. Nearer heaven. We know the things that are dragging downward—the "weights" that we should lay aside. It is a long, high flight our souls are making. It is not worth while clinging to anything that will keep us down.

Looking toward God. In that passage from Hebrews it is "Looking unto Jesus." That seems easier to say. Looking to Jesus—looking into the historic records we have of him; looking ahead to him as he leads his people (so many of them just now off his track, and busy with slaughter!) upward toward eternal love and peace.

But Jesus is not only back in history, and present universally and grandly in the world, and far ahead in the future; he is at our side. We look forward toward him. Yet, after all, he is closer than that. We may take his hand. His Spirit can be in us. And in the triumph and gladness and beauty of his friendship we may go onward and upward toward and with the God of all the years.

America for the World's Sake

B. Y. P. U. Topic. Isa. 54:2, 3; Acts 1:5-8

T HIS is the new conception of the career of a nation. America, not for her own sake, not for her people's sake, but for the world's sake.

It is matter for profoundest thanksgiving that some of our great national leaders have grasped this truth and are declaring it. We can all help the idea to grow and to take deeper and stronger root in the public mind.

Has ever any nation had an opportunity for service so splendid as ours? For years the people of other lands have been running to us (notice Isa. 55:45). We have been enabled to give them new ideas of liberty, of brotherhood, of God. Many of them have gone back to influence their communities toward better things. Now in the great world war, we stand firm, hoping for the time when we can help the contending nations to find the way to peace. We might have done far better; our record should have been kept clean by refusing to share in the profits of the warmongers. But there still is an opportunity to show ourselves the true friend of every nation in the world, willing to help, eager to find that happy path to universal brotherhood.

Don't think you have nothing to do about it. If you have a vote, use it to express your convictions and your hopes. But even if you have not, find out what public men are doing and try to help every one who has a vote to have a mind for these better things.

tory and impress upon them the sacred trust with which the great American democracy has been charged through racial traditions, and the heritage of the Reformation, as yet the greatest achievement of the human spirit."

Truly prophetic the book is in some of its portions. The author died before the outbreak of the present terrible war, yet he clearly foresaw its inevitable coming. Other future clashes he foresaw with equal clearness, because of his thorough grasp of the forces now shaping the course of the nations, particularly our own. The fact that the author was of German birth and a veteran of the Civil War adds peculiar interest to the book.

Though the student may oftentimes disagree with the author in his views and conclusions, he surely will find many a subject treated from a new angle, and will feel himself impelled to give earnest thought to matters wholly ignored heretofore.

"Cassock and Sword," by Charles Lenz, Ph.D., is published by Katharina and Heinrich Lincoln Lenz, New York City. Cloth-bound, 351 pages, price $2. Club rates for larger orders. The book may be ordered through The Christian Herald.

Pictures sharp to the corners—not dull and hazy.

Type like this—not like zint

Bausch and Lomb Balopticon

gives entertainment as novel, as interesting, as varied and as instructive as the talking machine gives in its field.

The Home Balopticon projects pictures, post cards, solid objects, etc. Pictures in correct position from left to right, not reversed. Now fitted with special 400-watt gas-filled Mazda Lamp, giving illumination superior to any similar instrument on the market. Absolutely safe and automatic and simple enough for child to operate. Lenses, mirrors and all mechanical parts of high quality—not a toy. Ideal equipment for clubs and small schoolroom as well as the home.

Costs but $35—with aluminum coated wall-screen included. Other models for various requirements $20 and up.

"Fun—and Better" is an interesting booklet telling of many novel ways to entertain with the Home Balopticon. Sent free upon request.

Bausch & Lomb Optical Co.
513 ST. PAUL STREET, ROCHESTER, N. Y.

Indoor Closet

More Comfortable Healthful and Convenient than the Out-Door Privy

Eliminates the out-door privy, open vault and cess-pool. They are breeding places for germs. Have a warm, sanitary, odorless toilet right in your house. No going out in cold weather. A boon to invalids. Endorsed by State Boards of Health.

ABSOLUTELY ODORLESS

Put It Anywhere In The House

The germs are killed by a chemical process in water in the container, which you empty once a month. Absolutely no odor. No more trouble to empty than dishwasher. Closet absolutely guaranteed. Write for full description and price.

ROWE SANITARY MFG. CO.
1230 Rowe Bldg. Detroit, Mich.
Ask about the Ro-San Washstand—Hot and Cold Running Water Without Plumbing

NOW READY The Forty-Second Volume

No other publication begins to furnish the inspiration, instruction and information for Sunday School Teachers and Scholars

SEND POSTAL FOR ILLUSTRATED CIRCULAR AND SAMPLE PAGES

PRICE, $1.00 NET $1.15 DELIVERED

W. A. WILDE COMPANY
120 Boylston Street, Boston, Mass.
Rand-McNally Building, Chicago

THE FIRST OF THE SIXTY

PICTURE No. 1

Watch for the second and third in next week's issue with rules and all details

Next week's Christian Herald will contain the opening instalments of the Bible Picture Contest

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of December 22, 1915, will be received by you as one of the chief holiday "specials" to yourself and family, for it will inaugurate a season of happy, hearty enjoyment in the solving of the Contest Pictures, and may lead to the very appreciable gift, from us to you, of one thousand dollars!

Get Ready! Observe This Object Lesson:

WHAT DO YOU SEE IN THIS SPECIMEN

Observe the dozen texts on both sides of the picture

They that sow in tears shall reap in joy. Psalm, CXXVI, 5.

The soul of the sluggard desireth, and hath nothing: but the soul of the diligent shall be made fat. Proverbs, XIII, 4.

Then came in all the king's wise men: but they could not read the writing, nor make known to the king the interpretation thereof. Daniel, V, 8.

Then he called for a light, and sprang in, and came trembling, and fell down before Paul and Silas. Acts, XVI, 29.

And I saw the seven angels which stood before God; and to them were given seven trumpets. Revelation, VIII, 2.

And Ruth said, Entreat me not to leave thee,

PICTURE

Which of these Bible verses come closest to the picture?

or to return from following after thee: for whither thou goest, I will go; and where thou lodgest, I will lodge: thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God: Ruth, I, 16.

And when he sowed, some seeds fell by the way side, and the fowls came and devoured them up. Matthew, XIII, 4.

And when they had kindled a fire in the midst of the hall, and were set down together, Peter sat down among them. Luke, XXII, 55.

And a great multitude followed him, because they saw his miracles which he did on them that were diseased. John, VI, 2.

And through a window in a basket was I let down by the wall, and escaped his hands. II Corinthians, XI, 33.

The Contest is easy because you are only required to pick your answers out of a given list. But you must select the best; so alertness will count.

Haven't You Renewed Your Subscription Yet?

The Bible Picture Contest opens next week, December 22, 1915, when the first three pictures will officially appear in the Christian Herald. There will be sixty pictures in all, so they will be appearing well into 1916. After the Contest is over, will come the announcement of the best answers, the winners of rewards, etc. Be sure you're on our list for the coming year.

All contestants have to do is to submit Bible verses that are applicable to the pictures. Look at the specimen picture above—you can select a verse, from among those given, that is described by the picture, can't you? Yes, and you can just as readily select appropriate verses for all the pictures from among the list given you in Gems from the Bible. This is a selection of about 2,000 Bible verses. From it you can choose your "answers" to the pictures—verses that fit the pictures. Those doing so most successfully, according to the simple rules, will receive the $2,500 cash. Everyone may compete without required expense.

Let us extend your subscription now; and if you add on fifty cents, sending two dollars in all, we shall enter your yearly subscription, and mail to you: a neat and convenient Reply Book in which to write your answers, as well as the valuable book Gems from the Bible, which contains all the available answers to the 60 pictures. Or, any paid in advance subscriber may obtain these two books free by sending us $1.50 for a new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald in behalf of some other person not of the same household.

Could you, for example, give anybody a better Christmas present than a year's subscription to your favorite weekly magazine?

On the other hand, you have only to show this announcement of the Contest to a friend or neighbor in order to obtain a subscription from that person—remember, the Outfit of Reply Book and "Gems from the Bible," which may help you to win the $1,000 first prize, awaits your order.

$2,500 Cash—416 Gifts

First Reward - - - -	$1,000.00
Second Reward - - - -	500.00
Third Reward - - - -	200.00
Fourth Reward - - - -	100.00
Fifth Reward - - - -	50.00
Sixth Reward - - - -	20.00
7th to 21st Rewards, inclusive, each,	2.50
22d to 416th Rewards, inclusive, each,	1.50

416 Cash Rewards in All Totaling - - $2,500.00

In the event of ties, the full rewards will be paid to all tying contestants

Address: THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK

MAGAZINES FOR CHRISTMAS GIFTS

NO OTHER gift will give greater or more genuine satisfaction to a relative or friend than a year's subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD or to one of the popular magazines. It is the logical solution of the gift problem. Renew your subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and add other magazines as Christmas Gifts.

Below is a condensed list of periodicals from which selection can be made of one or more magazines at a price in some cases almost one-half of the regular price. Readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are thus enabled to order all magazines desired in a single order, with the assurance that it will be shipped promptly, accurately and at the lowest prices. Subscriptions are for one year and can be new or renewal and can be sent to different addresses, except in a few cases noted otherwise. (Send no cash with postage additional.)

An appropriate Christmas card announcing the gift subscription will be sent to reach the recipient on Christmas morning. To determine the price of two or more magazines given in the list below, Add the class prices and multiply by five. The result will be the club price.

EXAMPLE
Christian Herald	Class 23	Pictorial Review	Class 25
McCall's	Class 10
Total class numbers 58		Multiply by..... 5
Price of club.....		$2.90

	Pubs. Price	Our Price		Pubs. Price	Our Price
30 ADVENTURE with CHRISTIAN HERALD	$3.00	$2.65	45 McBRIDE'S with CHRISTIAN HERALD	$4.50	$3.40
17 AMERICAN BOY with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.50	2.00	with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Woman's Home Companion	6.00	4.65
with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Pictorial Review (or Woman's Home Companion)	4.00	3.25	10 McCALL'S with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.00	1.65
with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Delineator and Everybody's	5.50	4.00	with CHRISTIAN HERALD and To-Day and Housewife	3.00	1.90
25 AMERICAN MAGAZINE with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	2.40	with CHRISTIAN HERALD, Mother's and Ladies World to one address except CHRISTIAN HERALD	4.50	2.65
with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Woman's Home Companion (to same address)	4.50	3.15	20 McCLURE'S with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.50	2.15
with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Pictorial Review	4.50	3.65	25 METROPOLITAN with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	2.40
17 BOYS' LIFE with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.50	2.00	17 MODERN PRISCILLA with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.50	2.00
with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Pictorial Review	4.00	3.25	with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Home Needlework	3.25	2.40
17 BOYS' MAGAZINE with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.50	2.00	with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Pictorial Review	4.00	3.25
with CHRISTIAN HERALD, McCall's, Housewife and To-Day's	4.00	2.75	23 MOTHER'S MAGAZINE with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	2.00
with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Woman's Home Companion	4.00	3.25	with CHRISTIAN HERALD, McCall's and Ladies World to one address except CHRISTIAN HERALD	4.50	2.65
50 THE CHRISTIAN HERALD	1.50	1.50	60 OUTLOOK with CHRISTIAN HERALD	4.50	4.15
THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 3 years	4.50	3.00	8 PEOPLE'S HOME JOURNAL with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.00	1.55
35 COLLIER'S WEEKLY with CHRISTIAN HERALD	4.00	3.00	25 PICTORIAL REVIEW with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	2.40
with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Pictorial Review (or Woman's Home Companion)	5.50	4.15	with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Modern Priscilla	4.00	3.25
with CHRISTIAN HERALD, Delineator and Everybody's	7.00	4.90	with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Metropolitan	4.50	3.55
16 COOKING CLUB MAGAZINE with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.50	1.95	with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Woman's Home Companion	4.50	3.65
COUNTRY GENTLEMAN with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.50	2.50	40 REVIEW OF REVIEWS with CHRISTIAN HERALD	4.50	3.15
70 COUNTRY LIFE IN AMERICA with CHRISTIAN HERALD	5.50	4.65	with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Pictorial Review (or Woman's Home Companion)	6.00	4.40
55 CURRENT OPINION with CHRISTIAN HERALD	4.50	3.90	SATURDAY EVENING POST with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	3.00
with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Pictorial Review (or Woman's Home Companion)	6.00	5.15	50 SCRIBNER'S with CHRISTIAN HERALD	4.50	3.65
23 DELINEATOR with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	2.30	17 SOMETHING-TO-DO with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.50	2.00
with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Everybody's (to one address)	4.50	3.15	50 ST. NICHOLAS with CHRISTIAN HERALD	4.50	3.65
with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Pictorial Review (or American)	4.50	3.55	8 TO-DAY'S with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.00	1.55
with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Review of Reviews	6.00	4.30	with CHRISTIAN HERALD, Housewife and McCall's	3.00	1.90
12 DESIGNER with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.25	1.75	55 TRAVEL with CHRISTIAN HERALD	4.50	3.90
25 ETUDE (for music lovers) with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	2.00	25 WOMAN'S HOME COMPANION with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	2.40
25 EVERYBODY'S with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	2.40	with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Little Folks (new)	4.00	3.15
with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Delineator (to same address)	4.50	3.15	with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Delineator	4.50	3.55
with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Pictorial Review (or Woman's Home Companion)	4.50	3.65	with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Pictorial Review	4.50	3.65
23 GARDEN MAGAZINE with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	2.00	with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Review of Reviews	6.00	4.40
GOOD HOUSEKEEPING with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	2.65	12 WOMAN'S MAGAZINE with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.25	1.75
HARPER'S BAZAR with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.50	3.15	5 WOMAN'S WORLD with CHRISTIAN HERALD	1.85	1.55
70 HARPER'S MAGAZINE with CHRISTIAN HERALD	5.50	4.65	40 WORLD'S WORK with CHRISTIAN HERALD	4.50	3.15
70 HARPER'S WEEKLY with CHRISTIAN HERALD	6.50	4.65	with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Woman's Home Companion	6.00	4.40
12 HOME NEEDLEWORK with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.25	1.75	40 YOUTH'S COMPANION with CHRISTIAN HERALD	4.00	3.25
with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Woman's Home Companion	3.75	3.00	with CHRISTIAN HERALD and McCall's	5.00	4.40
8 HOUSEWIFE with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.00	1.55	with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Woman's Home Companion	5.00	4.40
with CHRISTIAN HERALD, McCall's and To-Day's	3.50	1.90	Special Combinations. With Religious Papers
25 ILLUSTRATED WORLD with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	2.40	PROPHETIC AND MISSION RECORD, 3 Yrs. Amer. Advent. Miss. Soc. with CHRISTIAN HERALD	1.85	1.60
with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Pictorial Review	4.50	3.65	AMERICAN MESSENGER with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.00	1.65
55 INDEPENDENT with CHRISTIAN HERALD	4.50	3.90	DAILY BIBLE with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.10	1.75
50 JOHN MARTIN'S BOOK (Children) with CHRISTIAN HERALD	4.50	3.65	THE PROTESTANT MAGAZINE with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.50	1.95
LADIES' HOME JOURNAL with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	3.00	RECORD OF CHRISTIAN WORK with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	2.00
15 LADIES' WORLD with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.50	1.90	CHRISTIAN STANDARD with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	2.30
17 LITTLE FOLKS (new sub.) with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.50	1.90	CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	2.50
with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Pictorial Review (or Woman's Home Companion) (Add 15c if Little Folks is a renewal)	4.00	3.15	PRESBYTERIAN BANNER with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.50	2.90
			THE STANDARD (Baptist) with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.50	3.00

(*Must go to same address)

SEND ALL ORDERS TO

(*Must go to same address)

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, NEW YORK, N. Y.

Among the Workers

REV. T. J. BACH of the Scandinavian Alliance Mission, Maracaibo, Venezuela, writes: "With great joy we observe how the Lord has been pleased to add his blessings to our efforts to spread the Gospel. Formerly those who got their eyes opened to the truth would generally ask for some book or tract that would reveal the dark side of the Catholic Church, but lately the majority ask for the Bible or some tract that will reveal Christ. Our little evangelical paper has lately found its way into many new homes. In a city in Colombia, called Cucuta, we have over one hundred subscribers. That city, with some thirty thousand inhabitants, has no missionary. From our little bookstore we have sent many Bibles to Cucuta."

THE nurses of Bethesda Leper Home need bandage material all the year around, old, but clean linen, cotton, cheese cloth, pillow slips, sheets, etc. Bandages in rolls from 1 inch to 4 inches wide should be fastened at the end with a few stitches (use no pin). All donations should be securely packed. If sent prepaid by express, donations reach my office without further charge, while a charge is made for the delivery of packages from the piers to my office if sent by railroad and steamship companies. If receipts of bandage material exceed the Bethesda Leper Home needs, the surplus will go to other leper asylums of the Missions to Lepers. The lepers further need soft bath and hand towels, muslin, and underwear, white stockings, absorbent cotton, and other hospital supplies. None of these articles must be packed in with bandage material, and a list of contents of such packages should be sent to me for foreign custom house entry. Have name and address of donor on each parcel, package or case, so that I can acknowledge receipt thereof. R. DAN WOLTERBEK, 63 Park Row, New York City.

THE Lincoln-Lee Legion has made plans for a forty weeks' Scientific Temperance Educational Campaign to be inaugurated in all states at once. A twenty weeks' campaign has just been completed in Ohio with very remarkable success. A similar twenty weeks' campaign is now in progress in Vermont. While these Scientific Temperance Educational Campaigns are suitable to any period, because their teachings are fundamental knowledge, it has been found that they tend very materially to increase the dry vote where campaigns are in progress.

IN a letter, dated November 18, to Rev. J. B. Smith of the M. E. Board of Conference Claimants in Chicago, President Wilson expresses this hearty commendation of the work: "I take pleasure in expressing my very deep interest in the effort which you represent to obtain an endowment which will supply the means of pensioning aged preachers. This is a matter in which I have long had a great interest, for I have seen so many cases which demonstrated the necessity of such action."

Free Financial Information

THIRTY-five years ago Walter L. Williamson, Lisbon, N. D., settled in the Northwest and became a banker for the farmers in that region. He has sold millions of dollars' worth of mortgages to investors, and he advertises "No losses to customers." Mr. Williamson will tell you all about his business and how six per cent. mortgages may be bought in convenient denominations if you will write him.

Special Circular 702 C, issued by Greenbaum Sons Bank & Trust Company, La Salle and Madison Streets, Chicago, Ill., describes $500 six per cent. real estate gold bonds on Chicago first mortgages. Christian Herald readers with $500 and $1,000 amounts to invest at six per cent. should send for their circular.

"American Farm Loans" is an interesting booklet containing letters from Scotch clients of George M. Forman & Co., who now hold more than $8,000,000 of the Forman six per cent. farm mortgages. This booklet should be read by every one interested in investing money. Write to George M. Forman & Co., 11 South La Salle Street, Chicago, Ill.

There is a wide difference between the partial payment plan of buying securities and speculating in securities on the margin. Through means of the former convenient method of buying stocks the investor is enabled to pay for dividend-paying stocks and bonds by making a small first payment and the balance in monthly instalments. This method is fully explained in Booklet E-2, which any Christian Herald reader may obtain from Sheldon, Morgan & Co., 42 Broadway, New York City.

How is one to decide upon the right securities in which to invest his savings? This convincing question is discussed and answered in pamphlet 748, which will be sent to any reader free by Harvey Fisk & Sons, 62 Cedar Street, New York City.

Some farm mortgages come in pieces as small as $300, some in amounts as great as $5,000. Write to Spooner & Robinson, 10 South La Salle Street, Chicago, Ill., for valuable illustrated booklet.

Farm loan bonds netting six per cent., combining abundant security, large earnings and strong guarantee and secured upon first mortgage high-class farm loans, are described in an interesting circular 894 C, which will be sent to any inquiring Christian Herald reader addressing Peabody, Houghteling & Co., 10 South La Salle Street, Chicago, Ill.

During the fifteen months of war there is no class of investment security which has maintained a better rating than the first mortgage bonds of large public service corporations. Some of these bonds possess a real diversity in one investment. Send to A. H. Bickmore & Co., 111 Broadway, New York City, for circular HM describing such bonds in pieces of $100 to $500.

The usual rate of interest paid depositors of savings banks is three per cent. The savings banks invest your funds in municipal bonds which pay from four per cent. to six per cent. The very bonds the savings bank buys and makes its profit, the private investor may also buy. The story of $100 and $500 municipal bonds is convincingly told in a booklet issued free by Charles S. Kidder & Co., Investment Bankers, W. C. T. U. Building, Chicago, Ill.

The oldest and still the best investments for a great many people are six per cent. farm mortgages issued by great firms that are "on the ground." E. J. Lander & Co., Grand Forks, N. D., established themselves in the farm mortgage banking business in 1883 and have safely loaned millions of dollars of investors' money. You can buy these mortgages in denominations of $500 up. Write to the firm for booklet O and current lists.

Write to Bowman, Cost & Co., Third National Bank Building, Chicago, Ill., for "Investment Factors," which will be sent free to any reader of the Christian Herald. "Investment Factors" tells about corporation bonds, interest rates, security back of the bonds and how they may be bought through the means of small monthly payments.

DON'T Pay Two PRICES HOOSIER Stoves & Ranges FREE

Try in your own home for 30 days. Show your friends. Freight paid by us. Send it back at our expense if you do not want to keep it. You can buy the best at Actual Factory Prices. Our new improvements equal anything ever produced. Save enough on a single stove to buy your winter's fuel. ALL HOOSIER STOVES Guaranteed for Years. Send postal today for large FREE Catalogue, showing large assortment to select from. No Obligations.

HOOSIER STOVE CO. 164 State St., MARION, IND.

DIGGING BLACK DIAMONDS

Realistic booklet of photographs, vividly portraying 25 actual scenes in Anthracite Coal Mines, 1,000 to 1,500 feet under ground. Send 25c. for this booklet and see for yourself how coal miners work; miners caught by fall of roof, etc. Intensely interesting and educational. Dept. D, Box 310, Coal No. 1 Co., Scranton, Pa.

INDIVIDUAL COMMUNION SERVICE

Does YOUR Church use this cleanly and sanitary method? Send for catalog and special offer. Outfits on trial.

Thomas Communion Service Co., Box 150 Lima, Ohio

"The Sanitary" Individual Communion Cups

Convenient, Noiseless and Sanitary. List of thousands of churches using our cups and FREE CATALOG with quotations sent upon request. SANITARY COMMUNION OUTFIT CO., 67th ST., ROCHESTER, N. Y.

$1.00 WILL bring you 3 Beautiful Satin Book marks, with a poem on each; Book of Table Graces for daily use, special days and occasions; a box of Bible Comfort Powders, 28 in a box. M. E. MUNSON, Pub., 77 Bible House, New York, N. Y.

INVENT SOMETHING

Your ideas may bring wealth; our free book tells what to invent and how to obtain a patent, through our new credit system; write today.

Waters & Co., 5100 Warder Building, Washington, D. C.

INSTRUMENTS TO ASSIST HEARING

Send for new catalogue Order Early for Christmas WM. C. WILLIS & CO., 134 S. 11th Street, Phila., Pa.

Only India Paper Red Letter Bible in the World

ISAIAH 61

22 A little one shall become a thousand, and a small one a strong nation: I the LORD will hasten it in his time.

CHAPTER 61

THE Redeemer Comes to Zion with Blessings.
THE Spirit of the Lord God is upon me; because the LORD hath anointed me to preach good tidings unto the meek; he hath sent me to bind up the broken-hearted, to proclaim liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them that are bound; ★

2 To proclaim the acceptable year of the LORD, and the day of vengeance of our God; to comfort all that mourn; ★

3 To appoint unto them that mourn in Zion, to give unto them beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness; that they might be called trees of righteousness, the planting of the LORD, that he might be glorified. ★

4 And they shall build the old wastes, they shall raise up the former desolations, and they shall repair the waste cities, the desolations of many generations.

5 And strangers shall stand and feed your flocks, and the sons of the alien shall be your plowmen and your vinedressers.

6 But ye shall be named the Priests of the LORD: men shall call you the Ministers of our God: ye shall eat the riches of the Gentiles, and in their glory shall ye boast yourselves.

7 For your shame ye shall have double; and for confusion they shall rejoice in their portion: therefore in their land they shall possess the double: everlasting joy shall be unto them.

8 For I the LORD love judgment, I hate robbery for burnt offering; and I will direct their work in truth, and I will make an everlasting covenant with them.

9 And their seed shall be known among the Gentiles, and their offspring among the people: all that see them shall acknowledge them, that they are the seed which the LORD hath blessed

10 I will greatly rejoice in the LORD, my soul shall be joyful in

The Mission of the Lord's Anointed One

CHAPTER 60
Mat. 13: 31

CHAPTER 61

ch. 11: 2
Lu. 4: 18
John 1: 32
John 3: 34

Ps. 147: 3
Jer. 34: 8

CHAPTER 62

ch. 25: 9
Mal. 4: 1, 3
Mat. 5: 4

Ps. 30: 11

ch. 60: 21
John 15: 8

CHAPTER 62

ch. 65: 15
Rev. 3: 12
Zech. 9: 16
Hos. 1: 10
1 Pet. 2: 10
1 Ki. 22: 42
ch. 54: 1
2 That is, My delight is in her.
2 Ki. 21: 1
3 That is, Married.
4 with the joy of the bridegroom.
ch. 65: 19
d Ezek. 3: 17
Ezek. 33: 7
5 Or, ye that are the LORD'S remembrances.
6 silence.
e ch. 61: 11
Zeph. 3: 20
7 If I give, etc.
Jer. 28: 31
Jer. 5: 17

726

my God; for he hath clothed me with the garments of salvation, he hath covered me with the robe of righteousness, as a bridegroom decketh himself with ornaments, and as a bride adorneth herself with her jewels.

11 For as the earth bringeth forth her bud, and as the garden causeth the things that are sown in it to spring forth; so the Lord GOD will cause righteousness and praise to spring forth before all the nations.

CHAPTER 62

The Redeemer Calls the Watchmen to Awake.

FOR Zion's sake will I not hold my peace, and for Jerusalem's sake I will not rest, until the righteousness thereof go forth as brightness, and the salvation thereof as a lamp that burneth.

2 And the Gentiles shall see thy righteousness, and all kings thy glory: and thou shalt be called by a new name, which the mouth of the LORD shall name.

3 Thou shalt also be a crown of glory in the hand of the LORD, and a royal diadem in the hand of thy God.

4 Thou shalt no more be termed Forsaken; neither shall thy land any more be termed Desolate: but thou shalt be called Hephzibah, and thy land Beulah: for the LORD delighteth in thee, and thy land shall be married.

5 For as a young man marrieth a virgin, so shall thy sons marry thee: and as the bridegroom rejoiceth over the bride, so shall thy God rejoice over thee.

6 I have set watchmen upon thy walls, O Jerusalem, which shall never hold their peace day nor night: ye that make mention of the LORD, keep not silence,

7 And give him no rest, till he establish, and till he make Jerusalem a praise in the earth.

8 The LORD hath sworn by his right hand, and by the arm of his strength, Surely I will no more give thy corn to be meat for thine enemies; and the sons of the stranger shall not drink thy wine, for the which thou hast labored:

9 But they that have gathered it shall eat it, and praise the LORD; and they that have brought it to-

Jesus Baptized; He Undergoes Temptation

and his meat was locusts and wild honey.

5 Then went out to him Jerusalem, and all Judea, and all the region round about Jordan,

6 And were baptized of him in Jordan, confessing their sins.

7 But when he saw many of the Pharisees and Sadducees come to his baptism, he said unto them, O generation of vipers, who hath warned you to flee from the wrath to come?

8 Bring forth therefore fruits meet for repentance:

9 And think not to say within yourselves, We have Abraham to our father: for I say unto you, that God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham.

10 And now also the axe is laid unto the root of the trees: therefore every tree which bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down, and cast into the fire.

11 I indeed baptize you with water unto repentance: but he that cometh after me is mightier than I, whose shoes I am not worthy to bear: he shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost, and with fire:

12 Whose fan is in his hand, and he will thoroughly purge his floor, and gather his wheat into the garner; but he will burn up the chaff with unquenchable fire.

13 Then cometh Jesus from Galilee to Jordan unto John, to be baptized of him.

14 But John forbade him, saying, I have need to be baptized of thee, and comest thou to me?

15 And Jesus answering said unto him, Suffer it to be so now: for thus it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness. Then he suffered him.

16 And Jesus, when he was baptized, went up straightway out of the water: and, lo, the heavens were opened unto him, and he saw the Spirit of God descending like a dove, and lighting upon him:

17 And a voice from heaven, saying, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased.

CHAPTER 4

The Temptation of Jesus; his first Disciples.

THEN was Jesus led up of the spirit into the wilderness to be tempted of the devil.

2 And when he had fasted forty

CHAPTER 3

Deut. 8: 8

Deut. 32: 13

1 Sam. 14: 25

2 Ki. 18: 32

Ps. 81: 16

Ezek. 27: 17

John 19: 4

Rom. 5: 9

1 Thes. 1: 10

1 Or, answerable to amendment of life.

2 Cor. 1: 11

John 8: 33

Acts 13: 26

Rom. 4: 1

ch. 7: 19

John 15: 6

Heb. 6: 8

Mark 1: 8

Lu. 3: 16

John 1: 33

Acts 1: 5

Isa. 4: 4

Mal. 3: 2

Acts 2: 3, 4

Titus 3: 5

Mal. 3: 3

Mal. 4: 1

ch. 13: 30

ch. 2: 22

Dan. 9: 24

Mark 1: 10

Isa. 11: 2

Lu. 3: 22

John 1: 32

John 12: 28

Pa. 2: 7

Isa. 42: 1

Lu. 9: 35

Col. 1: 13

CHAPTER 4

Mark 1: 12

Lu. 4: 1

1 Ki. 18: 12

Ezek. 3: 14

Acts 8: 39

Heb. 4: 15

Ex. 34: 28

Eph. 6: 17

Deut. 8: 3

Neh. 11: 1

Ps. 91: 11

Deut. 6: 16

Deut. 6: 13

Deut. 10: 20

Jas. 4: 7

Heb. 1: 14

Lu. 3: 20

1 Or, delivered up.

Isa. 9: 1, 2

Isa. 42: 7

Lu. 2: 32

Mark 1: 14

ch. 10: 7

925

Specimen Page of Our India Paper Red Letter Bible

Shows Type, Size, and Binding

Text of the India Paper Red Letter Bible is printed in rich black and red

Our Red Letter Bibles and Testaments

Our Red Letter Bible

ONLY GENUINE EDITION

The only genuine edition of the Red Letter Bible is the Authorized or King James' Version, unchanged save for the variation of the color in the type. Two colors (Red and Black) are employed, in accordance with the simple plan devised by the late Dr. Louis Klopsch, the Originator of the Red Letter principle applied to the Holy Scriptures.

What Is a Red Letter Bible?

- 1 In the Old Testament the passages quoted by our Lord, or directly related to incidents to which he referred, are Printed in Red.
- 2 In the New Testament, the words universally accepted as those of the Saviour are Printed in Red.
- 3 A Red Star (★) immediately following a verse in the Old Testament indicates that the verse embodies a prophetic reference to Christ as the coming Messiah.

Our Red Letter Bible, illustrated above, Contains Full References; also a Concordance, Subject Index, and Dictionary—all under One Alphabetical Arrangement—together with Helps, Maps, and Numerous Illustrations.

The text of this Bible is set in Bold-Face Minion, especially designed for this work. There are 268 pages of Helps or Concordance and 17 superb Maps. This gem of a Bible, small in bulk, light in weight, very legible and very durable, weighs only 20 ounces. It is bound in American Levant, overlapping edges, red-under-gold, and makes altogether the handiest and most satisfactory Bible now on the market. For size of type, size of page and appearance, see above illustration. We send this superb Bible, together with The Christian Herald for one whole year, for

$3.00

OR: We will send it to old subscribers Free as a reward for sending us two NEW yearly subscriptions to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD with $1.50 each.

Something Still Better

Genuine Morocco, Calf Lined

If you can afford to pay $1 more, ask for the same Bible bound in Genuine Morocco, Calf Finish, Leather Lining, Silk Sewed, which will wear a Lifetime. This Bible is Equal to Any $10.00 Bible. It is Sent with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one Year FOR ONLY

$4.00

OR: We will send it to old subscribers Free as a reward for sending us three NEW yearly subscriptions to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD with $1.50 each.

All Charges Prepaid in Every Instance

Our Red Letter Testament

This beautiful volume is the ONLY NEW TESTAMENT which contains ALL THE WORDS SPOKEN BY OUR LORD PRINTED IN RED. The Type is Very Clear, and the Alignment of the Red and Black Lettering Absolutely Perfect. The Red Letter New Testament is Exquisitely Bound in American Levant, Soft and Flexible, with Overlapping Edges—Red Under Gold—with Book-mark—a Compact Volume that may be Conveniently Carried in the Pocket.

The Red Letter New Testament is Issued in Both the Authorized and Revised Versions, and is Sent, All Charges Prepaid, To gether with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for One Year FOR ONLY

$2.00

OR: We will send it to old subscribers Free as a reward for sending us one NEW yearly subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD with $1.50.

When ordering, state whether you want Authorized or Revised Version. All charges prepaid in every instance.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD
BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK

Add ten cents to your subscription for the Christian Herald Almanac for 1916, containing 100 pages of interesting facts and figures

Will there be a Victrola in your home this Christmas?

The only instrument that brings you the world's greatest artists

A splendid surprise for your family—to have Caruso, Farrar, Gluck, McCormack, Melba, Schumann-Heink and other famous artists sing for them; to have Elman, Kreisler, Paderewski and other noted instrumentalists play for them; to hear Sousa's Band, Pryor's Band, Vessella's Band, Victor Herbert's Orchestra; to enjoy Harry Lauder, Nora Bayes, De Wolf Hopper, Raymond Hitchcock and other celebrated comedians and entertainers.

Nothing else will bring so much pleasure to your family and friends all the year round.

There are Victors and Victrolas in great variety of styles from $10 to $400, and there are Victor dealers in every city in the world who will gladly demonstrate them and play any music you wish to hear.

Victor Talking Machine Co., Camden, N. J., U. S. A.
Berliner Gramophone Co., Montreal, Canadian Distributors

Always use Victor Machines with Victor Records and Victor Needles—
the combination. There is no other way to get the unequalled Victor tone.

New Victor Records demonstrated at all dealers on the 28th of each month

Victrola

Christian Herald

COPYRIGHT, 1915, BY THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

SUBSCRIPTION, $1.50 PER ANNUM
PUBLISHED 52 TIMES A YEAR

NEW YORK, DECEMBER 22, 1915

VOL. 38 NO. 51. PRICE 5 CENTS
OFFICES: BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK

Drawing by H. Willard Ortlip

"AND SHE SHALL CALL HIS NAME IMMANUEL" (Isaiah 7:14)

Our Mail-Bag

NOTICE

THE editors of the Christian Herald will be glad to answer any question addressed to the Mail-Bag provided it be of general interest and not merely personal. Correspondents may use a nom de plume to identify the question, but all letters must contain name and address of the sender, in addition to the nom de plume. No attention will be paid to anonymous letters.

Questions and Answers

EC. G., West Philadelphia, Pa. Please explain the statement "God is a spirit." I can readily understand the word spirit as applied to athletes or soldiers, meaning their enthusiasm. Just so I interpret being "filled with the Spirit" as meaning enthusiasm to follow truth and right, but I cannot interpret that other statement: "God is a Spirit."

Your confusion results from the fact that in ordinary language the word "spirit" has a number of varying meanings. It means fundamentally the immaterial soul of an individual as distinguished from his body. It is true that there is a good deal of uncertainty and obscurity about these terms because the mysterious facts that they stand for are so vaguely understood. For instance, the two Latin words animus and spiritus are rather hard to distinguish, except that animus stood ordinarily for the life shared by animals and man alike, while spiritus meant the higher soul quality, possessed by man and not by brute. But a man's spirit signified, and still signifies, his personality, his ego, all that spiritual nature that makes him what he is. The statement that God is a spirit; then, means that he is a person, having spiritual characteristics but not having any physical, material form, and so not limited to any locality. The use of the word spirit to which you refer as applied to soldiers and athletes is an extension of this fundamental meaning. A body of men is thought of as having a spirit, just as the body of an individual contains a spirit. This spirit of a company may be either grave or gay, enthusiastic or gloomy. But the good sense of the word overbalances the other. So it is sometimes used alone to signify good spirits, or, as you say, enthusiasm. But being filled with the Spirit means something far deeper than to have enthusiasm. It means to have God's self, his spiritual personality, dwelling with us, occupying our bodies. This is what Paul means by the statement that our bodies are the temples of the Holy Spirit.

R. P., Tribune, Kan. 1. A piece of iron will sink to the bottom no matter how deep the water is, because water is only slightly compressible. If water were highly compressible, as air is, the water at a great depth would be much denser, and therefore heavier, and an object would sink until it reached a point at which its weight would be less than that of the water which it displaced and there it would float, as clouds float in the atmosphere. But a cubic foot of iron weighs more than a cubic foot of water at a depth of two miles just as it does at the surface, and therefore continues sinking until it reaches the bottom. 2. The ocean has been sounded to a depth of 32,088 feet, or over six miles. This is just off the Philippine Island of Mindanao. Several other points in the Pacific show depths of over 30,000 feet. From the lowest sea depth to the highest mountain peak is 61,090 feet, which is about 1-700 of the earth's diameter. 3. We are not familiar with the teachings of the preacher mentioned.

Reader, Wisconsin. 1. According to the Jewish interpretation, from the beginning of one evening to the beginning of the next constituted one day—in other words, from sunset to sunset. 2. During their sojourn in Egypt, the Israelites must have become familiar with the idol-worship of that country. It is clear from Josh. 24: 14 and Ezek. 22: 7 that they had defiled themselves with the idols of the land, although it was probably more the corrupt worship of the Shepherd race than of the Egyptians themselves. It was not until after the Exodus that they came under the influence of a revealed religion. Even then they were on various occasions led to idolatry through contact with heathen nations. 3. This question is controversial. 4. There were no Roman Catholics in Paul's time, nor was that title applied to any church

Continued on last column

The House of Santa Claus

Alice J. Whittier

Once on a time, as we all say in rhyme,
I mounted my wind-o-plane,
And sailed away for an hour and a day
To search over land and main.
I wanted to find where Santa Claus dwells,
Up in the mountains or down in the dells,
And take a view
Of what they do
In the house of Santa Claus.

First I sailed forth away to the North,
Far over the mountains white,
Where auroras play and the white bears stay
And the years half day, half night.
O! the walrus roared in his snowy home,
And the big whales spouted in the foam,
But not a sight
Nor welcome light
From the house of Santa Claus.

Then a south wind passed, and I sailed fast
To the warm Equator lands,
Where monkeys play and elephants stay
And gators sprawl in the sands.
O! the big snakes crawled in the river's bed,
And the parrots screamed around my head,
But not a sign
At any time
Of the house of Santa Claus.

Then a west wind blew, and my plane it flew Toward the Continent of Men,
And came to stand over happy-land,
Deep hid in Christus' Glen.
But my wind-o-plane fluttered, flapped and fell
Right into the Village of Love pell-mell!
So down we drop,
Bumpity flop,
By the house of Santa Claus.

I sat up and stared, for nobody cared.
O wonderful sight and sweet!
The land was white with a marvellous sight,
It was popcorn two feet deep!
And the Kewpies played with the baby dolls,
And Teddy bears romped in the reindeers stalls,
While close at hand
A babies' band
Serenaded Santa Claus.

O! I laughed in glee at last to see
Dear Santa Claus' house and home.
Then settled down in that lovely town
And never more wished to roam.
'Tis the happiest village between the seas,
The streets just sprout with Christmas trees.
The people smile
And smile and smile
In the town of Santa Claus.

Now little folk, dear, please lend me your ear,
I will whisper a secret then.
Right down in the heart, in the loving part,
Right there is Christus' Glen.
And home is the Village of Love the while,
The windows loving eyes that smile,
Planning the joys
For girls and boys
In the house of Santa Claus.

When the Christmas star shines down from afar
And lights fair Bethlehem,
While angels sing of the Christ our King,
And joy and peace to men,
Wherever that light and beauty go,
There the Christmas trees in their beauty grow,
And down in the heart,
In the loving part,
Is the house of Santa Claus.

HEINRICH DEWAND WILLIAMS - 5.

Our Mail-Bag

Continued from first column

in apostolic days, notwithstanding the claims of Catholic historians. The primitive church was simply Christian. Even in the second and following centuries, when the bishops of Rome began to exercise a wide influence, the name Roman Catholic was unknown. There was an "Old Catholic Church" with an episcopal constitution, but owed no allegiance to Rome, as a centre of spiritual authority and direction, although even then the bishops of Rome were industriously extending their influence in a manner that foreshadowed the ultimate usurpation of ecclesiastical power. It was not until the eighth century, when the temporal power was definitely established, that the episcopate was gradually converted into a papal church. The system was completed under Gregor VII and the Roman Catholic Church so-called, was an organization which thereafter claimed supremacy, not only over the religious world, but over secular governments as well.

B. R., Des Moines, Ia. It is unquestionable that in dealing with many Bible passages there is great danger in literal interpretation. For example, take such passages as are purely figurative, or symbolical; it would simply be missing the real meaning altogether, to take them literally regardless of the spiritual character of the lesson they are designed to teach.

Ella M. C., Wabash, Ind. The "cliff dwellings" are found in Arizona, New Mexico, Utah and Colorado. It is not at all likely that they were built by the Aztecs or the Toltecs. Scientists who have investigated the matter have been led to believe that they were constructed by the predecessors of the Pueblo Indians who now occupy some of the similar structures located in the plains in the neighborhood of the cliffs. The Mancos canyon is in Colorado.

Y., Albion, Mich. King Lemuel mentioned in Prov. 31: 1, was an unknown ruler, to whom the wise advice of the chapter was addressed by his mother. Some Bible interpreters hold that the name Lemuel (which means "to God") is used symbolically as if we should say "devout one," and is neither more nor less than a pleasing epithet applied to Solomon himself. There are others, however, who hold that Lemuel was a real personage, and that he was "king of Massa." It should be added that the majority of commentators hold to the Solomonian application.

Mrs. L. L., Poughkeepsie, N. Y. Not in our collections.

Mrs. J. M. R., Cumberland, Md. The Queen of Sheba is supposed to have come from Yemen in Arabia Felix. Matt. 12: 42 calls her "the Queen of the South." She may have been a descendant of Sheba, Abraham's grandson by Keturah. Arabian legends give her the name of Bilkis or Yelkamah, queen of the Himyarites.

C. H. B., Kansas City, Mo. Where is Cyrene, the home of Simon (Matt. 27: 32)?

Cyrene was the capital of Cyrenaica, a country lying west of Egypt, and now included in Tripoli, which Italy recently conquered from the Turks. It was a Greek colony, founded in the seventh century B. C. It had at the time of Christ a large Jewish population. Its ruins cover a large extent of ground on a high plateau ten miles from the Mediterranean Sea.

S. W., Key West, Fla. From what country did the Gypsies originally come?

When the Gypsies first appeared in England in the fifteenth century, the name Gypsy was given to them by the English people, who believed them to have come from Egypt. The French, by a similar mistake, called them Bohemians. But a careful study of this race, and especially of their language, shows that they came originally from India. The Gypsy language is derived from the Sanskrit as are the other Aryan languages of India. A similar error was made by the English when they called a distinctively American bird a turkey, under the impression that it was an importation from the Ottoman Empire, and by the French when they called the same bird coq d'Inde, believing that it came from India.

Mrs. M. E. S., Newberg, Ore. It is useless to speculate on such possibilities just now.

The Christian Herald

CHRISTMAS NUMBER

AN ILLUSTRATED
NEWS WEEKLY
FOR THE HOME

Salonica, the "Coveted City"

By ELON JESSUP

The sleeper had trailed turned the stooped to Once David
the door in
"Why d he demanc
ened in th
She face
"Why c

AT a very early hour one morning last summer, four bedraggled individuals emerged from a stateroom three decks below the main deck of the Greek steamer "Espirus," running from Piræus to Salonica. The accommodations had been abominable; the heat and air intolerable. "Fine boat for Arctic exploration," remarked Jones. Five or six hours of travel through the glassy seas of the Aegean, past the multitudes of small picturesque islands for which the Greek seacoast is noted, brought us to the outer harbor of Salonica. We could make out the outlines of the old city in the distance, and gradually it assumed a more concrete form. Now the ancient fortress on the top of the hill and the old city walls could be distinguished; many needlelike minarets pierced the sky; here and there a mosque was seen; quaint sailing craft were coming under our bows. We now realized that the Greece which we were approaching was totally different from the one we had left in Athens.

The engines were stopped, the anchor dropped, and we looked over the rail to the water below. Myriads of small boats swarmed about as bees around a hive. Upon the gangway being lowered, boatmen by the dozens shoved, pushed and shouted their way up. Over the rail they scrambled, each in Greek and broken French explaining the excellence of his particular boat. For such is the primitive method employed in Salonica for the disembarkment of the amazed traveler and his baggage today.

We had been told to watch our baggage, and we appreciated the wisdom of the advice when three rough-appearing individuals spying it at the same time made a concerted dash for it. With like agility three of our party encircled the coveted baggage, and for some minutes a hand-to-hand encounter seemed imminent. Finally a bargain was struck with one, and the others disappeared. Down the rickety gangway we lugged our possessions, each step holding possibilities for a plunge of man and baggage into the water below.

Safe in the boat, a row of twenty-five yards brought us to the dock, where a throng of street urchins, hotel runners, officials by the score, and beggars welcomed us with open arms. One small barefooted, ragged wreck of a man seemed to possess a proprietary interest in my baggage, for he sat upon it and refused to be moved. By various gesticulations he made known his desire to carry it, and at last I motioned him to proceed. Up on his back with lightning speed went my three heavy suit-cases and off he trotted—not walked—every inch of the way to the hotel.

THE hotel had an oddity of construction and general air quite different from any hotel that we had ever been in. In the center of the building, indoors, was a large open space reaching to the roof. On each floor were numerous balconies looking down upon the first floor, which was used as a visiting room. A little curiosity on our part brought forth the information that the building dated back to the days of Turkish possession, when it had been the residence of a wealthy Turk. In those days, when visitors were received on the first floor, the numerous wives of the Turk were allowed to remain concealed behind the various small balconies.

We hunted up a sidewalk café and between bites gazed in wonderment on our surroundings. We were in the Rue Venizelos, one of the few wide thoroughfares in the city in spite of the fact that it was less than 200 yards in length. But in that short street we encountered a crowd of such denseness as to make passing well nigh impossible. Tables reached over the sidewalk on each side and well out into the street, down the center of which ran a narrow aisle through which the crowd elbowed its way. Underfoot was a rusted trolley track and overhead the useless wires. We learned that the café devotees had strongly objected to the presence of a trolley in their favorite haunts, with the result that it had been taken off. One block away was the waterfront, where an equally strong throng filled the street to overflowing, and where the trolley ran unassailed.

SALONICA has been called the "Coveted City." Though kn little of its tumultuous history the many strange types passing thr the streets were evidence to us of the significance of th title; that co politan throng represented the history of the city as i d not be d in books. For Salonica is one of the oldest cities in the d in snow. Within, by have been as sought after by as many different races. Ald was capering joyously the city, all who had desired it, were represented in l with toys.

saw on our first night there. Next day and with toys. follow we learned much of Saloper!" he shouted. "It's types and tumultuous his my stocking! It's full city of the ages, preached Christianity. Early in the morning we walked along the waterfront, passing many picturesque ships at anchor; these craft might have been the ships of Columbus, so similar were they in construction. On we walked, and finally we came to the "White Tower," a high, circular, forbidding-appearing structure, formerly used as a fortress, and often called the bloodiest spot in Europe. Here, during the days of Turkish possession, the bodies of murdered Christians were hung over the parapets and dropped into the waters below. This gruesome spot is now used as a barracks by the Greek army.

Salonica, from Water Edge to Crest

Soon we came on the Triumphal Arch of Alexander, one of the many precious monuments in the city. On the sides of the arch are written in terms of art the varied history of the city, for here may be seen the work of Egyptians, Greeks, Romans, and Turks. The same is true of the old city wall. We would come upon a Roman arch embellished by the work of the Turk.

Now we were climbing up the narrow and mazelike streets to the old fortress on the hilltop—through one of the oldest sections of the city, now given over to Turks and Turkish Gipsies. A walk through the section is much like finding one's way through a heavily timbered forest—all sense of direction seems gone. There is no central thoroughfare; one simply follows the winding lanes and trusts to good fortune to get him out. There is an ever present air of mystery about. Interminable stone walls there are, with occasional boarded gateways. On many of these gates we noticed crescents painted in white paint; occasionally we saw a cross painted in the same manner. Later we learned that such was the manner of distinguishing Christians and Mohammedans.

Although curious to learn something of the lives being lived behind those blank walls, we were kept in utter darkness. Occasionally a small gate would be silently opened and a heavily veiled woman carrying a water picher, and dressed severely in black from head to foot, would emerge. Silently and quickly the gate would be closed, the old air of mystery again enveloping the scene. And then we would come upon a picturesque group around one of the old wells. Some of these wells which are crumbling away to dust are gems of art. About them would be gathered women doing washing or a Turk accompanied by numerous wives.

ON the summit of the hill is the ancient fortress. This has been crudely reconstructed in places and is now used by the Greeks as a civil prison. We respectfully saluted a dapper Greek officer and attempted to make known our desire to enter. English and gesticulations were unavailing and we had about given up hope when a Greek soldier who had lived in the United States appeared and cleared up the difficulty. He welcomed us as brother countrymen; wished to know all about Boston, Pittsburg, Chicago. Now he was speaking to his officer in rather aggressive tones, and shortly we were ushered in.

Continued on page 1304

tainty and obscurity about the because the mysterious facts t stand for are so vaguely und For instance, the two Latir animus and spiritus are rather distinguish, except that animi ordinarily for the life shared by and man alike, while spiritus m was unk tholic Chure titution, but o Rome, as authority a ven then t e industriou

e in a mann ultimate use power It w tury, when t efinitely esta e was gradual church. T under Grego
tholic Churc
nization whi

Angels and Ministers of Grace--

Florence Morse Kingsley

S NOW had been falling since early morning—fine, hard crystals driven dizzily to earth before a roaring north wind. Already the rutted road in front of the house had disappeared beneath the drift; the trees, wrenched in the blast, bowed like gray ghosts hopeless of the morrow. Twenty feet away from the window (where the child had been standing for more than an hour) it was difficult to distinguish objects, so thick and fast came the whirling snow-mist. At noon a pallid radiance had marked the passage of the shrouded sun; but now, as the hands of the noisy little nickel clock marked the hour of three, the storm stooped close and dark, like vast, brooding wings shutting out the waning day.

The child at the window was talking busily to himself; but the woman, intent upon setting a patch in a ragged little pinafore, was not listening. She was thinking, instead, hard, bitter thoughts of the past; terrified, despairing thoughts of the future.

"An' nen he'll come home!" chirruped the child, his voice rising shrilly, "an' he'll bwing us bofe somefin' nice. An' nen—an' nen we'll bofe be glad!"

The woman straightened her bent shoulders with a sigh.

"It's 'most too dark to sew any longer," she told herself.

The child's yellow head bobbed about excitedly. "I fought I saw him comin'," he explained, turning his small eager face toward his mother.

"Saw who?" she demanded harshly.

"My—my faver; he's goin' t' bwing me somefin'; he—pwomised!"

The woman's lip curled contemptuously.

"Your father promised you, did he? Well, then he'll be sure to do it. Come over to the fire, Davie. Why, you're frozen, child; your hands are like ice! If you should get sick on top of everything else—Lord, Lord!"

She stooped to mend the dull fire, pushing the half burned sticks together and adding others from the box in the corner.

"The wood's 'most gone," she muttered. "It's been bad enough all along; but now with everything buried in snow—Davie! don't go back to that window; you'll freeze, I tell you!"

She dropped to her knees and began chafing the cold little hands in both her own.

"What's got into you, child?" she asked. "Yesterday you ran and hid when you saw him coming. Good thing you did, too!"

Her tone was bitter, like the bitter wind, whining hungrily about the lonely house.

The child's face upturned to hers wore a wise, angelic smile.

"It's a secwet," he announced triumphantly. "Faver an' me talked about it, when you was down stairs. But you never guessed, did you, muver? It's Cwis'mas t'morrow!"

"Christmas!" cried the woman, aghast. "Christmas! And he told you—he promised—?"

The little boy nodded confidently.

"Faver's goin' t' bwing us bofe—"

She caught the child to her lean breast and held him fast, painful sobs wrenching her throat.

"Oh! Davie, Davie!" she moaned. "Oh, my baby, my poor little baby!"

The besieging snow hissed stealthily against the pane. The wind swept past with a wailing clamor.

The child stirred in her close embrace.

"An' faver said—he said he wouldn't, muver—not today. He said, 'Help me God, Davie, I won't!'"

"If he should hurt you again—Davie, Davie!"

"My faver pwomised," cried the child, very loud and clear. "It's—Cwis'mas!"

The woman was staring fixedly at the darkening window, her great eyes wide and bright.

"If he comes home drunk and hurts you again," she said, in a slow, hard voice, "I shall kill him!"

She got slowly to her feet and set a bowl and spoon upon the table. "Come, Davie boy; you must eat your supper and go to bed." Between set teeth she added: "Let him dare!"

HALF an hour later she stood listening before the closed door of the little bedroom where the child slept. Behind the hearth dangled a small, limp stocking. She had not the heart to refuse him when he begged her to put it there.

"Faver said he'd bwing us bofe somefin' nice 'n'—'n' faver said Santa Claus fin's little boys stockin's—when they're good boys, an' fill 'em full wiv candy 'n' oranges 'n'—'n' wec mittens."

She could hear the sleepy little voice still crooning over the imagined joys of the morrow.

"An' nen I'll get up, 'n' the sun'll be shinin' 'n' my faver he'll say, 'Mewwy Cwis'mas, Davie!' 'n' nen I'll fin' my stockin', 'n' it'll be full way up t' th' top."

She suppressed the anguished groan that rose to her lips. How like David to fill the child's head with impossible notions! The time was when she, too, had hung trustfully on the glowing utterances of David Thurston's ready tongue. What had he not promised her, since the day when she yielded herself happily to his first lover's kiss?

"I'm not a rich man, Edith; perhaps I never shall be," he had said. "But I'll work hard for you, dear, and I swear I'll make you happy!"

And she had been happy—for how long? Her weary thoughts went back to the cozy cottage, with its fresh new furnishings, where Davie—little Davie—had first opened his blue eyes to the sunshine.

"We'll buy this house, little woman," David had proposed confidently. "There's your five hundred, you know; that'll make the payment down, and we can easily save enough to meet the balance in five years' time."

The five years of David's cheerful prophecy had passed; in retrospect it seemed a painful age. She pressed her fingers over her aching eyes in a vain effort to shut out the vision of those days and nights of anguished disillusionment. The little dream-house had long since passed into the hands of strangers; but not before she knew the truth about David. Not before she had learned to fear the sound of his uncertain step on the stair, to dread the fumbling of his hand at their chamber door, to loathe the sickening odor of his breath.

The sleepy little voice within the closed room had trailed off into silence. Mechanically she turned the key, withdrew it from the lock and stooped to hide it beneath a loosened brick. Once David had caught her in the act of opening the door in the morning.

"Why do you lock the little chap in, Edith?" he demanded. "If he should be sick or frightened in the night—"

She faced him with hatred in her eyes. "Why do I lock him in?" she mocked him. "Do you ask me that, David Thurston, after what happened?—you know when."

The man flung up his nerveless hand as if to ward off a blow.

"My God, Edith! don't look at me like that!" he begged. "I never meant to hurt the boy. I—I swear I wouldn't harm a hair of his head. You know I wouldn't!"

She stood at the window, staring out into the storm, while one shameful memory crowded another, pitilessly, persistently, like the hissing snow against the pane.

Then all at once she saw him. He was wading slowly and painfully through the drift, staggering a little as the wind smote him.

INSTINCTIVELY she drew back, biting her white lips till the blood came. Would his intoxication take its wonted form of maniacal fury? or, more hateful, more to be dreaded still, would he seek to lavish upon her helplessness the maudlin passion of the drunkard?

Across the open gate the snow had flung a mighty drift, its edges curling, breaking and streaming in icy spindrift far into the night. The man in his uncertain progress toward the house paused before this flimsy rampart, as if dazed to find it there.

The woman beat her close fists against her breast. "Ah, you're afraid of it!" she muttered. "And now you're looking for a light in the window. But I'll light no more candles for you, David Thurston!"

The wind shrieked past, sweeping the snow in a blinding cloud from the shaggy evergreens beside the path. When she could see once more, he had fallen to his knees and was struggling to rise with slow, awkward movements. Now he was up again, battling with the drift!

Was that his voice—calling her? "Edith! Edith!" Or was it only the shout of the wind, as it lashed the groaning trees?

"My God! He—can't get up!"

She crouched at the sill, her eyes fixed and glassy. The dark huddled figure at the gate floundered feebly; flung out its arms thrice, like a spent swimmer; then the drift broke over it, its foam-white edges streaming away into the dark.

WITHOUT sound, without motion, the woman stared intently at the drift. Presently (she was thinking stupidly) David would rise; he was a strong man. He would rise, shake off the snow and rush for the unbarred door. She had never yet locked the door of their home against David; despite the recurrent horrors of his home-coming she could never bring herself to that. The wind, grown playful now, wrought a fanciful arabesque along the margin of the drift. She watched it intently as it advanced and retreated in long curving lines of beauty. There was a dark spot (his coat-sleeve, perhaps) visible for a long time. The wind covered it softly, then capriciously swept it bare, again and yet again. Once she thought she saw it stir.

Something was buzzing dully in the back of her brain. She strove to stop watching the mad sport of the wind and the drift long enough to listen. It said itself over and over, in short, plain sentences, as one would endeavor to reach the wandering attention of a child.

"It is—cold. If David lies there long enough—It is—cold. It is growing colder—colder!"

A whimpering voice broke into low, rapid speech. She did not know it for her own.

"I—didn't do it, God! It's not my fault! If he hadn't been drinking— If he'd kept his word to Davie— In the morning we'll go away—Davie and I, and he'll never hurt us any more. . . . Oh, my God! I'm free! I'm free!"

All at once the dream changed.—It was a dream; she knew that now.

David was coming through the gate; it was a warm spring day, and the wind shook down showers of cherry blossoms on his dark head as he hurried up the walk. How strong and handsome he was, she thought pridefully, as she stood in the door of the little house to welcome him. Davie was in the dream, too—a wee bit of a fellow, toddling about in absurd little baggy trousers of pink gingham. They saved his white dresses so, she was explaining to her husband as he swung their small son to his shoulder. Then all three passed in at the open door, and the dream blurred. She struggled to make it clear again; and found herself alone in a freezing room. It was night, and the fire was dying in white ashes upon the hearth. From somewhere, a great way off, David was trying to come to her.

"David! David!"

She tore at the drift, clawing at it with both hands like a mad woman, her breath coming in great strangling sobs.

"David! Oh, David!"

SHE never knew how she dragged him to the house, rousing at last a faint flicker of life before the fireless hearth. He opened his eyes. They were clear and deep; the eyes of David Thurston in his first youth.

"I wasn't—" he murmured. "Edith! you'll believe me this time?"

She was hurriedly piling dry brushwood among the embers; a blaze leaped up and the poor little room burst into rosy light.

She bent over him, her face beautiful as a Madonna's beneath the heavy masses of loosened hair.

"David! David!" she crooned, pressing his head against her breast. All the bitter past seemed swept away in the passion of that embrace.

"I promised the little chap I'd bring him something," the tired voice went on. "It's Christmas, you know. Poor girl, I guess you'd forgotten it. I tramped about in the snow a long time, trying to find a job. At last I got it, unloading freight. I hadn't eaten since morning, and I was about all in. When they paid me—I thought— It seemed to me I must—you don't know how a man feels, when—"

"Hush!" she whispered. "Drink this!"

She held a cup of hot milk to his lips, and he drank deep.

"I—I seemed to see the little chap's face, all bright and smiling—and I couldn't. Somebody—the man who paid me—laughed behind my back. 'Two dollars'll buy a lot of cheap whisky,' he said. And then I seemed to see myself, as that man was seeing me—as the little chap has seen me many a time; and you—Edith, if you hadn't found me, I'd been dead by morning, and you'd never have known I wasn't drunk; but only tired. Lord! how tired I was; my feet weighed a ton. I looked for a light, but—"

She cried out at that, an exceeding loud and bitter cry, and hid her shamed face upon his breast.

"In my pocket," he was saying drowsily, "you'll find the toys for the little fellow's stocking. Put them in, will you, dear? So he'll find them—in the—morning."

THERE never was such a Christmas day as that which dawned after the great storm. On the outskirts of the village smoke was ascending from the chimney of a small, weather-beaten house, half buried in snow. Within, by the warm hearth, a child was capering joyously about, his hands filled with toys.

"It's Cwis'mas, faver!" he shouted. "It's Cwis'mas, muver! See my stocking! It's full way up t' the top!"

Sudden tears brimmed the eyes of the woman who watched him. She caught the child in a quick embrace, hiding her face in his yellow curls.

"My faver pwomised," the eager little voice went on, "an' he tomed home, 'n' bwoght us bofe somefin' nice, when I was asleep; didn't he, muver?"

The man drew mother and child into his arms.

"I did promise you, Davie," he said slowly.

"And—I kept my word."

His hand sought and found his wife's. "I know what you're thinking, Edith," he said gravely; "God knows I've given you cause. But this time you needn't be afraid. I—believe the old David Thurston died out there in the drift."

She broke into a piteous, inarticulate cry.

"When I fell I seemed to see your sad, accusing eyes—looking at me. After that I—dreamed. We were in our own little house again, and Davie, here, was a baby— What is it, dear?"

She was sobbing wildly.

"So when I awoke and found that you had saved me— Stop crying, dear. It's all over now. It's all over!"

It was little Davie who brought back smiles to their lips. He scrambled briskly down from his mother's arms and blew a resounding blast upon a scarlet trumpet which glittered bravely in the sunshine.

"Cwis'mas, muver!" he shouted. "Mewwy Cwis'mas, faver!"

So those two—the man and the woman, who had been as dead and were now mercifully made alive again, looked into each other's eyes with new hope and courage.

"Believe in me, Edith, and love me!" he whispered. "We'll go away from this place and begin a new life with the New Year."

He must have forgiven her had she doubted. But her soul had been washed clean of fear and bitterness in the dark hours of the night that was past. And she knew, beyond a peradventure, that Love stoops near and close, ready to save, even to the uttermost.

The GOD of HOPE

A Christmas Sermon

By Rev. Charles L. Slattery D.D.*

TEXT: Rom. 15: 13. "Now the God of hope fill you with all joy and peace in believing."

WE hasten, in mind and heart, this Christmas morning, to Bethlehem. We imagine ourselves as those trembling, excited shepherds, who pushing back the rude door of the cattle-shed, looked down into the face of the infant Saviour. We try to think their thoughts after them. They must have clasped their hands in reverent awe; so we clasp our hands, and, in hushed whisperings, tell one another how good it is that the long-expected Christ-child has come. "For centuries," we cry, "O Holy Child of Bethlehem, the world has been waiting thy coming; and now, O joy! thou art come! All our hopes are met in thee!"

Aye! there it is! Christmas-day reveals God as the God of hope. Men had been merry and successful, but inevitably into the life of each one at last came sorrow and failure. -Oh, it was all so bitter! Men had felt God's presence behind the seeming world; but they could not understand why he allowed them to come to such trouble. "God does not care!" they said again and again. At last they became aware of a dim and radiant Voice out of the vast unknown. "I will show you," said the Voice, "that God does care. I will show you what God's love for poor wandering, stumbling, falling mankind is. It is so intense, so real, that God himself—Maker and Ruler of all—will come into the life of One Man and live out his supreme character in the life of that One Man. He will become man—he will show the world that he cares to the uttermost."

Oh, what a hope it was! A great man here and there caught the accents of the Voice from the depths of light and thrilled all who heard his witness. The hope grew. It changed. It passed to finer phases. It was always a greater, a holier, a happier hope. And at last, after generations had gone to their graves with the hope unfulfilled, Christ was born in Bethlehem. Generations of Jewish maidens had led lives of brilliant goodness, hoping that to them might come the unspeakable honor of being the mother of the Messiah. At last Mary—beautiful and poor and good—knew that her child was the Chosen of God. At last a few shepherds, representatives for all time of a busy and longing humanity, were bidden to go to Bethlehem and to see God's answer to all the hopes which he had kindled in human hearts all along the ages. They went with great gladness—and they found a poor, helpless babe in a humble manger. Where were the signs of majesty and pomp? Nothing there save poverty and cold and spotless goodness and love—and the divine Son of God! God—the God of hope!

Think of the hopes that were then and there fulfilled. First, dare to feel the stupendous Christmas fact. Dare to take into your hearts the joy and peace of believing that God really was enshrined in a special and unique way in the Christ-child of Bethlehem. God, longing to be one with us: God loving us enough for that. Not merely longing—but becoming one with us. To live our life just as we live it. To have friends as we have friends. To meet our friends as we meet them. To have pain as we have pain; to fail as we fail. To have the agony of sorrow as we have the agony of sorrow; to love as we love—to love and to be unable to do what love would do. Grasp it; try, at least, to grasp it. Sorrow, pain, failure still are mysteries—but it is mightily significant that he who allows them to be, undertook them all in the life of that Christ who, as on this day, was born in Bethlehem. He is one with us. Not Lord, Master, King—but our Brother—ourselves!

* Rector of Grace Church, New York.

It is the thoroughness of that oneness with humanity which staggers imagination. God was never content, having made us, to help us from a distance. He was never content merely to say soothing words, either through his messengers or directly to the solitary heart. He was never content merely to explain and justify the order of his universe; nothing could satisfy him till he had come so close to our humanity that God and man were one—till he had gone to the lowest depth of human experience, till he had risen to the heights of human experience, till he had felt, not as God, but as man, the nooks and crannies of human experience in every single direction, till he made us know, by his own touch, that God is our God—a God who cares for all our joys and failures and griefs, because, as a Man, he knows how man is glad and downcast and in despair. This God is our God for ever and ever.

WHO would not like to believe that? "Oh, do I not long to believe it?" a man involuntarily exclaims. "How it would satisfy the pain that gnaws at the heartstrings! How it would put confidence and strength into the hand! But how dare I believe it?" Yes, it is sublime, superb audacity to believe it. But Christmas-day comes to say that you may believe it. The force which lies behind and above the powers of earth and humanity has deigned to enter a finite experience. Take that fact whole on Christmas-day. Do not be afraid to take God at his word. Let no one attempt to pare down the bold story, to satisfy the dullness of some plodding unimaginative person who chances to be passing. Believe it all with its divine splendor.

I yield to no one in a keen desire to be rational. I am glad to sift and weigh and try. I am glad to keep my two feet planted firmly on the earth; but while I stand there, I am not going to confine my attention to the sticks and stones that lie so near that I may touch them. I am going to look off into the illimitable blue above me: I am going to take account of the facts millions of miles away. Never shall it be enough for me and those I love that two and two make four, that iron is heavier than cotton, that the diamond is harder than the emerald; but I am going to take into my life the greater, finer, more glorious facts—the facts of poetry and music and religion. Above all, I am going to believe that God loves man as much as Jesus, who was born in Bethlehem, showed that he loved him when, having been cradled in a mean and lowly manger, he straightway lived out the divine life with all the dignity and simplicity of a perfect love. No; tell me that there is nothing in the wire when your message throbs through it; tell me that there is no life in the flower when, of a summer morning, it throws open its petals and blooms into a sparkling loveliness; tell me that there are no stars in the sky, but what we think to be stars are only tawdry reflections of our street lamps; tell me that, when your child throws his arms about your neck and whispers his affection in your ear, he is only a senseless automaton—tell me all these half-hearted questionings of invincible truths, but never, never be caught in the bird-witted timidity which would minimize or diminish the transcendent fact of Christmas-day. Dare to believe it. Let your mind be as nimble as your heart. For this henceforth is what the world means—the world which is so crowded with bitterness beating upon mirth, with hate besieging even the fastnesses of love, with pain driving away all comfort: it means love—ultimate and final love, catching up all that is sorrowful and doubtful and transmuting it at last into joy—love enthroned supreme in the heart of the mightiest, God himself—love so real, so deep, so true, that God became man for our sakes.

God, in the hearts of trembling, fearful men, planted hope—a hope beyond imagining. God fulfilled that hope on Christmas-day.

YES, all the hopes of an aspiring antiquity were gathered into the birth of Christ. God is thereby proved to be the God of hope; and because that greatest of all possible hopes has been fulfilled we may dare to believe that all the little hopes which quiver in our own hearts may also be fulfilled, the hopes about our future, the perplexing tomorrow, the years to come, the world hereafter. If God gives hopes, and we know that he does give them, he will also give answers.

And not only will God give men the answers to their hopes, but he will give better answers than men could possibly in their wildest moments have expected. For think again of the Christmas story. The shepherds, looking down into the child's face in the Bethlehem manger, doubtless expected that in a few years this child, grown a man, would lead the armies of Israel to the conquest of a world empire which should make the empire of Rome an insubstantial bit of tinsel in comparison. It seemed to them a wild and daring hope—and so it was. Was the hope answered? Yes, surely. There was an empire started. Even in our day it has outlived the proudest empires of the world. But it was an empire so much greater than the shepherds hoped to see that their most extravagant dreams could not have even touched it. For if it was good to follow a soldier like Alexander or Caesar, what was it to follow a soldier like Christ? No noise of battle, no triumphal processions; but quiet, magnificent victory—and victory that could know no defeat,—a conquest not of men's bodies, but of their hearts, their souls. Men shouted in admiration for such generals as Alexander; for Christ, the poor Galilean, there was a feeling too deep for any words. He was not only Master and King, he was Brother and Lover; He entered into the lives of his men and he bade them enter into his life. When Alexander was dead, his empire evaporated. People wondered, praised; but no one followed Alexander. Christ has been vanished from men's sight these nineteen centuries. Yet today the efficient men of the civilized world bow down before his name and say that they live in him, that he lives in them—that therefore they are able to do what they do, to be what they are. Had the shepherds said, "This poor baby, born in a manger, will be the Alexander of Palestine," the world would have laughed at the vain fanaticism of a too ardent hope. The shepherds did hope it. How was their hope answered? By a King who is for all time King of kings. By a conqueror of nations, but a conqueror also of the most untamed of all things—the human heart. God gave then. God gives always, better answers than men ever in their most exalted moments dare to hope for.

HOPE is the word for this Christmas-day! Hope beyond all reason, therefore hope for enormous blessings to you and yours and to the world, hope with almost insane aggressiveness; and then be confident that the Lord God who holds us all as in the hollow of his hand, and who loves us, will out-top the proudest and largest of our visions. It is God's nature to do so. He is the God of hope.

Sometimes you hear advisers of youth cautiously approaching their young friends with words like these: "You," they say

Cont'd on page 1314

Daily Meditation

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR. LED BY

J. H. JOWETT, D.D., F. B. MEYER, D.D., REV. E. WHITTIER CASWELL AND CLAYTON SEDGWICK COOPER

Unto the Lord

SUNDAY, December 26. Rom. 14: 8. "Whether we live, we live unto the Lord." I am recalling two very strong and gracious testimonies which were paid to the life and character of the late Bishop Westcott. One was by Archdeacon Boutflower: "In the presence of the Unseen, Westcott met all life, and you could not surprise him out of it." And the other was by Canon Scott-Holland: "He read and worked in the very mind in which he prayed." Both testimonies are concerned with the same experience. Bishop Westcott conveyed to his friends the moving suggestion of the divine presence, because he lived continually in conscious and all-controlling communion with God. When he passed from one thing to another there was no change of atmosphere. Nay, there was no change of spiritual posture; the mood in which he studied was the mood in which he prayed. His religious life was not a bundle of shreds and patches. It was a garment woven throughout, and without seam. If you came upon him unawares the mystic influence was not absent. You could not "surprise him out of it."

Arnold of Rugby said in one of his letters that he was very much dissatisfied with his religious life, because he realized such a change in spirit and attitude when he passed from his private devotions to the common affairs and business of the school. And that is a dissatisfaction which is shared by a host of Christian believers. We leave something behind when we leave our chamber. The spirit of worship is not regnant in our work. We do not pray without ceasing. Here and there in life there is a burning bush; but the entire forest is not aflame with the glory of the Lord. We go to service occasionally; life is not a ceaseless worship.

And yet our Father seeks unbroken communion with his children. He would have us meet everything in the fellowship of the unseen Friend. In his light we are to see light. Everything is to be viewed in the light of his countenance. The unfailing sense of his presence makes life a continual consecration. We are always at worship, and the whole world becomes the temple of the Lord. J. H. J.

The Faith to Ask Great Things

MONDAY, December 27. Isa. 54: 1-8. "Thy Maker is thy husband." This announcement is borne out by Rom. 7: 4 and Eph. 5: 31, 32. Suppose that a wealthy and distinguished man contracts a marriage with a poor girl of another level of society. On their first entrance on their new joint life, we can imagine him calling her to his side, and saying that he has placed a certain sum to her credit in the bank, at the same time giving her a check-book, the checks of which had already been signed by his own hand. He explains that her signature alone is needed, and that she is at liberty to fill in to an almost fabulous amount. After a month has elapsed, he asks her how it is that the money standing to her credit has been so slightly affected by her drawings. It is not that she has no need, for he is well aware that her own people have made considerable demands. How then is the balance almost unimpaired? She replies that she could not expect him to meet such a constant drain on his generosity. Is he satisfied? Is he pleased? Does not his love feel that its purposes have been misunderstood? He is somewhat sick at heart. She does not yet realize how he loves, or what he would do, or how desirous he is that every care and desire should be entirely met.

This is an obvious illustration of Christ's relationship to us. He is our Maker, Creator, Redeemer, Husband, Lord and Master. All things are committed to him of the Father. As our Trustee and Co-Heir to the property, he encourages us to ask great things. Does it not hurt him that we avail ourselves of his unsearchable riches to so small a degree? F. B. M.

The Uplifting Power of God's Peace

TUESDAY, December 28. Phil. 4: 7. "And the peace of God which passeth all understanding shall guard your hearts and your thoughts in Christ Jesus." There is a sense in which we can explain our religion to others and there is another sense in which our religious experience is inexplicable in words. It

"passeth all understanding." There are some successes of our lives that we can account for by our cleverness or our own work; there are others that seem to come down upon us in a mysterious manner, surprising us as an unexpected guest. Paul speaks of the peace of God as resembling these unaccountable things that cannot be quite understood—a thing that defies explanation on natural principles, something apart from our own natural resources, a supernatural gift. These are elements of our supernatural natures that link us with invisible chains to something uncalculated, immeasurable, bearing us on their wings into the realms where reason is dumb and the soul is speechless.

This is the religious experience of which the apostle speaks. He calls it a peace that passeth all understanding. It is a result that no creed or no dogma can clarify; it is the evidence of God-like realities in the midst of time and sense. No sensible man or woman can but wish to experience such moments, for they are like windows through which for an instant at least we catch glimpses of the "trailing clouds of glory," through which we have come from God, "which is our home." How shall we be able to multiply such divine moments, which take the sting out of sadness and give a new spring to our lives? Paul gives us a hint in the preceding verse: "In nothing be anxious; but in everything by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving let your requests be made known unto God." C. S. C.

The Complex Unity of God's Church

WEDNESDAY, December 29. John 17: 14-26. "That they all may be one, as thou, Father, art in me." The unity of the Church has for its model that of the Trinity. God is one, and yet in his holy being there are differences of function; just as in the human individual there are in the one personality the varieties of spirit, soul, and body. In the Church, therefore, we may expect to meet outstanding varieties, which do not for a moment hinder its essential oneness. The body is one, but has many members; the tree is one, but from the anchoring root to the acorn at the bough-top there is a perfect maze of differences in structure, organization, and function; the elemental chord of a noble musical composition is one, but the varieties are almost infinite.

So with the Church of the Living God. She is one because there is one Head, one redeeming Act, one Life, one Spirit, one Faith, one Hope, and one Ultimate Flock, to which the many folds contribute their contingents; but when we descend to organization or the expression of truth, we encounter a bewildering variety—the Episcopalian and the Salvationist, the Methodist and the Baptist, the Presbyterian and the Friend! But we may be thankful for each of these. The truth of Christ is so great that it can be comprehended from no single standpoint. The person of our Lord is so many-sided that all saints must be called to help us to comprehend the length, breadth, depth and height of his love. The four-dimension people must teach the three-dimension what otherwise they would fail to perceive; but we are all one in him. F. B. M.

The Spirit of Brotherhood in Man

THURSDAY, December 30. II Sam. 9: 13. "So Mephibosheth dwelt in Jerusalem; for he did eat continually at the king's table. And he was lame in both his feet." Mephibosheth was the deformed son of Jonathan, the friend of David. After David became king in the place of Saul, and the dear friend of his youth, Jonathan, who was Saul's son, had died, King David said: "Is there yet any that is left of the house of Saul, that I may show him kindness for Jonathan's sake?" They went out and found this poor, crippled son of Jonathan, and the king gave him a place at his own table, and furthermore restored him all the land of Saul his grandfather.

It was one of the great, magnanimous acts in the life of David, and it made him one of the first humanitarians of his race. By this act he became a pioneer in the great future age of human brotherhood; he said to his time, "A broken body is no reason to despise the dignity of a human soul."

We in this later age have gone on past David. We have stretched out the hands of help and succor to all sorts of the world's "broken earthenware," not merely because these maimed and deformed sons of men were relatives of our friends, but because we have seen in them the image of the same God, though marred, whose likeness we bear. Our countless homes and hospitals and charities are larger reflections of pity and love shown to the Mephibosheths of our nation.

What does it mean? It means that we see in the drunkard, in the halt and the blind, even in the criminal, something that awaits the redemption of the body, something that has never had a chance to express itself. We see the man behind his infirmity. This is Christian. This is following in the steps of the Great Physician. This is a strain of that divine pity that exists as the perfect music in the heart of God. We love others because he first loved us. C. S. C.

The Unchanging One

FRIDAY, December 31. II Tim. 2: 1-13. "If we believe not, yet he remaineth faithful; for he cannot deny himself." There is vast comfort in these words, which end such noble clauses—part, apparently, of one of the early hymns of the Church. Faith is the sixth sense. It combines our five senses, and is the eye, ear, nose, taste and touch of the soul toward God and the spirit-world; the key to all the riches of Christ, the leverage of prayer, the pass-key into all the chambers of the divine palace. All things are possible to the soul that believes. It is the appropriating grace. Coleridge calls it the affirmation and the act which makes eternal truth be fact. Faith walks the waves, and goes through the flood with dry foot, laughs at impossibilities and cries, "It shall be done."

But in all lives there seem to be lapses of faith, owing to a variety of causes. We have ceased to feed on God's Word, or have shrunk from some obvious duty, or have excused ourselves, or like Elijah when he fled from Jezebel, we have allowed the menacing difficulties of our life to shut out the present power of God. Sometimes, as in the case of the noble Baptist, when he sent from his prison to assure himself that Jesus was the Christ, the depression of our circumstances masters us. What then? During these hours or days are we to believe that we are excluded from all participation in God's saving health? No; when we lie at his feet, sighing "I would, but I cannot, believe that thou canst do this or that for me," our Father stoops over us and says, "Remember the great and precious promises of my Word. I cannot run back from them, for I am the Unchanging One. I will still be Faithful, and perform all that I have said." Then all suddenly faith comes back in flood-tide and we cry: "Lord, forgive me: I believe, help thou my unbelief." F. B. M.

A New Year's Song of Praise

SATURDAY, January 1, 1916. Ps. 103: 2. "Bless the Lord, O my soul, and forget not all his benefits."

"There's not the smallest orb which thou beholdest,
But in his motion like an angel sings."

If all the universe of nature is resonant with harmonies to heaven, shall man be silent? Shall the heart of him who is a little lower than the angels be out of tune with the music of the spheres, the birds, the zephyrs, and the great chorus of creation?

In the opening days of another new year, may we not all join in the psalm of praise to the Highest for all his benefits? Let us think of divine forgiveness, of life crowned with loving-kindness and tender mercies, of sorrows comforted, of needs supplied, of hopes inspired and of glory promised. We are entering upon another year of research and discovery among the unsearchable riches of Christ. Our hearts should beat in harmony with all the melodies of righteousness and truth. Poetry and music are the grand mediums of expression of the emotions of gratitude and thanksgiving to God for his creativeness, care and comfort during another year. When, like the psalmist, we are musing about God's goodness, the fire of love mounts upon wings of holy song, shouting the praises of the Infinite.

The melody of song is the blossoming of our adoration, which is to be followed by abundance of fruitage and faithfulness. Let us therefore, with thanksgiving, celebrate the opening of another Happy New Year. E. W. C.

Our Editorial Forum

PRESIDENT
OTTO KOENIG

MANAGING EDITOR
GEO. H. SANDISON

SECRETARY
THEODORE WATERS

Afterthoughts on the Message

PRETTY nearly everybody has now had time to read the President's message on preparedness. Those who have studied it carefully and discriminatingly, while they find much to approve, have also found not a little to disappoint. Militarists, of course, have criticized it on the ground that, while it has a warlike sound, it is not in any sense such a bellicose document as they had hoped for. According to the President's own declaration, "No one who really comprehends the spirit of the people . . . can fail to perceive that their passion is for peace . . . Great democracies are not belligerent. They do not seek or desire war." Then, in the next paragraph, in submitting his plan for national security against aggression, the President announces: "We will not maintain a standing army, except for uses which are as necessary in times of peace as in times of war, and we shall always see to it that our military peace establishment is no larger than is actually and continuously needed for the uses of days in which no enemies move against us." These words would seem, on the surface at least, to give little hope of the militarists' dream being realized.

On the other hand, the peace element, which the President frankly recognizes as dominant in the nation, finds itself sadly perplexed to reconcile the passages we have quoted from the message with a good deal that follows. "Just because we demand the unmolested development and the undisturbed government of our own lives upon our own principles of right and liberty, we resent, from whatever quarter it may come, the aggression we ourselves will not practice. We insist upon security in prosecuting our self-chosen lines of national development. We do more than that. We demand it also for others." And not ourselves only, he adds, but "all the partisans of liberty on this side of the sea" are to be kept free from outside interference—"set aside as a whole for the uses of independent nations and freemen." All our policies, he declares, grew out of such thoughts. War, therefore, is to be regarded merely as a means of asserting the rights of a people against aggression. Never has it been a mere matter of men and guns. It is a thing of "disciplined might." And the effective factor in such a case he announces to be the formation of a citizen soldiery, 400,000 strong, trained to take care of themselves, and of the government as well, the plan of organization for which he duly sets forth. This, together with an addition of 34,000 men to the regular army, and a comprehensive program for the development of a powerful navy, he offers as the solution of the present situation.

The President is a master of phraseology. He is never more at home than when stating in persuasive terms a syllogism to which he has given careful preparation. But many will be impressed with the conviction that the logic in the message is halting somewhere, and that the whole is set in a lower key than his other addresses. Both the advocates and opponents of preparedness will be likely to regard it as in the nature of a compromise, dictated by political expediency. The new program, if it is designed to put the country on a war footing, will be promptly repudiated by the militarists as altogether inadequate, if European models are to be considered. The peace element can only view it as a lowering of those ideals and principles for which the Administration has stanchly stood until now, and as the beginning of the drift that must logically lead to the ultimate militarization of the nation.

We appreciate the difficulties of the President's position and would not willingly add one word to make them greater. But great as is the temptation to abandon the policy which has served during sixteen months of war, it can only lead to a greater danger. By such a reversal of policy at a time when peace signs abroad multiply, may we not be drawn into complications far more serious than any that have gone before? We believe that in all he has done since the war began the President has been guided by a sincere desire for the nation's welfare. For this very reason, his present departure from the standard he himself has followed is magnified in the minds of his friends, and widely regretted. They confidently looked for a message which would emphasize anew our traditional attitude of conciliation and friendship toward other nations. Such a message would have brought gladness and confidence to many hearts.

After all, it is to Congress we must look for the real definition of the people's desires. It is true, we have had many causes for remonstrance since the war began; but these were unavoidable, and all the neutrals have been similarly affected, some much more acutely than ourselves. Let us hope that what Congress does will be done wisely. Preparedness within reasonable limits, sufficient for the nation's real needs for defense, will doubtless be stoutly antagonized by the military and naval interests, and by the powerful combination of munition-makers who will fight desperately for their pockets. Opposed to them will be able men in both houses, representing the real will of the people, who will maintain that we must look to the future instead of yielding to the importunities of the present—men who will urge the Administration to plan on higher lines for the protection and development of our national interests, the welfare of our people and the maintenance of peaceful relations everywhere. These can be attained, not by surrendering to the clamorous demands of an interested minority, but by wise and judicious legislation, suited to the real needs of this trying time. In the adoption of such a course, Congress and the Administration may depend upon loyal acquiescence and undivided support. Let the people rule!

The Greatest Gift

WHAT am I going to get for Christmas? That is the question just now uppermost in many thousands of minds. Those who are mature enough to have outgrown that question are wondering what those they love best will get, and have been planning strenuously to make Christmas a happy day by giving them what they most wish for.

Suppose now that some one should say: "I will give you the best and gladdest gift in the world for Christmas day," or "I will give all your friends this greatest gift." That would sound like good news, would it not? But it is true news. Precisely this promise is made to every one in the world.

Where, after all, lies the deepest and richest Christmas joy? There is a hint of it in this fact that the time comes when our interest changes from what we are to receive to what our loved ones shall receive. Suppose that love circle could be indefinitely extended, so that the happiness of any and all others would be of greater concern to us than our own. Suppose on Christmas day we and all our friends were to receive the gift of a Loving Heart. Could any gift in the world be greater than that?

This is why Jesus came to Bethlehem. This is why he went to Calvary. That everyone in the world might have a heart full of love.

It seems almost unbelievable that the followers of Jesus have so generally insisted upon forgetting, century after century, what he really came for. We see churchly pomp and churchly wealth and churchly power. We see Christian theologians disputing and Christian denominations wrangling and Christian armies fighting. Meantime the hands of Jesus are outstretched to bless every heart in the world with the gift of Love.

John Wesley was a profound and accurate theologian, a master of the Scriptures and of Christian doctrine, yet he said, in counseling his followers in their search for higher states of grace, that "one seeking anything other than love or anything higher than love goes wide of the mark." Of course he was thinking, too, of the soul's love for God, but he insisted that our highest duty toward both God and man is to love. He knew that we could not love our neighbor practically and effectively until our hearts were thrilled and filled with the love of God. He remembered Jesus' statement of the first and greatest commandment. And he remembered Paul's words: "Love worketh no ill to his neighbor, therefore love is the fulfilling of the law." He preached a "faith that worketh by love." He echoed St. John's demand that "he who loveth God love his brother also."

The gift of a Loving Heart! Who will have it? Who will reject it? Christmas bells and Christmas holly and Christmas music and Christmas laughter all are sweeter and fuller of delight when love is in the heart. "Lady," writing recently to the British people, is quoted by the British Weekly as saying: "It will never do to dispense with decorating our homes at this season. Though we may be feeling very anxious and depressed ourselves, we must be careful that no unnecessary cloud overshadows the bright, expectant little faces." It is pitiful to think of the little tokens of Christmas which the soldiers are arranging in their gloomy trenches this Christmas season. It is pitiful to think of the homes that have been shadowed and the hearts that have been broken by deaths on the battlefield. It is sad to think that in our own land many thousands will spend this glad Christmas season in poverty, hunger and bitter want. Yet the light that will save the world is shining brightly still. It is the light of love. One great Gift, received in one heart after another till all the world has been touched, will dry the tears and fill the needs and dispel the darkness of mankind. It is the gift of a Loving Heart.

When the Christ child knocks at your heart this Christmas time, do not say, because you are busy or burdened or troubled, that there is no room for him. Make room. Accept his heavenly gift of a Loving Heart. Help him in the face of this year's darkness and pain to spread wider and farther than ever before the gift of Love.

A Problem and Its Solution

TWO of our esteemed contemporaries of the religious weekly press have been discussing the question of the advisability of carrying in their columns the advertisement of the Christian Herald. The Watchman-Examiner, a leading Baptist weekly, in its issue of November 18 says:

This autumn we have been carrying in our columns, with most of the other leading denominational papers, an advertisement of the Christian Herald. A stanch friend of the Watchman-Examiner with hot indignation writes: "Who is responsible for the insane policy of advertising in your columns your greatest competitor? I am amazed that you do not see how short-sighted such a policy is." This letter and other inquiries that we have received warrant a few paragraphs explanatory of the relation of the Watchman-Examiner to other religious newspapers.

Our esteemed contemporary then defines the religious and semi-religious press, and, naming the Christian Herald among the interdenominational papers, says:

These papers concern themselves with the larger things of the Kingdom, but in the nature of the case they must eschew the things that concern the doctrine, the polity, and the particular work of the several denominations. They are instructive, illuminating and ennobling. We recognize their value, and we would be glad to see them in the homes of all our Baptist people.

The Living Church (Episcopalian), in its December 4 issue, relates a similar experience. A subscriber has written to that publication criticizing the publisher for accepting our advertisement, and we quote its effective rejoinder:

The Christian Herald is an undenominational religious and secular journal of a high class. The Living Church does not stand for the principle of undenominationalism in religion. If we had the wildest idea that the insertion of their advertisement would cause our own subscribers to discontinue the Living Church and substitute the Christian Herald, changing their reading therefore from a churchly to an undenominational point of view, it must be clear that self-interest, altogether apart from any duty to the Church, would lead to the rejection of the advertisement. But, on the other hand, is that what the Christian Herald, through its rather expensive advertising, is trying to do? So far as we know, no single subscriber to the Living Church has stopped his paper in order to substitute the Christian Herald for it.

But if the advertiser assumes that a fairly large proportion of the readers of the Living Church are accustomed to read one or more other periodicals as well, and might, therefore, be induced to supplement this journal with the Christian Herald, we should say there was rather good ground for his presumption. The Christian Herald passes, without difficulty, the test which the Living Church applies to its advertisers.

The Living Church hits the mark fairly in its reply, with this single exception: that the Christian Herald is not undenominational but interdenominational. It represents all denominations of the Protestant Church and is a welcome visitor in hundreds of thousands of denominational homes, where it is regarded as fitly supplementing the regular denominational weeklies. In no sense is it, or has it ever been, the rival of the denominational press, nor could it have the slightest object in trying to supersede it. Its subscription combinations with denominational journalism is harmonious and effective, and a distinct advantage to both.

It is perhaps in order here to say a word concerning the attitude of the Christian Herald toward denominational journals as a class. We believe in church members staying loyal in all things to their denomination, and in giving it the fullest support, including its publications. In these days of universal enlightenment, there is hardly an intelligent individual who limits his supply of reading matter to the denominational paper exclusively. There is choice of a wide variety of publications, and it is here that the Christian Herald, as the sole interdenominational journal of large circulation, comes in as a logical coadjutor to the denominational journal. It works in perfect accord with all the denominational boards, big and little, and contributes to their treasuries many thousands of dollars every year in support of their work in home and foreign missions and otherwise. Far from persuading readers to desert the denominational press, the Christian Herald is to these journals and the Christian organizations they represent a source of strength and increase.

The Bible and Newspaper

CONDUCTED BY
FERDINAND C. IGLEHART, D.D.

Prehistoric Structure Uncovered

THE exploring excavations in the Mesa Verde National Park, which the Department of the Interior is conducting under the direction of Dr. Jesse W. Fewkes, have revealed the most wonderful structure north of the Aztec architectural finds in Mexico. The splendid structure, of cut and polished stone, is in the form of a capital D. The straight elevation is one hundred and twenty-five feet long and the curved part two hundred and forty-five feet. The outer walls are double, and between them there are a number of narrow rooms. Dr. Fewkes believes the ruin was an uncompleted fortress abandoned when the cliff-dwellers disappeared from the Rocky Mountain region. The incessant revelations of truth to science, by the telescope that sweeps the sky, the spade that digs under the earth, and the instruments of experimentation everywhere, illustrate this truth in the spiritual realm: "There is nothing covered that shall not be revealed; and hid, that shall not be known." (Matt. 13: 35.)

Japanese Visitor

THE Japan Society of New York City, composed of Japanese and Americans, held its annual banquet at the Hotel Astor the evening of December 2. Some five hundred diners sat down at the tables. The guests of honor were Viscount Chinda, Japanese Ambassador to the United States, Viscountess Chinda, and Baron Ei-ichi Shibusawa. Lindsay Russell, president of the Japan Society, presided. Viscount Chinda proposed a toast to President Wilson, and Governor James F. Fielder of New Jersey proposed a toast to the Emperor of Japan. A. Barton Hepburn acted as toastmaster. Viscount Chinda, in referring to Baron Shibusawa, said that the recent act of the Emperor in conferring on him the Order of the Rising Sun showed in what esteem he was held in his native country; that he had done much and was still doing much to promote mutual good will and commerce between the two nations. The Baron made his speech in Japanese, which was afterward interpreted in English. Among other things the Baron said was that somewhat of the religious instruction we give our children should be given the children in his land. The banquet was designed to increase good feeling between Japan and America, and to contribute to the universal good will which ought to illustrate the brotherhood of man, thus expressed: "And hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on the face of the earth." (Acts 17: 26.)

Killed During Hunting Season

A REPORT from Chicago indicates that fifty-nine men were killed and sixty-six injured in eighteen states during the hunting season just ended. Last year there were a hundred and eleven killed and one hundred and sixty-two injured from seventeen states of the Union and one of the provinces of Canada. Michigan, as during the last several years, leads in the number of dead, with fourteen. The season in Illinois produced twelve fatalities, while in Wisconsin nine sportsmen were killed. Accidental discharges of guns led the list of casualties. In a number of instances persons were mistaken for deer. There were fewer sportsmen this greatly promote God's kingdom in the Sunday school. It is a pity that the superintendent should ever have to look far to find proper teachers for the classes. It would be difficult to calculate the vast amount of good Mr. Mead has done in teaching the boys the Bible and of Christ these forty-six years. Such constancy is thus enjoined: "Be ye steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, forasmuch as ye know that your labor is not in vain in the Lord." (I Cor. 15: 58.)

Wheat, Rye, Barley, Oats

THE International Institute of Agriculture at Rome, Italy, has just made a grain crop report which is incomplete but which contains these facts of interest: The production of wheat, rye, barley, and oats in the northern hemisphere is approximately one-fifth larger, for each crop, than last year, according to statistics from the International Institute of Agriculture at Rome, Italy. Denmark is the only country with less than last year's crop of wheat; Italy and the Netherlands have fallen off in rye production; Denmark, Great Britain, and Rumania have less barley than in 1914; and Scotland and the Netherlands, less oats. There are bountiful harvests in the nations at war planted and gathered by the old men, the women, the boys and the prisoners. God hasten the day when the men can go back from the trenches to the plow and reaper again. The kind Father of us all has said: "While the earth remaineth, seedtime and harvest, . . . shall not cease." (Gen. 8: 22.)

Splendid Seal Herd

THE seal herd of the Pribilof Islands in the Bering Sea, owned by the United States, at the end of the breeding season contained about a third of a million animals of both sexes and of all ages, forty thousand more than last year. There were born during the year 103,526. Congress passed a law forbidding the destruction of any seals in these islands, except a few males allowed as food for the natives. This governmental action has caused the rapid increase of these valuable fur-bearing animals. The United States in 1867 bought Alaska and the neighboring islands from Russia. This included the Pribilof Islands, one of the principal breeding-grounds of the Arctic seal.

Great Britain, Canada, Japan and other nations had long followed seal-fishing in these waters, and when our government went to assert its claim to ownership there was conflict of the most serious character. Because the cows went out into the great ocean to get food for their offspring and were killed by the sealers, and the cubs left on the Alaskan feeding-grounds to die, our government forbade deep-sea sealing. It was in 1911 that a treaty was entered into by our government, Great Britain, Russia and Japan forbidding all sealing. And so the breeding-grounds will be protected, and the seal industry perpetuated. Pliny mentions the use of seal skins as a covering for tents, and as a protection from lightning. Some commentators claim that the badger of the Bible was really a seal, and the same root in Arabic means a dolphin or seal. They say that seals were found on the shores of the peninsula of Sinai. Man's mastery of the seals is thus described: "Thou madest him to have dominion over . . . whatsoever passeth through the paths of the seas." (Ps. 8: 6, 8.)

Old Men Make Toys

AT 416 Lafayette Street, New York City, is "The Old Men's Toy Shop." There more than fifty aged and infirm men are making attractive toys out of wood. Each man receives fifty cents a day for his work and ten cents for lunch. The hours are from nine to five, with three-quarters of an hour for luncheon. When Miss Christine Foster was on the Mayor's Committee on the Unemployed, she cast her eye about to find light work for old and sick men, with some remuneration, and she established this old men's toy shop. The financial affairs of this shop, which as yet is but self-supporting, have been taken over by the New York Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor, but Miss Foster still directs the work for the men. She has opened an apartment not far from the shop, where about twelve of the men make their home. Cooking is done by them there, and for those who cannot be accommodated there at night, the apartment serves as a sort of club where they may sit, chat, play games, and enjoy a warm and comfortable evening. The best charity on earth is to help people to help themselves. Could anything be more lovely than giving old men work to drive away loneliness and to secure the means of self-sustenance? Was any knife so sharp or skilful as that of grandfather's in cutting out a top, or whip handle, or ball bat, or sleigh-runner? Christmas presents and all gifts of love remind us of the one gift of whom the prophet said: "For unto us a child is born, unto us a son is given . . . and his name shall be called . . . the Prince of Peace." (Isa. 9: 6.)

Locusts Devastating Palestine

IN describing the ravages of the locusts in Palestine, the American consul at Jerusalem says: "As far as the eye could reach, the fields were covered by locusts, and even the street in front of the American consulate had the appearance, in the movement of the green and black mass, of a flowing river." Olive gardens, orchards, vineyards, market gardens, and most summer crops appear to have been completely devastated. Early in the year the Turkish authorities appointed a commission to fight the locusts, with Dr. Aaron Aronson, director of the Jewish Agricultural Experiment Station, as high commissioner. A law was passed requiring every male inhabitant between fifteen and sixty years of age to collect and destroy forty-four pounds of these insects or pay a fee of $4.40. All of the rigid precautions and remedies proved of no avail. There is this reference to locusts in olden times: "Thou shalt carry much seed out into the field, and shall gather but little in; for the locusts shall consume it." (Deut. 28: 38.)

year than for a long time, which partly accounts for the fewer number of accidents. In Wisconsin and Michigan alone it is believed that seven thousand deer were killed. There is always danger in a dangerous thing. The wanton slaughter by hunters during the season is a shame, bordering on a crime. Let there be greater caution. Deer hunting in Bible times is thus referred to: "Now therefore, take, I pray thee, thy weapons, thy quiver and thy bow, and go out to the field, and take me venison." (Gen. 27: 3.)

Sunday School Teacher 46 Years

RUFUS MEAD, for forty-six years teacher of a class of boys in the First Presbyterian Church of Orange, N. J., resigned his position the other day on account of advancing years. One of the most important and useful departments of church work is that of the Sunday school teacher. It is right next to the mission of the minister in the message of the truth and in responsibility for souls. Many true men and women recognize this fact and

A Week in the World's News

OUR MERCHANT MARINE. Apropos of the President's plea to Congress for aid in reestablishing the American merchant marine, it is interesting to note that at the present time there are about 150 ships being built in American shipyards for American owners, most of them exceeding 6,000 tons, many being as large as 15,000 tons. The total tonnage under construction is more than 500,000 tons. The present tonnage in American-built ocean-going ships is about 1,750,000 tons. At the present rate of progress, our present tonnage will have been increased by 100 per cent. within three years and our merchantman flag will not be the stranger upon the high seas and in the ports of the world that it has been during the past twenty years.

WILL MEET IN ST. LOUIS. The Democratic National Committee has selected the city of St. Louis as the meeting place for the Democratic National Convention, which will convene on June 14, 1916, in the new Coliseum. The new Coliseum has recently been completed at a cost of $300,000 and has an actual seating capacity of 14,000 persons. The last convention of the Democratic Party at St. Louis was that of 1904, when Alton B. Parker was nominated for the presidency.

FOR POLITICAL HONESTY. A law creating the Public Service Commissions of New York State provides that no person shall be eligible to a place on the commissions who holds stock or is otherwise interested in any of the companies or enterprises over which the commissions exercise jurisdiction. On December 6, Governor Whitman of New York dismissed Edward E. McCall, chairman of the Commission of the First District, because it had been proven that McCall owned 287 shares of stock in a company under his jurisdiction, and appointed Oscar S. Straus.

PRACTICAL PATRIOTISM. The Society of the Daughters of the American Revolution has expended since its organization about $600,000 in the preservation of historic documents, the discovery and rescue of graves of veterans of the Revolution, the marking and preserving of spots of historic interest; and in developing increased civic and national pride and greater loyalty to flag and country. At least twenty thousand books have been sent to distant army posts and stations, and thousands of flags have been distributed to schools and public institutions. The society is responsible for the law requiring the United States flag to float above school buildings.

CHINA RETURNING TO THE EMPIRE. President Yuan Shi Kai of China is slowly arranging the details of the imperial government which the people have voted shall replace the present republican government. It is reported that the United States has not been in agreement with the request of France, Russia, England and Japan that the change be delayed. While not in sympathy with the change, the United States Government is reported as feeling that the change having been decided upon should be made at once. The transformation of the republic into a monarchy will be effected by three moves. First, the election of representatives by the people; this representative convention will then meet and nominate an emperor—there is no thought of any other nomination than of President Yuan Shi Kai; Yuan will then ascend the throne and the boy emperor who was dethroned by the declaration of the republic will surrender to Yuan all the historic treasures of the Tsing dynasty. The boy will then lose his title of emperor. The report that Yuan would marry his daughter to the deposed boy emperor has been denied.

PANAMA EXPOSITION CLOSES. At midnight on Saturday, December 4, the doors of the Panama Pacific International Exposition were closed after a run of 288 days. The Exposition is expected to show a profit of about two million dollars. All indebtedness was paid before the Exposition was two-thirds over. The expense of preparing the site and buildings was approximately fifty million dollars. The Exposition attendance averaged 62,000 per day. By November 19, 17,000,000 persons had passed the gates. The Exposition panied the brief rebellion, Chinese rebels entered the French concession and were fired on by the French police. Peace had been restored by the evening of the 7th.

YOU MAY RISK YOUR CORNS. The Supreme Court of the District of Columbia has decided that a railroad company has no death rate from tuberculosis still remains very high in Ireland.

MORE HOMESTEADS. Secretary Lane of the Department of the Interior has announced the designation of 950,000 acres of non-irrigable lands for entry under the 320-acre homestead law in Colorado, Idaho, Montana, Oregon and North Dakota; a considerable acreage was filed on at once.

PRIDE AGAIN GOES BEFORE DESTRUCTION. We do not say that the small city, created since the boom in war munitions began by the duPonts near Petersburg, Va., did not deserve the eulogistic description of it which appeared in the press of Monday, December 6, but on Thursday, December 9, this boom town of Hopewell, which had in these few months gathered together 25,000 inhabitants, was almost completely destroyed by fire. This short-lived town was erected to accommodate the workmen necessary to the huge increase in business produced by the war in Europe. It was well organized, though without a regular town government; it had its court, police department, water plant, sanitary squad, banks, school house, five churches (one of which was there before the phenomenal growth took place), religious and athletic clubs, and so forth. The town sprang up on the outskirts of the great powder manufacturing plant, and for the most part the buildings were of the knock-down variety, but attractive and homelike. There were also sections of concrete buildings.

The fire, the origin of which is not known, was first discovered by an eleven year old boy just after noon of Thursday, and by night it had practically wiped out the place. Fully 10,000 employees of the duPont Powder Company were made homeless and had to be removed to other towns. The property loss is estimated at over $2,000,000, some 400 structures having been destroyed and with little insurance. A wretched feature of the catastrophe was the hanging of a negro caught by enraged workmen in the act of looting the ruins. In fact the militia in neighboring towns were called on to prevent a riot of looting by the rough element in the village. Most of the workmen are of foreign extraction. Because of recent disclosures of plots to destroy munition factories in the interests of Germany, suspicion at once fell on a German who had been arrested as a suspected spy that morning, but investigation fixed the origin as an overturned lamp in a Greek restaurant. The mushroom village of Hopewell itself was practically destroyed, but there are still standing several hundred houses occupied by employees of the company situated at other points near the great plant. The destroyed village was about nine miles from Petersburg, Va., and it is said that the acreage on which it was located rose in value from $10,000 to $1,500,000 between last February and this November, adjacent properties increasing in value correspondingly. Before that time Hopewell was merely a name for an unsettled country spot. The expectation was that by spring Hopewell would contain 50,000 people.

HUGH BLACK STAYS HERE. Rev. Hugh Black, who has been for seven years pastor of practical theology at Union Theological Seminary, has recently refused a call to the pulpit of City Temple, London.

AMERICAN PROTEST HALTS BRITISH. Some weeks ago the British government announced that it considered eleven vessels of the American Trans-Atlantic Company to be enemy-owned, and therefore subject to capture. The vessels were formerly of Danish registry and were admitted to American registry under the law passed at the last session of Congress. The company is headed by Richard Wagner, and the British claim that the capital involved is largely German. Two of the vessels, the

© Underwood & Underwood

President Wilson Reading His Message to the Sixty-Fourth Congress December 7

was in every particular an exposition of progress. Thirty-nine foreign nations participated officially and thirty-seven states of the Union and the United States were represented. There were about 80,000 exhibitors. Probably the greatest success of the Exposition was its success in drawing westward the great body of tourist travel which in normal times would go abroad. San Francisco has made it possible right to move standing passengers about like pawns on a chessboard. The next time you are ordered to move up you may exercise your right and stay where you are and be walked upon in full knowledge that the motorman and conductor have no legal right to order you about.

IRELAND ON THE UPGRADE. According to the correspondence of the Associated

Mexican Teachers Who Studied Our Methods

Eighty of the foremost teachers of Mexico have just completed nearly a year's study of our educational methods, and have returned to Mexico to put their experience to practical use.

for a great many Americans to see America at last, if not first.

AN INCIPENT REBELLION. On December 6 reports from Shanghai told of the mutiny of the crew of the Chinese cruiser Chao-ho. The mutinous crew fired on two other warships and the arsenal, the fire being returned. Several shots fell in the foreign concession. The next morning the rebellious crew surrendered. An officer of the vessel had thrown overboard the keys of the magazines containing the shells for the larger guns, leaving the vessel at the mercy of the shore batteries. During the disorders that accompanied the recently completed census in Ireland show an increase in population, a thing unusual in Ireland in recent years. For the quarter ending September 30, the number of births was 27,779 and the deaths 14,670. There were only 3,511 emigrants, leaving a net increase of 9,598. About one Irish child in every dozen dies before the age of twelve months. This condition is slowly yielding to efforts of fresh air advocates and improvements in living conditions. There were nearly 8,000 fewer inmates of workhouses in the last quarter than the average for the same period for the last ten years, and there were 12,235 fewer persons in receipt of poor relief. The Hocking' and the Genesee were captured and taken to the Prize Courts at Halifax and St. Lucia. The American government at once protested. Before the Prize Court had made a ruling the British government requisitioned both vessels and also the steamer Kankakee. The American government protested again, and Ambassador Page took the matter up vigorously with the admiralty in London. On December 9 the British government announced a cancellation of the requisitions for the two vessels, the release of the Kankakee, under bond and the consolidation of the Prize Court proceedings on the other two vessels for a test decision. Pending this decision the other nine vessels of the company will not be interfered with.

MEANS WHAT IT SAYS. Attorney General Farrar, of Colorado, has interpreted the prohibition law of the state to forbid the sale of liquor in any form for use in foods and the manufacture for sale of mincemeat, plum pudding, brandied peaches, Italian macaroons and other desserts in which intoxicating liquors may be an ingredient.

KAISER RECALLS ATTACHÉS. German Ambassador Count von Bernstorff has called at the State Department at Washington, on December 10, and advised Secretary Lansing that the German Emperor has recalled Captain Boy-Ed, naval attaché, and Captain Franz von Papen, military attaché of the embassy, in accordance with the request of the United States, upon the stated reason that they were no longer acceptable. This action of the emperor was taken immediately upon receipt of the answer of the United States to Germany's request for further reasons. The German government requested the United States to arrange safe conduct for the two attachés and similar safe conduct for their successors on the way to America.

WESTERN ROADS CAN RAISE FARES. The Interstate Commerce Commission on December 11 authorized a general increase in passenger rates west of the Mississippi River. The new rates are to be figured on interstate bases of 2.4, 2.5, 2.6 and 3 cents a mile, according to the territory served, the higher rates applying in the less populous and more difficult territory.

AN IMPORTANT DISTINCTION WITHOUT A DIFFERENCE. The organization of the Boy Scouts of America is in the midst of a campaign to raise $200,000 for the needs of its propaganda. Because of the out-and-out military trend of a similar organization, "The United States Boy Scouts," we recently obtained and printed in the CHRISTIAN HERALD a positive statement by James E. West, Chief Scout Executive of the Boy Scouts of America, that that organization is wholly opposed to the military idea as a feature or a factor in the organization work. It is a fact that hosts of parents permit their boys to join this organization only when assured that there will be nothing of the military about its work. It is also a fact that General Sir Robert Baden-Powell, one of the founders of this class of boy work in America and only recently resigned from the Boy Scouts of America, is first of all a soldier and believes in soldierly qualities and ideas in such work.

In a letter in the press of December 13, Colonel Theodore Roosevelt, who is the honorary head of the Boy Scouts of America, heartily comments a movement to raise $200,000 for this organization, because the Boy Scouts of the United States has a tremendous asset of military strength; and the chief executive is urged to inject into the work of the organization the spirit of military service for the country. The executive board, however, has adopted a resolution to the effect "that the organization is non-military, but not anti-military, and non-political." This is a very fine distinction, but unfortunately it does not seem to be a real difference. The statement of Colonel Roosevelt that this organization is a great aid to "preparedness" seems to have foundation in fact.

SEEKING THE SECRET OF THE CANAL SLIDES. A voluminous copyrighted report by Colonel Goethals on the earth movements along the Panama Canal has appeared in a portion of the press, and a careful reading does not create a very hopeful feeling about the ultimate mastery of the situation, at least within comfortable time. At the request of President Wilson, the National Academy of Sciences has designated a board of ten scientists who will personally visit the canal zone and make exhaustive study of conditions. C. R. Van Hise, of the Academy of Wisconsin, is chairman, and all the members are eminent.

SUFFRAGISTS NOT LOSING A MOMENT. Promptly on the opening of Congress a host of representatives of equal suffrage descended upon the Capitol and besides interviewing the President through a delegation of three hundred women, when he promised to take up the question with Congress leaders thought declining to mention the subject in his message, the women marched upon the Capitol headed by brass bands and life-and-drum corps, and presented a petition measuring 18,000 feet and containing a half million signatures on behalf of the Susan P. Anthony amendment. This amendment has been introduced in every Congress for the last forty-seven years, according to Dr. Anna Howard Shaw, president of the National American Woman Suffrage Association.

POSTAL RECEIPTS SLUMP. The annual report of Postmaster-General Burleson shows that the disturbed conditions abroad have made serious inroads on postal revenues, the deficit for the year being $21,000,000, which has been reduced by economies to $11,000,000. Increased salary and additional railway mail pay required by law, have also contributed to the deficit.

one of the most important campaigns of the war. For years Germany has had her eyes fixed on Asia Minor and the Persian Gulf as her chosen fields of expansion, and her interest in Turkey, which began in 1898 at the time of the Kaiser's journey to Jerusalem, and which has in the intervening years steadily grown stronger, finally ripening into an alliance in form, was based on this desire, Turkey being of course the titular holder of these lands, and of part of the highway Germany hoped to form thereto. The project of the Bagdad Railroad was another step in the realization of this plan.

This plan and these facts the British well knew, and to prevent Germany from reaching her goal and from seizing Mesopotamia they, comparatively early in the war, initiated a ance. The rich lands of Asia Minor and Southern Persia, in the opinion of experts, under a modern system of agricultural exploitation could supply Europe with all the cotton, all the wheat, all the barley, all the oats, all the tobacco, and all the rye which the nations of that continent need to import, over and above their own production, and a very few years would suffice to bring this production about. In addition, figs, nuts, almonds, grapes and olives, besides coffee, madder and gums, can be produced in almost any quantity. Copper exists in Asia Minor in almost inexhaustible amounts, iron also abounds. In addition, there are manganese, borax, emery, coal and lignite, petroleum, asphalt, salt deposits of enormous extent now scarcely worked, but which are known to be extremely rich.

In a political sense the capture of Bagdad would have also been of extreme importance, as it would have had an enormous effect upon the Mohammedan world, not only of Turkey in Asia, but of Afghanistan, Persia, India and Egypt, which world is now in a state of unrest.

The British expedition penetrated to a place called Ctesiphon, about fifteen miles southeast of Bagdad, after a uniformly successful campaign against the Turks and Arabs opposing them. At Ctesiphon the Turks made their last stand in defense of Bagdad, and according to London's version of the fight not only were successful in stopping the British advance, but were able themselves to take the offensive and to drive back the British forces a distance of about 90 miles to Kut-el-Amara on the Tigris river, inflicting the heavy loss (in proportion to the total strength of the British force) of about 4,500.

The difficulties which confronted the British force in this advance were stupendous, and it is really marvelous how they managed to penetrate so far into the difficult and inhospitable country through which their route necessarily lay. The Turks are said to have surrounded Kut-el-Amara, but report that the British are putting up a very stiff defense.

In the Balkans, the fortunes of war have continually favored the Bulgarians and the Teutons. In Serbia itself the Bulgarians have completed the work of driving the Serbian army completely out of the small portion of Serbia which remained in Serbian hands at the end of last week, and into Albania, where their entry has been opposed by the Albanians, and where they are being followed by the Bulgarians.

South of Monastir, occupied by the Bulgarians last week, their troops have moved along the railroad as far as to the Greek border, and have occupied the frontier railroad station of Banitsa. The Bulgarians have refrained from crossing into Greek territory, as it has been arranged by them and their Teutonic allies that if future developments make it necessary for armed forces to cross the Greek frontier, such forces shall be composed exclusively of Austro-German troops.

The Allies in southeastern Serbia have been continually attacked on their northern front by the Bulgarians, who forced first the French contingent to fall back and then the British. Later, the Allies fell farther back practically along the Greek border.

This position of affairs apparently brings the Greek situation to a crisis. If these Allied troops cross the Greek frontier, it would seem that Greece would be forced to assert her neutrality, and in compliance with the duties of a neutral disarm and intern these troops, or else abandon her neutrality and join the Allies.

Farther north three offensives are now proceeding against Montenegro. There are rumors that Montenegro has notified the Allies that she will be unable to hold out.

All of these various misadventures in the Balkans have had the effect of making Rumania retire farther into her shell, and no hint even of her possible future course reaches us.

The text of the new declaration signed by all the Allies, engaging the five signers not to conclude a separate peace, has been given out and runs as follows:

"The Italian government having decided to accede to the declaration between the British, French and Russian governments signed in London, September 5, 1914, which declaration was acceded to by the Japanese government on October 19, 1915, the undersigned, duly authorized thereto by their respective governments, hereby declare as follows:

"The British, French, Italian, Japanese and Russian governments mutually engage not to conclude peace separately during the present war.

"The five governments agree that when terms of peace come to be discussed, no one of the Allies will demand conditions of peace without previous agreement of each of the other Allies."

Much interest has been aroused during the past week by a series of conferences between the military and political chiefs of the Allies which have taken place in France, but no hint as to the decisions reached has been made public from an official source. In the Western campaign the week has been calm. Even the interminable but separated artillery duels have been less fierce than usual. There has been very little infantry fighting. Some mining operations and a little hand grenade fighting completes the story of the week's doings.

President Wilson's Note to Austria on the Ancona Sinking

Department of State
Washington, Dec. 6, 1915.

The Secretary of State to Ambassador Penfield:

Please deliver a note to the Minister of Foreign Affairs, textually as follows: Reliable information obtained from American and other survivors who were passengers on the steamship Ancona shows that on Nov. 7 a submarine flying the Austro-Hungarian flag fired a solid shot toward the steamship, that thereupon the Ancona attempted to escape, but, being overhauled by the submarine, she stopped, that after a brief period and before the crew and passengers were all able to take to the boats the submarine fired a number of shells at the vessel and finally torpedoed and sank her while there were yet many persons on board, and that by gunfire and foundering of the vessel a large number of persons lost their lives or were seriously injured, among whom were citizens of the United States.

The public statement of the Austro-Hungarian Admiralty has been brought to the attention of the Government of the United States and received careful consideration. This statement substantially confirms the principal declaration of the survivors, as it admits that the Ancona, after being shelled, was torpedoed and sunk while persons were still on board.

The Austro-Hungarian Government has been advised, through the correspondence which has passed between the United States and Germany, of the attitude of the Government of the United States as to the use of submarines in attacking vessels of commerce, and the acquiescence of Germany in that attitude, yet with full knowledge on the part of the Austro-Hungarian Government of the views of the Government of the United States as expressed in no uncertain terms to the ally of Austria-Hungary, the commander of the submarine which attacked the Ancona failed to put in a place of safety the crew and the passengers of the vessel which they purposed to destroy, because, it is presumed, of the impossibility of taking it into port as a prize of war.

The Government of the United States considers that the commander violated the principles of international law and of humanity by shelling and torpedoing the Ancona before the persons on board had been put in a place of safety or even given sufficient time to leave the vessel. The conduct of the commander can only be characterized as wanton slaughter of defenseless noncombatants, since at the time when the vessel was shelled and torpedoed she was not, it appears, resisting or attempting to escape, and no other reason is sufficient to excuse such an attack, not even the possibility of rescue.

The Government of the United States is forced, therefore, to conclude either that the commander of the submarine acted in violation of his instructions or that the Imperial and Royal Government failed to issue instructions to the commanders of its submarines in accordance with the law of nations and the principles of humanity. The Government of the United States is unwilling to believe the latter alternative and to credit the Austro-Hungarian Government with an intention to permit its submarines to destroy the lives of helpless men, women and children. It prefers to believe that the commander of the submarine committed this outrage without authority and contrary to the general or special instructions which he had received.

As the good relations of the two countries must rest upon a common regard for law and humanity, the Government of the United States cannot be expected to do otherwise than to demand that the Imperial and Royal Government denounce the sinking of the Ancona as an illegal and indefensible act; that the officer who perpetrated the deed be punished, and that reparation by the payment of an indemnity be made for the citizens of the United States who were killed or injured by the attack on the vessel.

The Government of the United States expects that the Austro-Hungarian Government, appreciating the gravity of the case, will accede to its demand promptly, and it rests this expectation on the belief that the Austro-Hungarian Government will not sanction or defend an act which is condemned by the world as inhumane and barbarous, which is abhorrent to all civilized nations and which has caused the death of innocent American citizens.

LANSING.

The War in Europe

THE most interesting single event of the past week has taken place in Mesopotamia, and not only is this event the most interesting but also in its possible ultimate effect, the most far-reaching; namely, the defeat of the British at Ctesiphon.

The British expedition westward, along the Tigris and Euphrates Rivers, is regarded from both the political and military standpoint movement against the country from a base on the Persian Gulf.

The Bagdad Railroad, the Persian Gulf coasts, which, under German possession, would become a menace to Britain's possessions in India, Southern Persia, and the whole of Asia Minor, were the objects which this British expedition hoped to attain.

These lands are so far distant from us, and obtrude themselves so rarely on our notice, that few Americans realize their import-

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is published weekly by The Christian Herald, at the Bible House, Fourth Avenue, 8th and 9th Sts., New York City. The officers are: Otto Kuening, President and Treasurer, Bible House, N. Y. City; Geo. H. Sandison, Vice President, Bible House, N. Y. City; Theodore Waters, Secretary, Bible House, N. Y. City.

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE $1.50 a year in advance. Remittances should be made in the safest manner available. Make checks and money orders payable to the Christian Herald.

FOREIGN POSTAGE.—For copies mailed outside

the United States, Canada and Mexico, add one dollar a year to subscription price.

CHANGE OF DATE.—It takes at least two weeks to change the date, after your subscription is renewed.

EXPIRATION OF SUBSCRIPTION.—The date on the wrapper indicates when your subscription ends.

CHANGE OF ADDRESS.—It requires three weeks time to make the change. Give both old and new address.

LETTERS should be addressed, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

Entered at Post Office, New York, as Second-class Matter

Entered as Second-class Matter at the Post Office Department, Ottawa

Salonica, the "Coveted City"

Continued from page 1295

In a large prison yard was the same conglomerate mixture of nationalities that walked the streets of the lower city. But there was a difference in that there they were not allowed to intermingle, but were apportioned by races into various sections of the yard, high walls being employed for the division. Turks, Jews, Greeks, Albanians, Gipsies—each small racial unit was leading its own life in its own little corner. The only common interest was the prison fare—water and black bread. An odd figure in that motley group was an English sailor standing silently apart from the rest. Upon our questioning him he replied that he had "lost his ship," and seemed mysteriously reticent about giving any further information.

We descended to the lower city. It was midday and the heat was intolerable; streets were deserted and shops closed. From eleven in the morning until four in the afternoon Salonica is as a city of the dead. At four the blinds of the shops go up and people emerge from their houses. From then on till late at night Salonica is a city of much trading; a city of bright lights and gaiety.

On the day of our arrival we had been able to distinguish the many types in the streets in a very superficial way. Later we came to recognize them more closely and the part each played in the city's life. Some little oddity in one man's dress told us that he was from such an island; a small white skullcap on the head of another man was sufficient proof that he was from Albania. Russian, English, French and Serbian Red Cross men and nurses there were, each in a distinctive uniform; Greek army officers embellished by many decorations; Turks in red fezes; an occasional Englishman in white ducks and tropical helmet—we found a modern Babel of religions, races, costumes and languages. And the one outstanding race in this curious mixture was the Jew, for the greater part of the commerce of the city is in the hands of the Jews; they control all the banks and large stores.

As we sat watching the passersby, there came to us little Solomon, eleven years old and thoroughly familiar with four languages. He was born in the London East End; the family had moved to Turkey and now were working out their salvation in Salonica. With all his few years little Solomon was a typical Salonican, for we soon discovered a subtle plan of the trader in the friendship he had so suddenly struck up. His father, it appeared, owned a beer saloon, where, as reported by Solomon, the best brew in the city was obtainable. But we assured Solomon that we were not interested in his father's beer, and he forthwith disappeared into the night.

Now there appeared from time to time peddlers and myriads of beggars. The Salonica peddler may be a Turk, Jew, Greek or Islander, but whatever his race, once established in your presence he is very loath to depart. He hangs on and on. Your assurance that you need none of his wares means nothing to him; he is just as firmly convinced that you do—and quite likely he is correct, for he sells nearly every article that human want demands. To offer a price, even in jest, at a fraction of that asked is fatal; for he will forthwith accept the jesting offer. An Islander came before us offering beads; the price was three francs. "Watch me get it for one franc,"

Greek Soldiers on Guard on Mosque Roof said Arington, an American resident. Much unintelligible Greek and many gesticulations ensued and shortly Arington emerged from the contest, owner of a useless string of beads.

Quite as persistent, and their name is legion, are the beggars, a large proportion of these being refugees from Turkey. Any one induced to part with a coin soon discovers his mistake, for immediately swarms of beggars seem to rise out of the ground. Where this human flot-sam live, how they manage to keep body and soul together, is a mystery. They appear with the crowd in the afternoon; they vanish with it late at night.

Nearly all the churches in Salonica were at one time Turkish mosques. They continue to have the outward appearance of such. Two of the most well-known churches,

St. Sophia's and St. George's, were originally built by the Christians many centuries ago. Then the Turks came and the buildings were converted into mosques. For five hundred years they remained as such, and only after the recent Balkan war did they come back into their own. In the dome of St. Sophia's is an example of exceptionally fine mosaic work which dates back to the building of the church. This work of art has an interesting history. When the Turks came they painted it out so that none of the figures could be distinguished, and so it remained for five hundred years. Recently the paint was rubbed off and now the original picture stands out in all its beauty and original coloring.

ON Sunday we attended the service in St. George's. Somewhat ill at ease because of our ignorance of the ceremony, we stood just inside the doors and waited. Two Greek priests in long flowing gowns were standing facing each other in their pulpits, a few feet apart. At the time of our entrance one was reading in a monotone. At the end of about five minutes he ceased and the other priest continued the reading. In this manner they alternated indefinitely.

Other than ourselves and the two priests the church seemed deserted. Soon a worshiper appeared, selected and lighted a candle and slowly walked around the interior, kneeling before and kissing each ikon. Now the high priest appeared, waving incense and reciting in a monotone. To every corner of the church he walked, and then, the ceremony over, disappeared in a door near the altar. Soon another worshiper arrived and the ceremony was repeated. Although quite different from any religious ceremony we had ever attended, it was all exceptionally impressive.

In every Salonica churchyard stands a minaret—a relic of the days of Turkish possession. We were allowed to climb the one in the yard of St. George's. Up and up the narrow spiral stairway we went. To all appearance we were the first who had made the climb in many years, for in places piles of refuse made the way nearly impassable. At last we arrived upon the small balcony where in former years the Mohammedan priest had chanted his evening prayers, and there we were rewarded by a view of rare beauty. All of Salonica in its varied character was below; back of the city lay the Macedonian mountains; in the other direction the harbor; and way beyond, looming up in all its glory, the majestic Mount Olympus.

© American Press Association

Greek Mountain Artillery Starting Out from Salonica

MISS GRACE NEWTON, of the North China Mission, died at Paotingfu recently, in the fifty-sixth year of her age. Miss Newton was born in South Orange, N. J., May 10, 1860. She felt the call to the foreign field and in May, 1887, was appointed a foreign missionary and assigned to North China. She devoted herself to work among young Chinese girls. When the Boxer uprising occurred, in 1900, she was forced to flee, and her school was destroyed. When peace was restored a new school was built for her at Paotingfu, where she carried on her life-work with undiminished ardor. She was recognized throughout China for her ability and success and for the consecration of her life and energy to the cause of Christ.

EVANGELISTS Geisenheiner, Jones and Simpson recently concluded their labors at Grant, Mich., where for two weeks they have been holding revival meetings. About twelve people were converted.

THE following letter has been received from Niels P. Thompson, secretary of the Jail Gospel Workers of New Haven, Conn.: "Feeling very much indebted to you for your kind assistance in our work among the prisoners of the New Haven County Jail, we have decided to show our appreciation in such a humble way as to send you $10 to be used in any way you may wish. The Jail Gospel Workers consist of ten men who meet every Sunday to bring the message of good tidings to those whom sin has robbed of even their natural liberty. We realize that it depends much upon our faithfulness as to whether the Lord shall reach the hearts of the prisoners. As we go from cell to cell with the Christian Herald, New Testaments, and tracts, endeavoring to speak to them about the 'one thing needful,' our prayer is that we might be led by the Spirit to speak words dictated by Him who alone can approve of sin, righteousness and judgment. It is more than sad to see here men and women in all stages of life, from youthful springtime to the age of winter, when the hair has become snowy white, when the hand, clinging to the bars, trembles, when the knees are weak and shaky, and when the whole figure is the very picture of a life wasted in sin. How true is God's word, saying, 'But the way of the transgressor is hard.' This would, in our judgment, be the very best inscription for the entrance to every institution of this kind. It should be a great joy to us to know that the readers of the Christian Herald stood by us in this work with their prayers."

IN a recent letter E. A. Lancaster, a subscriber of the Christian Herald in Greenville, Tenn., made a very good suggestion. Mr. Lancaster has taken note of the wide use that merchants are making of advertising slides shown between films in the "movies." He suggests that the churches of a town might profitably employ the same means of advertising their message and themselves, uniting in preparing slides and in paying for the insertion of the slides in the "movie" program. This has been done in a limited way in some communities.

BENJAMIN F. BUTTS and party have just closed a most successful evangelistic campaign in Joliet. Mr. and Mrs. Butts conducted a service at the Illinois State Prison on Sabbath morning, November 7, where they had an audience of 1,900 prisoners.

REV. S. B. SHAW and his wife, who have done a great deal of good work in the Middle West both in evangelistic and temperance meetings, and have recently been in charge of the Marvin Park camp meeting ground of the Methodist Church, South, at St. Louis, are now planning another evangelistic tour.

STREET CORNER evangelism is profitable in Greater New York. For many weeks this past summer a good brother by the name of Harris, assisted by Mrs. Williams, a deaconess, and by other volunteer workers, has been holding meetings on a busy corner in Brooklyn formerly preempted by saloons.

The simple messages, the songs, the Gospels and the tracts have brought many souls into the Kingdom and the leader has received many letters from passers-by who have decided to do better.

THE National Temperance Union, which is under the direction of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, is planning to hold a series of Education and Welfare Expositions throughout the United States. These expositions through their detached exhibits will show the underlying causes of poverty, crime and domestic unhappiness and the beneficial economic results secured through temperance. Special slides and photo-plays have been prepared for use in moving picture theaters, and the economic aspects of temperance are to be kept before the public constantly.

IT is radically wrong when a prize-fighter in fifteen minutes can earn more than a country parson does in fifteen years. A penny expended for the support of aged ministers and teachers is a penny expressing a nation's gratitude to the most faithful of its servants and the truest of its citizens.

W. A. SUNDAY.

THE Committee on English for New Americans, of the Manhattan Mission Federation, is doing good work among the immigrants in New York City. The aim is to teach them English, and to give Bible instruction also. There are classes for Russians and Bohemians, and Sunday classes for Waldensians and Japanese are now being planned.

"The Same to You!"

By WILLIAM B. ASHLEY

ONCE upon a time there was a man who woke up.

To every one around him he had seemed to be quite wide awake all the time; he even supposed himself to be awake. But when he woke up, as you shall presently see, he stepped into a new experience that proved of itself that he had been asleep all the years.

There won't be any moral attached to the end of this little tale because it is going to be stated right here. The moral is this: "This man is no great exception."

No, he was not a great exception, but in some respects he rather overemphasized some common characteristics. The outstanding fact about him was that he didn't see things the way other people saw them. He was the only right man there was. And as he wasn't blessed with a vast deal of patience and sympathy, it irritated him a great deal to find everybody wrong all the time. It made him fretful. It made him crabbed. It made him a nuisance. In short, he got so he could not get along with any one, excepting his little boy.

This man had a fine family, consisting of one true wife and four excellent children. But, excepting the little boy, they, too, seemed to see everything differently from himself.

So the home was not altogether happy—when he was around. Nor even when he wasn't, for there was a kind of cloud over things just because he was sure to turn up sooner or later every night, and also to spend most of his Sundays with his family.

This man didn't see why his wife kept the house the way she did, had things cooked the way she did, dressed the way she did; and he kept telling her so. It was simply incomprehensible to him why his boys didn't know their lessons perfectly in school, why his daughter liked to have young men call on her, why everything didn't go exactly the way that he saw so plainly everything should go. And in the kindest, most patient, most maddening way in the world, he would parade the delinquencies of all the members of his family before them every chance he got—excepting always the youngest boy.

THE man was fond of saying good-night to this little fellow and tucking the bed-clothes around him after some one else had undressed him and seen to it that he brushed his teeth and put his clothes where they belonged. The man always gave the boy a kiss, and said a certain kind of good-night to him. It would either be, "Good-night and silly dreams to a silly boy"; or it would be "Good-night and happy dreams to a happy boy"; or "Good-night and brave dreams to a brave boy"; whatever happened to come to his mind. And invariably the little fellow would echo the reply, "Good-night and silly dreams to a silly man"; or "Good-night and happy dreams to a happy man"; or "Good-night and brave dreams to a brave man." And yet the significance of this never seemed to sink into the man's consciousness.

Of course, nobody of this sort is happy. And nobody who comes in contact with this sort is happy for the time being. In short, this man generated so much unhappiness that the only excuse for telling you about him is in order to let you enjoy his waking up. And so that you may enjoy that part of the story you will need to take a look at him outside of his home.

The man was in business. He was in business to make money. This brought him into contact with many people. It brought him into daily and hourly contact with men and women who worked with him. And in spite of a tremendous effort on his part to make every one around him see things just as he did, and thereby smooth their pathways through life, he was unpopular. Perfectly happy and cheerful human beings in his business house froze up when their employer appeared, and could find no cheery "good-morning" to greet him with. They never stepped up to his desk and wished him a pleasant holiday on the eve of those events. They instinctively seemed to misunderstand him, and to misinterpret his orders, and to misjudge his interest in them. He prospered because he knew how to make money. But his establishment was merely an organization of hired people. It was not an organization of fellow workers keen to advance the interest of their firm.

AND so it went. The man touched life at a number of points and at every point was useful and was tolerated on that account. He was a Christian of the most outspoken type, if you know what that means. But he held no office in his church. The toward Christmas time, the year he began to feel these pangs of self-pity. It had long been his custom to get through Christmas with as little display of this giving nonsense as possible. His idea was that people ought to give to each other three hundred and sixty-five days in the year. He hadn't time to do it himself, but other people ought to do it, and to his way of thinking Christmas giving was a sham, a pretense. Each year, as the day came around, he wondered how men and women could be so oblivious to the hollow mockery of their Christmas jollity, in which, for one day, everybody seemed to regard everybody else as an equal. He was able to pass almost unscathed through the Christmas greetings, and those that did reach him made slight impression. It was his custom to lie in bed until all the foolish glee and shouting downstairs had ceased, and then to go down and accept the few trifles he had permitted his family to give to him, with little pleasure in the task, waving aside the efforts the children were bold enough to make to thank him for the perfunctory gifts his wife had persuaded him to make.

It was drawing near to Christmas of the year when this man began to feel real bitterness over the fact that he was so much alone in the world. He really loved his family, the fellow members of his church, and, in a dutiful way, everybody, even those who worked for him. It must be said in fairness to the man that he really did mean everything for the best for everybody. And now it began to hurt him to find so many evidences on all sides that he didn't fit in—didn't fit in even in his own home. And he was thinking along that very line one night when he said good-night to his little boy.

"Good-night," he said, adding in a teasing mood: "Cross-patch dreams for a cross-patch boy." Straight back with a laugh came the answer "Good-night. Cross-patch dreams for a cross-patch man."

The man never went to sleep that night until two o'clock. For the first time in all his life he had heard with his inner ear the good-night echo of the little lad he loved so much.

THE next day he was thinking all the time along the same line, thinking very hard. And while he was thinking he was watching other people. He stood around and covertly heard others talk about Christmas plans. He kept his eyes on the evening paper at home, with one ear sticking out around the edge of it, learning more things. He was beginning to wake up very fast. A great dawning light began to shine in his eyes. He began to see things as they really are in this life. He even began to see himself as he was—which really ought to have waked him up with a start.

On the day before Christmas he decided to pinch himself, as it were, to make sure that he really was awake. And that night, when he came home late, he carried with him for the first time in very many years a staggering package of gifts for the members of his family, each and every one of them, including the servant; and he concealed the load in a convenient place outside the house before going in to pretend (this time) that he wasn't interested in the eleventh hour preparations of the household for the coming day.

The pretence itself chirked him up. "Good-night," he said to the little fellow; "mighty nice dreams for a mighty nice boy." And then he went to his room hugging himself in remembrance of the boy's prompt reply.

The next morning this man arose very early. He wasn't sure yet that he really was awake after all the years of sleeping. He knew he wanted to be a part of Christmas more than he could remember ever having wanted anything before, and yet he was by no means sure that he could be. He wisely placed no reliance on that great pack of gifts outside the house to accomplish anything. He didn't so intend those things; they, it happened, were bought wholly without guile. The fact that he had bought them at all could have assured him that he was fully awake, had he only understood. But he didn't understand—yet. And as he tip-toed down the stairs to get them, the hopefulness which had begun to cheer him slumped

Continued on page 1306

THE right setting for Christmas all depends upon where you live. "It doesn't seem like Christmas" unless there are huge snow drifts in the country roads, great banks of snow along the curb in town and city, and everybody muffled to the ears against the cold—to us, in most parts of America. But in Argentina, as these pictures disclose, "it doesn't seem like Christmas" unless the sun almost melts one's straw hat; watering-carts must keep down the dust, and the country all about is gay with foliage. They have the same hurrying, jostling crowds of Christmas shoppers there as here, only there they pay a high compliment to the purpose in that, for one day before Christmas, vehicular traffic is suspended in the principal shopping streets in order that pedestrians may cross and recross at will to the different shops with safety. Instead of the Christmas tree of our homes, the Argentine family erects a miniature grotto showing the country side and the inn at Bethlehem, usually with figures representing the characters in the historic scene of the first Christmas, and in and around this grotto, which is decorated with candles and tinsel, they place their gifts, and on Christmas morning the family gathers about it for prayers before beginning the jollities of the day.

Christmas Below the Equator

pastor didn't call on him for advice and sympathy. The rest of his family were members of the different organizations of the church; in fact, those organizations were a sort of refuge to them from the atmosphere of the home. Very few greeted him after services, and he was never called upon to lead in prayer at the prayer meeting. He gave liberally enough to the work, and was always ready to ask why things were not done this way and that way, but still he could detect no cordiality in the attitude of those around him.

Actually, after a while, the man began to be sorry for himself as he contemplated his own infallible judgment in all matters, realized the good intent of his motives toward all men, and at the same time perceived the complacency with which everybody jogged along in their unenlightened efforts to do things when he could so easily have instructed them in the right way.

And this man was getting along in life, and along

What Readers Think of "Preparedness"

Defends the President's Program

President Woodrow Wilson:

I HAVE just read Pastor Sheldon's open letter to you in the Christian Herald, in which he attacks your preparedness program. I do not agree with Mr. Sheldon.

Mr. Sheldon quotes you as saying: "No thoughtful man feels any panic haste in this matter. The country is not threatened from any quarter. She stands in friendly relation with all the world." He then says: "Why all this military program for an enemy we do not possess? In the course of your entire speech you do not mention one single reason for an increased army or navy. You do not name one nation in the world that has any design to threaten or invade our country."

Does Mr. Sheldon mean by this that it is unnecessary to think or concern ourselves with the problem of defense until a belligerent foe is at our threshold, clamoring for an entrance to the riches within? I think that your reason for an increased army and navy is to inspire respect in the hearts of foreign nations, so that they will mind their own business and leave us unmolested.

Mr. Sheldon proposes to take the money your program calls for and improve the roads, etc. What would be the use of improving our country without first providing an adequate defense for it? It would add to the temptation of foreign nations to seize it. Mr. Sheldon then proposes to Christianize Europe and educate the people, so that their warlike instincts would no longer be appealed to. Suppose that the United States were unprotected, and that the head of a foreign nation had an ambition to conquer it, and by so doing add a chunk of it to his own territory. On some imaginary pretext he declares war. But, because a large number of his subjects are Christians, they rebel against his declaration and refuse to fight. Immediately there is confusion and a civil war will result in the country. Probably Mr. Sheldon would say that if all the subjects of the foreign country were Christians, the monarch would have no followers. But no one will dispute the fact, deplorable though it is, that power has followers.

The adage, "In time of peace prepare for war," should be made to read "In time of peace take steps to insure peace"; and I think, Mr. President, that your preparedness program is the most practical plan for so doing.

ALBERT H. HINDMAN.

Kent, Iowa.

A Civil War Veteran's Views

WHILE the views I shall express are not at all yours, doubtless, it yet has seemed to me in all fairness that the multitude of your readers should have a word from those who at least claim to be Christians, on this subject of "preparedness," so earnestly advocated by the President.

All the more that their position is declared to be wholly against the spirit of Christianity. Yet if their words are to be believed, their purpose is to prevent war. And may it not be just possible that their judgment is of equal weight with that of the pacifist?

Since it is Dr. Sheldon's article that calls forth my protest, the reference to what he has said will be excused.

He quotes the President: "The country is not threatened from any quarter. She stands in friendly relation with all the world," and adds: "If that is true, why all this military program for an enemy we do not possess? In the entire course of your speech you do not mention one single reason for an increased army and navy. You do not name one nation in the world that has any design to threaten or invade our country."

Now, it seems strange, to one reader at least, that any intelligent citizen would expect the President of the United States, at this stage of affairs, to name any nation, in so many words, which he knows is likely to give us serious trouble, meaning war. Cannot any one see that this would not do at all?

But that the President thinks there is danger is very apparent, or from his high place of responsibility he would not send forth the serious warning which he does.

Even Dr. Sheldon would hardly accuse Mr. Wilson of indulgence in idle rhetoric, however brilliant it might be; still less since it is understood that this grave, intelligent thinker and statesman has been led (it must be by some weighty reason) to change his view upon this matter.

Now, the President is guarding against possible war. And if war, then there is no need for argument as to increasing our army and navy. Anybody knows that we could not now, as we are, defend ourselves against a powerful outside foe.

So much for the critic's statement on that point. Now, as to Dr. Sheldon's

Christian, "As much as lieth in you live peaceably with all men."

It may not always be possible, to live peaceably thus, and if a foreign nation sought to possess our land, destroying our homes and indeed the highest hope of liberty for the race for all time, the man who would not act on this principle and oppose it by all means in his power—well, I must let the reader finish the sentence. I am a soldier of Civil War times and may be rather sensitive.

Mankato, Minn.

C. A. HOBBS.

"Preparedness" a Menace

AN editorial paragraph in the Louisville Times, a paper favoring the President's policy of national preparedness, gives the estimate of that paper of the President's proof-text (Ezekiel 33:2-6) on the subject by classing it with what it is pleased

A Christmas Prayer

By ELEANOR DUNCAN WOOD

AT Christmas-time the garnered fields are white,
And every roof and haystack all bedight
With snowy splendor, while afar on high
The cawing crows sail black across the sky,
Mourning for Summer's store, and generous days gone by.

WHO heeds? Behold, we deck the church and hall
With clustering holly, coral-branched and tall,
With balsam-breathing pine, and hemlock bright.
And where the Yule log flings its dancing light
We tell the old-world tales of love, and field, and fight.

WE give and we are given! We pile the board
With plenteous viands of Earth's harvest stored.
And mid the lilting laughter and the glow
We sing a tender carol, soft and slow,
And kiss our own once more, beneath the mistletoe.

SUCH is our Christmas! But, O God of all,
Bid us to heed thy lowliest creature's call.
To crown with blessing heads grief-bowed and low,
Give of our plenty to the wide world's woe,
That cruel need may cease, and brothers' love may grow.

LET no heart go un comforted today.
May children, loss-forgetting, still be gay.
As thou hast given us peace, give peace to all!
Bid carnage cease, and war's red banner fall!
So shall we keep once more our Lord Christ's Festival.—Amen.

methods, as substitutes: He would have to change the Constitution and laws of the United States if they were adopted. He seems to forget that one of our fundamental principles is the separation of church and state—and a mighty good principle it has proved to be. The government, as such, cannot spend money for religious purposes. Even if you do not build battleships, you cannot, as a government, send missionaries, nor even use the money to secure prohibition, nor in any of the benevolent and Christian ways of which the Doctor speaks. Such moneys must be raised by the voluntary acts of Christian people, and nothing prevents the Doctor from raising sufficient sums now, except the unwillingness of the disciples.

The Doctor decides what Christ would do, if he were upon the earth. Now Christ, when on earth, did not out of hand abolish war. He has not done so since. There is no word of disapproval personally for the soldiers whom he met—the centurion, for instance—nor by the apostles after him. John the Baptist did not abolish war, but warned against violence outside of the soldier's profession. And Christ did not indulge in mere rhetoric when he bade his disciples to sell their garments and buy the sword (Luke 22:36). So Paul recognizes that the magistrate did not bear the sword in vain; and again he gave the practical exhortation to the to state is Scriptural authority for all the atrocities of the war.

In all due deference to the President as an exegete, I believe that Mr. Bryan is the "watchman upon the wall" who sees the "sword coming," and is raising his voice in warning against it. In my humble judgment there is a greater menace to the peace and safety of our land in such "preparedness" as is contemplated (militarism) than is threatened by the nations of the earth from without; for, in the first place, as has very reasonably been said, "The principal nations of the earth have, or will have, thrashed themselves to a frazzle fighting each other so that from this source we need hardly fear an attack." In the second place, as has been amply and horribly illustrated, these nations that have been proceeding on the theory of "preparedness" are the ones that like beasts have been going at each other's throats. The inevitable and unanswerable logic of history in the downfall of nations is against such a régime. It is a reversion to the spirit and methods of barbarism and the Dark Ages. It is the fellow with a gun, with few exceptions, that gets into trouble. He is suspicious of trouble, if not actually looking for it. The thought is father to the act.

No greater calamity, as it comes to me, in all the revulsion of my feeling, could come to our country than the adoption of the plans advocated for military practice, and especially among our school population. Two illustrations symptomatic of the baneful influence of this contagion have just in the past few days come under my notice in our own state (Kentucky). Two small boys are playing war; one shoots the other down. Again, a young man who has served several years in the army comes home on a visit, and for a small grievance kills both his father and mother. This is the natural and almost inevitable tendency of the military spirit. It means the turning of the dial back three hundred years or more in the ideals of our Christian civilization.

In the last place, it is a contradiction or disavowal of the principles of Christianity which have guided and animated our leaders in determining the genius and policy of our government and in determining our dealings in relation to other nations—justice to all, and the pursuit of peace, prosperity and happiness both among ourselves and toward all men and nations. The pursuit of these have made us a peaceful and homogeneous people, and a blessing to the world.

Military "preparedness," with an emphasis, does not, will not, and can not comport with the above principles and purpose. It is a denial of prophecy concerning the ushering in and progress of the kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ. "They shall learn war no more." Here is a deliberate program for teaching it! Have we lost faith in the all-conquering power of the Prince of Peace? Shall the weapons of our warfare henceforth be carnal? Then he, or the nation, that "takes the sword shall perish by the sword."

REV. G. W. CRUTCHFIELD.
M. E. Church, South, Jenkins, Ky.

"The Same to You!"

Continued from page 1305

away. He began to wish that he himself might slump away and keep out of sight for the next twenty-four hours so as not to mar the pleasure of his family. He resolved that as soon as he had stealthily put around the gifts which he already began to think it was a mistake to bring, he would hurry back to his room and lock himself in and stuff his ears against the song that goes sounding through the universe on all the winds that blow on Christmas Day.

SO, in this mood of discouragement, this new despair of having any part in Christmas himself, he stepped out into the cold clearness of the early Christmas morning and gathered up his Christmas pack, a mirthless Santa Claus indeed. Just as he started to re-enter the door, a tinkle of bells caused him to turn his head, and the milkman's sleigh came to a stop in the snowy road. The milkman himself, who knew our friend by reputation very well indeed, stumped along the path with the morning supply for the house, and turned the corner without so much as turning his head toward the laden figure on the porch, to go to the rear door. And suddenly our friend with the Christmas pack felt some strange and unusual impulse to speak surge up in him, and almost as by second nature—second child-nature, maybe—he called out in a voice whose heartiness startled him: "Good morning, friend, and a merry Christmas to you!"

And instantly he was made wide awake by the swift and hearty shout back from the astonished milkman: "Thank you, sir! The same to you! And many more of them!"

THERE was no way of stating the fact before, so it will have to be added here—the story, of course, is finished—that when the man got into the big dining-room with his bundles, he instinctively started to turn his back upon his own end of the table lest the emptiness of it, as in former years, should chill his new-found happiness. But to his amazement he saw that that end of the table was piled with Christmas tokens of the love of his family.

The Gary Idea in Bible Teaching

By O. H. PANNKOKE

A LITTLE over two years ago, the pastoral conference of Gary, Ind., took up the question of the Bible in the public school. It is by no means a novel question, as the files of newspapers, records of legislatures and decrees of courts amply show. However, this particular meeting had a new disturbing factor present. Therefore it has become historic. This new factor was a public school superintendent who had the disconcerting hobby of defying the most sacred and solemn traditions in order to face things as they are. This is, of course, surprisingly disconcerting in matters that everybody thinks happily solved and settled for ages to come. For a time the discussion went on pleasantly enough. Mr. Wirt, the school superintendent in question, came in for his share of criticism and suggestions, with which, no doubt, he had been familiar for years. Presently, however, things began to happen. Instead of meekly pleading guilty to negligence, he turned about for a frontal attack and charged the clergy with neglecting an opportunity for religious instruction that had existed in their midst for years. Instead of insisting on the Bible in the public school, they ought rather to discuss plans to carry on thorough religious training.

It was a challenge which struck at the very heart of Protestantism. The challenge was taken up in Gary, and a beginning made to work out the problem. It has since entered many other communities, and this fall New York City took it up. People of every shade of religious conviction have delved into the matter and are taking part in the discussion. The papers throughout the country have begun to treat it as a burning issue of the day. The religious press has contributed a great number of editorials and special articles.

While it is gratifying to see so much interest taken in the question of thorough religious training, it is a bit amusing to notice that very little has been written by men who are actually taking part in the Gary experiment, or who, at least, can speak from personal observation. The matter is important enough to deserve exact reports, and it is not so bare of interest that the imagination must be drawn upon to embellish a dry subject. Rather the opposite. The experiment in religious instruction carried on in Gary today is fascinatingly interesting, as well by reason of the way in which it is carried on as by the results it is achieving.

THE opportunity to which Mr. Wirt called the attention of the Gary pastors lies in two features of the Gary system. The one is the longer school day with its flexibility of program. The other Mr. Holmes summed up to me this way: "If the community in a given hour can take care of the children better than the schools, let the community have them."

Into the routine program of the average schools Gary introduces the whole round of healthful child interests. It brings the world into the schools. It also takes the school children out into the world about them, the Young Men's Christian Association, library, or any other place that may rouse their interest and broaden their mind. This is made possible by the longer school day and the departmental system of instruction. If parents during certain periods want their children to take music lessons, help at home, or attend religious instructions, the school can dismiss them without upsetting its curriculum or putting the child back. The community and the parent are thus taken in to cooperate with the school in educating the child. If parents desire religious instruction, they can have the child at certain hours. But they must provide the opportunity and must be responsible for attendance and diligence. This opportunity existed practically as long as the Gary system was in operation. It was not tried till two years ago.

When it came to carrying out Mr. Wirt's suggestion, difficulties loomed up that for a time seemed insurmountable. In asking parents to send their children to Bible schools during the week, it is impossible to offer meager equipment, untrained teachers and simple lesson materials of the Sunday school. The more interesting and efficient the secular school, the greater the task for the religious school to hold its own and win the cooperation of parents and children. Good equipment costs money, special teachers cost money. The Gary churches had little money and big debts. Owing to the phenomenal growth of the city in seven short years, they were taxed to the limit to provide facilities for worship, and could not think of shouldering the additional burden of getting expensive plants for weekday instruction.

The educational and missionary boards of the various denominations saw the opportunity, and made the task their own. The experiment of the past two years has therefore been thorough. The religious teachers at Gary are excellent. Not all the children are taught at the same time, but the grades are separated. Each group comes for two hours a week.

cut without any hesitancy. They knew the story, they know the import of the story, they know the Bible verses, they know where they are found. The teaching gives them a definite knowledge of the things in the Bible.

THE aim of the secular school to develop responsibility and make theoretical training real is carried out also in many of these religious schools. It is nothing strange to see older children help younger ones in their work, while the instructor is hearing others recite. Or groups of children are taken out to see Christianity in operation at the social settlements, at a funeral, or at any of the other expressions of practical religion.

Most of the Protestant churches are grouped about the Jefferson school, which has an enrolment of 800 children. About 65 per cent. of these children are in attendance at the Bible schools. All in all 1,050 children receive religious instruction, which makes an average of a little over 20 per cent. of the school enrolment. One reason for the higher percentage from the Jefferson school is the location. The other very important reason is, that considerably less effort has been expended to reach the others. Neither the teaching force nor the equipment is sufficient to do that. So the opportunities for a larger enrolment have not been exhausted by far. The results have only been equal to the effort and money put into the experiment.

Aside from the mere outward consideration of numbers, both children and congregations are proving the results of the training. The instruction is much more thorough and detailed, and the atmosphere under which it is given much more serious than that of the average Sunday school. The children cannot but grow up into well-informed, responsible Christians. They carry their lessons into the community and their homes, as case after case illustrates. One little boy asked his father at table whether they couldn't say grace, and then proceeded to say a prayer he had learned. The father, a prominent real estate dealer, was drawn into the church through that incident.

The religious instruction has not divided the children into groups, nor developed clannishness.

In fact, neither the church nor the school authorities that we interviewed had realized any evil effects from the denominational grouping of the school children during the week. Some rather considered it stimulating and good, as honest differences arouse interest. In the Bible school of the Gary Settlement House on the south side, the various teachers cooperated in carrying on an interdenominational school. The facts and stories of the Bible were taught, leaving the denominational interpretation to the Sunday school. This year nearly 300 are attending the Gary Settlement. Otherwise, however, each denomination carries on its work separately.

Little difficulty has been experienced in having the children receive religious instruction during school days without making the public school in any way responsible for unpleasant denominational rivalries. During the time the children attend the Bible schools they are not under the care of the public school, but of the parents. The parents send a written notice to the school authorities in which they state their desire to have their children attend a certain Bible school. This notice terminates the responsibility of the public school, and the parents are responsible for the children during that time.

The Roman Catholics have not received the experiment with enthusiasm. In one congregation for a time it nearly caused a split. A portion of the congregation failed to see the need of paying the upkeep of a separate parochial school any longer. The authority of the bishop and a considerable sum of money from Chicago is said to have quelled the insurrection.

As far as the experiment has gone it has raised three great questions on which depends its future: proper teachers, the proper equipment and teaching material, the cooperation of the congregations. The Gary plan can never become general unless there is a supply of qualified teachers. But neither teachers nor lesson material will be of any use until the local congregations will shoulder the responsibility.

The Fusing of the Races. A Class at Gary

Front row, left to right: Swede, Slav, Russian Jew, Slav, Austrian. Second row: German, American, Scottish, American. Third row: Irish, German, English, Slav, German. Fourth row: American.

A Typical School-day Class in Religious Education

To attend some of these classes is a revelation for one acquainted only with the superficial hurry and noise of the average Sunday school. These are religious schools, with the emphasis all on the schools. On the walls are pictures and charts to illustrate the lessons. On a table are contour maps of Palestine, which the children of another grade were finishing at an earlier hour. As a frieze around the room run books with pictures and Bible verses which children have colored and written to impress the lessons on their mind. For the younger ones there is a sand-table as an incentive to their imagination in making the lessons graphic. It is plain that every effort is made to bring the Bible stories into the mind and understanding of the pupils and fix them there permanently.

There is an air of alertness and interest about the students which shows they are taking the work seriously. In the review their answers come clean

Christian Herald

Bible-Picture Contest

A Search Through the Scriptures Find Suitable Bible Verses for a Series of Pictures

Equal Opportunity—A Picture Solving Plan for Everyone

Today, December 22, 1915, we inaugurate our Bible Picture Contest and publish three illustrations (on page opposite to this one) which are to be followed by similar illustrations in the CHRISTIAN HERALD until sixty pictures have appeared.

No titles or other description of these Contest pictures will be given by us. YOU are to describe the pictures—by means of Bible quotations. An "answer" to a picture will consist of one Bible verse. You may, however, submit as many as five different answers, if you see fit, for each picture.

An impartial committee of judges will approve the most suitable verses for the pictures (possibly more than one for some pictures) out of those submitted by the contestants. Then whoever has submitted approved answers will be so credited. Next, the sets of answers will be examined to ascertain who has supplied the greatest number of approved (or best) answers; and, as explained in the Rules, the most meritorious sets of answers will be awarded the rewards—enumerated in the next column.

In order to emphasize good judgment as the supreme test in this competition, rather than specially minute Bible knowledge, the simplifying feature has been introduced of limiting selection of answers (verses) for the pictures to a standard list of 2,000 Bible verses—which list is available to you. Therefore practically you need only pick the fitting verses out of the given number.

Contestants' rights will be protected by the carefully expounded technical provisions contained in the Rules. They are printed on page 1310. Read them. We have already given you the salient points in a nutshell, and you will profit by noting the introductory pictures and other interesting matter in the present announcement. Also read the CHRISTIAN HERALD every week.

The Six Object Lesson Pictures

The interrogation point outlined above includes within itself half a dozen little scenes typifying the question, or rather quest, which embraces the actual Bible Picture Contest. We know of no better way to introduce you to the Contest than by this symbol of the question mark. You must look at our pictures and ask, seek, search—until you find the most suitable wording for each illustration.

Let us assume that you were confronted with the picture on the upper left hand side and no text were given alongside it, but rather that you were told to examine a certain number of verses among which the most applicable answer for answers must be found. It is quite likely that you would in that case select, as your answer, the Bible verse we have printed above that picture. The same would apply to the other five instances. Once you get started in this delightful pursuit, you will find it an absorbing and profitable pastime.

An important point to bear in mind is that while, for the sake of interesting portrayal, the historical atmosphere may be indicated in the pictures, nevertheless the aim of the Contest is to fit one verse at a time to one picture—without reference to the whole story involved. Nor does the whole verse have to fit the whole picture. Simply try to find a verse which corresponds to the particular picture as closely as possible.

READ THE RULES ON PAGE 1310

Then the king commanded and they brought Daniel and cast him into the den of lions. Now the king spoke and said unto Daniel, Thy God whom thou servest continually, he will deliver thee. (Dan. 6:16)

Read the helpful talk below about these six object lesson pictures

When they saw the star, they rejoiced with exceeding great joy. (Matt. 2:10)

Moses came down from mount Sinai with the two tables of testimony in Moses' hand, when he came down from the mount, that Moses' face shone while he talked with Him. (Ex. 34:29)

And David put his hand in his bag and took thence a stone and slung it, and smote the Philistine in his forehead, that the stone sunk into his forehead, and he fell upon his face to the earth. (1 Sam. 17:49)

And bring hither the fatted calf and kill it, and let us eat and be merry. (Luke 15:23)

And he dreamed, and behold a ladder set up on the earth, and the top of it reached to heaven: and behold the angels of God ascending and descending on it. (Gen. 28:12)

$3,500 Cash-419 Rewards
To Encourage All to Greater Effort

So great is the interest already taken in the Bible Picture Contest that we have been persuaded to increase the rewards from the first announced sum of $2,500 cash to a total of $3,500 cash. Below we give the rewards in detail.

First Reward	$1,250.00 Cash
Second Reward	625.00 Cash
Third Reward	350.00 Cash
Fourth Reward	250.00 Cash
Fifth Reward	150.00 Cash
Sixth Reward	100.00 Cash
Seventh Reward	75.00 Cash
Eighth Reward	50.00 Cash
Ninth Reward	20.00 Cash
10th to 24th Rewards, each	37.50 Cash
25th to 419th Rewards, each	$1.50
419 Cash Rewards in all, aggregating	592.50 Cash
	$3,500.00 Cash

What Would You Do With $1,250?

Whether you are old or young, rich or poor, married or single, farmer, laborer, clerk or business man, lawyer, doctor, teacher or minister, schoolgirl or housewife, whoever you are and whatever your position and personal tastes—surely you can use one thousand two hundred and fifty dollars to advantage.

Think of your duty: to improve the industry in which you may be engaged; the house in which you live; your own mind by books and travel; to provide necessities and comforts for your own person and for your family, or for less fortunate people of whom you may know; to contribute to public charities and institutional movements here and in war-stricken foreign parts; to help support your church and its social and religious activities, including missions; to give your children or other young friends (or yourself, you young reader) proper educational advantages, business aid or other start in life; and to carry out one or more innumerable other objects dear to your heart; provided you had the wherewithal. Whatever award you win will be yours, to do with, without reservation, as you please.

Why not exert a little pleasant effort in the Bible Picture Contest? You may excel according to the simple conditions and receive a reward. Won't you try?

READ OUR SPECIAL OFFER

"Gems from the Bible" in the Sunday School

"Gems from the Bible" in the Home

"Gems from the Bible" in the Bible Class

Here Are the First Three Pictures—Save Them

PICTURE No. 1

What Bible verse fits this picture best?

PICTURE No. 2

What Bible verse fits this picture best?

PICTURE No. 3

What Bible verse fits this picture best?

SUBMIT YOUR COMPLETE SET OF ANSWERS AFTER ALL 60 PICTURES HAVE APPEARED

THREE PICTURES will be printed weekly. The Contest is open to men, women and children. Recreation, educational and spiritual benefit, concrete rewards.

How to Take Part in the Contest

IN the first place, you do NOT need to be a Biblical scholar in order to enjoy the Contest or to win a reward. At the same time, men, boys, girls and women, who love the Good Book, will be gratified with the increased contact, and those who know much will find augmented pleasure in that knowledge, while those who have in the past studied less will find themselves learning a good deal. But as far as the test of merit and the fascination of solving each problem are concerned, equal opportunity is afforded to all contestants by reason of the choice of Bible verses for the 60 pictures being limited to a standard list of eligible answers, which makes your search more concentrated—easier and more profitable; and it is the same for all.

You start in with Picture No. 1. How are you to proceed to find an answer (Bible verse) for it? You may indeed think of the subject probably represented, and at once turn to the appropriate portion in your Bible and soon locate the exact verse, but remember that there may be still another verse that fits the picture just as well, or better. Are you to go through the thirty odd thousand verses in the Bible for each picture? BY NO MEANS! A certain number of verses have been selected and these are all you need consult. Use the book "Gems from the Bible" in which these selected verses are arranged for easy and rapid consultation. Then whatever mild "work" there is connected with the Contest is turned into play, as you hold your "Gems from the Bible" in one hand and the Christian Herald page with the Contest picture in the other and thus progress to victory.

"Gems from the Bible" Reduced Size

"Gems from the Bible" (small picture of which is shown directly above) is a handsomely bound volume 7 1/2 by 4 1/4 inches in size, such as you should be glad to own. Long after the Contest is over, you will have this collection of Gems to charm, instruct and inspire you. In connection with the Contest, you can see for yourself how it will aid you to fuller enjoyment and also towards the worthy goal of $1,250 first reward, or one of the other generous rewards.

When you have decided on a fitting Bible verse (or several different verses) for a particular picture, the Rules (printed on page 1310) tell you that you are not obliged to submit a drawn picture with each answer, but may very conveniently enter as many as five answers for each picture in the authorized Contest Reply Book, a picture of which (reduced size) is shown here on the right. It is given free with the book "Gems from the Bible." You will find it a pleasingly practical device in which to keep and eventually submit your answers. Don't send in your answers now. Wait until the end of the Contest, when the entire series of 60 pictures have appeared.

Contest Reply Book (Reduced Size)

HOW TO OBTAIN "Gems from the Bible" and "Reply Book"

The book "Gems from the Bible" and the booklet called Contest Reply Book constitute together the complete, convenient Bible Picture Contest OUTFIT. If you are about to renew your subscription to the Christian Herald (as undoubtedly you will want to get your copies regularly while the Contest is running), or if you would just as soon extend your present subscription beyond whatever time it would ordinarily expire, add on fifty cents to the regular price, making a combined total of $2.00, and we will gladly send you the OUTFIT, consisting of Contest Reply Book and "Gems from the Bible," at once, prepaid and without further charge; and of course you need pay nothing for entry into the pleasurable Contest and competition for the rewards.

Or you can obtain the two books absolutely free if you will do us the favor of sending in the order of a NEW subscriber whom you will also interest in the Bible Picture Contest, with two dollars to pay for his subscription for one year and the Contest Outfit (consisting of "Gems from the Bible" and the Reply Book) and we will send you an Outfit FREE. The new subscriber you have interested will also receive an Outfit, of course. Use the coupon which you see in the corner here on the right.

THIS COUPON May be Either Cut Out or Copied

PREMIUM COUPON

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD,
Bible House, New York City

I hereby enter the Bible Picture Contest. I enclose $2.00 to pay for extension of my subscription to the Christian Herald, for one year, and premium consisting of Bible Picture Contest OUTFIT of "Gems from the Bible" and Reply Book, which you are to send me, prepaid.

(NOTE.—Put a cross here if, instead of renewing your own subscription, you are enclosing the $2.00 to pay for a NEW subscription you have obtained, with the new subscriber's order for Gems from the Bible and Reply Book. Then we will send you Gems from the Bible and Reply Book FREE. Write new subscriber's name and address on a separate sheet of paper.)

My Name

Full Postal Address

RULES AND REGULATIONS of CHRISTIAN HERALD BIBLE PICTURE CONTEST

LOOK on pages 1308 and 1309 for the first three Contest Pictures, object lessons, list of $3,500 in cash rewards, and instructions for starting right in.

1.—The Bible Picture Contest is a competition devised for the purposes of stimulating popular Bible research and of quickening the observation and judgment of the participants—making them more intimately acquainted with Bible characters and events.

2.—The Bible Picture Contest consists of 60 pictures, for each of which the participant is to submit a set of answers consisting of at least one and not more than five verses found in the book called Gems from the Bible, which contains over 2,000 selected Bible verses.

3.—The pictures will be published, three or more at a time in the Christian Herald.

4.—The book, Gems from the Bible, is given in the Bible Picture Contest Outfit, as explained in Rule 12. Or a participant may make use of the Bible itself, in church, home or library, by obtaining gratuitously from the Christian Herald, or any other publication announcing the Bible Picture Contest, the references by portion, chapter and verse corresponding to the official and standard list of 2,000 verses conveniently arranged in Gems from the Bible.

5.—The Bible Picture Contest is open to everybody, except employees of the Christian Herald and other publishers announcing this Contest, and members of their immediate families. One participant may send in as many as three separate sets of verses; but each set will be judged by itself, and only one set submitted by any person (that person's best set) may receive a reward. Likewise only one reward will be awarded in one household at one address, although all members of the household may each send in one, two or three sets of answers.

6.—Rank or merit will be accorded to participants primarily according to which set of verses contains the greatest number of best verses for the 60 pictures. If there should be an equality between two or more participants on this basic requirement, then the award will be made according to superiority in the following requirements, each being necessary only in case there is an equality on the preceding point: (a) the least number of incorrect—the verses which are not best—answers; (b) the highest relative position of the participant's correct verses in the aggregate among the participant's complete set of answers, as, when three verses are given by a participant for one picture, the correct verse is on top rather than in the position of second or third choice among the answers for that picture; (c) the least number of words in the whole set of verses; and (d) the least number of letters in the complete set of verses.

7.—The word "best" will be interpreted to mean "that which excels or surpasses in the matter of being a fitting text for a particular picture." The verse should fit, or suit, or be applicable to the picture as completely and specifically as possible. What is seen in the picture should correspond with the words of the verse supplied, there being no requirement of historical (or doctrinal) accuracy. The participant will see a picture; let him (or her) describe what is visible in the picture, using some Scriptural quotation; this to be a verse out of Gems from the Bible. The verse may describe only part of the picture; or the picture may illustrate only a part of the verse. The text which matches the picture the closest, according to the foregoing explanation, will be recorded as the best.

8.—If two or more verses submitted for any picture should be found by the Judges to be equally more fitting than the other verses which have been supplied for that picture, then each of such two or more equally superior verses will be recorded as approved—in the same class with "best" defined in Rule 7.

9.—A Committee of Judges, consisting of disinterested persons of recognized honor and capability, will judge the fitness of verses submitted for the pictures and select the best, according to the Rules. Their decision will be final.

10.—The announced list of rewards will be awarded, in order, to the highest ranking participants. In the event of a tie, each tying participant will receive the full reward tied for.

11.—The participant may submit the verses in the already prepared set of forms known as the Bible Picture Contest Reply Book, which is given as explained in Rule 12. Otherwise, each answer (verse) to every picture must be submitted on a separate answer form, a sheet of paper about 5 x 8 inches in size, on the upper part of which the participant has made by pen or pencil a fac-simile of the particular picture, and on the lower part of which he or she has written one verse for the picture, and name and address. If two or more answers are submitted for one picture, the verse which the participant considers the best is to be placed on top and the others in order below, the figure one in parentheses, thus (1), to be marked on the left of the participant's verse, the figure two (2) in the same manner for the next best and so on.

12.—Publication of pictures will begin December 22, 1915. No verses are to be submitted until after the appearance of the last picture; and then one month will be allowed participants for completing the work. The verses are to be together, in one set. Sets of verses are to be delivered to the Christian Herald, Bible House, New York City. Answers may be written in ink, or by pencil, or by typewriter. Every set of verses is to be submitted in the name of the person who worked them out. Participants are allowed to receive casual, gratuitous aid from relatives, teachers, ministers, or other friends, but shall not buy, or sell, or barter information. Any infraction of the Rules will subject the entry to debarment; and the Committee may also reject any entry upon receiving convincing evidence of unfairness. As soon as practicable after the conclusion of the Bible Picture Contest, the Committee of Judges will make a full report, which will be published in the Christian Herald and associated publications. The Bible Picture Contest Outfit consists of Gems from the Bible and Reply Book. The Outfit is not an obligation but a convenience. The Outfit is obtainable in connection with subscription as separately announced.

CHRISTIAN HERALD MAGAZINE BUREAU

Below is a condensed list of periodicals from which selection can be made of one or more magazines at a price in some cases almost one-half of the regular price. Readers of the CHRISTIAN HERALD are thus enabled to order all magazines desired in a single order, with the assurance that it will be attended to promptly, accurately and at the lowest prices. Subscriptions are for one year and can be new or renewal, and can go to different addresses, except in a few cases noted otherwise. Canadian and foreign postage additional.

To determine the price of two or more magazines given in the list below: Add the class prices and multiply by five. The result will be the club price.

EXAMPLE
Christian Herald	Class 23
Pictorial Review	Class 25
McCall's	Class 10
Total class numbers 58
Multiply by 5
Price of club $2.90

Class No.	Pubs. Price	Our Price	Class No.	Pubs. Price	Our Price
30 ADVENTURE with CHRISTIAN HERALD	$3.00	$2.65	10 McCALL'S with CHRISTIAN HERALD	$2.00	$1.65
17 AMERICAN BOY with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.50	2.00	with CHRISTIAN HERALD, To-Day's and Housewife	3.00	1.90
with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Pictorial Rev. (or Woman's Home Companion)	4.00	3.25	with CHRISTIAN HERALD, Mother's and Ladies' World (to one address except CHRISTIAN HERALD)	4.50	2.40
with CHRISTIAN HERALD, *Delineator and *Everybody's	5.50	4.00	20 McCLURE'S with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.50	2.15
25 AMERICAN MAGAZINE with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	2.40	25 METROPOLITAN with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	2.40
with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Woman's Home Companion (to same address)	4.50	3.15	17 MODERN PRISCILLA with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.50	2.00
with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Pictorial Review	4.50	3.65	with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Home Needlework	3.25	2.40
AMERICAN POULTRY ADVOCATE AND BOOK—200 EGGS A YEAR PER HEN with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	2.00	with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Pictorial Review	4.00	3.05
17 BOYS' LIFE with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.50	2.00	23 MOTHER'S MAGAZINE with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	2.00
with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Pictorial Review	4.00	3.25	with CHRISTIAN HERALD, McCall's and Ladies' World (to one address except CHRISTIAN HERALD)	4.50	2.40
17 BOYS' MAGAZINE with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.50	2.00	60 OUTLOOK with CHRISTIAN HERALD	4.50	4.15
with CHRISTIAN HERALD, McCall's, Housewife and To-Day's	4.00	2.75	8 PEOPLE'S HOME JOURNAL with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.00	1.55
with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Woman's Home Companion	4.00	3.25	25 PICTORIAL REVIEW with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	2.40
23 THE CHRISTIAN HERALD	1.50	1.50	with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Modern Priscilla	4.00	3.05
THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 3 years	4.50	3.00	with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Metropolitan	4.50	3.15
35 COLLIER'S WEEKLY with CHRISTIAN HERALD	4.00	3.00	with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Woman's Home Companion	4.50	3.65
with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Pictorial Review (or Woman's Home Companion)	5.50	4.15	40 REVIEW OF REVIEWS with CHRISTIAN HERALD	4.50	3.15
with CHRISTIAN HERALD, *Delineator and *Everybody's	7.00	4.90	with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Pictorial Review (or Woman's Home Companion)	6.00	4.40
16 COOKING CLUB MAGAZINE with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.50	1.95	SATURDAY EVENING POST with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	3.00
COUNTRY GENTLEMAN with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.50	2.50	50 SCRIBNER'S with CHRISTIAN HERALD	4.50	3.65
70 COUNTRY LIFE IN AMERICA with CHRISTIAN HERALD	5.50	4.65	17 SOMETHING-TO-DO with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.50	2.00
55 CURRENT OPINION with CHRISTIAN HERALD	4.50	3.90	50 ST. NICHOLAS with CHRISTIAN HERALD	4.50	3.65
with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Pictorial Rev. (or Woman's Home Companion)	6.00	5.15	8 TO-DAY'S with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.00	1.55
23 DELINEATOR with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	2.30	with CHRISTIAN HERALD, Housewife and McCall's	3.00	1.90
with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Everybody's (to one address)	4.50	3.15	55 TRAVEL with CHRISTIAN HERALD	4.50	3.90
with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Pictorial Review	4.50	3.55	25 WOMAN'S HOME COMPANION with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	2.40
with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Review of Reviews	6.00	4.30	with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Little Folks (new)	4.00	3.15
12 DESIGNER with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.25	1.75	with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Delineator	4.50	3.55
25 ETUDE (for music lovers) with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	2.00	with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Pictorial Review	4.50	3.65
25 EVERYBODY'S with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	2.40	with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Review of Reviews	6.00	4.40
with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Delineator (to same address)	4.50	3.15	12 WOMAN'S MAGAZINE with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.25	1.75
with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Pictorial Review (or Woman's Home Companion)	4.50	3.65	5 WOMAN'S WORLD with CHRISTIAN HERALD	1.85	1.55
23 GARDEN MAGAZINE with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	2.30	40 WORLD'S WORK with CHRISTIAN HERALD	4.50	3.15
GOOD HOUSEKEEPING with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	3.00	with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Woman's Home Companion	6.00	4.40
HARPER'S BAZAR with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.50	3.50	40 YOUTH'S COMPANION with CHRISTIAN HERALD and McCall's	4.00	3.25
70 HARPER'S MAGAZINE with CHRISTIAN HERALD	5.50	4.65	with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Woman's Home Companion	5.00	4.40
70 HARPER'S WEEKLY with CHRISTIAN HERALD	6.50	4.65	with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Pictorial Review	5.00	4.40
12 HOME NEEDLEWORK with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.25	1.75	SPECIAL COMBINATIONS WITH RELIGIOUS PAPERS
with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Woman's Home Companion	3.75	3.00	PROPHETIC AND MISSION RECORD, 3 yrs. Amer. Advent Miss. Soc. with CHRISTIAN HERALD	$1.85	$1.60
8 HOUSEWIFE with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.00	1.55	AMERICAN MESSENGER with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.00	1.65
with CHRISTIAN HERALD, McCall's and To-Day's	3.50	1.90	DAILY BIBLE with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.10	1.75
25 ILLUSTRATED WORLD with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	2.40	THE PROTESTANT MAGAZINE with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.50	1.95
with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Pictorial Review	4.50	3.65	RECORD OF CHRISTIAN WORK with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	2.00
55 INDEPENDENT with CHRISTIAN HERALD	4.50	3.90	CHRISTIAN STANDARD with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	2.30
10 JOHN MARTIN'S BOOK (Children) with CHRISTIAN HERALD	4.50	3.65	CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR WORLD with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	2.50
LADIES' HOME JOURNAL with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	3.00	PRESBYTERIAN BANNER with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.50	2.90
15 LADIES' WORLD with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.50	1.90	THE STANDARD (Baptist) with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.50	3.00
17 LITTLE FOLKS (new sub.) with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.50	1.90	(*Must go to same address) with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Pictorial Review (or Woman's Home Companion)	4.00	3.15	SEND ALL ORDERS TO 45 McBRIDE'S with CHRISTIAN HERALD	4.50	3.40	CHRISTIAN HERALD MAGAZINE BUREAU, Bible House, New York, N.Y.
with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Woman's Home Companion	6.00	4.65	(*Must go to same address)

CHRISTIAN HERALD BOOKS

Two Books by a Famous Pastor

REV. J. H. JOWETT, D. D., has been aptly described as the most spiritual preacher in America. He has written two volumes, "Thirsting for the Springs" and "Brooks by the Traveler's Way." These delightful books are written in this great preacher's happiest vein and the gift of felicitous expression shines out on every page.

Dr. Jowett is a deep student of human nature. He has a faculty of kindling the finer emotions and awakening the noblest ambition. This was the impression on the minds of the editors of the Christian Herald after reading these two companion volumes. The books will be welcomed by thousands who will be glad of the inspiration they afford.

These two volumes, aggregating 530 pages, handsomely bound in cloth, will be sent together with the Christian Herald for one whole year, postpaid, for $2. Or, we will send to old subscribers, FREE, as a reward, these two volumes for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $1.50.

Margaret E. Sangster's New Book

MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR., does not make up her stories and poems—they just form themselves on the background of her mind as winter sprites trace wonderful pictures on windowpanes, and then simply because she cannot help herself, she sets down a description of these pictures. There are, in all, in her new book, "Real People and Dreams," about eighty poems and thirty-two short stories and sketches. This is the work of a genius.

We will send this new volume by Margaret E. Sangster, Jr., handsomely bound in cloth, with a new photographic frontispiece of Margaret E. Sangster herself, and with illustrations for a number of the poems, together with the Christian Herald for one whole year, postpaid, for $1.85. Or, we will send to old subscribers, FREE, as a reward, this volume for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $1.50.

"Forty Thousand Beautiful Quotations"

SOME years ago the Christian Herald published a work entitled "Forty Thousand Sublime and Beautiful Thoughts." It was composed of a collection of the best sayings on every conceivable subject which the compiler could come upon. In the course of time the edition of this book was exhausted. We have had so many inquiries for it that we have decided to republish it this year thoroughly revised. There are actually forty thousand quotations in this book. It will make a very valuable addition to your library.

We will send you this volume, together with the Christian Herald for one whole year, for $3.00, or we will send to old subscribers, FREE, as a reward, "Forty Thousand Sublime and Beautiful Thoughts" for sending us two new yearly subscriptions to the Christian Herald with $3.00.

Luther in Light of Recent Research

WHILE there are several lives of Luther, Professor Heinrich Boehmer's famous work, which has attracted universal attention in Europe, is one of the best that has ever appeared. It comes most opportunely in view of the approaching celebration of the four hundredth anniversary of the nailing of Luther's famous Thesis on the gate of the old castle church at Wittenberg, which was the beginning of the Reformation. The Christian Herald has had the good fortune to secure the exclusive American rights of this book and has had it translated by Professor Carl F. Huth, Jr., of the University of Chicago, who has succeeded in preserving the spirit and expression of the original in a remarkable degree.

The Foreword to Boehmer's work by Professor J. H. Robinson of Columbia University pays a high tribute both to biographer and to the translator who has made this book so readable to the average American.

The Life of Luther, handsomely bound in cloth, will be sent together with the Christian Herald for one whole year, postpaid, for $2.25, or we will send to old subscribers, FREE, as a reward, this volume for sending us two new yearly subscriptions to the Christian Herald with $3.00.

A New "Do Something" Book

DID you read "Janice Day," which was offered with the Christian Herald last year? You will remember it was the "Do Something" book. The success of the book was such that the author, Helen Beecher Long, wrote a sequel entitled "The Testing of Janice Day." It is a vivid and delightful picture of typical New England life and character.

We will send "The Testing of Janice Day," 310 pages, attractive cloth covers, together with the Christian Herald for one whole year for $2.00, or we will send to old subscribers, FREE, as a reward, "The Testing of Janice Day," for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $1.50.

A Companion to the Bible

HAVE you bought your copy of "555 Difficult Bible Questions Answered"? Here is another book which has had a wonderful success during the past year and every lover of the Bible should possess a copy. Indeed it is a wonderful help to Bible study. This book is the result of research covering a period of twenty-seven years. Its theology is thoroughly sound.

The beauty of this book is that it answers those very questions which you are always on the point of asking but for some reason don't. These half thousand and more questions have been asked in one form or another by thousands and thousands of human beings like yourself and have been answered through the Christian Herald Mail-Bag by experts. The result is a book that is a "very present help in time of trouble" to the Bible reader.

We will send "555 Difficult Bible Questions Answered" together with the Christian Herald for one whole year for $1.85. Or, we will send to old subscribers, FREE, as a reward, this volume for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $1.50.

A Story for the Family Circle

WE do not know when we have had quite as much pleasure in reading any book this year as "Little Sir Galahad." There is so much that is charming and humorous and intensely human in the whole story that it appeals to the reader probably with greater force than if the action were on a more dignified level.

"Little Sir Galahad" is really a story of the golden age in our own time. That beautiful season that makes life radiant while it lasts.

It is as good a story as we have encountered in many a day, and that's saying a good deal.

"Little Sir Galahad," 376 pages, illustrated and handsomely bound in cloth, will be sent postpaid with one yearly subscription to the Christian Herald for $2.00. Or, we will send to old subscribers, FREE, as a reward, this volume for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $1.50.

Our Art Calendar for 1916

THIS beautiful calendar is composed of a reproduction of that remarkable picture of Christ walking beside the plowman in the field, which was published under the title of "Lo, I Am With You Always." The picture is described in verses by Margaret E. Sangster, Jr. This calendar is printed in eight colors, achieving a most beautiful effect. It will make a Christmas or New Year's present. It will remind your friends of you every day in the year.

We will send this superb calendar together with the Christian Herald for one whole year for $1.75, or to old subscribers sending us their renewal and one new subscription to the Christian Herald, we will send two copies of this calendar mailed to separate addresses if desired, FREE.

Our 1916 Almanac

DON'T forget the Almanac. This year it will be better than ever. In addition to its permanent features, its prose and poetry, its wit and humor, it will contain new departments such as the story of the European War up to date of going to press; it will contain political information which should be at the disposal of every voter in the Presidential Election of 1916. There will be a comprehensive description of the Lincoln Highway. There will be difficult Bible questions answered. There will be a department devoted to Common Law, and there will be many features of especial interest to women, and things here and there for many an hour's interested perusal.

Add ten cents to your subscription to the Christian Herald and we will send you the Christian Herald Almanac for 1916 postpaid.

Address, The Christian Herald, Bible House, New York

The Ascending Lord

International Sunday School Lesson for January 2. Acts 1:1-14

The Ever-Present Christ

By Arthur H. Howland

RECENTLY asked a friend, widely known as an economic reformer, and known also as a most radical and unsound expositor of the Scriptures, if he really believed that Jesus Christ was living today. He smiled in a way that would have done good to the hearts of his enemies and friends alike. "Undoubtedly," he said. "I am sure he still lives."

Lyman Abbott has been severely criticized for his liberal opinions about Bible truths, but he declared in an article written a year or two ago that as one studied Christian history and observed the present-day progress of religion, one was conscious of "the perpetual presence of a great personality." That's pretty sound theology, after all. It sounds much like the apostrophe of the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews: "Jesus Christ, the same yesterday, today and forever!"

The disciples were, naturally enough, sad when Jesus said he had to go away. No wonder they would miss him. Three years of such friendship could not come to an end without deep heartache. But he said: "It is expedient for you that I go away." Expedient, even for them. Not only for the millions of his friends whom he would bless and guide and help through the coming ages in a way that he could not if he kept the limitations of his body, but better even for them. He would be nearer to them, more constantly with them, after his going away than before. At Pentecost they understood what he meant by that, for it was then that he really came back to them to dwell forever in their hearts.

Luke writes this book of Acts as he had written his former narrative, which we call his Gospel, in the form of a letter to his friend Theophilus. Nobody knows exactly who Theophilus was; but we know very well who Luke was. He was a doctor, a friend and co-worker of Paul's, and, as is evident from the "we" passages along in the latter part of the book, one of the companions of Paul on his voyage to Rome.

Luke states that his former narrative relates the story of Jesus up to the time of his ascension. He repeats the account of the appearances of Jesus to the disciples after his resurrection. In this connection be sure to read Paul's statement in the first eight verses of the fifteenth chapter of First Corinthians about the different people who saw Jesus after he rose. Luke puts down again the words of the wonderful promise Jesus made to these friends to whom he was saying good-by. "Ye shall be baptized with the Holy Spirit not many days hence."

We have next week the special study of the coming of the Holy Spirit, but it will be time well spent in connection with this lesson to look up the Old Testament and Gospel references to the Holy Spirit. Find and study the following passages. We shall probably refer to many of them in detail next week. Ezek. 36:25-27; Isa. 44:3; Joel 2:28-29; Matt. 3:11; Mark 1:8; Luke 3:16; John 1:33; John 7:38, 39.

NOTICE again that Jesus told the disciples to wait. He wished them to go forth with the glad news of salvation. Some of them were doubtless already eager to go. But he said "Wait!" Wait for the promise of the Father. Imagine a railway train ready to start, perhaps to take a trainload of passengers from a place of danger. The passengers are aboard. The crew are in their places. But there is no steam. There is no fire in the firebox. Imagine, if the passengers did not know about steam, the wild and fantastic efforts they might make to start the train. They would send for horses. (By the way, did you know that the New York Central trains used to be drawn by horses from the Grand Central station down through New York City, before the street railway system was developed?) So these people

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By REV. F. B. MEYER, D.D.

"He led captivity captive, and gave gifts unto men." Eph. 4:8.

What majestic words are these! They were first uttered by a woman. For twenty years Israel had suffered terribly under the iron yoke of Sisera. At last Deborah arose, as the Maid of Orleans in modern history. She inspired first Barak and then her people with heroic faith in the God of their fathers. Finally, on the morning of the battle, she descended from the high plateau of Tabor to the lower slopes, where Barak and his host had spent the night, summoning him in these words to lead in captivity those who for so long had held the chosen people captive. "Arise, Barak, and lead thy captivity captive, thou son of Abinoam." There are occasions when men may be able to obey the summons to rid themselves of the evil habits and sins by which they have been held. But there was no such help for our race, which was in captivity to the power of Satan, of death, and of the dark powers. No help, no hope, till Jesus descended to the manger-bed, and then to the cross and grave! He went down that he might go up. He descended that he might ascend. And when he rode up the steep of light to the City of God, he took bound to his chariot-wheels our deadly foes. Captivity that had captured was captured. The keys of death and Hades were transferred to his girdle; and all the treasures of heaven are now unlocked and opened for the use of those who by faith dare to appropriate them.

might get horses; they might get levers and cables and crowbars and exhaust themselves in furious effort to make the thing go. Meanwhile the fireman is quietly building his fire, steadily shoveling on coal. To all their entreaties and execrations the engineer replies calmly, "Wait." "Wait till we get fire." "Wait till we get steam." "You cannot hasten matters by your frantic efforts to make the train go. There is nothing to do but wait, wait, wait for fire and steam."

A good many churches would make far better headway during the whole of 1916 if they would put a stop to all their activities and begin like the disciples to pray for and await the coming of the Holy Spirit to give them the power they lack. You say all the church organizations and enterprises would suffer and fall apart. No, they would be infinitely strengthened. Did you ever hear Dr. Torrey tell about the time when he shut himself in his room, and, although he was the successful pastor of a large city church, vowed that he would never enter his pulpit again until he had received the baptism with the Holy Spirit, and knew it? Visions came to him of that empty pulpit and waiting, wondering congregation. But because he was willing to wait, because he determined to wait, he received such power as has made him the winner of multitudes of souls and his name a household word throughout Christendom.

But Dr. Torrey himself points out that there is really no need for waiting when once a soul has determined to receive the blessing and has made a full surrender. Notice the comments on another page on this week's Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. topic—Consecration. Consecration is not the difficult, dreadful thing many have fancied, but a delightful, reasonable act by which we yield ourselves to God. As we thus yield ourselves to him and definitely trust him, this blessing of the Holy Spirit's presence is received.

Then, as now, it was hard for the followers of Jesus to keep their minds on the spiritual rather than the material aspects of his kingdom. While he was talking about the splendors of an indwelling God, they interrupted with: "Lord, wilt thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel?" He said it was not necessary for them to know that. Then he brought their minds back again to his promise of spiritual blessing and endowment. "Ye shall receive power when the Holy Spirit is come upon you." Then after the power has come, they are to be witnesses, first at Jerusalem, then through Judea, then into Samaria—then "unto the uttermost part of the earth." That is Christ's program for Christianity.

Then he was gone. They returned to the city, went into the upper room, and began to pray and wait for the blessing that was to come.

ONE practical matter may well be discussed in class, both Junior and Adult, but particularly in the latter grade. How should we apply that rebuke of Jesus to the disciples for their desire to know when their nation's independence should be regained? It does not mean that Christians should not be zealous for liberty and reforms. It does not mean that they should not try to apply the principles of the Gospel to such practical affairs as housing the poor, providing for the children and the workers and the aged; it does not mean that they should not seek valiantly to get the will of God done on earth. Christians ought to do these things. Christ insisted throughout his ministry that his followers should do all they could to lighten the burdens and right the wrongs of the world. But he also insisted that spiritual concerns come first. He did insist that the first commandment is to love God with all the heart. So now, while he was trying to focus their mind upon the duty of waiting and praying for the coming of the Holy Spirit, he did not want them to be turning their thoughts to the question of the political liberties of the Jews. Again, there is a hint here of Christ's transcendent internationalism. He was to break down the narrow ideals of Judaism and begin the movement that would lead to world-wide brotherhood. They asked about Jewish liberties; he replied by telling them to preach the Gospel into the uttermost parts of the earth. In their dreams of liberty and justice he wanted them to think not of Israel, but of the world. Lastly, there was a hint here that it is not wise to make speculative prophecies about future events. Many are interested now in trying to relate present-day occurrences to Scripture prophecies and to try to fix the time of Christ's second coming. Jesus warns: "It is not for you to know the times and the seasons." Today's duty is clear—to be filled with the Holy Spirit and in the power of that endowment to help to the utmost of our strength and opportunity all whom we can reach.

The ever-present Saviour—that is today's real lesson. Not so much the ascending Lord, not so much the coming Lord, but the actually present Saviour, blessing, guiding, helping, cheering all who will yield their lives to him. Next week we shall consider the wonderful experience of Pentecost.

The How Column

Conducted by Frank L. Brown, Joint General Secretary World's Sunday School Association

More About Getting the Scholars to Study Their Lessons at Home

A NEW MILFORD teacher of ten boys averaging twelve years old testifies, with many other teachers, to the value of marking for lesson preparation: "We keep a class record of attendance, study, daily Bible readings and collections." A Topeka, Kan., teacher of Junior boys: "We use the Robert Raikes system of rewards, and the preparation of the lesson and presentation of the work-book is essential. All, with an occasional exception, prepare."

A teacher of young men writes: "I drop them a line each week through the mail, calling attention to parts of the lesson and requesting they be looked up and explained the following Sunday." A teacher of fifteen young women relies on "home visiting and personal effort to stimulate a pride in being a broad student, capable of knowing the Bible as one of the great books of the world."

A teacher of a class of young men at Oakland, Calif., assigns the class members to different sides on the lesson debate, with discussion and summary. Practically all are ready under this plan.

Another Ilion, N. Y., teacher of ten fifteen to seventeen year old boys has thus splendidly solved the question: "I meet the boys one evening each week, either in my home or the basement of the church when we do our homework; then have an hour for games or refreshments or plan some hike for Saturday afternoon." An Oakland, Calif., teacher of a class of thirteen-year-old girls writes: "I make out typewritten questions each week on the lesson. Some are with references and some thought-questions of a practical nature, suited to their every-day life. Practically all prepare, and if a lesson has been neglected on Sunday they usually make it up before the following Sunday."

From an Elizabeth, N. J., teacher of sixteen-year-old boys: "They have lesson books and take pride in writing out answers to questions on the lesson. We have written examinations and promotions with diplomas. Five-sixths prepare, and frequently all."

A teacher of a class of twenty-eight girls, thirteen to fourteen years of age, finds excellent results in home study by "sending report cards to parents" and grading the quality of the home study. Three-fourths of her girls prepare under this plan. Another Pennsylvania teacher who has twelve seventeen-year-old girls in her care writes: "I tell them what I do. If I am full of the subject they want to do the same." And ninety per cent. of her girls respond.

That ninety-eight per cent. of her scholars prepare is the testimony of a teacher of a large Denver class of young women. She says: "I try to make the lessons interesting so they will want to study them. The only way a teacher can get others to love Bible study is to love it herself, is my idea."

An Atchison, Kan., teacher of married ladies reports: "I ask them to read the book where the lesson is found." Others who have obtained good results say: "I suggest a set time for the lesson study, the same as a set time for public school study or other reading." "They usually study at home along the lines of the last lesson. I tell them what to study to finish the subject."

A large number of teachers dwell upon the value of assigning special questions. The results seem uniformly good. One says: "I give to each a written question or two, or ask the whole class to look up some special subject in the lesson. The girls beg for extra questions." One teacher assigns three-minute talks to the scholars.

From a group of teachers of the Beginners and Primary age come some very helpful suggestions. It will be noted that the home work with the younger children is often done in the week following the lesson.

"I try to have them bring in something that will illustrate our lesson. For illustration, last Sunday our lesson was on birds. I requested them to bring me something that birds make their nests of." "We give cards and books for perfect lessons. Also, if children keep their lesson papers for one quarter, we bind them at the end of that time and furnish attractive covers." "My children do not study the lesson in advance as I wish the story to be new when I tell it to them." "I usually make it a matter of competition. I take one of their papers and say, 'Now I am going to do the work just as I want you to do it, and let's see which does best.' They usually try to see if their work will look as well as mine or better." "Pupils have crayons for home coloring of papers." "They must know the memory verse in order to get the blue star. Otherwise they get a red star." "I give a Bible to those who come prepared twelve successive Sundays. I also write each week on the typewriter what I want them to do the coming week." And twelve of this teacher's fifteen boys come prepared.

Several things stand out quite clearly from these plans. The teacher must be full of the subject herself in order to inspire enthusiasm in the scholars. The assignment of definite work, such as a city, person, event, Bible reference or a life question, is needed with the average scholar to secure home preparation and promote class interest. The use of note books and school credits is of value.

In Mr. Lawrence's school at Toledo, Ohio, and in many other schools it has been customary to distribute each week Home Study question slips with, say, ten printed questions on the lesson for the following Sunday, due credit being given for their answer in the school honors.

The superintendent or teacher may suggest some good book in the school or public library, fiction or otherwise, that may throw some light on the lesson.

In a Brooklyn school a teacher would meet with a group of scholars to assist them in writing out, illustrating with pictures and decorating the lesson story in their note books.

Following the Trail

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

SOME people go journeying through life as across a desert, without a light to shine upon their way or a chart and compass to guide them. Many people travel diligently—but in the wrong direction; many are thieves of time—thieves who in despair keep on in the beaten path, never caring that it is the wrong path. Most people at some time see a light, but not all recognize it for what it is. Some see footprints in the sand and try to follow, but not all reach the goal.

THE Three Wise Men, mounted on camels, rode swiftly, eagerly, across the desert. And as the dust of their rapid passage whirled away on the keen December wind, a trail of footsteps—large, clearly-defined camel footprints—led away across the sand. But the Three Wise Men never took heed to the trail that they left, never glanced behind them; for their eyes were fastened on a glowing star that flung a silver sheet of radiance over a humble stable. And the Three Wise Men breathed many prayers as they followed the star, for they knew that there a Holy Child was sleeping.

The Three Wise Men, in good time, reached the vicinity of a little town called Bethlehem, and the feet of their desert steeds sank heavily into the mud of the streets. And presently the men knelt before the Holy Child, and in their hands they bore gifts—gold, and frankincense, and myrrh. And the Holy Child, smiling, nestled back in His mother's tender arms and slept.

THE desert sands swept out softly toward the East—silent, mysterious, alluring. And in the silver light of the great star that hung, like a heavenly lamp, in the sky, a band of wandering robbers stumbled upon the trail of the three camels. A young scout, running back to the camp that they had pitched, told the chief about it in a quavering, excited voice.

"Three camels have passed," he said, "three heavily laden camels. We must follow!"

The chief, a dark, vicious looking man with eyes keen from long acquaintance with the desert, speedily followed his scout, to the clearly defined trail. Eagerness shone from the evil face, as he bent over the tracks, for caravans were rare things in the winter months, and gold was scarce. A pleased smile curled his stern lips when he raised his head.

"Three camels have passed," he told his scout, in confirmation of the report, "and they were heavily laden. Moreover, they are not much in advance. You and I," he nodded genially to the young scout—"you and I will follow the trail. Two of us, coming from behind on fast horses, can surprise, and slay, and rob three men."

The young scout smiled beamingly at his chief, for he had never been honored so greatly before. He hurried back to the camp for the horses.

"Perhaps," he murmured to himself, "perhaps there will be gold and jewels. Perhaps this raid will make me rich!" And he blessed the camel tracks.

Away rode the chief and the scout—silently, as desert people ride. Once they lost the trail for a moment and the scout, slipping to his bare feet, ran in widening circles, as a beast would run, his nose near the ground. When he had found the trail again he lifted his head and laughed—a sharp barking laugh of triumph—and mounted his horse.

They rode along through the stillness, and the horses' hoofs, muffled in the sand, went faster and faster. Neither spoke until the chief reined his horse in suddenly.

"Do you notice that huge star in the sky ahead?" he whined; "the light from it shines in my very eyes—brighter than the sun! It blinds me and I can scarcely see!"

The young scout looked inquiringly at his chief, at the sky; then he laughed his short, barking laugh again.

"Perhaps it is a vision," he said gaily —for he was young and on his first real trail—"to me it looks strangely beautiful—as cloth of silver looks in the light of noonday."

The chief shook his head fretfully—"It is not beautiful," he said; "it is hideous. It is a mockery that my eyes ache to behold. Have you noticed how the camels' tracks seem to lie in its silver light?"

The young scout glanced at the trail and a sort of wonder gleamed out of his eyes.

"It looks," he mused, "as though the camels followed where the star led. Do you think—" But he left his sentence unfinished.

Silence descended upon the pair again as they urged their steeds onward. But oftentimes the chief drew his hand across his eyes as if to shut out the glorious light, and ever so often the young scout leaned sharply over his horse's neck to look at the trail.

Sandstorms come, in the desert, without warning. It was so that the sandstorm came upon the robber chief and the young scout with a whirl of wind from the west and a stinging hail of dirt. In the fashion of desert people, they caused their horses to kneel until the blinding curtain-like sheets of grayness could sweep away. Kneeling there, they could still see the starlight, dimly, through the blowing sand, and for no apparent reason the chief shivered in the pure gleam, and shut his eyes as if to keep out the light of it. And then, as suddenly as it had begun, the wind died away and the sand settled back softly and the star shone serenely in the deep blue of the heavens.

Nervously the chief started to his feet, one hand gripping his mantle over his chest. "We will go on!" he gasped.

The young scout was standing by his horse's head, staring off across the desert. His face looked disappointed.

"The trail, sir," he murmured; "it is gone."

The chief looked out across the sands with a half angry, half relieved glance. True, the sand storm had buried the camel trail beneath a gray blanket. The chief thought of the gold that had probably weighed down the camels, and he sighed; but as he turned his horse slowly toward the home tents a smile crept over his face.

"It was that accursed star!" he said to his scout. "That has caused our lack of success! And no longer will I have to ride in the face of it. . . . Come, we will go back!" But the young scout was looking at the star, and his voice came to the chief as from a distance.

"I will follow the trail!" he announced, "I will follow the trail!"

The chief sniffed sarcastically. "You may go," he said, "on your fruitless search. How can you follow a trail when there is no trail?"

The young scout looked stubbornly at the sky. This was his first large quest and he hated to give it up. "The footprints lay in the path of silver light," he told his chief; "I will follow the star!"

THE chief went back slowly, thoughtfully, over the desert sand. And as he went, he thought of the miracle of the light that had blinded him. "There was magic in it!" he mused.

But the young scout followed in the light of the star that fell, gloriously silver-colored, before him. Over the desert sands he followed, over rough places and smooth, up gentle little hills and down sharp inclines, until at last he came to the outskirts of a little town. And there, reining in his tired horse, he gave a glad cry, for in the mud that no desert sandstorm could blow away he saw the footprints of the three camels—the three heavily laden camels. And he saw that the trail still lay in the path of the star.

The young scout, as he neared the end of his quest, felt that he was a victor. But somehow none of the victorious feelings that robbers are wont to have came over him. Somehow,

Bran-Made Dainties

The modern idea in well-advised homes is to serve bran every meal. Always have a bran food on the table. That's to offset the ill effects of fine foods. Bran is Nature's laxative.

But authorities say that the bran must be unground. The flakes make it extra-efficient. It must be delicious, else folks will rebel at it.

And there must be variety, else folks tire.

All these problems have been solved in Pettijohn's. These two products can be used in 50 ways. Each food they make is a dainty, and each is efficient. Their goodness and their good effects will win your folks to bran.

Pettijohn's
Two Bran Foods
The Quaker Oats Company
Chicago

Breakfast Food Soft wheat rolled into luscious flakes, hiding 25 per cent unground bran. A breakfast dainty. Per package, 15 cents.

Pettijohn's Flour Patent flour with 25 per cent special bran, largely in flake form. Use like Graham flour in any recipe. Per package, 25 cents.

Burns Kerosene (Coal Oil)

Won GOLD MEDAL at World's Exposition San Francisco

LIGHTS WHOLE ROOM
BEATS ELECTRIC OR GASOLINE
10 DAYS FREE Charges Prepaid Send No Money

We don't ask you to pay a cent until you have used this wonderful modern light in your own home ten days—we even pay transportation charges. You may return it at our expense if not perfectly satisfied after putting it to every possible test for ten days. You can't possibly lose a cent. We want to prove to you that it makes an ordinary oil lamp look like a candle; beats electric, gasoline or acetylene. Lights and is put out like old oil lamp. Tests by Government and 33 leading Universities show it Burns 50 Hours on One Gallon common coal oil, and gives more than twice as much light as the best round wick open flame lamps. No odor, smoke or noise; simple, clean, no pressure, won't explode. Several million people already enjoying this powerful, steady light, nearest to sunlight. Guaranteed.

Men with Rigs or Autos make big money delivering the ALADDIN on our easy plan. No previous experience necessary. Practically every farm home and small town here will buy after trying. Conrad, a farmer near Basil, O., and subscriber to Christian Herald, used an Aladdin one year in his own home, then started distributing among his neighbors and has disposed of several hundred lamps in his County the past three winters, making splendid money. Thousands who are coining money endorse the Aladdin just as strongly. No Money Required. We furnish capital to reliable men to get started. Ask for our distributor's plan and learn how to make big money in unoccupied territory. Sample sent for 10 Days' Free Trial. We want one user in each locality to whom we can refer customers. Be the first and get our special introductory offer under which you get your own lamp free for showing it to a few neighbors and sending in their orders. Write quick for 10 DAY ABSOLUTELY FREE TRIAL. Address nearest office.

MANTLE LAMP COMPANY, 339 Aladdin Building
Largest Kerosene (Coal Oil) Mantle Lamp House in the World
CHICAGO NEW YORK CITY PORTLAND, ORE. MONTREAL or WINNIPEG, CANADA

Free for Testing

A pair of mated EVERBEARING STRAWBERRY PLANTS FREE if you will report as to your success with them. Will bear loads of big, red, berries from June to November. We have counted 400 berries, blossoms and buds on a single plant. A postal will bring the plants, also enough seed of the new GERALD, PETERITA to plant a rod square of ground. Also a pkt. of perennial ORIENTAL POPPY seed. Send 10 cts for mailing expense or not, as you please. Write today and get acquainted with

THE GARDNER NURSERY COMPANY
Box 769, Osage, Iowa.

PASTOR'S COMMUNION SERVICE

For Visiting the Sick

Every Pastor should have one. Leather Case. Silver-plated Flagon and Wafer Box, six crystal glasses. An ideal gift for the pastor. Special price, $8.50 postpaid, satisfaction guaranteed.

THOMAS COMMUNION SERVICE CO.
Box 611
Lima, Ohio.

"MY TRIP TO EUROPE." Gives the experience of an American girl in her travels abroad. Postpaid 55c. A. VOEGELIN, 53 West Seymour Street, Philadelphia as he rode slowly through the town, he felt that he did not want to surprise folk, or kill them, or rob them. He felt strangely at peace.

The trail of the camels led past the more pretentious part of the town, down narrow side streets, until an inn came into sight. There, by the stable of the inn, the young scout could see three dark bulks with hunched up backs. But somehow the young scout, instead of spurring into the courtyard, rode softly through the gate toward the stable. For the star beamed down on the stable with a strange glory—a glow that seemed full of music and fragrance as well as of light. The young scout dismounted quietly and crept past the three camels into the stable.

IT was dark in the stable; and yet it was light, too, with a wonderful light that clung brightly on the hair of a young mother who held a tiny baby pillowed in her arms. It shone, in a reflected glory, on the gold and jewels that were held by a white-bearded old man, who knelt before the baby. It gleamed dully on the precious metal that was molded into caskets filled with fankincense and the bitter-sweet of myrrh. But the young scout did not seem to notice these things. He had forgotten that he was a thief, a murderer, a dangerous character.

Outside, the light of the star glowed as if heaven had opened. Outside a myriad angels sang. But inside of the sordid little stable the tiny baby looked over the heads of the Wise Men and smiled into the face of the young scout. And the young scout, a wordless prayer in his heart, dropped to his knees.

SOME people go journeying across the sands of life without chart or compass to guide them. And, though many start in the wrong direction, there comes a light, surely once to every one, that will lead in the right way. Some are blinded by the light, some are overawed by it, and some never see it. But some people follow it on and on over rough hills and through dark valleys, until at last it brings them into the presence of a Holy Child.

Artistic Christmas Cards

RAPHAEL TUCK & SONS, the well-known art publishers, have produced a remarkable line of personal greeting cards, calendars and engraved tokens for the Christmas season. Among the wonderful collection shown there are cards for autographs, cards with gay, Japanese-like Paradise birds or dainty Kate Greenaway children on them; hand-tinted cards that hold tiny cardboard vases filled with fragrant pot-pourri, and cards that picture the sweet, half-forgotten corners of old gardens. The Raphael Tuck cards and calendars are perfect as to printing and engraving, exquisite as to coloring, and charming as remembrances of Christmas friendship and greeting.

*He shall this life with good deeds fill,
Whose aim is first to do God's will.*

Mrs. Longwed's Advice To Mrs. Newbride

Little Mrs. Newbride isn't used to such hard work. Everywhere she looks she sees wet or soiled clothes. It's mid-afternoon and only half of her wash is done—to say nothing of all her other neglected work.

Fortunately Mrs. Longwed, her next-door neighbor is kind-hearted and wants to help. She has done her own wash (and a much larger one, too) with Fels-Naptha Soap and it has been drying for a couple of hours. She is not tired either. So she is glad to show Mrs. Newbride how she does her work so easily and quickly.

Mrs. Newbride tells Mrs. Longwed she uses "any kind of soap." "That is the reason," says Mrs. Longwed, "that you don't get through your work as soon as I do. And your clothes don't look as nice, either."

"Now I will show you what I use—Fels-Naptha. I call it the wonder-soap. It really saves me half the hard work I used to do before I used it. I wash with it, clean with it—do all my household soap-and-water work with it."

Of course, there must be a reason why Fels-Naptha Soap is different—why it works for you and saves time and strength. Fels-Naptha is a perfect combination of good soap with naphtha and other wonderful and harmless cleansers, which dissolve grease, take out stains and make dirt disappear without hard rubbing or scrubbing. Try it for your washing and household cleaning.

Fels & Co., Philadelphia

Young People's Topics for January 2

What Is Consecration?

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topic. Mark 12: 28-34 (Consecration Meeting)

CONSECRATION is a terrible word to some people, even to some Christians. The thought of making a full surrender to God is a thought of terror. It is not true of them as it is true of the wicked, that "God is not in all their thoughts." He is in their thoughts, but they are afraid of him. Some of the saddest chapters in the story of religious experience are those that tell of the terrible struggles of earnest souls with fantastic, mysterious ideas of duty. They feel and hear strange "calls" to do strange things and are thrown into spiritual despair because they cannot bring themselves to the point of saying "yes" to these vague and terrible voices. A psychological study of these "obsessions" traces them back to most unexpected causes, very far removed from heavenly voices. God does not talk to us that way. "My yoke is easy," said Jesus. "Come now, and let us reason together," saith the Lord. Again Jesus declared, "My sheep know my voice." When you are not sure it is Christ speaking to you you may be quite sure it is not he.

For instance, a young mother thought she heard the "call" to go as a foreign missionary. The evangelist who was conducting the consecration meeting asked her to talk it over frankly with him. What were her circumstances? Was she free to go? What were her home obligations? Then she confessed that she was the mother of a family of young children. "Well, then," said the evangelist, "just tell the Lord that when you have finished this present task he has given you, when the children are all able to take care of themselves, then if the way opens, you will be glad to go as a missionary." The burden rolled away at once from the mother's heavy heart; the cloud was lifted. She saw that the plain, reasonable, simple way is God's way.

Before summing up with a statement as to what consecration really consists of, let us remind ourselves of three great facts that ought to keep us always from being afraid to trust ourselves and all our belongings with God.

The first fact is that God is very kind. The next, that he is very strong.

The third, that he is very wise.

He is so kind, so strong, so wise that we ought to count ourselves very fortunate that he promises to control our lives and our affairs if we will let him. Kinder than our best friend; kinder to us than we could possibly be to ourselves; stronger than all the forces of man and nature; wiser than all earth's counselors—shall we not trust this heavenly Friend?

To consecrate ourselves to him means that we enter into an agreement with him that just as far and as fast as he makes his will clear to us, we will obey. Sometimes it is our duty to stay, not to go. Sometimes it is our duty to keep silent—not to speak. The rests in orchestral music are as necessary as the tones, and for an instrument to sound when the conductor wishes silence spoils the whole production.

What is there under the sun that should make us hesitate to give ourselves unreservedly for every hour of 1916 and every year thereafter to this wise, strong, loving Friend? He will make our lives harmonious, clean, fruitful. Without him we can do—how much? Nothing. It is the dictum of Jesus. With him, how much? Hear Paul's exultant boast: "I can do all things through Christ, who strengtheneth me."

It was a happy choice to assign the love commandment for this consecration lesson. To love God—that is the first duty. After that to love our neighbor and to let Christ work out in our lives the love he himself has implanted in our hearts.

Keeping the Morning Watch

Epworth League Topic. Ps. 5: 1-3; 88: 13; 90: 14, R. V.

IN the beginning, God. That is the only safe and wise start for every world, for every enterprise, for every life, for every day.

We live nowadays under such pressure, so furiously, with such complexity and haste that it requires considerable figuring to provide for that quiet moment with God at the beginning of the day. "Late to bed and early to rise" is the motto for most of us, and often there is scarcely time for breakfast. What can we do about the morning watch?

I suppose no one will question that the morning watch ought to be kept, and that most of us could keep it more regularly if we would plan more carefully. Sometimes it can be kept in unexpected places—a half hour or quarter hour meditation on the train, after one has caught it; some thoughtful moments on the way to school, remembering that we can walk with Christ along the sidewalks of our town as truly as Peter or Andrew ever walked with him along the narrow streets of Capernaum or Bethsaida; the sudden lifting of the heart to him as we begin our study or our work.

Paul tells us to "pray without ceasing." Not only at the day's beginning, but throughout its hours and at its end we may talk with God. That is the true prayer life—a life that looks Godward through every waking moment, and that, even in dreams, is often in touch with him.

The God of Hope: A Christmas Sermon

Continued from page 1298

in what they call a practical and wise fashion, "you can accomplish just about so and so much. To be sure, you will be disappointed to think you can do no more than this: it is meager and flat; but you must remember that you are common clay, and that therefore you can count on only common results. Do not waste your time building air-castles. Do not fritter away business hours on heroic dreams. Learn to enjoy mediocrity. Make a living, take care of yourself, and let the rest of the world sublimely alone." I have heard tolerably good people say such words; a good many clergymen imply it in their depressed moments. But it is pernicious counsel, false and cowardly. Since Jesus Christ became part of our humanity on the first Christmas, no man is merely "common clay." Since Jesus Christ took poverty and small learning and no worldly advantage and a short life, and with these adverse elements forged a life of perfect mastery and strength, there is no man so poor, so unlearned, so obscure, so short-lived, but can win everlasting gratitude from men—if such an one will lose his life in the strength of Christ, to be found anew in power. Any man who believes, truly believes, in the God of Christmas-day is at liberty to hope anything; making only one provision, that after he has hoped the greatest hope he dared, God will give him something far better. Better a thousand times a young man should strive and seem ignobly to fail—you notice I say seem to fail, for no true man has ever really failed since Christ was nailed to the cross—better a thousand times such seeming to fail than to go plodding in hidden, easy valleys all one's days, with never a reverse. How bitter is that timid folly which counsels a young man to crawl on the earth lest soaring he now and then get a fall. I fancy—yes, I am sure—that men do not so often differ in ability or in native power as they differ in this willingness to take God at his word, and to reach out for what worldly-minded wisdom calls the unattainable. If all people in the strength of their youth could be so sure that God plans the world for their hopes that they would send out their hopes, free and high, then what a splendor of accomplishment we should soon have in every corner of the earth! Christmas-day could not be till men had sufficiently hoped for it. Men filled with the heroic and effective greatness of Christ cannot be till they have run every risk in aspiring to be filled with that divine might, till they have hoped the greatest, noblest thing within reach of their vision. Then, then—the time having come—God will send his answer; and that answer shall be unguessed heights above their last and highest hope. God is a God of hope. O young men, dare to hope everything that is brave and noble this Christmas-day.

THEN there are the old who do not need advice, but give advice to themselves. They say very often, "Yes, yes; hope is for the young. Let them dream of a gay future. But our life is nearly done. We have no hope. . . ." That is all wrong. Hope is for everybody. You need not remember that Michelangelo, grown old and famous as painter and sculptor, gave years of unexpected greatness to architecture long after the age when most men have folded their hands to rest. It need not be labor which gives a man power. From how many an old man comes the sweet sympathy and encouragement, which only age can give, to his younger brother who is in the thick of life; and how often that sympathy, that encouragement is more than books and battles and kingdoms in making the coming generation live up to its best. The pity of it is that the old man does not know it always; but he shall know it some time. He shall know that while he was hoping that he might be strenuously at work as in the old days, he was doing a work finer, stronger, more lasting than on the most active day of his busiest life.

And then, even suppose a person to be so shut in that there is nothing here to hope for. Then hope against hope. God answers hopes: it is his nature to do so. Hope superb hopes; and some time, I know not when—somewhere, I know not the place—you shall find them all.

"We two will stand beside the shrine,
Occult, withheld, untrod,
Whose lamps are stirred continually
With hopes sent up to God;
And see our old hopes, granted, melt
Each like a little cloud."

IS there anyone today burdened with sorrow, or loneliness, or dread anxiety for the future? It would be strange if there were not some secret heaviness in many a heart this morning. Now I will not say that the man who depends on the love in Christ can always hope for the brightest and best to come out of all seeming sorrow and hardship. But I do say that every man ought to have such a hope. If some terrible dread fastens itself to your hearts, banish it this Christmas-day. Banish it, in Christ's name; for, rationally, it has no place in a Christian heart. Heaviness may endure for a season; but joy cometh in the morning. Hope for, expect, the joy, and God will give it—not the joy you exactly hoped, but a better; and you will know it to be a better joy. What God is even now doing for our vanished ones we can only dream and hope; but dream as we will with our most ardent longings, we know that he is surrounding them with a happiness beyond our most feverish hope. How safe they are in God's nearer keeping! How unbecoming that we should begrudge their safety! And then for ourselves. Our very loneliness we may hope to be a link in a new gladness for those we mourn as for ourselves. We hope it, and lo, so it shall be—only a better gladness.

O sad, discouraged, distracted men and women, hope wildly, extravagantly this Christmas morning. For God is the God of hope.

A Great Prayer Clearing-House

By JOHN G. HALLIMOND, Ph.D.

THE members of the Christian Herald Prayer League will doubtless be interested in hearing something of the remarkable events that are continually happening along the line of prayer in the Bowery Mission meetings.

All the requests for prayer that are received in the Christian Herald office, after having been duly noted and classified there, are sent by the editor for special prayer at every Sunday evening Brotherhood meeting. Here they are most earnestly and reverently received, and fervent prayer is offered publicly for every case. The average number received is about five hundred per week.

The Christian Herald regularly mentions cases of answered prayer that come from the outside, but some of the most thrilling and inspiring testimonies to the fact of God answering prayer come out of the experiences of the Bowery Mission men themselves.

Never a meeting in the Brotherhood passes but that, when the opportunity occurs, men start to their feet and relate definite answers to prayer. The prayer that, perhaps, comes most frequently from the members of the Brotherhood, nearly all of whom in the beginning are out of work, is a prayer for a job. The records of the Labor Bureau show that fully ninety per cent. of the members of the Brotherhood have been put into possession of employment through its agency, and as a result of prayer.

OF all the wonderful stories told with regard to direct divine interposition at some critical juncture in a human being's experience, none is more wonderful to me than my own. Two years ago I was stricken down suddenly by what had all the appearance of being a fatal illness. My own doctor and two other specialists whom he called in held out little or no hope. I felt myself that the end had come. For a week I lay in extreme bodily agony, and most of the time unconscious. To relieve the pain my physician had on several occasions to administer morphine. One memorable night, when I was barely conscious because of intense suffering, my wife sat by my side, holding my hand. The doctor had been obliged to leave me for a short time. Suddenly the pain left me, and turning to my wife I asked her what night in the week it was. "It is Thursday night," she said. "Then," I said, "I know they have been praying for me at the Mission, for the pain has gone, and I am going to get better." The doctor, a Hebrew gentleman, returned shortly, and I at once said to him, "I am going to get better, doctor, and it is in answer to prayer."

Thursday night was my own special night at the Mission, and the men there had agreed to spend it in prayer for my recovery, and I have the deepest and most unshakable conviction that it was in answer to their prayers that God laid his healing hand upon me.

Cases like this very often happen. Last Sunday morning one of the Mission leaders living in the country telephoned just as the meeting was commencing, saying that a little child, daughter of a friend of his, was lying critically ill with diphtheria, and asking us to pray for her. We did. From that moment the child began to mend and is now fully recovered.

A few evenings before, just as the meeting was commencing, another leader was telephoned to by a friend saying that the lady with whom she was living was ill and in a critical condition, and asking for prayers. The prayer was submitted at the meeting and the lady began to recover at the identical moment the prayer was offered.

Some of the most pathetic instances of answer to prayer have to do with men who are separated from their families, and the testimonies that are borne to this fact are wonderful and soul-stirring. One of the leaders of the Mission was for fifteen years separated from his wife and three little children. He was living a miserable life on the Bowery. His wife and friends sought, but could not find him. Certain legal matters demanded his presence and he had been advertised for, but he was not to be found; he was lost in the great surging crowd of homeless men in the city. To settle legal obligations his wife was obliged to divorce him, and appealed to the courts of her state to have him declared dead, in order that an unclouded title might be given to certain properties. Then there came a wonderful night in his life when he gave himself up to God and became a thoroughly regenerated man. He began to pray, and his friends in the Mission prayed that he might have his wife and family restored to him. These prayers continued through many anxious months, and finally the answer came. Ten years ago I had the pleasure of remarrying him to his wife, and today he is one of the most respected men in the community, surrounded by children and grandchildren and a large circle of devoted friends.

ONE of the most disreputable looking men that ever came into the Mission was soundly converted here some five years ago. He had so neglected and abused his wife that he had been several times imprisoned, and finally the police of his city had drawn a dead-line around his house, and warned him that if ever he came near he would be severely punished. He was a Protestant, his wife a Roman Catholic, and when he came to the Mission there did not seem the shadow of a possibility of a reconciliation, but in for twenty years had lived a dissipated life and had nearly broken his heart, had been converted in the Mission in answer to his prayers. The son sat by his side, and with a gladsome light in his eyes, and a voice ringing with emotion, testified to the truth of the father's assertion.

A few weeks previous, a former senator of a Southern state came over on a special visit to the Mission from the city of Washington, bringing his son with him, and they followed each other in testimony of the fact that, in answer to a prayer uttered by the boy in deep distress one night in the Bowery Mission, God had entered into his life and made it possible for him to be restored to his dear ones at home.

ONE of the former leaders of the Mission, now somewhat advanced in years, and a prosperous business man of the city, visits us occasionally and produces a deep impression by the story of his conversion. He was born in the city of New York, and on coming to manhood married and had a large family of little children, when he gave way to a life of drunkenness and gambling. He was well known on the Bowery, and had a most unenviable reputation for crookedness, and even worse. His wife, however, was a praying woman, and a member of the Baptist Church. She prayed incessantly for his conversion; she continued to pray even when things became increasingly dark and hopeless. She never gave up praying.

Her prayers and her exhortations at last made him so uncomfortable that he decided to leave his wife and children to fight for themselves, and taking all the money he possessed out of the bank—some three hundred dollars—he went to Chicago. He had a vague idea of trying, in new surroundings, to live a better life; but on his arrival at Chicago, passing along a certain street, he heard the rattle of poker chips, entered the house from whence the sound proceeded, and in a short time had lost all his money. He was reduced to sore distress, and became a dishwasher in a restaurant. This place happened to be occupied by a Christian woman, who on several occasions spoke kindly to him, and at last got from him the story of his leaving his wife and children in destitution. She urged him to return to them, which he did.

Then came the wonderful answer to his wife's prayer. Passing down the Bowery, he saw the people streaming into the old Windsor Theater, where a gospel meeting was being held under the leadership of Fred Schevira. Under the influence of Schevira's speech, he became a converted man, and has ever since been one of the most active Mission workers in the city. Two years later, when his anniversary was being celebrated in the Bowery Mission, his wife told the story of this wonderful answer to her many prayers. Another lady, who was present, at the close of the meeting sought the wife and weepingly told her that she had been praying for ten years for the conversion of her husband. They both agreed to pray for this second man. He was then and is at the present time in one of the best-known business houses in the city, but was living an exceedingly worldly and evil life. His wife and two daughters, finding this new reinforcement to their prayers, became still more importunate in beseeching God in his behalf.

Apparently by accident he found himself one night, very much against his will, in the Bowery Mission and one of his daughters by his side. To his great surprise and indignation his daughter was called upon to sing. He was furiously angry, and determined to forbid her ever going to such a place again; but when she rose, and in a sweet voice began to sing "What will you do with Jesus?" his heart was broken. Their prayers were answered. That night he became a Christian man, and for sixteen years has been a leader in the Bowery Mission.

IN nothing, however, has the great reality of prayer been so impressed upon Bowery Mission workers as in the wonderful way in which Christ's striking injunction and promise have been realized. "Pray ye the Lord of the harvest, and he will send laborers into the vineyard."

One by one the old supporters of the Mission have passed away to their reward, and as each one has gone the question has arisen, Who will fill his place? The place has always been filled in apparently the most miraculous manner. The leaders of the various departments meet every week for a review of the work, but especially for prayer for divine help in the great undertaking. The success of the Brotherhood, the Mission industries, the Labor Settlement at Tuckahoe, and the recently acquired Memorial Farm at Yorktown Heights, has been distinctly, in each case, in answer to prayer. It is for all these reasons that I ventured to select as the title of this little article, "A Great Prayer Clearing-House"—The Bowery Mission.

She said:

Dear Santa, do you know
At you're the nicest man?
You bring me dolls and Teddy bears,
An' everything you can,
An' cause I never thought a mite
Until this very year,
I asked an' asked an' never said,
I thank you, Santa dear!
So, please, this Christmas, don't you care
About my games an' toys;
But take 'em all to chellen poor,
To little girls an' boys
Who never had a stocking full,
An' never had a tree;
Oh, won't you do this, Santa Claus?
You've done so much for me!
I've kissed this letter for a stamp
An' up the chimney flue
I'm throwing it. I know the wind
Will blow it safe to you,
So please, dear Santa, give some child
My Teddy bear an' dolly
'At really needs 'em. Lots of love
An' kisses from your answer to prayer the reconciliation came, and today he is an honored employee of the city government of Philadelphia, and he is living in one of the happiest homes in that city.

A few weeks ago a banker came from the city of Boston, and publicly thanked God that his son, who

Amarilly of Clothes-Line Alley

By BELLE K. MANIATES

Copyright, 1915, by Little, Brown & Co. All rights reserved

CHAPTER XXII

WORK on the Boarder's Annex was begun with frantic zeal, each and every member of the Jenkins family lending a helping hand. The Boarder, as boss carpenter, worked after switching hours until it grew dark; then the children took turns in holding a lantern for him. The savings of the Boarder being taxed by the trip to "Niagry" and the furnishing of the apartment, great economy had to be exercised in the erecting of the Annex.

Amarilly pleaded for a bay window, but the Boarder felt this ornamentation to be quite beyond his means, so they finally compromised on a small and simple porch on which Lily Rose could sit of a summer night while the Boarder sat by her side. Mrs. Jenkins, moved to memories long dormant of the home of her youth, suggested blinds instead of window-shades, but the Boarder after much figuring proved adamant in resistance to this temptation.

Lily Rose was the only one who made no suggestions. Anything the Boarder might construct in the way of a nesting place was beautiful in her eyes.

"She'd be too sorter modist-like to tell me if she was sot on any pertier thing about the new place," he confided wistfully to Amarilly. "You're so sharp I wish you'd kinder hint around and find out what she wants."

Amarilly diplomatically proceeded to put out "feelers," and after much maneuvering joyously imparted to the Boarder the information that Lily Rose loved to look at the one solitary tree that adorned the Jenkins lot, because to her it meant "the country."

"So that's the way she loves to look out," informed Amarilly, "and you see there isn't any window on that side of your rooms."

"There shall be one," declared the Boarder firmly.

"Couldn't you make it a bay?" again coaxed Amarilly. "It's on the side the sun comes in most, and the doctor said Lily Rose should get all the sunlight she could."

The Boarder sighed.

"Don't tempt me, Amarilly. There ain't a cent more I kin squeeze out."

"I'll think out a way," thought Amarilly confidently.

She took the matter to Colette, who instantly and satisfactorily solved the problem, and Amarilly returned radiant.

"She says you've saved too much out for furniture, and to build the bay window from the furniture fund."

The Boarder shook his head.

"I thought of that, but thar ain't a thing I can take out of that. I got the figgers on the price of everything from the House Furnishers' Establishment."

"But you see, Miss King says no one ever comes to a wedding without bringing a present. That it wouldn't be et—,—dear me! I have forgotten what the word is. And she says not to buy any furniture till all the presents come, and then I can settle the rooms for you while you and Lily Rose are away. Lots of the things you are expecting to buy will be given you."

"It's risky," said the Boarder dubiously. "We'll most likely git casters and Bibles and tidies. That's what I've allers seen to weddin's."

"Well, I see I have got to put a flea in your ear, but don't tell Lily Rose. Let it be a surprise to her. Miss King is going to give you a handsome base-burner coal stove. So you can take that off your list."

The Boarder looked pleased and yet distressed.

"She shouldn't go fer to do that!" he protested.

"Well, she wants to give you a nice present because you've been nice to us, and she thinks Lily Rose is sweet, and she says she believes in making sensible presents. She asked Mr. Meredith what to get, and he told her to get the stove, so you see it's all right if he says so. She thought you wouldn't need a stove till next winter, but I told her you wanted the rooms furnished complete now."

"Then," said the Boarder beamingly, "the bay winder shall be cut out tomorrow."

When Lily Rose was brought over one starlight night in budding May to of outward and visible expressions of affection, and he was deeply moved by this voluntary offering.

The Annex grew rapidly, but its uprising was not accomplished without some hazard and adventure. There was an exciting day when Cory fell through the scaffolding where she had been climbing. She suffered a moment of unconsciousness and a bump on her head.

There was also a thrilling moment when Iry thrust his head through the

"The rest of him is smaller than his head," observed Amarilly practically, as she arrived upon the scene and took a comprehensive view of the case. "Push him through, Flam, and I'll go around on the other side and get him."

Iry, safely landed in Amarilly's arms, laughed his delight, and thinking it a sort of game, was about to repeat his stunt of "in and out."

"It's time something was done to you," said Amarilly determinedly, "before you get killed in this place. I am going to spank you, Iry, and Co, too."

In spite of wailing protests Amarilly administered a spanking to the two younger children that worked effectually against further repetition of their hazardous performances. But Bobby tobogganed down the roof during its shingling and sprained his ankle.

"He can break his neck if he wants to," remarked Amarilly, when besought by Co to punish him too.

Mrs. Jenkins lost a finger-nail by an injudicious use of the hammer. Bud sat down in the paint pot, and had to go to bed while his clothes were cleaned. In fact Lily Rose was the only one of the whole family circle to suffer no injury, but the Boarder guided her so tenderly over every part and plank of the Annex that there was no chance for mishap.

When the lathing and plastering were completed, the little bride-elect began to tremble with timidity and happiness at the consciousness of the nearness of her approaching transfer to the Home.

The plan of the Boarder had been to leave the walls rough and unfinished till their settling process should be accomplished, but Amarilly, absorbed heart and soul in this first experience of making a nesting place, pleaded for paper—"quiet, pretty paper with soft colors," she implored, Derry's teachings now beginning to bear fruit in Amarilly's development of the artistic.

"Amarilly, we can't hev everything to onet," he rebuked solemnly. "The paper'll crack as sure as fate, if you put it on now."

"Let it crack!" defied Amarilly. "Then you can put on more. You're away nearly all day, and the rest of us are at work, but if Lily Rose has to sit here all day and look at these white walls that look just like sour bread that hasn't riz"—Derry had not yet discovered this word in Amarilly's vocabulary—"she'll go mad."

"Amarilly," sighed the Boarder, "you'll hev me in the poorhouse yit!"

"Oh, dear!" sighed Amarilly. "I'll have to let you into another secret. Mr. Meredith is going to give you and Lily Rose a handsome center-table and an easy-chair. There won't be any surprises left for you by the time the wedding is over, but you're so set, I have to keep giving things away to you."

"That makes me think," remarked the Boarder. "I was going to ask you what I'd order give the preacher fer marryin' Lily Rose and me. The fireman of Number Six told me he give two dollars when he was spliced, but you see, Mr. Meredith is so swell, I'd order give more."

Amarilly gazed reflectively into space while she grappled with this proposition.

"Do you know," she said presently, with the rare insight that was her birthright, "I don't think Mr. Meredith would like money—not from you—for Lily Rose. You see, he's a sort of a friend, and you'd better give him a present, because money, unless it was a whole lot, wouldn't mean anything to him."

"That's so," admitted the Boarder, "but what kin I give him?"

Amarilly had another moment of thought.

"Make him a book-rack. Mr. Derry will draw you the design, and you can

The TOUCH of HIS HAND

A Legend of the Christ child

By Annie J. Flint

An ancient legend recounts that of the Three Wise Men one was a King who brought gold to the King of Kings and on him Jesus smiled; the second was a Priest with incense for the High Priest, from whom the Child took the gift and clasped it to His breast; and the third was the Prophet of the ages, bearing the myrrh, emblem of burial and of broken hopes and broken hearts, and for him was the tender touch of the Christ who was to rise in triumph that the sorrows of humanity might nevermore be comfortless.

The Wise Men came to the Holy Child,
And precious gifts they bore;
But knew they what their giving meant,
For all their wisdom's lore?

The King before the King of Kings
Arrayed his golden offerings;
Beneath the gaze of the Baby eyes,
Brooding, questioning tender-wise;
With glint of setting and flash of gems
Shone ring and scepter and diadem,
And from His mother's lap the Child
At the heaped-up riches gravely smiled.
Did He feel the weight of another crown
And the warm, red drops that should trickle down,
And know He must suffer and groan and bleed
Ere His Kingdom of love should be His indeed?

The Priest knelt down and a rich perfume
Floated over the lowly room;
From the costly frankincense he brought,
And the Child reached out His hand, and caught
And drew the casket to His heart;
As if from its treasure He could not part;
Did He see His soul in the depths of pain,
And the veil of the Temple rent in twain,
That man might enter the Holy Place
And speak with the Father, face to face?

And last there came the Prophet-Sage,
All bent with sorrow, bowed with age;
And, prostrate at the Baby feet,
Laid down his burden, bitter-sweet;
And straightway through the air there stole
A sense of anguish, loss and dread,
And the Christ-child raised His little hand,
And softly touched the old man's head;
Did He hear in the suppliant's patient sigh,
The voice of sad humanity,
That fills the years
With moans and tears
And echoes every mourner's cry,
From the wail of Eve o'er her first-born dead
To Rachel's woe uncomfited,
And know that grief must still hold sway
Till He should wipe all tears away?

see the beautiful aperture that would eventually become a bay window and face the solitary tree, two dewy drops of joy came into her eyes. Before them all she raised her pale little face for a kiss which the Boarder bestowed with the solemn air of one pronouncing a benediction, for Lily Rose was chary railings of the new porch. Satisfied with his outlook, he would fain have withdrawn, but was prevented by an unaccountable swelling of his pate. Flamingus, coming to the rescue and working seemingly on the theory that his skull might be compressible, tried to pull him backward.

carve it out. You can do it noons after you eat your luncheon."

"That's jest what I'll do. So with the fee saved and the cheer and table out, I kin paper the rooms. You find out what kind Lily Rose wants."

Lily Rose was easily persuaded to let Derry be consulted. He promptly volunteered to tint the walls, having studied interior decorations at one time in his career. He wrought a marvelous effect in soft grays and browns with bordering graceful vines.

Lily Rose by taking advantage of a bargain sale on suits saved enough from her trousseau to curtain the windows in dainty blue and white muslin.

Derry then diverted the appropriation for an ingrain carpet to an expenditure for shellac and paint with which he showed Amarilly how to do the floors.

At last the Annex was ready for painting. Lily Rose wistfully stated that she had always longed to live in a white house, so despite the fact that the Jenkins house proper was a somber red, the new part was painted white.

At Amarilly's suggestion, the wood-work was also painted white.

The moment the paint was dry and the Annex announced "done," the Boarder took Lily Rose to view their prospective domicile. They were unaccompanied by any of the family, but it took the combined efforts of Mrs. Jenkins, Amarilly, and Flamingus, whose recent change in voice and elongation of trousers gave him an air of authority, to prevent a stampede.

Lily Rose returned wet-eyed, sweetly smiling, and tremulous of voice, but the Boarder stood erect, proud in his possessions.

Colette vetoed the plan for Amarilly to settle in the absence of the groom and bride.

"If you have it all furnished beforehand," she argued, "there will be just so much more room to entertain in on the night of the wedding."

And then Lily Rose confessed that "she'd love to be 'to hum' in her own place."

"But they won't be furnished," argued Amarilly.

"Oh, yes, they will," assured Colette. "It's etiquette—" she paused to see Amarilly writing the word down in a little book she carried—"for people to send their presents before they come, and you can settle as fast as they come in."

The wedding gifts all arrived the day before the wedding. The base-burner, though not needed for some months, was set up, because the Boarder said he would not feel at home until he could put his feet on his own hearth. John Meredith sent an oaken library table and an easy-chair. Derry's offering was in the shape of a beautiful picture.

The best man, who fortunately had appealed to Amarilly for guidance, gave a couch. The Jenkins family, assessed in proportion to their respective incomes, provided a bedroom set. Lily Rose's landlady sent a willow rocker; the girl friends at the factory, a gilt clock; the railroad hands, six silver spoons and an equal number of forks. Lily Rose's Sunday school teacher presented a lamp.

These presents were all arranged in the new rooms by Lily Rose, and the elegance of the new apartment was overwhelming.

"It look most too fine to feel to hum in," gasped the Boarder. "It makes me feel strange!"

"It won't look strange to you," assured the bride-elect, looking shyly into his adoring eyes, "when you come home and find me sitting here in my blue dress waiting for you, will it?"

"No!" agreed the Boarder with a quick intake of breath. "Twill be home and heaven, Lily Rose."

CHAPTER XXIII

SHYLY and perversely Lily Rose had postponed the trying on of her borrowed wedding waist until the day preceding the great event.

"There won't be time to fit it," pleaded Amarilly.

And Lily Rose had smiled a faraway smile and said her veil would cover it anyway. But finally Amarilly's pleas prevailed and the beloved garment was brought forth.

Amarilly took it reverently from its wrappings and held it up to view. After many exclamations of wonder and admiration, Lily Rose, who had removed her dress, essayed to try it on.

"Why, Amarilly," she said, struggling to get her arm into the sleeve, "there's something the matter!"

Amarilly hastened to investigate.

"Oh!" she gasped, after thrusting her hand within, "to think it should be in here, for I am sure this is what Miss King has been looking for so long."

She hurried to the kitchen precinct of the house.

"Oh, ma, do you know how this came in Miss King's lace waist?"

"Why, didn't you ever take that home?"

"Yes," informed Amarilly, "but she made me a present of it, and I put it away to keep till I was—grown up. And I want to lend it to Lily Rose to be married in. And when she went to try it on, she found this in the sleeve."

Mrs. Jenkins paused in the sudsing of a garment.

"Let me see!" she said, surveying the object with reminiscent scrutiny.

"Oh, yes, I remember now. I found it on the floor the day she was here, afore the waist was ready for her. I thought she had dropped it, and so I pinned it in the sleeve of her dress."

"I'll go right over to her house with it now," said Amarilly.

Lily Rose, adorned in the filmy white waist, entered the kitchen.

"See, Amarilly," she said delightedly. "It's a beautiful fit!"

But Amarilly had something on her mind of more moment even than Lily Rose's wedding garments.

"I am glad it fits," she said hurriedly, scarcely vouchsafing a glance toward Lily Rose as she caught up her hat and hastened as fast as the street-cars would take her to Colette.

"Oh, Miss King!" cried Amarilly, her face aglow. "I guess I have found it!"

Colette's heart began to flutter and the wavering beat became a steady throb when Amarilly handed her the long lost article.

"Oh, Amarilly, you darling! Yes, yes, this is it! And it evidently has not been touched. Where did you find it?"

Amarilly related the story of its discovery.

"Then, but for your generosity, Amarilly, this would have been in the waist for years, so I am going to reward you. You shall make Lily Rose a wedding present of the waist, and when you are married, I shall give you a real white wedding gown of white satin."

"Oh, Miss King! I must get married then, even if I have to do it in a leap year!"

"Of course you will marry. I shall pick out the bridegroom myself. I feel like doing almost anything for you, Amarilly."

"Do you, truly?" asked Amarilly.

"Then I wish you would —"

"Tell me, dear!" urged Colette.

"I'll do anything for you to-day."

"Be nice to Mr. St. John!" whispered the little peacemaker.

"Amarilly! I will, indeed—nicer than you can imagine, or he either. And tell me, is Lily Rose still happy—very happy?"

"Yes," replied Amarilly. "So happy, and so scared-like, and she's going to dress at our house, and could you come early and fix on the veil?"

"Of course I will. And now will you take a little note to St. John for me on your way home?"

The rector looked up with a welcoming smile when Amarilly was shown into his study.

"I came with a note from her," she said.

John took it eagerly. His face fell at the first few words which told him not to call for her tomorrow night on the way to the wedding, but it brightened amazingly when he read the reason—the adjusting of Lily Rose's bridal veil; it fairly radiated joy when he read: "I am not going to be disagreeable to—anyone to-morrow. I shall 'let my light shine' on Lily Rose and—every one. If you will keep your carriage to-morrow night, I will send mine away and ride home with you."

To be continued

A Great Song Book

Sparkling, snappy, invigorating, energizing, appealing, effective and useful, this latest and greatest of Rodeheaver productions has set a new high-water mark in gospel songbook making. Hundreds of churches, Sunday schools and other religious societies are already using it and are expressing unbounded approval and delight. The first to introduce it into your church community will have exercised "winning strategy."

Songs for Service

has 288 pages, is printed from new plates on better-than-usual paper and is finely bound. Orchestrated for instruments. Printed in both round and shaped notes. It is the book used exclusively in the "Billy" Sunday campaigns.

EXAMINE A COPY FREE—Simply state that you will either return it in good condition within 15 days or will remit the retail price. State binding desired.

PRICES—Cloth 85c, limp 25c, manila 20c per copy, postpaid.

Cloth $25, limp $15, manila $15 per 100, not prepaid.

THE RODEHEAVER CO.

1083 MONON BLDG. CHICAGO 633 LIPPINCOTT BLDG. PHILADELPHIA

THE loss of one Sunday's collection often amounts to the entire cost of the Envelope System. Why take the chance?

FREE—A Duplex Envelope Opener, for the name and address of your Treasurer and S. S. Supt. Saves time and trouble.

ADDRESS DESK—
DUPLEX
RICHMOND, VA.
(ARCHER G. JONES)

$3.25 Special Offer $3.25

Christian Herald ($1.50 a Year) - -

Youth's Companion ($2.00 a Year) - - $3.25

Remaining issues of 1915 FREE

McCall's Magazine (50c a Year) - Save 90c
(including choice of a 15c pattern FREE)

ADDRESS

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD
BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK

When Boston Burned

After the disastrous $80,000,000 conflagration that swept Boston in 1872, a Boston newspaper paid tribute to the Hartford Fire Insurance Company's prompt and liberal settlement of its enormous losses.

"All adjusted claims were paid at sight," said this newspaper, "without discount or delay. Such a record is its own argument for integrity, ability and determination. A policy in the Hartford is as good as a gold bond."

And it is worth adding that this disaster came less than a year after the great Chicago fire that cost the Hartford Fire Insurance Company over $1,933,562. Such is the financial strength back of the

INSURANCE SERVICE OF THE TWO HARTFORDS

For over a century the Hartford Fire Insurance Company, through war, panic and disaster, has met every honest obligation fully, fairly, and on the dot of time. As a result it writes today more fire insurance than any other company in the United States.

The Hartford Accident & Indemnity Company, extending the parent company's activities into the field of casualty and bonding insurance, has already earned a reputation worthy of the Old Hartford's best traditions.

The two companies, between them, write practically every form of insurance but life insurance.

Check on the coupon below any form of insurance in which you may be interested. Mail it to us and we will send you full information.

Hartford Fire Insurance Co.
Hartford Accident & Indemnity Co.
Hartford, Conn.

COUPON—CHECK—TEAR OFF—MAIL

Hartford Fire Insurance Company, (Service Department C-12), 125 Trumbull Street, Hartford, Conn.

Gentlemen:

Please send information on the kind of insurance checked to the name and address written on margin of coupon.

☐ Fire ☐ Accident ☐ Health
☐ Auto Liability
☐ Auto Collision
☐ Auto Theft
☐ Auto Fire
☐ Baggage

☐ Motor Cycle
☐ Burglary ☐ Employer's Liability
☐ Workmen's Compensation
☐ Bonding ☐ Elevator
☐ Plate Glass
☐ Race Horse

☐ Tornado
☐ Hail ☐ Gopher's Policy
☐ Parcel Post
☐ Rent
☐ Merchandise in Transit
☐ Live Stock Transit
☐ Live Stock

☐ Sprinkler Leakage
☐ Marine
☐ Breeders and Exhibitors ☐ Teaming
☐ Salesmen's Samples
☐ Registered Mail
☐ Use and Occupancy
☐ Explosion

Now's the time to make your laser products while the others wait.

By Experts
Just out: Tells how to feed for eggs, how to develop progeny for best use of your flock and how to control disease and parasites for best results
Available at Mast's for 20¢

Edwards & Loomis Co., 343P No. Elizabeth St., Chicago, Ill
Also Manufacturers of the Famous Red Horn Dairy Feeds

To try in your own home for 30 days.
 Show your friends. Freight paid by us.
 Send us back at our expense if you do not want to keep it. You can buy the best at Actual Factory Prices. Our new improvements equal anything ever produced. Save enough on a single stove to buy your winter's fuel. ALL WINTER'S
STOVES Guaranteed for Years. Send postal today for large FREE
 Catalogue, showing large assortment to select from.

HOOSIER STOVE CO.
164 State St., MARION, IND.

"I hear you. I can hear now as well as anybody. 'How?' With the MORLEY PHONE. I've a pair in my ears now, but they are invisible. I would not know I had them in, myself, only that I hear all right."

"The Morley Phone for the

DEAF

is to the ears what glasses are to the eyes. Invisible, comfortable, weightless and harmless. Anyone can adjust it." Over one hundred thousand sold. Write for booklet and testimonials.

THE MORLEY CO., Dept. 754, Perry Bldg., Phila

ALWAYS FRESH

There is the same marked difference between fresh Olive Oil and Olive Oil packed months ago as there is between a newly-laid egg and an egg months old. Insist on

THE STANDARD IMPORTED OLIVE OIL

Woman, boy or girl to represent The Christian Herald. This is an opportunity to build up a business of your own, which should grow more and more profitable year after year. Address: Agency Dept., THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Bible House, New York City

Their healthful, happy pastime can best be made bright with a Pony Buggy. Surely every child longs for

A Beautiful Pony Buggy
Parents write for Colored Booklet No. 55, telling of Pony Vehicles and Harness, a list of Pony forms.

HOME PONY VEHICLE CO. CINCINNATI, O.

A LUCRATIVE PROFESSION easily acquired. Anyone can learn. Our PATENTED TUNE-A-PHONE METHOD makes success more certain than best oral instruction. Guaranteed. Write for FREE BOOKLET, telling how our STUDENTS MAKE BIG MONEY.

Niles Bryant School of Tuning, 22 Inst. Bld., Battle Creek, Mich.

For 14 years we have been paying our customers the highest returns consistent with conservative methods. First mortgage loans of $200 and over, we can recommend after the most thorough personal investigation. Please ask for Loan List No. 709.

$25 Certificates of Deposit also for saving Investors may bring you wealth. Write for "Needed Inventions," and "How to Get Your Patent."

PERKINS & CO. Lawrence, Kan.

RANDOLPH & CO., Dept. 96, Washington, D. C.

$1⁰⁰WILL bring you 3 Beautiful Satin Bookmarks, with a poem on each; Book of Table Graces for daily use, special days and occasions; a box of Bible Comfort Powders, 28 in a box. M. F. MUNSON Pub., 77 Bible House, New York, N. Y.

By HENRY LOOMIS

Long a Representative in Japan of the American Bible Society

THERE have been frequent and strong assertions that there is such a probability of war between Japan and the United States, that to prepare as speedily as possible for any emergency is an urgent necessity. Such a suggestion is underserving of serious consideration. The reasons are these:

There is no such disposition on the part of the Japanese people. Some irresponsible jingoes in Japan may try to stir up trouble, but they do not represent the thinking and ruling classes. Writing on this subject, the editor of the Japan Mail (who was an ex-officer in the British Army) said: "Before engaging in a war with America, Japan would have to divest herself of the strongest sentiments of friendship which are entertained toward any foreign country."

The Hon. Shimada Saburo, the editor of a leading daily paper in Tokyo, and one of the most prominent men in the Diet and politics, writes: "These rumors that Japan may attack and occupy the Pacific coast are absolutely without any foundation, and will be proved baseless in time. Such an attack would be suicidal. The United States is the greatest buyer of Japanese goods, and Japan does not propose to ruin all this trade by making a foolish attack that would be foredoomed to failure."

In the editorial in the Japan Advertiser (which is owned and edited by an American in Tokyo), the writer says: "To suppose or pretend to suppose that the leaders of the Japanese people contemplate a war with a non-military but extremely powerful nation containing double the population and tenfold the resources of Japan, and separated from Japan's basis by 4,000 to 6,000 miles of sea, is to pay a very bad compliment to the political sagacity which has made Japan the power that she is. War with America, on any pretext whatever, is unthinkable. No government could propose it and live a day."

At a meeting of the leading American residents of all professions in the city of Yokohama, the American ambassador said: "There is no cause under the sun why there should be distrust between the people of Japan and America."

The following is an extract from the resolutions that were unanimously adopted at the same meeting:

“IT has come to our knowledge that in sections of the United States rumors have been circulated to the effect that public sentiment in Japan is hostile to the United States, and that the Japanese Government entertains sinister purposes of a dangerous character.

THIS cry of a father's heart has come reverberating down the ages, and is daily echoed in every corner of Christendom by fathers and mothers whose sons have gone, whither they know not.

Absalom was not safe. Nor was David absolutely guiltless of the tragedy in the wood of Ephraim. Absalom had been brought up as a prince but not as a king. He had lived in luxury but had not learned restraint. He had satiated himself with pleasure, he had done what he willed, and no man said him nay, until his banquet to the king's sons and his murder of his trespassing brother drove him to flight from the kingdom. Then he had been forgiven, reestablished in part, but still unrestrained, and his rebellion and death were the logical outcome of David's own failure to govern his household.

East, west, north and south, sons of good fathers and mothers are constantly going out into the world. Are these young Absaloms safe? They may be and they may not. At every turn of the way of life paths lead off into devious ways, and the young man faces dangers day and night. He may meet these dangers and defy them, and he may meet them and become their prey.

(On the train he will meet pleasant

“The rumors in question are based upon misinformation, or, even worse, the hope of selfish advantage. We believe, upon evidence that cannot be doubted, there is not to be found in the Japanese Empire any wish or thought other than to maintain the most friendly and cordial relations with the Republic of the United States, and that any representations to the contrary, wherever emanating, and from whatever cause proceeding, are baseless calumnies, which, if uncontradicted, can only result in vast material losses to the people of both governments, and in creating an unhappy prejudice between them.”

Even should there be any change of feeling at this time, or in the future, on the part of the Japanese toward the United States, such a thing as war is impossible, for the following reasons:

The whole area of Japan proper is less than that of the state of California, and only one-fourth, or less than the area of New York state alone, is under cultivation. The wealth of Japan is only one-half of that of the state of New York. The total population of Japan is about 80,000,000 and that of the United States 111,000,000, giving Japan slightly more than one-half of the United States' figures. The national debt of Japan is greater than that of the United States, and more than one-half of this sum is money borrowed from abroad. Her wealth is less than one-twelfth that of the United States. The annual income of the Japanese is $30 per capita. The annual income of the residents of the United States is $250. Less than one per cent. of the farmers in Japan own 25 acres and ninety per cent. less than one acre. The rent is often sixty per cent. of the crop, and the average peasant must pay as much as twenty per cent. interest. The ordinary taxes amount to about ten per cent. of the income; and to this is added the special income tax, which runs from one and seven-tenths to twenty-six and a half per cent. No other country in the world is carrying so heavy a financial burden in proportion to its strength. The ordinary revenue of Japan, according to latest report, was $259,849,000. The ordinary revenue of the United States was $734,673,000. The total expenditure for army and navy in Japan for 1914-15 alone was less than $100,000,000. The expenditure for the United States army alone was $94,000,000.

The Kokubin Shimbun (a Tokyo daily paper) says: "The heavy debts of Japan are more than the nation can endure." Baron Shibusawa, who is one of the ablest financiers in Japan, says: "The present rate of taxation in Japan gentlemen who will invite him to have a game of cards. He may play, and he may gain a little new experience and profit by it, or he may go on and on playing for larger stakes until he knows no honest work. In the hotels he will find comradeship of men and women who live carelessly, and who laugh the cares of life out of countenance until laughter fades into despair, and then life claims its own with penalty. He may be careless, too, or wise. The loneliness of a hall bedroom or a cheap lodging house may drive him to seek comradeship where it may be found. He may seek it in the church of his fathers or he may seek it in cabarets and dance halls and public entertainments patronized by young people of all shades of character. Or, prospering and still lonely, he may follow the lure of the white lights to roof garden and midnight revel, and find comradeship of a sort with women who know how to dazzle a man's mind while they damn his soul.

He may climb steadily from position to position and reach a place of influence, and yet live a life he would not care to bare to his mother's eye; or he may live blamelessly upon a meager stipend until, on some day of trial, the funds of his is indeed extremely high, and more than the people at large can bear."

At the close of the war with Russia, the new Japanese cabinet proposed considerable enlargement of the navy, in order to be prepared for a possible renewal of the struggle; but the people protested so strongly that the cabinet resigned, and the result was a change in the program, and a large reduction in the appropriation for that object.

The Diet which met last December refused to sanction the increase of the army by two divisions, and a new Diet was chosen before such additional expense was approved.

Speaking on the subject of an increased army and navy for Japan, President Sato of the Tohoku Imperial University said: "It is ridiculous for Japan to think of supporting a bigger armament; and that is what a majority of the people think."

JAPAN is largely dependent upon the United States for a market for her products. Her chief articles of export are tea and silk. The United States takes practically all of her tea that goes abroad, and the larger part of her silk. The latest report of silk exported to the United States gives the amount as $100,900,025 value of raw silk, and $39,936,000 manufactured silk. The value of tea sent to the United States was $16,735,000.

According to the latest statistics, Japan has seven dreadnoughts and sixteen battleships, and a naval force of 42,407 men, not counting reserves. The United States has ten dreadnoughts and twenty-two battleships, and a force of 85,965 men, or more than double that of Japan. To conduct an aggressive war against a nation with about double the population, with twelve times the financial strength, possessing a more powerful navy, and at a distance of from 4,800 to 6,000 miles from its base, is a project that no sane person would consider. Hawaii is too well fortified to be taken by any such force as Japan could send, and is 3,900 miles distant from Japan and 2,400 from San Francisco.

With modern equipments, even a small body of soldiers, with the aid of mines and submarines, could repel any number of invaders, as has just been demonstrated in the Gallipoli peninsula.

The former American Ambassador at Tokyo, Hon. Luke Wright, said on his return to the United States: "The talk of war between this country and Japan isn't even respectable nonsense. Japan no more wants war with us than we want it with her; and the idea that there is an impending conflict is ridiculous."

Only India Paper Red Letter Bible in the World

ISAIAH 61

22 A little one shall become a thousand, and a small one a strong nation: I the LORD will hasten it in his time.

CHAPTER 61

The Redeemer Comes to Zion with Blessings.
THE Spirit of the Lord GOD is upon me; because the LORD hath anointed me to preach good tidings unto the meek; he hath sent me to bind up the broken-hearted, to proclaim liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to them that are bound; 2 To proclaim the acceptable year of the LORD, and the day of vengeance of our God; to comfort all that mourn; 3 To appoint unto them that mourn in Zion, to give unto them beauty for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness; that they might be called trees of righteousness, the planting of the LORD, that he might be glorified. 4 And they shall build the old wastes, they shall raise up the former desolations, and they shall repair the waste cities, the desolations of many generations. 5 And strangers shall stand and feed your flocks, and the sons of the alien shall be your plowmen and your vinedressers. 6 But ye shall be named the Priests of the LORD: men shall call you the Ministers of our God; ye shall eat the riches of the Gentiles, and in their glory shall ye boast yourselves. 7 For your shame ye shall have double; and for confusion they shall rejoice in their portion: therefore in their land they shall possess the double: everlasting joy shall be unto them. 8 For I the LORD love judgment, I hate robbery for burnt offering; and I will direct their work in truth, and I will make an everlasting covenant with them. 9 And their seed shall be known among the Gentiles, and their offspring among the people: all that see them shall acknowledge them, that they are the seed which the LORD hath blessed. 10 I will greatly rejoice in the LORD, my soul shall be joyful in

The Mission of the Lord's Anointed One

CHAPTER 60

Mat. 13: 31
ch. 11: 2
Lu. 4: 18
John 1: 32
John 3: 34
Ps. 147: 3
Jer. 34: 8
Lev. 25: 9
Mal. 4: 1, 3
Mat. 5: 4
Ps. 30: 11
Ezek. 36: 33
Job. 2: 12
E. 19: 6
ch. 40: 2
Zech. 9: 12
ch. 55: 3
ch. 49: 18
Rev. 21: 2
deceit as a priest
Ps. 72: 3
Ps. 85: 11
ch. 60: 18
ch. 62: 7
CHAPTER 62
ch. 65: 15
Rev. 3: 12
Zech. 9: 16
Hos. 1: 10
1 Pet. 2: 10
Isaiah
1 Ki. 22: 42
ch. 54: 1
That is, My delight is in her.
2 Ki. 21: 1
That is, Married.
4 with the joy of the bridegroom.
ch. 65: 19
d Ezek. 3: 17
Ezek. 33: 7
5 Or, ye that are the LORD'S remembrances.
ch. 61: 11
Zech. 3: 20
7 If I give, etc.
Deut. 28: 31
Jer. 5: 17

my God; for he hath clothed me with the garments of salvation, he hath covered me with the robe of righteousness, as a bridegroom decketh himself with ornaments, and as a bride adorneth herself with her jewels. 11 For as the earth bringeth forth her bud, and as the garden causeth the things that are sown in it to spring forth; so the Lord GOD will cause righteousness and praise to spring forth before all the nations.

CHAPTER 62

The Redeemer Calls the Watchmen to Awake.
FOR Zion's sake will I not hold my peace, and for Jerusalem's sake I will not rest, until the righteousness thereof go forth as brightness, and the salvation thereof as a lamp that burneth. 2 And the Gentiles shall see thy righteousness, and all kings thy glory: and thou shalt be called by a new name, which the mouth of the LORD shall name. 3 Thou shalt also be a crown of glory in the hand of the LORD, and a royal diadem in the hand of thy God. 4 Thou shalt no more be termed Forsaken; neither shall thy land any more be termed Desolate: but thou shalt be called Hephzibah, and thy land Beulah: for the LORD delighteth in thee, and thy land shall be married. 5 For as a young man marrieth a virgin, so shall thy sons marry thee: and as the bridegroom rejoiceth over the bride, so shall thy God rejoice over thee. 6 I have set watchmen upon thy walls, O Jerusalem, which shall never hold their peace day nor night: ye that make mention of the LORD, keep not silence, 7 And give him no rest, till he establish, and till he make Jerusalem a praise in the earth. 8 The LORD hath sworn by his right hand, and by the arm of his strength, Surely I will no more give thy corn to be meat for thine enemies; and the sons of the stranger shall not drink thy wine, for the which thou hast labored: 9 But they that have gathered it shall eat it, and praise the LORD; and they that have brought it to

Jesus Baptized; He Undergoes Temptation

and his meat was locusts and wild honey. 5 ¶ Then went out to him Jerusalem, and all Judea, and all the region round about Jordan, 6 And were baptized of him in Jordan, confessing their sins. 7 But when he saw many of the Pharisees and Sadducees come to his baptism, he said unto them, O generation of vipers, who hath warned you to flee from the wrath to come? 8 Bring forth therefore fruits meet for repentance: 9 And think not to say within yourselves, We have Abraham to our father: for I say unto you, that God is able of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham. 10 And now also the axe is laid unto the root of the trees: therefore every tree which bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down, and cast into the fire. 11 I indeed baptize you with water unto repentance: but he that cometh after me is mightier than I, whose shoes I am not worthy to bear: he shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost, and with fire: 12 Whose fan is in his hand, and he will thoroughly purge his floor, and gather his wheat into the garner; but he will burn up the chaff with unquenchable fire. 13 ¶ Then cometh Jesus from Galilee to Jordan unto John, to be baptized of him. 14 But John forbade him, saying, I have need to be baptized of thee, and comest thou to me? 15 And Jesus answering said unto him, Suffer it to be so now: for thus it becometh us to fulfil all righteousness. Then he suffered him. 16 And Jesus, when he was baptized, went up straightway out of the water: and, lo, the heavens were opened unto him, and he saw the Spirit of God descending like a dove, and lighting upon him: 17 And a voice from heaven, saying, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased.

CHAPTER 4

The Temptation of Jesus; his first Disciples.
THEN was Jesus led up of the spirit into the wilderness to be tempted of the devil. 2 And when he had fasted forty

CHAPTER 3
Deut. 8: 8
Deut. 32: 13
1 Sam. 14: 25
2 Ki. 18: 32
Ps. 81: 16
Ezek. 27: 17
Lu. 24: 42
Acts 19: 4
days after 3 A him, I God, be m 4 5 is writ bread that p of Go 5 T into on a 6 A the S for it angel, and in thee u thy fo 7 Je ten ag the Lo 8 9 into and of th them; 9 An things fall do 10 Tt Get written Lord t thou si 11 T and, minis 12 ¶ that, depar 13 A and d upon t of Zab 14 Th which prophe 15 Tt the la way o Galile 16 T ness which of dec 17 F to pre for th hand.
925

Specimen Page of Our India Paper Red Letter Bible Shows Type, Size, and Binding

Text of the India Paper Red Letter Bible is printed in rich black and red

Our Red Letter Bibles and Testaments

Our Red Letter Bible ONLY GENUINE EDITION

The only genuine edition of the Red Letter Bible is the Authorized or King James' Version, unchanged save for the variation of the color in the type. Two colors (Red and Black) are employed, in accordance with the simple plan devised by the late Dr. Louis Klopsch, the Originator of the Red Letter principle applied to the Holy Scriptures.

What Is a Red Letter Bible?

- 1 In the Old Testament the passages quoted by our Lord, or directly related to incidents to which he referred, are Printed in Red.
- 2 In the New Testament, the words universally accepted as those of the Saviour are Printed in Red.
- 3 A Red Star (★) immediately following a verse in the Old Testament indicates that the verse embodies a prophetic reference to Christ as the coming Messiah.

Our Red Letter Bible, illustrated above, Contains Full References; also a Concordance, Subject Index, and Dictionary—all under One Alphabetical Arrangement—together with Helps, Maps, and Numerous Illustrations.

The text of this Bible is set in Bold-Face Minion, especially designed for this work. There are 268 pages of Helps or Concordance and 17 superb Maps. This gem of a Bible, small in bulk, light in weight, very legible and very durable, weighs only 20 ounces. It is bound in American Levant, overlapping edges, red-under-gold, and makes altogether the handiest and most satisfactory Bible now on the market. For size of type, size of page and appearance, see above illustration. We send this superb Bible, together with The Christian Herald for one whole year, for $3.00

OR: We will send it to old subscribers Free as a reward for sending us two NEW yearly subscriptions to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD with $1.50 each.

Something Still Better

Genuine Morocco, Calf Lined
If you can afford to pay $1 more, ask for the same Bible bound in Genuine Morocco, Calf Finish, Leather Lining, Silk Sewed, which will wear a Lifetime. This Bible is Equal to Any $10.00 Bible. It is Sent with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for one Year FOR ONLY $4.00

OR: We will send it to old subscribers Free as a reward for sending us three NEW yearly subscriptions to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD with $1.50 each.

All Charges Prepaid in Every Instance

Our Red Letter Testament

This beautiful volume is the ONLY NEW TESTAMENT which contains ALL THE WORDS SPOKEN BY OUR LORD PRINTED IN RED. The Type is Very Clear, and the Alignment of the Red and Black Lettering Absolutely Perfect. The Red Letter New Testament is Exquisitely Bound in American Levant, Soft and Flexible, with Overlapping Edges—Red Under Gold—with Book-mark—a Compact Volume that may be Conveniently Carried in the Pocket.

The Red Letter New Testament is Issued in Both the Authorized and Revised Versions, and is Sent, All Charges Prepaid, together with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for One Year FOR ONLY $2.00

OR: We will send it to old subscribers Free as a reward for sending us one NEW yearly subscription to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD with $1.50.

When ordering, state whether you want Authorized or Revised Version. All charges prepaid in every instance.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK

Add ten cents to your subscription for the Christian Herald Almanac for 1916, containing 100 pages of interesting facts and figures

Health

Defense

To repulse the coffee invader's attacks upon health, the sure defense is to use

INSTANT POSTUM

"There's a Reason"

Christian Herald

COPYRIGHT, 1915, BY THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

SUBSCRIPTION, $1.50 PER ANNUM
PUBLISHED 52 TIMES A YEAR

NEW YORK, DECEMBER 29, 1915

VOL. 38 - NO. 52. PRICE 5 CENTS
OFFICES: BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK

See Description Page 10

A BEDOUIN CHILD OF THE JUDEAN WILDERNESS

Photograph by Ansel Adams, Jerusalem

Our Mail-Bag

NOTICE

THE editors of the Christian Herald will be glad to answer any question addressed to the Mail-Bag provided it be of general interest and not merely personal. Correspondents may use a nom de plume to identify the question, but all letters must contain name and address of the sender, in addition to the nom de plume. No attention will be paid to anonymous letters.

Questions and Answers

H W. S., Minneapolis, Minn. Many years ago there came to our door a stranger asking for a night's lodging. It was refused. He was pale and delicate looking and inoffensive in manner. I have so often wondered if in turning him away we did not turn away one who was more than human, and I can never forgive myself. I make this statement hoping it may be a warning to others to obey the Gospel injunction: "Be not forgetful to entertain strangers, for thereby some have entertained angels unawares."

By a curious coincidence a good friend of the Christian Herald wrote the following reminiscence at about the same time your letter was received:

"At the close of a busy day while crossing the park, I met a youth of about twenty. His thin garments were sodden with the sleet. In the lamplight his face was wan and listless. He came up to my side, and spoke a few husky words. 'Hunger, hunger!' was all I could remember. My mind was full of business and I scarcely even listened. Suddenly I be-thought me and looked about for him; but he was gone. The lean figure had faded into the night mist. A flood of self-accusation rushed to my lips. Eagerly I retraced my steps; I crossed and recrossed the little park; I peered at the few passersby and stood under the lamplight silent and shocked. I felt that I had ill repaid God's great goodness to me in neglecting that feeble call for help. 'Why,' I heard myself saying, 'what if some day one of your own sons should be sick, hungry, perhaps homeless and dying, and his plea should be neglected?' This thought remains with me and will never be forgotten: That night I had turned a deaf ear to the voice of One who said: 'Inasmuch as ye did it not to one of the least of these, ye did it not to me.' I sought and found divine forgiveness, but twenty years of atonement have not effaced from memory the picture of that winter night in the little park."

These cases are not precisely similar, for one stranger asked simply for food, the other for a night's lodging. As to the possibility that your stranger might have been a heavenly rather than an earthly visitor, you may be sure he was but a man, the message is true that in serving others we are serving the Christ, but you have no grounds for thinking that your visitor was anything else than human. To take a stranger into one's home may not always be an absolute duty. Your responsibility to the stranger does not cancel your responsibility to the members of your own household; these must be guarded from disease and possible crime. It is to provide this safety that special institutions are provided where the homeless may find shelter. Having said all this, however, the fact remains that religious people are far too careless and selfish in considering the needy. Who can say what blessings might have resulted if you had taken the stranger in, provided him a bath, clean clothes, comfort, food, and tried to win his heart for the Saviour? Every Christian ought to be doing all he can to relieve the sufferings of the poor. But many who care for the needy neglect those dependent upon them, servants, employees, associates. We ought all to strive to make conditions more just and life brighter for all the poor of our own community and elsewhere. You are to be congratulated upon having a tender heart that suffers with the sufferings of others. Turn this tender sympathy into steadfast service, and the Master will use your life to bless many.

A. W. G., Oakland, Calif. Are there any inscriptions in the Old World that are not yet deciphered?

There are two great nations of antiquity whose inscriptions cannot yet be read the Etruscans and the Hittites. The Etruscans occupied a part of Italy corresponding roughly to what is now known as Tuscany. The Hittites at one time occupied a part of Palestine, and united with the Canaanites to resist the invasion by the Israelites under Joshua. The Etruscan and Hittite inscriptions have thus far resisted the attempts of scholars to decipher them, though no one knows when some one may stumble on a bilingual inscription which will serve as a key, just as the Rosetta stone, discovered in Egypt in 1799, served as a key to the Egyptian hieroglyphics. In the

New World, the so-called Maya inscriptions, found on the ruins in Yucatan, are also a puzzle to scientists. A series of articles by Maynard Owen Williams, who assisted in the excavation of Hittite ruins on the Euphrates, are published in the Christian Herald and tell in a very interesting way the story of the Hittites and the unearthing of their remains.

Mrs. S. E. A., Alamogordo, N. M. Please give your views on Acts 19: 2. I understand it as a special manifestation of the Spirit, like that of the day of Pentecost. Do you believe that Christians now should or could have the same manifestations?

You are mistaken in thinking that present-day Christians do not experience the same manifestations. Even if one prefers not to go so far back as the great revivals of Wesley,

One who gave his life for sinners, and who stands ready to pardon you, if you will only turn to him, whose name you have treated as a thing of cursing instead of blessing." And raising his face upward, he said in deep, thrilling tones—

"Jesus, my Lord, I know his name;
His name is all my boast;
He will not put my soul to shame,
Nor let my hope be lost."

He then resumed his seat, while the shame-faced men hurriedly sought refuge in another car, and the passengers, who had watched the incident, stamped their approval, some of them even cheering the courageous old gentleman. It is not an easy matter to suggest a method of dealing with such cases, however. Perhaps tracts, such as those issued by the

"That My House May Be Filled"

THE highways and byways have been made far more accessible to the workers of the Kingdom by the automobile, and this group of four big cars carrying placards that announce their mission to the whole country-side has been fittingly named the "Flying Squadron" by the Harrington evangelistic party which sends these cars out through the neglected places in the country surrounding whatever city or town they are holding meetings in. Local pastors often are the preachers who speak from these convenient pulpits. In the widespread campaign of evangelism which is under way this winter, other methods may have to be found to penetrate where only poor roads open the way, but the determination of evangelists to utilize every good means for extending their message is one of the signs of success for which the whole church is praying.

Fletcher and Edwards, the accounts of the results of the preaching of Charles G. Finney show similar occurrences. And even today, in probably every state in the Union, earnest people who believe in New Testament religion are engaged in conducting religious services where such results occur. When a Christian who has been formal, or inconsistent, or despondent, or defeated suddenly enters into an experience in which his soul becomes filled and thrilled with light and power and joy, he is very apt to give way to expressions and manifestations of gratitude and delight. As to the detail, however, of these newly blessed people speaking "with tongues," you will find a number of statements about this matter in the Mail-Bag of recent issues of the Christian Herald. We have yet to be convinced that any of these recent cases are genuine, and agree with Paul that the gift of tongues is one of the least valuable in the Christian scheme.

G. H. E., Loveland, Ohio. 1. We are not acquainted with the business house you mention. 2. Phrenology is not considered seriously by scientific men.

Avis A. H., Providence, R. I. Thanks for your kindly letter, with its good wishes.

Theophilus, Alta, Calif. In many states, profanity, in public at least, is punishable under the law. "Taking the name of God in vain" is a species of profanity unfortunately too common today, and one which deserves emphatic rebuke wherever encountered. It is related of a courageous old Christian that, overhearing some men in a railroad car swearing horribly, he went up to them and lifting his hat reverently, said: "I heard you name a name which is to me precious and sacred above all others—the name of Jesus. He is my dear Saviour, who died for me and to whom I owe my life and my hopes of happiness here and hereafter. I am sure you will not deny an old man the privilege of honoring the name of National Anti-Profanity League (Rev. R. D. Sawyer, Ward Hill, Mass., secretary), might be serviceable in many cases. We would be glad to know of any plan that has been tried and found effective.

Mina M. C. N., Bloomfield, N. Y. Your question deals with one of the hardest problems of prophecy, concerning which there are many opinions and no two alike. Questions that are purely controversial are not discussed in the Mail-Bag.

M. A. B., Reed City, Iowa. The passage in Isa. 48: 10 is better translated in the R. V.: "I have refined thee, but not as silver. I have tried thee in the furnace of affliction." In the previous verses, God is expostulating with Israel on account of its leaning toward idols. Yet he will not cut off the nation. One translation of verse 9, instead of "defer mine anger," reads "I will refrain." He will refine, yet not with the severest measures. The nation must pass through the ordeal of suffering—the purifying fires of affliction. (Compare Isa. 42: 25; Ezek. 22: 18, 20, 22.) They are to be spiritually cleansed, and made fit for ultimate restoration.

Distracted, Colo. Confession of sin (in the manner urged in James 5: 16) is often a source of cruel torment to sensitive souls. It should be very clearly understood that if we have wronged any one in thought, word or deed, it is our duty to confess it to that person; but a wrong which may belong so far in the past that it can justly be said to affect no one but God and ourselves, and which a quickened conscience is insistently bringing before us, needs to be confessed only to God. We have sometimes heard confessions at experience meetings, revivals, etc., that were unnecessary and unprofitable, and would have been better omitted, save in the presence of God alone. The case you state is one of this class. Acts done through youthful folly and inex-

NOTICE OF EXPIRATION

ONCE each month we attach, just under this notice, a subscription blank and notice of expiration for our subscribers whose Christian Herald subscriptions expired at any time during the past month. If your copy has this subscription blank attached, please use it to renew at once. IF YOU SENT YOUR RENEWAL WITHIN THE LAST TWO OF THREE WEEKS, PLEASE PAY NO ATTENTION TO THE BLANK.

When renewing, indicate on the blank with your remittance whether you are subscribing for any of our premium books, In Christ's Own Country, $2; The Fundamentals of the Faith, $2.20; Wonder Stories, $2; 555 Difficult Bible Questions Answered, $1.85; India Paper Reader Bible, $3, with your subscription, or a straight year's subscription at $1.50.

Do not forget you can have YOUR OWN RENEWAL AND ONE NEW SUBSCRIPTION FOR $2.25, or, YOUR OWN RENEWAL AND TWO NEW SUBSCRIPTIONS FOR $3. It is understood that the old subscriber must get the full subscription price of $1.50 from the new subscriber and must not in any way share the special price with the new subscriber.

Send money by postal or express money orders. Address, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

perience rise up to vex the sensitive soul which is laboring under acute conviction, and they seem to interpose an impassable barrier between us and the divine forgiveness. But why not resolve, once for all, to take God at his word? "Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be white as snow; though they be like crimson, they shall be like wool." Here is no half-way promise, but a pledge of full pardon and cleansing, if we come before God with a penitent heart and, confessing all, ask forgiveness in the name of him who said that no one so coming would be cast out. Pray for faith to help you to believe this, and having once confessed your sin and asked forgiveness, hold fast to that promise, no matter what doubts the arch-enemy of souls may try to sow in your mind, to rattle and cause distress and excite unbelief. Remember, "He is faithful that promised." He takes away all our doubts, strengthens our faith, covers our sin, and drives away the tempter who would destroy our peace and wreck our souls if permitted. Keep in close touch with God through daily prayer, and he will give you grace and strength to resist these insidious attacks. Tell God all your troubles, and he, who has a balm for every wounded, contrite heart, will make his grace sufficient for your needs. Having taken Christ as your Saviour, ask and claim a complete salvation. Never doubt him again. Put the past resolutely behind you. Ask for divine help and guidance daily, that your life henceforth may be that of a true, courageous, sincere Christian. "Cast thy burden on the Lord, and he will sustain thee," and the burden of past sins, the heaviest load of all, is assuredly included in this promise. We would be pleased to hear from you again.

A reader in Greenleaf, Idaho, Mrs. C. H. R., writes urging consideration in behalf of the men employed by the United States Reclamation Service, who now work every day in the year, Sundays included. Her letter says: "We are under the Boise project. We are proud of the class of citizens we have. They are industrious, intelligent people, many of them Christians and many well educated, being graduates of Eastern colleges. They are willing to work hard and to sacrifice to build up the country and support schools and churches; but they object to give up the day of rest and worship." It is possible that some arrangement might be made for releasing at least a portion of the working force on Sundays in rotation. An application of this sort to the proper quarter might have the result desired.

C. A. F., Cawker City, Kan. The poem is not in our collection.

W. T., Stamford, Neb., writes, apropos of poets and the war: "We need the Christ spirit, all of us; but none of us needs the war spirit. The Christ spirit is everything, or life is a failure. The world is bound in wickedness. Too much personal cowardice (concerning war) and not enough personal work. We need a great poet to show us the intensity of the battle of life."

B. S., Glenville, W. Va. "Clover" is not mentioned in the Bible.

The editors of the Mail-Bag have been requested by friends on the Pacific Coast to help clear up the disappearance of a school teacher named S. D. Wells. If any reader knows Mr. Wells's present address, the editors will appreciate prompt information.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD

An Illustrated News Weekly for the Home

A Short-Lived Republic

CHINA, oldest of nations and youngest of republics, is again an empire. Yuan Shi Kai, president since February 15, 1912, on December 11 at first refused and then accepted the crown of the new empire, offered to him by the Council of State, after a canvass of the recent election, which showed 1,993 representatives out of 2,043 favorable to the change of government. Pending his coronation as emperor, Yuan will continue to serve his country as president.

For centuries the Chinese bore the yoke of the Manchu without complaint. They wore the queue and they bound their women's feet; they endured taxation and they worshiped their ancestors and the god of things as they are. They worked hard and lived simply. Uprisings there were and bandits there were and the viceroys were corrupt, but these were only the normal diseases of the body politic; things which had always been and that therefore must be borne. The average Chinaman was peaceful and frugal and industrious, and the nation of 400,000,000 stood before the world an object lesson of stolidity and unchangeableness.

Then the foreigner came and the missionary with Western ideals, Western machinery, Western education and Western religion. China at first resented the attempts to educate and enlighten her; but as the schools increased and the hospitals widened their field of influence, and the railway brought material progress in its train, China began to realize that the West had something to give her; and her men of influence began to send their sons, and even their daughters, to the mission schools for instruction in Western learning. Then, as the value of Western education became more apparent still, they sent the most promising of their young men to the universities of the United States, of England, and of Germany. Meantime new ideas of government, of personal relations to government, and of life in general were filtering through all the strata of Chinese life, and the exactions of the viceroys, the poverty of the farmers and laborers, and the widening scope of foreign influence and enterprise were gradually laying the mine which was to destroy the old China and make possible a reconstruction.

THE first blow at the old regime came in the Chinese-Japanese war of 1894. Japan had welcomed Western learning and Western methods and her army had been thoroughly drilled in Western tactics and thoroughly armed with the latest weapons. The Chinese army met the invaders with drums and banners and guns of ages gone; and they fired their guns and waved their banners and beat their drums. But the enemy didn't run away as he was supposed to do. He kept right on coming, so the Chinese army ran away itself and left its drums and its banners to the mercy of the invaders. China realized that something was wrong. When the treaty of peace had been signed and China saw that she had lost Korea and had been seriously shorn of power in Manchuria, and that there was nothing to prevent Japan from doing it again, she took a different attitude toward Western ideas. The first step was the organization of a modern army, and the leader and organizer was Yuan Shi Kai, then judicial commissioner of Pechili. Yuan, who was the son of a district governor in Honan, had been director-general of trade and international relations in Seoul, Korea, in 1883. He was also in command of the Chinese troops in Seoul, and was commissioned to enforce Chinese control over the Hermit Kingdom. He proved a master of intrigue and of diplomacy, and he held command in Seoul until the Japanese War, when he fled under the protection of British bluejackets.

Li Hung Chang recognized in Yuan a man of power, and he took Yuan under his protection, and it was Li who put Yuan in charge of China's new army. In 1897 Yuan was given command of an army corps and in 1898 he was appointed governor of Shantung.

Yuan opposed the Boxer Rebellion in 1900 with all of his influence and the full strength of his new army; and he succeeded in preventing the rebellion from spreading southward and westward. The new army was, however, not yet strong enough to drive the Boxers back from Peking, and the expeditionary army of the Western powers and of Japan was needed to save the imperial city and to rescue China from herself.

In November, 1901, the Dowager Empress Tsi Nan appointed Yuan viceroy of Pechili. In 1903 he was given complete charge of the army and in 1907 he became grand counselor and president of the Wai-Wu-Pu or Foreign Office.

Yuan had served the Manchu dynasty well, but he had never been blind to the interests of Yuan himself; and when the young emperor Kuang Shu and the old dowager both fell victims to palace intrigue and the child emperor Hsun Tung came to the throne under the regency of Prince Chun, Yuan came under suspicion. He was not disgraced, but was permitted to retire to his old home in Honan to nurse a sore leg.

WHEN the rebellion inspired by Sun Yat Sen broke out in South China in 1911, Prince Chun urged Yuan to return to the court, but Yuan replied master of intrigue, had the new republic in leash. Dr. Sun resigned as provisional president and Yuan found himself the chosen one of his country. He accepted the provisional presidency with a great show of reluctance, and, there being no other candidates, he became president on October 6, 1913. Dr. Sun was accused of plotting new revolts and fled to Japan, and Yuan put down uprisings with an iron hand and ruled as a military despot, but always under the semblance of complying with authorized governmental forms.

The parliament of China was subservient, but about one-third of the members belonged to Dr. Sun's party and opposed Yuan's plans. Although these men were elected under the constitution, Yuan found a way to expel them, and he finally permitted the parliament to adjourn. It has not reconvened. Early in 1914 he abolished the district councils and restored the worship of Confucius. The whole Christian world was stirred by this latter move of Yuan's, but he smilingly explained that some system of morals for the people was absolutely necessary to the security of the state, and that Confucianism, being the ancient Chinese system, more nearly met the ideals of the Chinese people than either Buddhism or Christianity. Apparently Yuan, as was his habit, guessed right.

The unrest incident to the revolution developed many roving bands of outlaws, and these bandits, who had at times terrorized whole provinces, Yuan followed up unceasingly, driving them into the Mongolian mountains and dispersing them.

The fight on opium, which was begun by the Dowager Empress in 1906, was energetically continued by Yuan, and China is now nearly freed from this curse, which will be done away with in 1916. Opium has blighted the life of China for more than a century, and since 1839 the opium trade has been an ineradicable blot on the escutcheon of Christian England as well as a stumbling-block for all Christian effort in China. With the opium business out of the way, the word of the Gospel will have freer course.

IN all his doings Yuan has been binding himself closer and closer to the central place of power in the nation. All of his acts have led unerringly toward the restoration of the monarchy; yet so astute is Yuan that he has been able to make himself appear the unwilling object of an irresistible destiny. It is unlikely that the monarchy would have been declared at this time had not the helplessness of China been made manifest so glaringly in the negotiations with Japan following the Japanese occupation of Tsingtao and Kiauchau. China was helpless; yet not entirely helpless, for Yuan's diplomacy met the Japanese threat with suavity and delay and saved the nation's face. Japan's Western allies also came to China's aid by advising moderation on the part of Japan.

The Japanese difficulty crystallized the slowly forming national consciousness and gave an immediate impetus to the movement for the restoration of the empire. The Council of State ordered an election to be held that the will of the people might be known. The vote on the proposed change of government was taken by provinces. The first provinces reporting showed decided majorities for the monarchy, and the chancelleries in Tokyo, London, Paris and Petrograd began to get uneasy. With the Western world in tumult, a revolution in the Orient, even as a mere possibility, was not to be thought of; and reports indicated considerable smoldering discontent in the southern provinces. Fearing disorders which the government of Yuan would be unable to cope with, the representatives of England, Russia, France and Japan, under the leadership of the Japanese ambassador, presented to the Chinese Gov-

(Continued on page 1327)

© By International Film Service, Inc.

Yuan Shi Kai, Chinese Statesman, President, Emperor

that his leg was not yet well. The rebellion went badly for the Manchus and Yuan was offered and accepted the supreme command of all the armies of the North. He also became premier of the first "responsible cabinet." This did not satisfy the rebels, and Yuan was willing to be more than a premier. Yuan forced the abdication of the boy emperor and had himself authorized to cooperate with the rebel leaders in the organization of a republican government. The southern provinces had already been organized into a republic with Sun Yat Sen as provisional president.

The negotiations between Yuan and the southern leaders were concluded promptly and China became the youngest republic among the nations. We of the United States were duly complimented upon the use of our constitution as the model of the new constitution of the newest republic; but we did not realize how little real impression the republican demonstration had actually made upon the thought and life of the Chinese people. It was an intellectual rebellion; the ordinary Chinaman didn't know what it was all about, and in many districts of the vast empire the people never knew that there was a republic. When the first flush of victory had faded Sun Yat Sen, dreamer, idealist, possibly patriot, found that Yuan, diplomatist and

The Reawakening of the Rural Church

IT would be merely trite to say that a second vision of a valley of dry bones has been given to some present-day prophets. Yet if statistics are true on which are based the statements that "two-thirds of rural churches have ceased to grow, and eighty-three per cent. have memberships of less than one hundred," then certainly it would be as apt as it would be trite to apply the vision which came to Ezekiel, to the church in the country. But if the conference on the Church and Country Life recently held in Columbus, Ohio, is a safe indication, the miracle that took place in that other valley may soon be expected to be repeated throughout the churches in our rural communities.

But the simile does not fit the case at all points. There still is life, strong, vigorous, productive life in our country churches. One-third of them by the very statistics just mentioned have not ceased to grow, and seventeen per cent. have memberships above one hundred. There is enough evidence in these refreshing facts to justify the expectation that a wisely planned and loyally executed movement for the revival of the country church as the natural leader in its community will succeed. And it was to give such a movement the important place it should occupy in the thought of the whole Christian church that the Columbus conference was arranged.

Practical understanding of the field occupied derived from surveys, practical programs for work, including all manner of social cooperative schemes, and practical elimination of sectional and denominational lines, made up the message of the Commission. Fundamental facts developed by field workers were submitted in the form of committee reports, and leading thinkers, preachers and educators, including the President of the United States, endorsed by their presence and their words this undertaking of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America.

Gifford Pinchot, chairman of the conference, and one of its most active promoters, gave this as his epitome of the result of the conference:

"This conference has set the country church problem in a new position, and has shown that the time is ripe for a united and vigorous effort to give the country church the power and influence which rightfully belong to it.

"It has proved that the denominations are ready and eager to work together to give new strength to the country church.

"It has procured for the country church problem a hearing and a place that is national in every sense."

Rev. Charles O. Gill, secretary of the commission, gave his definition of the results of the conference in this phrase: "Religion is in the soil."

That the great meeting truly spoke for the religious people of the United States is shown by the fact that thirty-four states were represented, thirty-one denominations participated, and those who sat with delegated authority represented 17,500,000 professing Christians.

THE work of the sessions fell into three sections. The first concerned itself with surveys which have been made in Ohio and elsewhere, and which, as a result of the conference, are to be made in several other sections of the country. Probably the first state survey to be made will be of South Carolina.

A pioneer in this kind of work, Mr. Gill emphasized its need, and was sustained by other members of the council and speakers, and in the report of the Committee on Country Church Function, Policy, and Program, submitted by Dr. Kenyon L. Butterfield; in its first draft this report was largely the work of the late Dr. Wilbert L. Anderson.

This committee report urges each rural community to make a careful survey of itself, so that its actual needs and its actual resources may be known before any attempt is made to work a change looking to better conditions. This committee divides the work of a country church into the following heads:

1. Knowledge. 2. Preaching and worship. 3. Religious education. 4. The church ministering to all the people. 5. The church, the servant of the community. 6. Cooperation among the churches. 7. Division of labor. 8. Administration and finance. 9. The preacher and his helpers. 10. The preacher, a community builder. 11. The country church circuit.

It is to be noted that before all the committee

Chart results in graphic form so that the material can be preserved for constant use.

Religious use with reference to rural environment of special days, like Harvest Home, Rural Life Sundays, Thanksgiving, Farm Mother's Day, Easter.

Utilize existing women's organizations—for larger and more effective service.

Encourage the use of the church building by organizations and societies.

Give public advocacy to various forms of social service, such as clean-up days, community picnics, play festivals, town improvement, arbor day, beautifying cemetery or common.

Preach contentment with rural life and adequacy of country as a life investment.

Make church sociables community affairs.

Wherever the community is suffering from intemperance or lawlessness, a campaign for no license, or prohibition, or law enforcement, is advocated.

The church should cooperate to secure public health and sanitation, good roads, school education and consolidated schools. It should lend its efforts to intellectual development by means of libraries, lectures, reading circles and other agencies. It should assist in making provisions for public recreation and a Saturday half-holiday for agricultural laborers. It should sanction the use of the church grounds for demonstrations of recreation, if no better place can be had. It should urge better farming and better farm homes, with special stress upon extension work of agricultural colleges. It should assist in bringing about the beauty of village, roadside and private grounds.

Other activities urged upon the rural church by the council are the establishment of a supervised social center or community house, and formation of a local federation for rural progress and other community programs, and the promotion of cooperation among farmers in their production, buying and selling."

A far western Episcopal edifice that is at least novel places an emphasis on thorough knowledge of the situation. The report says: "Country church leaders, both preachers and laymen, should have a clear view of the fundamental aspects of the rural problem, and should broadly define the relationship of the church to that problem. The country church should make a survey of its field to discover neglected individuals and families, to ascertain conditions which determine its work, and to learn what movements are entitled to its guidance, interest and support. Two or more churches serving the same community should cooperate in such a survey. The main results should be made

IN the more strictly religious field this committee recommends that churches consolidate where only one church is needed in a community; where this is not immediately practicable, hold union meetings for religious and patriotic purposes, evangelistic campaigns, and general community betterment.

In the matter of finance the recommendations of the committee are brief but pointed. They embrace three points: 1. Official boards and organizations regularly and completely organized with proper program of work. 2. Carefully kept records and regular reports of work in finances. 3. Systematic, community-wide, and adequate financial plan for local church support and benevolences.

In conclusion the report emphasizes very strongly the need of a resident ministry, and that it should be adequately trained to meet rural needs. The report says: "Permanency of tenure should be sought by every possible means, including the payment of salaries commensurate with present economic needs and proportionate to ability and service."

ONE of the outgrowths of the council which will not be a matter of record is the enlistment of a number of prominent city pastors for work in rural communities. This is being privately and unofficially arranged, but has for its avowed purpose the establishment of a greater respect for work in the rural communities by the clergy of the country at large. It is believed that the spectacle of pastors resigning important and well paid pulpits in cities to take up work in small and little known communities, will emphasize as nothing else can do the dignity and the importance of the work which the council has under its care.

No note in the conference was more persistently sounded than that which calls for the obliteration of denominational lines. Fred B. Smith, of New York, for many years international secretary of Y. M. C. A. work, called upon the church to choose between the scrapheap for its present ecclesiastical forms, or a willingness to listen to the call of the future and abandon what he called "segregated sectarianism."

And Gifford Pinchot declared: "The problem which confronts us can no more be solved by the individual

In some degree country church buildings can, and sometimes do, approximate the efficiently arranged Bethany Church of Philadelphia public, but the rights of privacy should be duly guarded."

The program which is marked out under these several subdivisions is in every way intensely practical. Among the many points mentioned are these:

Have speakers on the subject of the rural problem at church conventions, conventions of young people's societies, and others.

Hold county or district conferences of rural preachers to study the rural problem.

Promote the community survey.

Encourage self-study by the community.

A suburban church that would be attractive anywhere and, in style at least, is possible anywhere country church, or by the churches of any one denomination, than the problems of rural life can be solved by one farmer, or the farmers of one state. In this, as in any other undertaking, union is strength. We work to the best advantage when we work together."

Dr. Washington Gladden, in whose church many of the meetings were held and who was frequently referred to as the father of the movement toward unified churches, added a strong appeal for less denominationalism. Dr. W. O. Thompson, president of the Ohio State University and a Presbyterian preacher; Dr. W. G. Clippinger, president of Otterbein University and a United Brethren preacher; Bishop William F. Anderson of the Methodist Church; Rev. Alva W. Taylor of Columbia, Mo., and Dean Shailer Mathews of the University of Chicago—one and all took occasion in the course of their formal papers to urge cooperation and union between the churches.

If there was one subject upon which there was marked unanimity among the delegates, it was this same call for the elimination of denominational lines. Utterances of this kind were the most frequently and most freely applauded. There were not wanting those who pointed out the distinct advantages of denominational organizations, but uniformly it was cited that the largest progress of the Christian Church is hindered by its sectarianism. In the rural life this is shown by efforts of a community to support several churches where their resources are adequate only to the support of one, and in the mission field by conflict in the wills and intelligences of those whom the Christian workers seek to reach.

Practical methods will be employed in overcoming this obstacle to efficient work. Rural ministers and church leaders during the next year will receive publications issued by the Commission on Church and Country Life devoted to the problems of rural church federations and combinations. This will prepare the way for discussion of church cooperation. Then in each township or natural community churches will be urged to form a federation, with delegates and ministers from each church forming a supervisory committee to coordinate community activities. Ultimately this federation might employ a common minister and pay him a salary adequate to allow him to undertake wider social work. In many cases these churches could merge. Denominational connection with a certain church organization could be maintained, but within the community sectarian differences would be largely ignored.

Mr. Pinchot vigorously declared that "There can be no permanently sound and vigorous life for the nation unless life in the country is vigorous and sound. I believe we are standing today on the threshold of a great movement which will bring back to the church in the country and smaller towns the greater power for good which it used to have. I do not contend that the church should take the functions of the Grange or the agricultural school, but I do believe that failure of the country churches through their ministers to get into productive touch with the work and needs of the country people is one of the fundamental reasons for the present weakness of the country church."

Mr. Pinchot urged good farms, good roads and good schools as necessary for the success of churches, but declared also that active churches would assist powerfully in securing improved material conditions.

A great feature of the conference was the address of President Wilson. Among the many stirring things the President said were these very pertinent comments:

"After all, the most vitalizing thing in the world is Christianity. The world has advanced, advanced in what we regard as real civilization, not by material, but by spiritual means and one nation is distinguished from another nation by its ideals, not by its possessions; by what it believes in; by what it lives by; by what it intends; by the visions which its young men dream and the achievements which its men of maturity attempt. . . . When I think of the rural church, therefore, I wonder how far the rural church is vitalizing the lives of the communities in which it exists. . . .

"I believe that where the school-house is inadequate, and even where it is adequate, the most vital social center should be the church itself; and that, not by way of organizing the church for social service . . . but of making the community realize that that congregation, and particularly that pastor, is interested in everything that is important for that community, and that the members of that church are ready to cooperate, and the pastor ready to lend his time and his energy to the kind of organization which is necessary, outside the church as well as in, for the benefit of the community.

"It seems to me that the country pastor has an unparalleled opportunity to be a country leader; to make everybody realize that he, as the representative of Christ, believes himself related to everything human that has as its object the uplift and instruction and inspiration of the community or the betterment of any of its conditions; and that, if any pastor will make it felt throughout the community that that is his spirit, and that his interest, and that he is ready to draw his elders or his deacons or his vestrymen with him as active agents in the betterment of the community, the church will begin to have a dominating influence in the community such as it has lost for the time being, and we must find it means to regain . . .

"I have been a member of one or two churches that were admirably organized and were accomplishing nothing. You know some people dearly love

Like its surroundings, stern and uninviting, and too typical of many country church buildings organization. They dearly love to sit in a chair and preside. They pride themselves upon their knowledge of parliamentary practice. They love to concoct and write minutes. They love to appoint committees. They boast of the number of committees that their organization has, and they like the power and the social influence of distributing their friends among the committees, and then when the committees are formed, there is nothing to commit to them . . .

"I remember that when I was a lad I belonged to an organization which at that time seemed to me very important, which was known as the Lightfoot Baseball Club. Our clubroom was a corner, an unoccupied corner, of the loft of my father's barn, the part that the hay had not encroached upon, and I distinctly remember how we used to conduct orderly meetings of the club in that corner of the loft. I had never seen a public meeting, and I do not believe any of the other lads with whom I was associated had ever seen a public meeting, but we somehow knew how to conduct one . . .

"Some churches are organized that way. They are exceedingly active about nothing. Now, why not lend that organizing instinct to the real things that are happening in the community, whether they have anything to do with the church or not? . . .

"So I am hoping that the outcome of these conferences, of all that we say and do about this very important matter, may be to remind the church that it is put into this world not only to serve the individual soul, but to serve society also.

"The proof of Christianity is written in the biography of the . . . people whose individual lives have been transformed by Christianity. It is the only force in the world that I have ever heard of that does actually transform the life . . .

"All the transforming influences in the world are unselfish. There is not a single selfish force in the world that is not touched with sinister power, and the church is the only embodiment of the things that are entirely unselfish, the principles of self-sacrifice and devotion. Surely this is the instrumentality by which rural communities may be transformed and led to the things that are great; and surely there is nothing in the rural community in which the rural church ought not to be the leader, and in which it ought not to be the vital actual center . . ."

THAT the rural church will be materially benefited by the conference just concluded is the opinion of all those most directly concerned. One enthusiastic leader expressed it in these words:

"We shall accomplish in this country in a few years a regeneration of the rural church and the rural community which it has taken a generation or more to bring about in Europe. This conference has called attention to many facts, which the average worker in the Christian Church did not realize or appreciate. It was educational in its purpose and its effect, and big things may be expected in the future as a direct outgrowth of it."

Not pretentious, but once the home of a vigorous congregation. "The Little Brown Church in The Vale"

What One Day's Cost of War Could Do for Central America

A MISSIONARY in Guatemala, reading that $50,000,000 per day was expended in the European war, wrote a letter home telling what great things could be done toward the world's conversion with such a sum. His letter says: "I sat down the other day and did some figuring, in order to make the amount seem at least more tangible. I was thinking what might be done in the Central American field with this money. With it we could build and equip a great university in each of the five republics of Central America, each costing one million dollars. These five universities would cost $5,000,000. We would endow the universities with one million each. We would erect professional schools as medical colleges, seminaries, law schools, etc., coordinating the work with the university.

Each of these schools would cost for building and equipment $250,000 each, or $2,500,000 for the ten. We would set aside for endowment for each professional school the sum of $250,000. In the important centers we would erect in the five countries twenty-five hospitals costing $5,000,000, or $200,000 each. We would put aside $5,000,000 for maintaining them. We would give the different republics a mighty lift in general educational work, establishing 1,200 high schools and academies. We would build fifteen hundred churches and chapels. By the side of each church we would build a handsome manse, and still have left from this fund nearly $2,000,000 to help maintain the churches and advanced missionary work. We would erect fifty handsome structures for Y. M. C. A. and

Y. W. C. A. to work among the youth of these countries. In building and equipment we would expend $1,500,000 or $25,000 for each building. We would have an endowment fund of $1,500,000. We would have the nice little sum of $1,500,000 for fifty libraries in fifty centers and put aside $1,500,000 to keep them supplied. We would devote $250,000 for five orphanages. In each capital city of the five Central American countries we would have a little farm and nice home for fatherless children. We would endow them with an additional $250,000. Almost nothing is being done for the blind of these countries, so we would expend $250,000 in this work, erecting proper buildings, and endowing the work with another $250,000. Then we would establish five Old Folks' Homes properly equipped costing $250,000 and appropriate $250,000 endowment funds for the same. Finally we could take $150,000 to establish and equip a printing plant and put aside another $150,000 as an endowment fund for taking care of the work. This is what one day's destructive warfare is costing the countries of Europe today. For Central America we would ask just this much and we would practically take care forever of the work of God in these countries, using it in a way to develop and not destroy the initiative of the people."

The devil has to run,
It is understood,
To catch the man who walks
To do some one good.
Rev. W. W. Vanderhoff, D.D.

A Week in the World's News

THE PRESIDENT'S WEDDING. On the evening of Saturday, December 18, Mrs. Edith Bolling Galt became the First Lady of the Land as the wife of President Wilson. The marriage ceremony being performed at the bride's residence in Washington by Rev. Herbert Scott Smith, rector of St. Margaret's Episcopal Church. The event was strictly private in character, and the wedding guests numbered, according to reports, about thirty members of the two families. The honeymoon is to be spent not far from the capital, if rumors are correct, and will not be disturbed by any but the most critical international developments. The application for the marriage license gave the age of Mr. Wilson as fifty-nine and of the new mistress of the White House as forty-three. All publicity concerning the preparations for the wedding was sternly discouraged. Even the hour in which the wedding was to take place was withheld from the public.

AUSTRIA'S REPLY TO ANCONA NOTE. The Austrian reply to the note of the United States of December 6 was received in Washington December 16. Unofficial versions of the note given in the press indicated that Austria does not consider itself bound by the precedents established in the American correspondence with Germany over the Lusitania and the Arabic. The note is, in its essence, a plea for details, but it has been officially declared at Washington to be unsatisfactory from the American standpoint. Reports from Washington declare that the note is courteous in form and that Secretary Lansing with the full approval of the President will reply promptly, in his reply repeating the demands of the first note. The second American note is expected to be in the nature of an ultimatum. Since the first American note was based upon the Austrian official report of the Ancona incident and upon affidavits of American citizens which bore out the Austrian statement. It was intimated in official sources in Washington that the only way in which a discussion could be prolonged would be the receipt by Austria of later information which would make an essential change in the facts stated in her own official report.

CALIFORNIA WANTS PROTECTION. Senator Works of California on December 16 represented to the Senate that the presence of some 30,000 trained Japanese reservists resident in California constitutes a dangerous menace, in view of what he considers to be a real Japanese peril, and he wishes Congress to provide for a permanent army reserve of 200,000 men on the Pacific coast as a protection against a Japanese invasion. Each reservist is to be given a house and five acres of land for occupation in time of peace, the men to be employed by the government on irrigation development. The senator looks to the tenement districts of great cities to recruit a big part of this new reserve force.

PREPAREDNESS STRIKES THE POST-OFFICE DEPARTMENT. The Chicago Tribune, under date of December 13, publishes a letter from its staff correspondent in Mexico, dated December 1, which states: "I have to report an order from the United States Department of the local legation that the official pouch—the only way in which Americans can get important mail through to family or friends with assurance that it will not be examined or wantonly destroyed—is to receive only unsealed letters, allowing the officials (in Washington, not here) of our own State Department to examine the letters, no matter how private. The project, of course, is to prevent the circulation of information concerning real conditions, which the State Department has done its best to suppress." From this and other letters and other circumstances, the Tribune points out that the United States Government is maintaining an increasingly rigid censorship of Mexican news. Whatever other merits this may have, it at least puts one or more men in training for censorship work when the great war against which Congress is asked to prepare is upon us.

HAS DR. GRENFELL BEEN DIVIDED IN TWO? A quite recent issue of the Boston increase the stock of good will in the world, and that as it is the duty of the United States to mold a nobler world policy than that now existing, therefore all pastors and teachers and other religious leaders should concentrate their strength on fostering international good will and divine ideals of human brotherhood; and the American people are appealed to to withstand the movement for increased armaments, and instead to become prepared in mind and spirit to meet the crucial situation which is before us.

OLD RECORDS OF THE ARCTIC. The Stefansson Arctic Expedition discovered in a cairn on Prince Patrick Island records left in 1853 by Sir Francis Leopold McClintock, whose expedition had gone in search of Sir John Franklin, who set out in 1845 in search of the Northwest Passage and was never heard pudding, brandied peaches, Italian macaroons and other desserts in which intoxicating liquors may be an ingredient.

WAR TAX EXTENDED. A resolution extending the present war tax to December 31, 1916, was rushed through the House of Representatives on December 16, and through the Senate December 17. The resolution was at once signed by the President, and this internal revenue measure will continue to accumulate the pennies of the people for another year.

UNCLE SAM A BILLIONAIRE. The latest report of the Department of Agriculture gives what are probably final figures on the yield and value of the crops of 1915. The value on December 1 of the principal farm crops is more than five and one half billions. The yields and estimated values are as follows:

Crop	Yield	Value
Corn	3,054,535,000 bu.	$1,755,859,000
Wheat	1,011,505,000 "	930,302,000
Oats	1,340,362,000 "	555,569,000
Barley	237,009,000 "	122,499,000
Buckwheat	15,769,000 "	12,408,000
Potatoes	359,103,000 "	221,104,000
Cotton	11,161,000 bales	602,343,000

According to the department's estimates, the total value of farm crops and animals for the year is $9,873,000,000, an increase of $3,000,000 over the record figure of 1913.

AMERICAN SECURITIES TO BALANCE TRADE. The government of Great Britain is arranging to buy or borrow as nearly as possible all American securities held by corporations and individuals in Great Britain. Ever since the beginning of the war, the trade balance has been running against Great Britain. An unfavorable trade balance may be permitted to exist for a few months in the shape of credits on the books of international banking corporations, but it cannot stand in this shape indefinitely, especially when it is increasing constantly. The trade balance can only be eliminated by the transfer of real value, either in the form of gold or of obligations of the party or nation to which the balance is due. The half billion dollar loan of the Allies was used in part to cover the unfavorable balance then existing, and thereby to relieve the condition of the exchange market, which was decidedly favorable to the United States. The balance has since increased steadily and threatens to reach $2,000,000,000 by January 1. Great Britain and British citizens have already sold in this country since the beginning of the war between $900,000,000 and a billion dollars of American securities. (The term "American" is here used to cover securities of corporations and municipalities both in the United States and in Canada.) And it is estimated that there is still in the hands of British holders anywhere from $1,500,000,000 to $1,000,000,000 worth of marketable securities. These Chancellor McKenna proposes to mobilize in the hands of the British treasury. Those that can be bought will be paid for in five-year treasury certificates bearing interest at five per cent. Those that cannot be purchased will be borrowed by the government, with the understanding that the government has the option of selling them after giving notice to the holders, and of © International Film Service, Inc.

Continued on next page

General Sir Douglas Haig
Who has been placed in command of Britons in France.

General Joffre
Commander of all French forces in Europe.

Field Marshal Sir John French
Who retires from command of British troops in France.

Transcript has a news item about a meeting of the Board of the International Grenfell Association in New York City, since the sailing of the Ford ship (but with no relation thereto), at which Dr. Grenfell was present after a month's lecture tour in the west. Reports of the medical missionary work under Dr. Grenfell's jurisdiction show that on the last trip of the hospital steamship Strathcona 2,250 miles were covered and nearly 1,000 patients treated. The vessel used wood fuel purchased en route from needy families in return for clothing. Forty-six circulating libraries were arranged and many other forms of service were rendered. The Transcript states that Dr. and Mrs. Grenfell "are sailing December 14 for France." The published list of members of the Ford expedition which sailed December 4 contained the name of Dr. Grenfell.

THE WEAPONS OF OUR WARFARE ARE NOT CARNAL. Believing in the superior force of good will, the Church Peace Union at its annual meeting December 11 adopted resolutions to the following effect: That as present world conditions have confused men everywhere in their notions and bewildered them in their judgments, and that as it is the duty of all God-fearing men to of again, McClintock reported all in good health and that he planned to travel westward in search of new land. Had he traveled northward, as Mr. Stefansson did, he would have found it. While the search for the Franklin expedition was without avail as to its primary purpose, it resulted in a great increase of knowledge of the Arctic regions and in the exploration of nearly two thousand miles of coast line. In 1857 Captain McClintock finally found two skeletons in a boat at Point Victory with a record signed by Lieutenant Graham Gore on May 28, 1847. It is commonly believed that Franklin and his companions perished shortly after this date. Franklin found the Northwest Passage, but was not permitted to return to declare the results of his exploration.

SWITZERLAND'S NEW PRESIDENT. December 16 Camille de Coppel was elected president of the Swiss Republic at a special session of the National Assembly. M. de Coppel comes from a French canton.

MEANS WHAT IT SAYS. Attorney General Farrar of Colorado has interpreted the prohibition law of the state to forbid the sale of liquor in any form for use in foods and the manufacture for sale of mincemeat, plum

THE event of the week in the western campaign is the removal of Field Marshal Sir John French from the command of the British army in France and Flanders, and the appointment of Lieutenant General Sir Douglas Haig as his successor. This removal had two causes, the first of which was the lack of positive aggressive results achieved by Sir John during the more than a year in which he has been in command, while the second was the friction and the misunderstanding which undoubtedly existed between this commander and Lord Kitchener. The removal strengthens Lord Kitchener and would seem to make it certain that he will remain Secretary of State for War throughout the present conflict.

This retirement cannot be said to be in the nature of a disgrace to General French. At the time the war broke out he was the only general of sufficient rank whose record in South Africa

The War in Europe

By ANTHONY ARNOUX

European journalist of many years' standing; military critic; staff writer of the Paris Daily Mail and Le Temps; contributor to L'Indépendant et Belge

(the last war in which Great Britain had been engaged) justified the hope that he was of sufficient military ability to shoulder the chief command in the present war. But General French was essentially a cavalry leader, and the campaigns in the west in this war have not been of a character in harmony with his prior experience; and further, he has been hampered in every conceivable way, particularly in having quarter-trained troops, poorly officered, sent to him, with the order to accomplish wonders therewith. History will possibly not be hard on French, and will probably appraise him as a better than the average field commander, but lacking as a strategist and organizer. Sir Douglas Haig, who takes up French's unenviable burden, is a younger man by 10 years and has shown marked ability in the present war as a field commander of one of the British armies in France. Whether, however, he will excel French as a strategist and organizer is something which the future only can tell.

The appointment of General Dorian-Smith to command in East Africa, indicates that Great Britain intends to make a vigorous campaign against the only remaining German colony on that continent. This colony does not bulk large as compared with the greater issues of the war, but it is not at all a bad idea for Great Britain to capture the colony, as it is a good thing to have all of the enemy's territory possible in hand when peace negotiations begin, in order to use it as a set-off, or to barter for one's own territory in the enemy's possession.

The British, according to a statement in the House of Commons last week, estimate the present Turkish forces at about 650,000, which can under certain circumstances be increased to 1,000,000. These "circumstances" are the obtaining of arms and ammunition from Germany. The last estimate, however, being made by an opponent, is probably rather low.

In Serbia during the week all fighting has practically ceased, owing to the fact that the Serbian army has, except for some few battalions which managed to reach the Allies in the southeast, been paying the holders the average price of the securities on the New York exchange on the day on which they were sold, plus two and one-half per cent. Securities loaned to the treasury will remain the property of the owners, and the owners will receive all interest and dividend payments. The securities thus accumulated will be used to take care of the trade balance in America in two ways: some of them will be sold in the open market; others of them will be used as collateral for loans, probably to be sold in time to liquidate the loans. It is possible that the success of this plan will take care of the debt of Great Britain to America for this year and the next. It will result in returning to America from two to four billion dollars' worth of securities, and in retaining here, for investment, the dividend and interest payments which, until now, have been remitted abroad. In place of these income securities, Great Britain will have her own promises to pay. This scheme is probably the best arrangement that could be made from the American standpoint, for the alternative would be the acceptance here of the unsecured obligations of the British Government.

Continued on page 1343

PROPOSE TO MAKE OVER NEW YORK. The New York City Board of Estimate will presently begin hearings, to be held for six months, on a report by the Committee on the City Plan, a board of experts who have been considering ways and means for providing for present congestion and future growth of the city, in which it is proposed that the entire city be mapped off into districts with specified characteristics, a division in which the height of buildings will be restricted, others devoted solely to residential, business and manufacturing properties. Division lines will have some measure of elasticity, as, for example, permitting a certain measure of mixup of stores and dwellings in their respective districts. The details of the plan will be laid before the public and discussed at the hearings.

THE STAR SPANGLED BANNER ON THE PACIFIC STILL WAVES! The International Corporation, the new $50,000,000 organization formed to conserve the world-wide trade of the United States, has purchased, through the agency of W. R. Grace & Co. of New York, the majority stock interest in the Pacific Mail Steamship Company for a little over $1,000,000, and in addition has purchased the remaining seven of the Pacific Mail's ships; the stock interest is in that company's wharves and real estate, docks, lighters and other equipment at San Francisco and Honolulu. These transactions apparently will keep the Stars and Stripes aloft on the Pacific, and thereby establish a nucleus of marine patriotism around which may yet grow up a mighty fleet of passenger and freight steamships. The present fleet of seven ships will be employed chiefly in development of trade between the United States and Central and South America.

THEY APPEAR TO HAVE IMBIBED OUR PRINCIPLES. The Chee Kung Tong, or the Chinese Republic Association, with a membership of something like 300,000 in this hemisphere, 50,000 of whom are in the United States, has appealed to President Wilson not to recognize the Chinese monarchy. It is said that this organization is actively at work in China in opposition to the accession of Yuan Shi Kai to the throne, and may even go so far as to proclaim a republic and name a provisional president. Just how much importance can be attached to this is not at the present apparent.

STIRRING OF A REVOLUTION IN BRAZIL? "They" say, on their arrival in this country as passengers from Brazil, that a great deal of political unrest is noticeable there, together with a more or less well-defined propaganda for removing President Braz and placing Dantas Varreto, at present governor of Pernambuco, in power. The army and navy are said to be dissatisfied with the present administration, which took office last March. The press gives no other source for these statements than Rumor.

TO HONOR BOOKER T. WASHINGTON. The trustees of Tuskegee Institute have authorized the creation of a $2,000,000 endowment as a memorial to the founder of the institution, and announce that $450,000 have already been pledged. At the present writing a successor to the late Booker T. Washington as president of the Institute has not been selected.

WOULD INTEREST STATE DEPARTMENT IN MEXICAN CATHOLICS. The plight of Catholic nuns in Mexico and the harsh treatment of priests, credited to the Carranza de facto government by prominent Roman Catholics, have been formally brought to the attention of Secretary of State Lansing by Monsignor Francis C. Kelley, president of the Catholic Church Extension Society in the United States, and Rev. Thomas V. Shannon, editor of the New World of Chicago, a leading Catholic organ. It was represented to Mr. Lansing that new anti-religious laws and decrees have been issued, and that by way of Yucatan report is made that all priests have been ordered to marry and to work eight hours a day in the public offices or be expelled as a penalty. Clergymen have been made incapable of owning property and their homes have been taken from them. Catholic universities and schools, it is said, have been closed, and special privileges sacred to the members of the church have been discontinued, all of which is cited as proving that the religious liberty guaranteed by the Mexican Constitution is a farce. It was given out in the press that the State Department seemed disposed to do everything possible to bring about better conditions.

CROWNING INDIGNITY OF THE WAR. The women of many neutral countries, particularly America, and perhaps some of the warring countries, have been thrown into a state bordering on permanent hysteria by the disclosure of what is said to be a vast plot, already in successful operation, to palm off on the women of fashion cheap German imitations of French gowns, the point of distribution being in Paris itself. The mere fact that extravagant prices have been paid for these supposed creations of Parisian art is inconsequential, the heartrending feature of this business is that while half the women of the world are without homes and firesides and the their tense poses in the Eden Musée. The famous institution has been discontinued, and all of its remarkable objects sold under the hammer to proprietors of lesser halls. The Chamber of Horrors is a thing of the past, and a large amount of amusement money is now released to find its way into other coffers.

MASON AND SLIDELL REVERSED. The United States government on December 14 cabled Ambassador Sharp at Paris a note to be presented to the French Foreign Office, protesting vigorously against the action of the French cruiser Descares in stopping the American steamships Carolina, Coamo and San Juan. The immediate release of some Germans who were forcibly removed was asked on the ground that the seizure of citizens of any nation on an American vessel on the high seas is without legal justification, and constitutes flagrant violation of American rights. The note was couched in friendly terms and cited as a precedent the case of August Piepenbrink, who was removed from the American ship Windber by the French cruiser Conde last November, and who was released

© Underwood & Underwood

© Harris & Ewing

President and Mrs. Woodrow Wilson

wherewithal to live from day to day, a small percentage of the remaining women of the world have actually been wearing dresses that were not made by the most famous of the world's modistes! This is indeed suffering too acute for words, and what makes the situation utterly unbearable is that there is no such form of relief possible as is possible for those freezing, starving women of Poland, Serbia and a great many other parts of Europe.

CHURCH WILL GIVE THANKS FOR A GREAT INVENTION. Following an ancient custom in the Roman Catholic Church, it is announced by a Rome correspondent of the London Exchange Telegraph Company that the Pope is preparing to bless officially wireless telegraphy, as being one of the inventions which, because they confer great benefits on humanity, are entitled to this recognition.

AN AMERICAN MECCA MELTS AWAY. Visitors to New York City for the last quarter of a century and more have gravitated toward a unique exhibition on West Twenty-third Street, the Eden Musée, where it was possible to stand unabashed, face to face with the great people of the world's history. The humblest individual could stand as long as he pleased gazing straight into the face of Queen Victoria, or the German Kaiser, or George Washington himself; or, if his taste so inclined, into the face of this or that notorious assassin, in the latter case not fearing to let his scorn show in his face. Prison cells, weird mines, courts of law, drawing-rooms, could be entered at will and their occupants serenely subjected to calm scrutiny and all sorts of critical remarks. The composition of these famous figures gave forth a peculiar odor which fairly made your hair stand on end. More than one youth has gone out of the Eden Musée with his ambitions to be this or that at fever heat—and nothing has ever been heard of him since. But Colonel Roosevelt, Julius Caesar, General R. E. Lee, and Guiteau have at last been relieved from upon protest by the United States. The attention of the French government was also called to the rule laid down by the French Minister of Foreign Affairs during our Civil War, on the occasion of the removal by a warship of the United States of the Confederate commissioners Mason and Slidell from the steamship Trent.

ANOTHER CHICAGO CONVENTION. The Republican National Committee, meeting in Washington on December 14, selected the city of Chicago as the meeting-place of the 1916 Republican National Convention and called the convention for June 7, one week earlier than the date set for the Democratic Convention at St. Louis.

A CENTURY OF SAVINGS. The first bank exclusively for savings was organized in the United States in 1816. The one hundredth anniversary of the founding of this bank will be observed throughout the country in a thrift campaign conducted by the American Institute of Banking and the American Bankers' Association. The national wealth of America is estimated today at about $187,000,000,000. The savings banks of the country have deposits of $4,700,000,000, belonging to 10,500,000 people. This is in addition to the deposits in the postal savings banks.

TAFT WOULD EXPEL POSTMASTERS. In a recent interview, ex-President William H. Taft declared that postmasters as a class are inefficient and uneconomic, and asserted that the general government could save $4,000,000 annually if it would abolish postmasters in all first-class offices and leave the offices in the hands of the men now designated as assistant postmasters. Mr. Taft had reference, of course, to the offices classed as presidential, in which the postmaster is changed to suit the complexion of the administration. In these offices the real responsibility and the real directing force are of necessity lodged in the assistant postmaster, who, being a civil service employee, continues without regard to political exigencies. The presidential postmasters, with some notable exceptions, are a choice collection of figureheads.

NO CANCER CURE YET. The Crocker Cancer Research Laboratories at Columbia University report the results of the tests of various alleged cancer cures. A great many supposed cures have been tested, but none of them have given satisfactory results. They class the radium cure as interesting, but much less important than had been supposed. Radium has apparently had some influence upon cancerous growth, but not to an extent that would warrant heralding it as a cure. The results of the research at the Crocker Laboratory indicate that the cure for cancer, aside from the surgeon's knife, is still to be found. Persons advertising to cure cancer by any therapeutic means may be considered as either ignorant or charlatans.

YOUR BABY MAY (OR CAN, OR BOTH) CRY. The Society for the Prevention of Unnecessary Noises has done a great deal of good in eliminating various noises that could be avoided. Some noises are unavoidable and cannot be suppressed. In New York, the magistrates have refused to issue orders against the howling of the neighbor's cat or the crying of the neighbor's baby, it having been held that it is as necessary for a baby to cry as for a tired worker to sleep. As for the cat, it can continue to attract the movable articles of the neighborhood without fear of molestation from the magistrates.

SALE OF ALLIES' BONDS. The underwriting agreement under which the Anglo-French loan of $500,000,000 was made expired on Tuesday, December 14, and of the $500,000,000 five per cent. five year bonds, the syndicate has left on its hands about $180,000,000 worth, about $320,000,000 worth having been taken by banks and investors. At the end of the syndicate term, the bonds were selling on the market at around ninety-five cents on the dollar. After some fluctuation the bonds are now quoted above 94c.

UNCLE SAM'S BATTLE AEROPLANE. Successful tests have recently been made by Lieutenant Byron Q. Jones, of the United States Army Aviation Corps, of a new type of battle aeroplane, which is said to be in advance of anything now in use. The machine is a biplane about 65 feet over all, built entirely of vanadium steel, which is of exceptional strength and lightness. The plane carries two gun turrets, one on each end of the wings, the turrets being eight feet long by two and one-half feet wide, big enough to hold a rapid-fire gun and its gunner, with a vertical arc of fire of more than 90 degrees, and a horizontal arc of more than 200. The guns will be heavy enough to destroy other aeroplanes or dirigible balloons, and with a bomb-dropping equipment will make the battleplane a most efficient engine of war. In its trial tests the machine made ninety to ninety-five miles an hour. The motor is 140 horse-power. The new plane will not necessarily be confined to military uses, but can be used for carrying mail or express.

SENATOR COCKRELL DIES. Francis Marion Cockrell of Missouri, who succeeded Carl Schurz in the United States Senate March 4, 1875, and who served continuously for thirty years, died at Washington on December 13. He was a commander of Confederate troops in the Vicksburg campaign. He also served on the Interstate Commerce Commission for six years after his term as senator expired, and was a member of the International Boundary Commission appointed by President Taft in 1913.

FOR PEACE AND UNITY. The Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America has announced a separate list of topics for the week of prayer, as follows: The topics announced by the World's Evangelical Alliance are found on the Prayer League page of this issue of the Christian Herald. General Theme, Peace and Unity. Sunday, January 2, sermons on Reconciliation. Isa. 54:10. Acts 10:36. Rom. 5:11. II Cor. 5:18-19.

Monday, January 3. Peace, International and National. Isa. 12. Acts 17:22-31. Rom. 13. I Tim. 2:1-8.

Tuesday, January 4. Peace through Christian Service for Jews and Gentiles, Abroad and at Home. For all Missionary Societies. Ps. 67. Isa. 49:3-13. Acts 1:1-8. Mark 5:1-20. 6:1-6.

Wednesday, January 5. Unity in the Church Throughout the World. Ps. 133. Isa. 26:3. 57:19. John 17. Eph. 4:1-16. I Cor. 12:12-27.

Thursday, January 6. Peace by Education in Schools, Colleges and Universities. Ps. 119:9-16. Prov. 3:1-26; 8:22-36. Isa. 32:16-17.

Friday, January 7. The Family and Youth; Spiritual Training. Deut. 6:4-9. Ps. 34. Ps. 122. Matt. 18:1-14. II Tim. 3:14-17.

Saturday, January 8. Peace Through Brotherhood; Reform and Social Service. To promote health, labor conditions, purity and temperance. Ps. 85:9-13. Ps. 87. Isa. 33:20-24. Luke 10:25-37. Rom. 12-14.

Sunday, January 9. Sermons; The Prince of Peace in Victory and Glory. Ps. 110:1. Isa. 9:6-7. Luke 19:38. Eph. 2:14. I Cor. 15:25. I Tim. 6:15. Heb. 10:12-13. Rev. 19:16.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is published weekly by The Christian Herald, at the Bible House, Fourth Avenue, 8th and 9th Sts., New York City. The Editors are Otto Koenig, President and Treasurer, Bible House, N. Y. City; Geo. H. Sandison, Vice President, Bible House, N. Y. City; Theodore Waters, Secretary, Bible House, N. Y. City.

SUBSCRIPTION PRICE $1.50 a year in advance. Remittances should be made in the safest manner available. Make checks and money orders payable to the Christian Herald.

FOREIGN POSTAGE.—For copies mailed outside

Entered at Post Office, New York, as Second-Class Matter
Entered as Second-Class Matter at the Post Office Department, Ottawa

the United States, Canada and Mexico, add one dollar a year to subscription price.

CHANGE OF DATE.—It takes at least two weeks to change the date, after your subscription is renewed.

EXPIRATION OF SUBSCRIPTION.—The date on the wrapper indicates when your subscription ends.

CHANGE OF ADDRESS.—It requires three weeks time to make the change. Give both old and new address.

LETTERS should be addressed, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

A New Year Sermon

BY THE REV. JAMES M. GRAY, D.D.*

TEXT: Psalm 39:7. "And now, Lord, what wait I for?"

ANOTHER twelvemonth has almost gone, and we are yet in the land of the living. If we give this serious consideration, we must regard it as remarkable. Some think death the strangest wonder of human history, but is not life stranger? To use another's illustration, "a steam engine in a vessel at its dock is not so extraordinary as a steam engine in a vessel plowing the sea." And is it not less singular that the machinery of our existence should cease to operate, than that it should operate at all? How surprising an infant should live an hour! How marvelous that it should continue to live threescore years and ten! When we reflect upon our frame, and the shocks of life it must endure, must we not exclaim with Young,

"Strange that a harp of thousand strings Should keep in tune so long!"

Is it to be wondered at if, like David, we too should put the question, "What wait I for?" The mystery of being here is not profounder than the mystery of staying here.

Let us, therefore, put the question first to ourselves this morning. There are children present. Boys and girls, what wait ye for? There is another life beyond this and every one enters upon it sooner or later. Why do you tarry here? There are young men and maidens present. What wait ye for? "It is appointed unto men once to die." Why then have you not died? There are careworn heads of families present. What wait ye for?

"The light our paths surrounding,
The loves to which we cling,
The hopes within us bounding,
The joys that round us wing—
All melt like stars of even
Before the morning ray;
Pass upward into heaven,
And chide at our delay."

There are white hairs present, too. Even if, by reason of strength, ye be fourscore years, yet is your strength but labor and sorrow. What wait ye for?

Is it enough for the boys and girls to say that they are waiting to be men and women? For the youths that they are waiting to get a start in life and settle down? For fathers and mothers that they are waiting to see their children educated and established? For the aged that there are earthly enterprises to whose success their presence is still necessary? Are these things really what we are waiting for, and all that we are waiting for?

Let us ask God the question. The psalmist felt he could not trust his own conclusions, and so he said, "Lord, what wait I for?"

IT may be you are waiting to be saved. God is not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance and live. "O Ephraim, how can I give thee up, how shall I leave thee, Judah?" Behold him weeping over the Holy City, "O Jerusalem, how often would I have gathered thy children together, as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not!" He is so pleading with some of you today. To go back no farther than the past year, has there been no sermon, no invitation or warning, no supplication or exhortation, that has appealed to your intelligence, or moved your emotions, pleading with you to accept Christ? Have you lost no friend or neighbor by death during that period? Have you had no escape from bodily peril or no illness to remind you of the uncertainty of life? Can you conscientiously say that in all these respects God has left you alone? Has he done not a thing to startle you out of your false security, to convince you of sin, to invite you to the Saviour? I repeat, has God left you absolutely alone? Ah! you cannot say that he has.

Once when I was convalescing from a long illness, it was suggested that for the benefit of the change I visit the British Provinces. The arrangements were all made when, unexpectedly, another malady threw me on my bed again. How disappointing this was! For what was I waiting longer in the sickroom? I soon received a satisfactory answer. Picking up the newspaper I read that the steamer in which I would have sailed, struck a reef on entering St. John harbor, and almost instantly sank. It may be that in his mercy, God is now holding back some of you from a more disastrous shipwreck. Before you embark upon the ocean of eternity, he would have you take passage in the only craft that can furnish assurance of a safe voyage, and bring you to the desired haven. It is this that you may be waiting for. Waiting to be saved! Waiting to repent, and believe the Gospel. Waiting to have your sin put away through the washing of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Ghost.

But "God's Spirit will not always strive with man." There comes a period when "he who, being often reproved, hardeneth his neck, shall suddenly be destroyed, and that without remedy." God forbid it should be so of you. God forbid that your transient impressions, and hasty resolves, and speedy apostasies should be the weary story over again for 1916. "How long halt ye between two opinions?" God pushes for a decision, and an immediate reply. "Today, if ye hear His voice, harden not your hearts."

IT may be you are waiting to bear fruit. You are, by the grace of God, already saved, let us suppose. But for what purpose were you saved? Since God loves you with a "love that passeth knowledge," and since "to depart and be with Christ were far better" than to remain here—why did he not call you to himself at your conversion? Why are you here instead of enjoying your Redeemer's presence? There must be some reason. "Ye have not chosen me," said Christ, "but I have chosen you, and ordained you, that ye should go and bring forth fruit, and that your fruit should remain." May it be to give you another opportunity to glorify his Father by bearing fruit, that you are still here? "A certain man had a fig-tree planted in his vineyard, and he came and sought fruit thereon, and found none. Then said he unto the dresser of his vineyard, Behold, these three years I come seeking fruit on this fig-tree, and find none; cut it down; why cumbereth it the ground? And he answering said, Lord, let it alone this year also, till I shall dig about it, and dung it; and if it bear fruit, well; and if not, then after that shalt thou cut it down."

It requires no great imagination to perceive in this fig-tree, not merely the Jewish nation, but "all and each who in after times should be elected out of the world to the privilege of a nearer knowledge of God"; in a word, to you and me, if we are disciples of Christ; while in the vine-dresser we behold the great Intercessor for his people, who now appeareth in the presence of God for us. The three years in which the

according to the benefit received? Have we added unto our "faith virtue, and to virtue knowledge, and to knowledge temperance, and to temperance patience, and to patience godliness, and to godliness brotherly kindness, and to brotherly kindness love?" It is only when these things are in us, and abound, that they make us "to be neither barren nor unfruitful in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ."

It is that which is to make the difference whether we "shall be saved, yet so as by fire," or whether "an entrance shall be ministered unto us abundantly into the everlasting kingdom." It is the latter that the Father wills, and hence his yielding to the mediation of the Son to let us alone "this year also."

Nor should we forget that the "fruit-bearing" of believers includes the salvation and instruction of other souls. "I will make them and the places round about my hill a blessing." "The Son of Man came into the world to seek and to save that which was lost," and as his Father sent him, so hath he also sent us. "Ye shall be witnesses unto me," said Jesus. "A true witness delivereth souls." (Prov. 14:25.) May it be that for this cause it is needful we should abide in the flesh? There is the companion of our fireside, bone of our bone, flesh of our flesh, who has yet to find the Saviour. We are waiting, let us hope, to have some fruit among them also, that shall be our rejoicing in the day of the Lord Jesus. Shall we not strive for this?

IT may be you are waiting to be perfected. I ought to explain this, because there is a sense in which every true Christian is perfected the moment he accepts Christ as his Saviour. He is perfected in that he is both justified and sanctified; his sin is put away, and by the Holy Spirit he himself is set apart for God forever. The New Testament is very clear on this; notice Paul's words in his epistle to the Colossians, for example. He is exhorting those young Christians to "walk worthy of the Lord unto all pleasing," and reminds them that to do so they should be "giving thanks unto the Father which hath made us meet to be partakers of the saints in light." He uses the past tense, "hath made us meet," to show that this is not something the Father is about to do for them, or even something he is now doing, but something that was done for them once for all when, as the next verse says, he "delivered us from the power of darkness, and translated us into the kingdom of his dear Son."

What, then, do we mean by saying we may be waiting to be perfected? Do we mean the attainment of a state of sinlessness this side of heaven? No, for if a Christian lived to be as old as Methuselah, would he not still require to pray, "Forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us"? We only mean that perfectness, in the sense of a ripeness for the sickle, which comes in the lives of some as if a crown of glory had been vouchsafed to them even before they passed into the unseen. As Dr. Guthrie says: "You have seen the luscious fruit hanging from the bough long after the digging and pruning have been ended, waiting—only waiting—for the genial sun to put the final bloom upon its beauty and beget within the sweetness and mellowness of completed growth. So is it very often in human life." And so may it be with some of you. Though now your pruning, your digging, and perhaps your growing days are over, yet the quiet but potent rays of divine grace are accomplishing a maturity in your experience, so that your Christian life never will have been so attractive as in the hour that you depart hence. "We all do fade as a leaf," but the fall of you, ye glory-crowned ones, is to be illumined by the grandeur of an autumnal sunset.

There is a touching propriety in such a thought as this for those who are advanced in life. More than one generation has passed away since God shined in your hearts to give you "the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ." You have served him, let us hope, until the strength to serve him, physically at least, has almost ceased. You wonder why you are left after your energy is departed. Like the mother of Sisera, only with a holier expectation, you are looking through the lattice and exclaiming, "Why is his chariot so long in coming?"

God bless you, aged brethren! God bless you, young and old, rich and poor, saint and sinner! May you have a "Happy New Year" in the highest and truest sense. "Happy is the people whose God is the Lord." Accept him, serve him, wait for him. It is only as we stand in such relationship to him that, after employing the psalmist's question, "And now, Lord, what wait I for?" we can confidently apply the consolation in his words that follow, "My hope is in Thee."

Singing by the Way

By Eben E. Rexford

HO, comrade, heavenward faring,
Let's sing in cheerful strain
A song to lighten labor
And soothe the heart of pain.
A song so full of gladness,
So blithe with hope and cheer,
That weary wayside pilgrims
Will gain new strength to hear.

LIFE holds for most, my comrades,
More happiness than pain.
God gives a week of sunshine
For every day of rain.
So, trusting in the wisdom
Of his eternal plan,
Let's face the rain or sunshine
And do the best we can.

OH, let us sing, my comrade,
Of blessings by the way.
Each cloud's a silver lining;
There's blue beyond the gray!
Lo, as we sing about it
The shadows break apart,
And all the world's in sunshine
Because we're light of heart!

owner looked for fruit and found none may represent youth, early manhood, and the prime of life. In the poetic language of an old Puritan, did we offer unto the Lord "the firstling of our strength," or was it permitted to run into "wildwood and wanton branch"? Have we presented unto the Owner of the vineyard "a ripe basket of summer fruit," or have our maturer years been "eaten up by the grasshopper and the canker-worm"? The time past may have included years of great mercy; were they laid at the Lord's feet? They may have been years of affliction, when we were digged about and fertilized; have we rendered

* Dean of the Moody Bible Institute of Chicago.

Daily Meditation

FOR EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR. LED BY

J. H. JOWETT, D.D., F. B. MEYER, D.D., REV. E. WHITTIER CASWELL AND CLAYTON SEDGWICK COOPER

The Men of Mighty Days

SUNDAY, January 2, 1916. Deut. 33:25. "As thy days, so shall thy strength be." Walt Whitman has a great word in his eulogy of General Grant. He describes him as "a man of mighty days and equal to the days." The word is just a transcript of the divine promise. We are always purposed by our God to be more than a match for the largest circumstances, more than level with the vastest opportunity, more than adequate to the most exacting task. Mighty days are therefore days of royal privilege, because they are days of promised power and endowment. "Bliss was it in that day to be alive, but to be young was very heaven!" The day of convulsion is the day of our Lord. The fearfully unfamiliar task is a strange door into a new inheritance. Our impossible marks the very hour of grace. In the "mighty days" we can unlock the mighty power of God. The background of every day is grace, and the more tremendous the day the more abounding is the grace. And therefore we can interpret our difficulties as the index of our resources. Our mission betokens our capital in the bank, and we can draw upon "the unsearchable riches" to the last demand of our need. "As thy days, so shall thy strength be."

Then with God's mighty grace we can unlock ourselves. If life were just a sunny picnic that was never broken up by fierce tempest, by thunder and lightning and pelting rain, the greater part of our human resources would remain unused and concealed. It is in the mighty days that we discover ourselves. Latent gifts troop out of their graves. Buried seeds spring into vigorous life. We never thought we had it in us! The big struggle becomes not only our revealer, but also our unearther, and we put on strength and majesty like a robe.

We are living through mighty days, and by God's good grace we can be equal to the days. These are days of great unlockings, and we are having surprises on every side! Young fellows who were regarded as milksops are revealing themselves as iron pillars. Once-while selfish men are unveiling their spiritual wealth in glorious sacrifice. Women who appeared to be living for nothing are giving their life like wine! The "mighty days" are upon us, and God is making us equal to the days. J. H. J.

Jewels Out of the Common Clay

MONDAY, January 3. Isa. 54:9-17. "I will set thy stones in fair colors." What an enumeration of precious stones! The sapphire, the ruby, the agate, and the carbuncle vie with each other, and flash with varied and resplendent color. Jewels are by nature only lumps of dull and inert matter: the sapphire is clay, the diamond carbon. But why the difference between their appearance and that of the ordinary soil? The answer is not easy to give; but this exquisite effect is probably due to crystallization, conducted under exceptional circumstances of convulsion, pressure, and fire. Thus there is a special fitness in this address to the afflicted people of God—their are the convulsions; the awful pressure; the fiery baptism. They count it hard—they cannot understand why they are treated thus. But they will see it all one day, when they learn that God was making agates for windows, carbuncles for gates, and sapphires for foundations.

When next thou art overwhelmed in sorrow and pain, or tossed with tempest and not comforted, dare to look to the outcome of thy stern discipline. It is not for the present joyous, but grievous; nevertheless afterward. . . . Our light affliction, which is for the moment, is like a shaft which it is difficult to turn—it strains every nerve; but on the other side of the wall it is grinding golden grain, the quality and weight of which will more than compensate thee. Learn, then, to look on God as making pleasant stones for the borders of thy life—the walls of salvation and the gates of praise. Is it not a blessed thing to realize that God is making jewels out of the common materials of our daily experiences through the fire of pain and trial? F. B. M.

The Toiler's Hope

TUESDAY, January 4. I Cor. 9:10. "He that ploweth ought to plow in hope." Paul is speaking about apostolic liberty and the right of the worker to expect some reward for his work. Toil that is devoid of anticipation becomes drudgery; to plow in hope—that is the secret of efficient labor. The toiler's hope is the idea of creating, or putting something into the world that was not there before. This gives work a sanctity; this lifts the mind above the slavery of daily routine.

Have you ever seen a Vermont farmer take a piece of worthless-looking land, that can be hired for a few dollars an acre, drive his plow through its rocky soil, harrow it and seed it with seed that may cost him forty cents, and then after the sun and the rain have had a chance at it, harvest a crop that is worth forty dollars an acre? He has created something to enrich the life of man. Have you seen a village carpenter take a tree and, by honest toil, convert it into chairs or the foundations of a house? There is something intangibly sacred in the expression of his face as he stands off and surveys the creative product of his hands.

Toiling, rejoicing, sorrowing.

Onward through life he goes;

Each morning sees some task begun,

Each evening sees its close;

Something attempted, something done,

Has earned a night's repose.

The field may seem small and mean, but to make it yield ever so little is to plow in hope. C. S. C.

Love Stronger Than Death

WEDNESDAY, January 5. John 18:1-10. "Jesus therefore, knowing all the things that were coming upon him, went forth." As we view the death of the Cross, we must ever remember the voluntariness of that supreme act, which is all the more conspicuous as the agony of the garden reminds us how greatly the Lord's spirit dreaded the awful pressure of the world's sin. This made him cry: "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" How greatly he must have loved us! It was love, and only love, that kept him standing at the bar of Pilate, bending beneath the scourge of the soldiers, hanging in apparent helplessness on the cross. Not the iron hand of relentless fate; not the overpowering numbers or closely-woven plots of his foes; not the nails that pierced his quivering flesh. It was none of these. It was not even the compulsion of the divine purpose. It was his own choice, because of a love that would bear all things if only it might achieve redemption for those whom he loved more than himself. "He loved me, and gave himself for me."

Surely we may trust that love! If it moved him to endure the cross and despise the shame, is there anything that it will withhold, anything that it will not do? His love is stronger than death, and mightier than the grave. Strong waters cannot quench it, floods cannot drown it. It silences all praise, and beggars all recompense. To believe and accept it is eternal life. To dwell within its embrace is the foretaste of everlasting joy. If you are fearing the just recompense of your sins, like a band of arresting soldiers lurking in the dark shadows and threatening to drag you forth to pay the uttermost farthing, take heart: Jesus has met and will meet them for you.

F. B. M.

Being True in Great and Little Things

THURSDAY, January 6. Matt. 22:16. "We know that thou art true." These words were addressed mockingly and deceitfully to Jesus by the disciples of the Pharisees, but they represented the ideal the men have always held in their minds of their teachers and leaders. Being true is everywhere and at all times being great, in the sense that God regards greatness. Righteousness is the eternal foundation of everything that lasts.

To be true is to do what we promise to do and when we promise to do it. A builder told me that he had the hardest work to get his employees to finish their work on time, or when they had promised it. We are inclined to allow for certain delays in getting labor accomplished, because men are untrue to their promises. A lawyer friend told me that he had figured out that he lost eighteen months of his life waiting for people who had been untrue to their appointments.

To be true to the use of money is difficult in the large cities, especially where the temptation to spend on trifles is so great. "Money goes" is the common saying. But according to the Scriptures, money is a sacred trust and its use is a sign of our ability to distinguish between right and wrong. "Wherefore do ye spend money for that which is not bread?" A spendthrift is another word for a thief; he is untrue to the use of money; his stewardship shall be taken from him. Extravagance, love of display and the vanity of spending are national weaknesses, national sins; they make us dishonest to ourselves as well as to others, and the end is insincerity and not truth.

Being true is being great in friendship, no matter what happens.

"Love is not love

Which alters when it alteration finds;

Oh, no. It is an ever fixed mark

That looks on tempests and is never shaken."

C. S. C.

Vessels Fit for the Master's Use

FRIDAY, January 7. II Tim. 2:14-26. "A vessel unto honor." We are admitted into this great house, the house of the Lord, the Church. Yonder are successive shelves lining the walls, and laden with vessels of various texture, shape and use. The lowest is filled with those of gold. Their burnished glory glistens in the sun. Many of them are highly wrought. All of them might have stood on that royal banquet table, at which Belshazzar feasted a thousand of his lords. Above them are those of silver. They, also, are wrought into beautiful patterns, some of old silver, others bright and pure to see. The shelf above these contains those of wood. These have been carefully carved out of rare trees, some polished, others rimmed or inlaid with metal. But the highest shelf of all holds vessels of earth. These have come from the potter's hands. They are the cheapest of all, and have passed through the fire. Such are the varieties of the Christian Church. Some of its members have received the last touch of modern culture, which has wrought on a highly valuable substratum of gold, whilst others are of commoner and coarser texture—simple, unlearned, and ordinary. And between these are other classes and talents.

Now, see, the Master of the house enters. He needs one for his immediate personal use. Watch his actions! He looks at those lower rows of vessels, but presently turns from them to seek what he requires in the highest shelf of all. Why? Is he arbitrary? No. But because most of the lower vessels contain other liquids, or are not clean, or their handles are hidden against the wall. On the top shelves the vessels are empty and clean, and their handles reach out to invite his hand. You may be gold, but you will not be meet for his use if you are not pure and clean. F. B. M.

Going All the Way with Jesus

SATURDAY, January 8. Matt. 26:39. "And she went a little farther." Jesus went farther than any other being for the salvation of men. He went all the way to Gethsemane, Calvary, the sepulcher and to glory. If he had not taken that last step, all his other steps would have been unavailing.

Our Lord did not fail humanity in this crucial hour of human destiny. When the sins of the race pressed him upon his knees, his shoulders bore our burdens, his blood paid our liabilities, purchased our pardon, cleansed our natures, that we might be pure to see the Father.

No earthly friend could go so far as Jesus did. They have not the infinite strength, are liable to fall asleep in the supreme moment, or flee away in the hour of danger. When Jesus went a little farther, he was alone! Forsaken! An hour before he had tenderly said, "Remember me," but now all had forgotten him. He must tread the winepress alone, drink the bitter cup to its dregs till, in his solitary anguish, with the Father's face turned away, his precious blood, a crimson sweat, stood upon his brow before his side was pierced.

Millions are glad Jesus went a little farther. There are other millions who should take that last step, out of self into Christ, and then into glory. In our Gethsemane we are not alone, for he said, "Lo, I am with you always." "There am I in the midst." With angels to comfort you and the mighty Victor over Hell, Death and the Grave to guard, guide and protect you, you may be a victor like him. Soon it will be said of you, when life is ended, "He went a little farther, into glory, where he awaits our coming."

E. W. C.

Will the War End in Palestine?

By
OWEN MAYNARD WILLIAMS

THE present war is bringing into new prominence a land that has been the battlefield of history. Once again the attention of the world is being turned to the land of Syria. The battlefields of antiquity may be the battlefields of tomorrow. Geography has laid its impress on the land, and history repeats itself along geographical lines.

The news comes that Germany is to make an attack on Egypt. The political significance of the move is outside the realms of this discussion. The possibilities of success, of Mohammedan insurrection against England, Italy and France along the whole north coast of Africa, of revolution in India,—these things can not be touched on here. We seek simply to show the setting for Germany's move, if it does come.

The first trains that followed the "Drang nach Osten" to Constantinople were laden not with munitions of war, but with railway material. There are rumors, more or less well founded, that the Taurus and Amanus ranges are now tunneled and that a through traffic from Scutari, opposite Constantinople, to Medina, far to the south of the Suez Canal, is now in operation; that a railway, paralleled by a pipe line for water, runs south toward Egypt from Beersheba; and that the historic highway for caravans from the plain below Nazareth past Jerusalem and Bethlehem to Beersheba and beyond, is now the roadbed for transportation of the steel rails of modern war.

Certainly the materials rushed through so quickly are not for ordinary development projects. The assumption that they are for strategic purposes is a fair one. The construction of the Bagdad Railway has been rushed throughout the war, and those who know say that there is no need for more rails there. The district around Busra and almost to Bagdad is in the hands of the British, and the possibility of major operations in the Persian Gulf district is remote.

With Egypt as the goal, there are two possibilities for the use of the railway material. All use for the rails lies south of the Taurus and Amanus tunnels, of which, eighteen months ago, there were eleven miles uncompleted. Whether the tunnels are open now or not, they soon will be, and as the need of the materials lies beyond them, they need not be considered in the question of destination of the material.

Beyond the tunnels, the Bagdad Railway has been running trains to Aleppo for three years. From Aleppo trains are now available to Medina, only a few miles north of Mecca. As far as Damascus the line was French, and from there to Medina the railway is Turkish. Both lines are of course available now. Branches from this line run to the Mediterranean at Tripoli, Beirut and Haifa. A railway against Egypt will have to run west from the Hedjaz Railway or south from the Haifa-Damascus line. The first would have to cross the Arabah depression and the northern length of Sinai. The other would follow the route that Jesus often trod, across the plain of Esdraelon, through the Vale of Dothan, and past Samaria to Shechem and Jerusalem. From the Holy City it would run south to Bethlehem, Hebron and Beersheba, before entering the southern desert and turning southwest to the Suez Canal. Part of this line was already in operation before the war began. It may at present be finished to Beersheba or beyond. [Recent news dispatches tell of the opening of the line to Beersheba and within fifty miles of the Egyptian border. EDITOR.]

Let us first consider the route from the Hedjaz

Railway west across Sinai. From Damascus to the Suez Canal this line would be at a safe distance from the coast. But it would be necessary to descend into the hot, pestiferous Arabah—which is a continuation of the Dead Sea valley—and then cross the dry deserts of Sinai. Not only is this branch route without water, but it comes from a district across the Jordan almost equally barren. If it passes too near Akaba, it is liable to be cut by a landing force from that point. Only for the months of December, January and February is there any water along this route, which, although it has the advantage of freedom from attack by a landing party, has great disadvantages in length, grades, and water supply. The problem of a landing party is a grave one.

So we will assume that the route to Egypt will be the one from the Haifa-Damascus line at El-Fuleh, south through the very center of the Holy Land. Jerusalem, which on account of its isolated position at a considerable elevation was off the ancient caravan routes, will be on the direct line of the new railway. This line was not begun as a military route, bilities of insurrection in Egypt are offset by those of insurrection in Syria. Where is such an insurrection most likely to occur? The logical place for an allied landing party is the port of Beirut.

Beirut itself is two-thirds Christian, and has long been a center of pan-Arabic and anti-Turkish feeling. Behind Beirut is the Lebanon, which is more than half Christian, and which was under the protection of France from the time of the massacres of 1860 till Turkey entered the present war. A fine carriage road and a railway connect Beirut with Damascus. If a landing party lands at Beirut and succeeds in cutting the line, it will sunder Constantinople and Aleppo not only from the western of the two lines, but from the eastern as well. For that reason, the cutting of the line need not here be considered further, as it would affect one line as well as the other.

Assume, then, that the rails that were hurried to Constantinople are to complete a line from El-Fuleh, in the Plain of Esdraelon, south to Beersheba and then southwest to the Suez Canal. The line is already near enough to completion, so that when the rains come and the barren desert below Beersheba blossoms like a garden, and the northern side of Sinai is green for the only time during the year; when winter's cold and the heavy snow make operations of magnitude in the eastern or western theaters of war impossible, the scene of war may shift to the southern theater.

Let us stand in the midst of the great plain at the northern end of the new line. Up there, behind the pyramidal hill to the north, lies the beautiful village of Nazareth, sheltered in a hollow among the hills. How often Jesus may have walked out on that hill and gazed down upon the rolling plain, where long caravans wended their way from Egypt to Damascus and the cities of Mesopotamia, Persia or the Indies themselves! From this very hill, rising steeply from the plain, it is said that his enemies were about to cast him upon the rocks below. Toward the west we see the long line of Carmel. Only a few miles away is the spot where Elijah had his contest with the priests of Baal; and at our very feet rise the headwaters of the Brook Kishon, which empties into the Mediterranean between the modern port of Haifa and Acre, the southernmost port of ancient Phoenicia. In the harbor, which can be seen from this point only when the setting sun sparkles on the waters beside Mount Carmel, the Crusaders beached their fleets from Pisa, Venice, and Genoa. Saladin captured the city, but was later driven out by Richard the Lion-hearted, who massacred two thousand five hundred prisoners because a ransom did not come from the Kurdish leader of the Saracens. Napoleon failed to capture Acre in 1799, Ibrahim Pasha destroyed it in 1832, and its destruction by the Anglo-Austrian fleet under Napier in 1840 ended Egyptian influence in Syria.

To the southwest is the site of Megiddo, where the old caravan route cut behind Carmel and connected Egypt with the East. The Plain of Esdraelon, Megiddo, or Jezreel is unique among the landscapes of the Holy Land. On this plain, which separated the northern tribes from the southern, Deborah directed Barak in his campaign against Sisera. Here

Jael, after the Israelites had swept down from Tabor and put the army of Jabin to flight, drove the tent-peg into Sisera's temple. Here the exultant song of Deborah rose to Jehovah. Here the stars and the Brook Kishon aided the Israelites in their battle, and Sisera's mother awaited, as mothers do, the coming of her son, whose chariot had long since been riderless.

Band-Led Turkish Troops in Jerusalem

but to enable tourists and mails to reach the Holy City when the weather at Jaffa made a landing there impossible.

Assuming, then, that the Central Powers do make a drive at the Suez Canal and Egypt, there is the probability that the Allies will try to cut the long line of railway between Aleppo and Egypt. The possi-

Looking Across Esdraelon Plain Toward the Mount of Precipitation, Behind Which Lies Nazareth. El-Fuleh at Extreme Left

Travelers (Note Child's Cradle on Donkey) on Road to Schechem at the Break Between Judean Plateau and Samaritan Valleys

Within sight of El-Fuleh, Gideon tested his soldiers and mustered the ones who kept hold of their weapons as they drank. Arming them with horns and lamps concealed in earthen water-jars, he put the hordes of Ishmaelites to flight and pursued them to the Jordan. Here Saul's three sons were slain by the Philistines, and here, when the battle turned against him, Saul and his armor-bearer fell on their swords. Here Josiah, needlessly opposing his army to the Egyptians, was routed and mortally wounded by the army of Pharaoh-Necho, whose coming had often been prophesied, and who was passing across this level plain to the Assyrian cities beyond the Euphrates. On this plain Jeremiah's dirge sounded on the air.

Here Jehu's ride to Naboth's vineyard took place. Here Ahab descended quickly from Carmel to Jezreel, to escape the rain that turned the dry plain into a bottomless mire, and Elijah ran before him as a sign of respect. Here Egyptians, Jews, Syrians, Romans and Greeks passed and repassed. Napoleon, entering the plain through the pass at Megiddo to found an empire on the Euphrates, crossed in pride and returned on his first retreat. At this point in the link-land between Egypt and the Euphrates, battles have been not the exception, but the rule.

As our train rushes on toward the south, we pass through the Vale of Dothan, where the elder brothers stripped the many-colored coat from their brother Joseph and then cast him into the pit. We are passing through the same valley that was traversed by the Egyptians who bought the young man and took him down into their country. Samaria, the proud capital of Omri, which Herod the Great afterward beautified and named Sebaste, after Augustus' sister, is next passed, before our train turns to the east and rushes into the narrow valley between Ebal and Gerizim, where Schechem lay, and where the blessings and the cursings echoed back and forth from one hillside to the other. We are now in the center of the Holy Land. From the top of Mount Ebal, one can see almost all the land where Jesus lived.

But troop trains cannot wait for historical references and we rumble on around the base of Gerizim and past Jacob's well—and turn again to the south, climbing to the top of the Judean plateau and passing Bethel, which Jacob founded and Josiah destroyed. Next we pass Shiloh, where the Ark of the Covenant stood, and where Samuel, wakened from his calm sleep of boyhood, answered, "Here am I, Lord." At Beeroth we pass the place where the mother of Jesus missed her twelve-year-old Son from the large company who were returning to Nazareth over the same route we have come, and turned back to Jerusalem to find him.

We stop for a moment beside the battlemented walls of the Holy City, and our engine is filled with water from Solomon's Pools and Artas, which we will soon pass farther south. The small tomb of Rachel, mother of Benjamin, can be seen beside our road as we near Bethlehem and obtain a view of the city of the Nativity, stretched out along a ridge on our left. Nineteen hundred years have passed since the angels sang "Peace on earth, good will toward men."

Our train speeds on till the little town of the first Christmas is hidden by a hill. Half an hour more, and we are passing through the city of Hebron, where Abraham pitched his tent under the oaks of Mamre, and where the decrepit old traditional "oak of Abraham" is preserved by unsightly iron props.

BEERSHEBA is the last village on the trip to the south. Here Abraham dug wells that have identified the place to this day, and here he made the treaty with Abimelech, which is spoken of in the twenty-first chapter of Genesis. It was at this point that he received his command to sacrifice his son. To this place Elijah fled from the wicked Jezebel over the very route we have followed. The wells of Beersheba have never failed throughout the years. Whether they will be able to supply an army through a pipe line across the desert, no one can say; but it is likely that more water would have to be brought from Artas or the Pools of Solomon. The marble rims of the wells are deeply cut and grooved by the ropes of centuries of thirsty men and beasts, so that they resemble a cog wheel.

Syria has always been the link-land between the population center of East and West. Once it was Babylonia and Egypt that were joined by this bridge-land. Later, it was the population centers of India and China on the one side, and the thickly peopled countries of western Europe on the other. The Bagdad Railway is but one more step in the development of this perennial highway. Early in history, the royal road to the East led across Asia Minor and Mesopotamia to Susa and Sardis. For fifteen hundred years this road was the connecting link between East and West. Then the civilizations of the land died down and lawless marauders made the route unsafe for trade. The need for a new route drove Columbus across the Atlantic and made Vasco da Gama round the Cape. For three hundred years the long sea route was followed, until de Lesseps separated Africa from Asia, and trade flowed through the Suez Canal.

But now even that route is not short enough. Over three-quarters of a century ago, Von Moltke advocated a route from Berlin to the Persian Gulf, following the historic route of the everlasting link-land. This led to the friendship between the Kaiser and the Sultan. Germany, stepping in, supplanted England in the graces of the Turk. The right to construct the new line, which both England and France had had, was conceded to Germany, and England and Russia found their plans for a quicker route to the East thwarted by the Teuton. In the midst of this war broke out, and the lands between Constantinople and Egypt are once more forced into prominence. Another battle may drench Esdraelon in blood. Jerusalem, formerly sheltered by its aloofness from the plains, now holds a prominent place in the thoughts of the governments whose magnificent hospices have almost hidden the little city, which lies on the direct line of the advance toward Egypt. Unholy war threatens to bring sorrow and suffering once more to the land of Calvary. Or is it that peace may be realized in the land where the first Christmas carols gladdened the air?

Thus it will be seen that it is by no means an improbable thing that tiny Judea, the birthplace of Christ, may be stirred by the rumble of troop trains, and even quiet Bethlehem may feel the ominous throb of a land stirred by the throes of war. The Holy Land may be the turning point.

The citizens of Nazareth may gaze down upon the great battlefield of the centuries, and see there the final conflict of the war. Who knows but that the opposing forces may first realize the brotherhood of man within sight of the birthplace of the world's Brother?

Modern Houses in Aleppo, More Egyptian Than Palestinian Style

Railway Station in Syria, within sight of the Lebanon Mountains

Our Editorial Forum

PRESIDENT
OTTO KOENIG

MANAGING EDITOR
GEO. H. SANDISON

SECRETARY
THEODORE WATERS

The Church's Opportunity

It is surely a most remarkable illustration of the elasticity and adaptability of certain kinds of religion that, at a time when the whole world is either at war or discussing it, the American pulpit should be divided on the question of "preparedness." We have seen how statesmen and editors have quoted Scripture after a fashion designed to accommodate their personal views, regardless of the context, and in some cases giving to the words a meaning they were never meant to convey. Now, we hear of ministers of the Gospel who are unfurling the bloodred flag of militarism and attempting to justify war, declaring that the appeal to force is quite consistent with the teachings of the Prince of Peace. This class of preacher—who is flourishing in Europe just now—is very aptly satirized by a poet who characterizes the teaching in these caustic lines:

Christ did not wish that men might be like him;
That is an error, springing who knows where.
Christ's purpose was that, in the distance dim,
A grand ideal, planet-like, might flare,
Subject for praise or theme on which to preach,
But never meant to come within our reach.

Fortunately, we have here in all the denominations pastors who are neither ashamed nor afraid to speak the truth from their pulpits, men who denounce war as only to be tolerated when unavoidable, and who warn the nation against being carried away by the outcry of the militarists and the munition-makers. There are plenty of preachers clearheaded and sagacious enough to see that the present agitation has its origin in selfishness and greed.

Our Presbyterian contemporary, the Continent, has taken a poll of the pastors of its own denomination, and of 353 ministers who responded 72 voted against any increased armament by the United States, believing that the country is in no danger of attack; 57 held that all war is wrong and unnecessary, and 91 believed that military drill among boys would create "an appetite for war." A larger number, evidently influenced by the current agitation on the subject, favored preparedness, most of them, however, on moderate lines. Some emphasized their objections to militarization, while yet opposing disarmament on the ground that we cannot adopt a policy of pure idealism. One, an ex-army veteran, declared war "the most irrational way of settling any question," and urged a world-peace conference—a view which was shared by others. Some held that there should be no war, save by a vote of the people. One New York pastor wrote, "There never was less need of arming than now," and another, in the State of Washington, expressed a fear, widely shared, that "if we prepare for war, we shall want to try out our preparations and will be the more easily led into it." Taken as a whole the judgment of the majority of the pastors was on the side of prudence and moderation.

Another large denomination, the Disciples of Christ, is represented by the Christian Century as holding the view that for the first time in history a nation is now "brought to deliberately consider a war program in the light of the moral ideals of Jesus Christ." It is a clean-cut issue, which has developed "a strong, conscientious conviction against war and in favor of following the leadership of Christ." The proposition that our country should not "put on the whole armor of militarism strikes at the very quick of the Christian conscience that has been growing in the Church," making the campaign the greatest religious revival the nation has ever seen. "What will Jesus do?" will be asked with an urgency never known before, and answered with intelligence and fidelity.

Similarly, the American Friend recognizes "a great religious crisis" in the present issue, and one in which churches cannot be silent or inactive for expediency's sake. The Church, "by every rule of truth and the fundamental principles of love and human brotherhood," is bound to condemn war and is therefore called "to universal protest against a program that sanctions or prepares for war." And the Congregationalist, of Boston, speaking for its denomination, unfurls the flag of protest and says: "Let us declare to our representatives and senators in Congress our opposition to the plans proposed. How can we dare to refuse to be Christian in this hour of world-crisis?"

This, then, is the crowning test for the Christian Church in America, which has grown out of the great war. Will it prove faithful to its Founder, who set it among the nations to witness for truth against error, for the spiritual force against the material, for love against hate, for kindness against cruelty? If our nation has a mission to the world, as we believe, let the Church loyally lend its influence, its eloquence and its spiritual vigor to bring that mission to a successful and righteous issue. This is the Church's greatest opportunity. The European war has been called "a tragedy of the weak though righteous Christian will." Let us not perpetuate this weakness by vacillation now. A united Church in America, rising with one voice in courageous protest and declaration, will have God on its side, and will triumph over all the forces that are arrayed against it.

The Week of Prayer

THE first week of January is again appointed a week of prayer. Both the World's Evangelical Alliance and the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America have announced special subjects for prayer on the days of the first week of the new year.

"In the beginning God." The old plan of a watch night service, still followed by many churches, in which Christians spend the last moments of the old year and the first moments of the new in consecration and meditation and supplication, is sane and beautiful. Even if we are not able to get to such a service, the dawning year must find our hearts in the attitude of prayer. Then the dominant note of the first week, including the first two Sabbaths, should be the note of prayer. The Federal Council in its call to prayer writes:

Beyond the borders thought of heretofore, may we hope to extend this appeal for prayer since Jews and Gentiles, bond and free, Christian and non-Christian, are involved in the common distress and the common need. Let us pray that the God of Abraham, of Isaac and of Jacob, the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, will pour out again his Spirit for the reawakening of his people of every name; that all who wait upon him may be refreshed, so that the whole world will come back to renewed faith in God; and that great reformations and revivals of true religion may follow in every land, hastening the day when

"The earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord
As the waters cover the sea."

From many hearts, from many homes, from many churches, from many lands, prayers to the Christian's God will be ascending during these first days of 1916. What part shall we have? Shall our faith, in the face of the discouragements and woes of these present days, still be strong and help bring down the peace and glory of God to the storm-swept world? God will miss our voice if we do not pray. The world will miss a blessing if we forget.

The Challenge of Faith

DON MARQUIS had a rare poem in the Evening Sun the other night. He entitled it "Portrait of An Old Sea Captain," and in it told how Varras, the painter, put such fire and vigor into the canvas that the old sea captain, who had been sitting as his model, felt that he must go to sea again.

I'm only eighty odd;
I'll die on open waters yet, please God,
Once more . . . to be the master of a ship!
What's in your art to make an old man brag?

But Varras, "having created something more than truth," was busy cleaning his brushes.

Alice Brown wrote some years ago the story of a man whose rival was loved better than himself, but was not living worthily. The rejected lover was an artist, and asking his rival to sit for him, he, too, put a nobility and purity into the canvas that carried the man out of himself and made him better than he was. The splendid artist made by his art a man out of a wreck and gave him to the woman he himself could not win.

The lesson? To make people better than they are by our faith in them. S. H. Hadley, the apostle of Water Street, used to say: "If a man cheats me nineteen times I'll shame him out of his frauds by trusting him the twentieth." Jesus knew how to do this. He was keen and quick to see the wrong in men and brave to tell them of it, but often he took the other way. He saw Nathanael under the fig tree and praised him into a pure and noble pride. To another man he said: "Thou art not far from the kingdom of God."

To learn how to praise; to learn how to stimulate men—or women and boys and girls—to be better than their best; to believe in people, and praise them, and have pride in them, till they must rise to new heights to meet the challenge of our faith—this is the way to help. And who shall say how many a land-satisfied sailor we shall send out to sea again, to see new world glories and to gather for himself, his friends and his land new riches and still higher hopes?

Think of the faith God has in us; think of what he expects us to be. We must have faith in ourselves to meet the faith he has in us. Jesus said: "As a man thinketh in his heart, so is he." He declared again: "According to your faith be it unto you." We can be what he expects us to be. And by painting for others the dream of their lives which God cherishes in his heart we can lift them to his heights.

"Free Course" for the Bible

ONE gratifying outcome of the war is that it has given an immense stimulus to Bible production and circulation. Never has there been a year in which God's Word has found such free course as now. Not only the Bible Societies, foreign and domestic, feel the demand augmented beyond all calculations, but the Bible-producing houses in the regular trade find their facilities unequal to the demand. There are publishers outside of the Societies that have an annual output of over a million Bibles, and this will be greatly exceeded this year. The Gideons, an organization of Christian commercial travelers, now put 50,000 Bibles in American hotels in a single season. The American Bible Society, with a world-wide field, places between 2,000,000 and 3,000,000 Bibles, Testaments and Gospels in circulation yearly, and this season will be the largest it has ever known. It has come to be generally recognized that in times of great stress, when business and private interests are deeply affected, the demand for the Old Book grows while all others may decline. It is to all classes, high and low, rich and poor, the one great source of consolation and comfort; a beacon in the storm, a light in the darkness, a divine voice of hope and encouragement in the time of trial. "Thy Word is a lamp unto my feet, a light unto my path," said the psalmist, and the distressed world still finds it so today.

To Our Family Circle

WITH the New Year at hand, the Christian Herald sends cordial greeting to its friends everywhere. May 1916 bring to each and every member of our Family Circle, in their homes, their business affairs and their social relationships, the blessings of health and prosperity and a realizing sense of God's goodness in all things. We take this opportunity to acknowledge the many kind messages of friendship, goodwill and encouragement that have come to us from members of the Circle throughout the year that has gone. They have been an inspiration to us in our work.

Each passing year enlarges our borders and increases the pleasant bonds of fellowship that exist between the members of our Family Circle and ourselves. There is a mutuality of aims and interests which conduces to enthusiasm and success. The voluntary testimonies of many thousands of our readers assures us that the Christian Herald is more than ever a welcome guest in the sanctuary of their homes, and that it has a wholesome influence there.

We will begin the New Year with a greatly increased audience. Old friends are there and many new ones; and we trust to greet many more as the days go by. We especially desire to keep with us every one who has been a member of the Family Circle, and who has thought and planned and worked with us in the memorable year just closing. Nineteen sixteen is destined to be a year of great world-events, spiritual and material. We want our Family Circle to be intact and united at such a time.

And let us say here that you can add to your usefulness and extend your influence as a member of the Circle if, when renewing your own subscription, you send along with it a subscription for some one who has not hitherto been a reader of the paper. In this way you will be doing real missionary work of the most practical kind.

We know that there are very many of our friends who have long had the desire, though lacking the opportunity, to advance the cause of the Gospel. You may never be able to go out to mission fields, but you can have a substitute working in your stead. This is a simple and direct way of doing it. Make the Christian Herald your evangel to some quiet home, where it will do service in your stead. Your own copy and that of your beneficiary will be supplied weekly to any addresses given, at $2.25 for both together.

The Bible and Newspaper

CONDUCTED BY
FERDINAND C. IGLEHART, D.D.

Lightning

MR. O. S. PETERS has gathered data from the United States Census Bureau, the Weather Bureau, insurance companies, fire chiefs, on the damage from lightning, which he has embodied in a report recently printed. From this it is learned that $8,000,000 worth of property is destroyed each year by lightning and that 1,500 people are struck by it, one-third of them fatally. Nine-tenths of these fatal accidents occur in the rural districts. Lightning rods reduce the fire hazard from lightning by 80 to 90 per cent. for houses and as much as 96 per cent. in the case of barns. Some people do not pay any attention to a thunderstorm; others are mortally afraid of it, and try to protect themselves and families with feathers, glass, horn and other non-conducting substances. The sharp lightning echoed in the angry thunder's roll plays a beneficent part in nature, purifying the atmosphere, and giving health and life to man. God reveals his truth in mildness and severity in nature, the Bible, and human experience. Job describes God's severity in nature, likening the thunder to the sound of his voice: "He directeth it under the whole Heaven, and His lightning unto the ends of the earth." (Job 37: 3.)

Flowers About Coal Mine

FIVE years ago the Mineral Spring colliery of the Lehigh Valley Coal Company stood seventeenth in the rating for general appearance and efficiency of fire protection among the thirty collieries of the company. When incited to effort by the offer of a banner of efficiency to fly from the flagstaff, the miners and outside workmen began to take thought of matters that they had ignored. In 1911 they raised the Mineral Spring colliery to the rank of number nine; the next year they stood third, and in 1913 they had won first place, and have held it since. But the rivalry among the collieries is so acute that, whereas last year the colliery held its place by two points, this year it came within seven-tenths of a point of losing it. The men are proud of the grass and the flowers around the breaker house. The most unsightly place imaginable, the space about the mouth of a coal mine is thus rendered a beautiful garden by the taste and care of the miners and their wives and daughters. How many beautiful characters can be found among the miners and their families! One of the surprises in visiting the submerged districts of the great cities is the large number of flowers blooming in the windows of abject poverty. The seeds of Christ's love often fall into the most unsightly soil and adorn it with the most beautiful flowers, and perfume it with the most delicious odors of virtue and truth. The mouth of a coal mine is clean and beautiful by the side of the unregenerated human heart, into which the Gospel seed falls, which under divine culture brings to it gardens and harvests. This transformation by spiritual agriculture is thus promised: "The wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad for them; and the desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose." (Isa. 35:1)

New York Secures Billy Sunday

REV. W. A. SUNDAY had promised to go to Chicago January 1, 1917, and the committee from New York sent a messenger to Chicago and persuaded the people there to let New York have their date, which they did, and formal word was received from the evangelist stating that he would begin work in New York January 1, 1917. At the close of a day's meeting of the New York District of the New York Methodist Conference, under the direction of Dr. Allan MacRossie, one thousand laymen met, and, learning that the evangelist was to come to the city, sent to him at Syracuse the following telegram: "One thousand Methodist laymen in great rally meeting here tonight enthusiastically voted to support your campaign here in 1917." This was the beginning of a line-up of Protestant New York for what is believed to be the largest religious move-saving power. The spiritual problem of the second city of the world should send the Christians of the city and nation to their knees with this prayer: "O Lord, revive thy work in the midst of the years; in the midst of the years make known; in wrath remember mercy." (Hab. 3:2.)

Cotton Stalks Make Pulp

THE cotton stalk, after the picking, has been counted not only worthless but a minus quantity, as it cost a dollar a ton to destroy it. It has been discovered that these stalks make an things that used to be thrown out as waste furnish the profit of the establishment. The great problem with the pastor and with the Christian man and woman is to utilize the forces that are going to waste in the mental, moral, and spiritual realm in the church and individual life. Christ after his miracle of feeding the five thousand considered it of importance to teach this lesson of rigid economy: "When they were filled, he said unto his disciples, Gather up the fragments that remain, that nothing be lost." (John 6: 12.)

Newfoundland Goes Dry

MOST of the British colonies are radical in their war on the drink traffic. Newfoundland went dry in the election the other day. Prohibition was carried by four hundred votes more than forty per cent. of the registered vote required, so it was announced in St. Johns November 25. Prince Edward Island is dry, nearly all of Canada but the large cities have adopted prohibition, and New Zealand recorded more than a majority vote against the liquor traffic, but the law there requires a sixty per cent. majority, which was not secured. The people of Newfoundland found that however attractive drink might appear, and what promises it made, "At the last it biteth like a serpent, and stingeth like an adder." (Prov. 23: 32.)

Rivals Telescope

AN optical device, which it is claimed rivals the telescope in revealing the mysteries of the heavenly bodies, was exhibited at the thirty-sixth annual meeting of the American Society of Mechanical Engineers held recently. Dr. John A. Bashear of Pittsburg, in his address as returning president, held in his hand this new device, which is called a "diffracting grating," and explained its working. It looked like a rectangular piece of metal about two by four inches long, and changed color under the electric lights. The speaker said: "On the plain side of this polished plate, made accurate to one-tenth of a light wave, or within one forty-five-thousandth of an inch, are ruled more than 45,000 lines, between which there is no greater error than one two-millionth of an inch. With this delicate piece of apparatus, made possible, first, by vigorous scientific research, second, by the skill of the artisan, third, by a knowledge of and a vigorous care to avoid temperature changes, and fourth, by the accuracy of the mechanism, the astro-physicist has been able to tell the composition, temperature and distance of the stars. It also is possible for the physicist, the chemist, to tell us the purity of the material he is called upon to investigate; "indeed, it makes itself subservient to many phases of engineering in the domain of metallurgy." Dr. Bashear paid a tribute to the genius and skill of American engineers, and said that the perfecting of the screw by Rowland, and later by Dr. Anderson of Johns Hopkins University, had contributed to the scientific mechanism which made possible the optical device that now rivals the telescope. Each astronomical device reveals new secrets of God's wisdom and power. The Hebrews were impressed by the siderial heavens, and though they knew almost nothing about them compared to the people of our times, they claimed that God their Father made and sustained them, as instanced by the language: "When I consider thy heavens, the work of thy fingers, the moon and the stars, which thou hast ordained, what is man, that thou art mindful of him? and the son of man, that thou visitest him?" (Ps. 8: 3-4.)

© International Film Service, Inc.

Lady Eglantine, $100,000 Hen

WHEN "Lady Eglantine" was brought to the poultry show in New York, December 7, the photographers went to get her picture, and the city papers printed it and told how she had performed the feat of laying 31 eggs in a year, and thus claimed the world's record. It is said that each of her eggs sells for sixty dollars, or $720 a dozen, for hatching purposes. If all of her eggs could have been sold at that rate the income from her would have been over $18,000 for the year. The premium bird is a White Leghorn and weighs three and seven-eighths pounds. Until within the past fifty years in America poultry-raising was only an incident of farming, and only within the past twenty-five years have the farmers realized what an enormous income can be had from this branch of the agricultural industry. Few people even among the farmers realize that the crop of the poultry and poultry product in this country each year equals in value that of the hay, wheat or cotton crop; that it approaches the enormous sum of a billion dollars. The greatest care is taken in breeding, feeding and housing the birds, and in marketing them and their eggs. Poultry-raising was a part of the farming industry in olden times. Christ in one of his addresses thus refers to the hen to illustrate his loving care: "How often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathereth her chickens under her wings, and ye would not." (Matt. 23: 37.)

ment in the history of the city. A second resolution was offered by Bishop W. F. McDowell of Chicago that, not waiting for the coming of Mr. Sunday, "we pledge ourselves here and now to try to bring to New York the greatest revival it has ever known." The motion was seconded by Bishop Edwin F. Hughes of San Francisco. There were loud hallelujahs and amens from every part of the house. Rev. Dr. Charles L. Goodell, chairman of the general committee of a hundred having the matter in charge, says a site will be selected and work begun at once in the construction of a tabernacle capable of seating from 20,000 to 25,000 people. There is a wide difference of opinion with reference to Billy Sunday, but he has made good everywhere and his friends confidently expect him to do so in New York. The task is too great for any man, but not for God, who honors his servants' faith with his presence and excellent pulp for the manufacture of paper, making a stronger and better quality than that derived from pulp made from wood. The destruction of the forests will reduce the wood pulp supply; the annual supply of stalks from the cotton crop will be perennial. It is said the cotton stalk's pulp, having a strong fibre, can withstand the nitrate process and be used in the manufacture of gun cotton. In destroying the cotton stalks, it has been customary to cut them close to the ground and let the roots remain in the earth. The new discovery has use for the roots as well as the stalks in making the pulp. This it is said will remove the curse of the little boll weevil, which lives and feeds during the winter months in the roots of the cotton plant. From the pulp it is claimed an artificial silk can be produced. Great marvels have been wrought by science in the lines of efficiency. In some lines of business, the

Go ye out into

all the World

Places reached in the Christian Herald World-Wide Mission of Cheer

NORTH AND SOUTH AMERICA: Arctic (3 stations), United States (26 different points in 12 states), Venezuela, Peru, Chile, Honduras, Mexico (3 stations), Brazil, San Salvador, Surinam, Dutch Guiana.

ISLANDS OF THE SEA: Polynesia, Philippines, Hawaiian Islands, Guam, Haiti, New Hebrides, Cape Verde Islands.

WAR RELIEF COMMITTEES: London, England;

Paris, France; Berlin, Germany; Rotterdam, Holland; Brussels, Belgium; Nish, Serbia; Lodz, Poland; Galicia; Vienna, Austria; Constantinople; Jerusalem.

MISSIONARY AND GOSPEL WORK: Europe—Bulgaria. Asia—Armenia, Persia, Korea, Syria, Arabia, Tibet, Japan (3 stations), India (40 stations), China (24 stations). Africa—Egypt, Liberia, Congo, Zambesia, Natal.

A World-Survey of the Spiritual and Benevolent Work of the Christian Herald Family Circle during 1915

NOTHING less than a world-survey will be adequate to explain the spiritual and benevolent activities of the Christian Herald Family Circle during the year now closing. Owing to the great war and the universal suffering it has entailed, our energies have been drawn into many new channels. Shortly after the outbreak of hostilities, our Family Circle was organized as an Army of Helpfulness, and took up with enthusiasm the task of succoring the destitute widows and orphans. Beginning with the sufferers of this class in Belgium and the refugees in Holland, the work rapidly extended, until it is now represented by no less than eleven Christian Herald Relief Committees in the combatant countries, viz., at Paris, Berlin, Vienna, Lodz, Nish, London, Constantinople, Rotterdam, and Brussels, with a similar committee in Galicia and another in Jerusalem. In many instances, our American Ambassadors personally directed the organization of the committees, while one committee—that at Constantinople—has as its chairman our Ambassador, Mr. Morgenthau. It was due to the zeal and prompt generosity of our readers that the first American relief to reach Belgium was a Christian Herald cargo of food-stuffs, conveyed from London to Rotterdam on the Dutch steamer Jan Blockx, and thence on barges by canal into Belgium. Our committees in many cases have labored under great difficulties, this being especially true of the committee in Serbia, which after working effectively at Nish for a time, was scattered before the invading armies. The total remittances to December 15 made by the Christian Herald to the committees in all the warring lands was $161,500. Too much praise cannot be given to the work of our relief committee. In Holland and Belgium especially, their labors among the refugees and the orphan children have been far-reaching and Christ-like, and are still going on with undiminished vigor. It is most gratifying to know that, notwithstanding the disturbed condition of affairs everywhere owing to the war, our funds in every instance reached the committees safely, and were productive of incalculable good, bringing cheer and help to tens of thousands. We also took an active part in the great propaganda for supplying Testaments to the soldiers in the trenches on a very extensive scale.

HAND in hand with the vastly increased humanitarian work of the year, our Family Circle has cooperated with us in spreading the Gospel over a wider surface of the earth's area than ever before. As the map shows, their spiritual work has included East and West Africa, where missionaries have been helped, Tibet, Korea, Polynesia, Morocco, the Philippines, the Hawaiian Islands, Egypt, Armenia, Arabia, Persia and Syria, where many missionaries have been assisted in their Gospel work. In India, the leper work has been aided, Gospel effort has been helped in a wide field and the missionaries at 40 different mission stations have been sustained financially in the training of orphan children, and a similar work among child waifs has been supported at 24 different mission stations in China, 4 stations in Africa and 2 in Japan. Ten native missionaries have been supported in various eastern lands. From the far-off islands of the New Hebrides, where our people have helped the mission founded by the celebrated Christian pioneer, John Paton, the line of their gifts is continuous clear across to the western continent. Missions have been aided in Venezuela, Peru, Chile, Honduras, Brazil, San Salvador, Haiti, Cape Verde Islands, Dutch Guiana, and Surinam. Their benevolences have even extended to the Arctic, and natives and missionaries of frozen Labrador, at Makkovik, Nain, and St. Anthony, have been grateful beneficiaries of the Christian Herald Family Circle.

WHILE this far-reaching work has been going on in other lands, the needs of our own homeland were not neglected. Missions for men and boys, evangelistic work, bread lines, rescue missions for women, missionary work among mountaineers, Gospel and industrial work among the colored children of the South, Hebrew Christian Missions and a wide range of other Christian enterprises have been helped during the year. As the diverging lines on the map indicate, the home energies of our Family Circle have extended to 12 states and a score of cities. These are exclusive of the Bowery Mission with its Bread Line, its Labor Bureau, its Industrial Annex and its Farm, all of which have been conducted with the usual vigor during the year, nor do they include the Christian Herald Children's Home at Nyack, where a most satisfactory season was recorded, with upward of 2,500 little waifs cared for.

WE rejoice with our readers that the Christian Herald, during these "times that try men's souls," is being made more than ever a channel of spiritual and material effort and blessing, and that its work during this memorable year has been so wonderfully extended. We invite the prayers of all of our friends that it may continue to be increasingly instrumental in the years to come.

The Hundredth Man

BY IDA ALEXANDER

THEY came in swarms, in the summer time, ill-looking fellows a great many of them, to whom the appellation of "tramp" seemed rather a compliment than otherwise. At front doors and back doors, on the porches, in the barns, anywhere, everywhere did the troublesome tramps appear.

They were rarely willing to work for the bread they ate. And the hospitable but over-worked people of Harley often murmured among themselves at feeding the worthless fellows, who, after despatching their dinners, usually lay down in the shade and watched with lack-luster eyes the weary little procession marching back to the hay fields. But it took an especially annoying summer for the people of Harley to lose the last remnants of their patience.

None of them remembered a summer like it. The tramps flocked from everywhere. And when they went on their way they did not go empty-handed. Often before there had been an occasional chicken or turkey missing. But now whole flocks disappeared; hams vanished from the smoke-houses; vegetables from cellars and fields; pies, left to cool, were spirited away.

There was no one who did not suffer. And when a meeting was called, every one for miles around attended. The subject of tramps was discussed in all its bearings. One after another waxed eloquent as he told his doleful tale; one after another stepped blithely forward and signed his name as guarantee that he would do all in his power to eradicate the evil from the land.

Only one hesitated. They looked at him frowningly.

"What's the matter, Barrett?" asked Everett Hayes, who had gathered the people together and drawn the paper up. "Why don't you come up and sign, man? We've got to combine against these fellows, and every man's name should be here."

Jim Barrett shifted from one foot to the other. Speech was always difficult to him. It was especially so now, as he looked among his neighbors and could read on no face an understanding of the attitude he had taken. At last he spoke.

"You're right, in reason," he said. "Still—there might be cases. . . . An' I don't like to sign no paper not to give bread, if I want to. I've seen a man as wasn't able to walk further, without food."

"Then let the others carry him!" broke in the harsh voice of Bryan Briggs. "This thing has to be solid through and through. It's absolutely no use for some to refuse to give food. It has to be all. Then they'll find Harley isn't the easy place it has been. And they'll stop comin' through."

The others nodded approval. All over the schoolhouse rose murmurs of "He's right!" and "Sign, man!" But Jim Barrett never moved.

"I'm willin' to sign partly," he said. "But I won't sign to give nothin' to no one, whether they need it or not. Neighbors, I can't. I've played in too hard luck myself. You see—"

BUT nobody saw. Jim Barrett sighed as he left the meeting, and took his way back to the little brown house covered by roses and a mortgage.

His wife opened the door and looked eagerly at his face.

"Well, father?" she queried. "They was all there," he answered, sinking into a chair and mopping his face. "It was jest like we thought. You had to sign a paper promisin' never to give a thing to tramps. An'—"

"You didn't sign?" she interrupted. "No, I didn't. How could I, with our boy off somewheres, maybe no better fixed? Besides, there's cases neither you nor me couldn't turn away. An' our Hundredth Man, mother—I low we'll find him some day. But I was sorry to see that they all felt hard about it."

"How do you know they did?" "I could see it at the schoolhouse. An' after, they all passed me without offerin' me a ride. Hayes whizzed by me in his machine without a word."

"Hayes?" echoed his wife. "I'm sorry for that."

"So am I. I worried all the way home. I must work all the harder an' have the mortgage money on time. He's a hard man, when you offend him."

"I know he'll call the mortgage in," he said to himself. "I must have the money ready. He won't give me no more notice than he can help."

THE summer wore away, and the tramps, refused everywhere, centered all their endeavors on the little brown house. As in the case of Jean Valjean, they bade each other "Knock at that door!" And the door never refused to open. As their numbers increased, Martha Barrett often was forced to narrow her gift down to a couple of slices of bread and butter. But she gave it with a right good will, and eyes that said: "For our boy! For our boy!" could the tramps but have read them.

It was autumn when more than the trifle of food was demanded. Martha Barrett espied the man, limping haltingly up the tree-bordered driveway. Her heart missed a beat and then throbbed chokingly. But, as he drew nearer, she saw that it was not Jimmie.

When he reached her, the man pulled off his hat jauntily, though his lips were white with pain.

"I'm in hard luck, lady," he said. "Could you gimme a bite to eat, an' let me stay in the barn overnight? I'm a carpenter, an' sprained my ankle on my last job—an' I can't walk much further."

For the fraction of a second Martha Barrett hesitated. They had never allowed any one to sleep in the barn. People who had, had almost always had reason to be sorry for it. But then . . .

"You come right in the kitchen," she said, "an' I'll take a look at your ankle. A sprain's sometimes worser'n a break."

The sprain was revealed as a bad one, when she had cut the lace and drawn off the old shoe. She bathed it in water as hot as could be borne, and skilfully bandaged it.

"Now, set right here in the kitchen," she said, "while I get supper. An' we'll fix up a place for you to sleep."

After supper, the man started for the door. But Mrs. Barrett put forth a detaining hand.

"The barn's quite a piece for you to walk," she said. "I've fixed for you to stay in here."

And she led the way to Jimmie's old room.

Perhaps the tramp guessed what the room had been, from the fishing rods, guns and boyish books. But he made no remark.

And it was the next night before they mentioned Jimmie to him. Mr. Barrett broached the subject in his hesitating way, as they all sat around the fire after supper.

"Now," he said, "I don't suppose 'tain't at all likely—I guess there ain't a chance in a hundred as ye ever met a man same name as me, on your travels?"

His eyes looked away from the stranger as he spoke.

"Jest about your build, he is," he went on, "blue eyes, clear as kin be, an' hair like as two peas to his mother's here."

Mrs. Barrett held her breath for the answer, but it was a negative one.

The ice thus broken, though, they found it easy to talk of Jimmie. For the listener was an attentive and apparently a sympathetic one.

And by degrees, while the stubborn ankle mended, they talked of many things to him, and before him. He learned of Everett Hayes and the mortgage; the time when foreclosure could take place, if things did not go right.

"But I ain't afeared," went on Jim Barrett. "The hay crop this year was number one. If next year's is as good I'll be more'n all right, with what I've by. Once it's made its growth, I kin sell in the field—every one knows what a crop my land throws. An', in that way, it'll be in time for the mortgage. An' if worst comes to worst I kin borrow a little, I guess. For I know Everett Hayes. It'll be every cent, an' on the day."

FOR over two weeks the tramp occupied Jimmie's room, and stilled some of the heartache that the lonely old couple felt. But at last they watched him march away, apparently oblivious to the fact that the barn was crying out for resingling, the fences for repairs—easy matters to a young carpenter, but difficult ones to the farmer, with hands and head full of other matters.

"He was the nicest boy," Martha Barrett sighed. "I wisht he'd of been satisfied to stay right here with us."

And Jim Barrett nodded without speaking, thinking sadly and tenderly of their own boy, who had not been content to stay with them.

The fall gave place to the winter; the winter to early spring. Jim Barrett whistled as he sowed the grain. Everything seemed propitious. Soon a little green carpet spread over the once brown fields.

And then the drought fell on Harley. The oldest inhabitants remembered nothing like it. Heat and frost, alternating, combined produced a perfect whole of desolation. Martha and Jim Barrett watched their grain nipped, not in the bud, but in the leaf. They looked at each other with white faces.

But, after the first shock of knowing that the grain crops were a loss, Jim Barrett did not bemoan it.

"Likely I kin get a little work for some of the neighbors," he said. "That'll help along a little. An', one way or another, perhaps I kin raise it: I'm only about three hundred shy."

But the neighbors, most of them, were not in much better case than he. He could find no work. The calamity for all, too, precluded the idea of being able to borrow. There was nothing for it but to sit at home, his mind a prey to fears, his hands trembling.

Of the two, the anxious time was easier upon Martha than on him. Dear as the place was to her, it had been her home for only five and twenty years. She was not haunted by the sad ghosts who cried to Jim Barrett night and day of their lost home. There was much, too, that he kept from her. She did not know the exact time when the mortgage fell due. The threats of Everett Hayes that he would have his pound of flesh intact, and on the day, never sounded in her ears. As far as he could, he spared her.

"Two more days!" Jim Barrett muttered to himself. "There ain't nothin' kin happen to save us in those two days. I must break it mighty keeful to Marthy. Poor girl, she ain't an idee that the time is up."

THEY sat beside the fire on the evening of the second day. There was but one day more. And Jim Barrett knew that the time to tell his wife had come. He reached out his hand and took hers, a work-worn hand, upon which the old wedding ring gleamed. It had been a pretty hand, he remembered, when he had slipped the shining ring on. She reached over her right hand and touched the hand that held her own. She was thinking, too, of what a strong hand it once had been; and of how bent and old he looked.

For a while they sat silently with their memories. Outside, the rain fell in torrents, for the deluge had succeeded the drought. The wind whistled fearfully in the sturdy eucalyptus trees. But it was very peaceful in the kitchen—so peaceful that he hesitated to speak. But at last he began, with a hesitation even greater than usual.

"Marthy—" he said.

But the eyes of Martha were turned from him; her attitude was one of listening.

"Hark!" she cried. "Father, didn't you hear somethin'?"

But he shook his head.

"Listen!" she whispered.

And then he heard it—a faint sound, but coming nearer, a gay voice whistling blithely in the bitter night. It came nearer and nearer. The same hope and fear lay like an awful light on either face. The steps were on the porch—at the door. . . .

Martha Barrett was the strongest then. She threw the door wide. A stranger—for a moment she thought him a stranger—stood dripping on the threshold. And then she knew him. For all her bitter disappointment, she put out a cordial, welcoming hand.

"Come right in, Will," she said. "I'm so glad to see you. Father, it's Will."

Jim took him into the other room, and substituted for the dripping clothes other well-worn ones, sighing a little as he brought them forth. Martha bustled about and soon set food and steaming coffee before him. The tramp ate hungrily and then drew up before the fire with the others.

He began to question at once.

"This crop, that you depended on sellin' in the field, didn't amount to nothin', did it?"

Jim Barrett shook his head without speaking.

"Well, such is life," callously observed the tramp. "But that mortgage, ain't it about due?"

"It's due some time next month, ain't it, father?" asked Martha.

Again Jim Barrett's head moved negatively. The time to tell her had come—and before a comparative stranger. So blunt and cruel it would sound, he thought to himself. He cleared his throat.

But the tramp spoke first.

"Wait," he said.

He drew a buckskin bag from his breast and threw the contents on the table—gold and gold and gold! They gazed, fascinated.

"Don't look like that," said the tramp. "I ain't held up a stage. It's honest money, an' it's yourn. It's over three hundred. I hope it'll make the mortgage up. I worried considerable over it. You were," he choked a little, "so kind to me, an' every one. An' I says to myself when I left, 'What's the matter with you, Bill Benson? You got a good trade. An' you can fix that mortgage up all right.' An' I lowed it was jest about time for old California to show that she ain't all saint, when it comes to climate. You see, crops ain't certain, but mortgages is. So, when I blew into Frisco, I got work out at the Exposition buildings, five plunks every day! An'—I guess that's all."

He sat down out of breath.

Martha drew his face down to her own and kissed him on the forehead, as if he had been her own boy.

"You'll stay—forever?" she asked, with quivering lip.

"Nope," said the tramp, "no, Mis' Barrett, I guess not, ma'am. Tomorrow I'll be on the hike again. I'm done with work for a while. I been too good to last. Work an' me didn't never agree anything to speak of. Jest a little goes a long, long ways. An' I'll hit the trail again, like a bird set free. But do you know what I'm a-goin' to do? I low I'll meet considerable men, one way an' another. An' to each one I'll say: 'Do you know Harley? Ever been in Harley?' An' I'll keep that up till I find that boy o' yourn an' get him home again. Maybe I'll come with him. Kin I?"

His eyes turned toward the master of the house. But Jim Barrett did not answer. He had found his Hundredth Man.

More Letters on "Preparedness"

Unreasonable Preparedness

I DO not believe in peace-at-any-price, but I believe war to be such an immense calamity, even to the victor, that peace may be bought, profitably, at the sacrifice of great commercial interests. So great is its value that we can afford some risk rather than to imperil it by a display of force, calculated to stir up some adversary to a greater display. I am not opposed to a "reasonable preparedness," meaning such preparation as is necessary to repel a probable, or threatened, unjust attack. That we cannot, whatever our preparation, repel some possible attack needs no argument. War makes as strange bedfellows as politics. If England, France and Russia can unite, why might not all Europe unite against us in some contingency? We need not lose a wink of sleep over this contingency, however, which could only arise through our own fault, and so I think of other somewhat more probable ones.

Whatever we do, then, should be strictly in the direction of self-defense, carrying no threat or challenge to any nation supposed to harbor unfriendly feelings toward us. Unhappily nobody has as yet been able to suggest a defensive force which would not equally lend itself to the purpose of aggression. It is all very well to say that we have no aggressive intent. All the other nations say that. All are fighting in self-defense—for their very existence. None of them began the war—it was the other fellow. Perhaps we have no aggressive intent; but how will it be next year, or next decade, if some prospect of great advantage should present itself? There is always a class of people, sharks, blood-suckers and yellow journalists, who are clamorous for war on any pretext. Another and very large class, carried away by what they suppose to be patriotism, or through hostility to everything foreign, are always ready for war. There is another, not small class, who glory in war—at a distance—and, like Artemus Ward, would cheerfully sacrifice all of their first wife's relations for the sake of it. There is also the professional soldier who desires it for many reasons. In a democracy like ours, it is not surprising that the government should be unable to resist this active insistence, even while a great preponderance of the intelligence and moral sentiment of the country is on the other side.

Whatever the moral grounds, whatever the final outcome of good or evil—as a question of preparedness merely—we should remember that every one of our foreign wars was begun by ourselves. The last two were sentimental, purely benevolent, we thought, though we did not fail in either to take a huge slice of territory by way of a little souvenir.

NOW if anything has been absolutely demonstrated by the present war, it is that preparation for defense does not prevent war. If Belgium could have been as fully prepared as Germany, she might not have been invaded; but that was impossible. All were as well prepared as their resources would permit. That they have all vastly increased their force during the war is true; but it has been at the expense of all other industries, and can be kept up only a little while. All are fighting on credit, and decades, centuries it may be, of peace will be required to restore the waste and pay the debt.

Once more; if we look at the wars of the last fifty or sixty years, we shall see that they were begun by the nation which believed itself to be the strongest.

* "Ethics of Force."

Whether so in fact, can never be determined except by trial. Ten years ago I pointed out*—it was, of course, not my discovery—that a balance or equilibrium of force between the nations was impossible. If it existed at a given moment it could not long be maintained, and in any case it would be impossible for a given nation to prevent a combination of other nations which would upset it. If I carry a revolver, it may be enough to defend me from an unarmed man on the street who is stronger than I, but it will not be enough to defend me against a gang of highwaymen as well armed as myself. It will be better for me to avoid meeting the gang, if I can. Our best defense against attack is to act in such a way as not to provoke one. This will be, first, to have a really pacific disposition.

For a hundred years, in spite of lively quarrels, we have got on with England with no army or, until recently, any navy to speak of. Germany and Japan are the only nations from whom any probable danger has been suggested. Is there any? I do not know anything as to the relative strength of our navy and theirs, and not one in a thousand of our personally conducted patriots of the Women's Loyal Legion, the Grand Army of the Republic, the sons and daughters of this and that, and of the Army and Navy League, knows any more. From such information as I have, Japan's navy is far inferior to our own. She has half our resources in men and perhaps a quarter in money and material. With ten thousand miles of sea to cross, and no naval or coaling stations near us, it is preposterous to suppose that she would fight us, unless driven to it by our aggression. Besides, is there at the present time the slightest evidence of hostility on her part?

AS to Germany, whose navy at the beginning of the war was not superior to ours and through the loss of many war vessels is probably no stronger now, what is there to fear, admitting that she is unfriendly to us? Victor or vanquished, she will emerge from the war burdened with an enormous debt, her industries crippled, resources exhausted, depleted of men. Whether she will have any navy at all, no one can say. In any case, aside from her submarines, what has her navy accomplished? What has England's, for that matter? Both nations have lost vessels and a large number of lives, but neither has made any impression on coast defenses. Whether the dreadnoughts and super-dreadnoughts are worth anything at all, except for old junk, is at present unknown.

Advocates of a big navy complain that our vessels are without sufficient ammunition. The reasoning appears to be that, with the addition of twenty or thirty dreadnoughts with a corresponding number of cruisers, we should have an abundance. Why not, so far as possible, make our present navy efficient? Beyond this, some strengthening of our coast defenses and additions to our submarines might be justified. This would not be shaking our fist under the nose of some adversary.

To burden ourselves with a big standing army and great navy, on account of a hypothetical danger, would be like a business man insuring his building, if that were possible, in so many companies and for so many times its value, that he not only had to use his entire income but to borrow money to pay the premiums, the only considerable danger being from his carelessness.

H. E. WARNER,
(Author of the "Ethics of Force.")

Militarism Terribly Wrong

I HAVE read Pastor Sheldon on Preparedness in the Christian Herald of November 24, and wonder why it is that pastors and workers along Christian lines are about the only ones who write such articles. I do not favor militarism, and think it will be a mistake to arouse the spirit of fear and suspicion and war in our nation. Even the thoughts of instilling into our children's minds the idea of future enemies seems terribly wrong to me. MRS. CORA GLEASON.

Why Some Favor Preparedness

THERE are millions of American citizens who favor preparedness, not because they are interested, directly or indirectly, in the making of armor, guns and projectiles, but because they believe that the safety of the United States depends absolutely upon the demonstrated ability of the people to repel foreign powers, which may covet the things we possess and seek to take them away from us.

It is well to bear in mind that the angel of the Lord drew a flaming sword in the Garden of Eden, and that justice and the sword have been allied from that day to this in many a dispute.

The actual reason why so many Americans demand a state of preparedness in our country is this: They believe that the present "world war" is the result of a contest between nations for trade, prestige and power, or, as the expression goes, for "places in the sun." They believe that, as a result of this terrible struggle, which is exhausting financially to Europe, the United States will capture the larger part of the world's commerce and, in fact, reap all the benefits for which the European Powers are fighting. They believe that this resulting condition of greatly increased prosperity in the United States will make this country a target for envious eyes in all other parts of the world, particularly among those nations that are staggering under tremendous burdens of new war taxes and with shattered foreign trade. They believe that the only way of preventing an ultimate attack is to be defensively prepared for it. To be unarmed and unprepared is to invite aggression and war.

It is foolish to say that days of peace and good will among the nations will follow the present carnage. There is strong probability that a series of wars will follow, especially if the present war ends in a draw, as seems possible. And it behooves the United States to be prepared to take care of any disturbers who appear in the offing, either upon the Atlantic or the Pacific Coast.

Some of this "peace talk" is so infantile that it recalls the plaint of our nursery days:

"Rain, rain, go away;
Come again another day,
Little Benny wants to play!"

E. H. WELLS.

Would Make Unpreparedness a Crime

TO follow the advice of Pastor Sheldon and some other writers for your paper in regard to our being prepared for war would soon place us in the condition of Korea and China. Japan, with a population of about 60,000,000, has taken possession of Korea, and unless interfered with by other nations, will compel China, with her 400,000,000, to do her will in all things, simply because she is prepared for war while China is the weak, helpless nation that Mr. Sheldon would have us become. If your readers will read Christ's words in Luke 14: 31, 32, they will see he would give us no such advice as Mr. Sheldon gives. War costs a hundredfold more than being prepared for an enemy costs. It costs England $21,750,000 a day, according to the newspapers, and if we add to this pensions for forty years or more, and a heavy indemnity for all the loss the enemy has suffered, besides the making of hosts of widows and orphans and depriving the nation of the flower of its strength by death, in industrial, intellectual and scientific lives, we can see what a costly thing unpreparedness amounts to.

Preparedness saves from more wars, with their brutality and cruelty, than helplessness. If it had not been for our unpreparedness we should never have had our war with Spain over Cuba. England and France have been punished for their unpreparedness, while Russia, with her immense population undrilled and lacking ammunition and war material, has had a constant history of retreat since the destruction of her first army and the destruction of her towns, and is depending today upon Japan for war material and her very existence.

To allow a nation to become unprepared to meet an enemy should subject those responsible for it to death, as it is nothing less than wholesale murder.

D. F. EASTON.

Washington, D. C.

The President and the Bible

HAVING read your editorial on "The President and the Bible," I wish to convey to you my hearty appreciation of your exegesis of Ezekiel 33, and congratulate you on pointing out the superficiality of much that is quoted in these days in defense of preparedness and war.

Recently, I have had occasion to express myself in similar terms; once in an address on "Non-Resistance" before our theological students, and last evening on "The High Patriotism," at the West Side Sunday Evening Club, here in Chicago.

With Drs. Sheldon and Jefferson, I feel very keenly on the matter. Your paper is one of the few remaining strictly Christian newspapers now being published.

GEORGE L. ROBINSON.

Professor of Biblical Literature,
McCormick Theological Seminary,
Chicago, Ill.

Pastor Sheldon on World Peace

I AM moved to write this note to express my thanksgiving this Thanksgiving week to you and your associates on the Christian Herald that you have used the pages of your paper to speak the truth about militarism. At a time when nearly all the Eastern dailies, and even some of our religious journals, are preaching war, it is refreshing to know that the Christian Herald has had convictions on the right side and fearlessly expressed them. This makes the Herald Christian. I thank God for it!

I am also grateful that you were ready to print my letter to President Wilson. It will give it a hearing among hundreds of thousands of readers all over the country. And the Christian Herald has great influence with its large family.

The people of this country will not accept a military program. I am very confident of that. God's program will be carried out. Thank him, you and the others on the paper will help him to do it. Dr. Jefferson's article was powerful.

CHARLES M. SHELDON,
Central Congregational Church,
Topeka, Kan.

His Will

Phil. 4: 6, 7.

LORD, give thy people eyes to see
The only path to victory;
Speak to each heart in this dark hour;
Reveal the weapons of thy power:
The sword of thy omnipotence.
The shield that is a sure defense.
Show us our whole security
Is in obedience to thee.
Make us to know thy will, and then
Teach us to do that will. Amen!

O. B. ADAMS

The Writing That Lasts

By MARGARET E. SANGSTER, Jr.

YEARS ago, before science had invented pens or pencils or crayons—before even the art of writing had been dreamed of, men traced the thoughts that crowded into their souls on the rough sand of the beaches. They drew pictures of their fears and their emotions and their joys. And then, when they wished to draw new pictures, they brushed clumsy fingers over their work, and patted the ruffled surface of their improvised tablet into smoothness until there was again a clear, level space on which to make their rude drawings. Oftentimes, frightened by some mammoth prehistoric animal, they left their pictures and fled into the depths of the trackless forest. After they had gone, perhaps, other bold tribesmen or shy maidens paused to gaze at the writing in the sand. Perhaps it stayed there, growing fainter each day, partly obliterated by the footprints of strange beasts, until some heavy rain-storm splashed down and swept it away.

Later, years later, a more enterprising group of men left the dangers of the wood and the seashore and journeyed inland until they reached a stony country; a country of cliffs and rugged boulders. These men bound bits of sharp rock with rawhide and tough wood and so created weapons, mallets and slings and knives. They made their homes in the small dugout caves that dotted the cliffs and with these same rude knives they expressed their feelings and emotions, their defeats and their victories, by rude pictures cut deep and lastingly into the rocky walls of their homes.

Beasts crept by, and rainstorms and hailstorms and tempests swept over the land, but the pictures that the cave-men had cut into the cliffs still endured. They could not be swept away into vacancy like the writing in the sand.

Thousands of years have rolled by since first primitive men scratched their story pictures in the sand. We know that they lived, that they fought against great odds for their existence, that they died—and we know little more. For their writing was swept away, thousands of years ago, by a rainstorm or a careless hand.

QUITE recently a famous archeologist discovered a stone that had been carved by one of the cave-men. It told, in queer detail, in weirdly pictured incidents, the story of a brave life. It told a story, in pictures that were worn nearly smooth by the snow and rain and heat and cold of the centuries; but a story that was still to be read in the heart of the living rock. The rude pictures showed a man who fought against huge beasts and killed them with his bare hands; who had fortified his cave from invasion, and speared fish, and stolen a wife. And though the man himself is dead and has for ages been less than a memory, nameless, his fame comes to us in a grippingly real way across the void of the years.

There were many other stories by many other cave-men. A quantity of them have been discovered. And we, who look at them from our pinnacle of education and surface culture, laugh, and wonder what manner of folk these ancestors of ours could have been.

Cave-men may have been rude and uncultured and primitive. They may have lacked the finer feelings, but are there many of us today who would sit for hours hacking a story into a wall of solid rock with a bit of flint? Are there many of us who would have the patience, and the cleverness, and above all the stick-to-it-iveness, to keep at our task?

I HEARD the story of a horseback performer not long ago. She was one of the famous equestriennes of one of the most famous circuses. She told how, at the time she joined the circus, she had never even petted a horse, and that she feared horses. She said that she was a clumsy child, and that her wrists were weak—so weak that she could not raise herself up in the saddle. In a half-hearted way she tried to learn, and failed. One day a very well-known man visited the practice tent and watched the child as she cantered around the ring. Then he turned to the manager.

THE FIRST ICE

By Margaret E. Sangster, Jr.

First ice o' th' season an' it's Monday,
Hear th' schoolbells ringin out their tune?
Saturday (it only snowed on Sunday!)
Saturday was jus' as warm as June.
Santa brought me skates at Chris-mas-glor-y!
I ain't had a chance t' wear 'em yet—
Talk about a awful hard luck story,
This kin beat th' worst of all, I bet!

First ice o' th' season an' there's lessons,
Saturday was warm an' muggy too;
(Mother says ter try t' count my blessin's Same as any thankful boy would do!)
Count my blessin's—whod call sums a blessin'?
Think I'll go ter school like Mary's lam?
Think I'll get a lickin'? Now yer guessin'!
Where's my books?—Say, what yer think I am?

"You're foolish to keep that kid," he said in a voice that carried across the tent; "she'll never learn!"

The manager looked at the child and then suddenly he smiled. "Oh, yes, she will," he told the very well-known man, "oh, yes, she will, if she sticks to it!"

From that moment the girl decided that she would stick to it. She strengthened her weak wrists by practicing on a trapeze, drawing herself up until her chin touched the bar. She did this many times a day until her little arms were sore and her little soul was weary. She practiced twice as much as she had practiced before, and when she sought her bed at night she slept the sleep of exhaustion. But in a few months her riding had improved, and her wrists were strong enough to bear the weight of her body. In a year she had justified the manager's remark, for she "made good" because she had managed, almost against her own will and to everybody's surprise, to stick to it. In eighteen months, child though she was, they advertised her as the "queen of the sawdust ring."

AT New Year's time folk talk of turning over a new leaf, and making good resolutions, and wiping the slate clean. Ministers and writers and lecturers say "Begin over again. Take the black marks out of the past." And they say the right thing, only—

The very early men drew their pictures in the sand and they drew them perhaps faultily, perhaps well—we don't know. We only know that the very early men lived and fought for their meager existence, and died. For the very early men rubbed out their pictures and drew new ones and rubbed out the new ones. The pictures that they left were done so lightly that they were swept away by the lightest rainstorms or the most careless animal feet.

But the cave-men! The cave-men with infinite care and patience and hardship worked over their carvings. They made carvings that all the changes of centuries—hundreds of centuries—could not erase. They made pictures that have today given us part of the history of the world that we dwell in.

IT'S a good thing, if you have black marks and untidy pages and poor drawings on the book of your life, to turn over a new leaf and begin again on a fresh, smooth surface. But oh, friends of mine, it's a better thing to work skilfully and carefully and patiently on the same page—it's infinitely better to do so well, the first time, that there needn't be any other page. And if sticking to it and patience and cleverness with the tools that you have, no matter how inadequate those same tools may be, will keep you writing on the same page, you owe it to yourself and to the ones who have faith in you—your family, your pastor, above all, your God—to stick to it, and persevere and succeed.

The very early men who sketched in the sand didn't leave much of an inheritance to the future generations, did they? For they kept erasing their work and beginning over. But the cave-men builded well, and their little, commonplace lives proved valuable to history. So it can be with each one of you.

A book with scratched, tumbled pages, with jerky, abrupt endings and more jerky, more abrupt beginnings, is not an interesting book, is it? And it isn't a book to be proud of and to pass down to your children's children. But a book that is written page after page carefully, patiently, wisely, is a book to be proud of.

FRRIENDS of mine, if there are any soiled pages in your book of life, turn over a new leaf and write new resolutions on a new sheet of whiteness. And as you write the new resolutions, carve them deep, deep into your soul, so that there will never again need to be any more turning of pages and no more regretting what has been written. Then, years afterward, your life may stand out a blessing to others, like a brave story graven on rock.

Continued from page 1323
ernment on October 29 a verbal note advising China that in view of possible disorders, and in view also of the impossibility of any assistance being rendered to China by their own governments, it was their opinion that the change in the form of government should be delayed until the end of the war.

The Chinese government received the communication in good part, replied that it felt fully capable of handling any situation that might arise, and indicated that if the mandate of the country should be for the change, it would be made. The interested powers were formulating another protest when it was announced on December 11 that the Council of State had offered Yuan the crown of the new empire and that he had consented, reluctantly of course, as one who is willing to sacrifice his personal preferences at the call of the state. He now awaits a favorable opportunity to be crowned and to become emperor in fact, as he has been in effect from the beginning of his presidency.

The men who were back of the republican movement were many of them Christian Chinese. The new constitution insured religious and personal liberty, and in the early days of the republic there were evidences that the new régime would lend all possible encouragement to the missionary societies, especially to those engaged in educational work. At the invitation of the government, many government schools were taken in charge by the missions, the government having decreed the substitution of Western learning for the study of the old Chinese classics, and having found it impossible to supply competent teachers.

Yuan has not interfered with the missionaries, and he has encouraged enterprises backed by European and American capital. The reestablishment of Confucianism has been a slight handicap to missionary evangelism. It is not possible now to forecast what effect the apparent reversion to older governmental standards may have on missionary activities in China; but the people by thousands are accepting Christ, the position of the native Christians as well as of the foreign missionary enterprises is becoming more unassailable, more men of influence are becoming Christian, and more Christian Chinese are gaining influence. The republic may not be dead. It may return. Dr. Sun still lives.

The career of Yuan, his early decision to seek high office and his constant use of all means, fair and otherwise, to attain his ends and to bring him preferment, recalls another emperor who founded an empire on the crumbling structure of a republic. We remember Shakespeare's lines:

"What meat doth this our Cæsar feed upon,
That he hath grown so great?"

Will Yuan have his Brutus? Time will tell. Meantime China, no matter what the nature of Yuan's rule, cannot again become the China of the centuries of Manchu rule. A new day has dawned, even if the dawn is somewhat fogged by the failure of the people to shake off the inertia of centuries.

LOUIS E. ORCUTT

A Short-Lived Republic

The Coming of the Holy Spirit

International Sunday School Lesson for January 9. Acts 2:1-13

The Heart of the Bible

By Arthur H. Howland

WE have reached the heart of the Bible. All that goes before this second chapter of Acts is by way of preparation and introduction. All that comes after is to explain and apply the words of this chapter.

Of all the questions of the human heart, these three are deepest and most insistent. "What is God like?" "Where is God?" "How can I please God?" or, putting that same question in another form, "How can I be like God?" Pentecost is the answer to all these passionate queries. Coming after the life of Jesus, Pentecost answers the first question by saying: "God is like Jesus." It answers the second question by saying: "God dwells in the soul of every person who will receive him, without any limitations or restrictions of age, race, or condition. It answers the third question by saying: "God himself, by the power of his Spirit, will make us what we ought to be, make us like himself, make our lives pleasing to himself."

The lesson should be approached with a brief outline study of other Scripture passages about the Holy Spirit. Repeating the references suggested in last week's lesson, Ezekiel 36:26, 27 shows the purpose of Pentecost. The trouble with men had been that they would not and apparently could not do right. God answers this failure with the promise that he himself will take hold of us and, by putting his own Spirit within us, give us the power to do right. "A new spirit will I give you. I will put my Spirit within you and cause (or compel) you to walk in my statutes, and ye shall keep my judgments and do them." In studying these verses, do not fail to connect them with the verse preceding and the next verse but one. They connect the blessing of the Holy Spirit with the blessing of the divine cleansing. "I will sprinkle clean water upon you and ye shall be clean." "I will also save you from all your uncleanness." Peter, explaining before the first church council how God had blessed the Gentile centurion Cornelius, giving him the very same blessing the disciples themselves had received at Pentecost, said (Acts 15:8, 9): "God bare them witness, giving them the Holy Spirit, even as he did unto us, and put no difference between us and them, purifying their hearts by faith."

In connection with the cleansing quality of the gift of the Holy Spirit, study also the passages referring to God as fire (Isa. 4:4): "When the Lord shall have washed away the filth of the daughters of Zion and shall have purged the blood of Jerusalem from the midst thereof by the spirit of judgment and by the spirit of burning." When John the Baptist was telling the people who Jesus was and what he would do, he said: "He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire" (Matt. 3:11; Luke 3:16). A Scripture study of all the passages in which God is referred to in terms of fire is intensely interesting. Abraham, Moses, Solomon—all had experiences which made them compare God to fire. And the next to the last chapter of one of the last books of the Bible echoes a statement of one of the first books, which sums up all these teachings: "Our God is a consuming fire." (Heb. 12:29; Deut. 4:24).

It will be necessary to refer to the aspect of fire again; but to continue the Scripture review, notice the other symbol—water. Isaiah announces the promise: "I will pour water upon him that is thirsty and floods upon the dry ground. I will pour my blessing upon thy seed, and my blessing upon thine offspring" (Isa. 44:3). This echoes part of that passage from Ezekiel: "Then will I sprinkle clean water upon you, and ye shall be clean." And it is echoed in the beautiful words of Paul, explaining why Jesus died: "According

TALKS ON THE GOLDEN TEXT

By REV. F. B. MEYER, B.A., D.D.

"Know ye not that ye are a temple of God and that the Spirit of God dwelleth in you?" I Cor. 3:16.

If this verse applies to the Church collectively, I Cor. 6:19 applies to each of us individually. It is a wonderful statement, whether in the one case or the other. We must not try and argue our way to this stupendous fact, but accept and affirm it. For my part I like to begin each day, almost before I open my eyes, by saying: "Thou art in me, great and holy Spirit, the very Spirit that wast in Jesus in his human life, and art in Christ, exalted to God's right hand." It is equally good when a Church is gathered at the Table of the Lord, or for prayer, to begin the proceedings by affirming that the Spirit of God is actually present. It is not a matter to put to the test of feeling or reasoning, but to affirm. The next important item is to be sure that nothing is being harbored or permitted which would bind him and make him as a mighty man who cannot save. When these conditions are granted, let us be still and know that he is God. Let us believe that nothing is impossible. Let us expect that he will do great things. According to our faith it will be done unto us. And we shall discover that the temple will often be filled with light and glory. Not the most holy inner shrine alone, where spirit meets spirit, but the outward body, the courts of the house, will become transfigured.

to his mercy he saved us by the washing of regeneration, and renewing of the Holy Spirit, which he shed on us abundantly through Jesus Christ, our Saviour" (Titus 3:5, 6). And this verse again is an echo of Paul's statement to the Ephesians: "Christ loved the church and gave himself for it, that he might sanctify and cleanse it with the washing of water by the word." (Eph. 5:25, 26).

But we shall get a clearer conception of the event of Pentecost if we keep our attention upon the symbol of fire. "There appeared unto them cloven tongues, like as of fire, and it sat upon each of them, and they were all filled with the Holy Ghost." Now what are we to understand by that? Did real fire come? The record does not say so. The appearance of the heavenly blessing was "like as of fire," not actual fire. Now let us hold steady and think what that means. A little present-day observation will show you that light is even now sometimes a spiritual manifestation. Ask any color expert or artist to examine the face of a man or woman before and after conversion, or before and after receiving the Pentecostal blessing. There is actual, literal darkness about many a face before the soul is converted or cleansed; there is actual, literal, visible light upon it after God's blessing has come. Sometimes onlookers can actually see the light strike these faces as the heart is blessed. A face that was dark one moment becomes luminous the next. Where does the light come from? There is only one answer. It comes from God. When God cleanses the heart of its sin, he puts a glow upon the face. "They looked unto him, and were radiant," says the Psalmist, "and their faces were not ashamed" (Ps. 34:5). Jesus himself said: "If thine eye is single" (meaning if thy motive, thy heart, is pure) "thy whole body also is full of light" (Luke 11:36). He went on to say: "If thy whole body therefore be full of light, having no part dark, the whole shall be full of light, as when the bright shining of a candle doth give thee light." And Paul says exquisitely: "God, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined in our hearts, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ" (II Cor. 4:6). And he writes twice within the next half dozen verses that the life of Jesus is to be "made manifest in," that is, to be allowed to shine through, our body.

All these Scripture references will help us to explain to our pupils this great event of Pentecost. It meant God coming into the human soul. It meant that God would dwell henceforth, not in a mystic room of a great temple, a room approached by one man once a year; it meant that he would dwell not with a few chosen people selected from a chosen race to be his prophets or representatives, but that henceforth he would dwell in any heart that would yield itself to his cleansing and his power. So we see how Pentecost does answer the three great questions. What is God like? He is like Jesus. Where does he dwell? In human hearts that will receive his coming. How can we please and be like him? By receiving his Spirit to cleanse and transform us and to give us power to obey his law.

The details of the lesson story are so familiar that they scarcely need comment, except to note again that the blessing came after the disciples and their companions had waited and prayed. "Take time to be holy." No time is needed to persuade God to give us his blessing. No time is needed for the Holy Spirit to reach our hearts. But time is needed to get our own minds in the right attitude to receive him. Time is needed to get our wills and hearts yielded to him. It took Paul three days of struggle in the guest chamber of Judas on Straight Street, Damascus, to yield all his life's ambitions to the dominance of the Saviour he had been persecuting. But when he had made the great surrender, the fingers of Ananias were knocking at the chamber door, and the voice of Ananias was sounding in his ears: "Brother Saul, the Lord, even Jesus, that appeared unto thee in the way as thou earnest, hath sent me that thou mightest receive thy sight, and be filled with the Holy Ghost."

The How Column

Conducted by Frank L. Brown, Joint General Secretary, World's Sunday School Association

How to Promote the Use of the Bible by the Scholars

BIBLE bringing by the scholars should be recognized in the class and school credits. Where every scholar in the class has brought a Bible the class should be recognized. The department or school should be requested occasionally to make a show of the Bibles brought. The motto of the Lawrence School is "Every member present every Sunday, with a Bible, an offering, a studied lesson and a mind to learn."

But the Bible unused is of no value. We shall here suggest some plans for Bible marking and Bible drilling that may be used by teacher or superintendent in order to make the scholar familiar with the Book.

Suggest that on the fly leaves of the Bible the scholar write his name, a life text, date of life decision to be a Christian, time of joining church, time of special blessings and important life steps.

Special verses should be marked or underlined, those especially with initials that have been tested and that have brought personal help and blessing, with date—such verses, it may be, as Matt. 7:7; II Cor. 9:8.

The various books of the Bible may be headed with appropriate names, such as "The Gospel of Love" for John, "Work" for James, "Redemption" for Exodus.

Chapters may be similarly marked, such as eleventh of Hebrews, "Faith Chapter"; Romans tenth, "Salvation Chapter." A list of such chapters can be found in "Chapters of Pure Gold," by Yatman (Revell) and "Chapters of Blessing from the Book of Life," by Henderson (Eaton & Mains).

The Rainbow book-marks which divide the Bible into the various divisions such as Pentateuch, History, Poetical, Major and Minor Prophets, can be obtained of Sunday school supply houses.

The following drill suggestions are subject to great variation and expansion. They can be used in the class, from the platform, or in any week-night gathering of the class. One can scarcely believe how eager scholars will be to do this work if given an opportunity. Those first finding the passages should stand or hold up the Bible at the place.

Find the Ten Commandments, Solomon's Prayer, Shepherd Psalm, Moses' Psalm, Isaiah Fifty-three, the Great Commandment, the Sermon on the Mount, the Beatitudes, the Magnificat, the Lord's Prayer, Paul's speech on Mars Hill, the Galaxy of Heroes of the Faith, Paul's chapter on Charity, John's Letters to the Seven Churches, his Description of the Eternal City.

Find the longest verse in the Bible; the shortest verse; four verses alike (Psalm 107:8, 15, 21, 31); two chapters alike (II Kings 19 and Isaiah 37); Rest verse (Matt. 11:28); Greatest verse (John 3:16); Last Command (Acts 1:8).

Find the verse, "All have sinned and come short of the glory of God." Where? Locate the verse as to sin's penalty. Find the redemption verse. Where? What? Find a verse on love; prayer; faith; temperance; missions.

Find rapidly Psalm 91:1; Matt. 11:28; I Tim. 1:18; Joshua 1:9; Daniel 12:3; Deut. 20:4; Psalm 119:165; Gal. 6:2; John 3:16.

Find rapidly Sin chapter (Rom. 3); Atonement chapter (Isaiah 53); New Birth chapter (John 3); Salvation chapter (Rom. 10); Light chapter (John 9); Purity chapter (Ezek. 36); Love chapter (I Cor. 13); Abiding chapter (John 15); Resurrection chapter (I Cor. 15); Best chapter (John 14).

The alphabetical drill will please the Junior scholars. Find and read a verse beginning with A, (Matt. 3:23); B, (John 1:29); C, (Matt. 11:28); D, (John 4:8); E, (Matt. 7:13).

Find a Bible character beginning with A, B, C, etc. The scholars can give the name and the first Bible reference to the character.

Ask classes or scholars to bring in best verses beginning with letters of alphabet, or containing some word such as faith, love, peace.

Ask for pivotal texts giving location and asking for the verse; or announcing verse and asking for location.

Ask for the different names given to the Bible, languages in which written, names and number of Bible books, divisions, as to Old and New Testament, subdivisions, the bounding of Bible books (the book before and after the one given).

Have scholars or classes repeat selected Bible chapters or great passages.

Amos R. Wells in "The Bible Marksman" (United Society of Christian Endeavor) makes some excellent suggestions as to Bible marking and memorizing.

A Thought for Today

"That my joy may be in you, and that your joy may be full."—Jesus of Nazareth.

SOME forty years ago a very earnest minister said that the Lord Jesus never smiled. "How could he?" Verily if that good man's iron creed were all of the Truth, how could he smile?

But we have read that a certain angel spoke of "glad tidings of great joy which shall be to all people." And the Christian faith was called a "Gospel," i.e., good news.

True, the Bible has something to say of the value of chastisement, and "no chastisement is joyous." Many true words have been written of the great gain that comes only through sorrow and suffering and pain. Eyes that have been tear-washed oftentimes see more clearly.

Nevertheless the kingdom of heaven is not sorrow but righteousness, peace, and joy!

John the Baptist fasted or ate locusts and wild honey, and John the Baptist was good.

But a greater than he came eating and drinking—entering into life—blessing a marriage feast—holding little children in his arms.

His greatest apostle says, "Rejoice!" WARREN ROCHELLE.

A Cry from China

LITTLE HAI' IEH TSI (the "Abused Leaf"); a Story of Childhood and its Perils in Heathen China. All who are interested in sweet and innocent childhood will find this a fascinating story. A postal card addressed to "China Orphans, Christian Herald, Bible House, New York," will bring you free copies of this illustrated booklet.

Here Are the First Six Pictures

In the Bible Picture Contest there will be a total of sixty such illustrations. The Christian Herald invites you to fit Bible verses to these pictures. The best selections will be rewarded generously. See list of awards below.

Picture No. 1

Begin today to take part in this delightful home recreation. All ages and both sexes are eligible. Answers are to be picked by you out of a given list. The first reward is $1,250 in cash—the awards having been increased to $3,500 cash.

Picture No. 2

Picture No. 3

Picture No. 4

Picture No. 5

Picture No. 6

How to Begin the Contest

Do you know your Bible? Well, there is no such thing as knowing the Bible too well. And if you don't know your Bible as well as you might, then let this competition lead the way.

You should not delay. Next week three additional pictures will appear. Clip out the pictures and save them, or keep each copy of the magazine. Let the Contest fill your spare moments. The answers to the pictures are NOT to be sent in until all the 60 pictures have appeared, when you can forward your complete set of answers.

We have set up a list of 2,000 Bible verses as the standard of eligible answers to be submitted for the pictures. The Contest consists of your choosing the most appropriate texts out of the 2,000. Observation and judgment will count, not minute knowledge. You may use your own Bible for consultation, or that of church or reading room, and you may freely obtain the references. But for convenient use we offer our "Gems from the Bible," containing the verses you need.

As most readers renew their subscriptions about this time of year, we propose adding "Gems from the Bible," and giving with it a booklet known as Reply Book (into which you can write your answers—as many as five for each picture, if desired), to every yearly subscription to the Christian Herald, at the combination price of two dollars. If your subscription does not expire for some time, then we will add on your renewal from your present date of expiration. Whether now a subscriber or not, send in two dollars, and the Contest books, with the Christian Herald for one year, will be yours.

Or you may obtain "Gems from the Bible" and Reply Book free by interesting in the Contest and the Christian Herald some person not now a subscriber, sending us $2.00 (collected from the new subscriber) to pay for the yearly subscription and Contest books for that person. And for this favor to us, you, yourself, will be sent the "Gems from the Bible," and Reply Book—FREE. Use the order form to the right.

The Increased List of Awards

First Reward.....	$1,250 cash
Second Reward.....	625 cash
Third Reward.....	350 cash
Fourth Reward.....	250 cash
Fifth Reward.....	150 cash
Sixth Reward.....	100 cash
Seventh Reward.....	75 cash
Eighth Reward.....	50 cash
Ninth Reward.....	20 cash
10th to 24th Rewards, each $2.50.....	37.50 cash
25th to 419th Rewards, each $1.50.....	592.50 cash
419 Cash Rewards in all, aggregating.....	3,500 cash

In case of ties, full rewards will be paid the tying contestants.

BIBLE PICTURE CONTEST ORDER FORM

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Dept. B1, Bible House, New York City
Enclosed find $2.00, for which send me the CHRISTIAN HERALD for one year, and "Gems from the Bible" and Reply Book, which outfit me handily to compete in the Bible Picture Contest.

My Name.....

Full Postal Address.....

NOTE.—Put a cross here (.....) if you are sending in the $2.00 to pay for a new subscription you have secured, with the new subscriber's order for the Contest books. Write your own name and address above, and write the name and address of the new subscriber on a separate sheet of paper. The new subscriber will then receive the Christian Herald for one year, "Gems from the Bible" and Reply Book. And you will be sent "Gems from the Bible" and Reply Book FREE.

The World's Bitterest Winter

THESE have been winters of record cold, wide-spread, unbearable, fatal. There have been winters of epidemics because of unseasonable weather, when households by hundreds were robbed of their loved ones by such dreaded visitors as diphtheria. And there have been winters when war gripped this or that land and froze the joy of a nation.

But there has never been a winter when nearly all the world was at war. To the poor, the suffering, the homeless, the hopeless, winter is always a cruel tyrant, and never has the world known so many poor and suffering and homeless and hopeless women and children shivering in their loneliness before the blasts of winter.

The picture on this page is not very suggestive of winter nor of suffering. It might be the picture of the girls of some popular boarding school in a foreign land; or the picture of the members of a Sunday school on an Easter morning. But it is none of these. It is the picture, we are credibly informed, of some of the young women who escaped a fate that is worse than death which befell many innocent girls in Armenia during the recent massacres there.

The picture brings two ideas to mind: the hateful idea that war is still a factor in "civilization," though in its track lie ruined homes and the ruined lives of such as these; and the stimulating thought that it is always the high privilege of Christian people to combat the violence of war with the activities of Christian charity. These girls and thousands of others younger and older, little children, mothers, have been saved—and that word "saved" is a wonderful word in such a time of peril—for the most part by Christian agencies. It is good to look upon such a group and to realize that the millions of dollars of charity which have poured out of America into Europe have been for the benefit of whole populations of such people. But we are told that hundreds and thousands, yes, millions of people, chiefly those who are accustomed to the protection of husbands and fathers and brothers, are waging a hopeless battle for existence against the hard, cold and mighty fists of winter, which are now beating them down. They are without homes—or anything that can be called home by any stretch of the imagination. They are reduced to the scantiest supply of clothing. They are dependent for their food upon chance. They are the poorest of this earth's poor, and the saddest of this earth's broken-hearted today. We do not know their names, we do not know their histories, we do not know their hopes—that is, the hopes they once had. We only know that in Serbia and especially in Poland and in practically every section where the war has been and still is, there are multitudes of such sufferers. And we also know that in America there is "enough and to spare." And in our Father's house there is always enough and to spare. You and I know that. And only you and I know how much there is to spare in our own trust fund. For after all is it not true that all that we have is a trust fund?

The Story Will Tell You What This Group Represents

SO this is to remind you of the greatest of world needs. And to remind you that the Christian Herald relief committees abroad are still in existence, doing all that in their power lies to relieve suffering. Their power is determined by your gifts. We are glad indeed to administer your gifts through these excellent agencies. We remind you of this so that all who have enough and to spare and who wish to have a part in this, the greatest of world beneficences, may know that the Christian Herald Fund for the Relief of Widows and Orphans of the War is still open. Please address all gifts to the Widows and Orphans Relief Fund, Christian Herald, Bible House, New York.

Amarilly of Clothes-Line Alley

By BELLE K. MANIATES

Copyright, 1915, by Little, Brown & Co. All rights reserved

CHAPTER XXIV

ON the night of the auspicious occasion, Mrs. Jenkins's home presented a scene of festivity. Neighbors had loaned their lamps, and the brakeman had hung out his red lantern in token of welcome and cheer. It was, however, mistaken by some of the guests as a signal of danger, and they were wary of their steps lest they be ditched. Mrs. Hudgers ventured the awful prognostication that "mebby some of them Jenkins brats had gone and got another of them ketchin' diseases."

When they entered the house there was a general exclamation of admiration. The curtain partitions had been removed, and the big room was beautifully decorated with festoons and masses of green interspersed with huge bunches of June roses.

Derry and Flamingus received the guests. Upstairs the Boarder and brakeman were nervously awaiting the crucial moment. The door into the Annex was closed, for in the sitting-room was the little bride, her pale cheeks delicately tinted from excitement as Colette artistically adjusted the bridal veil, fastening it with real orange blossoms. Amarilly hovered near in an ecstasy which was perforce silent on account of her mouth being full of pins.

"There's Mr. St. John's carriage," she managed to murmur as she peered from the window.

Colette dropped her paper of pins, went hastily to the adjoining bedroom and slipped out again before John Meredith was ushered in where the surplice, immaculately laundered, was waiting to be donned by its original owner.

After slipping it on, John's hand from force of habit sought the pocket and there encountered something. He drew it forth wonderingly. It was a small silver-monogrammed envelope sealed and addressed to him in Colette's handwriting. He read the note once, twice, thrice. Then there was a knock at the door that led into the Annex sitting-room. He opened it to admit Amarilly.

"Are you ready?" she asked. "You're to go in with them. They—"

She paused and stared at him. The transformation in his face was wonderful.

"Yes, I am ready, Amarilly," he replied, and something in his voice sounded strange to her.

He followed her into the next room where the Boarder, awkward in his Sunday clothes, but regal in his pride in the little white-veiled figure at his side, was awaiting him.

John walked out into the Jenkins's part of the house with them, while Amarilly slipped home by way of the Annex bedroom.

The entrance was certainly effective to the neighbors.

"Ain't she a lily though!" "Look at that long veil onet!" "Jest like a picter!" "What a swell waist!" "That big bo'quet!" "I niver seed sech flowers afore." "That surplus makes it look like picters!"

All these comments were sweet music in Amarilly's ear. Only one person had regrets. Mrs. Hudgers was visibly disappointed.

"I thought they'd hev candles a-burnin'," she confided to Mrs. Huce. "Don't you know no better than that?" scoffed Mrs. Huce with a superior air. "Them things is only used by Irish folks."

Derry's dancing eyes looked to Colette for appreciation of this statement, but her eyes and attention were entirely for John.

The ceremony began. John's impressive voice, with its new pervading note of exultant gladness, reached them all, tempering even Derry's light-hearted mirth. It gave courage to the little bride whose drooping head rose like a flower, and a light shone in her eyes as she made the responses sweetly and clearly. It found echo in the Boarder, whose stooping shoulders unconsciously straightened and his voice grew clear and strong as he promised to have and to hold. It found a place in Colette's heart which sent illumining lights into her starry eyes.

When the solemn ceremony ended, and the Boarder and Lily Rose were pronounced man and wife, the guests flocked forward to offer congratulations. Then they were bidden to adjourn to the Annex, that they might view the bride's domain, while Mrs. Jenkins assisted by many helping hands set the long tables, a small one being reserved for the Boarder, the bride, Mr. Cotter, and Mrs. Jenkins and Iry.

"I thought they could eat more natural," whispered the considerate little Amarilly to Colette, "if there weren't no strangers with them."

Colette, John and Derry were also honored with a separate table. Mrs. Hudgers and Amarilly "dished up and poured" in the woodshed, while the boys acted as waiters, having been thoroughly trained by Amarilly for the occasion.

"Do you know," laughed Derry, "I was so surprised and relieved to find that the Boarder had a cognomen like other people. It never occurred to me before that he must of course have a name."

Colette smiled politely but perfunctorily. She was living too deeply tonight to appreciate wit. John, too, was strangely silent, his eyes resting often and adoringly upon Colette. Shrewdly Derry divined the situation and relieved it by rattling on with a surface banter that demanded no response.

"These refreshments," he observed, "are certainly the handiwork of my little maid. They have a flavor all her own. I am proud of Amarilly's English, too."

"I wonder," said Colette, "if you are doing quite right, Mr. Phillips, in improving Amarilly to such an extent? I am afraid she will grow beyond her family."

"No; even you, pardon me, Miss King, don't know Amarilly as I do. She couldn't get beyond them in her heart, although she may in other directions. Her heart is in the right place, and it will bridge any distance that may lie between them."

John looked up attentively and approvingly.

"Amarilly has too much aptitude for learning not to be encouraged, and I shall do more for her before long. We have pursued a select course of reading this winter. She has read aloud while I painted. We began stumbly with Alice in Wonderland and are now groping through mythology."

After refreshments had been served, Lily Rose went to her bedroom to don her traveling gown, and when the happy couple had driven away amid a shower of rice and shouts from the neighbors, John's carriage drew up.

"John," asked Colette, after a happy little moment in his arms, "did you read my note and did you see what the date was?"

"Colette, surely it was the dearest love-letter a man ever received. If I could have had it all these dreary months!"

"Do you wonder that I feared its falling into strange hands?"

"Tell me its history, Colette. How you recovered it, and why you thought it was in the surplice, in the first place?"

"I wrote it the day after you asked me—you know—"

There was another happy disappearance and silence before she resumed:

"I was sentimental enough to want to deliver it in an unusual way. I took it to Mrs. Jenkins's house the day your surplice was to be returned to you, and I slipped it inside the pocket. I wanted you to find it there on Sunday morning. I didn't know what to think when you looked at me so oddly that Sunday—yes, I know now that you were wondering at my silence. And when we came home in the fall and I learned from Amarilly that strangers might be reading and laughing at my ardent love-letter, which must have passed through many and alien hands, I was so horrified I couldn't act rational or natural. I was—yes, I will fess up, John—I was unreasonable, as you said and—No, John! wait until I finish before you—"

"You want to know how and where it was found? It seems, at the same time your surplice was laundered, a lace waist of mine was at their house. I didn't care for a 'fumigated waist,' so, like you, I made Amarilly a present perforce. She laid it away in its wrappings to keep until her wedding day. Out of the goodness of her generous little heart she loaned it to Lily Rose; and yesterday, when they were trying it on, Amarilly found my note in the sleeve. Mrs. Jenkins was appealed to and remembered that when the things were ready to be sent home, she found the note on the floor, and supposing it had fallen from the waist slipped it inside and forgot all about it. I decided that it should be delivered in the manner originally planned."

"But, Colette," he asked wistfully, a few moments later, "if you had never found it would you have kept me always in suspense and never have given me an answer? I began to hope, that night I called, that you were relenting."

"I was, John. Amarilly had been telling me of the Boarder's love for Lily Rose, and it made me lonely for you, and I determined in any event to give you your answer—this answer—tonight. And so I did, and—I think that is all, John."

"Not all, Colette."

CHAPTER XXV

THE dairy business continued to prove profitable to Gus, the cow remaining contented, loving and giving. One night, however, there came the inevitable reaction, and the gentle creature in the cow-shed felt the same stifling she had rebelled against on the night of the stampede when she had made her wild dash for liberty. Moved by these recollections, the sedate, orderly cow became imbued with a feeling of unrest, and demolishing the frail door was once more at large. In a frenzy of freedom she dashed about the yard. Her progress was somewhat impeded by contact with the surplice, which, pinned to the clothes-line, was flapping in the breezes. Maddened by this obstruction, which hung, veil-like, over her bovine lineaments, she gave a twist of her Texas horns, a tug, and the surplice was released, but from the line only; it twined itself like a white wraith about the horns.

Then the sportive animal frisked over the low back fence and across the hill, occasionally stepping on a released end of the surplice and angrily tearing her way through the garment. She made her road to the railroad track. That sight, awakening bitter memories of a packed cattle-car, caused her to slacken her Mazeppa-like speed. While she paused, the night express backed onto the side track to await the coming of the eastbound train. The cow, still in meditation, was silhouetted in the light of a harvest moon.

"This 'ere," a home-bound cattleman was saying to a friend on the platform, "is nigh onto whar we dropped a cow. I swar if thar ain't that blasted cow now, what? Know her from hoof to horn, though what kind of a Christmas tree she's got on fer a bunnit, gits me! Ki, yi! Ki, yi!"

At the sound of the shrill, weird cry, the animal stood at bay. Again came the well-known strident halloo. A maelstrom of memories was awakened by the call. Instinctively obeying the old summons she started toward the train, when from over the hill behind her she heard another command.

"Co, boss! Co, boss!"

The childish anxious treble rose in an imploring wail.

The cow paused irresolute.

"Co, boss!"

There was a note of entreaty, of affection, in the cry.

After all, domesticity was her birth-right. With an answering low of encouragement the black cow turned and trotted amiably back.

"Well, I'll be jiggered," said the cattleman, as the train pulled out. "I'd a swore it was old Jetblack. Maybe 'twas. She was only a milker anyway, and I guess she's found a home somewhere."

Gus with arm lovingly about the cow's neck walked home.

"Bossy," he said in gently reproaching tones, "how could you give me such a skeer? I thought I'd lost you, and I'd hev sure missed you—you, yerself—more'n I would the money your milk brings us."

Then for the first time the lad's eyes noted the decorated horns.

"What in thunder—"

He began to unwind the ribbons of white cloth.

"Gracious me! It's the surplus! What will Amarilly say—and Lily Rose? It's only fit fer carpet rags now. Well, if this ain't the end of the surplus after all it has went through! I wonder what bossy wanted of it anyway?"

Great was the joy of the Jenkinses at the restoration of the cow, but there was grievous lament from Amarilly for the fate of the precious garment.

"It was our friend—our friend in need!" she mourned.

"I'm so glad we hev a pieter of it," said Lily Rose, gazing fondly at the photograph of the Boarder in the saintly robes.

"I'll go and tell Miss King," said Amarilly the next morning. "She said she felt that the surplice would come to some tragic end."

"It was a fitting fate for so mysterious a garment," commented Colette.

"I don't see," meditated Amarilly, "what possessed the cow. She's been so gentle always, and then to fly to pieces that way, and riddle the surplice to bits!"

"It's very simple," said Colette. "I suppose she wanted to go to the train. And as nearly everyone else had worn the surplice on special occasions, she thought she could do the same; only, you see, never having been to church she didn't quite know how to put it on, and I suppose got mad at it because it didn't fit her and gave vent to her anger by trampling on it."

Amarilly's doleful little face showed no appreciation of this conceit.

"Don't look so glum, Amarilly. I have something to show you that will please you."

She opened a desk and took a thick, white square envelope from it.

Wonderingly Amarilly opened it and took out a folded, engraved sheet of thick paper. She read eagerly.

"Oh, oh!" she cried, looking up with shining eyes, which in another moment glistened through tears.

"Why, Amarilly, aren't you glad that I am going to be—"

"Mrs. St. John?" smiled Amarilly. "I think it's beautiful. And," anxiously, "you will surely be good to—him?"

"Yes," replied Colette softly. "I will be good—very good—to St. John. Don't fear, Amarilly."

A card had fallen from the envelope. Amarilly picked it up and read:

"To be presented at the church."

"What's that?" she asked curiously.

"You have to show that at the church door. If you didn't have it, you couldn't get in to see us married. It's the same as a ticket to a theater. And St. John doesn't like it; but if we didn't have them there would be a mob of curious people who don't know us. I shall give all of you tickets to come to the church, the Boarder and Lily Rose, too."

"Oh," cried Amarilly, "that will be lovely, and we shall all come."

"Of course you will all come. Your friend the bishop is to marry us, and Bud is going to sing a solo."

"I must go home and tell them all about it," said Amarilly excitedly.

"Wait! There is more to hear. I am going to invite you to the reception here at the house, and I am going to have a lovely white dress made for you to wear, and you shall have white silk stockings and slippers and white gloves."

"Oh," gasped Amarilly, shutting her eyes. "I can't believe it."

The next morning at the studio she announced the wonderful news to Derry.

"I just received an invitation, myself," he replied. "We will go together, Amarilly. I'll send you flowers and call for you with a taxicab."

"Things must stop happening to me," said Amarilly solemnly.

Derry laughed.

"When things once begin to happen, Amarilly, they never stop. You are to go from here now every day after luncheon to this address," handing her a card.

"Miss Varley," Amarilly read, "1227 Winter Street. Will she have work for me, too?"

"Yes; work in schoolbooks. She takes a few private pupils, and I have engaged her to teach you."

Amarilly turned pale but said nothing for a moment. Then she held out her hand.

"I will study hard—to pay you," she said simply.

"And can you stand another piece of exciting news, Amarilly? Sunset, which I have dawdled over for so long, drew first prize."

"Oh, Mr. Derry, that is best of all!"

"And do you know what I am going to give Mrs. St. John for a wedding present from you and me? The picture of The Little Scrub-girl."

To be continued

Velvet Grip

You know this trade-mark through national periodical advertising

BEFORE the days of nationally advertised trade-marks, competition was based almost entirely upon the price of goods to the middleman. The consumer had nothing to say about it.

The richest manufacturer could crowd out all of his lesser competitors by reducing prices temporarily below cost—thereby forcing them to sell out to him or go into bankruptcy—then he had a real monopoly and could cheapen quality and raise prices as much as he saw fit. When competition developed again, he could repeat the process—and he not only could do these things, but he did do them.

There can be no monopoly in advertising; therefore, today one manufacturer stands as good a chance as another to win favor for his trade-mark, so long as he backs up his advertising and his trade-mark with quality. And the trade-mark makes the consumer the deciding factor in all purchases, because it enables him to identify the goods. Trade-marks and the advertising that makes them known, are the two things that do most to standardize qualities, permanently reduce prices and prevent commercial piracy.

Trade-marks and national advertising are the two greatest public servants in business today. Their whole tendency is to raise qualities and standardize them, while reducing prices and stabilizing them.

CHRISTIAN HERALD

MEMBER OF THE QUOIN CLUB
THE NATIONAL PERIODICAL ASSOCIATION

50 Mends for 50 Cents

Genuine Solder

With an ordinary match it easily mends and solders metals permanently. Used by the housewife, farmer, electrician, automobilist, moving picture operator, jeweler, merchant and mechanic.

AGENTS WANTED

Show what it will do and it sells itself. Everybody wants SOLDERALL. Send 50c for large tube. Your money back if dissatisfied.

EMENAR CO.

47 E. 23rd Street NEW YORK CITY

The "BEST" LIGHT

Positively the cheapest and strongest light on earth. Used in every country on the globe. Makes and burns its own gas. Casts no shadows. Clean and odorless. Absolutely safe. Over 200 styles. 100 to 2000 Candle Power. Fully Guaranteed. Write for catalog. AGENTS WANTED EVERYWHERE.

THE BEST LIGHT CO.

470 E. 5th St., Canton, O.

Children's Christmas Delight

Their healthful, happy pastime can best be made bright with a Pony Buggy—Surely every child longs for

A Beautiful Pony Buggy Parents write for Colored Booklet No. 55, telling of Pony Vehicles and Harness, also list of Pony farms.

HOME PONY VEHICLE CO. CINCINNATI, O.

HAVE You a Camera? Write for samples of my magazines, American Photography and Popular Photography, which will tell you how to make better pictures and earn money F. R. FRAPRIE, 862 Pope Building, Boston.

DEAF?
"I Now Hear Clearly"

You, Too, Can Hear!

Inasmuch as 200,000 users of the "ACOUSTICON" have had the same results from it as Mr. Garrett Brown, whose photo appears above, we feel perfectly safe in urging every deaf person, without a penny of expense, solely and entirely at our risk, to accept a thorough trial of the

1916 Acousticon

No Deposit FREE No Expense

All you need to do is to write saying that you are deaf and will try the "ACOUSTICON." The trial will not cost you one cent, for we even pay delivery charges.

WARNING! There is no good reason why everyone should not make as liberal a trial offer as we do, so do not send money for any instrument for the deaf until you have tried it.

The "ACOUSTICON" has improvements and patented features which cannot be duplicated, so no matter what you have tried in the past, send for your free trial of the "ACOUSTICON" today and convince yourself—you alone to decide. Address

GENERAL ACOUSTIC CO., 1314 Candler Bldg., New York
Toronto, Ont. Office, Royal Bank Bldg.

CHRISTIAN HERALD MAGAZINE BUREAU

Below is a condensed list of periodicals from which selection can be made of one or more magazines at a price in some cases almost one-half of the regular price. Readers of the CHRISTIAN HERALD are thus enabled to order all magazines desired in a single order, with the assurance that it will be attended to promptly, accurately and at the lowest prices. Subscriptions are for one year and can be new or renewal, and can go to different addresses, except in a few cases noted otherwise. Canadian and foreign postage additional.

To determine the price of two or more magazines given in the list below: Add the class prices and multiply by five. The result will be the club price.

EXAMPLE
Christian Herald Class 23	Pictorial Review Class 25	McCall's Class 10
Total class numbers 58
Multiply by 5
Price of club $2.90

Class No.	Pubs. Price	Our Price	Class No.	Pubs. Price	Our Price
30 ADVENTURE with CHRISTIAN HERALD	$3.00	$2.65	10 McCALL'S with CHRISTIAN HERALD	$2.00	$1.65
17 AMERICAN BOY with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.50	2.00	with CHRISTIAN HERALD, To-Day's and Housewife	3.00	1.90
with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Pictorial Rev. (or Woman's Home Companion)	4.00	3.25	with CHRISTIAN HERALD, Mother's and Ladies' World (to one address except CHRISTIAN HERALD)	4.50	2.40
with CHRISTIAN HERALD, *Delineator and *Everybody's	5.50	4.00	20 McCLURE'S with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.50	2.15
25 AMERICAN MAGAZINE with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	2.40	25 METROPOLITAN with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	2.40
with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Woman's Home Companion (to same address)	4.50	3.15	17 MODERN PRISCILLA with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.50	2.00
with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Pictorial Review	4.50	3.65	with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Home Needlework	3.25	2.40
AMERICAN POULTRY ADVOCATE AND BOOK—200 EGGS A YEAR PER HEN with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	2.00	with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Pictorial Review	4.00	3.05
17 BOYS' LIFE with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.50	2.00	23 MOTHER'S MAGAZINE with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	2.00
with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Pictorial Review	4.00	3.25	with CHRISTIAN HERALD, McCall's and Ladies' World (to one address except CHRISTIAN HERALD)	4.50	2.40
17 BOYS' MAGAZINE with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.50	2.00	60 OUTLOOK with CHRISTIAN HERALD	4.50	4.15
with CHRISTIAN HERALD, McCall's, Housewife and To-Day's	4.00	2.75	8 PEOPLE'S HOME JOURNAL with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.00	1.55
with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Woman's Home Companion	4.00	3.25	25 PICTORIAL REVIEW with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	2.40
23 THE CHRISTIAN HERALD	1.50	1.50	with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Modern Priscilla	4.00	3.05
THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 3 years	4.50	3.00	with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Metropolitan	4.50	3.15
35 COLLIER'S WEEKLY with CHRISTIAN HERALD	4.00	3.00	with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Woman's Home Companion	4.50	3.65
with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Pictorial Review (or Woman's Home Companion)	5.50	4.15	40 REVIEW OF REVIEWS with CHRISTIAN HERALD	4.50	3.15
with CHRISTIAN HERALD, *Delineator and *Everybody's	7.00	4.90	with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Pictorial Review (or Woman's Home Companion)	6.00	4.40
16 COOKING CLUB MAGAZINE with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.50	1.95	SATURDAY EVENING POST with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	3.00
COUNTRY GENTLEMAN with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.50	2.50	50 SCRIBNER'S with CHRISTIAN HERALD	4.50	3.65
70 COUNTRY LIFE IN AMERICA with CHRISTIAN HERALD	5.50	4.65	17 SOMETHING-TO-DO with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.50	2.00
55 CURRENT OPINION with CHRISTIAN HERALD	4.50	3.90	50 ST. NICHOLAS with CHRISTIAN HERALD	4.50	3.65
with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Pictorial Rev. (or Woman's Home Companion)	6.00	5.15	8 TO-DAY'S with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.00	1.55
23 DELINEATOR with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	2.30	with CHRISTIAN HERALD, Housewife and McCall's	3.00	1.90
with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Everybody's (to one address)	4.50	3.15	55 TRAVEL with CHRISTIAN HERALD	4.50	3.90
with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Pictorial Review	4.50	3.55	25 WOMAN'S HOME COMPANION with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	2.40
with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Review of Reviews	6.00	4.30	with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Little Folks (new)	4.00	3.15
12 DESIGNER with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.25	1.75	with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Delineator	4.50	3.55
25 ETUDE (for music lovers) with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	2.00	with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Pictorial Review	4.50	3.65
25 EVERYBODY'S with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	2.40	with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Review of Reviews	6.00	4.40
with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Delineator (to same address)	4.50	3.15	12 WOMAN'S MAGAZINE with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.25	1.75
with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Pictorial Review (or Woman's Home Companion)	4.50	3.65	5 WOMAN'S WORLD with CHRISTIAN HERALD	1.85	1.55
23 GARDEN MAGAZINE with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	2.30	40 WORLD'S WORK with CHRISTIAN HERALD	4.50	3.15
GOOD HOUSEKEEPING with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	3.00	with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Woman's Home Companion	6.00	4.40
HARPERS' BAZAR with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.50	3.50	40 YOUTH'S COMPANION with CHRISTIAN HERALD and McCall's	4.00	3.25
70 HARPER'S MAGAZINE with CHRISTIAN HERALD	5.50	4.65	with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Woman's Home Companion	5.00	4.40
70 HARPER'S WEEKLY with CHRISTIAN HERALD	6.50	4.65	with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Pictorial Review	5.00	4.40
12 HOME NEEDLEWORK with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.25	1.75	SPECIAL COMBINATIONS WITH RELIGIOUS PAPERS
with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Woman's Home Companion	3.75	3.00
8 HOUSEWIFE with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.00	1.55	PROPHETIC AND MISSION RECORD, 3 yrs. Amer. Advent Miss. Soc. with CHRISTIAN HERALD	$1.85	$1.60 with CHRISTIAN HERALD, McCall's and To-Day's	3.50	1.90	AMERICAN MESSENGER with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.00	1.65
25 ILLUSTRATED WORLD with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	2.40	DAILY BIBLE with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.10	1.75
with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Pictorial Review	4.50	3.65	THE PROTESTANT MAGAZINE with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.50	1.95
55 INDEPENDENT with CHRISTIAN HERALD	4.50	3.90	RECORD OF CHRISTIAN WORK with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	2.00
50 JOHN MARTIN'S BOOK (Children) with CHRISTIAN HERALD	4.50	3.65	CHRISTIAN STANDARD with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	2.30
LADIES' HOME JOURNAL with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	3.00	CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR WORLD with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.00	2.50
15 LADIES' WORLD with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.50	1.90	PRESBYTERIAN BANNER with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.50	2.90
17 LITTLE FOLKS (new sub.) with CHRISTIAN HERALD	2.50	1.90	THE STANDARD (Baptist) with CHRISTIAN HERALD	3.50	3.00
with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Pictorial Review (or Woman's Home Companion)	4.00	3.15
45 McBRIDE'S with CHRISTIAN HERALD	4.50	3.40
with CHRISTIAN HERALD and Woman's Home Companion	6.00	4.65

(*Must go to same address) SEND ALL ORDERS TO CHRISTIAN HERALD MAGAZINE BUREAU, Bible House, New York, N.Y.

Young People's Topics for January 9

SUPPOSE, as the new year begins, we try to get our Christian Herald young church people into a little friendlier relations. Can't we help one another in other ways than merely studying together the weekly prayer meeting topics? There are problems you would like to ask about; or pieces of good news about your local work you would like to report, which would be helpful and suggestive for other places. Let's have a young people's convention of our own to ask and answer questions and to make reports. Address all communications to "Young People's Church Societies," Christian Herald, Bible House, New York.

Many have regretted the separation of the young people of the different denominations into separate organizations. It is hard to see why there should be three different young people's church societies with different names, any more than three separate Bible school institutions with different names instead of our great world-wide Sunday school movement.

But in the Christian Herald young people's page, workers and members of all these societies can unite in prayer, study and work. It is a step in the right direction that the Baptist Young People's Union and the Christian Endeavor Society are using, with occasional exceptions, the same prayer meeting topics. Can we not hope and endeavor to follow up this move for unity? Each denomination should, of course, retain its own young people's organization, but these should all be blended, as are the Sunday schools, into a world-wide union of Young Protestant Christians. Cannot the young people of the Christian Herald Family set an example of enthusiastic cooperation?

Why Join the Church?

Christian Endeavor and B. Y. P. U. Topic. Eph. 3: 8-21

SOME simple questions like this are still simpler if we put them the other way about. "Why not join the church?" Can any one think of a single good reason for not joining the church? When we have canvassed this question, we can take up the several hundred strong reasons for identifying ourselves with the church of Jesus.

A township in New York state was recently engaged in a strenuous fight against the saloon. The voters were bombarded with arguments why they should refuse to grant saloon licenses throughout the township. The great evils and enormous costs of the saloon business were emphasized. The idea occurred to a hearer as the campaign was being concluded, too late to be acted upon, but not too late to suggest for subsequent campaigns in that or any other locality, "Why should this small group of men be allowed to sell poison?" Considering all the facts, isn't it absurd to give permission to a hundred men to spoil the lives of several thousand? Isn't it absurd to expect intelligent men to vote for such a proposition? We put it to them wrong.

Now—why not join the church? You could afford to offer a prize to any one who would give you a sound reason.

The one big reason for joining the church is that every follower of Jesus wants to be in league with every other follower, helping all the rest do the things Christ left us to do when he went away. The committees selected a good scripture reference for this lesson, the wonderful prayer of Paul that the soul life of the Ephesian Christians might be deepened and that they might be filled with God's Spirit. That is an alluring offer. It draws us to Christ's fold and shows us the secrets of joy and success in Christian work. Here is another good passage: Phil. 1: 14-18. Paul speaks of the various motives that are leading different people to preach Christ; some of envy and strife, of contention, not sincerity, trying to add affliction to his bonds. But he says he is glad for all this. He was glad to have Christ preached, no matter what the motive was. So—our place is where people are talking about our Christ and trying, ever so feebly or inconsistently, to do his work. Others will point out the failures and faults of the church. But, granting all they say, why should you not join? The church is where you belong. The church will help you and you will help the church. If others are inconsistent, there is the challenge for you to be consistent; if others are indolent, there is the challenge for you to be industrious; if others are lukewarm, there is the challenge for you to come near to God and be filled with his fulness, his joy and his power.

The Beatitude of the Bringer of Good News

Epworth League Topic. Isa. 52: 7

THE saddest task in the world is to be the bringer of sad news. Many a brave man's heart has quailed before the assignment to tell some wife or mother that a son or husband has been killed. Nothing could be harder than that. But what can possibly be easier and gladder than to tell good news? And in many a pulpit where one would have a right to expect a gospel service, one hears nothing of the sort. Advice, warning, exhortation, scolding—but not good news. Yet it is the good news that will bring gladness and power to those who hear, and will react in tremendous blessing upon the soul of the announcer.

Good news—God loves. God forgives. God cleanses. God blesses. God strengthens. God saves. God will take us safely through death and into his homeland. God will help us to love and to help others. Good news. Glad news. Have we received the good news—and let it transform and light up our own lives? Are we receiving daily the blessing that comes for those who carry on the happy task of announcing the message?

Do You Know Your Bible?

Correct Answers to List No. 8 (Half-year Contest, List No. 3)

PHILEMON

- (a) Archippus. Philemon, 2. (b) Marcus, Aristarchus, Demas, Lucas, 24 (also Epaphras, 23).
- (a) Onesimus, 11. (b) 16. (c) "As a brother," 16, or "as myself," 17.
- (a) "In time past was unprofitable," 11; "If he hath wronged thee," 18. (b) "Whom I have begotten in my bonds," 10 (also 13). (c) "Put that on mine account," 18; "I, Paul, write it with mine own hand, I will repay it," (d) "Paul the aged," 9.

EPHESIANS

- (a) Tychicus, 6: 21. (b) No.
- (a) Gentiles. Ephesians, 2: 11, 12; 3: 1, 3: 8; 4: 17. (b) Through the shedding of Christ's blood on the cross, 2: 13. (c) "The law of commandments contained in ordinances," 2: 15.
- (a) An attitude of trust and belief. Eph. 1: 13. (b) They were filled with the Holy Spirit, 1: 13. (c) Acts 19: 1-7.
- (a) 1: 17-23; 3: 14-21. (b) To those who believe, 1: 19. (c) Through faith, 3: 17.
- (a) All the fulness of God, 3: 19. (b)

Honor Roll for List 8

(Half-year Contest, List 3)

MISS Ethel Barber, Charles W. Dickinson, Mrs. Arthur Du Boise, Mrs. J. W. Floyd, Mrs. Susan A. Glover, Mae Granger, Annie M. Grover, Della M. D. Harris, Inez Hopkins, Flora A. Johnson, Miss W. Nicholson, Mrs. Clement T. Pauli, Sister Lena Rasch, Mrs. G. L. Snyder, Miss E. L. Standiford, Annie G. Stine, Mrs. Edwin D. Ward.

Frank G. Carpenter on Alaska

ONE week from today you will step right into Alaska. Fifty million acres of possible farmlands will lie before you. The highest mountain peak in North America, and glaciers that dwarf those of the Alps will await your exploring footsteps. Rivers that are navigable hundreds upon hundreds of miles will carry you into regions where probably more mineral treasures are stored up than in any other one section of the globe. A people, said to be more interesting than any other race under the American flag, will greet you.

In another week you will begin to enter this land and behold its greatness. You will not even need to leave your fireside to do so. In fact we predict that you will be loath to leave your fireside at all until each week you have completed that week's instalment of the splendid article on Alaska by Frank G. Carpenter which will begin in the first 1916 number of the

CHRISTIAN HERALD

Mr. Carpenter is in the forefront of travelers who know how to tell what they see, and who know how to see everything worth while there is to see. The things before this that Mr. Carpenter has seen in various sections of the globe, have been read about with delight by hundreds of thousands, who have, in consequence, found their minds well furnished with the best of information on places throughout the world which they could never hope to see for themselves. And the same experience regarding Alaska awaits all readers of the Christian Herald in the coming year.

Christian Herald Books

Two Books by a Famous Pastor

Rev. J. H. Jowett, D. D., has been aptly described as the most spiritual preacher in America. He has written two volumes, "Thursdays for the Springs," and "Brooks by the Traveler's Way."

These two volumes, aggregating 530 pages, handsomely bound in cloth, will be sent together with the Christian Herald for one whole year, postpaid, for $2. Or, we will send to old subscribers, FREE, as a reward, these two volumes for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $1.50.

Margaret E. Sangster's New Book

"Read People and Dreams" contains about eighty poems and thirty-two short stories and sketches.

We will send this new volume by Margaret E. Sangster, Jr., handsomely bound in cloth, together with the Christian Herald for one whole year, postpaid, for $1.85. Or, we will send to old subscribers, FREE, as a reward, this volume for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $1.50.

"Forty Thousand Beautiful Quotations"

Some years ago the Christian Herald published a work entitled "Forty Thousand Sublime and Beautiful Thoughts." We have had so many inquiries for it that we have decided to republish it.

We will send you this volume, together with the Christian Herald for one whole year, for $3.00, or we will send to old subscribers, FREE, as a reward, "Forty Thousand Sublime and Beautiful Thoughts" for sending us two new yearly subscriptions to the Christian Herald with $3.00.

Luther in Light of Recent Research

While there are several lives of Luther, Professor Heinrich Boehmer's famous work, which has attracted universal attention in Europe, is one of the best that has ever appeared.

The Life of Luther, handsomely bound in cloth, will be sent together with the Christian Herald for one whole year, postpaid, for $2.25, or we will send to old subscribers, FREE, as a reward, this volume for sending us two new yearly subscriptions to the Christian Herald with $3.00.

A New "Do Something" Book

Did you read "Janice Day" which was offered with the Christian Herald last year? The success of the book was such that the author, Helen Beecher Long, wrote a sequel entitled "The Testing of Janice Day."

We will send "The Testing of Janice Day," 310 pages, attractive cloth covers, together with the Christian Herald for one whole year for $2.00, or we will send to old subscribers, FREE, as a reward, "The Testing of Janice Day," for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $1.50.

Our Art Calendar for 1916

This beautiful calendar is a reproduction of that remarkable picture of Christ walking beside the plowman in the field entitled "Lo, I Am With You Always."

We will send this superb calendar together with the Christian Herald for one whole year for $1.75, or to old subscribers sending us their renewal and one new subscription to the Christian Herald, we will send two copies of this calendar mailed to separate addresses if desired, FREE.

A Companion to the Bible

"555 Difficult Bible Questions Answered" is another book which has had a wonderful success during the past year.

We will send "555 Difficult Bible Questions Answered" together with the Christian Herald for one whole year for $1.85. Or, we will send to old subscribers, FREE, as a reward, this volume for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $1.50.

A Story for the Family Circle

We do not know when we have had quite as much pleasure in reading any book this year as "Little Sir Galahad."

"Little Sir Galahad," 376 pages, illustrated and handsomely bound in cloth, will be sent postpaid with one yearly subscription to the Christian Herald for $2.00. Or, we will send to old subscribers, FREE as a reward, this volume for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $1.50.

Our 1916 Almanac

Add ten cents to your subscription to the Christian Herald and we will send you the Christian Herald Almanac for 1916 postpaid.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York, N. Y.

The War in Europe

Continued from page 1326

driven into Montenegro and Albania, and consequently military operations against it have been completely transferred to those two fields.

Some Serbian stragglers behind the lines of the Teutonic Allies were gathered in in Serbia, but the greatest efforts that the Teutons are putting forth in that country are devoted to repairing the railway from Belgrade to Nish which the Serbians practically destroyed in their retreat, and to opening up the flooded copper mines in the north.

Montenegro the Austro-Hungarians are invading in three columns. The first, moving from the northern border, has forced its way well south, and at the end of the week was reported to have cleared the country as far south as Mojkovatz. The second is operating to the west from the White Brin river, and is reported to be master of all the country from that river to the north Albanian Alps, including the towns. In addition, this army is said to have forced some of the passes of these Alps and to be threatening the cities (for Montenegro, we would call them large villages) of Plava and Gusinje to the west of these mountains. A third force is working its way eastward from southern Herzegovina towards Cetinje, the capital of Montenegro.

Further south the Serbian army, which retreated into Albania, is being followed by the Bulgarians and is also being fiercely attacked by the Albanians themselves. Owing, however, to the extreme difficulty of getting news out of the very wild country in which this fighting is going on, we know only the bare outlines of what has occurred.

In southeastern Serbia, the Bulgarians have been completely successful in their operations against the French and British troops, and after severe fighting have forced these latter to fall back completely out of Serbia and into Greece; to positions south of Kilindir and Baialza. This fighting took place in the early days of the week and was for two or three days very bitter, both sides losing heavily in casualties. The Bulgarians also took a fairly considerable number of prisoners.

On the Allies entering Greece, the Greek government ordered its troops to completely evacuate the district between the Serbian and Bulgarian frontier, and Salonica, which was done. On leaving Salonica, the Greek general commanding handed the Allies a formal written protest of his government against the Allied occupation of Salonica, and particularly against their fortifying the town, a work on which they have been engaged for some time.

The situation seems to be that Greece abandons this part of her territory to the combatants and leaves them to fight it out, favoring neither. The Teutons and the Bulgarians have not yet crossed the frontier in force, though it is expected that they will do so; when the Allies will probably fall back to Salonica itself, where they will be to a degree under the protection of the guns of the Allied fleet.

In view of this probable ultimate retreat of the Allied forces on the city of Salonica, it becomes interesting to consider the topography of the surrounding country and the possibility of defending the city from the sea by the Allied fleets. This town of about 150,000 is situated on the west side of the Chalcidic peninsula, at the head of the Gulf of Salonica, and is built partly on the low ground on the edge of the bay and partly on the heights rising to the north, which heights and their continuations to the east and south form a sort of natural rampart surrounding the city on all but the western side.

The Bay of Salonica is surrounded on the east and south by the Calamarian heights, while on its northwestern and western sides lies the broad alluvial plain produced by the discharge of the Vardar and Bistritza rivers. Over this plain the guns of the warships would have full play. But to the northeast and south their range would be seriously shortened by the hills encircling the city. These hills, however, probably the land forces of the Allies would occupy with artillery.

The greatest danger to the Allied forces would seem to be of a bombardment from a great distance by the heavy Austrian mortars, which have proved so very effective elsewhere, and which could be placed in positions not reachable by the guns of the warships, and at too great a distance for the land artillery of the Allies to attack successfully. From the nature of the surrounding country it is possible that such attack as the Teutonic Allies make on the town will be made from the east.

Rumania still remains an uncertain factor, but the retreat of the Allies to the south and the non-activity of the Russian army on her northern frontier will hardly increase Rumania's desire to throw her lot in with the Entente powers, if such desire ever existed. In fact, there is more than one sign that Rumania is becoming convinced that the recovery of her lost province of Bessarabia from Russia would be more easy of realization than the taking of any part of the Transylvania from Austria. As Rumania is quite frankly out for anything she can get in the way of territory with the least effort, perhaps the prospect of Bessarabia will prove too tempting to be allowed to pass unrealized.

The very peculiar course of Italy, one of the Allies, in this Balkan campaign, in steering such an absolutely independent course, has puzzled many people. The explanation of this, according to the more serious Italian papers, is that Italy is unwilling to be dictated to by her allies; that she is their ally and not their vassal; that she has capable military commanders, and that the Italian general staff believes in a concentration of forces on vital points, and does not believe in embarking on hazardous adventures, which would at best only result in a temporary advantage. Besides these considerations Italy, according to these same sources of information, fears greatly that if she should put her military resources at the disposal of others, the gaps in the western line would be filled with Italian troops. Italy has, however, this week sent some additional troops to Albania to strengthen her forces in the towns on the Adriatic coast which she occupied early in the war.

The British press seems to think that Germany is now planning an attack on Egypt, and are advising that preparations to meet such an attack be immediately made by the government. Some color is given to this theory by the generally increased activity noticeable of late in the Sinai peninsula, where there has been considerable fighting of the skirmish order with varying results.

The western front has been very quiet all the week. General de Castlenau now actively commands the French army on this front, General Joffre's recent promotion to full command relieving him of the active oversight of the military situation here.

The simple truth of this western campaign seems to be that what are loosely described as the opposing lines are too strong to be broken through except at a cost which neither side is willing to pay. The positions are not lines; they are more in the nature of solids.

Winter has fallen in earnest upon the scene at Gallipoli peninsula, and it is said that both sides are suffering severely from the cold, which caught them to some degree, at least, unprepared.

Much interest is being manifested in England concerning the success of Lord Derby's recruiting plans, the last day of which was Wednesday, December 15, the period of trial having been extended to that date. A rush took place on the last days, but the results have not been tabulated sufficiently as yet to give definite figures. In any event it must be remembered that the recruits secured by this scheme will not be available for actual field service until they have spent at least eight months in training.

In Mesopotamia, the reports indicate that the British have been successful in holding their position at Kut-el-Amara against the repeated and vicious assaults of the Turks. These assaults have taken place daily during the past week, but the British claim that all have been repulsed, while the Turks claim no gains of moment.

KEEP YOUR CHILDREN STRONG

Some children catch one ailment after another, have colds after colds, while other children are seldom sick.

If your children are pale or frail, if they catch colds easily, lack ambition or are backward in school, they need SCOTT'S EMULSION which is rich in the food elements to create good blood to strengthen their bodies and brains—SCOTT'S EMULSION is free from alcohol or habit forming drugs.

CHILDREN RELISH IT. REFUSE SUBSTITUTES.

SCOTT & BOWNE, BLOOMFIELD, N. J.

NOW READY

The Forty-Second Volume

No other publication begins to furnish the inspiration, instruction and information for

Sunday School Teachers and Scholars

PRICE, $1.00 NET $1.15 DELIVERED

W. A. WILDE COMPANY

120 Boylston Street, Boston, Mass.
Rand-McNally Building, Chicago

DON'T Pay Two PRICES HOOSIER Stoves & Ranges FREE

Try in your own home for 30 days. Show your friends. Freight paid by us. Send it back at our expense if you do not want to keep it. You can buy the best at Actual Factory Prices. Our new improvements equal anything ever produced. Save enough on a single stove to buy your winter's fuel. ALL HOOSIER STOVES Guaranteed for Years. Send postal today for large FREE Catalogue, showing large assortment to select from. No Obligations.

HOOSIER STOVE CO.
164 State St., MARION, IND.

WANTED

In every town in the United States, an intelligent man or woman, boy or girl, to represent The Christian Herald. This is AN OPPORTUNITY To build up a business of your own, which should grow more and more profitable year after year. Address AGENCY DEPARTMENT The Christian Herald BIBLE HOUSE New York

BLMYER BELL CHURCH BELLS

UNLIKE OTHER BELLS SWEETER, MORE DURABLE, LOWER PRICE. OUR FREE CATALOGUE TELLS WHY.

Write to Cincinnati Bell Foundry Co., Cincinnati, O.

POULTRY SECRETS

Valuable 130-page data-book. Facts on lowering death rate, getting 100 per cent. hatches, highest prices, etc. Illustrates improved incubators. Write today. MODEL INCUBATOR CO., 26 Henry St., Buffalo, N.Y. Also 39 Barclay St., New York City

POULTRY PAPER 44-124 PAGE periodical, up-to-date; tells all you want to know about care and management of poultry for pleasure or profit. Four months for 10 cents. POULTRY ADVOCATE, Dept. 29, Syracuse, N. Y.

YOU CAN AFFORD Familiar Songs of the Cospel No. 1 or 2. Round or shape notes. $3 per hundred; samples, 5c each. Songs, words and music. E. A. K. HACKETT, FORT WAYNE, INDIANA

PATENT IDEAS WANTED. Manufacturers want clever ideas. Send for 2 free books; inventions wanted, etc. I get patent or no fee. Manufacturing facilities. RICHARD B. OWEN, 53 Owen Bldg., Washington, D. C.

KIDDER'S PASTILLES For 40 yrs. Standard Relief for Asthma (Inhalation) All Druggists; or by mail, 35c. STOWELL & CO., Manufacturers, Charlestown, Mass.

CHRISTIAN HERALD BOOKS

Two Books by a Famous Pastor

REV. J. H. JOWETT, D. D., has been aptly described as the most spiritual preacher in America. He has written two volumes, "Thirsting for the Springs" and "Brooks by the Traveler's Way." These delightful books are written in this great preacher's happiest vein and the gift of felicitous expression shines out on every page.

Dr. Jowett is a deep student of human nature. He has a faculty of kindling the finer emotions and awakening the noblest ambition. This was the impression on the minds of the editors of the Christian Herald after reading these two companion volumes. The books will be welcomed by thousands who will be glad of the inspiration they afford.

These two volumes, aggregating 530 pages, handsomely bound in cloth, will be sent together with the Christian Herald for one whole year, postpaid, for $2. Or, we will send to old subscribers, FREE, as a reward, these two volumes for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $1.50.

Margaret E. Sangster's New Book

MARGARET E. SANGSTER, JR., does not make up her stories and poems they just form themselves on the background of her mind as winter sprites trace wonderful pictures on windowpanes, and then simply because she cannot help herself, she sets down a description of these pictures. There are, in all, in her new book, "Real People and Dreams," about eighty poems and thirty-two short stories and sketches. This is the work of a genius.

We will send this new volume by Margaret E. Sangster, Jr., handsomely bound in cloth, with a new photographic frontispiece of Margaret E. Sangster herself, and with illustrations for a number of the poems, together with the Christian Herald for one whole year, postpaid, for $1.85. Or, we will send to old subscribers, FREE, as a reward, this volume for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $1.50.

"Forty Thousand Beautiful Quotations"

SOME years ago the Christian Herald published a work entitled "Forty Thousand Sublime and Beautiful Thoughts." It was composed of a collection of the best sayings on every conceivable subject which the compiler could come upon. In the course of time the edition of this book was exhausted. We have had so many inquiries for it that we have decided to republish it this year thoroughly revised. There are actually forty thousand quotations in this book. It will make a very valuable addition to your library.

We will send you this volume, together with the Christian Herald for one whole year, for $3.00, or we will send to old subscribers, FREE, as a reward, "Forty Thousand Sublime and Beautiful Thoughts" for sending us two new yearly subscriptions to the Christian Herald with $3.00.

Luther in Light of Recent Research

WHILE there are several lives of Luther, Professor Heinrich Boehmer's famous work, which has attracted universal attention in Europe, is one of the best that has ever appeared. It comes most opportunely in view of the approaching celebration of the four hundredth anniversary of the nailing of Luther's famous Thesis on the gate of the old castle church at Wittenberg, which was the beginning of the Reformation. The Christian Herald has had the good fortune to secure the exclusive American rights of this book and has had it translated by Professor Carl F. Huth, Jr., of the University of Chicago, who has succeeded in preserving the spirit and expression of the original in a remarkable degree.

The Foreword to Boehmer's work by Professor J. H. Robinson of Columbia University pays a high tribute both to biographer and to the translator who has made this book so readable to the average American.

The Life of Luther, handsomely bound in cloth, will be sent together with the Christian Herald for one whole year, postpaid, for $2.25, or we will send to old subscribers, FREE, as a reward, this volume for sending us two new yearly subscriptions to the Christian Herald with $3.00.

A New "Do Something" Book

DID you read "Janice Day," which was offered with the Christian Herald last year? You will remember it was the "Do Something" book. The success of the book was such that the author, Helen Beecher Long, wrote a sequel entitled "The Testing of Janice Day." It is a vivid and delightful picture of typical New England life and character.

We will send "The Testing of Janice Day," 310 pages, attractive cloth covers, together with the Christian Herald for one whole year for $2.00, or we will send to old subscribers, FREE, as a reward, "The Testing of Janice Day" for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $1.50.

Our Art Calendar for 1916

THIS beautiful calendar is composed of a reproduction of that remarkable picture of Christ walking beside the plowman in the field, which was published under the title of "Lo, I Am With You Always." The picture is described in verses by Margaret E. Sangster, Jr. This calendar is printed in eight colors, achieving a most beautiful effect. It will make a Christmas or New Year's present. It will remind your friends of you every day in the year.

We will send this superb calendar together with the Christian Herald for one whole year for $1.75, or to old subscribers sending us their renewal and one new subscription to the Christian Herald, we will send two copies of this calendar mailed to separate addresses if desired, FREE.

A Companion to the Bible

HAVE you bought your copy of "555 Difficult Bible Questions Answered"? Here is another book which has had a wonderful success during the past year and every lover of the Bible should possess a copy. Indeed it is a wonderful help to Bible study. This book is the result of research covering a period of twenty-seven years. Its theology is thoroughly sound.

The beauty of this book is that it answers those very questions which you are always on the point of asking but for some reason don't. These half thousand and more questions have been asked in one form or another by thousands and thousands of human beings like yourself and have been answered through the Christian Herald Mail-Bag by experts. The result is a book that is a "very present help in time of trouble" to the Bible reader.

We will send "555 Difficult Bible Questions Answered" together with the Christian Herald for one whole year for $1.85. Or, we will send to old subscribers, FREE, as a reward, this volume for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $1.50.

A Story for the Family Circle

WE do not know when we have had quite as much pleasure in reading any book this year as "Little Sir Galahad." There is so much that is charming and humorous and intensely human in the whole story that it appeals to the reader probably with greater force than if the action were on a more dignified level.

"Little Sir Galahad" is really a story of the golden age in our own time. That beautiful season that makes life radiant while it lasts.

It is as good a story as we have encountered in many a day, and that's saying a good deal.

"Little Sir Galahad," 376 pages, illustrated and handsomely bound in cloth, will be sent postpaid with one yearly subscription to the Christian Herald for $2.00. Or, we will send to old subscribers, FREE, as a reward, this volume for sending us one new yearly subscription to the Christian Herald with $1.50.

Our 1916 Almanac

DON'T forget the Almanac. This year it will be better than ever. In addition to its permanent features, its prose and poetry, its wit and humor, it will contain new departments such as the story of the European War up to date of going to press; it will contain political information which should be at the disposal of every voter in the Presidential Election of 1916. There will be a comprehensive description of the Lincoln Highway. There will be difficult Bible questions answered. There will be a department devoted to Common Law, and there will be many features of especial interest to women, and things here and there for many an hour's interested perusal.

Add ten cents to your subscription to the Christian Herald and we will send you the Christian Herald Almanac for 1916 postpaid.

Address, The Christian Herald, Bible House, New York

Chas. S. KIDDER & Co.

INVESTMENT BANKERS Est 1898

IN THE LONG RUN

Municipal Bonds, paying from 5% to 6% will afford as great satisfaction and yield as high a return, consistent with safety, as any investment security. Municipal Bonds are payable from regularly collected taxes, which taxes are a lien prior to the lien of a Mortgage or any other incumbrance upon property in the Municipality. Let us send you our offerings of Municipal Bonds—the safest form of investment known.

W.C.T.U. Bldg. Chicago, Ill.

Twenty Years' Experience

When you buy Municipal Bonds from us you are getting the benefit of our twenty years' experience as specialists in Municipal Bonds.

Your satisfaction with investments that you have purchased from this house has made Our Reputation valuable.

Write today and arrange for your next investment.

BOLGER, MOSSER & WILLAMAN

29 S. La Salle St. Chicago, Ill. Organized 1894

INVESTMENTS THAT ARE SOUND

Investment First Farm Mortgages, protected by the Federal Farm Mortgage Law, are the most conservative investments available.

6% Farm Mortgages

These are the most conservative investments available. They are secured by the Federal Farm Mortgage Law, and are payable from the net proceeds of the sale of the property.

E. J. LANDER & CO.
Grand Forks, N. D.
Est. 1883
Capital and Surplus, $400,000

TO CHRISTIAN HERALD INVESTORS:

Make your New Year's investments secure by selecting prime tax-protected MUNICIPAL DISTRICT 7, and 6% bonds such as we offer—amounts $100, $500 and $1,000 and upwards may be placed with thorough security and profitably. This is the time to buy good municipal bonds—why not get the benefit of a wise selection? Ask also for New Year's edition of "Investment Factors," just off the press. It contains a number of interesting and valuable features for conservative investors.

BOWMAN, COST & COMPANY

Investment Bankers

615 Third Natl. Bank Bldg., St. Louis, Mo.

TYPEWRITERS

FACTORY TO YOU

Write to us for a free booklet, "How to Buy a Typewriter." It tells you everything you need to know about typewriters. It is free of charge. Write to us today.

AMERICAN WRITING MACHINE CO., Inc., 345 Broadway, N. Y.

If you must buy a typewriter, buy a Remington. It is the most reliable and the most popular of all typewriters. It is the only one that has been in continuous production for over 40 years.

SPOONER & ROBINSON

FARM MORTGAGES

10 So. La Salle St. Chicago, Ill.

TYPEWRITERS ALL MARKS
Prices $15.00 up. SOLD or RENTED anywhere to 1/2 MANUFACTURER'S PRICE, allowing RENTAL TO APPLY ON PRIZE. Free Trial. Installment payments. Write to us today.

VIRGINIA FARMS $15.00 per acre and up. Easy payments. No dairy, stock. Mild climate. Ranges from 10 to 100 acres. On railroad. Best markets nearby. Write for full list, information and N. & W. Rwy. Homeowner. Free. E. F. LA BAUME, Agt., Norfolk & Western Ry., Room 327, N. & W. Bldg., Roanoke, Va.

WANTED AN IDEA!

Think of some SIMPLE THING TO PATENT. Protect your ideas. They bring you wealth. Write for "Neediest Inventions." RANDOLPH & CO., Dept. 96, Washington, D. C.

Lake Money for Your Church

1 New Collapsible Tube Shoe Polish. Different. Mrs. Pfeister sold 62 one-hour Good repeats. The prof. Complete outfit, consisting of Polish, Mitt and Tail Case, 12¢. Particularly good and long lasting free. AMILTON CO., Dept. 25, Toledo, Ohio

PATENTS That Protect and Pay
Advice and Fees FREE. Reasonable. Highest Referees. Best Services. ATSON E. COLEMAN, Patent Lawyer, Washington, D. C.

INVENTORS Do Not Sacrifice Your Inventions
Get full money value. RELIABLE Book Free. Write S. & A. B. Lacey, 610 Barrister Bldg., Washington, D. C.

Investment and Insurance Counsel

This department is maintained for the benefit of our regular readers; the service is offered entirely free of cost to them, and all correspondence is strictly personal and confidential, in so far as the identity of the inquirer is concerned. Always enclose letter postage and write name and address plainly, addressing your inquiry to Financial Editor, Christian Herald, Bible House, New York City.

Neither the Christian Herald nor any other publication can guarantee the value of investment securities. We do all we can, however, to make sure of the integrity of our advertisers before admitting them to our columns. Any advice given is an expression of our conclusions, based upon information we believe to be reliable, but we must not be held responsible, should any loss arise from its acceptance.

Answers to Financial Queries

MRS. "X", MICHIGAN. Yes, Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway preferred is a good investment for a woman.

B. M. S., IDAHO. Mineral Ridge Mining & Milling Company, Coeur d'Alene, is listed among the "dead" mining companies.

E. M., MAINE. Western Union is prospering, as is evidenced by the recent extra dividend. The stock looks like an attractive investment for a business man.

MRS. C. P., FLORIDA. St. John levee and drainage district of Missouri 6 per cent. bonds are highly recommended by the bankers. They are due serially, June 1, 1918-1935.

C. C. W., IOWA. We have never recommended Alaska Gold for we believed it was a very speculative issue. The recent slump is unfortunate, but its coming was inevitable.

N. O. D., CONNECTICUT. You did well to hold your American Express stock instead of selling at the low points. The increase in the dividend to $1.50 reflects a more prosperous condition.

L. S. W., NEW JERSEY. Federal Dye-stuffs and Chemical is a new issue recently brought out on the curb at 45. Manipulation has sent the stock up about 10 points. It is highly speculative. Leave it alone.

H. H. O., MASSACHUSETTS. The accident association you ask about has a fair rating, but we should much prefer a policy in the Travelers of Hartford Co., an infinitely stronger company, offering accident insurance at low rates.

W. J. D., PENNSYLVANIA. Tonopah Mining Co. stock is quoted around $7 per share. We learn that the output from the different levels and various sections of the mine is being well maintained and development work is progressing without interruption.

E. P. D., TEXAS. The Supreme Court of Connecticut has taken control of the failed Middlesex Banking Company out of the hands of the receivers and given it to the Middletown Trust Company. Liquidation will be very slow and the 5,000 bondholders are in for many a headache. There is nothing you can do.

G. D. J., NEW YORK. Long Island Railroad first mortgage 7's represent a first lien on the main line Long Island City to Greenport about 155 miles. The bonds are due to be paid August 1, 1918. There are very few of the $100s in existence. If you can get hold of these bonds, without paying too much premium, buy them.

A. D. D., WEST VIRGINIA. It is impossible for the Christian Herald to know the value of farm property standing as security for a loan. The firm offering the loan certifies as to this. The latter's rating is high and from the fact that they have been engaged in the business for more than 30 years we presume their statements may be accepted at par.

H. E. R., NEW YORK. (1) We cannot advise in matters relating to grain speculation. (2) Approved first mortgages on Chicago real estate are sound investments. They offer the investor a maximum interest yield. But the standing of the firm is a matter of vital importance to you, this you have not mentioned. (3) Communicate with our advertisers.

MRS. A. P. M., WISCONSIN. We can not recommend Florida 8 per cent. mortgages. Moreover, why should you send money 2,000 miles to Florida for investments of any kind? Keep your money in your own state. Invest in good public service bonds of Wisconsin corporations. You can obtain as high as 6 per cent. for your money in these securities without undue risk.

J. Y. C., PENNSYLVANIA. First preferred stock of United Gas & Electric Corporation is cumulative as is also the second preferred. Accrued dividends on the preferred issues amount to $789,978. From the fact that the first preferred dividends are again to be paid it might be supposed that the quotable value of the stock would appreciate. The common stock is far removed from dividends.

J. A. C., OHIO. Neither Rock Island nor Missouri Pacific are investment stocks. Both are decidedly speculative and their future is most uncertain. Both properties are in the hands of receivers. In buying Missouri Pacific you are obligating yourself to pay an assessment equivalent to $50 per share. No assessment announcement has yet been made by the Rock Island receivers, but it is probable that a large one will be named. Assessment-paid stock, all too often, eventually sells for less than amount of assessment.

D. M. C., ILLINOIS. (1) Emerson Phonograph has not reached an investment rating far too speculative for you. (2) Republic Iron & Steel common sold as low as 19 last February. With the stock now selling 40 points above the low we must decline to advise in the matter of a sale, or the purchase of additional stock. The company passed all production records in November in pig iron production, ingots and fabricated steel products. It is reported 12 per cent. is being earned on the common stock.

MRS. S. S. D., NEBRASKA. (1) Fort Dodge, Des Moines & Southern Railroad Co. 1st mortgage 5 per cent. gold bonds are issued in the denomination of $100 and $500. The serial maturities and stringent mortgage provisions assure a constantly increasing equity, thus annually increasing the volume of security back of the bonds remaining in the hands of investors. Buy one of the $500s and two of the $100s. (2) 50 shares of the First National Bank of Kearney, Neb., were sold at public auction in New York recently at $15 for the lot.

G. C. W., OHIO. Nearly all the stock of the Oxford Linen Mills was exchanged for stock in the Phoenix Linen Mills. Old Oxford Linen Mills stock is now valueless. Stock of the Phoenix Linen Mills possesses only a "problematical value" according to the company's representative at 11 Broadway. As you are doubtless aware the original Oxford Linen Mills stock was sold to the public by the Sterling Debenture Corporation, the proprietors of which were convicted of fraud in the sale of this stock by the United States government and sent to a penitentiary for long terms.

E. Y. D., INDIANA. (1) We have noted your exception to our stated belief that many industrial stocks have reached the top and are now on the decline. Since we made that statement, November 15, the stock market has given abundant evidence we were not wrong. (2) The following public utility bonds may be bought at prices to yield more than 5 1/2 per cent.:

Central Illinois P. S. 1st ref. 5s	yield 5.50%
Pacific Gas & El. Gen. & ref. 5s	" 5.60%
Tri-City Ry. & Lt. 1st & ref. 5s	" 5.75%
Northern Miss. Ry. Pwr. 1st 5s	" 5.42%
Long Island Lighting 1st 5s	" 5.62%

F. G., NEW JERSEY. You state that you have come into possession of $4,500 from a maturing life insurance policy and desire to invest in railway securities. We should buy 5 shares Atchison common, 5 shares Baltimore & Ohio pref., 5 shares Union Pacific pref., 6 $100 New York Central 6 per cent. Debentures; one $500 Southern Pacific 5 per cent. Convertible; one $500 Chesapeake & Ohio 4 1/2 per cent. Convertible; and one $500 Norfolk & Western 4 1/2 per cent. Convertible. The above will call for a total expenditure of about $4,500 including accrued interest and brokers' commission. These securities are listed on the N. Y. Stock Exchange and can be instantly sold.

MRS. C. K., NEW YORK. The Kentucky 6s are practically out of the market and hard to get. The offer made by the firm to repurchase your bonds at an advance has no significance whatever. The firm states that they have accumulated a somewhat large demand from their clients for more of these bonds, and not being listed on the exchange and thus not having the advantage of an open market which the firm can go into and bid for the bonds they must, perforce, deal direct with their customers and offer them the highest market price. Then, if their customers want to sell they can do so. But we see no good reason why you should dispose of your bonds which you bought for investment and not for a few dollars' profit.

This page went to press December 14, 1915

A Wide Selection of Conservative Investments

We have prepared a special list of our recommendations for your January funds. This includes first mortgage bonds and farm and city mortgages, and the wide variety assures your finding an investment suitable to your requirements.

Denominations—$100, $500 and $1,000

Maturities—1 to 20 Years

Yield—5 per cent to 7 per cent

Location of Security—in various parts of the United States and Canada.

Send for Circular No. 900-C

Peabody, Houghteling & Co.

(Established 1865)

10 So. La Salle Street Chicago

The Growing Demand for well-secured Public Utility Bonds and Notes indicates a future scarcity of supply and a corresponding rise in their prices.

We recommend for present investment

6% TEN YEAR BOND and 6% BOND SEC. NOTE of two established companies, each yielding slightly over

Ask for Circulars H-1 and H-2

A. H. Bickmore & Co.
111 BROADWAY, N. Y.

53 Communities situated in

5 States are served by the 12 public service companies comprising the United Light & Railways Co.

Diversification of service and breadth of territory afford every opportunity for the continued growth of this Company's business.

We recommend for investment the Bonds and Notes of this company.

Send for Circular

N. W. Halsey & Co.

New York Philadelphia Chicago San Francisco

FORMAN FARM MORTGAGES

6% Did you ever reflect on the many advantages to be derived from trading with a Banking House of long standing and established reputation? We are pleased to offer our services to investors, large and small. Write today and establish a connection with us.

George M. Forman & Company
(Established 1885) 11 South La Salle St., CHICAGO

L. R. LATROBE & Co.

STOCK EXCHANGE SECURITIES
STANDARD OIL STOCKS
ALL CURB SECURITIES

111 Broadway New York
Partial Payment Plan and Investor's Guide (270 pages), revised to date, also Market Letter mailed free on request.

zinc

For big contract jobs consult our Research Bureau

Duplex-Richmond, Va.
Box 1656 (Archer G. Jones)

.....

Examine a Copy Free Return this ad., and state that you will return the book in good condition in ten days or we'll send you to pay for it. Unusually Effective Songs.

The Chas. Reign Scoville Publishing Co., 2207-2209 Van Buren St., Chicago, Ill., C. Har.

WAR

Prepared book, "OUR NEAR FUTURE" by Walter D. Weyl, 1918, 128 pages, 10¢. "The War has become involved with the 6 reports and 14 buttons, the destruction and the fighting, the new and the old, the future and the past." Intensely interesting and memorable. B. L. 20 pages, 10¢. 10¢.

LEADER, HANDED, 10¢. 10¢.

Does YOUR Church use this clean and sanitary method? Send for catalog and special offer. Outfits on trial.

Thomas Communion Service Co. Box 150 Lima, Ohio

Long Beach, Calif.; Spalding, Canada (that young people in this community may take an interest in the church and Sunday school); Glasgow, Ky.; Hartwick, N. Y.; Greenville, Ohio; Elizabethtown, Pa.; Danbury, Conn.

Special prayers are asked that God will greatly bless the meetings conducted by Mr. Sherwood Eddy in Lucknow and Calcutta, India. Also his special evangelistic campaign for colleges and the teachers' convention to be held at Travancore.

*A man should be a Christian in his walk,
As well as be a Christian in his talk.*

We'll save you the price of this farm weekly
before you buy it

—An offer on which you can't lose

TAKE the hardest problem on your farm—the thing that's costing you money because you don't know what to do about it.

Maybe it's a poor crop, or a pest, or sick poultry, or a building to put up, or what not.

Sit down now and write us about it.

We'll put your question up to one of our 100 experts—actual practical farmers and well-known authorities.

It costs you nothing

We'll promptly send you the answer—absolutely free. We pay the expert's bill.

When you have done what he advises, and have satisfied yourself that our help has saved you money—$2, or $10, or $100—then, if you want to, send us one dollar and get a year's subscription—52 issues of

The COUNTRY GENTLEMAN

There is no string to it. You don't have to subscribe. The advice is yours and you are under no obligation to us.

Send us that hard question today.

THE COUNTRY GENTLEMAN, BOX 581,

Independence Square, Philadelphia

The Country
Gentleman

Box 581

The Curtis
Publishing Company

Independence Square, Philadelphia

Enclosed please find $1.00 (Canadian price $1.75). Please send The Country Gentleman for one year to the address below:

Name _____

Address _____

R. F. D. Route _____

USE THIS COUPON WHEN YOU'RE CONVINCED

Back home for a real New Year's dinner.

Absolutely necessary to make the New Year's Feast complete

In over a million homes throughout the country, Arbuckles' Coffee will be absolutely necessary to make the New Year's feast complete.

The women of these homes know the importance of having the right coffee—for three generations they have known that in Arbuckles' Coffee they get just the flavor everyone enjoys.

If you have not tasted it lately, serve it now. At your New Year's dinner, get all the enjoyment good coffee gives.

This is the signature you save.

By far the most popular coffee in America

ARTHUR
SHEPHERD

